

THE LIBRARY
OF
THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA
DAVIS

A POPULAR
HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

DURING THE REIGN OF VICTORIA.

EDITED BY

MADAME GUIZOT DE WITT,

FROM NOTES AND DOCUMENTS

BY

FRANÇOIS PIERRE GUILLAUME GUIZOT, LL.D.,

MEMBER OF THE FRENCH ACADEMY, THE ROYAL SOCIETY (LONDON), THE SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES (LONDON); AMBASSADOR AT THE COURT OF
ST. JAMES; PRIME MINISTER OF FRANCE
UNDER LOUIS PHILIPPE, ETC.

ESTES AND LAURIAT'S
LIBRARY OF STANDARD HISTORY.

GUIZOT'S POPULAR HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE ACCESSION OF VICTORIA.

Four Vols., Royal Octavo.

GUIZOT'S POPULAR HISTORY OF FRANCE,

FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE FIRST REVOLUTION.

Six Vols., Royal Octavo.

HENRI MARTIN'S POPULAR HISTORY OF FRANCE,

FROM THE FIRST REVOLUTION TO THE PRESENT TIME.

Three Vols., Royal Octavo.

ALFRED RAMBAUD'S POPULAR HISTORY OF RUSSIA,

FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO 1880.

Three Vols., Royal Octavo.

Each of the above works are issued in uniform style. They are illustrated with wood and steel plates, by the best artists, are printed in the best manner, on superfine paper.

PRICE PER VOLUME:

Cloth, Bevelled,	$5.50
Library Sheep, Marbled Edge,	6.50
Half Calf, Extra; " "	7.50
Half Mor., " " " "	7.50
Full Morocco, or Tree Calf, Gilt,	10.00

E.W. Stodart. Sculpt.

VICTORIA.

Edes & Lauriat Boston

GUIZOT'S
POPULAR HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

FROM THE ACCESSION OF VICTORIA.

1837—1874.

EDITED BY MADAME GUIZOT DE WITT,

FROM NOTES AND DOCUMENTS

By M. GUIZOT,

AUTHOR OF "A POPULAR HISTORY OF FRANCE," "A POPULAR HISTORY OF ENGLAND,"
"THE HISTORY OF CIVILIZATION," ETC.

TRANSLATED BY M. M. RIPLEY.

CONTAINING ILLUSTRATIONS, AND A FULL INDEX TO GUIZOT'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND, FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES.

BOSTON:
DANA ESTES AND CHARLES E. LAURIAT, 301 WASHINGTON STREET.

COPYRIGHT, 1881,
BY ESTES AND LAURIAT.

BOSTON STEREOTYPE FOUNDRY,
NO. 4 PEARL STREET.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

CHAPTER	PAGE
I. THE ACCESSION.	13
II. WARS AND RUMORS OF WAR.—THE EAST.	33
III. SIR ROBERT PEEL AND THE CORN-LAWS.	57
IV. IRELAND.	90
V. FOREIGN POLICY.	99
VI. EUROPEAN DISTURBANCES.—DOMESTIC PEACE.	125
VII. THE FRUITS OF PEACE	151
VIII. THE CRIMEAN WAR.	171
IX. THE INDIAN MUTINY.	236
X. THE TORY ADMINISTRATION.	280
XI. THE LIBERALS WITHOUT REFORM.—EASTERN DIFFICULTIES.	301
XII. WESTERN TROUBLES.—THE WAR IN THE UNITED STATES.	317
XIII. INSURRECTION IN JAMAICA.—CONTINENTAL CHANGES.—AFFAIRS AT HOME.—THE ABYSSINIAN WAR.	351
XIV. MR. GLADSTONE'S ADMINISTRATION.	381

LIST OF STEEL ENGRAVINGS AND MAPS.

VICTORIA	Frontispiece
THE THAMES EMBANKMENT	26
THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT FROM WESTMINSTER BRIDGE	64
THE RIGHT HON. B. DISRAELI	76
THE NATURAL HISTORY MUSEUM, SOUTH KENSINGTON	162
MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR	184
PLAN OF SEVASTOPOL FULLY INVESTED BY THE ALLIES	200
PLAN OF BALACLAVA	210
FIELD MARSHAL LORD RAGLAN, K. C. B.	225
LORD PALMERSTON	350
GLADSTONE	380
H. R. H. THE PRINCE OF WALES	406

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS.

	PAGE
The Youthful Queen	14
Victoria at the Age of Eight	14
Marshal Soult	16
M. Thiers	35
An Egyptian Temple	40
English Legation at Shanghai	46
Calcutta	56
Windsor Castle	56
Daniel O'Connell	90
Louis Philippe	101
View of the City of Morocco	106
Marshal Bugeaud	108
Battle of Islay	110
Lord Aberdeen	115
Robert Peel	136
Wellington	148
Victoria	151
A Mohammedan at Prayer	172
View of Constantinople	177
A Bulgarian Soldier	179
Charge of the Light Brigade	205
View of Sevastopol	214
Capture of the Malakoff	230
Fortress of Kars	232

	PAGE
Scene in a Chinese Harbor	237
Pagoda, Bombay	239
Mausoleum at Lahore	242
Palace and Park of the Grand Mogul	244
View in the Himalayas	246
Mahratta Procession	251
The Imambarra, Lucknow	269
Scindia, Prince of Gwalior	271
Australian Pioneers	287
Lord John Russell	301
Porcelain Tower, Pekin	308
Garden of the Summer Palace, Pekin	312
The San Jacinto stopping the Trent	327
Combat between the Kearsarge and the Alabama	332
Admiral Farragut	332
Park in the City of Mexico	337
Royal Palace at Copenhagen	345
View in Hyde Park, London	364
M. Guizot	391

A POPULAR HISTORY OF ENGLAND

DURING THE REIGN OF VICTORIA.

CHAPTER I.

THE ACCESSION.

KING WILLIAM IV. was dead (June 20, 1837), and the Princess Victoria, the only child of the Duke of Kent, fourth son of King George III., became queen of England. This was something more than the close of one royal life and the dawn of a new reign. Without the foundations of society or of the throne being shaken, without the occurrence of any of those dangerous shocks which exhaust and shorten a nation's life, it was the opening of a new era in the career of England. Henceforth the sovereign was to advance freely with the nation in a more liberal and sometimes even a venturesome path. Queen Victoria was to accept simply and frankly the place made for her by her country's progress in consequence of the Reform Bill and the increasing authority of the House of Commons; without relinquishing her rightful share in the government,—a share more real and more important than has often been believed,—she was never to embarrass the truly sovereign action of the country itself in the conduct of its own affairs. She was destined to become, par excellence, that which she to-day is, for the happiness and greatness of England, — the constitutional sovereign of a free country; unreservedly and avowedly admitting the operation of those parliamentary institutions, the slow product of ages in England's history, which all nations have sought and are still vainly seeking to imitate.

The Princess Victoria was eighteen years of age; brought up far from the court by her widowed mother, she was almost unknown to those even whose duty it was to announce to the new queen her accession. The Archbishop of Canterbury and the lord chamberlain arrived at five in the morning at Kensington palace, where the Duchess of Kent resided. All the gates were shut, and it was with some difficulty that they obtained admittance to the presence of the princess, awakened suddenly by their message.

At eleven o'clock the Council met, and the young queen presided. Mr. Charles Greville, secretary of the Privy Council, has related, with an amiability unusual to him, this first entrance of the sovereign upon her public duties:

“The king died at twenty minutes after two, yesterday morning, and the young queen met the council at Kensington Palace, at eleven. Never was anything like the first impression she produced, or the chorus of praise and admiration which is raised about her manner and behavior, and certainly not without justice. It was very extraordinary, and something far beyond what was looked for. Her extreme youth and inexperience, and the ignorance of the world concerning her, naturally excited intense curiosity to see how she would act on this trying occasion, and there was a considerable assemblage at the palace, notwithstanding the short notice which was given. The first thing to be done was to teach her her lesson, which, for this purpose, Melbourne had himself to learn. . . . She bowed to the lords, took her seat, and then read her speech in a clear, distinct, and audible voice, and without any appearance of fear or embarrassment. She was quite plainly dressed, and in mourning. After she had read her speech, and taken and signed the oath for the security of the Church of Scotland, the privy councillors were sworn, the two royal dukes first, by themselves; and as these two old men, her uncles, knelt before her, swearing allegiance and kissing her hand, I saw her blush up to the eyes, as if she felt the contrast between their civil and their natural relations; and this was the only sign of emotion which she evinced. Her manner to them was very graceful and engaging; she kissed them both, and rose from her chair, and moved toward the Duke of Sussex, who was farthest from her, and too infirm to reach her. She seemed rather bewildered at the multitude of men who were sworn, and who came, one after another, to kiss her hand; but she did not speak to anybody, nor did she make the slightest difference in her manner, or show any in her countenance, to any individual of any rank, station, or party. I particularly watched her when Melbourne and the ministers, and the Duke of Wellington, and Peel, approached her. She went through the whole ceremony, occasionally looking at Melbourne for instruction when she had any doubt what to do, which hardly ever occurred, with perfect calmness and self-possession, but at the same time with a graceful modesty and propriety particularly interesting and ingratiating."

VICTORIA AT THE AGE OF EIGHT.

THE YOUTHFUL QUEEN

"If she had been my own daughter, I could not have wished her to do better," said the Duke of Wellington. The admiration felt by the principal personages of the kingdom, first admitted to the presence of the young sovereign, rapidly spread throughout the nation; Queen Victoria was saluted with eager delight by a people who, through all the vicissitudes of a long reign, have never forgotten those first transports of affection and of joy.

The accession of the young queen to the English throne was the signal for the separation of Hanover from the crown of England. The electoral dignity of Hanover being hereditary in the male line, the territory united with England by George I. now fell to the share of the eldest of George III.'s surviving sons, the Duke of Cumberland, not long since rendered distinguished by his military achievements, but, with good reason, unpopular, in England. The separation of the two crowns, however, caused no regret to the English nation, who had often found themselves entangled in continental affairs on account of the undisguised interest the Hanoverian kings had manifested in the welfare of their hereditary states. The royal house of Hanover henceforth ruled independently its two nations, nor was any one clear-sighted enough to foresee at that time the shocks which were to overthrow the more modest of these two thrones.

The coronation of the young queen did not take place until a year after her accession. On this brilliant occasion it was observed, with a satisfaction not unmingled with surprise, that the populace of London gave an enthusiastic welcome to Marshal Soult, ambassador extraordinary from Louis Philippe. He had been the last in France to fight against the English, at the battle of Toulouse, and the recollection of past feuds added a rare savor to the joys of peace. "The English cried, 'Hurrah for Soult!'" he said, some years later, in the Chamber of Deputies; "I had learned to esteem them upon the field of battle, I have learned to esteem them in peace; I am ardently a partisan of the English alliance."

Politics had not occupied a large share in the attention of the young queen, but she had been brought up under the influence of the Whigs, and on ascending the throne she found them in power. Lord Melbourne, the premier, was the least radical of his party, impartial by reason both of indifference and of good sense, a judicious epicurean, an agreeable self-seeker, cool and gay, mingling a natural authority with a negligence which he took pleasure in carrying even to exaggeration. "I don't care," was his habitual expression. The queen soon became much attached to him; he amused her as well as advised her, and had an affectionate freedom in his intercourse with her which was almost fatherly. The Tories soon became extremely jealous of Lord Melbourne's personal influence over the young sovereign. "We have no chance at all," said the Duke of Wellington; "I have no small-talk, and Peel has no manners." The penetration and good sense of the queen soon taught her to recognize superior merit hidden under a cold or unattractive exterior, but she always preserved her affection for Lord Melbourne, even after the necessities of public affairs obliged her to separate from him.

The first difficulties of Queen Victoria's government arose from Canada. The population of Lower Canada had remained French in manners and habits, even after the misfortunes and faults of Louis XV. had delivered the province over to England. It had struggled long and passionately to remain faithful to that France who was not able to keep her colonies, but has left her ineffaceable stamp everywhere, and the tender memory of her rule. The colonists of Upper Canada, English in origin, whether coming directly from the mother-country, or coming in over the border from the United States, had by degrees gained an importance and taken a control in the affairs of the colony which threatened to become preponderant. The strife of rival tendencies and influences had brought about between the two populations an antagonism which manifested itself especially in the conflict of the two legislative bodies, one named by the crown, the other elected by popular suffrage. The animosity was carried so far that the representative assembly refused to vote subsidies. This legal resistance shortly became open revolt, active and enduring in Lower Canada, soon and easily repressed in Upper Canada. In the latter province, Major Head, the governor, contented himself with calling out the militia and invoking the aid of all well-disposed citizens against the rebels; for the pacification of Lower Canada, all the regular troops had been required. Parliament suspended the constitution of Lower Canada, still in large measure stamped with French traditions, and the ministry appointed as governor-general Lord Durham, son-in-law of Lord Grey, and confided to him almost dictatorial powers.

The new governor of Canada had been a member of the ministry which had accomplished the work of parliamentary reform; he was ardent, eloquent, sincere in the enthusiasm of his views and of his character. His disposition was capricious, and his best friends dreaded his explosions of temper. He might save Canada, or he might ruin it. Canada was saved through the audacity of Lord Durham's measures, and the governor himself was ruined by them.

The armed rebellion had already been suppressed when the governor-general arrived at Quebec, towards the close of May, 1838; the chief leaders had quitted the colony, a few others were in prison. Lord Durham perceived that it would be impossible to have them judged by the ordinary tribunals; the jury were sure to acquit them without exception. He did not institute a higher court, but, proclaiming an almost general amnesty, he excepted from it those only who had fled the country and those now in prison who had been openly implicated in acts of high treason. In the exercise of his supreme authority, he transported the prisoners to the Bermuda Islands, and pronounced sentence of death against those excepted from the amnesty who should attempt to return into the colony. In all his measures for the re-establishment of a settled government, he set aside the provisional council which had been formed to replace the suspended laws, and ruled alone, with the assistance of his secretaries and aids-de-camp. The power which he exercised was absolute. Such was, in his mind, the mission with which he had been charged.

Parliament judged otherwise. When the news of Lord Durham's dictatorial acts reached England, the opposition seized upon them at once with an eagerness which united in the same attack Lord Brougham and Lord Lyndhurst. The ministry yielded, and disowned the acts of Lord Durham. The latter learned by an American newspaper that he had been thus cast off, and his resignation crossed on the way the official announcement that his conduct had been disapproved at home. Carried away by his resentment, the governor published a proclamation at Quebec, appealing to the sentiment of justice in the colony against the censure of the English government. His recall had become inevitable. He returned to England, deeply irritated and wounded, and never rallied from the blow which he had received. He died shortly after (in the year 1840), at the age of forty-eight, without having seen the result of his efforts in favor of a new constitution for the colony of Canada.

It was, however, Lord Durham's report, skilfully prepared by Mr. Charles Buller, which has served as the basis for the reforms made successively in the constitution of Canada, transforming it into a real federation, governing itself, in fact, and every day becoming freer and more prosperous. The work was accomplished with a prudence and a wisdom which Lord Durham never could have manifested; but it was he who first conceived the idea of it, and the system he sought to inaugurate has since then been applied to the numerous colonies of England as fast as the mighty instinct of the Anglo-Saxon race has founded them in all the seas.

It was a measure analogous to that of placing Lord Durham in command in Canada which the ministry presented in the session of 1839, with the intention of relieving the embarrassments of the government in Jamaica. The emancipation of the blacks remained imperfect in that island; the planters composing the representative assembly of the colony found it difficult to accustom themselves to the equality which recent laws had granted to their former slaves.

The government and the legislative council protected the negroes against the oppression still practised against them, the illegality of which they themselves did not always understand. To put an end to the conflict between the two powers, the ministry proposed to suspend, for a period of five years, the constitution of the colony. This measure, necessary perhaps, but dangerously anti-liberal, was attacked simultaneously by the Tories and by a certain number of the radicals. The administration was already tottering, and a majority of only five was announced in favor of the law. The ministry resigned. The queen took counsel with the Duke of Wellington, who advised her to send for Sir Robert Peel, assuring her that the new administration would encounter its chief difficulties in the House of Commons.

The chief difficulty, however, was to arise from a different quarter; it was the queen herself who was to become the obstacle in the formation of the Tory Cabinet. Sir Robert Peel readily made his selection, and the queen offered no objection to the persons proposed, although she had never scrupled to say from the first how much she regretted the Whigs, while yielding without hesitation to the constitutional rule which required her to part with them. But the demands of Sir Robert Peel extended to the household of the queen; he felt the serious disadvantages of leaving the queen surrounded by the wives and sisters of his political opponents, and he requested the dismissal of Lady Normanby and the Duchess of Sutherland. The queen was attached to her ladies. It appeared to her that her entire household would be forever subject to change at each change of ministry. Her pride and her affection both objected to what she considered the unreasonable claims of Sir Robert. She declined to dismiss any of her ladies. Sir Robert persisted, and finally refused to form a Cabinet. Lord Melbourne and his colleagues were recalled. The power remained in the hands of the Whigs, and the explanations given by the two parties in Parliament added to the question an importance it had not at first deserved. Some years later, by the wise advice of Prince Albert, it was decided that the ladies of the royal household who were very closely connected with the members of a retiring administration should naturally share the fate of husbands or brothers, and resign their positions. But when the matter was thus settled once for all, the queen had already in her domestic life an intimate companion whom no political oscillation could remove from her.

The ministry remained feeble in both Houses, and was violently attacked. Lord Brougham reproached the ministers bitterly with their unconstitutional complaisance. "I thought," he exclaimed, "that we belonged to a country in which the government by the crown and the wisdom of Parliament was everything, and the personal feelings of the sovereign were absolutely not to be named at the same time. . . . I little thought to have lived to hear it said by the Whigs of 1839, 'Let us rally round the queen. Never mind the House of Commons; never mind measures; throw principles to the dogs; leave pledges unredeemed; but for God's sake rally round the throne.' Little did I think the day would come when I should hear such language, not from the unconstitutional, place-hunting, king-loving Tories, who thought the public was made for the king, and not the king for the public; not from the Whigs themselves. The Jamaica Bill, said to be a most important measure, had been brought forward. The government staked their existence upon it. They were not able to carry it; they therefore conceived they had lost the confidence of the House of Commons. They thought it a measure of paramount necessity then. Is it less necessary now? Oh, but that is altered! The Jamaica question is to be new fashioned; principles are to be given up; and all because of two ladies of the bed-chamber."

Parliamentary recriminations, whether well founded or not, and the weakness of the administration, were alike powerless to interfere with the magnificent outbursts of human thought and invention which signalled the first years of the young sovereign's reign. The change effected by the application of steam to the means of locomotion by sea and land was beginning to renew the face of the world, while no man could as yet measure its marvellous effects. Four railways were opened in England between 1837 and 1839. Navigation by steam was applied to the transatlantic voyage about the same time, and a line of steamships established between England and America. The first experiments with the electric telegraph date equally from this epoch of marvellous development of the human mind. Some time before this, the eminent mathematician, Joseph Marie Ampère, had discovered the principle and commenced the application of electricity to the transmission of news; but his experiments were still incomplete and theoretic when Professor Wheatstone and Mr. Cooke took out a patent "for improvements in giving signals and sounding alarms in distant places by means of electric currents transmitted through metallic circuits." Ariel had not yet set forth to "put a girdle round the earth in forty seconds," but his wings were already clearly to be discerned. The act ordering the transmission of the mails by railway wherever lines had been established, had scarcely been passed, in 1838, when an important reform was introduced which radically modified the post-office system in England, and progressively throughout the entire world. The transmission of letters was expensive and difficult; for the support of the department it had been believed necessary to fix very high rates, Mr. Rowland Hill proposed to reduce the postage on letters to one penny, asserting that the immense development of letter-writing consequent upon this reduction would fill, and more than fill, the deficit arising from the reduction of the tax. He had commenced his campaign as early as 1837, and his doctrines by degrees gained proselytes. The tax levied upon letter-writing weighed most heavily upon the lower classes, who did not profit by the franking privileges afforded to members of Parliament. Miss Martineau relates how the passion of Mr. Hill for his favorite reform was excited by a little incident witnessed by one of his friends, the poet Coleridge:

“Coleridge, when a young man, was walking through the Lake district, when he one day saw the postman deliver a letter to a woman at a cottage door. The woman turned it over and examined it, and then returned it, saying she could not pay the postage, which was a shilling. Hearing that the letter was from her brother, Coleridge paid the postage, in spite of the manifest unwillingness of the woman. As soon as the postman was out of sight, she showed Coleridge how his money had been wasted as far as she was concerned. The sheet was blank. There was an agreement between her brother and herself, that as long as all went well with him he should send a blank sheet in this way once a quarter; and she thus had tidings of him without expense of postage. Most persons would have remembered this incident as a curious story to tell; but there was one mind which wakened up at once to a sense of the significance of the fact. It struck Mr. Hill that there must be something wrong in a system which drove a brother and sister to cheating in order to gratify their desire to hear of one another's welfare.”

The excitement was great in the post-office department, and the resistance prolonged; but it is the honor and strength of free countries that new and fruitful ideas always find some brave mind and persevering will to defend and propagate them. Government was not convinced of the practical utility of Mr. Hill's proposition, ardently supported though it was in the Houses of Parliament; but it was agreed to reduce the postage to fourpence for each letter not exceeding a half-ounce in weight, throughout the whole extent of the United Kingdom.

A year later, in the month of January, 1840, the definitive reform was accomplished, and a uniform rate of a penny a letter was fixed, while the franking privileges accorded to members of Parliament and of the government were at the same time materially abridged. Free scope being thus offered to commercial and individual correspondence, its development has since surpassed all expectation; the number of letters rising from eighty-two millions in the year 1839 to more than a thousand millions in the year 1875, in Great Britain and Ireland. The entire world profits by the persevering initiative of Sir Rowland Hill. Time and space had begun to yield before the increasing energy of the human mind, and it was reserved for his administrative faculty to inflict upon them a new defeat by bringing the interchange of letters within the reach of all.

So much intellectual activity, so much material progress and increasing energy, naturally excite a people enjoying their beneficial effects. The abrupt change brought about in the social condition by the rapid extension of railways was of a nature to reveal, and did in fact bring to light, abysses of the rudest ignorance; it excited passions and hopes, old and yet forever new.

A half-insane leader, assuming a pretentious title, raised an insurrection in Kent, promising the peasants a regeneration in society, as once Wat Tyler and Jack Cade had done in the same part of England. The winter had been severe; suffering was extreme; most of the peasantry were utterly illiterate; their chief promised them all this world's goods and eternal glory. A crowd gathered about him; and when the authorities sought to disperse them, a constable was killed. The military being called out, the officer in command was shot dead; but at the first fire of the troops, the wretched fanatic who had incited the disturbance, John Nicholls Thom, or, as he styled himself, Sir William Courtenay, fell, with several of his partisans; others were arrested, condemned, and transported. The insurrection was at an end; but the ambitions and illusions seething in men's minds were not dispelled.

A consolation amid the bitter strifes and constant agitations of our time is found in the ever-increasing interest felt by the more prosperous classes in the fate of those who suffer. Dr. Arnold, head-master of Rugby, a man whose memory remains forever dear to all who have been within his influence, and whose power extended far beyond the institution of which he was the head, wrote in 1839 to one of his friends: "I would give anything to be able to organize a society 'for drawing public attention to the state of the laboring-classes throughout the kingdom.' Men do not think of the fearful state in which we are living; if they could once be brought to notice and to appreciate the evil, I should not even yet despair that the remedy may be found and applied, even though it is the solution of the most difficult problem ever yet proposed to man's wisdom, and the greatest triumph over selfishness ever yet required of his virtue."

The feeling of the working-classes themselves naturally went further than the wise foresight of the Tory chief. Their existence was, without doubt, hard and precarious; they felt all its bitterness, and desired its amelioration, but at the same time they had other desires which had been excited by the Reform

Bill and the hope which it had kindled before their eyes. The battle had been fought in Parliament; the flag of Reform had been carried by the aristocratic leaders who had taken the cause in hand; the working-classes had sustained it ardently, and even clamorously; the middle-class had been admitted to a share in the government of the country, but the working-classes in no way whatever participated therein. They saw the door shut in their faces, and the career closed against the very men who had fought for the Reform Bill with the greatest ardor. Popular agitators resolved to carry forward the work which in their judgment had been but just commenced. At a conference held between a few of the most radical members of Parliament and the leaders of the working-men, a programme was adopted which afterwards became widely known. "There's your Charter," O'Connell said, "agitate for it, and never be content for anything less," and the "Chartists" soon gathered about their "Charter."

Some of the points set forth in this "Charter" of the agitators have since become law in England; others, happily for the nation's tranquillity, remain yet unaccepted. Voting by ballot has been adopted, as the programme of the Chartists insisted; the property qualification required for members of Parliament has been abandoned: but universal suffrage does not exist; Parliaments have not been made annual; members of Parliament are not paid; the territory of England is not yet divided into equal districts, sending each its representative to the House of Commons. Still, it would be idle to deny that the progress of legislation and of public sentiment is forcing England as well as the nations of the continent in the direction of democracy. The alliance between the aristocracy and the democracy is not yet broken; the aristocracy is not dispossessed of its rôle, in general the authority is yet in its hands; it manages the affairs of the country, but it carries them on more and more in sympathy with public sentiment and in obedience to the public will. While still preserving its social rank, it is to-day the servant, and not the master. The aristocracy governs, the democracy rules, and rules with a mastery too dreaded, and sometimes obeyed with too much docility.

THE THAMES EMBANKMENT.

In 1839 the Chartists were divided into two classes, the partisans of moral force, and the partisans of material force; the men of theories, and the violent agitators, ready to come to blows with a society which refused to them that which they regarded as their right. The first demonstration of these practical demagogues took place at Birmingham, between the 4th and the 15th of July. The excitement was factitious, for manufactures were prosperous, and most of the working-classes already possessed the right of suffrage, but the city was in a panic until the rioters had been forcibly suppressed. The same scenes were enacted at Sheffield and at Newport. In the latter city, a former magistrate, well known for his advanced opinions, headed the working-men who rose in the name of the Chartist programme. He led them when they entered Newport on the 3d of December. The mayor of the city was attacked in the inn where he had established his head-quarters, and was wounded while defending himself. The troops soon repulsed the ill-disciplined multitude; the leaders were arrested, tried, and finally transported.

The agitation was destined to continue, for it arose from the condition of society itself, and from that instinctive and bitter envy which lies at the bottom of so many hearts; but it was not destined to shake to its foundations the life of the English people. In 1848, when all the thrones of Europe trembled, after the fall of Louis Philippe in France, a Chartist demonstration took place in London, and was immediately met by an impressive manifestation of the conservative spirit of the great majority of the people. "There was a great Chartist meeting to-day at Kennington, near London," wrote M. Guizot, then in exile in England, to M. de Barante, his friend, "twelve or fifteen thousand, they say, who assembled to demand the half of what the Parisian Communists require. The walls are placarded with an official prohibition of all meetings or processions, exactly like Delessert's proclamation three weeks ago. Everybody, from the Duke of Norfolk and Lord Lincoln on the one side, down to the two thousand coal-heavers of the Thames on the other, all the aristocracy and all the middle class to its lowest degree, rallied to the government, and were sworn in as special constables in case of a riot, and there will be at Kennington more volunteers to repress than there will be to make an outbreak. This is grand, but for us a sad thing to see."

The Chartist tumults were not yet appeased, and their leader Fergus O'Connor, presided over meetings and over mobs, when Queen Victoria, upon opening Parliament on the 16th of January, 1840, announced to the nation her intention to marry her cousin Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg Gotha, a union which she hoped would be as conducive to the interests of her people as to her own personal happiness. "Her Majesty has," said Sir Robert Peel, in the House of Commons, "the singular good fortune to be able to gratify her private feelings while she performs her public duty, and to obtain the best guarantee for happiness by contracting an alliance founded on affection."

For some time the queen had been attached to her cousin, who was nearly of her own age, and had been twice in England. The marriage had already been for some months decided on when the queen announced it in Parliament.

"In the year 1888," says M. Guizot, in his preface to the "Speeches of Prince Albert," "two centuries will have been completed since William of Orange, a foreign prince, and the husband of an English princess, was called into England by a revolution. There was doubt and embarrassment about the extent of the power which he should exercise. 'And now,' says Lord Macaulay, 'William thought that the time had come when he ought to explain himself. He accordingly sent for Halifax, Danby, Shrewsbury, and some other political leaders of great note, and with that air of stoical apathy under which he had, from a boy, been in the habit of concealing his strongest emotions, addressed to them a few deeply meditated and weighty words.

“‘He had hitherto, he said, remained silent; he had used neither solicitation nor menace; he had not even suffered a hint of his opinions or wishes to get abroad; but a crisis had now arrived at which it was necessary for him to declare his intentions. He had no right and no wish to dictate to the convention. All that he claimed for himself was the privilege of declining any office which he felt that he could not hold with honor to himself and with benefit to the public. A strong party was for a regency. It was for the Houses to determine whether such an arrangement would be for the benefit of the nation. He had a decided opinion on that point; and he thought it right to say distinctly that he would not be regent. Another party was for placing the princess on the throne and for giving him during her life, the title of king and such a share in the administration as she might be pleased to allow him. He could not stoop to such a post. He esteemed the princess as much as it was possible for man to esteem woman; but not even from her would he accept a subordinate and a precarious place in the government. He was so made that he could not submit to be tied to the apron-strings even of the best of wives. He did not desire to take any part in English affairs, but if he did consent to take a part there was one part only which he could usefully or honorably take. If the estates offered him the crown for life he would accept it. If not, he should, without repining, return to his native country.’

“William III. was right. When he was called into England he was thirty-eight years of age. For sixteen years he had defended a great European cause against the greatest king in Europe. England had called upon him to come and defend for her, and upon her soil, this same cause by bringing a revolution to a happy and successful issue. The crown of England was above all a great additional strength in carrying on his struggle upon the continent. To fulfil the mission laid upon him he had need of all the power and all the prestige of royalty. If he had accepted a lower position, were it lower but in appearance only, he would have been weakened, instead of strengthened, he would have lost instead of gaining.

“That which he insisted upon, while essential for his public career, required no effort, and occasioned no disturbance in his domestic relations. His wife, the Princess Mary, thought and wished as he did. When she learned that there was hesitation at London, in respect to the power and the title with which her husband should be invested, she wrote to Lord Danby that she was the Prince’s wife, that she had no other desire than to be his subject, that the most cruel injury that any one could do her would be to establish a rivalry between herself and him, and that she should never regard as her friend, any person who should form such a plan. For eleven years, William had been king over his household; there even he would have suffered a certain diminution of authority and dignity if he had not had equal rights and powers with his wife in the new kingdom.

“When, in 1840, Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg, married Queen Victoria, his position was very different; he was young and unknown to the world. He married a young queen hereditarily established upon her throne, in a country most foreign to any necessity or any chance of revolution, a country governed as strongly as it was liberally. In his native land he had done nothing; in the new country to which he came, there was nothing for him to do ; England asked of him only to be a good husband to the queen, and to occasion in her government neither disturbance nor embarrassment.

“ Guided either by the excellence of his own judgment or by the wise counsels of his advisers, Prince Albert understood admirably the situation, and adapted his conduct to it with equal dignity and good sense. He was at once active and modest, never seeking, in fact, avoiding any vain show of taking part in the government. Although very seriously occupied in the public affairs of England, and the interests of the crown worn by his wife, he was for twenty-one years Queen Victoria’s first subject and her first counsellor, her confidential and only secretary, silently associated in all her deliberations, in all her resolutions, skilful in enlightening her and in seconding her in her relations with her Cabinet without embarrassing or offending the ministers themselves, exercising at the side of the throne a salutary and judicious influence, yet never going out of his place or interfering with the action of a constitutional government.

“ For these twenty-one years, Prince Albert was in his domestic life as excellent a husband as he was a wise and useful counsellor. He lived with the queen, his wife, in the most tender affection, assiduously occupied, in concert with herself, in the education of their children, uniting to a serenity of character and the charm of an affectionate nature, a suitable measure of conjugal and paternal authority, filling and animating the life of those about him, and giving to his royal family as much happiness as he received from them. It was a career as beautiful as it was unostentatious, rare in the domestic history of thrones, and pursued by Prince Albert without effort, without alternating periods of good and bad, by the natural impulse of an upright and elevated mind, an affectionate heart, and a conscience as sensitive as it was enlightened.”

The marriage of Queen Victoria with Prince Albert took place February 10, 1840. The prince was received in England with a certain coolness which at times betrayed itself by absurd and unjust suspicions, and by uncivil procedures. Prince Albert was a free-thinker, some said; others averred that he was a Roman Catholic. The proposition for an annuity for the prince was not accepted without debate in Parliament, and the amount was finally reduced from fifty thousand pounds to thirty thousand. Prince Albert was destined to be justly appreciated and to become thoroughly popular in his adopted country only after his death. Every year of his virtuous life was, however, to bring him increasing happiness in his family, and increasing consideration and respect in his country. And finally, all England was to lament him, feeling to this day the grief and void caused by his loss.

CHAPTER II.

WARS AND RUMORS OF WAR. THE EAST.

THE queen's marriage with Prince Albert was celebrated in February, 1840, and in June of the same year the first of those attempts upon her life was made, which from time to time have alarmed and exasperated England. The assassin was one Oxford, a boy of seventeen, half crazy, and treated as such. No political motive was assigned for this attack, the act of a disordered mind and an insane thirst for notoriety. Five times more, at very irregular intervals, the queen was destined to be the object of similar attacks. No one of the assassins paid with his life for the criminal attempt; no one even underwent a long imprisonment. A law, made expressly, fixed the punishment for such attempts at transportation for seven years, or imprisonment for not more than three years, "the culprit to be publicly or privately whipped as often and in such manner as the court shall direct, not exceeding thrice." Neither the queen nor the nation desired a vindictive punishment of these insane acts, which appear never to have been inspired by fanatical passions or instigated by secret societies, as were the attacks made upon Louis Philippe in France.

More serious anxieties at this time occupied the statesmen of both England and France. The recent difficulties between the Sultan of Turkey and his great vassal, Mohammed Ali, Pasha of Egypt, threatened to kindle a war between the great Powers of Europe, protectors of one or the other of the belligerents. Sultan Mahmoud died (July 1, 1839) at the moment when his troops sent to recapture Syria from the pasha had been defeated by the army of the latter. The new sultan, Abdul Medjid, was but sixteen years of age; the audacity of the Pasha of Egypt was increased by this fact, and such was his influence over the very officers of the Porte, that the Capitan Pasha, or High-Admiral of the Turkish fleet, took his vessels to Alexandria and delivered them up to the viceroy. The courts of Europe offered their mediation, which was accepted by Turkey, and the difficulties of the situation increased daily. King Louis Philippe sent M. Guizot to London as ambassador.

“My situation in entering upon negotiations in London upon the Turkish question was singularly hampered and difficult,” writes M. Guizot in his Mémoires. “By our note to the Porte of the 27th of July, 1839, we had agreed to act upon that question in concert with Austria, Prussia, and Russia, as well as with England, and we had deterred the sultan from making any direct arrangement with the Pasha of Egypt, assuring him that the united action of the five great Powers was certain. Since that time, however, we had encouraged the pretensions of the pasha to the hereditary possession not merely of Egypt but also of Syria, and at the time that I was accredited to London, notwithstanding the obstacles we had encountered, we still persevered in this resolution. ‘The king’s government,’ wrote Marshal Sout, in his instructions to me, dated February 19, 1840, ‘has believed and believes still that, in the present position of Mohammed Ali, to offer him less than the hereditary throne of Egypt and Syria would be to expose ourselves to a certain refusal, which he would support, if need were, by desperate resistance, of which the result would be a severe shock, and perhaps total overthrow, to the Ottoman Empire.’ Thus pledged on the one hand to a concert with the other great Powers, and on the other, to a support of the pasha’s claims, we had against us in the negotiations: England, — she refused absolutely to the pasha the hereditary possession of Syria; Russia, who wished to preserve her exclusive protectorate over Constantinople, or would sacrifice it only in involving us in a quarrel with England; and even Austria and Prussia, indifferent as to the territorial question between the sultan and the pasha, but determined to side, according to the occasion, now with England and now with Russia, rather than to unite with us in moderating the claims of either of those Powers.

L. ROMJAT.

H. Schmitt, sc.

M. THIERS.

“The whole policy of the French Cabinet rested upon three convictions, which were not lessened upon the accession to power of M. Thiers and M. de Rémusat (29th of February, 1840): the utmost reliance was felt at Paris upon the persistency of Mohammed Ali in his claims upon Egypt and Syria, and upon his energy in supporting them by arms if he should be attacked; the means of coercion which could be employed against him were regarded either as absolutely inefficient and futile, or as gravely compromising the safety of the Ottoman Empire and the peace of Europe; finally, it was firmly believed that Russia would never abandon her exclusive or at least preponderating protectorate at Constantinople. Firmly intrenched behind these convictions, the French Cabinet yielded willingly to the strong pressure of public opinion in favor of the Pasha of Egypt, and felt no urgent necessity to oppose it. It was my mission in London to obtain from the English government important concessions for the benefit of the pasha, and my weapons were to be the three conjectures which I have just mentioned in respect to the probabilities in case of war, and the necessity of a permanent union between France and England to maintain the integrity of the Ottoman Empire and the peace of Europe.”

The confidence of the French Cabinet was unfounded, as M. Guizot very soon perceived. The policy of the English ministry, under the influence of Lord Palmerston, threatened to become more and more exclusively English, and to pay less respect to the wishes of France than was supposed at Paris. "I hope that nothing will be done without us, and I am working to that end," wrote M. Guizot to General Baudrand, first aid-de-camp to the Duke of Orleans, and one of his most trusted friends; "but it is only a hope, and the work is difficult. English policy at times involves itself carelessly and very rashly in foreign affairs. In this affair, all the Powers, except ourselves, flatter England, and stand ready to obey her behests. We alone, her special allies, say, no! The others only desire to please; we are determined to be reasonable, at the risk of displeasing. It is not a very agreeable, nor even a very safe position. If the matter is well managed, and we have time enough, we may succeed; but it will not do, in my judgment, to be sure of this. We must constantly be on our guard against some sudden and secret blow."

Such was precisely the danger about to be encountered. Lord Palmerston had well comprehended the situation of Egypt and had taken care to aggravate the difficulties of the case. The insurrection in Syria, fomented by him, was an excuse for repulsing the French proposals which asked for Mohammed Ali the hereditary possession of Syria as well as of Egypt. Counter proposals, offering to divide Syria between the pasha and the sultan having been in their turn refused by France, the negotiation dragged, and the Pasha of Egypt sought to enter into direct communication with the Porte. Lord Palmerston decided to exclude France from the convention which he considered urgently required by the interests of the Ottoman Empire; he concluded, with Prussia, Austria, and Russia, the agreement of the 15th of July, 1840, in accordance with which, if the sultan's proposals to the pasha were repulsed, the Porte was empowered to call for the aid of the four mediating Powers to compel his vassal to obedience.

This was to isolate France in Europe, and it was the most serious attack made upon that alliance between France and England which had been so strictly maintained since the accession of Louis Philippe to the French throne. M. Guizot had already foreseen this. "The Eastern question occupies me much," he wrote; "it was drooping, when Mohammed Ali's proposals to the sultan after the fall of Kousreff Pasha caused it to revive. This is regarded as the exclusive work of France, and has given offence. It is said, 'Since France has her separate policy and follows it, let us do the same.' The four Powers at once set at work; Lord Palmerston is preparing a quadruple arrangement with this twofold basis: no Syria for the pasha; coercion if necessary. I do not understand that the matter is settled. If the proposition of Mohammed Ali to the sultan should succeed, and bring about a direct settlement of difficulties, it will be for the best, and everybody must needs be content. But if nothing comes of it, we must not shut our eyes to the fact that our influence with the other European Powers will be enfeebled, and an agreement between them from which we are left out, will have a very good chance of success."

When the convention of the 15th of July was known, the anger in France was great,—greater and more general than Lord Palmerston and the English Cabinet had foreseen. "Everything that I heard from Paris showed me how strong and general was the feeling, the displeasure, I may say, on this subject," writes M. Guizot in his Mémoires; "it arose as much from the unfriendly act of the English Cabinet as from the public good-will towards Mohammed Ali, and the French anger helped along the Egyptian cause. 'The public temper is incredibly warlike,' some one wrote to me, on the 30th of July; 'the coolest heads, the most timid natures are carried away by the general impulse; all the deputies whom I see, pronounce in favor of a great display of strength; the most peaceable among us are wearied with this question of war, always put off, but always recurring again; we must put an end to this, they say. This disposition has reacted upon our anniversaries this month; on the 28th there were between sixty and eighty thousand men under arms, and everybody was delighted to see so many bayonets at one time. Yesterday when the king appeared on the balcony of the Tuileries he was received with acclamations that were really very cordial, and when the orchestra performed the Marseillaise, there was a genuine outburst of enthusiasm.’”

In England war was not desired. Lord Melbourne said to M. Guizot: “Lord Palmerston asserts that we shall succeed promptly and easily. In this expectation the experiment is made; if we are mistaken, we shall not go on. The pasha is not a madman, and France is always there. France has indicated the terms of an agreement: Egypt and Syria made hereditary for the pasha; Candia, Carelia, and Adana restored to the sultan. The pasha can always fall back upon this proposition. Why should he not at once, if he declines the propositions of the Porte? And if it is refused now, why should he not bring it up again in the course of events when he has proved his strength, and has begun to prove Lord Palmerston in the wrong? England wishes neither to quarrel with France nor to set Europe in a blaze. Austria is of the same mind with England. It is a pity, and it would be very serious; but it can be avoided, and we desire to stop it, and France, who would not assist the four Powers in moving, will at least help them to stop.”

Lord John Russell was as anxious as Lord Melbourne; the Tories were more uneasy than the Whigs, although they had not the responsibility of the decision. “We shall remain silent,” said Sir Robert Peel; “we shall leave all the responsibility to the Cabinet. We shall be like France in the East, motionless and watchful, waiting for events." The Duke of Wellington wrote to one of his friends: "God send that we may preserve peace between these two great countries, and for the world! I am certain that there is no desire in this country, on the part of any party, — I may almost say of any influential individual, — to quarrel with, much less to do anything offensive towards, France. But if we should be under the necessity of going to war, you will witness the most extraordinary exertions ever made by this or any country in order to carry the same on with vigor, however undesirable we may think it to enter into it."

M. Thiers was disposed to commence at once the warlike preparations whose possibility the Duke of Wellington had regretfully foreseen. "Stand firm," he wrote to M. Guizot, in a letter desiring him to return to Paris to decide, in a personal interview, upon the course to be pursued; "be cold and severe, except with those who are our friends. I have no wish to change anything in your conduct, except to render it more decided, if that be possible without exciting against yourself the ill-will of those who can influence the conduct of England." The sultan had already accepted the convention of the 15th of July, and had, in accordance, addressed to the pasha a summons to return to his allegiance. Mohammed Ali replied with the most explicit refusal. "That which I have gained by the sword I shall abandon only to the sword," he said to the consul-general of England. France intervened, and had obtained important concessions from the pasha, but the English fleet was already off Beyroot before the treaty of the 15th of July had been ratified. On the 14th of September, without replying to the propositions of Mohammed Ali, the sultan pronounced sentence of removal upon his viceroy, and appointed a new Pasha of Egypt. Three days later, September 17th, Beyroot was first summoned to surrender, and then bombarded by the English squadron, while Turkish troops, or those in the service of Turkey, landed in Syria. The treaty of July 15th was executed in all its consequences, whilst at London and Paris efforts were still making to prevent these results. The situation was critical in France. Preparations for war, already for some time in progress, were every day hastened more and more. The nation felt herself offended, and believed herself menaced. In the treaty of the 15th of July she saw an attack upon her dignity; and the alliance of the four Powers to settle the Egyptian question without her, seemed in her eyes the presage of a new coalition against her, perhaps to come into existence in the near future. The enemies of the government of 1830 fomented this twofold sentiment, promising themselves an opportunity for the gratification of their passions and the success of their designs. The French Cabinet felt all the pressure of the public anger and alarm, and took measures as serious as they would have done if the perils which seemed to threaten had in reality burst upon them. An augmentation of sea and land forces was ordered; it was decided to fortify Paris. On the 8th of October the French Cabinet declared its determination not to consent to the overthrow of Mohammed Ali as Pasha of Egypt, and the Chambers were convoked for the 28th of the same month.

M. Guizot did not believe that the war was necessary. On the 23d of September he wrote to the Duke de Broglie: "Ought France to make war for the sake of preserving Syria to the Pasha of Egypt? Plainly that is not an interest of sufficient importance to become a casus belli. France, who did not make war to save Poland from Russia, or Italy from Austria, cannot reasonably do it in order that Syria may belong to the pasha rather than to the sultan. The war would be either in the East and maritime, or continental and general. If maritime, the inequality of forces is incontestable; if continental and general, France could sustain the war only by becoming once more revolutionary, that is to say, abandoning the honest, wise, and useful policy which she has followed since 1830, and by her own act transforming the present alliance of the four Powers into a hostile coalition. It is, therefore, not for the interest of France to make the Syrian question a ground for war. The policy hitherto declared and maintained by France towards the East does not permit her to do it. We have constantly and loudly asserted that the distribution of territory between the sultan and the pasha concerned us but little; that if the pasha wished to restore Syria to the sultan, we should offer no opposition whatever; that the anticipation of his refusal, of his resistance, and of the perils which would arise thence for the Ottoman empire and for the peace of Europe, was the sole motive of our opposition to the exercise of coercion towards him. In making war for the sake of preserving Syria to the pasha, we should give ourselves the lie in a most conspicuous and disastrous manner. Is this equivalent to saying that France has nothing to do but to be an armed spectator at the execution of the agreement of the 15th of July, and that her language, her attitude, her preparations must be, whatever happens, a demonstration, and nothing more? Certainly not.

AN EGYPTIAN TEMPLE.

“If the pasha resists, if the measures of coercion employed by the four Powers become complicated and prolonged, then, what France has announced may be realized. The Syrian question may bring up other questions. War may arise spontaneously, necessarily, in consequence of some unforeseen incident, the situation being perilous and critical. If war arise in this way, not by the will and the act of France, but in consequence of a situation for which France is not at all responsible, France must needs accept the war. From the present moment she is bound to hold herself ready to accept it.”

Patriotic anger had been the first impulse in France, upon the news of the convention of July 15th, and revolutionary passions worked upon this patriotic anger, seeking to stimulate it to the most dangerous excesses. The conservative and prudent instinct awakened in presence of the wild extravagances of the newspapers and popular meetings. The necessity for the government to resist this popular excitement by resting upon the wisdom of the Chambers, was every day more keenly felt. The Cabinet of M. Thiers, hotly engaged in the struggle, was not adapted to rally the resisting force of France, nor to treat with England. "Send us away, Sire, send us away," M. Cousin, at that time Minister of Public Instruction, said to the king, "we shall lead you into war." Louis Philippe followed M. Cousin's advice: he recalled M. Guizot from London, and entrusted him with the duty of forming a new Cabinet.

The peace policy prevailed, dignified, reserved, always ready to give proof of boldness and strength, in an isolation which might at any moment become an imminent danger,—the policy of peace, however, openly announced, and courageously supported. The English Cabinet greeted it with mingled satisfaction and embarrassment; and events, justifying Lord Palmerston's policy,—the insurrection in Syria, the retreat of Ibrahim Pasha and his army, and the taking of St. Jean d'Acre,—destroyed the illusions of France in respect to Mohammed Ali's energetic resistance, and threatened to complicate the situation of Europe, by making the triumph of the four Powers too complete. Sir Robert Peel acknowledged this in a letter to M. de Bourgueney, French chargé-d'affaires.

In this perilous situation Mohammed Ali resolved to follow the advice given him by Sir Charles Napier, then in command of the English squadron; he offered, as soon as the hereditary succession of Egypt should be assured to him, to send back to the sultan the Turkish fleet, and he gave orders to his son, Ibrahim Pasha, to evacuate Syria.

The object of solicitude was now changed; to secure the peace of Europe it was no longer a question of arresting the encroachments of Mohammed Ali upon the power of the Porte, but of preventing, in concert with France, the sultan from impairing the situation in which the Powers desired to maintain the Pasha of Egypt. "Nothing good or lasting is done without France," the Duke of Wellington used to say. For eight months the capricious alternatives of the Porte, the anger of Lord Ponsonby, the English ambassador at Constantinople, re-acting upon Lord Palmerston's designs, and Oriental finesse, seeking to explain documents or complicate proceedings, kept in suspense the conclusion of a treaty which all desired, though on different grounds, and which could alone put an end to a situation always full of danger. On the 13th of July, 1841, the agreement of the five Powers was signed, assuring to Mohammed Ali that Egyptian heredity, pure and simple, which had once been scornfully refused to him, and was now granted solely by reason of the protection of France.

"The Egyptian question was disposed of," writes M. Guizot in his Mémoires; "a question raised in 1840 far above its true importance, and in which we, ill-informed in respect to facts, became much more deeply involved than the strength of the pasha justified, or the interests of France required. Peace was maintained, and in the midst of peace, the precautionary armaments made by France were maintained also; the fortification of Paris was carried on, the French government established itself in that isolation which had been caused by the failure of the Powers sufficiently to esteem her presence and advice. Europe became conscious of the void in its counsels created by the absence of France, and showed eagerness to recall her to them. France did not return thither until Europe came to beg her to do so, after requiring from the Porte the concessions claimed by the pasha, and making the declaration that the treaty of July 15, 1840, was definitively annulled.

“Mohammed Ali, driven from Syria and threatened in Egypt itself, was at last established in the latter country with the hereditary succession, and upon equitable conditions, not by reason of his own strength, but on account of consideration for France, and because the Powers who had signed the treaty of the 15th of July were not willing to incur the risk of disunion among themselves, or of seeing new complications arise.

“By the convention of July 13th, 1841, the Porte was withdrawn from the exclusive protectorate of Russia, and placed in the sphere of the general interests and the common deliberations of Europe. By these results, the failure of France, due to her mistake in this question, was limited and arrested; she resumed her position in Europe, and assured in Egypt that of her client. In the end was done and obtained that which should have been done and obtained in the beginning.”

The affairs of Egypt, important as they were, were not the only ones to trouble the world. Many delicate negotiations had been brought to a successful issue during M. Guizot's residence in England. The remains of the Emperor Napoleon had been given up to France, not without a certain surprise upon receiving such a request from the king, Louis Philippe. The difficulties existing between England and Naples on account of the sulphur mines were settled by French mediation. But the extreme East was agitated by serious conflicts, England had entered upon a war with China, and her difficulties with the Afghans became every day more threatening.

China was still, in theory, an empire closed to all foreign civilization, interdicting to its subjects every form of intercourse with the merchants of the West. In fact, diplomatic and official relations did not exist, but American merchants and the English East India Company had succeeded in obtaining a foothold in a corner of the Celestial Empire, their establishments at Macao and at Canton being authorized. The East India Company's monopoly expiring in 1834, the conditions of European traffic in China were modified; commerce becoming free, a considerable number of English merchants henceforth became interested in it. The commerce of the Americans and the English with China was nearly of the same nature. European traders furnished to the Chinese the opium of which they made great use, in defiance of the prohibition of their own government, strictly forbidding its importation and sale. The Chinese government tolerated the culture of the poppy, it was urged; it was therefore unreasonable to object to the importation of opium. "It is an agricultural protection question," urged Lord Palmerston in the House of Commons against certain moralists in the opposition who declaimed against the wickedness of the traffic. Superintendents were appointed by the English government to watch over the commerce of their countrymen at Macao and Canton, in the hope of avoiding the frequent difficulties sure to arise between two nationalities, one shut up in a narrow and antique civilization, with which they were proudly content, the other bold and enterprising, ignorant of the ideas and manners of the Chinese, and profoundly despising the narrowness of their prejudices. The English traders considered themselves protected by their government, and carrying on the opium trade under the shelter of the British flag.

The English government acted wrongly in leaving these superintendents for a long time without positive instructions in their delicate mission; and when at last it was declared officially that government could not interfere to defend English subjects from the penalty of violating the laws of the country with which they traded, and that the traders must themselves bear any loss which might fall upon them in consequence of a stricter application of Chinese laws, it was already too late. The Emperor of China and his mandarins had determined to put an end to the trade. The opium in the possession of British traders was seized, the authorities required the warehouses to be given up, the persons as well as the property of English subjects seemed to be menaced; and Captain Elliott, the chief of the superintendents, sent for aid to the Governor of India. War had begun.

The result could not be doubtful. The Chinese displayed a persistent bravery which was entirely unexpected, and their heroic despair in defeat rendered their losses considerable. When conquered, they not unfrequently put their wives and children to death, and themselves perished under the ruins of their dwellings. Peace was made at last with the cession of the island of Hong-Kong, and the opening to British traders of five ports, Canton, Amoy, Foo-Chow-Foo, Ning-Po, and Shanghai. Diplomatic relations were established, and the Chinese engaged to pay a heavy indemnity to England, besides making up to the traders their losses in the opium destroyed.

The wise principle laid down at the beginning by the English government had been abandoned; the cause of the opium traders had been supported, and, despite the remonstrances of the opposition, thanks were voted to government which had earned the gratitude of England by compelling the Chinese to admit the opium proscribed by their own laws. The excuse of the English public was, that it did not well understand the question, and believed England bound to defend her citizens, and protect the honor of her flag.

The cause which England had supported in China was not a good cause; but her arms had gained an easy victory, and the product of the war-indemnity figured in the revenues under the title of "China money." The long-established English dominion in India was to be the theatre of events more serious, painful, and humiliating to the country, and, for many years, fruitful in misfortunes. For the first time the Afghan name made itself heard in Europe, where it was destined to acquire a cruel and lasting renown.

ENGLISH LEGATION AT SHANGHAI

The kingdom of Cabul, or Afghanistan, forms the link between western and eastern India. It is the great highway from Persia to India, and among its population are mingled many nationalities, Hindoos, Arabs, and even Armenians, the Afghans being, however, the dominant race. They are a brave and haughty people, devout followers of Mohammed, and for ages governed by bold and able princes. In 1837, when the first difficulties arose between the Governor of India, Lord Auckland, and the Afghan princes, the throne of Afghanistan was occupied by Dost Mohammed, belonging to the powerful tribe of the Barukzyes, who had driven out of the kingdom the descendants of Ahmad-Shah, the great founder of the Afghan Empire. These latter princes retained nothing but Herat, and all the rest of Afghanistan was divided among Dost Mohammed and his brothers, who were favorably disposed towards England; and had already made overtures towards her.

Anxiety in respect to the increase of Russian influence had always existed at the court of the English Governor of India, and it was particularly serious at this period. Dost Mohammed, while earnestly seeking the favor and protection of England, allowed it to be understood that if unsuccessful in this attempt, he should seek another alliance. Captain Barnes, a bold and experienced traveller, was employed to sound the intentions and judge of the sincerity of the Afghan prince, and the information he sent to Lord Auckland was distinctly favorable to Dost Mohammed. Notwithstanding this, Lord Auckland seems to have had no confidence in Dost Mohammed; it appeared to him that he should better secure English preponderance in Afghanistan by placing upon the throne a prince who should owe everything to England: a descendant of the exiled rulers of the country was living in retirement in India, and Lord Auckland resolved to restore this individual to the throne of his ancestors. On the 12th of October, 1838, the English governor published a manifesto, announcing the war and declaring his reasons. The presence of a Russian agent at the court of Dost Mohammed, and the fear of a Russian invasion of India across Persia and Afghanistan, were evidently among the causes of Lord Auckland's decision. A general anxiety prevailed throughout English India, and the governor was in a degree forced by public opinion when, at the beginning of the year 1838, he entered upon the disastrous Afghan war.

The campaign opened brilliantly. Ghuznee and Jellalabad were taken by assault, Dost Mohammed abandoned his capital, and the new prince, Shah Shooja, was installed in Cabul. The popularity, however, of which Lord Auckland had spoken so confidently in his proclamation, was entirely wanting to the new sovereign. His capital received him in gloomy silence, and only the acclamations of the English soldiers greeted his passage through the streets.

This condition of public feeling soon manifested itself openly. Dost Mohammed himself had made more than one effort to recover his lost throne; he had distinguished himself by his personal bravery, but finally he seemed to have become convinced that it was useless to struggle against the power of England, and on the evening after a battle, which had at least been undecided, and might have been claimed by him as a victory, he made his way to the English headquarters and surrendered his sword to Sir W. H. Macnaghten, the British envoy and minister at the court of Cabul. Thereupon he was sent to India, and his name replaced that of Shah Shooja upon the list of Great Britain's pensioners. But in the meantime the population of Cabul were becoming more and more dissatisfied with the new ruler, who, they averred, had sold the country to strangers. An insurrection was imminent; Sir W. H. Macnaghten was warned, but he paid no heed to the information. On the 2d of November, 1841, the populace broke out into insurrection; Captain, now Sir Alexander Barnes, who had been deputed to act with Sir W. H. Macnaghten, was besieged in his own house, but refused to believe himself in danger, and sought to appease the frenzy of the mob by assuring them that he had always been their friend. His conduct, however, had laid him open to the suspicion of treachery. He had been the friend of Dost Mohammed, and he was now the confidential adviser of Shah Shooja. What were his real sentiments is perhaps doubtful, since it has been well established that the despatches he sent home to the British government were tampered with before they were presented to the House of Commons. But the infuriated crowd regarded him as their enemy; they forced the garden gate, and rushed into the house, uttering fierce threats against Sir Alexander and his brother. A Mussulman from Kashmyr offered to conduct the two brothers in safety to the forts, if they would trust themselves to him; but no sooner had they quitted the house than the traitor cried out to the mob, "Here they are!" and the two were instantly murdered.

The English troops were quartered outside of the city, a few of them occupying the fortress. Every day they were threatened and insulted, and their position grew more and more dangerous. At this time a son of Dost Mohammed, Akbar Khan, a bold, intelligent, and unscrupulous young man, put himself at the head of the insurrection. Sir W. H. Macnaghten was intending to fall back in the direction of India, in the hope of meeting the reinforcements believed to be on the way towards Cabul. He opened negotiations with the Afghan chiefs, who began by demanding unconditional surrender, a demand which was, of course, indignantly refused. Meantime dissensions existed among the English officers; General Elphinstone, the commander-in-chief, was ill and enfeebled; the second in command was a man of much greater ability, but through vanity and ill-humor unable to do his country good service. The winter had now set in with great severity, and snow fell heavily. On the 23d of December, Akbar Khan proposed a secret conference to the English envoy. The latter accepted it, and, accompanied by three officers, made his appearance at the place designated, where Akbar Khan, accompanied by a crowd of Afghans, met him. But a few words had been exchanged when one of the English officers was seized by an Afghan who stood behind him, and Akbar Khan, fell upon Macnaghten; he was thrown down; and Akbar Khan drawing a pistol, one of a pair Macnaghten had lately presented to him, shot the envoy. With him one of the English officers was also killed, and the others were carried off prisoners. "The look of wondering horror that sat upon Macnaghten's upturned face," says Kaye, in his "History of the Afghan War," "will not be forgotten by those who saw it, to their dying day Thus perished as brave a gentleman as ever in the midst of fiery trial struggled manfully to rescue from disgrace the reputation of a great country."

The surprise of the English was such, and their situation so critical, that they dared not at once avenge this odious murder. Reinforcements were on the way, it was said; but the officers resolved to capitulate. They accepted conditions the most humiliating: the abandonment of nearly all their artillery, the relinquishment of all the treasure, augmented by a considerable personal ransom, and the evacuation of Jellalabad by General Sale. Six English officers were left as hostages in the hands of Akbar Khan.

The caravan set out on the 6th of January, 1842. It consisted of four thousand five hundred soldiers, most of them Asiatics, and twelve thousand English or Indian camp-followers. Some officers' wives and a number of children made part of this sad band. The Afghans had at first proposed to retain the women as hostages, but the officers, who had accepted so many humiliations, refused this in set terms. Fate, however, was soon to triumph over even this last resistance.

Akbar Khan had required fresh hostages, which had been given him; he now followed the march of this disorderly and despairing band, who were pressing on unaware into new dangers. The tribe of the Ghilzies occupied the pass of Koord Cabul, a gorge five miles in length, between precipitous cliffs of great height, and traversed by a mountain torrent. From the rocky sides of the pass a shower of balls rained down upon the human mass struggling in this defile. Akbar Khan, it is said, strove to put an end to this fire, but he was utterly powerless to do it; and when the English column emerged from the pass, three thousand dead bodies lay upon the ground. The women shared in the common fate; many of them were in camel-panniers, a few — among them Lady Sale — on horseback. The latter was severely wounded, and her son-in-law was killed. The Afghan chief from time to time appeared in the midst of the confusion. Finally he announced, says Lady Sale, "that he had a proposal to make, but that he did not like to do so, lest his motives might be misconstrued; but that, as it concerned us more than himself, he would mention it; and that it was that all the married men with their families should come over and put themselves under his protection, he guaranteeing them honorable treatment and safe escort to Peshawur. He added that it must have been seen from the events of the day previous—the loss of Captain Boyd's and Captain Anderson's children—that our camp was no place of safety for women and children." The women were not consulted. "There was but faint hope," says Lady Sale, "of our ever getting safely to Jellalabad, and we followed the stream. But although there was much talk regarding our going over, all I personally know of the affair is that I was told we were all to go, and that our horses were ready, and that we must mount immediately, and be off."

The column continued to advance, the Asiatic soldiers dropping behind and falling under the severity of the cold. Finally the English gave way, one after another, until in the pass of Jugdulluk, barricaded by branches and trunks of trees, and held by the enemy, a massacre so horrible ensued that but twenty officers and twenty-five soldiers emerged alive. The following morning this little handful was again attacked; they refused to surrender, a captain and a few men were made prisoners, others perished on the spot, six only reached Futtehabad, sixteen miles from Jellalabad, and before the last stage of the journey was completed, five of these six had perished.

General Sale meanwhile was at Jellalabad, ignorant of what had befallen his comrades and his family at Cabul. Common rumor had already announced some great danger, when a letter arrived from General Elphinstone declaring that in virtue of a treaty made with the Afghans, the entire territory of Cabul was to be abandoned. General Sale was not sure that he should be able to lead his troops to Peshawur, and he resolved to disregard the instructions of Elphinstone and hold the position in which he was. On the 13th of February, a sentinel on the walls of Jellalabad perceived a man advancing in the distance whose horse seemed almost too fatigued to walk. They hastened out to meet him. Wounded, famished, worn out with suffering, Dr. Brydon brought news of the disaster which had overwhelmed the English column. Alone of all who had left Cabul on the 6th of January, he remained alive and at liberty, and he brought word to the English general that his wife and daughter were in the hands of Akbar Khan.

In a soldier's heroism General Sale found what consolation was possible. "I propose," he said, "to hold this place on the part of government until I receive its order to the contrary." Akbar Khan immediately laid siege to the town, seconded by successive earthquakes which destroyed a portion of the ramparts. But the English stood firm, repairing their walls and repulsing the enemy's attacks. They knew that General Pollock was on his way to their relief, and they decided to come out and attack the Afghans, without waiting for his arrival.

On the 7th of April, three columns of infantry with a little force of cavalry made a sortie from Jellalabad. At the head of one of these columns marched Captain Havelock, as tranquilly resolute as when, later, he came to the deliverance of Lucknow. The Afghans were completely defeated, notwithstanding their superior numbers. On his part General Pollock had carried the Khyber Pass, where General Wild had been destroyed. Foreseeing that the enemy would, in accordance with their custom, occupy the heights, he had posted his own forces on still higher elevations; the Afghans tried vainly to dislodge them, and in their turn perished by the same fate that they had designed for the English. The two victorious corps met at the gates of Jellalabad. The fortune of war had shifted, and English courage was in the ascendant. For a moment the vague hope had spread among the native populations of India that foreign dominion was approaching its end in their country. Shah Shooja was assassinated in Cabul; Lord Auckland, however, published a proclamation full of courage and hope: the calamity which had overtaken the British arms was, he said, "a new occasion for displaying the stability and vigor of the British power, and the admirable spirit and valor of the British Indian army."

This was the brave adieu of the governor-general to a country which he had inconsiderately involved in a disastrous war. Lord Auckland had just been superseded by Lord Ellenborough.

The first instinct of the new governor was to recall the troops at the earliest possible moment from Afghanistan. Lord Ellenborough was a man of much intellectual ability; he was an orator, and extremely well informed in respect to Indian affairs, but he was often carried away by a love of rhetoric and theatrical effect into contenting himself and seeking to satisfy others with mere words. The brilliant style of his proclamations did not suffice to content the English generals, eager for vengeance, and burning to wash out the shame of their defeats. The military commanders gathered together their forces, and marched against the enemy. One by one, the cities which had fallen into the hands of the Afghans were retaken; on the 15th of September, 1842, General Pollock entered Cabul, and, a few days later, set fire to the grand bazar where Akbar Khan had displayed to the Afghan populace the body of the murdered Macnaghten.

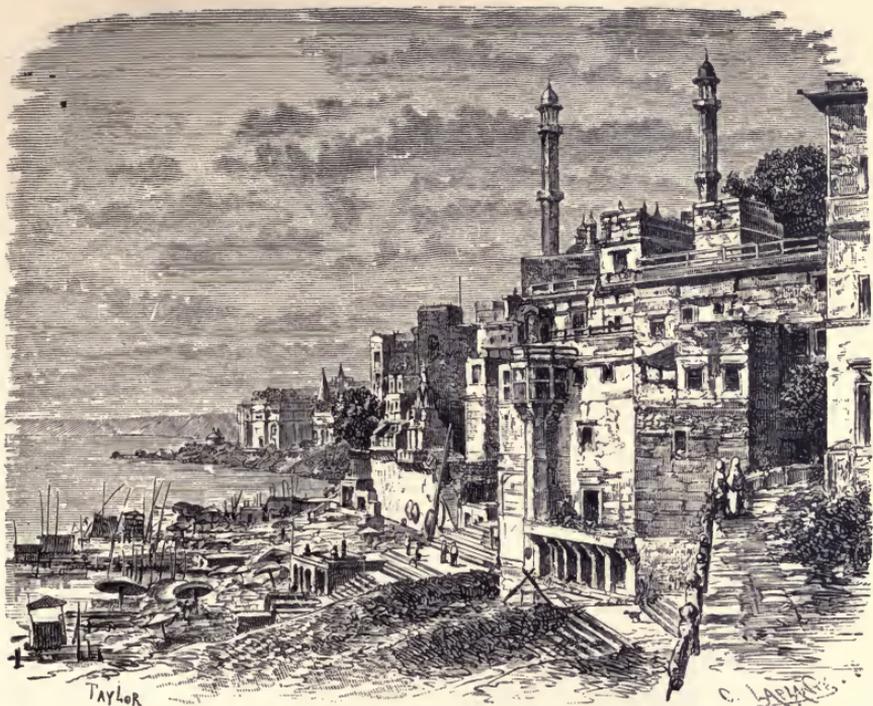

The English hostages meantime remained in the hands of the Afghan prince; the conquerors were not forgetful of them, however, and Sir Robert Sale was appointed to attempt their deliverance. Whether he should find his wife and his daughter alive he did not know. From fort to fort, from defile to defile, the unhappy prisoners had been hurried by their keepers; they had been shut up in the most horrible recesses, deprived almost of the necessaries of life, overwhelmed by physical and mental sufferings of every kind. Lady Sale in her journal relates the history of this captivity which lasted eight months. General Elphinstone very early succumbed under the hardships of the imprisonment. The women had preserved their strength wonderfully, and the health of the children seems not to have suffered. A hope of deliverance supported the prisoners, for signs of weakness were evident in the position of Akbar Khan. The same conviction made its way among the inferior chiefs, to whom the custody of the English prisoners was confided. They allowed themselves to be won over by the promise of a heavy ransom, and the whole party were on their way towards General Pollock's camp when they met General Sale, coming in search of them. "Our joy was too great, too overwhelming for tongue to utter," wrote one of the rescued prisoners. "We felt a choking sensation which could not obtain the relief of tears."

Other captives who had fallen into the power of the Ameer of Bokhara, to whom they had been sent as an embassy, were meeting with a very different fate. The feeble attempts that were made to deliver them ended only in establishing the certainty that death has been to them a relief from insupportable sufferings.

The intervention of the government of English India in the affairs of the native princes had borne bitter fruit. A proclamation by Lord Ellenborough announced that this course had been definitively abandoned. "To force a sovereign upon a reluctant people," wrote Lord Ellenborough, on the 1st of October, 1842, four years after Lord Auckland's proclamation in favor of the Shah Shooja, "would be as inconsistent with the policy as it is with the principles of the British government." He added that any government freely recognized by the Afghans themselves would be accepted by Great Britain; that the English troops would be withdrawn from Afghanistan; and that the English power in India would content itself with the limits which nature appeared to have assigned to it.

Dost Mohammed emerged from captivity, and was restored to the throne of Cabul. All the sufferings, losses, and humiliations of the English army had been in vain; at the end of four years, events had brought back the old chief to his kingdom, and restored the independence of the Afghan nation. The bones of those who had been the victims of this war remained scattered in the defiles of the mountains, while hostile and bitter memories lingered in the depths of many hearts.

CALCUTTA.

WINDSOR CASTLE.

CHAPTER III.

SIR ROBERT PEEL AND THE CORN-LAW QUESTION.

WHILST England in the East was attaching her name to the opium trade with the Chinese, and to the defiles of the Afghan mountains, her interior government was undergoing important modifications, and the power passed from the hands of the Whigs to those of the Tories, from Lord John Russell and Lord Palmerston to Sir Robert Peel and Lord Aberdeen.

“Ever since its two restorations in 1835 and 1839,” says M. Guizot in his life of Sir Robert Peel, “the Whig Cabinet had been wearing itself out by continuing in office without growing in power. During the sessions of 1840 and 1841, it began again to totter, and it was easy to foresee that it would soon fall once more. The attacks of the opposition became more pressing. Peel no longer restrained the ardor of his friends. The Whigs began to perceive that his blows were more hardly dealt, and might soon prove mortal. They endeavored to intimidate or weaken him by foretelling the difficulties which would beset him in the exercise of power. ‘I believe,’ said Mr. Macaulay, ‘that if, with the best and purest intentions, the right honorable baronet were to undertake the government of this country, he would find that it was very easy to lose the confidence of the party which raised him to power, but very difficult indeed to gain that which the present government happily possesses, the confidence of the people of Ireland.’

“It was by the help of Ireland most of all, that the Whigs hoped to maintain themselves in power and to paralyze their formidable opponent. They called on him to explain himself with clearness on this question, and generally to state the views and principles of conduct which would guide him if he were placed at the head of the government. Peel unhesitatingly accepted the challenge. 'Two demands,' he said, 'have been made by the opposite side, in the course of this discussion. The one, that he who is about to give his vote of want of confidence in the government should specify the grounds upon which this vote is given; the other, that those who from their position may be regarded as the probable successors of the government which it is sought to displace, should state upon what principles of public policy they propose to conduct the affairs of their country. The absolute justice of the first of these demands I willingly admit. The other demand, namely, that I should explain in detail my views of public policy, is perhaps not equally imperative in point of strict obligation, but it is a demand to which, from considerations of prudence, I shall most willingly accede. There shall be no limit to the fulness and unreservedness of the answers which I will give, excepting your impatience. I know too well the little value that can be placed on that support which arises from misconception of one's real opinions. I have had too much experience of solemn engagements, entered into for the purpose of overturning a government, violated when that object had been obtained. I have so little desire to procure a hollow confidence, either on false pretences or by a delusive silence, that I rejoice in the opportunity of frankly declaring my opinions and intentions on every point on which you challenge unreserved explanation.' "

Sir Robert Peel spoke for two hours, passing in review all the great public questions of the time, all his own opinions regarding reform, the principles of Parliament, the Poor Law, the Corn Law, Catholic Emancipation and the Administration of Ireland.

“I have done,” he said at last. “I have fulfilled the purpose for which I rose, by specifying the grounds on which I withhold my confidence from the present government, and by declaring the course I mean to pursue on the great questions of public policy on which the public mind is divided. I cannot answer the question you put me, what principles will prevail if a new government be formed? But I can answer for it, that if the principles I profess do not prevail, of that government I shall form no part. It may be that by the avowal of my opinions I shall forfeit the confidence of some who, under mistaken impressions, may have been hitherto disposed to follow me. I shall deeply regret the withdrawal of that confidence; but I would infinitely prefer to incur the penalty of its withdrawal than to retain it under false pretences. It may be that the principles I profess cannot be reduced to practice, and that a government attempting the execution of them would not meet with adequate support from the House of Commons. Still I shall not abandon them. I shall not seek to compensate the threatened loss of confidence on this side of the House by the faintest effort to conciliate the support of the other. I shall steadily persevere in the course which I have uniformly pursued since the passing of the Reform Bill, content with the substantial power which I shall yet exercise,—indifferent as to office so far as personal feelings or personal objects are concerned,—ready, if required, to undertake it whatever be its difficulties,—refusing to accept it on conditions inconsistent with personal honor, disdaining to hold it by the tenure by which it is at present held.”

It was not until the following session, on the 27th of May, 1841, that the vote of want of confidence in the Whig Cabinet, proposed by Sir Robert Peel himself, was carried by a majority of one. Determined to try every chance, the queen's ministers obtained the dissolution of Parliament. In the debate on the queen's address, the new Parliament, assembling on the 19th of August, 1841, gave the Conservatives a majority of ninety-one votes. On the 30th of August, the Whig Cabinet resigned, and Sir Robert Peel took into his hands the government of his country.

He came into power under the most brilliant yet precarious auspices, with a splendid array of strength, but also with hidden sources of weakness. His triumph was no less legitimate than it was complete. The Whig Cabinet had given way before no accident or manœuvre; it had slowly been worn out, in the open daylight of debate, and had retired before the positive and well-considered vote of Parliament. The Cabinet just formed by Sir Robert Peel numbered in its ranks men illustrious by their renown, their rank, their capacity, and by the general esteem of the public: in the House of Lords, the Duke of Wellington, who had no special office; Lord Lyndhurst, equally skilled in political discussion and in the administration of justice; Lord Aberdeen, a man of conciliating disposition and clear-sighted intelligence, prudent, patient, just, and better than any other person acquainted with the diplomatic interests and traditions of Europe; and Lord Ellenborough, the most brilliant of Tory orators: in the House of Commons, Lord Stanley, concerning whom the noble ex-leader of the Whigs, Lord Grey, said, in 1840, that he considered him the direct descendant of the great oratorical school of Pitt and Fox; Sir James Graham, eminent for administrative talent, a fertile and animated reasoner, full of resources in debate; and around them a group of men still young, already highly distinguished, laborious, enlightened, sincere, and devoted,—Mr. Gladstone, Lord Lincoln, Mr. Sidney Herbert, Sir William Follett. Behind this political staff stood a strong majority, trained by ten years of conflict, rejoicing and proud in their new triumph. Finally, at the head of this powerful party and this strong ministry was Sir Robert Peel, the unquestioned and experienced leader, accepted by all, enjoying the esteem of the public, invested with the authority of character, talent, experience, and victory. Never perhaps had a prime minister united, at his accession to power, so many elements and guarantees of a safe and strong government.

But he was called to perform the most difficult of tasks,—a task in its very nature incoherent and contradictory. He was obliged to be at once a conservative and a reformer, and to carry with him in this double path a majority, itself badly cohering and ruled by interests, prejudices, and passions, which could neither be removed nor conciliated. Unity was lacking in his policy and union in his army. His position and the work which lay before him were alike complicated and embarrassed; he was a commoner, charged with the duty of subjecting to severe reforms a powerful and proud aristocracy; he was a Liberal, reasonable and moderate, but truly a Liberal, drawing after him the old Tories and the ultra Protestants. And this commoner, now become so great, was a man of reserved and unsympathetic character, of cold and ungraceful manners, able in guiding and ruling a public assembly, but ill suited to act upon men's minds by the charm of intimacy, of conversation, of frank and free interchange of sentiments,—rather a tactician than a propagandist, more powerful to convince than to persuade, more formidable to his adversaries than agreeable to his friends.

Better than himself, probably, his adversaries perceived, with the sagacity of party spirit, the difficulties which awaited him, and took no pains to remove them. Still in power upon the re-assembling of Parliament, and called upon to prepare, as their last will and testament, the speech from the throne, the Whigs were very careful to define therein the double task which they themselves had not been able to accomplish, but which they imposed upon their successors. They said to the two Houses: "The extraordinary expenses which the events in Canada, China, and the Mediterranean have occasioned, and the necessity of maintaining a force adequate to the protection of our extensive possessions, have made it necessary to consider the means of increasing the public revenue. Her Majesty is anxious that this object should be effected in the manner least burdensome to her people; and it has appeared to her Majesty, after full deliberation, that you may at this juncture properly direct your attention to the revision of duties affecting the productions of foreign countries. It will be for you to consider whether some of those duties are not so trifling in amount as to be unproductive to the revenue, while they are vexatious to commerce. You may further examine whether the principle of protection, upon which others of those duties are founded, be not carried to an extent injurious alike to the income of the state and the interests of the people. Her Majesty is desirous, also, that you should consider the laws which regulate the trade in corn. It will be for you to determine whether these laws do not aggravate the natural fluctuations of the supply; whether they do not embarrass trade, derange the currency, and by their operation diminish the comfort and increase the privations of the great body of the community."

Retiring thus with all possible advantages, the Whigs laid upon Sir Robert Peel the task of repairing their faults and making good their promises. He was required to re-establish authority and to reform the laws; to supply deficits and to lighten the burdens of the people.

For five months, Sir Robert Peel studied the great questions which it was his duty to solve. Eager to resume the always easy rôle of an opposition, the Whigs reproached him for his dilatoriness. "What has been your neglect of duty," he retorted, "in permitting five years to elapse without bringing forward on the part of a united government, a proposition for the remedy of these abuses! . . . I do wish that the noble lord had taken the sense of the House of Commons—elected under his advice and under his auspices—with respect to the reasonableness and justice of the demand which I make upon its confidence, and had thus enabled me to judge whether the House of Commons approves or disapproves of the course which I mean to pursue.”

Parliament was, however, prorogued before Sir Robert Peel had stated his plans. It met again on the 3d of February, 1842, with unusual interest and enthusiasm. The Queen had recently given birth to the Prince of Wales, and a strong monarchical feeling animated both the nation and the Houses: addresses of affectionate congratulation were voted both to the Queen and to Prince Albert.

Fortuitous and fleeting though they are, ebullitions of public joy are always serviceable to the administration which is in power at the moment. Addresses in reply to the Queen's speech were voted in both Houses with entire unanimity. They announced that measures would be at once proposed for the restoration of an equilibrium between the expenses of the State and its revenues, for the revision of the tariff and of the corn-laws, for the amendment of the bankrupt law, for the registration of voters, for regulating the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, and for affording to the distress of certain manufacturing districts all the relief that legislation could apply. All hesitation and all slowness now ceased in the action of the Cabinet; it immediately set the Houses at work, and for more than six months, Sir Robert Peel was constantly in the breach, either to explain and defend his plans in respect to the great questions under discussion, or to meet the attacks of the opposition, and all the other incidents of government.

The means which he adopted to restore the balance in the finances of the State was the re-establishment of the income tax, a tax on all incomes above £150 a year, a measure originally carried by Mr. Pitt in 1798. The tax which Mr. Pitt had proposed and obtained was, however, at the rate of ten per cent., while Sir Robert Peel desired but three per cent. He insisted unflinchingly upon his demand; it was, in his eyes, a question of national honor as well as of administrative prudence.

“We live,” he said, “in an important era of human affairs. There may be a natural tendency to overrate the magnitude of the crisis in which we live or those particular events with which we are ourselves conversant; but I think it impossible to deny that the period in which our lot and the lot of our fathers has been cast—the period that has elapsed since the outbreak of the first French Revolution, has been one of the most memorable periods that the history of the world will afford. The course which England has pursued during that period will attract for ages to come the contemplation, and, I trust, the admiration of posterity. That period may be divided into two parts of almost equal duration; a period of twenty-five years of continued conflict, the most momentous which ever engaged the energies of a nation, and twenty-five years, in which most of us have lived, of profound European peace, produced by the sacrifices made during the years of war. . . . My confident hope and belief is, that, following the example of those who preceded you, you will look your difficulties in the face, and not refuse to make similar sacrifices to those which your fathers made, for the purpose of upholding the public credit. You will bear in mind that this is no casual and occasional difficulty; you will bear in mind that there are indications amongst all the upper classes of society of increased comfort and enjoyment—of increased prosperity and wealth; and that, concurrently with these indications, there exists a mighty evil, which has been growing up for the last seven years, and which you are now called upon to meet. If you have, as I believe you have, the fortitude and constancy of which you have been set the example, you will not consent with folded arms to view the annual growth of this mighty evil. You will not adopt the miserable expedient of adding, during peace, and in the midst of these indications of wealth and increasing prosperity, to the burdens which posterity will be called upon to bear.

THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT FROM WESTMINSTER BRIDGE.

“Your conduct will be contrasted with the conduct of your fathers under difficulties infinitely less pressing than yours. Your conduct will be contrasted with that of your fathers, who, with a mutiny at the Nore, a rebellion in Ireland, and disaster abroad, yet submitted with buoyant vigor and universal applause (with the funds as low as 52) to a property tax of ten per cent. I believe that you will not subject yourself to an injurious or an unworthy contrast.

“My confident hope and belief is, that now, when I devolve the responsibility upon you, you will prove yourselves worthy of your mission — worthy to be the representatives of a mighty people. You will not tarnish the fame which it is your duty to cherish as the most glorious inheritance. You will not impair the character for fortitude, for good faith, which, in proportion as the empire of opinion supersedes and predominates over the empire of physical force, constitutes for every people, but above all for England, the main instrument by which to repel hostile aggressions and maintain extended empire.”

The Houses thought and felt with the minister, who honored them by trusting to their integrity; the great party that marched under Sir Robert Peel's leadership accepted the burden which he laid upon them, and order was re-established in the public finances.

At the outset, and in appearance, the second of the measures proposed by the new minister was less serious: it consisted in the revision of the tariff. Twelve hundred articles were comprised in the new list; the duties were reduced on seven hundred and fifty articles, and these reductions added to the reduced duties on coffee and on timber for building would, it was calculated, entail a loss of one million and forty thousand pounds on the exchequer.

“Many gentlemen, who are strong advocates of free trade,” said Sir Robert Peel, “may consider that I have not gone far enough. I believe that on the general principle of free trade there is now no great difference of opinion, and that all agree in the general rule that we should purchase in the cheapest market, and sell in the dearest; . . . but it is impossible, in dealing with such immense and extensive interests, to proceed always by a strict application of the general principle. I believe that the true friends to the general principle will argue that it is not expedient or proper to propose such a change as to cause general complaint and excite a strong sympathy. . . . We have proceeded with such care and caution as to produce as small an amount of individual suffering as was compatible with the end in view. . . . I sincerely hope that the general result of this and the other measures will be ample compensation for any individual suffering that may be inflicted; and that they will increase the demand for the employment of industry, and thus increase the means of the people to command the comforts and necessaries of life. We have made this proposal at a time of very considerable financial embarrassment; but in doing so we have set an example to Europe, we have declared that we will not seek to improve our finances by increasing the duties on imports; we have trusted to other means for replenishing our exchequer.”

Sir Robert Peel had judged correctly in thinking that the advocates of free trade would find his reforms insufficient; they directed their attacks against the modifications made by the Tory minister in respect to the legislation on corn. He had maintained the principle of the sliding-scale of duties on the importation of foreign corn, modifying it in the liberal direction. The Whigs, with Lord John Russell as their spokesman, proposed the substitution of a fixed duty for the sliding-scale; Mr. Villiers, Mr. Cobden, and the radicals demanded the complete abolition of all duties upon corn. Mr. Christopher, in the name of the ardent partisans of protection, required that at every step of the sliding-scale the rates should be raised. Sir Robert Peel firmly supported the propositions of the ministry. Without vehement confidence, without self-deception, without charlatanism, he proposed his plan as the most equitable compromise between the conflicting interests, but promised neither to himself nor to others the final reconciling of these interests, or the cessation of the distress of the working classes in certain parts of the country.

He was evidently perplexed, although resolute, and extremely harassed in his mind between his ardent desire to ameliorate the condition of the working classes, and the consideration that he owed, not only as a matter of parliamentary prudence, but also in justice and permanent necessity, to the landed interest and the national agriculture. These perplexities created embarrassments for him among the members of his Cabinet; as soon as he manifested his intention to reduce the protective duties of the sliding-scale, the Duke of Buckingham, to whom he had given office as the most devoted representative of the agricultural interest, resigned, and the Tory party divided in the vote upon the amendment. Lord Palmerston took a malicious pleasure in calling attention to these difficulties of the Conservative party, suddenly abandoned, he said, by the leader to whom they had given their confidence. Sir Robert Peel haughtily vindicated his right to freedom of thought and action. "You told me last year," he exclaimed, replying in the House of Commons to Lord Palmerston, "that I must be an instrument in the hands of others, and that the power was denied me of enforcing my own principles. I declared then, as I declare now, that I consider office, its power, its distinction, its privileges, as nothing worth, except as the instrument of effecting public good. If it is to be held by sufferance, if it can be retained only on the condition of abandoning my own opinions and obeying the dictates of others, it will not be held by me. My reward for all the sacrifices it entails is the prospect of that honorable fame which can only be attained by steadily pursuing the course which, according to the best conclusions of our fallible judgment, we honestly believe to be for the welfare of the country. . . . It is not by subserviency to the will of others, it is not by the hope of conciliating the temporary favor of majorities, that such fame can be acquired; and in spite of all the noble lord has said, in spite of the rumors he has heard of concealed dissatisfaction among our supporters, we have the proud satisfaction of knowing that we retain their confidence while we claim for ourselves the privilege of acting on our own opinions. From the commencement of the session to its close, we have received that generous support which has enabled us to overcome every difficulty, to carry triumphantly every measure we have proposed. There may have been shades of difference, there may have been occasional dissatisfaction and complaint; but I have the firm belief that our conduct in office has not abated one jot of that confidence on the part of our friends which cheered and encouraged us in the blank regions of opposition; and next to the approval of our own consciences and to the hope of future fame, the highest reward we can receive for public labors is their cordial support and their personal esteem."

The confidence of Sir Robert Peel in his adherents was sincere and, to a certain extent, well-founded. In spite of evident differences of opinion and manifestations of ill-temper, the main body of the party had remained, and did remain, faithful to him; necessary to one another, agreeing in the fundamental principles of government, the leader and the majority of his army marched together, without asking questions; they made no attempt to deceive one another, but they avoided undeceiving each other, and covered their dissensions and their disappointments with concessions or with silence. At the same time, useful as was this patient moderation, the situation was a false one, and could not last without becoming worse as it became more manifest. In Parliament the peril was beginning to appear; in the nation, two important facts, the Anti-Corn-Law League and the condition of Ireland, now hastened the march of events, and forced Sir Robert Peel to move more rapidly down the slope upon which he had entered.

Bolton, in the county of Lancaster, not far from Manchester, a second-rate manufacturing town, having, however, fifty thousand inhabitants, had been plunged by the commercial crisis into the severest distress. Disorder and crime, as well as suffering, went on increasing with frightful rapidity in this unhappy town. Nearly one-fourth of the houses stood empty, and the prisons were crowded with inmates. Parliament instituted inquiry into the extent and cause of this distress. Bolton was at this time represented in the House of Commons by Dr. Bowring, a political economist, enthusiastic, intelligent, indefatigable, ardently devoted to the cause of free trade, and supported in his philanthropic zeal by his gratification at notoriety. The evil remained, and no remedy for it appeared. In August, 1838, an old physician, Dr. Birney, gave notice that he would deliver a lecture in the theatre in Bolton, on the Corn-Law and its effects. A crowd filled the building, but the speaker, seized with sudden embarrassment, was unable to proceed. Disappointment and displeasure, in an audience already so disheartened, soon changed to anger. A riot seemed about to begin, when a young surgeon, Mr. Paulton, sprang upon the platform, and began to pour forth an eloquent invective against the Corn-Law which was inflicting so much suffering upon the working classes. The assembly listened and applauded with ardor. He was requested to repeat his address on another occasion. Dr. Bowring invited the young man to come to Manchester, where a committee had just been formed among the manufacturers for the purpose of investigating the public distress and suggesting means to remedy it. Mr. Paulton was sent by this committee on a tour through the principal manufacturing districts of England, with the design of inspiring everywhere the same zeal for the same objects. The Chamber of Commerce at Manchester addressed to Parliament a petition, desiring the complete and immediate abolition of the Corn-Law. Twenty-five thousand signatures were attached to a sort of declaration of war against these acts, and a permanent association was organized among the manufacturers for the prosecution of their object. A periodical publication was established, and a staff of lecturers employed to disseminate their view, a subscription of fifty thousand pounds being promptly raised to meet the expenses of the work.

Thus began the formal organization of public feeling in behalf of an interest and an idea.

An idea, however, is nothing without a man. Immediately one was found for the dawning institution. This was Richard Cobden, a manufacturer of printed calicoes, who had been for a few years established in Manchester, and had at once distinguished himself by his acute, upright, and fertile intellect, and by his clear, animated, natural and bold eloquence, as well as by his honorable character and industrial success. He was popular and a man of wealth, and represented the borough of Stockport in the House of Commons. That union of instinct and prompt judgment which characterizes powerful minds and true missions, taught Mr. Cobden, upon his entrance into the association, that, in order to succeed, it must become general and national, instead of remaining local and provincial, and that it must have for its headquarters the great centre of the country and the government, that is to say, London.

In this he succeeded, but without destroying the influence of Manchester; and the aim and principles of the association, its conditions and means of success, were debated and proclaimed in a sphere much more elevated and extensive than that in which it had originated.

At one of these meetings Mr. Cobden had been describing the Hanseatic League, and other similar associations formed in the Middle Ages for the purpose of resisting aristocratic oppression and protecting the working classes. "Why do we not have a League?" cried some one in the audience. "Yes," rejoined Cobden, "an Anti-Corn-Law League." The suggestion was promptly and enthusiastically adopted; it spread rapidly wherever the Manchester movement had penetrated; and the association henceforth had a striking name, a popular leader, unity, and grandeur. The London Times, which had hitherto taken little notice of the movement, changed its tone, and announced solemnly that the League was "a great fact;" adherents multiplied and subscriptions became daily more considerable. It was finally resolved to form a new fund of one hundred thousand pounds, and at the first meeting held in Manchester more than one-eighth of this sum was immediately subscribed.

At its very beginning, however, the League encountered a serious danger; this was the claim of the Chartists to lead in all assemblies for reform, and to proclaim everywhere their principles and their projects. They refused to enter into any alliance with the League for the purpose of obtaining free trade, the sole aim of that organization; and they plunged its chiefs, the manufacturers, into the most extreme perplexity by counselling the factory-hands everywhere to suspend work, it being certain, they said, that when all sources of production and revenue were thus dried up, government would be forced to give way, and to grant to the working classes whatever they might choose to demand. This advice bore fruit in several weeks of idleness and disorder, fatal to the work-people themselves and dangerous for the manufacturing interest which protected free trade. Mr. Cobden and his friends deplored a disturbance which the general distress and the ravings of the Chartist leaders had brought about; they kept scrupulously aloof from it, and gladly resumed their own work when liberty of action had been restored to them by the subsidence of the Chartist agitation, and the general return of the factory-hands to their work.

Public addresses became numerous in London, and soon in other cities of the kingdom; at stated periods the most distinguished political economists, in the presence of crowded audiences, attacked the existing legislation, claiming free trade in the name of principles and interests, of science and of charity. The violence of the orators was extreme at times, a violence possible only among a people long accustomed to the exercise of liberty within the limits of a strongly established order. Mr. W. J. Fox, who shortly after became a member of the House of Commons, spoke thus, in Covent-Garden Theatre: "It is something, it is much to many here, that, through every station, in every rank of life, the pressure is felt; the demon seems to be omnipresent, and they cannot escape his pestiferous influence. But even this is not the deadliest influence of the Corn-Laws. Did one want to exhibit it in this great theatre, it might be done; not by calling together such an audience as I now see here, but by going out into the by-places, the alleys, the dark courts, the garrets and cellars of the metropolis, and by bringing thence their wretched and famished inhabitants. One might crowd them here — boxes, pit, and galleries, — with their shrunk and shrivelled forms, with their wan and pallid cheeks, with their distressful looks, — perhaps with dark and bitter passions pictured in their countenances, — and thus exhibit a scene that would appall the stoutest heart, and melt the hardest; a scene that we would wish to bring the prime minister upon the stage to see, and we would say to him, ‘There, delegate of majesty! Leader of legislators! Conservator of institutions! Look upon that mass of misery. That is what your laws and power, if they do not create, have failed to prevent, have failed to cure or mitigate!’ And supposing this to be done, — could this scene be realized, — we know what would be said. We should be told, ‘There has always been poverty in the world; there are numerous ills that laws can neither make nor cure; whatever is done, much distress must exist.’ They will say, ‘It is the mysterious dispensation of Providence, and there we must leave it.’ I would say to the premier, if he used such arguments, ‘Hypocrite, hypocrite! urge not that plea yet, you have no right to it. Strike off every fetter upon industry, take the last grain of the poison of monopoly out of the cup of poverty; give labor its full rights; throw open the markets of the world to an industrious people; and then, if, after all, there be poverty, you have earned your right to qualify for the unenviable dignity of a blasphemer of Providence!’”

When an idea has been thus transformed into a passion and a virtue, when the element of truth contained in it thus completely effaces and obliterates all objections and all the other truths which limit it, deliberation and discussion are at an end; there is nothing left but to act; its partisans advance; they rush forward. The League made rapid progress, recruiting new and unexpected adherents. In the agricultural regions, and notably in Dorsetshire, meetings were held of farm-laborers, those especial favorites of protection, who related their own distresses, almost equal to those of the manufacturing classes. “I be protected,” cried a peasant at one of these meetings, “and I be starving!”

Sir Robert Peel followed with sympathetic but anxious eyes this great movement. A friend of the principles on which the League was founded, he was, nevertheless, shocked by the violence of its language and the impatience of its demands; he did not regard the Corn-Law as the source of all the public distress, nor free trade as a remedy for all the miseries which, in afflicting the country, grieved him to the heart. The anger and alarm of the high-Tories redoubled; their attacks against Peel for "the treason he had already consummated, and his obscure designs," became every day more violent. He was irritated rather than intimidated by these attacks; but in the midst of this party turmoil, in the presence of so many hostile or compromising passions, of so many problems and doubtful points, he judged it wiser to slacken rather than to hasten his advance in the difficult road upon which he had entered. He announced publicly that her Majesty's government did not have it in contemplation to propose extensive changes in the Corn-Laws.

The irritation of the leaders of the League was extreme; and the attacks against Sir Robert became personal. He, however, remained persistently silent, only letting the restored equilibrium of the public finances speak for him, and the progressive abatement in the tax on a great number of articles of commerce. The income-tax was, however, still maintained, and the Corn-Law received no modification. The reserved character of the minister, his habits of reflection and solitary resolve, weighed equally upon his disturbed and disorganized party and upon his uneasy and suspicious adversaries. The Tories had a deep-seated conviction that Sir Robert Peel was removing himself from their cause and from their control, ruled by higher considerations than the spirit of party; the Whigs dared not yet count upon his support, and sought at one time to urge him into the path where they themselves walked; at another, to supplant him in the exercise of power. All were conscious of the approach of a great crisis in the interior administration of England, ordained not by political or social theories, but by a sentiment more elevated and more imperative, — the greatest good of the greatest number of human beings recognized as the supreme aim of human society and government. Such was the supreme law of which Sir Robert Peel made himself the minister; its weight rested also upon all his opponents, some of them ruled as he was by this grand idea, others intimidated and paralyzed by it, as it was more or less clearly presented to their minds, either as an incontestable law or as an irresistible fact. This is, par excellence, the democratic dogma of our day; and it will be the glory of Sir Robert Peel, as it was his chief element of strength, that he was its most reasonable, honest, and, for a well-regulated state, its boldest representative.

There was, however, great impatience at the delays and persistent hesitation ascribed to the prime minister. The distress of the agricultural laborers was the favorite argument of the advocates of free trade, and Mr. Cobden gave notice that he should ask for the appointment of a committee of inquiry into the causes of this distress. Asserting that the farmers were as much manufacturers as the weavers or the cotton-spinners, he appealed to the support of the English aristocracy.

“Your fathers led our fathers,” he exclaimed; “you may lead us if you will go the right way. But, although you have retained your influence with this country longer than any other aristocracy, it has not been by opposing popular opinion, or by setting yourself against the spirit of the age. In other days, when the battle and the hunting-field were the tests of manly vigor, your fathers were first and foremost there. . . . You have always been Englishmen. You have not shown a want of courage and firmness when any call has been made upon you. This is a new era. It is the age of improvement; it is the age of social advancement, not the age for war or for feudal sports. You live in a mercantile age, when the whole wealth of the world is poured into your lap. You cannot have the advantages of commercial rents and feudal privileges, but you may be what you always have been if you will identify yourselves with the spirit of the age. If you are indifferent to enlightened means of finding employment for your own peasantry; if you are found obstructing that advance which is calculated to knit nations more together in the bonds of peace, by means of commercial intercourse; if you are found fighting against the discoveries which have almost given breath and life to material nature, and setting up yourselves as obstructions of that which destiny has decreed shall go on,—why, then, you will be the gentry of England no longer, and others will be found to take your place.”

It was Mr. Sidney Herbert, and not the prime minister, who replied to Mr. Cobden, and the Tories accused the latter of abandoning more and more their cause. Mr. Disraeli, like a bold and capable scout, dashed forward in advance of the main body which one day he was destined to lead. “I remember,” he said, “to have heard the right honorable baronet at the head of the government say that he would sooner be the leader of the gentlemen of England than possess the confidence of sovereigns. We don’t hear much of the gentlemen of England now. But what of that? They have the pleasures of memory — the charms of reminiscence. They were the right honorable baronet’s first love, and though he may not kneel to them now as in the hour of passion, still they can recall the past. He does what he can to keep them quiet; sometimes he takes refuge in arrogant silence, and sometimes he treats them with haughty frigidity; and if they knew anything of human nature, they would take the hint and shut their mouths. But they won’t. And what then happens? The right honorable baronet, being compelled to interfere, sends down his valet, who says in the genteelest manner, 'We can have no whining here.' And that is exactly the case of the great agricultural interest — that beauty whom everybody wooed, and one deluded. There is a fatality in such charms, and we now seem to approach the catastrophe of her career. For my part, if we are to have free trade, I, who honor genius, prefer that such measures should be proposed by the honorable member from Stockport (Mr. Cobden), rather than by one who, by skilful parliamentary manœuvres, has tampered with the generous confidence of a great people and a great party. For myself, I care not what may be the result. Dissolve, if you please, the Parliament you have betrayed, and appeal to the people, who, I believe, mistrust you. For me there remains this at least — the opportunity of expressing thus publicly my belief that a conservative government is an organized hypocrisy."

Sir F. Grant, P.R.A.

G. B. 1841

The Right Hon. Mr. B. Disraeli

The progress of the League, meanwhile, was as great as its most enthusiastic advocates could desire. Instead of being worn out by its protracted duration, the movement grew daily stronger and more general. The country districts united with the towns, working-men with their employers, laborers with political economists. It was no longer a question local in extent, and special as regards legislation; free trade became a passion, democratic as well as scientific, and, in the instinct of the people as well as by the ratiocination of the learned, an affair of national interest.

Sir Robert Peel had really not decided on his course, in spite of the efforts of those who believed they could read in his mind a secret tendency towards the reform which they demanded. Mr. John Bright, recently become a member of the House of Commons, and one of the most eloquent advocates of free trade, asserted this publicly in one of the Covent Garden meetings. "Sir Robert Peel," said Mr. Bright, "knows well enough what is wanted. . . . He has not been for nearly forty years in public life, hearing everything, reading everything, and seeing almost everything, without having come to a conclusion that, in this country of twenty-seven millions of people, and with an increase of a million and a half since he came into power in 1841, a law which shuts out the supply of food which the world would give to this population cannot be maintained; and that, were his government ten times as strong as it is, it must yield before the imperious and irresistible necessity which is every day gaining upon it. From his recent speech I would argue that he intends to repeal the Corn-Laws. He cannot say what he does, and mean ever to go back to the old foolish policy of protection. . . . He sprang from commerce, and until he has proved it himself, I will never believe that there is any man — much less will I believe that he is the man — who would go down to his grave, having had the power to deliver that commerce, and yet, not having had the manliness, the honesty, and the courage to do it.”

The hopes which the partisans of free trade founded upon Sir Robert Peel, and the advances, mingled with reproaches, which they had made towards him, disturbed and excited the Whig chiefs, long accustomed to lead in popular reforms, but up to this time faithful to the theory of a fixed tariff, moderately protective of native products. Lord John Russell was the first to make it a point of honor to carry forward that flag of Reform which he had borne so proudly. On the 26th of May, 1845, he proposed in the House of Commons eight resolutions which touched upon all the questions then occupying public attention, — the Corn-Laws, general freedom of trade, public education, colonization, the law in respect to the parochial settlement of the poor, — opening out prospects in every direction, and lavishing hopes, but without indicating any precise measures or any fixed conditions, the vague manifesto of a bold and noble ambition, eager to grasp the supreme authority and promising to make good use of it, without defining, or indeed taking much pains to determine, what that use should be.

Almost at the same time, Mr. Villiers moved for the complete and immediate abolition of the Corn-Laws. Sir Robert Peel put aside the vague, liberal resolutions of Lord John Russell, as well as the radical proposal of Mr. Villiers. He introduced into the debate moral views distinct from the strict principles of free trade, and of a higher range than the arguments on which his adversaries relied. "Under the existing state of the law," he said, "there has grown up a relation between landlord and tenant which does not rest merely on pecuniary considerations. . . . According to the principles for which the honorable gentleman opposite contends, I apprehend that he would say, 'Let the landlord make as much out of his land as he can; he has a right to do that.' On the same principle he has a right, commercially speaking, on the termination of a lease, to let his land for the utmost he can get for it; let there be no reference to the relations that have existed, perhaps for centuries, between him and the family that occupies the land; let him have no regard for the laborer; let him take the man who can do most for his ten or twelve shillings a week; let the old and feeble receive no consideration, because they cannot perform the labor which the young, the healthy, and the active can do. Though the land may be so regarded, yet, in everything but a purely commercial sense, in a social and moral point of view, I should deeply regret it. It would alter the character of the country, and would be accompanied by social evils which no pecuniary gain, no strict application of a purely commercial principle, could compensate."

Lord John Russell was not, however, convinced, and his ardor for the fray increased with the reticence observed by Sir Robert Peel. On the 22d of November, a rainy autumn having aggravated the general distress by a late and insufficient harvest,

Lord John Russell, in a letter to his constituents of the city of London, suddenly abandoned the principle of a fixed and moderate duty on foreign corn, and passed completely over to the radical camp, announcing himself, like Mr. Villiers and Mr. Cobden, the advocate of unlimited free trade. With him went other leaders of the Whig party. The surprise was great, and the anger no less, among the Conservatives, on seeing the forces of their adversaries thus reinforced. For a moment Sir Robert Peel believed that he had carried his Cabinet with him in a bold resolve to suspend at once the operation of the Corn-Laws, but he failed. Two days later the ministry resigned, and Lord John Russell was called to form a new one.

The chief of the retiring Cabinet wrote thus to the queen :

“Sir Robert Peel presents his humble duty to your Majesty, and influenced by no other motive than the desire to contribute, if possible, to the relief of your Majesty from embarrassment, and to the protection of the public interests from injury, is induced to make to your Majesty this confidential communication explanatory of Sir Robert Peel’s position and intentions with regard to the great question which is now agitating the public mind.

“On the 1st of November last, Sir Robert Peel advised his colleagues, on account of the alarming accounts from Ireland and many districts in this country as to the failure of the potato crop from disease, and for the purpose of guarding against contingencies which, in his opinion, were not improbable, humbly to recommend to your Majesty that the duties on the import of foreign grain should be suspended for a limited period, either by Order in Council, or by legislative enactment; Parliament, in either case, being summoned without delay.

“Sir Robert Peel foresaw that this suspension, fully justified by the tenor of the reports to which he has referred, would compel during the interval of suspension the reconsideration of the Corn-Laws.

“If the opinion of his colleagues had then been in concurrence with his own, he was fully prepared to take the responsibility of suspension and of the necessary consequence of suspension, a comprehensive review of the laws imposing restrictions on the importation of foreign grain and other articles of food, with a view to their gradual diminution and ultimate removal.

“He was disposed to recommend that any new laws to be enacted should contain within themselves the principle of gradual reduction and final repeal.

. . . . “Sir Robert Peel will support measures founded on that general principle, and will exercise any influence he may possess to promote their success.”

This was to play into Lord John Russell’s hands; still the latter was anxious to obtain more explicit engagements on the part of the great rival who now proposed to become his ally. Sir Robert Peel refused; again claiming that liberty of thought and action upon which he had always insisted. A serious disagreement between two of the persons selected prevented Lord John Russell from forming a Cabinet, and the queen recalled Sir Robert Peel. He accepted anew the task confided to him; and Lord Stanley was the only one among the ministers who felt it his duty to persist in his resignation of office. By the formal declarations both of Lord John Russell and of Mr. Cobden, the conservative party now found themselves obliged to choose between a sudden and absolute reform, and one of those measured and gradual reforms, which, amid the greatest tumult of conflicting interests and opinions, the government, the aristocracy and the people of England have so often had the wisdom to accept and accomplish.

But neither the conservative party, nor the opposition — Whig or Radical, — nor the people of England, nor Sir Robert himself, were this time in a considerate and foreseeing temper of mind. For four years the conservative party had been slowly going to pieces under the weight of the sacrifices which Sir Robert Peel demanded of it, and the repugnant tasks which he had imposed upon it without making them easier by any complaisance or confidence, by any skilful use of personal influence. Private interests now defended themselves hotly, taking no heed of the alleviations which the ministerial project offered them. The agricultural interest was not the only one attacked by his measures; for nearly all manufactures, as well as for the articles of food, the protective system was abandoned. In regard to the principal kinds of grain, instead of at once and completely abolishing the import duties, he contented himself with reducing them, leaving their entire abolition to take effect only after three years.

The prudence of Sir Robert Peel, however, failed of its effect, in the presence of the ardent displeasure of his late friends now become his foes. The schism in the great conservative party had bitter results. A hundred and twelve members only, in the House of Commons, followed Sir Robert Peel in the bold course upon which he had decided. Henceforth, the "Peelites," as they were called, no longer belonged to the ancient ranks of the Tories, and the old edifice of party began to be shaken to its very foundations.

Sir Robert Peel supported his measure in the House with that consummate skill which he possessed in the discussion of affairs, constantly bringing back his auditors to the question from which his opponents were perpetually straying. Mr. Disraeli and Lord George Bentinck directed their attacks in a great measure against the personal character of the minister; he felt these attacks keenly, for with his reserve was mingled a proud and shy sensitiveness; but he continually lifted the debate into the regions of the highest disinterestedness. On the 16th of February, after having for several hours defended his measure in all its details, he concluded as follows:—

“This night is to decide between the policy of continued relaxation of restriction, or the return to restraint and prohibition. This night you will select the motto which is to indicate the commercial policy of England. Shall it be ‘Advance!’ or ‘Recede!’ Which is the fitter motto for this great Empire? Survey our position, consider the advantages which God and nature have given us, and the destiny for which we are intended. We stand on the confines of Western Europe, the chief connecting link between the Old World and the New. The discoveries of science, the improvement of navigation, have brought us to within ten days of St. Petersburg, and will soon bring us within ten days of New York. We have an extent of coast greater in proportion to our population and the area of our land than any other great nation, securing to us maritime strength and superiority. Iron and coal, the sinews of manufacture, give us advantages over every rival in the great competition of industry. Our capital far exceeds that which they can command. In ingenuity, in skill, in energy, we are inferior to none. Our national character, the free institutions under which we live, the liberty of thought and action, an unshackled press spreading the knowledge of every discovery and of every advance in science, combine with our national and physical advantages to place us at the head of those nations which profit by the free interchange of their products. And is this the country to shrink from competition? Is this the country to adopt a retrograde policy? Is this the country which can only flourish in the sickly, artificial atmosphere of prohibition?

“Choose your motto, Advance! or, Recede! Many countries are watching with anxiety the selection you may make. . . . I counsel you to set them the example of liberality. Act thus, and it will be in perfect consistency with the course you have hitherto taken. Act thus, and you will provide an additional guarantee for the continued contentment, the happiness, and the well-being of the great body of the people. Act thus, and you will have done whatever human sagacity can do for the promotion of commercial prosperity. You may fail. Your precautions may be unavailing. They may give no certain assurance that mercantile and manufacturing prosperity will continue without interruption. Times of depression must perhaps return, unfavorable seasons, gloomy winters, may set in again; 'the years of plenteousness' may have ended, and 'the years of dearth' may have come; and again you may have to offer the unavailing expressions of sympathy and the urgent exhortations to patient resignation.

"Commune with your own hearts, and answer me this question,—Will your assurances of sympathy be less consolatory, will your exhortations to patience be less impressive, if, with your willing consent, the Corn-Laws shall have then ceased to exist? Will it be no satisfaction to you to reflect, that by your own act you have been relieved from the grievous responsibility of regulating the supply of food? Will you not then cherish with delight the reflection that in this the present hour of comparative prosperity, yielding to no clamor, impelled by no fear,—except indeed that provident fear which is the mother of safety,—you had anticipated the evil day and, long before its advent, had trampled on every impediment to the free circulation of the Creator's bounty?"

The House of Commons adopted Sir Robert Peel's plan by a majority of ninety-eight votes. In the House of Lords it was supported by the Duke of Wellington. "I am aware, my lords," he said, "that I address you on this occasion under many disadvantages. I address your lordships under the disadvantage of appearing here as a minister of the crown, to press this measure upon your adoption, knowing at the same time how disagreeable it is to many of you with whom I have long lived in intimacy and friendship, on whose good opinion I have ever relied, and whose good opinion I am happy to say it has been my good fortune hitherto to have enjoyed in no small degree. . . . I am aware that I address your lordships at present with all your prejudices roused against me for having adopted the course I have taken, a course which—however little I may be able to justify it to your lordships—I considered myself bound to take, and which if it were to be again adopted to-morrow, I should take again. I am in her Majesty's service, bound to her Majesty and to the sovereigns of this country by considerations of gratitude of which it is not necessary that I should say more to your lordships. It may be true, my lords, and it is true, that, under such circumstances, I ought to have no relation with party, and that party ought not to rely upon me. . . . I have stated to you the motives on which I have acted; I am satisfied with those motives myself; and I should be exceedingly concerned if any dissatisfaction respecting them remained in the mind of any of your lordships. . . . And now, my lords, I will not omit even on this night—probably the last on which I shall ever venture to address to you any advice again—I will not omit to give you my counsel with respect to the vote you ought to give on this occasion. . . . I know the object of the noble lords who are opposed to this bill is that Parliament should be dissolved, that the country should have the opportunity of considering the question, and that it may be seen whether or not the new House of Commons will agree to the measure. Now, really, if your lordships have so much confidence in the result of other elections, I think that you might venture to rely upon those which must occur according to the common course of law, within a twelvemonth from this time; and that you might leave it to the Parliament thus elected to consider the course which it will take on the expiration of the term of the bill now before you, for that bill is to last only till the year 1849. Do not compel the queen to dissolve Parliament."

The bill was passed by the House of Lords, as it had been by the House of Commons, and the triumph of Sir Robert Peel was complete. The displeasure of the conservative party remained unabated against him, however; and the Whigs had not abandoned their desire to complete by themselves the great work in which they had aided, under the flag of a leader foreign to their party, and but lately hostile to it. Upon the question of the repression of disorders in Ireland an alliance was formed between Lord George Bentinck, the Whigs, and the Radicals. Sir Robert Peel found himself in the minority, but Mr. Cobden had been careful to declare that his vote and that of his friends concerned only the bill in question, and affected in no degree the gratitude that the reform party felt towards Sir Robert Peel.

Four days later, the minister announced in the House of Commons that her Majesty had accepted the resignations of the Cabinet, and had directed Lord John Russell to form a new administration. Recapitulating the various questions that had occupied public attention during the past five years, he concluded as follows:—

"I have now executed the task which my public duty imposed upon me. I trust I have said nothing which can lead to the revival on the present occasion of those controversies which I have deprecated. Whatever opinions may be held with regard to the extent of the danger with which we were threatened from the failure in one great article of subsistence, I can say with truth that her Majesty's government, in proposing those measures of commercial policy which have disintitiled them to the confidence of many who heretofore gave them their support, were influenced by no other motive than the desire to consult the interests of this country. Our object was to avert dangers which we thought were imminent, and to terminate a conflict which, according to our belief, would soon place in hostile collision great and powerful classes in this country. The maintenance of power was not a motive for the proposal of those measures; for I had not a doubt that, whether those measures were accompanied by failure or success, the certain issue must be the termination of the existence of this government. It is perhaps advantageous for the public interest that such should be the issue. I admit that the withdrawal of confidence from us by many of our friends was a natural result. When proposals are made, apparently at variance with the course which ministers heretofore pursued, and subjecting them to the charge of inconsistency, it is perhaps advantageous for the country and for the general character of public men that the proposal of measures of that kind, under such circumstances, should entail that which is supposed to be the fitting punishment, namely, expulsion from office. I therefore do not complain of that expulsion. I am sure it is far preferable to the continuance in office without a full assurance of the confidence of this House.

“I said before, and I say truly, that in proposing our measures of commercial policy, I had no wish to rob others of the credit justly due to them. I must say, with reference to honorable gentlemen opposite, as I say with reference to ourselves, that neither of us is the party which is justly entitled to the credit of them. There has been a combination of parties generally opposed to each other, and that combination, and the influence of government, have led to their ultimate success. But the name which ought to be associated with the success of those measures, is not the name of the noble lord, the organ of the party of which he is leader. Nor is it mine. The name which ought to be and will be associated with the success of those measures, is the name of one who, acting, as I believe, from pure and disinterested motives, has, with untiring energy, made appeals to our reason, and has enforced those appeals with an eloquence the more to be admired, because it was unaffected and unadorned: it is the name of Richard Cobden.

“I now close the observations which it has been my duty to address to the House, thanking them sincerely for the favor with which they have listened to me in performing this last act of my official career. Within a few hours probably, that power which I have held for the period of five years will be surrendered into the hands of another, — without repining, without complaint on my part, — with a more lively recollection of the support and confidence I have received during several years, than of the opposition which, during a recent period, I have encountered.

“In relinquishing power I shall leave a name, severely censured, I fear, by many who, on public grounds, deeply regret the severance of party ties, — deeply regret that severance, not from interested or personal motives, but from the firm conviction that fidelity to party engagements, the existence and maintenance of a great party, constitutes a powerful instrument of government. I shall surrender power, severely censured also by others who, from no interested motive, adhere to the principle of protection, considering the maintenance of it to be essential to the welfare and interests of the country. I shall leave a name execrated by every monopolist who, from less honorable motives, clamors for protection because it conduces to his own individual benefit; but it may be that I shall leave a name sometimes remembered with expressions of good-will in the abodes of those whose lot it is to labor and to earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow, when they shall recruit their exhausted strength with abundant and untaxed food, the sweeter because it is no longer leavened with a sense of injustice.”

When, four years later, all England wept the death of Sir Robert Peel, a committee was formed to open among the working-classes a penny subscription for the purpose of erecting to him a "Poor Man's National Monument," and Mr. Cobden proposed that in its inscription should be inserted this last sentence of the speech with which the great minister closed his official career.

CHAPTER IV.

IRELAND.

AT the moment when the ministry of Sir Robert Peel went out of office, famine was decimating the population of Ireland, and the Irish question agitated and distressed the sister kingdom. It was the culminating period of a long-continued anxiety and a constant solicitude. The Catholic emancipation had been lately accomplished, as was afterwards to be the trade reform, by the Tory leaders, Sir Robert Peel and the Duke of Wellington, marching at the head of the Whigs; and with this triumph of liberty and justice, it had been hoped that the violent passions which distracted Ireland would be appeased. Sir Robert Peel had never lost sight of the plan conceived by Mr. Pitt, when, in 1800, he had accomplished the union of the two countries. The emancipation of the Roman Catholics, a fixed endowment assured by the State to the clergy of that faith, and the establishment of public institutions in which they might receive the education which either they now lacked or were forced to seek upon the Continent, were the three measures by means of which it was believed that the union of England and Ireland would be made genuine and effectual. Under the lead of Mr. O'Connell and his agitators, Ireland now demanded something very different: she claimed the repeal of the union itself, and, for the future, her own Parliament once more, and an independent national existence.

The task before the sincere friends of Ireland was most severe. They had to reconstitute the whole system of society, and at the same time undo the results of all her history. Out of a mass of victors and vanquished, differing in race, religion, and speech, and after centuries of war or oppression, there must be made a nation of citizens, free and equal, and submissive to government like their neighbors of England and Scotland. All the successive Cabinets which had attempted this task, since the time of Mr. Pitt, had, like him, been deceived in respect to the difficulties of the work; they had sowed broadcast hopes and promises. The Irish troubles had become for England a grave danger; her miseries oppressed the English with a weight of remorse. Animated with an ardent desire to bring to an end this unhappy condition of affairs, they deceived themselves as they did the people of Ireland in respect to the value of their measures, and the efficacy of their promises. The effect of centuries of tyranny cannot be abolished in a day; a people cannot be regenerated by a few laws. The more hopes were held out to Ireland, the more that unhappy country became exasperated at her repeated disappointments. "The union," said Mr. O'Connell, "ought to have been the amalgamation of the two countries, — the identification of the two islands. There should have been no rights or privileges for the one that should not have been communicated to the other. The franchise should have been the same, all corporate rights the same, every civic privilege identical. Cork should have no more difference from Kent than York from Lancashire. That ought to have been the union. That was Mr. Pitt's object." The union had not as yet borne these fruits; the condition of Ireland had never rendered them possible. O'Connell urged the repeal of the union. "The year 1843 shall be the repeal year," he said.

DANIEL O'CONNELL.

For many years O'Connell governed Ireland, holding all hearts in his powerful hand, swayed by his eloquence and his ardent patriotism. He had sustained the Whig ministry, while often reviling its chiefs, and the agitation that he had fomented in Ireland, with the number of votes that he commanded in Parliament, assured him a considerable influence in England also. This "uncrowned king," as his fellow-citizens proudly called him, made incessant appeal to the passions of his people, but he preserved a respect for the law that his partisans often ignored. "The man who commits a crime gives strength to the enemy," he was accustomed to say, and all the strength of his mighty nature was exerted to maintain in material order a nation which, at the same time, he goaded to the utmost limits of moral tumult. The task was beyond his ability. Meetings called together to urge the repeal prepared not merely sedition, but the most shocking outbreaks. At a meeting held at Tara, August 15, 1843, five hundred thousand persons, it was said, were assembled to listen to their great orator. O'Connell was more bold and confident than ever before. "The overwhelming majesty of your multitude will be taken to England," he said, "and will have its effect there. . . . The Duke of Wellington talks of attacking us, and I am glad of it. I mean no disrespect to the brave, the gallant, the well-conducted soldiers that compose the queen's army; there is not one of you that has a single complaint to make against any of them. They are the bravest army in the world, and therefore I do not mean to disparage them at all; but I feel it to be a fact that Ireland, roused as she is at the present moment, would, if they made war upon us, furnish women enough to beat the entire of the queen's forces. . . . See how we have accumulated the people of Ireland for this repeal year. When, on the 2d of January, I ventured to call it the repeal year, every person laughed at me. Are they laughing now? It is our turn to laugh at present. Before twelve months more, the Parliament will be in College Green. . . . The Irish Parliament will then assemble, and I defy all the generals, old and young, and all the old women in pantaloons — nay, I defy all the chivalry of the earth — to take away that Parliament from us again."

This was too much; sedition became imminent. O'Connell announced openly, that, legal means being exhausted, Ireland must now depend upon herself. A "monster meeting" was called to meet at Clontarf, near Dublin, on the 8th of October. The entire programme of the day, the march, the arrival, the position, the ordering of the crowds, were formally arranged in advance, with an air of military precision, as if it were, not a popular assembly to be harangued, but an army to be reviewed on the eve of a battle. It was judged both in Dublin and in London that the moment was come to put an end to a situation growing every day more dangerous. The meeting announced at Clontarf was forbidden, and a few days later, Mr. O'Connell, who had used all his power over the people to obtain their obedience to the royal decree, was arrested with his principal associates, their trial being appointed to take place in January, 1844.

The great agitator and his companions were condemned by a jury into which no Roman Catholic had been admitted. They appealed to the House of Lords; the judgment of the court was reversed, and they were set at liberty. But the power of O'Connell over the ardent and excitable people whom he had so long governed was shaken; he had given way before the summons of the English government. A party began to be formed, more blindly Irish than his had been. Henceforth "Young Ireland" had its chiefs and its organs who no longer applauded or obeyed their old leader.

On the 4th of September, O'Connell had been acquitted by the Lords. They had judged, with a magnanimous equity, that he, who had incessantly and violently attacked them, had not received from the tribunal where he had been condemned (February 2), the justice to which he had a right. Just at this time, Sir Robert Peel was presenting to the House the project of an extension of the college of Maynooth, devoted since 1795 to the education of the Roman Catholic priesthood. "I say, without the least hesitation," he argued, "that you must break up in some way or other that formidable confederacy which exists in Ireland against the British government and the British connection. I do not believe you can break it up by force. You can do much to break it up by acting in a spirit of kindness, forbearance, and generosity. . . . I do not guarantee the vote for Maynooth as a final and complete measure, . . . but I do think it will produce a kindly feeling in Ireland."

In spite of the violent and conscientious opposition of the ultra-Protestants, the bill passed both houses, but without producing on the moral condition of Ireland all those good effects which Sir Robert Peel had promised himself from it. The day was coming when all England was to be interested in behalf of a population so long oppressed, and grown so difficult to serve usefully and rationally. The potato crop had been poor for two years; in 1845, it failed completely. In 1846, famine assumed frightful proportions in Ireland. By formal proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant, fifty-eight districts were declared to be in a state of distress. The suffering was so extreme that it is hard to believe even the authentic testimony concerning it. Almost the whole population was occupied in agriculture, holding from the proprietors, mostly absentees, small farms scarcely sufficing to support a family. Nothing but the cheapest of food was within their reach; suddenly this failed, and in a single district, that of Skibbereen, out of a population of 62,000 inhabitants, 5,060 died in the space of three months. At Bantry, the officers whose duty it was to inquire into the causes of deaths, reported at one session forty verdicts: "died of hunger." "I have seen," said an English clergyman, Rev. Mr. Hazelwood, speaking before a meeting in Exeter Hall, "I have seen miserable creatures prick the cattle which they met on the road, and apply their lips to the wound, to appease their hunger by sucking the animal's blood." Disease was added to famine; a fever, occasioned by lack of food, decimated the population. Meantime, the efforts made in England to relieve the destitution of the Irish, had assumed great and generous proportions. O'Connell, almost dying, and so feeble that his voice could scarcely be heard in the House, though men held their breath to listen, drew a most pathetic picture of the sufferings of his countrymen. "I do not think," he said, "that honorable members are sufficiently impressed with the horrors of the situation of the people of Ireland. I do not think they understand the miseries — the accumulation of miseries — under which the people are at present laboring. Twenty-five per cent. of the whole population will perish, unless the House affords effective relief. They will perish of famine and disease, unless the House does something speedy and efficacious, not doled out in small sums, not in private and individual subscriptions, but by some great act of national generosity, calculated upon a broad and liberal scale. . . . It is asserted that the Irish landlords do not do their duty. Several of them have done their duty, others have not, . . . but recollect how encumbered is the property of Ireland. How many of her estates are in chancery? How many are in the hands of trustees? She is in your hands — in your power! If you do not save her, she cannot save herself. And I solemnly call upon you to recollect that I predict with the sincerest conviction that one-fourth of her population will perish, unless Parliament comes to their relief!"

These last public words of the Irish patriot were spoken on the 8th of February, 1847; he left the House and England, eager to reach Rome, that refuge of so many famous men weary of life, and of so many exiles from their native land. He had not, however, time to arrive there, and died at Genoa, the 15th of May. Like many others, he was a striking example of that sad and noble union of egotism and self-sacrifice, of sincerity and falsehood, of high-mindedness and vulgarity, of greatness and vanity, which can exist in the human heart!

In 1840, M. Guizot saw O'Connell in London. "I found him," he wrote, "exactly what I expected. I saw him perhaps with pre-conceived ideas, but it is always a good deal if a man answers one's expectations of him. Tall, stout, robust, animated; his head a little sunk between the shoulders; an air of strength and shrewdness; the strength everywhere, the shrewdness in the quick glance, a little stealthy, yet not false; no elegance, yet by no means vulgar; manners slightly embarrassed, yet decided; a certain arrogance even, although concealed. Toward the Englishmen of rank, who were there, he was a little humble and yet imperious; you felt that they had been his masters, and that he had won a power over them; he had undergone their domination and now he was receiving their cordial civilities. Upon being introduced, I said to him: 'You and I, sir, are great proofs of the progress of justice and good sense: you, a Catholic, are a member of the English House of Commons; I, a Protestant, am the French ambassador.' He talked much, relating the history of the temperance movement in Ireland under Father Mathew; drunkards decreasing by thousands, the desire for neat clothing and more civil and decent manners increasing as drunkenness diminished. No one opposed the new movement. I asked him whether this was a caprice of popular whim, or a durable reform. He replied with gravity: 'It will last; we are a persevering race, as they are who have suffered much!'"

The suffering of Ireland was at its climax when Mr. O'Connell died. If he had lived he would have seen all England, Parliament and people alike, moved toward Ireland with a compassion full of a secret remorse, and offering to her with lavish hands their wealth, their sympathy, and their intelligence. It is the honor of Christian civilization that it had made repentance penetrate even the soul of nations. England repented that she had oppressed Ireland; Europe repented of having practised slavery. Pagan antiquity never had these awakenings of the public conscience, these moral enlightenments suddenly changing the hearts of men, and shortly, the social condition. Tacitus could only deplore the loss of the early virtues of Rome, and Marcus Aurelius but shut himself up sadly in the stoical isolation of the sage; nothing indicates that these superior minds had even suspected the great crimes of their society in its best days, and aspired to reform it. The Christian world, from epoch to epoch, sees new truths and new virtues rise upon its horizon, revealing to it at once its grandeur and its faults, and, by purifying it, restoring its youth.

Even before O'Connell had begged for them, England felt herself obliged to those acts of munificence toward Ireland which could alone, if not repair, at least expiate, the wrongs of ages. Parliament was not yet in session, but already immense public works had been ordered and commenced in Ireland, works ill planned, and for the most part without aim or utility, real national charities under the name of employment, useful only for the moment to give bread to the starving and manifest a solicitude to relieve, on the part of those in authority. In the month of January, 1847, five hundred thousand workmen were thus employed in Ireland, each man earning, it was said, nearly sufficient to feed four persons, making in all two millions of individuals fed by government; and on the 25th, when Lord John Russell took up the subject in Parliament, the expense for the month amounted to 700,000 pounds sterling. Parliament endeavored to regulate a little better the object and supervision of these works, and decided that the expense of them should not be levied on Ireland alone, but that England should bear her part of the burden. Considerable sums were advanced to the Irish proprietors for the purchase of seed, for the drainage of their lands, and the reclamation of bogs. Private endeavors were united with the public effort; everywhere the charitable work of the public kitchens was carried on by English and Irish, women and men, working together for the relief of the starving. As a matter of fact, and for the time, all attempts were insufficient, and the succor brought to the general distress was really but insignificant; everything failed before an abyss of suffering slowly dug by national idleness and improvidence, as truly as by a long-continued foreign oppression. Finally, however, and as Ireland emerged from a terrible epoch, the nation as it was had vanished, with its hopeless poverty. The law in respect to embarrassed estates modified the situation of the Irish land-owners, while emigration opened to the Irish peasantry vast prospects and infinite resources. A new Ireland henceforth began to be founded beyond the seas.

CHAPTER V.

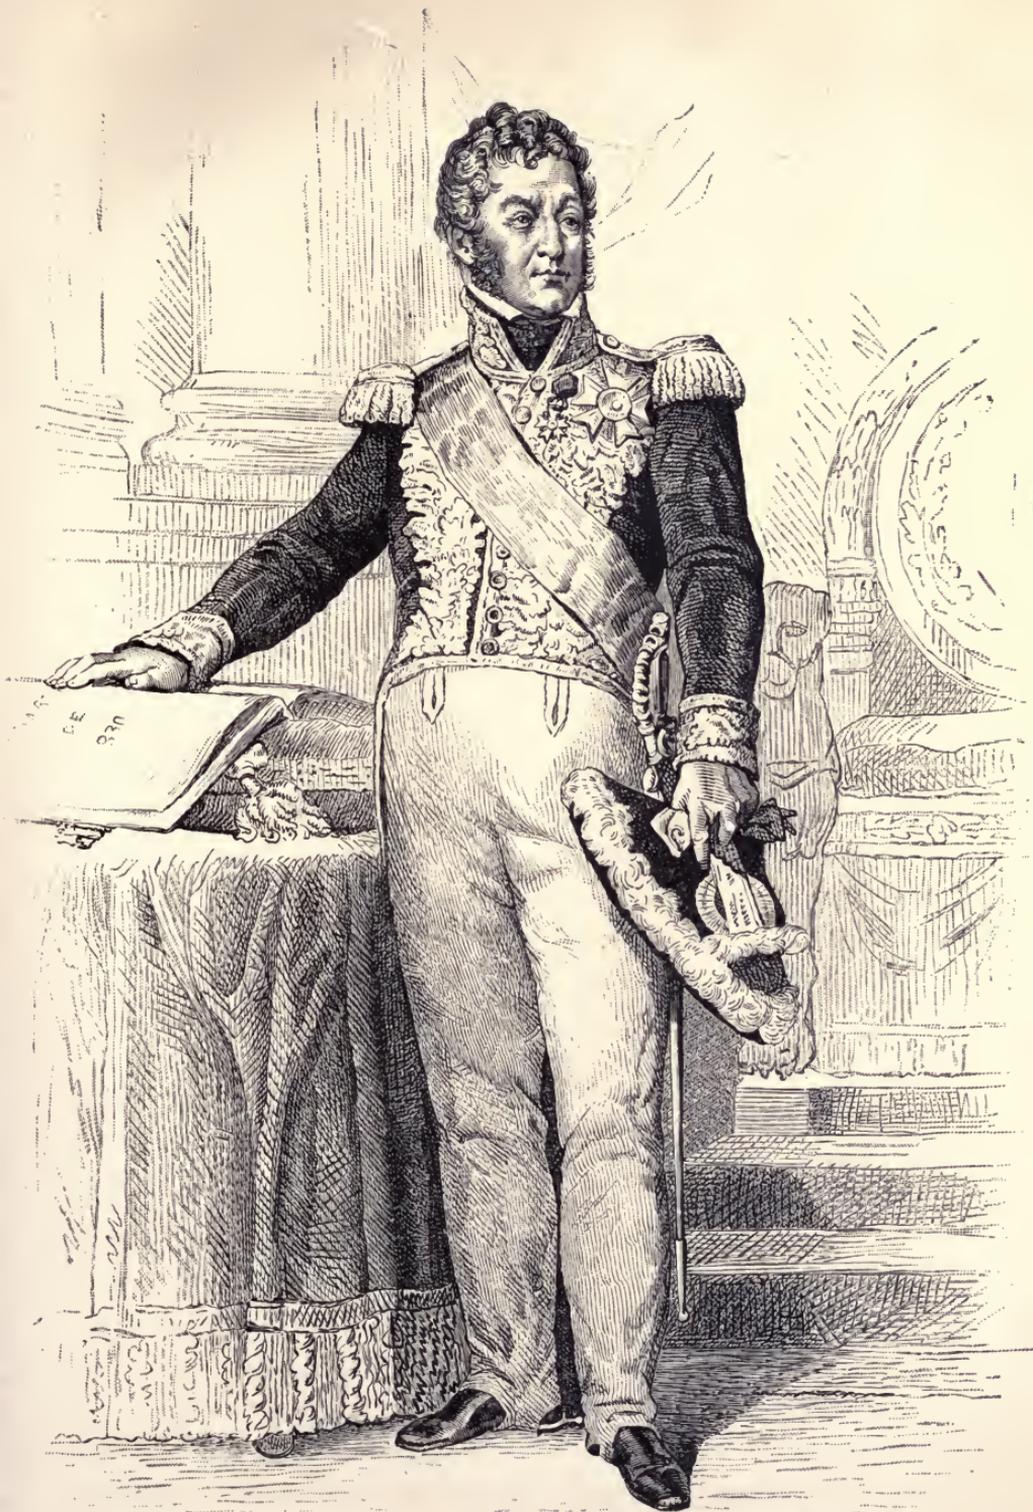

FOREIGN POLICY.

SIR ROBERT PEEL had resigned on the rejection of the Bill for the repression of outrages in Ireland, but he had secured in advance the sole efficacious remedies against the distresses which were soon to overwhelm that unhappy country. The principle of Free Trade grew and strengthened itself in the midst of the misfortunes with which those were smitten who had most violently combated it. Not merely were all taxes on the importation of grain suspended, but also the Navigation Laws which restrained the importation by enhancing the price of freight; the most decided partisans of the protective system voted themselves for these measures whose scope they did not, however, fail to perceive. "When the shipping-interest joined the Anti-Corn-Law League in forcing the repeal of the Corn-Laws," said Lord George Bentinck, "I always anticipated that it would find its own turn to come next, and would suffer the penalty of its rashness."

England had thus taken an important step, destined soon to become definitive, in that path of Free Trade which she has opened to all nations. She was the better able to do this, inasmuch as peace prevailed throughout Europe, and her Cabinet was on those intimate and confidential relations with France which simplified and facilitated the solution of all international questions. "I doubt," says M. Guizot, "whether any two governments have ever been more sympathetic than were at that time the Cabinets of France and England, both in their views of general policy and in their mutual dispositions, or ever had to experience more frequent and delicate trials." Like Sir Robert Peel and Lord Aberdeen, King Louis Philippe and his Cabinet seriously and sincerely desired peace and justice in the relations of the two kingdoms. During the ministry of Sir Robert Peel, three grave questions menaced the harmony between France and England, — the right of search for the suppression of the slave-trade; the occupation of Tahiti; and the French war in Morocco. The affair of the Spanish Marriage, at that time commencing, was soon to fall into other hands less friendly toward France and her government.

From the date when she had freely and generously abolished slavery throughout the whole extent of her territory, England had taken the lead in the Christian and philanthropic crusade against the slave-trade. The agreements concluded in 1831 and 1833 between France and England, authorized the mutual right of search of vessels suspected of being employed in this barbarous traffic; in 1841, France signed this treaty anew with slight modifications, and Austria, Prussia, and Russia now concurred in it. This was the occasion of violent debates in the French Chambers; the ministry was hotly attacked, and the echo of the strife resounded in England. The ratifications of this treaty had been held back. M. Guizot at first delayed them, and finally refused them absolutely. A new agreement was drawn up at London, between France and England, by the Duc de Broglie and Dr. Lushington. Both were old and well-known advocates of the abolition of the slave-trade; they were also imbued with a spirit of reciprocal kindness and conciliation. On the 29th of March, 1845, the new treaty was signed, and each of the two countries engaged to repress the slave-trade in its own vessels. The right of search was abolished, and the entente cordiale, for a moment threatened by ancient prejudices and new rancors, emerged stronger than before, from this severe trial of a political disagreement fanned by popular clamors, between two free countries.

E. RONJAT

Hiltibrand. sc.

LOUIS PHILIPPE.

While this question of the right of search was still pending, Queen Victoria gave to the king and people of France a proof of her royal sympathy. On Saturday, the 2d of September, 1843, accompanied by Lord Aberdeen, she paid a visit to King Louis Philippe at the Chateau d'Eu. In a letter written at the time, M. Guizot relates the arrival and landing of the queen:—
“At quarter past five, the queen was in sight; at quarter to six we embarked in the royal cutter, the king, the princes, Lord Cowley, Admiral Mackan, and myself, to go out to meet her. We went out a half mile. The most beautiful sky; the most beautiful sea; the land thronged with all the population of the neighborhood. Our six vessels, all dressed with flags, the French and the English, saluted noisily and gaily, but the guns hardly out-roared the sailors' shouts. We went on board the queen's yacht, the 'Victoria and Albert.' The king was much affected, the queen also; he kissed her. She said to me, 'I am delighted to see you again.' She came on board the cutter, accompanied by Prince Albert. As we landed, the salutes from the cannon and the shouts of the crews of our war-vessels redoubled. To this was joined the applause of the crowds on shore. Much shaking of hands in the royal tent. Then, carriages and the road. 'God save the Queen!' and 'Vive la Reine!' 'Vive la Reine d'Angleterre!' as often as 'Vive le Roi!' One must believe in the power of just and simple ideas. This region is not fond of the English, it is Norman and maritime. In our wars with England it has been two or three times burned, and pillaged I know not how often. Nothing would be easier than to excite here a popular feeling which might embarrass us much; but the people here have said to one another, and it has been repeated over and over again, 'The Queen of England is doing a polite act towards our king; we must be very polite to her.' This idea has taken possession of all minds, overcoming all memories, passions, temptations, parties. They cry and will continue to cry Vive la Reine! and they applaud the 'God save the Queen' with all their hearts. Only it would not be wise to require them to do this for too long a time. . . .

"I may add, however, that another simple and more lasting idea, that of peace and the advantage of being at peace, has become powerful and is daily increasing in force. It prevails among the middle classes and also among the reflective and well-disposed of those in the lower ranks. It is of much use to us at this time. It is often said: 'If you want to have peace, it will not do to make faces at each other and say hard words.' This was felt to-day by everybody on this shore of the channel."

Cordial feeling existed in reality as well as on the surface; the visit ended with all the personal satisfaction and the political effect desired and intended. When the king returned, in October, 1844, the visit Queen Victoria had paid to him at the Chateau d'Eu, the good feeling of the English equalled that of the French.

"On the 8th of October, at seven o'clock, we were in sight of Portsmouth," says M. Guizot, in his Mémoires. "No fog; the sky was pure, the sea calm, and the dawning day revealed to us the three cities which surround the harbor, Portsmouth, Portsea, and Gosport, which, from a distance, seemed to make but one. Eight small steam-vessels, sent out the evening before to meet us and take up a position along our route in order to salute us each in its turn on our approach, had now gathered behind us, and followed in our wake. Other vessels, which had been moored in the harbor, came out and joined these. As we advanced our escort increased, and soon the sea was covered with craft of every sort, sailing, steam, and row boats, great vessels, yachts, cutters, skiffs, so numerous and so eager that the 'Gomez' was forced to slacken speed and take much care to avoid collision with some of them. All these vessels were decorated with flags, French and English side by side,—the crews of them all clinging to the rigging or standing on the decks. All the population assembled along the shores mingled their hurrahs with the salutes from the harbor batteries, the forts, and ships of the line. There was an immense stir and noise in testimony of national and peaceful joy.

“Entering and dropping anchor within the harbor, we waited for the arrival at Gosport of the train by which Prince Albert was coming to meet the king. Meantime, our attention was not unoccupied. The mayor and corporation of Portsmouth, animated by the same sentiment which three weeks before had led the mayor of Liverpool to solicit a visit from the king, had asked and obtained permission to do honor to the arrival of the King of the French in England, by presenting to him an address. This they now did, coming on board the 'Gomez' for the purpose, and withdrew delighted with the reply they received from him, and gratified to have had their personal share in this meeting of two sovereigns and two peoples. This municipal expression of the general feeling occurred four times during the king's journey: at Portsmouth, upon his arrival; at Windsor, during his sojourn there; at Dover, when he left England; and, on the 12th of October, the corporation of the city of London, deeply regretting not having been able to entertain the king in London, sent to Windsor Castle their Lord Mayor, aldermen, sheriffs, and municipal officers and councillors, to present to him, in a formal address, their respectful congratulations and good wishes. It was a grand and touching ceremony. The same day I wrote to Paris: 'I have just been present at the presentation of the city's address. The king's reply was extremely well received.

I had written it in the morning and had it translated by M. de Jarnac. In the opinion of Sir Robert Peel and Lord Aberdeen, it was necessary that the speech should be written out, read, and handed immediately by the king to the Lord Mayor. The queen and Prince Albert spent half an hour in the cabinet of the king, reading and correcting the translation. It is like a family intimacy. In the opinion of every one here, the city's address voted unanimously in the Common Council is an unexampled event of great significance. Sir Robert Peel remarked that he was much struck by it.' "

This intimacy between the two royal families, which later was to offer to the French exiles a kind and consoling support, and the cordiality of the relations existing between the two nations, had lately, in the month of October, 1844, passed through two severe trials. England had been much disturbed by the hostile proceedings of France towards the Emperor of Morocco, in consequence of the latter's protection of Abd-el-Kader; and she had also been stirred with indignation on account of an insult offered at Tahiti to an agent of Great Britain, half missionary, half consul, Mr. Pritchard.

"There are two things in regard to which my country is intractable, and in regard to which I am not as free as I could wish," Lord Aberdeen had said to M. Guizot, during the queen's visit at the Chateau d'Eu, "the abolition of the slave-trade, and Protestant propagandism. As to other matters, we have no need for any anxiety except to do what is best, and I will undertake to have it approved. But on those two subjects there are impossibilities in England, and we shall have to be very careful in dealing with them." "I then asked him," says M. Guizot, "what was the strength in the House of Commons of the 'party of the saints'?" "They are all saints on that subject," he replied.

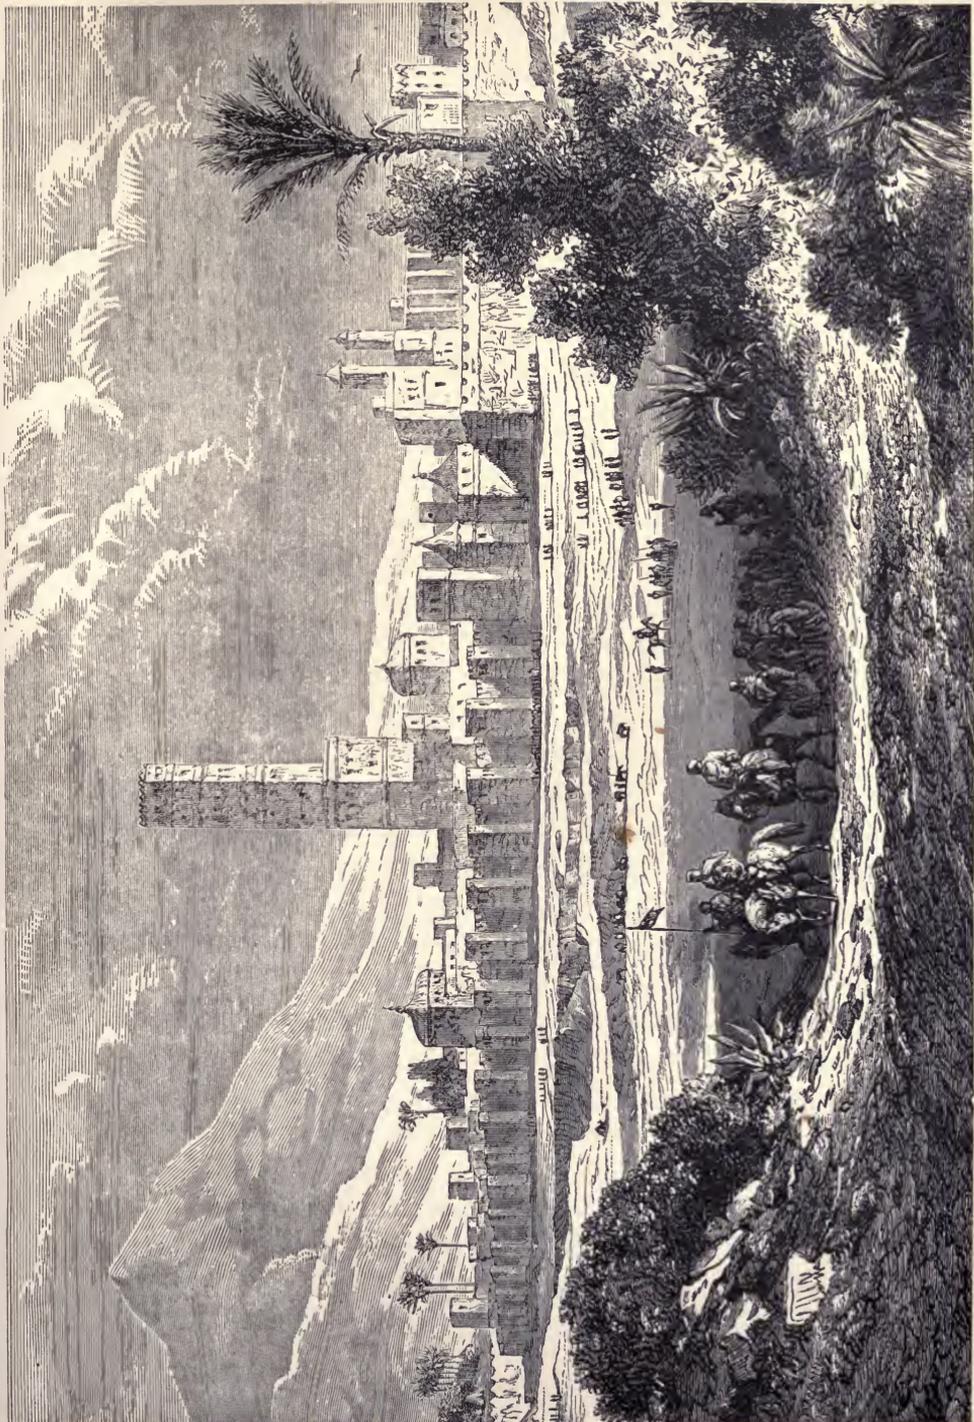

It was the general public sentiment of England that had been offended by the conduct of French sailors in Oceanica, and now threatened to force the hand of both Cabinets; not that the English government itself was, in the beginning of this affair, keenly interested in the question. In 1827, during the administration of Mr. Canning, England had in set terms refused to take possession of the island of Tahiti, which was offered to her by the native chiefs. She had, therefore, no rights to vindicate against the establishment of the French protectorate, instituted first in 1842, over the Marquesas islands, and later, at Tahiti. Regret and anxiety had, however, long existed on this subject among the Protestant missionaries devoted to the evangelization of these archipelagoes, and their solicitude had extended to their friends in England. For many years Tahiti had been the object of a constant struggle between the Protestant ministers and the Roman Catholic priests. The first upon the ground, the most numerous, and the most successful had been the missionaries of the great "London Society," and they strove hard to maintain their empire. The Admiral du Petit-Thouars interposed in behalf of the Jesuit priests; and shortly it was no longer a question of a French protectorate, for the admiral had taken possession of the sovereignty of the island. Questions asked in the House of Commons irritated and disturbed Sir Robert Peel, himself displeased and anxious at the turn affairs had taken, but the moderation and prudence of the French government dispersed the first storms. The action of the admiral, in taking possession of Tahiti, had been performed without orders from home; it was disowned, and France claimed nothing more than the mere protectorate accepted eighteen months earlier by the native chiefs, and freedom of action and protection were promised to the Protestant missionaries to whom the island owed its regeneration. Sir Robert Peel hastened to acknowledge the friendly conduct of the French Cabinet; while at Tahiti the English missionaries themselves assured the admiral that, as ministers of the gospel of peace, they regarded it as their imperative duty to exhort the people of these islands to a peaceable and uniform obedience to established authority, considering that by such means their own interests would be best promoted, but more especially, as such obedience is required by the laws of God which the missionaries had hitherto made it their special business to inculcate.

But these pious and reasonable sentiments were unhappily not unanimous. Mr. Pritchard, agent of the mission, and at the same time British consul at Tahiti, had always been excessively hostile to any French and Roman Catholic influence in the island; he exerted all his influence to excite resistance and even sedition against the newly established authority of France. The position of affairs became such that Captain D'Aubigny, provisional commandant at Tahiti, felt it necessary in the temporary absence of Admiral Bruot, the governor, to arrest Mr. Pritchard and place him in solitary confinement in a blockhouse. Upon his return, M. Bruot transferred Mr. Pritchard to an English ship, with the request that he should be taken to England. Returning home, Mr. Pritchard himself carried the news of the treatment that he had received, and the outburst of anger in the Houses was so violent that it even affected Sir Robert Peel himself. His reply to the inquiry of Sir Charles Napier in the House of Commons was extremely severe towards the French government, — from whom he had as yet received no communication on the subject, — publicly announcing his intention to demand reparation for the insult offered to the English consul.

This language of Sir Robert Peel and the public indignation in England occasioned in the French Chambers a debate of great violence, which very nearly overthrew the ministry. When the facts were made plain, France maintained on the one side that she had a right to send away from any colonial establishment any foreign resident who disturbed the public peace; and on the other, her conviction that the French authorities at Tahiti had had good reason for sending Mr. Pritchard away from the island, he being, besides, no longer the English consul, as he had resigned four months before. The French government, however, acknowledged that the procedures in Mr. Pritchard's case had been unnecessary and objectionable, and offered, as compensation for the inconveniences these procedures had occasioned him, to pay an indemnity, the amount of which should be fixed by the two admirals, French and English, who were in command in the Southern seas.

VIEW OF THE CITY OF MOROCCO.

The English Cabinet, on their part, did not dispute the principle or the facts asserted by the French government, and gave up the idea of sending Mr. Pritchard back to Tahiti, and of demanding the recall of the officer who had banished him. M. Guizot was able to say with truth in the Chamber of Deputies: "Our relations with England are called an entente cordiale, a good understanding, friendship, alliance. There is something newer, more uncommon, grander than that, in them. There exist at this moment in France and England two Cabinets who believe that there is room in the world for the prosperity and for the material and moral activity of the two countries; two governments who feel that they are not obliged to regret, to deplore, to dread each other's progress,—that they can, in freely developing their strength of every kind, be mutually helpful instead of harmful, one to the other. And this, which they believe possible and a matter of duty, these two governments really do. They put these ideas in practice; they testify towards each other on every occasion a mutual respect for rights, a mutual regard for interests, a mutual confidence in the other's intentions and words. This is what they do, and this is why the most delicate and serious complications do not bring about a rupture, nor even a coolness in the relations between the two countries." On the 5th of September, in proroguing Parliament, Lord Lyndhurst, the chancellor, said in the queen's name: "Her Majesty has recently been engaged in discussions with the government of the King of the French on events calculated to interrupt the good understanding and friendly relations between her country and France. You will rejoice to learn that by the spirit of justice and moderation which has animated the two governments, this danger has been happily averted."

A wise policy, that of moderation and good sense, had to struggle in England against the uneasiness of a selfish patriotism, as well as against the susceptibilities of the Protestant propagandism; the successes of France in Africa were the object of popular jealousy and suspicion. The Emir Abd-el-Kader, the indomitable defender of Arab independence and the Mussulman faith in Algeria, had been defeated and driven back at every point, and had taken shelter behind the uncertain frontier of Morocco, whence he incessantly carried on or recommenced hostilities. At one time, with his vagrant bands, he made sudden incursions into the regency of Tunis; at another, he excited the native fanaticism of the people of Morocco, and persuaded them to unite with him against the French troops. He had, too, a great influence over the Emperor of Morocco, Abd-el-Rhman, himself, now leading him to share in his Mohammedan fanaticism, now filling him with alarm against the French and against his own subjects. In vain did the Governor-General of Algeria, Marshal Bugeaud, address his just remonstrances to the government of Morocco: the Emperor Abd-el-Rhman was powerless to make himself obeyed, and the audacity of the emir increased by impunity. A band of the emperor's soldiers attacked the camp of General Lamoricière; they were promptly repulsed, but the patience of Marshal Bugeaud was exhausted.

ERONJAT.

Hilsibrand. sc.

MARSHAL BUGEAUD.

He demanded from the Emperor of Morocco an exact drawing of boundaries between his state and Algeria, and insisted that Abd-el-Kader should hereafter be kept with his bands on the western side of Morocco. In exacting these conditions of peace, Marshal Bugeaud was at the head of a considerable force. A French squadron, commanded by the Prince de Joinville, was sent to cruise along the coast of Morocco, rather with the design of moral than of physical effect. "The instructions given to his Royal Highness are pacific in their character," wrote M. Guizot to the consul-general of France at Tangier, "and start from this point, that war has not been declared between France and Morocco."

At news of this, however, the excitement in England was great. England had important commercial relations with Morocco; from Tangier, Gibraltar drew most of its supplies, and the safety of the African port was considered important for the English post. For the moment it was believed in England that what had happened in Algeria was now to occur in Morocco, and that a war between France and the African state was but the first step towards conquest. Sir Robert Peel was personally anxious and disturbed, but good sense and justice in his mind, as in that of Lord Aberdeen, triumphed over the first outbreak of the popular excitement. Pressing instructions were sent out from England to the consul-general at Tangier, directing him to bring all the weight of England's influence to bear upon the mind of the emperor, to induce him to attend to the just demands of France, and arrest the course of the war. In case the emperor should not give satisfaction to France, it was to be made plain to him that he could count upon no support whatever from England.

The Emperor Abd-el-Rhman was in no condition to yield to the demands of France; he was carried away by his own feelings and by the popular fanaticism each day fanned to a higher flame by the Emir Abd-el-Kader. The frontier posts were reinforced, and the English consul could obtain no decided answer. War was inevitable by sea and land. On the 6th of August, 1844, the Prince de Joinville attacked Tangier, silencing the batteries of the town and destroying the fortifications. On the 15th, he bombarded the city of Mogador at the southern extremity of Morocco, and seizing on the little island at the entrance to the harbor, established a garrison there. The preceding day, at Isly, Marshal Bugeaud had defeated the emperor's army, and the victory being thus complete, the Prince de Joinville immediately opened negotiations. Lord Aberdeen devoted himself to the work of pacifying the ill-humor of Sir Robert Peel and the disquietude of the public mind. The war was ended, and the Morocco question settled, the good understanding between France and England having been in no degree impaired, under the eyes of the English sailors and amid the coming and going of the diplomatic agents of England who were deeply interested in the re-establishment of a peace which the wisdom of the French government, following her success in the campaign, easily secured. "The conduct of the English government in this affair has been most upright, wise, and sincere," said M. Guizot, in the Chamber of Deputies, "and I am glad to take this occasion to render it justice."

It was in the same sincere spirit of moderation and equity that negotiations were opened and for many years carried on between France and England in respect to the marriages of the Queen of Spain, Isabella II., and her sister, Doña Luisa Fernanda. "A glance at the map of Europe is enough to show," says M. Guizot in his Mémoires, "how useful to France is the natural alliance existing between her and Spain, and how essential it is to her that Spain should not be drawn into any European combinations hostile to French interests. For four centuries history has reiterated what geography says. The union of Spain with Germany and the Low Countries, under the sceptre or under the dominant influence of Charles V. and of Philip II., made in the sixteenth century the great peril of France. In the seventeenth century, it was the glory of French policy, personified in Richelieu, Mazarin, and Louis XIV., that it broke the hostile circle with which France had been surrounded, and removed Spain from the preponderating influence of Germany, by placing on her throne, in accordance with her own desire, a prince of the house of Bourbon. To this grand fact, France owed in the eighteenth century, in spite of some contrary incidents, either the peace of Europe, or else the active assistance of Spain in the struggles in which she was engaged. And in the first years of the nineteenth century, it was by reason of having alienated Spain from France through the excesses and perfidies of his ambition, that the Emperor Napoleon found beyond the Pyrenees a permanent danger, and one of the principal causes of his ruin. Evidently and exactly because of the chances to the contrary arising from the establishment in Spain of the female succession, it became to France a point of the first importance to maintain at Madrid the work done by Louis XIV., and once more to secure the Spanish throne for the house of Bourbon."

BATTLE OF ISLAY.

It was the ardent wish of Spain, or at least of the moderate party, — that party which had maintained the crown on the head of Queen Isabella, — to draw more closely than ever the bonds uniting the two countries by marrying the young queen to one of the sons of King Louis Philippe. From the first, the king had repulsed this idea, as in 1831 he had refused the throne of Belgium for the Duc de Nemours. He sacrificed without hesitation to the general interest of a true and solid European peace all interests of personal and family aggrandizement, but he was at the same time firmly decided not to sacrifice the special interest that France had in remaining closely connected with Spain ; and the maintenance of the house of Bourbon upon the Spanish throne was evidently the approved and natural method of arriving at this result. Public instinct was no more deceived on this subject in England than in France. The old jealousies against French influence in Spain awakened in all their strength; but the relations of England with the radical party in Spain had been only of recent growth, and Lord Aberdeen at first inclined to absolute neutrality in the question of the marriage of Queen Isabella. "It is a purely domestic affair, with which we have no concern," he said, at first. "Then," said M. Pageat, whose duty it was at that moment to carry the words of the French government from Paris to London, "I can say to the king's government that if Queen Isabella desires to marry her cousin, the Duc d'Aumale, you will not oppose it." "Ah! I did not say that," rejoined Lord Aberdeen quickly; "then it would be a question of the European equilibrium; that would be different."

"I do not know what will happen in Spain," wrote M. Guizot to the French minister at London (March 2, 1842), "but something will happen, and anything may happen. All is disturbed, disorganized, seething. The Carlists, the Christinos, the Esparteristes, the republicans, all are in commotion, and are conspiring together or separately, as heretofore or seeking out new paths. Usurpation, compromises, an exclusive or a divided victory, marriages and protections of every kind, — everything is thought of, hoped for, prepared for. It is a chaos, whence will emerge nothing good in all probability, but which ferments none the less for that, and will give us a great deal of trouble. One of these difficulties, the chief perhaps, is and always will be English jealousies and suspicions. If the two nations could really understand one another, and act in concert, were it but for a time, and with the certainty of afterwards resuming our traditions of rivalry — which are rather puerile at the present day — the affairs of Spain would soon be arranged. . . . It is the path in which we must always walk, for it is the only one that can bring us to our desired end; if we do not actually reach it, at least we are in the right road, and our own position has always the chance of gaining rather than losing by it."

"Our policy is simple," wrote M. Guizot to the Count de Flahaut, French ambassador at Vienna. "At London, and probably also elsewhere, there is an unwillingness to see one of our princes on the throne at Madrid. We understand this, and we accept it in the interests of the general peace and balance of power of Europe. But, in the same interest, we make our exclusion in turn: we will not see upon the Spanish throne any other than a prince of the House of Bourbon. That House has husbands enough to offer — the princes of Naples, of Lucca, the sons of Don Carlos, the sons of the Infante Don Francisco. We propose none of them, we prohibit none. The one who is agreeable to Spain will please us; but in the circle of the House of Bourbon, that is a French interest of the highest order, and I consider it manifestly also a European interest."

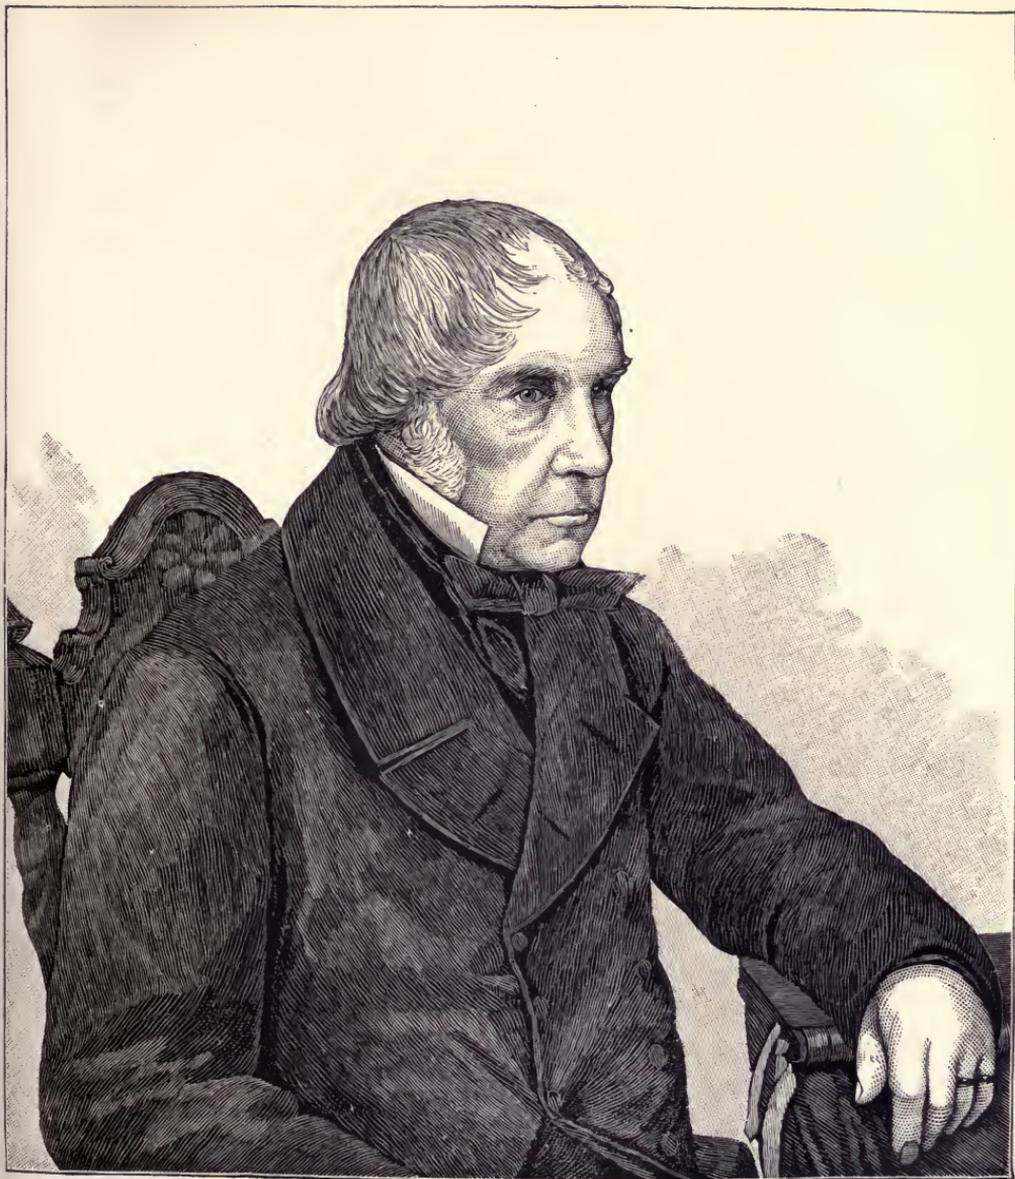

To some language addressed to London, Sir Robert Peel had replied: "I ought to tell you plainly that we have entered into no engagement with the present government of Spain having as its object the exclusion of the House of Bourbon from the Spanish throne. I will add that we have no intention of making any such engagement, and I am free to say that I should regard it as very simple to have it understood at Madrid that, while we have no right to interfere in a question which Spain must finally settle for herself, we advocate a conciliatory policy by which all interests concerned may be satisfied." "They have destroyed all the old methods of government in Spain, and have replaced them by no other," said the Duke of Wellington, with his abrupt good sense; "the two great Powers, England and France, must act in concert for the pacification of Spain."

In the midst of the innumerable difficulties caused every moment by the violent changes of public opinion and the internal agitations of the Spanish government, the determination of Sir Robert Peel and Lord Aberdeen had remained the same; the increasing intimacy between France and England confirmed them in their friendly intentions, but their action at Madrid remained feeble and embarrassed, the English agents in Spain being at heart opposed to a combination which they believed of a nature to increase the influence of France.

The embarrassment of the English Cabinet did not, however, arise exclusively from their hereditary traditions of distrust and opposition towards the ascendancy of France in Spain; they encountered in England itself, very near the throne, a desire which complicated extremely for them the question of Queen Isabella's marriage, and the negotiations of which it was the object. A cousin of Prince Albert, Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, brother to Prince Ferdinand, the husband of the Queen of Portugal, would be, it was believed, a suitable husband for the young Queen of Spain; and this union would assure a good understanding between the courts of Spain and Portugal, and also the preponderance of England in the peninsula.

All, therefore, that the fidelity and loyal persistency of Lord Aberdeen and Sir Robert Peel could do was to maintain towards the Spanish court, and in the endless negotiating to which the queen's marriage gave rise, an attitude of friendly neutrality. The secret manœuvres of Sir Henry Bulwer, at that time English ambassador at Madrid, often exceeded these limits, and Lord Aberdeen was careful to inform M. Guizot of them, — a rare testimony to a rare friendship between two statesmen directing the affairs of their respective countries, and commemorated by M. Guizot in the portrait of Lord Aberdeen given in his Mémoires.

The policy of England in respect to Spanish affairs was destioned to change its character. "On the 29th of June, after having completed the economic reform," says M. Guizot in his Mémoires, "the Cabinet of Sir Robert Peel resigned office; the Whigs under the leadership of Lord John Russell succeeded to the Tories, and Lord Palmerston took the place of Lord Aberdeen in the foreign office. On the 6th of July, I wrote to Lord Aberdeen: 'I must write you then to say adieu. I did not hope and yet I did expect. It is so deep a grief to me, so keen a regret; one resigns one's self to these things only at the last extremity. You go out gloriously. I heard of your success in the Oregon affair * with the same joy as if it had concerned myself personally. Your successes were mine. You will probably go to Haddo, and I, in a few days, shall leave for Val Richer. Why can we not share our repose as we have shared our labor? I am sure that, at leisure and at liberty, walking together and talking, with no other end in view than our own pleasure, we should suit each other as well as hitherto we have understood and supported each other in public affairs. But it is so rarely that we can arrange our lives as we desire! We enjoy our friends so little! We meet, we see each other for a moment; then we separate, and each goes his way, bearing affectionate recollections, which soon change into sad regrets. I am, however, firmly resolved that this shall not be a separation between us. I shall write, and you will write me also, will you not? You will be in France again. I shall revisit England. And then, who knows? I trust that often again, no matter in what situation, we shall serve together that rare and good policy which we have made triumph for five years.' However it may come about, my dear Lord Aberdeen, it must be that we shall meet each other again somewhere, and shall understand each other even more freely and intimately than ever before. Meanwhile, preserve all your old friendship for me; let me at least lose nothing in my private capacity. For my part, I love you, and shall love you always with all my heart.'

LORD ABERDEEN.

* In the last days of his ministry Lord Aberdeen had brought to an equitable adjustment a question in respect to the limits of Oregon territory, which had disturbed the relations of England and the United States, and threatened even to compromise the peace between the two countries.

"My expectations were not deceived; after his retirement from public life and after my own, I lived with Lord Aberdeen in the same intimacy as in the times when we acted in behalf of our two countries in the relations of European politics. We met several times after this in France and in England. I spent a fortnight with him in Scotland at Haddo House, in the long and free conversations of country and home life. He died six years ago, and since his death I have thought of him often. The better I knew him, and the more I proved him, the more he satisfied and attached me. His nature was noble and modest, independent and gentle, deep and subtle, original without affectation, without exaggeration, without pretension. Entering political life while yet young, and in the midst of the great crisis of 1814, he was early a spectator of the grandest scenes of ambition, power, and human destiny, he retained from it all the highest lessons, the spirit of moderation and equity, a respect for the right, a regard for order, the love of peace. This experience of his youth was perfectly in harmony with the bent of his mind and character; conservative by position and by instinct, liberal through justice and kindness of nature, a true and proud Englishman, but neither prejudiced nor jealous, faithful to the traditions of his country, but a stranger to the routine of parties or the public, he was ready to comprehend the situations, the interests, the sentiments of other nations or individuals, and to give them their just due. It was a policy singularly new and bold, but Lord Aberdeen avoided with care the outward show of innovation or boldness; he was averse to noise, he did not seek for display, and aspired to make the right succeed, with but little care for his own success. He was neither disposed to violent parliamentary strifes, nor was he fitted for them; he had too much scrupulousness in his thought and too little facile power in his words; he did not set questions at rest by prompt solutions and the empire of eloquence; he excelled in unravelling them, calling time, good judgment, and the moral sense to the support of the truth. He loved public life and affairs of importance, but as a man may who keeps all things in their true place and at their just value, and knows how to occupy himself and to take pleasure in the simplest as well as the most brilliant. He had known all the charm and also all the griefs of domestic life, and although surrounded by a numerous family who loved and honored him, and seconded on every occasion by his youngest son, Arthur Gordon, who had become his secretary and confidential assistant, an expression of lasting sadness was stamped upon his grave and gentle face. In first interviews, outside of the family circle, his manner appeared cold and almost severe; but as he permitted you to look a little way into his soul, you became aware of treasures of delicate sympathy and tender emotion, not interfering, however, with the free judgment of one who observed critically and even a little sarcastically, not only in indifferent relations, but even in those which were of the most affectionate nature.

“He loved his fellow-men with a profound sense of their vices and weaknesses as well as of their miseries, and respected free thought as he did human liberty. . . . The great social problem, brought forward more clearly in our time than ever before, is to bring the principles of morality and of science into politics, and to unite, in the government of nations, the respect for divine laws with the progress of human information. Lord Aberdeen is, in our time, one of the men who have most frankly accepted this difficult problem, and who, for their part and in their sphere of action, have most scrupulously sought to resolve it, — an effort worthy of himself, and one which will be to the honor of his memory as it has been the labor of his life.”

Lord Aberdeen's last care in quitting the ministry of foreign affairs had been to instruct his successor as to the position of the negotiations in Spain, and recommend to him that cordial understanding with France that he had so wisely maintained and so faithfully observed. Lord Palmerston asserted his desire to go on in the same path, but already the spirit that had always directed his policy, and which had always led him to serve the interest exclusively English, betrayed itself in instructions sent to Madrid. Queen Christina and the Spanish government had renounced the idea of an alliance with one of the Neapolitan Bourbons, who had been the favorite candidates of France; also Spain had rejected the scheme favored by Prince Metternich, which consisted in uniting the young Queen Isabella to the son of Don Carlos, the Count de Montemolin, thus uniting the claims of the two branches of the royal house of Spain. Thus, in England, Henry VII. had extinguished the last embers of the War of the Roses by marrying the Princess Elizabeth of York. But the party who had maintained the validity of the will of Ferdinand VII., and placed his daughter upon the throne, would never have admitted this expedient except on condition that the Count de Montemolin should relinquish his royal claims and ask the hand of his cousin merely as an Infante of Spain. Nothing of this kind was done. Queen Christina and her counsellors, therefore, fell back upon a scheme which had some time before been abandoned. They proposed that Queen Isabella should choose one or other of the two sons of the Infante, Don Francisco de Paula; but at the same time, and in order to have a firmer support for their policy than the fickle favor of the Spanish public, they asked of King Louis Philippe, in behalf of the younger Princess of Spain, that which he had already refused to the queen, the hand, namely, of one of his sons.

“The Duke of Cadiz for the queen, and the Duc de Montpensier for the infanta,” wrote M. Guizot to Count Bresson, at that time French ambassador at Madrid. “Follow without hesitation this path which the Duke de Rianzares opened before us, on the 28th of last June. In itself this solution is perfectly satisfactory; in the present condition of affairs it is the easiest, the readiest and surest.”

“There is,” says M. Guizot, “in affairs of importance, an ignoble art, — though one often practised by men of intelligence, — which consists in saying and not saying, in giving instruction wrapped up in words which seem to disavow it, and in employing false shadows to veil from the common eye the effect sought to be produced, and the design that is pursued. Such was the policy and such the instructions of Lord Palmerston in the Spanish affair at the beginning of his administration. He admitted the candidature of the sons of the Infante Don Francisco de Paula, which France also accepted; but at the same time, and in the foremost rank of aspirants, he supported Prince Leopold of Coburg, who was absolutely and from the beginning of the negotiations put out of the question by the principle which the French government had laid down: ‘No matter which of the descendants of Philip V., but a descendant of Philip V.’”

In writing to M. de Jarnac, French chargé d'affaires at London, M. Guizot expressed himself thus: “When the king declared that he would not seek, nay more, that he should refuse positively to place one of his sons on the Spanish throne, but that, as compensation, he should insist that the throne of Spain should not go out of the House of Bourbon, and that some one of the descendants of Philip V. should be placed upon it, Lord Aberdeen, without adopting in principle all our ideas upon this subject, accepted in fact our plan of conduct. It was said and understood that the two governments would see to it that the queen’s choice should fall upon one of the descendants of Philip V. When any other candidate — when, in particular, Prince Leopold of Coburg — was brought forward, Lord Aberdeen faithfully exerted himself in opposition to the idea. And when very lately Bulwer at Madrid gave, if not his support, at least his recognition to some advances on the part of Queen Christina towards the Duke of Coburg, Lord Aberdeen so severely blamed him for this, that Bulwer offered his resignation.

“Certainly, my dear Jarnac, after such procedures and such language, I have a right to say that the equal approbation given by Lord Palmerston to three candidates, among whom the Prince of Coburg is placed first, is a great change, is a complete abandonment of the language and attitude of his predecessor.

“Although the position of the king’s sons and of the Prince of Coburg are not absolutely identical, when the king has himself banished his sons from all pretensions to the hand of the Queen of Spain, he must have expected, he did in fact expect, and he had the right to expect, a certain measure of reciprocity; if it be not so, I do not say that the king will change his policy, but it is certain that he will recover his liberty in the affair completely. He would no longer be concerned for anything except the interests of France and the honor of his crown. . . . I am deeply convinced that cordial understanding, the common action of our two governments, is more useful and desirable in Spain than anywhere else, for it is a larger field and one where the questions involved are more serious. I have not limited myself to a verbal expression of this conviction. I have proved it and acted upon it by proposing to Lord Palmerston — as I did ten days ago, before I had any knowledge of his despatch of the 19th of this month, — that we should unite in a concerted action in favor of the sons of the Infante Don Francisco de Paula. I attach the utmost importance to this agreement, this concerted action; I will do much to support it. But, in conclusion, there may be for France also an isolated policy in Spain, and if the initiative of an isolated policy be taken at London, it will become necessary that I should follow it at Paris."

It was in fact an isolated policy that was henceforth to prevail in the great responsibility of the Spanish question. Soon isolation became antagonism. Lord Palmerston supported the Prince of Coburg; France remained faithful to the principle she had laid down in the beginning in favor of a descendant of Philip V., but from this time her choice was made: in accordance with the overtures of the queen-mother, she now supported the candidature of the Duke of Cadiz, eldest son of the Infante Don Francisco de Paula.

Queen Christina and her partisans still hesitated. "I shall always believe," says M. Guizot in his Mémoires, "that, amid all the uncertainties and vicissitudes of her political situation and her own disposition of mind, the serious intention of Queen Christina always had been to have one of her daughters, either the queen or the infanta, make one of the two great marriages which were offered to them, and thus to secure for Spain and for herself the support of France or of England. In her own mind, and for herself, she infinitely preferred the French alliance; perhaps even, in making overtures towards the Coburg marriage, she hoped sufficiently to alarm King Louis Philippe to obtain from him the solution she desired. 'It will be all my uncle's fault,' she often said; 'why has he not given Montpensier for the queen?' At all events, it was the attitude and the despatch of Lord Palmerston which overcame the distaste of Queen Christina for the sons of her sister Doña Carlotta, and determined her sudden and open resolution in favor of the two Bourbon marriages. Either through carelessness or through his habits of routine in the old-fashioned English policy, Lord Palmerston had judged wrongly of the state of parties in Spain. The moderate party was in possession of the government, but it was to their enemies that he held out the hand. Queen Christina, the Cabinet, and all the moderate party saw themselves in danger of being delivered over to their inveterate and bitter foes, the revolutionary 'party of progress.' They would not support this idea, and at last declared plainly for the French alliance." The Cortes were convoked for the 4th of September; the two marriages, that of the queen and the Duke of Cadiz, and of the infanta and the Duc de Montpensier, were simultaneously announced.

Recapitulating the diverse phases of the negotiation, of the original harmony and the subsequent disagreement between France and England on the subject of Queen Isabella's marriage, M. Guizot wrote (September 10) to M. de Jarnac: "I have done what I announced to you on the 27th of February last. In presence of the candidature, sought at Madrid and accepted at London, of Prince Leopold of Coburg, for the hand of Queen Isabella, I gave orders to M. Bresson to use all his efforts to decide the queen's marriage with one of the sons of Don Francisco de Paula, preferably with the Duke of Cadiz now in Spain, and the marriage of the infanta with the Duc de Montpensier. The queen, her mother, and the Cabinet have just accepted this double union.

"These are the facts, my dear Jarnac; recall them to Lord Palmerston's mind, when you inform him of the decision which has just been made at Madrid, and of which he is perhaps already informed. As to the grounds of this decision, I have nothing to say. Of the two marriages to which it refers, one is a political question which the Queen of Spain and her government have a right to settle according to the constitution of the country; the other is a family affair which concerns only the queen-mother, her two daughters, and ourselves."

In presence of the intention thus openly proclaimed by Spain, Lord Palmerston made no further effort to prevent or even to delay the marriage of the infanta with the Duc de Montpensier. The Spanish government gave way to no weakness in this regard. Like France, it had resumed all its liberty of action since England had refused to share in a concerted action. The mischievous agitations of the revolutionary press secretly fomented at Madrid by Sir Henry Bulwer, remained ineffectual; on the 11th of October, 1847, the two princely marriages were celebrated one after the other in the church of Our Lady of Atocha at Madrid, in presence of a curious crowd who had gathered to salute the queen as she passed. The violence of the debates in Parliament and in the French Chambers was all that testified to the discontent caused, especially in England, by the result of a negotiation long pursued harmoniously with France, but ending finally in a check for the policy of England, in consequence of Lord Palmerston's determination to abandon upon this point the cordial agreement which had existed between the two countries. Diplomatic relations were, however, not interrupted. Ill-feeling remained strong in England; it lingered in the form of a vague and general impression, contributing in the ignorance of facts to diminish the popularity of King Louis Philippe and to pervert the judgment of the English public in respect to him. It did not bring about any of those fatal consequences that a dissension less serious and less a matter of public feeling was to occasion in 1870, when two great governments and two great countries rushed into war in the name of the claims to the Spanish throne of the Prince of Hohenzollern.

"I am sad and shocked," wrote M. Guizot, July 17, 1870, "shocked at the two governments and the two nations. In 1846, England attempted in the Spanish marriage to inflict a very different check upon us from that which the candidature of the Prince of Hohenzollern could now be. Lord Palmerston had officially placed the Prince of Coburg at the head of the list of candidates agreeable to England. He was defeated; the marriage, contrary to his declared wish, took place. But to make war upon us for that never occurred to England, not even to Lord Palmerston himself. They were, however, much displeased, both people, queen, and ministers, but all was limited to a long and animated discussion of the two negotiations. To-day a candidature formally made by Spain offends us; we say so to Prussia, patron of the candidate; the candidate withdraws, with his patron's permission; Spain accepts his withdrawal. We do not stop at this, but require of the patron to forbid for the future, in any case, absolutely, the withdrawn candidate from being again proposed. Upon this astonishing demand, the patron suddenly, without hearing a word, breaks off diplomatic relations and enters upon war. And in both countries, multitudes applaud. Which of the two nations is most destitute of good judgment and of moral sense? Verily I am at a loss to say. It is a case when one agrees with Chancellor Oxenstiern.*

* "Go, my son," said the great minister of Gustavus Adolphus, sending his son to travel in foreign countries, "go and see with what small wisdom the world is governed."

CHAPTER VI.

EUROPEAN DISTURBANCES. — DOMESTIC PEACE.

IT has been my wish to relate with considerable detail negotiations which at the time occupied the attention of all Europe, and very specially affected the relations of England with France and Spain. I now return to the important affairs at home which soon absorbed all thoughts and occupied all hearts. Hardly had the ministry of Sir Robert Peel fallen when famine broke out anew in Ireland with an unheard-of violence, demanding unheard-of efforts, to which England devoted herself courageously and generously. Once more the interior condition of Ireland necessitated the presentation of a law repressive of the multiplied disorders and criminal attempts which desolated the country. Upon a proposition of this nature had ensued the debate which was followed by the overthrow of the Tory ministry. Sir Robert Peel permitted himself the satisfaction of referring to this. "I should be unwilling," he said, "to let the first night of the debate on the proposal of her Majesty's government pass, without publicly declaring that it is my intention to give to that proposal a cordial support. I will quarrel with none of the details of the measure. . . . I cannot resist the force of the appeal which the right honorable gentleman has made to the House, because it is precisely the same appeal which some two years since I myself made, and made in vain." Sir Robert Peel, in fact, supported the Whig ministry against his own former friends, now eager in the attack upon the government. All the great questions with which he had himself been obliged to deal—those that had been settled as well as those that had remained undecided — reappeared successively before the Houses: the income tax, the monetary system and the organization of the Bank of England, the state of the Colonies, the tax upon sugars, the distinction between sugars grown by free labor and those grown by slave labor, the number of hours' work in factories, etc. England was in one of those periods of transformation and of social crisis, when the old system, everywhere and necessarily antagonistic to the modern spirit, makes an obstinate, though almost hopeless defence, each day trying to ward off the morrow's peril or repair the disaster of yesterday, and keeping its intrepid but useless defenders forever in the various breaches which have been made.

The reputation and the talent of Lord George Bentinck and Mr. Disraeli increased daily in this incessant warfare, often violent and unjust, but never seriously endangering the existence of the ministry, much less the tranquillity of England, in the midst of the agitations of Europe. On the 24th of February, 1848, the monarchy of July had fallen before the impatient and inconsiderate attacks of an opposition which did not itself measure the abyss into which it was plunging the country. Following upon this fall, which was as surprising as a peal of thunder from a clear sky, all Europe saw her thrones shaken, and the revolutionary ferment reappear upon the surface of social organizations beneath which it had been secretly working. At many points, the disturbance was serious, and its effects durable. In England it was limited to a Chartist procession on Kennington Common and the presentation of a petition to the House of Commons. The parliamentary commission appointed to examine this petition discovered a multitude of false signatures, often repeated in the same handwritings, or reproduced as a foolish joke. The public mind, for the moment disquieted at the Chartist manifestation, soon turned it into ridicule, and Chartism expired in England at the moment when revolution was shaking anew the larger number of the thrones of Europe.

The agitation could not, however, fail to gain ground in Ireland. The death of O'Connell had left "Young Ireland" mistress of the position. Standing alone at the head of the popular fermentation, the party at once became divided; Smith O'Brien and Meagher found a rival in John Mitchel, more violent than they, and more deeply involved in rebellion. The new organ of the "Young Ireland" party, the "United Irishmen," stimulated revolutionary passions. The English government resolved to put an end to so many outrages. Mitchel was arrested, tried, and condemned to banishment. Smith O'Brien and Meagher made no effort to save him; the population of Dublin remained quiet, and Mitchel in a few hours was out of the country and on his way to Bermuda. Many years later he returned to Ireland, became a candidate for an Irish county and was elected to Parliament; the election being declared void, he was again elected, but died before he could take his seat.

The depths of the Irish nation had not been moved, and the revolutionary movement was not serious, when, after Mitchel's condemnation, Smith O'Brien and Meagher sought to revive it anew. Warrants for their arrest were issued by government, and a rebellion broke out in their defence. Some collisions occurred at different points between the partisans of "Young Ireland" and the police. Smith O'Brien and Meagher were shortly captured, both were condemned to death, but the sentence was at once commuted to transportation. Meagher escaped, in company with John Mitchel; but Smith O'Brien remained faithful to his parole, and his sentence being remitted in consideration of his fidelity, he quietly returned to England, and died in Wales in 1864. Meagher, who served in the American army during the war of secession, was drowned by falling from the deck of a steamer on the river Missouri. With the condemnation and dispersion of its principal leaders, the party of "Young Ireland" disappeared as Chartism had already done. Revolutionary attempts had failed before the peaceful strength of a free country, governed with order and liberality. The English nation was able to follow a path more and more liberal every year. It inclined constantly more and more towards democracy, but it desired to advance with even step, without undue haste or violence. With a compassion that was slightly contemptuous, England gazed upon the ruins that covered so many of the countries of Europe, forgetful sometimes of the fierce and prolonged struggles that had brought her to this height of well-ordered liberty, the supreme object to which the generous hopes of all nations aspire.

The English government had, however, the wisdom to understand that the condition of Ireland presented a constant menace to the tranquillity of England. It weighed like a nightmare upon all thoughtful minds, upon that of Sir Robert Peel in particular. Three years' continuance of the potato disease had produced a permanent famine; the Poor Law had been imposed on landed property, and landed property, crushed with debt, deprived of capital, blasted with sterility, was falling into a condition of impotence and ruin. What was to become of this people, growing daily more numerous and more wretched? What was to become of England, laden with this burden which was ever increasing and ever on the point of ending in a great danger?

"It is in vain for England," said Sir Robert Peel, on the 30th of March, 1849, "to hope that by indifference or neglect she can free herself from the burden—if there be no remedy for Irish distress and disorder—which will press upon her with intense force. At the moment at which I am speaking, you have a military force of not less than 47,000 men in Ireland; and the whole of the charge for that force is borne, not locally by Ireland, but by the Imperial Treasury. Now with that military force, and with coercive laws, what is the social condition of Ireland? I have here an account of the last assizes at Clonmel; for one division only of the county of Tipperary, and that the most quiet one, there are no less than two hundred and seventy-nine persons for trial, and of these eighteen are charged with arson, four with attacking a police barrack in arms, three with burglary, four with conspiracy to murder, forty-two with treasonable practices, fourteen with highway robbery, twenty-one with murder, and fourteen for shooting with intent to murder. The prison, which has only two hundred and twenty-five cells, has in it no less than six hundred and sixty-eight persons, including twenty already under sentence of transportation. No wonder that Judge Jackson designated the calendar as one of the most awful he had ever known. . . . Have I not stated enough to recommend to the condition of this portion of the empire the social condition of Ireland? . . . To mitigate her sufferings, to lay the foundation for a better state of things, measures of no commonplace and ordinary character are requisite. . . . Reject my proposal if you will, but propose some other. If you can propose a better, there is no man in this House who will give it a more cordial support than I shall. I make this proposal without adventitious party aid. I know not who agrees with, or who differs from me. I make it solely under the influence of sympathy for an unfortunate country, and with the conviction that some decisive measure is necessary for the relief, not only of Ireland, but of this country also."

Sir Robert Peel's propositions concerned two points: emigration, and the condition of landed property in Ireland. He had lately, in 1847, supported a measure brought forward by Lord Lincoln, on the subject of Irish emigration; now, in 1849, returning to the subject on his own account, he brought forward doubts as to the benefits of a system of government emigration, and recommended to the ministry to carry forward the measures they had already set on foot to encourage voluntary emigration, which was now every day increasing.

It was to the state of landed property in Ireland that Sir Robert Peel chiefly directed his efforts; after having vividly portrayed its deplorable condition, its public burdens, its private debts, the new Poor Law, the accumulation of mortgages, the apathy of landlords, the unprofitable crowding together of tenants, he went on to say: "It is not without hesitation I venture to offer any suggestion for diminishing the danger which I see in perspective; but I will communicate to the House what my impressions are. Almost the only measure from which I derive a hope of safety is the introduction of new proprietors who shall take possession of land in Ireland, freed from its present incumbrances, and enter upon its cultivation with adequate capital, with new feelings, and inspired by new hopes." He then referred to what had taken place, under James I., in Ulster, in the north of Ireland, when, after repeated revolts of the Irish chieftains, the king, put in possession by confiscations of two million acres of land, had distributed a great part of it among the English and the Protestant Scots who had settled there with their families, and by intelligent and industrious farming, laid the foundations of the prosperity of that province.

"Nothing can be easier," he continued, "than to suggest remedies, if we choose to disregard those rights of property which it is the first duty of a British legislature to uphold. But if it be possible to make any new settlement similar to that of Ulster, my earnest advice—my advice, in unison with the general feelings of the House—would be that no religious distinction should be allowed to enter into the arrangement. . . . If, without violating the rights of property, you can place the land in possession of new proprietors without distinction of religious profession, you will lay the foundation of the future prosperity of Ireland. I much fear that if you rely merely on individual sales and purchases, you will make no great advance. Perhaps it might be prudent to appoint a commission for the purpose of considering the whole subject, and the possibility of encouraging, by their advice and intervention, that change in property which I believe to be indispensable to any great improvement of the country. Much property in Ireland is, in point of fact, of little value to the proprietors on account of the incumbrances upon it; and it may be possible for the government, with the sanction of the House, to devise means by which new capital may be introduced into the cultivation of the land in Ireland, and the existing proprietors rescued from the disappointment and despair in which they are involved."

The proposition of Sir Robert Peel raised, as indeed was inevitable, serious objections. It presented grave legal and administrative difficulties; it offended long-established prejudices and aroused ancient jealousies; it tended to the rupture of ties that had endured for centuries, and were still dear, notwithstanding the sufferings they had entailed. It succeeded, however, for it was plainly useful to Ireland as a whole, and even to those whom it seemed to offend. The results surpassed the expectations of even its most ardent promoters; its effects, however, had scarcely begun to make themselves felt when Sir Robert Peel suddenly died.

For several months all England had been ringing with the names of Don Pacifico and Mr. Finlay, the one a Jew from Gibraltar, the other a Scotsman, both English subjects, asserting themselves to have been wronged by the Greek government, and claiming large indemnities. Lord Palmerston had made himself not only their advocate but their champion; he required from the Greek government immediate payment, and on their hesitation the English fleet had appeared in the Piræus, and seized a considerable number of Greek vessels belonging to government and to private owners. A sharp disagreement on this subject ensued between the Cabinets of London and Paris. The French commissioner at Athens, Baron Gros, and the ambassador at London, M. Drouyn de Lhuys, both quitted their posts. The House of Lords formally censured the policy of Lord Palmerston, and the minister's fall was certain, unless the House of Commons distinctly manifested confidence in him. One of the most eloquent of the Radicals, Mr. Roebuck, gave notice of a resolution affirming that the principles on which the foreign policy of the government had been regulated were "such as are calculated to maintain the honor and dignity of this country, and in times of unexampled difficulty to preserve peace between England and the various nations of the world." This was much more than was required by the Greek question. It was a general and systematic approbation of all Lord Palmerston's foreign policy, and not of acts merely, but of principles. Lord Palmerston pleaded his own cause with consummate skill, claiming, in the name of England, that effectual and powerful protection which she had always extended to her subjects. It was no longer a question of the justice of Don Pacifico's claims, nor of the reprisals made upon the Greek government. The verdict of the House would decide, Lord Palmerston said, "whether, as the Roman, in days of old, held himself free from indignity when he could say 'civis Romanus sum,' so also a British subject, in whatever land he may be, shall feel confident that the watchful eye and the strong arm of England will protect him against injustice and wrong."

For four years Sir Robert Peel had habitually sustained the Whig Cabinet. He knew by his own experience the difficulties of government, and his reason, as well as his sense of justice, refused to impute all that went wrong to the mistakes or the inefficiency of the Cabinet. Mr. Roebuck's motion, however, required too much of him, for it implied a censure of the foreign policy of his own ministry. "I am asked," he said, "to express approbation of the foreign policy of the present government as distinguished from the policy of its predecessors. The declaration of the noble lord at the head of the government [Lord John Russell], has removed all doubts from my mind on this point. He said, upon the first night of this debate, that his noble friend, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, would not be the minister of Austria, would not be the minister of Russia, would not be the minister of France, but would be the minister of England. What was the meaning of that declaration? My construction of it was that the noble lord meant to contrast the conduct of the noble lord [Lord Palmerston] with the conduct of the Earl of Aberdeen; and that what he solicited from me by my vote of this night, was a decided reflection on the policy of the Earl of Aberdeen,—upon the policy for which I myself was responsible.

"I have been connected with my noble friend the Earl of Aberdeen during the whole period for which he was Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. I was connected with him at the period when we announced that we recognized the House of Orleans, and that we were determined to maintain the most friendly relations with France. I remained connected with him until July, 1846, when, on surrendering power at the feet of a majority of this House, I announced the termination of the only difficulty that remained with the United States, by the adjustment of the affair of Oregon. . . . I believe there never existed a minister less disposed to make a sacrifice either of the honor or of the interests of this country, or more sincerely disposed to maintain, not only peace, but the most friendly relations with every country with which England had intercourse. . . . In justice to ourselves, in justice to the party with whom I then acted, in justice to this House, I could not with honor acquiesce in any covert reflection on the policy of my noble friend, the policy of peace consistently with our maintenance of the honor of the country. . . . I protest against the resolution — the carrying of which will, I believe, give a false impression with respect to the dignity and honor of this country, and will establish a principle which you cannot put into execution without imminent danger to the best interests of the country.”

Sir Robert Peel was right in his condemnation of the extremes to which an exclusively selfish national policy might lead. He, however, did not regret the success of Mr. Roebuck's measure, which maintained the Whigs in power. He had no desire to be again at the head of affairs, and his party was disorganized. There was a party without a leader, and there were leaders without a party, it was said at the time. Sir Robert's friends were gathered around him, waiting for his directions, and seconding him in his generous efforts in the service of the country. They had just congratulated him on his speech, when, on the 29th of June, 1850, the rumor was suddenly spread that he had fallen from his horse as he was riding up Constitution Hill; and almost immediately news came that he was dying.

As soon as the news of the accident became known, the most intense and universal interest manifested itself; great and small, the court and the public, Prince Albert, the Prince of Prussia, the Duke of Cambridge, all the most important personages in England, came and came again to Whitehall Gardens to inquire for Sir Robert, and found gathered around the house a multitude of persons of every condition in life, tradesmen, workingmen, women with children in their arms, — poor people eager to learn what was to be hoped or feared concerning the life of him who had freed their daily bread from taxation. The crowd of carriages was so great that it became necessary to stop them at some distance from the house, lest their noise should disturb the sufferer, already afflicted with the most extreme nervous excitement; and the number of persons on foot who were waiting for news was so considerable that copies of the physicians' bulletin from time to time were distributed to the policemen who were on duty near the house, to be read aloud by them for the satisfaction of the crowd.

Sir Robert Peel expired on the 2d of July; it had been his wish to be buried very quietly in his family tomb in the country, and he had specially objected to any public funeral, or any honorary distinction which might be conferred on his family after his death. These wishes were scrupulously observed; the ceremonious obsequies proposed by the Houses were declined, and also the peerage offered to Lady Peel.

Never certainly was the democratic principle, "to each man according to his works," manifested in a higher sphere or by a disinterestedness more severe and thorough. In no other way, perhaps, was ever the inmost heart and character of Sir Robert Peel so sincerely revealed as by these prohibitions. He was a great and honest servant of the State, proud with a kind of humility, and unwilling to shine with any splendor foreign to his natural sphere; devoted to his country without any desire of recompense, not specially mindful of established rules or long-existing political combinations, sedulous to discover day by day what the public welfare demanded, and ready to bring this about without caring for parties and party formulas. He was thus by turns conservative and reformer: Tory, Whig, and almost Radical; unpopular and popular; using his strength with the same ardor, now in a resolute resistance, now in concessions which were perhaps excessive; wise rather than prudent, courageous rather than firm, but always sincere, patriotic, and marvellously suited to an epoch of transition like our own, — to a control over modern society such as it has become, and becomes every day more and more, in England as well as elsewhere, under the sway of those democratic principles and feelings which have been for fifteen centuries fermenting in Europe, and in our time are gaining victories concerning which no man can yet say what will be the real and final result.

At the moment when the accident occurred which resulted in Sir Robert Peel's death, he was on his way to attend the meeting of a commission which had been appointed, under the presidency of Prince Albert, to make the preliminary preparations for organizing the first Great Exhibition of Industry,—a beautiful and noble thought, destined to become fruitful in establishing among all the nations of the world an intercourse till then unknown, and relations which the progress of commerce could have brought about but slowly. Its original conception was due to Prince Albert himself, who had for more than a year devoted his efforts to the success of an enterprise which he was confident would be useful to England, and would develop the peaceful industries of all the nations of the world.

All, however, were not of this opinion, and the project of a Universal Exposition met with violent opposition in many quarters. The national and religious susceptibilities of England had just been excessively offended by a papal bull, dividing the territory of England into dioceses to which were attached ecclesiastical titles. Cardinal Wiseman, well known in England, and highly esteemed for his eminent talents, became by this act of the pope, Archbishop of Westminster and Metropolitan of Great Britain. A letter by the cardinal, destined to be read in all the Roman Catholic churches of London, solemnly announced that England had "received a place among the churches which, normally constituted, form the splendid aggregate of Catholic communion. Catholic England has been restored to its orbit in the ecclesiastical firmament from which its light had long vanished, and begins now anew its course of regularly adjusted action round the centre of unity, the source of jurisdiction, of light, and of vigor."

ROBERT PEEL.

This was presuming too far upon English toleration and the progress of religious liberty. Public sentiment felt itself wounded. The more moderate considered the pope's act and Cardinal Wiseman's commentary as ill-judged and futile. The more ardent Protestants, both in the church of England and among dissenters, were much excited at what was called the Papal aggression. Lord John Russell, carried away by the general excitement, wrote, in reply to the Bishop of Durham, a letter which was to give free rein to the anti-Romanist passions of the country. The prime minister condemned the recent movement as "a pretension of supremacy over the realm of England, and a claim to sole and undivided sway, which is inconsistent with the queen's supremacy, with the rights of our bishops and clergy, and with the spiritual independence of the nation, as asserted even in the Roman Catholic times." He attacked at the same time those Romanizing tendencies which had been for some years manifested in the Anglican church itself, the partisans of which were grouped around the University of Oxford and Drs. Pusey and Newman. "Clergymen of our church," he said, "have been leading their flocks step by step to the verge of the precipice. . . . I have little hope that the propounders and framers of these innovations will desist from their insidious course; but I rely with confidence on the people of England, and I will not bate one jot of heart or hope, so long as the glorious principles and the immortal martyrs of the Reformation shall be held in reverence by the great mass of a nation which looks with contempt on the mummeries of superstition and with scorn at the laborious endeavors which are now making to confine the intellect and enslave the soul."

The war-cry seemed to have been raised from the very foot of the throne; the cry "No Popery!" answered it back from all corners of England. The government found itself committed by the rather imprudent manifesto of its chief, as well as by the public excitement. A Bill was presented to the Houses, interdicting all ecclesiastical titles except those recognized by the English law.

The main difficulty in the case arose from the tacit recognition which had been accorded many years before in Ireland to the ecclesiastical titles of the Roman Catholic bishops. The good sense and equity of the most distinguished men in both Houses opposed all violent measures as alike contradictory to the principles of religious liberty, and unworthy of the dignity of a great country governed with liberality, and tranquilly secure in her own strength. The measure presented by the government was amended, revised, discussed with a sharpness that no religious controversy had excited for many years. Lord John Russell appeared by turns as the most zealous advocate of Protestantism and the partisan of the Roman Catholics. When at last the law passed, it remained, and could not but remain, without effect. The Catholic prelates continued to employ their ecclesiastical titles, and were not prosecuted for doing so; and in 1871, the Act was quietly repealed, its provisions never having been enforced. The toleration so slowly and painfully gained by the English people triumphed in practice over the momentary excitement of Protestant passions against an unwise attempt of the Roman court. "I would never have consented to anything which breathed a spirit of intolerance," the queen wrote to her aunt, the Duchess of Gloucester, while the public feeling was most intense. "We must hope and trust this excitement will soon cease, and that the wholesome effect of it upon our own church will be lasting."

The agitation caused by "the papal aggression," and some checks received in the House of Commons by the government upon incidental questions had for a moment threatened to overthrow the ministry, but it was saved, as in the time of Sir Robert Peel the Whig power had been, by the inability of its opponents to form a Cabinet. The religious excitement abated; and the anxiety of those naturally disposed to uneasiness now busied itself with the subject of the approaching Exposition. "The opponents of the Exhibition," wrote Prince Albert, at this time, "work with might and main to throw all the old women here into a panic and to drive myself crazy. The strangers, they give out, are certain to commence a thorough revolution here, to murder Victoria and myself, and to proclaim the Red Republic in England; the plague is certain to ensue from the confluence of such vast multitudes, and to swallow up those whom the increased price of everything has not already swept away. For all this I am to be responsible, and against all this I have to make efficient provision." The prince, however, persevered, using his influence wisely and prudently, and gaining, one after another, the controverted points. Hyde Park had been designated from the outset as the natural site for the Exposition, but a violent outcry, to which Lord Brougham, with characteristic impetuosity, lent his voice, asserted that the Park would be forever disfigured. "An absolute prostration of the understanding takes place even in the minds of the bravest when the word 'prince' is mentioned in this country," he exclaimed, supporting a petition presented in the House of Lords against the occupation of any part of Hyde Park for this purpose.

The fortunate inspiration of Mr. Paxton, the Duke of Devonshire's head-gardener, in substituting iron and glass for brick and stone, gathered the products of the world's industry in an immense conservatory, open to all the light of day, sheltering under its roof the great trees of the Park, and charming all eyes by its bold and novel elegance. All difficulties were by degrees surmounted, and the enthusiasm of the original partisans of the project had by degrees gained upon the whole nation. The day of the opening of the Exposition was a day of triumph which Queen Victoria has herself described with touching vivacity. "The great event," wrote the queen, "has taken place, a complete and beautiful triumph, a glorious and touching sight, one which I shall ever be proud of, for my beloved Albert and my country. . . . The park presented a wonderful spectacle, crowds streaming through it, carriages and troops passing, quite like the coronation-day, and for me the same anxiety; no, much greater anxiety, on account of my beloved Albert. The day was bright and all bustle and excitement. . . . The Green Park and Hyde Park were one densely crowded mass of human beings, in the highest good-humor, and most enthusiastic. I never saw Hyde Park look as it did, as far as the eye could reach. A little rain fell just as we started, but before we came near the Crystal Palace, the sun shone and gleamed upon the gigantic edifice, upon which the flags of all nations were floating. . . . The glimpse of the transept through the iron gates, the waving palms, the flowers, statues, myriads of people filling the galleries and seats around, with the flourish of trumpets as we entered, gave us a sensation which I can never forget, and I felt much moved. . . . The sight as we came to the middle was magical, so vast, so glorious, so touching, one felt, as so many did whom I have since spoken to, filled with devotion, more so than by any service I have ever heard. The tremendous cheers, the joy expressed in every face, the immensity of the building, the mixture of palms, flowers, trees, statues, fountains; the organ — with two hundred instruments and six hundred voices, which sounded like nothing — and my beloved husband, the author of this peace festival, which united the industry of all nations of the earth — all this was moving indeed, and it was, and is, a day to live forever. God bless my dearest Albert! God bless my dearest country, which has shown itself so great to-day! One felt so grateful to the great God, who seemed to pervade all and to bless all!"

The apprehensions that had been aroused by the project of the Exhibition of 1851 proved vain; no danger, natural or moral, was destined to arise for England from the immense throngs that gathered in London and its environs. The hopes conceived of the salutary influence of this great pacific manifestation proved also to be exaggerated. Universal Expositions have developed and multiplied in all countries, but they have not assured the peace of the world, and the era of warlike preparations was destined to recommence for England immediately upon the closing of the Crystal Palace. The Great Exhibition of 1851 left, however, in the minds of all, an impression of novelty and of enthusiasm; its aim was generous and noble, and the material success was complete, even in respect to the financial part of the enterprise. Too much had been hoped as regards the progress of civilization, and these illusions were not slow to be dissipated. The demon of war was not yet conquered.

The remote discords which as yet had not reached England herself, were not, however, without influence upon her interior policy. The death of Sir Robert Peel had freed Lord Palmerston from a rival who was more than his equal, and from a censor whom he dreaded, even while accepting his support. Bold, even to imprudence, in his foreign policy, Lord Palmerston was opposed to all concessions to the democratic spirit at home, and his policy was in all essential points in harmony with that of the Conservatives. But it was difficult for him to resist those influences which came to him from abroad, and the consistency of his conduct suffered much therefrom. The Hungarian revolt against Austria had just been suppressed, and Louis Kossuth, the popular hero of the insurrection, had taken refuge in England; he was still a young man, handsome, and of noble and picturesque exterior. He spoke with fluency a certain stately and literary English, acquired from the study of books. His somewhat Oriental imagination lent to his speeches a brilliancy which charmed the masses; he was received by the Liberals with an enthusiasm which soon became general. From ladies of the highest rank to the crowds gathered at the doors of public halls to hail him as he went by, all the population of London saluted Kossuth with its applause. He conceived, from this welcome, hopes for his country which were absolutely vain, and very offensive to the Austrian diplomatic service. The rumor even went abroad that Lord Palmerston was about to allow himself to be visited by Kossuth.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs was privately much amused at the alarm of Austria. "Kossuth's reception," he wrote to his brother, "must have been gall and wormwood to the Austrians and to the absolutists generally." The Cabinet feared some inconsiderate step on the part of Lord Palmerston, and he was obliged to promise that he would not receive Kossuth.

For some time the independence of Lord Palmerston's demeanor had excited a certain discontent. The queen was displeased that important dispatches had been received or sent away without her knowledge. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had been called to account by Lord John Russell, but fell into the same fault again, "not from oversight or negligence," wrote Prince Albert, "but upon principle, and with astounding pertinacity against every effort of the queen." A memorandum was therefore prepared by the royal couple, and sent to the Minister of Foreign Affairs. The conduct required of him by the queen was distinctly and severely indicated. The queen insisted upon her constitutional rights and upon the duty of her minister, a duty which Lord Palmerston had frequently failed to fulfil. Lord Palmerston did not resign, he did not defend himself; he simply excused himself for the delay that had sometimes occurred in the transmission of dispatches from the Foreign Office to the queen's Cabinet, and he added, "I have taken a copy of this memorandum of the queen, and I will not fail to attend to the directions which it contains." "If I had suddenly resigned," he explained later, "I should have been bringing for decision at the bar of public opinion a personal quarrel between myself and my sovereign—a step which no subject ought to take if he can possibly avoid it, for the result of such a course must be either fatal to him or injurious to the country. If he should prove to be in the wrong, he would be irretrievably condemned; if the sovereign should be proved to be in the wrong, the monarchy would suffer."

Notwithstanding the correct prudence of the attitude which he assumed, Lord Palmerston remained irritated and displeased. His ill-humor showed itself in a reply which he made to the deputations of sympathizers with Kossuth. The levity of tone equalled the political imprudence of his words. The public infatuation, however, was for the moment in sympathy with the declarations of the Minister of Foreign Affairs. The queen, Prince Albert, and Lord John Russell were well aware that the time was not yet ripe to manifest their disapprobation. A conspicuous opportunity to break with Lord Palmerston was not long delayed.

The new experiment that France had made of a republican form of government had been of short duration. The President whom she had chosen had not been long in manifesting views more ambitious than were attributed to him by the mass of those who had aided in raising him to power. Prince Louis Bonaparte was well known in England; it was thence that he had set out for his two attempts at Strasburg and at Boulogne; it was there that he had found refuge after his escape from the chateau of Ham. He had lived there for some time, without fortune and without influence, half-forgotten in the society, more aristocratic than respectable, in which he played an insignificant part. At the time of the great Chartist demonstration on Kennington Common, his name had figured in the list of special constables who had volunteered for the maintenance of order. The English public had regarded with surprise, but not with disfavor, his election as President of the republic. The coup d'état of the 2d of December caused the most extreme surprise throughout England. Its violence and illegality were revolting at once to the good sense and the moral sentiment of the country. But by degrees, the cordiality of Prince Louis Napoleon towards England, and the anxiety that had been caused by the political vacillations of the Legislative Assembly modified the first spontaneous impressions. The English nation grew more favorable towards the President of the French Republic, — soon to become the Emperor of the French. Lord Palmerston had shared from the first in these feelings of indulgence, and openly acknowledged this to Count Walewski, at that time French ambassador at London, and personally interested in the Napoleonic cause. M. Walewski hastened to make known at Paris this favorable opinion, which he attributed, as a matter of course, to the entire English Cabinet.

The attitude decided upon in council by the ministry was, however, very different. Lord Normanby, the English minister at Paris, was instructed to maintain great reserve and the most exact neutrality; and a few days later, an attitude of prudent observation, without enmity and without sympathy, was indicated to him. Faithful to the letter to the policy that had been marked out, Lord Normanby soon found traces of Lord Palmerston's independent procedures; and M. de Turgot, Minister of Foreign Affairs, openly confirmed the suspicion that the English Secretary of State had acted separately and outside of the line of conduct decided upon by the Cabinet. Lord John Russell was required by the queen to ask for explanations from his colleague. The latter did not at once reply, and when he did make answer, it was to acknowledge that he had in fact approved of the course of the Prince President, that he believed it perfectly justified by the manœuvres of the Assembly against him, and that he had expressed to Count Walewski his opinion on this subject. The French minister had supposed that the Secretary for Foreign Affairs of England was not speaking inconsiderately, and that his words committed his government. Hence this misunderstanding, which had embarrassed Lord Normanby, and surprised M. de Turgot. Lord Palmerston's explanations tended chiefly to the defence of the coup d'état, and the establishing of the grounds of his approval of it, without in any way seeking to extenuate the imprudence of his words, contradictory to the attitude decided upon by the entire Cabinet.

This was going too far, and in a matter of too serious importance. Lord John Russell wrote to Lord Palmerston to that effect. "While I concur," he said, "in the foreign policy of which you have been the adviser, and much as I admire the energy and ability with which it has been carried into effect, I cannot but observe that misunderstandings perpetually renewed, violations of prudence and decorum too frequently repeated, have marred the effects which ought to have followed from a sound policy and able administration. I am therefore most reluctantly compelled to come to the conclusion that the conduct of Foreign Affairs can no longer be left in your hands with advantage to the country."

Lord Palmerston was replaced by Lord Granville, an amiable man and popular with his colleagues, and one who would have no disposition to adopt an independent line of policy. The vexation of the fallen minister did not lead him into any unbecoming manifestations. In the discussions which followed on this subject in the House of Commons, and in spite of the somewhat rude frankness of the attacks made by Lord John Russell, Lord Palmerston observed the reticence which he had hitherto imposed upon himself in respect to his personal disagreement with the queen; he was 'defeated, and he acknowledged it. "My turn will come with John Russell," he said; and in fact the day of revenge was not far off.

The English mind was, however, excited and apprehensive. The re-establishment of the empire, with its trivial reminiscences of the past, awakened thoughts of the long struggles and persistent enmity that had menaced England with ruin, and had imposed upon her heavy sacrifices. In vain the Emperor Napoleon III. proclaimed at Bordeaux: "L'Empire, c'est la paix!" The very name of Napoleon accorded ill with these peaceful declarations, the national instinct was anxious and troubled. As at divers epochs in her history, England had been seized with a panic at the idea of a possible French descent upon her coasts. New corps of volunteers formed everywhere, militia-officers drilled their men, and Lord John Russell presented a Bill for the organization of the militia; it was ill-conceived and inadequate, and Lord Palmerston attacked it vigorously. He proposed an amendment, which passed by a small majority, whereupon Lord John Russell announced that he could not retain power, since he no longer had the confidence of the House, and that he should resign. "I have had my tit-for-tat with John Russell," wrote Lord Palmerston to his brother, "and I turned him out on Friday last."

The new Cabinet, formed by Lord Derby, was destitute of strength; the eloquence of the prime minister in the House of Lords, and that of Mr. Disraeli, as chancellor of the exchequer, in the House of Commons, could not suffice to support it with distinction. The dissolution and the new elections slightly increased its authority. Reduced to depend for support upon often irregular contingents, the ministry remained in fact in the minority, and its existence was constantly threatened. A violent conflict soon began between Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli, destined to continue as long as their existence, side by side, in the same legislative assembly. The budget presented by the chancellor of the exchequer was attacked by Mr. Lowe, at this time a new member of the House, as well as by Mr. Gladstone.

At the close of a protracted passage-at-arms, most bitter in reality and most brilliant in form, the ministry resigned. It was four o'clock in the morning when the House adjourned. The weather was cold and foggy. "It will be an unpleasant day for going to Osborne," Mr. Disraeli remarked to a friend as they stepped out of doors. The queen was at the moment at her favorite residence in the Isle of Wight.

The new Cabinet could only be formed by an alliance between the Whigs and those friends of Sir Robert Peel who still bore with pride the name of Peelites. Lord Aberdeen became prime minister. Lord John Russell assumed the charge of foreign affairs, and Lord Palmerston became home secretary. "I had long settled in my own mind," the latter wrote to his brother, "that I would not go back to the foreign office, and that if I ever took any office, it should be the home. It does not do for a man to pass his whole life in one department, and the home office deals with the concerns of the country internally, and brings one in contact with one's fellow-countrymen; besides which it gives one more influence in regard to the militia and the defences of the country." Mr. Gladstone commenced upon those duties as chancellor of the exchequer which were to contribute so greatly to his reputation and his influence. The debate which he had recently carried on with Mr. Disraeli had placed him in the ranks of the great orators of the world. He was yet young, and the hopes that were formed in respect to him were well founded. The action of his mind was henceforth to count among the powers that govern England.

A few weeks before the organization of the Coalition Cabinet, and at the very moment when the national alarm most vividly foresaw the return of the era of armed strife, England experienced the loss of one of her most illustrious and most faithful servants. On the 14th of December, 1852, the Duke of Wellington expired at Walmer Castle, "falling peacefully asleep on earth to awake in eternity." He had completed his eighty-third year, and for many months had been very feeble. In 1848, he had displayed for the last time, against the Chartists, the ardor of his indefatigable zeal in the service of his country. It was in his name and under his direction that had been organized the effort of a resistance imposing in its uselessness. Since that time he had lived very quietly, fulfilling the duties committed to him as he had always fulfilled all his duties, faithful to a single and simple idea, the greatness of England and a personal devotion to the sovereign who reigned in England. No individual feeling, no prejudice, and no preference ever interfered with the efficiency of his conduct. No self-love or self-seeking ever stood in the way of "the Duke,"—as men loved to call him in England—when it was a question of the country's good or the country's claims. No anxiety as to the success of his undertakings enfeebled the directness of his mind and of his intentions. When in November, 1834, Lord Grey's Cabinet at last gave way, King William sent for the Duke of Wellington. The duke was already an old man, illustrious by military successes and by devotion in politics to the conservative cause. He gave at once a grand example of modesty and of power: "It is not to me," he said to the king, "but to Sir Robert Peel that your Majesty must apply to form a Cabinet; and to him it belongs to direct it. The difficulty and the predominance are in the House of Commons; the leader of that House must be at the head of the government. I will serve under him in any post that your Majesty may please to intrust to me." The king did not object; but Peel was absent. A month before he had set out for Italy with his family. The duke agreed, until Sir Robert's return, to undertake the responsibility of the government, and in concert with Lord Lyndhurst, he did this for three weeks, conducting several departments himself, calmly bearing the attacks of the rigid constitutionalists, while the public admired his confident boldness and his indefatigable readiness to be useful to the king and country.

WELLINGTON.

One of the last times when he had spoken in the House of Lords was to announce the death of Sir Robert Peel, the tears running down his cheeks as he spoke of the man with whom he had bravely shared responsibilities so heavy, and had, with singleness of purpose, accomplished so many reforms which seemed necessary to him, although often they were contrary to his own inclination.

England had never forgotten the military glory of the duke, and the perils from which he had saved her. She had remained grateful to him even in the time when his political course had contradicted the popular enthusiasm. The duke gave back confidence for confidence, but he was indifferent to applause as to reproach when it was a question of serving the country. The populace of London might break one day all the windows of Apsley House; the duke replaced only those of the rooms that he occupied, and with a gesture of disdain pointed to the yawning casements when a few days later the capricious crowd saluted him with applause as he was mounting his horse at his own door.

In reality and notwithstanding the variations of public opinion, the feeling that united the old soldier to his country was a noble and touching one. It broke forth in ardent expression on the news of his death. All the honor that public respect and public regret could bring, gathered about his tomb. He was the last survivor of the grand generation who had fought in Europe against the French revolution, both in its demagogic and its absolutist phase. In war he had been its most illustrious representative, victorious, by his heroic perseverance, over even the genius of the Emperor Napoleon. In peace he had been one of the firmest champions of that rule of law in liberty which had of late lent to England the strength to sustain a desperate struggle, and was now leading her, at the head of all civilized nations, towards a progressive advance in toleration and justice, in industry and commerce.

When he died, the duke was but a name and a memory, but England felt that she had been honored by his presence, and was now impoverished by the loss of this personification of an almost sublime good sense, and an integrity proof against every trial. It is one of the glories of England that she has always known how to honor, to love, and to recompense her great servants.

VICTORIA.

CHAPTER VII.

THE FRUITS OF PEACE.

AT the very moment when the most illustrious of her old military leaders vanished from earth, England found herself upon the point of losing for a time that peace which she had now enjoyed for more than forty years, a period of tranquillity which had given scope for so much useful and brilliant progress, which had been favorable to so many useful and brilliant undertakings, and had secured to future generations so many benefits.

British arms had not remained absolutely inactive during all this time. Far-off hostilities had from time to time disturbed the repose of the mother-country. We have seen that the English had made war upon the Chinese, in order to impose upon them the opium trade, and upon the Afghans, to oblige them to accept a sovereign of English selection. Nor was this all. Following upon the disastrous campaign in Afghanistan, an attack had been made, and with better success, by Sir Charles Napier upon Scinde, a territory reported (and without doubt, truly) to be animated by hostile sentiments towards England. He had captured the fortress Emaun-Ghur, taking with him across the desert a handful of English troops mounted on camels. The treaty which he had determined to force upon the ruler of Scinde was accepted, but its conditions were severe. The Scindians sought only to evade it, and the very day after the signatures had been affixed, Major Outram, the English resident at Hyderabad, was attacked by a swarm of Beloochees. He succeeded in making his escape by the river, but Sir Charles Napier determined to avenge the violation of the treaty and to strengthen his conquest. His forces were inconsiderable, and he had but a dozen guns. On the morning of the 17th of February he wrote in his journal: "It is my first battle as a commander; it may be my last. At sixty that makes little difference; but my feelings are, it shall be Do or die. To fall will be to leave many I love best; to go to many loved and my home; and that, in any case, must be soon." Success was to crown the resolve of the bold soldier who had learnt the art of war in the great struggles of the Peninsula; the battle of Meanee was fought and gained; Hyderabad surrendered. Further engagements ensured to England the possession of Scinde, and the successful general became its first governor. He knew how to develop the prosperity of the province which was entrusted to him, and to teach its warlike population to enjoy the benefits of peace. The happy results of his administration were conspicuous at the time of the revolt of nearly all India, when Scinde remained faithful to its English rulers.

Some hostilities between the governor-general of India and the Mahrattas, and a short campaign against the Kaffirs also marked the years just past, the distant echo of these sounds of war now and then reaching the ears of England, but scarcely touching her heart. The day was approaching when all the best of England's strength was to be called forth in a prolonged and cruel struggle, without danger, indeed, to her national position, but bitter to many hearts, and fatal to many lives. Before entering upon the story of the Crimean War, it will be well to glance at the fruits of this long peace, which had healed the wounds and renewed the strength of England.

We have already spoken of the marvellous progress brought about in the interior condition of England by the construction of railways; the transformation became daily more complete as the network of new roads extended further and further, and the population became more and more habituated to their use. Postal communications had attained, almost at a single stride, the highest degree of perfection. The telegraph was gaining slowly the ground it was destined so completely to conquer. Free-trade had won its definitive victory, Lord Derby's Cabinet, nominally made up of protectionists, having been forced to abandon their ground. All English ports were now open to the merchandise of the world, with an abatement of all those duties which had not yet ceased utterly to exist.

Social progress kept pace with commerce and industry. The English government and private philanthropic enterprise were busied in securing cheap bread to the working people, and also in sanitary reforms affecting the water-supply, and the condition of their dwellings. In the latter respect, reform was imperatively required. In Liverpool and in Manchester, and in many other manufacturing cities, a tenth of the population were housed in cellars flooded in every shower of rain. Immense systems of drainage purified these pestilential quarters; associations were formed to establish public baths and wash-houses; cemeteries were by degrees removed to the outskirts of the towns; and important engineering works were undertaken for the purpose of bringing pure water into populous centres. At the same time, and from the same charitable impulse, leading the intelligent and cultivated classes to efforts for the material and moral improvement of the classes beneath them who were often blind to their own real interests, it was forbidden to employ in mines women and girls, naturally unsuited for that species of labor. They had often borne the part of beasts of burden. The labor of children in the mines was also limited and regulated, as it was shortly after to be in the factories. The eminent philanthropist, Lord Ashley, — better known as Lord Shaftesbury — strove vainly for many years to reduce to ten hours the labor of women in factories. The day's work of children under thirteen was fixed at six hours and a half, and the care of their education was no longer abandoned to the doubtful charity of their employers. Parliament made laws upon this subject, and established penalties. From year to year the principle of the right and duty of the nation to protect the weak against the oppression of the strong, and against their own errors of judgment, gained ground in men's minds notwithstanding the opposition of the absolute principles of political economy. Nor were the sufferings of the agricultural population completely neglected in this generous crusade; the evil was acknowledged, and efforts were made, though often insufficient and incomplete, to furnish remedies for it.

Ignorance was manifestly one of the deep causes of the degradation and poverty of the working classes. Up to this time popular education had been almost entirely in the hands of the Church of England or of the dissenting sects, assisted by the efforts and sacrifices of the landed proprietors. From the beginning of Queen Victoria's reign, the state entered upon a more liberal course, and important grants were voted by the Houses for purposes of popular education. In 1839, for the first time, a council of Public Instruction was formed, especially entrusted with the establishment of normal schools for teachers of both sexes.

The progress of the public interest in this matter was rapid. In 1847, an animated discussion took place on the propositions of Lord John Russell upon the subject. The government aid to schools, which in 1833 was £30,000, had now been increased to £100,000. Sir Robert Peel entered into the question warmly, like one who had long given it his serious attention, and regretted that he had done so little for so great a public interest. "If," he said, "we could know the extent of evil which has arisen from the present ignorance of the people ; if there could be presented to us a full account of all the crime which has been generated by the want of education ; if we could obtain a statement, extending over the last fifty years, of all the vice which the evil example of parents has impressed upon the character and disposition of children, the violence and rapine which ignorance has occasioned, the offences against life and property which a neglect of education has superinduced ; if we could only enúmerate how many immortal souls have been within that period sent into the presence of their Creator and their Judge, ignorant of the great truths of religion and the principles of Christianity, we should shudder at our own grievous disregard of duty, and struggle without delay to repair the evils of our past neglect."

The remedies proposed by Lord John Russell were not as yet very extensive, and his language went much further than his measures, but the principles on which they were based were sound and practical. The State was to give assistance to the efforts, whether of the Church of England, of the dissenting sects, of laic corporations, or of private individuals, and everywhere to afford to this great work its strength and its superintendence, without interfering at any point either with religious beliefs or the free action of individual zeal. Sir Robert Peel warmly supported the propositions of the Cabinet, insisting strenuously upon the necessity of religious direction, so hotly attacked in our days.

"I am," he said, "for a religious as opposed to a secular education. I do not think that a secular education alone would be acceptable to the people of this country. I believe that such an education is only half an education, but with the most important half neglected." At the same time, a spirit of justice and toleration is conspicuous in his words. "I do not deny," he says, "the Established Church is powerful ; I rejoice that it is so. I think that the power of the church is increasing; and why is it increasing? Because of her willingness to make timely and salutary reforms, . . . because she is becoming aware of the necessity, both for temporal and spiritual objects of attending to the education of the people; it is because her conduct has been guided by that necessity that her influence has been gained. . . . But, attached as I am to the Church of England, I should be sorry to give to that Church any advantage by means of this Education vote, if I thought it unjust to the Dissenters.

. . . . On the contrary, however, . . . the principles acted upon in these minutes is one of perfect equity. . . . In the course of this discussion a question of great importance has arisen with regard to the condition of other subjects of her Majesty than either those who are members of the Established Church, or those who are usually called Dissenters. I speak of the Roman Catholic population. I am of opinion that no establishment of general education, even in England, could be deemed complete, which excluded the Roman Catholic population. . . . You are going to widen the sphere of the measure, and the more wide that sphere is, the more marked is the exclusion. Therefore, I think the time is come when justice and good policy will require from you the mature consideration of the position of the Roman Catholics. Take the case of the Roman Catholic population of Manchester, or Liverpool, or any other great town. In Manchester there is a district called the Irish town, in consequence of the great numbers of Irish resident there, amounting to from 60,000 to 70,000. Now, what class of people are these? They came over there relying on their industry, and they bargain for their labor. They have no natural protectors, . . . and there is no one probably to superintend their education. There are 60,000 or 70,000 of them, and how is their education to be attended to? I confess I cannot conceive a more urgent case, not so far, merely, as the intellectual advantage of the Roman Catholics is concerned, but, if there be any virtue in our principle — if the true remedy against barbarism, and crime, and degradation of character is instruction — it is not for the advantage of the Protestant community that these Roman Catholic children should remain immersed in ignorance.”

The same progress in religious toleration and the same solicitude in respect to the needs of others gave rise to Lord John Russell's measure for the abolition of the political incapacities which forbade to the Jews the entrance into Parliament. The question was long pending, and was hotly discussed. “It is not on account of their religion that I object to admitting the Jews into Parliament,” said Lord Aberdeen, the most liberal of the conservative party, “it is on account of their nationality; they are and will remain Israelites, and will never become Englishmen.” The spirit of justice and equity finally gained the day, and the political disabilities of the Jews were removed. Baron Lionel Rothschild had been repeatedly elected by the city of London before the doors of the House of Commons were finally opened to him.

Religious questions have always held an important place in England. The breath of the eighteenth century, the disturbances created everywhere by the French Revolution, the desperate strifes which had been engendered by it, had, however, in some degree distracted the public mind from these vital and eternal interests. The religious awakening, that is to say, the increasing solicitude for the highest welfare of the soul, burst forth at nearly the same time in England and upon the continent, — a movement at many points contradictory and violent, yet everywhere efficacious and bearing precious fruit of charity, piety, and simple and practical devotion. In France, the liberal Roman Catholics gathered around Monsieur de Montalembert, Père Lacordaire, and Monsieur de Falloux, bravely carrying on the work so often undertaken of the alliance of the Roman Catholic church with the needs of modern life; and the French Protestants, rescued from the philosophic lukewarmness which had succeeded to the long religious persecutions supported by them with so much heroism, entered upon a path of new and fervent zeal. In Germany, the pietists, as they were called, took the lead in all religious works. In England, the movement was complex and of diverse nature; in the Established Church the Evangelical party, deeply imbued with the principles of the Reformation, in recovering the religious ardor of that epoch, drew nearer to the Protestants of the continent, who were, for the most part, followers of Calvin. At the same time a contrary tendency was developing itself in the University of Oxford, and, far from leading the Established Church towards the spirit and practice which had marked its origin and had inspired the Homilies and the Prayer-Book, exhibited that disposition to draw near the Church of Rome which had actuated Archbishop Laud at the time when the Pope believed it suitable to offer to him a cardinal's hat. Two men, very distinguished by their intellect and character, put themselves at the head of the party which was destined — much against its will — to bear the name of one of them; but Dr. Pusey and Dr. Newman very soon entered upon diverging paths. Dr. Newman shortly went to seek in the Church of Rome that fixed rule and unbroken tradition which he believed logically necessary to his mind; Dr. Pusey was to remain faithful to the theory established and promulgated in those "Tracts for the Times" which they had been the first to compose and put in circulation. According to this theory, the Church of England was the true Catholic Church, forever at war with the corruptions which had invaded the Church of Rome, forever faithful to the principles of the primitive church, and preserved pure by Apostolic Succession from the earliest ages. No one had been more ardently opposed to the Roman Church than Dr. Newman. He had long combated that which in the end he was to adore; but the tendency of his teaching was none the less effectual, and among his disciples more than one was destined to follow his example, and return, like himself, into the Roman Catholic Church. The influence exercised upon the Anglican Church by Dr. Pusey was not less powerful. He never left the University of Oxford, but his words and writings have animated the zeal of numerous ministers of the church, who did not feel attracted towards the somewhat narrow formulas and rigid practice of the Evangelical party. It is the happiness and strength of the Church of England, as it was long the happiness and strength of the Roman Catholic Church, to be able to contain in its vast embrace diverse and apparently contradictory tendencies, based, however, on the same eternal foundations of religious faith and religious consecration. In the immense field of human want and ignorance in England, partisans of High Church and of Low Church, Puseyites and Evangelicals, have been for years faithful laborers, and their rivalry has been fruitful in good works, notwithstanding the bitterness of ecclesiastical anathemas.

With the exception of certain ultra-logical minds and a few ardent and agitated spirits who have pushed their researches to the extreme, and ended by seeking refuge in the Church of Rome, the Anglican Church has guarded all her children, her enlisted soldiers in diverse camps marching always under her banner. The Presbyterian Church of Scotland, meantime, has divided upon a principle of organization, not upon a question of faith or religious practice. The lay patronage of ecclesiastical livings often resulted in the appointment of persons distasteful to the congregation they were appointed to exhort and instruct. The strife was long and bitter between the partisans of the right of lay patronage and the advocates of the religious rights of the flock. The General Assembly of the Scottish Presbyterian Church finally declared that no minister could be installed over a parish, whatever might be the wish of the patron of the living, unless he were accepted by a majority of the congregation. Collisions soon ensued, and the questions being brought before the House of Lords they twice decided in favor of lay rights against the remonstrances of the presbytery. In vain government strove to calm the excitement of both parties. The crisis came when, on the 18th of May, 1843, in the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, Dr. Welsh, who had been moderator the preceding year, read a protest signed by four hundred and seventy pastors. The signers of the protest then silently arose, and forming an imposing procession, left the hall and went to take possession of a room prepared for them, where they immediately constituted themselves the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland. The men who thus abandoned their livings and positions, slowly and laboriously acquired, were among the most distinguished, learned, and pious ministers of the Scottish church. At their head was Dr. Chalmers, the foremost preacher in Scotland, perhaps even the foremost in the United Kingdom, profoundly versed in the natural sciences and in political economy, a theologian of the first rank, but above all an ardent and sincere Christian, as powerful over his colleagues by the genuineness and fire of his religious convictions as by the superiority of his mind and the brilliancy of his eloquence. The Free Church of Scotland thus had the good fortune to be founded by men whose views were as broad as their religious faith was firm, and it was to the honor of the Scottish nation that they realized this, and sustained the great religious movement which was going on amongst them, without abandoning their ancient national church. The ministers of the Free Church remained for some time poor, striving against the difficulties which environed them, and enduring the greatest privations. Slowly, however, buildings were erected for Divine worship, livings were endowed, the resources of the Free Church were multiplied, and at the same time the zeal of the National Church re-awakened, strifes were appeased, the chasm that had yawned at the moment of separation was in a great degree filled up, and the ministers of the National Church and those of the Free Church labored side by side for the salvation of souls and the practical amelioration of society. It was a rare and beautiful instance of sincerity in religious convictions leading men to extreme sacrifices, without impairing their candor and their good judgment. As has been the case in England between the partisans of High Church and Low Church, the antagonism between the National Church and the Free Church of Scotland has borne fruit more widely in good works than in the bitter results which usually follow from controversy.

This great mental and spiritual activity manifested in the church by religious controversies, broke forth elsewhere in literary, scientific, and philosophic labors. The reign of Queen Victoria forms an epoch of itself in the history of the human mind, as well as in the history of the free and peaceful development of parliamentary government. The most distinguished of the writers who had rendered illustrious the earlier part of the nineteenth century were dead before her accession to the throne. Sir Walter Scott, Lord Byron, Coleridge, Keats, had ceased to live. Wordsworth was destined to survive for many years yet, also Southey, Moore, and Walter Savage Landor, but the reputation of each of these authors was already made, and their most important works had been given to the public before the year 1837. The names of certain persons eminent in science were beginning to be known,—Brewster, Faraday, Sir John Herschel, Owen, Hugh Miller, Mrs. Somerville,—but their great works were yet to appear. As had been the case in France a few years earlier, historic studies were coming into the foremost rank of science and literature. Thomas Carlyle, one of the most brilliant among the historians of his time, eloquent and sagacious, although often led into error by prejudice, was giving to England and to the world the first fruits of his vast labors. Carlyle painted with ardor the heroes who had struck his imagination. Dr. Lingard slowly and conscientiously carried forward the history of England up to the year 1688, a network of facts and dates, dryly but accurately set forth. Sir Francis Palgrave had commenced his learned researches; and Sir Henry Hallam and Lord Macaulay, the two most illustrious historians of the period we are considering, unequal in age as well as in talent and brilliancy, were throwing the light of their judicious and penetrating criticism upon the remote periods of history or upon the life of personages who had played a great part upon the world's stage.

“Since I have known Mr. Hallam,” writes M. Guizot in his Mémoires, “and the better I have known him, the more his mind and character have alike attached me to him. Before 1830, his admirable historic works, — above all, his Constitutional History of England, — had established friendly relations between us. Since then I have met him in Paris, and we have entered into correspondence. He has often expressed to me his opinion in respect to what was going on in England; among other things, upon the Parliamentary Reform of 1831; and I have been struck with the firm independence as well as with the judicious sagacity both of his abstract ideas and his views upon contemporary events and measures. I never have known a man more thoroughly and sincerely liberal, and at the same time more exempt from all national prejudice and all party spirit, or one who occupied himself more exclusively with seeking the truth and with doing justice to all, without any desire either to please his friends or to get the better of his adversaries. The natural rectitude of his judgment, his exact and extensive knowledge, his personal high-mindedness, and his entire impartiality, rendered him absolutely equitable, and made him not less incapable—in the cause even that he had the most at heart, that of religious and political liberty—of fanaticism than he was of indifference or lukewarmness. . . . I have heard it said that in the earlier part of his life, Mr. Hallam was somewhat severe and imperious, but he had endured great domestic afflictions. He had lost his wife and several children, among them his eldest son Arthur, a young man of rare distinction, to whose memory Tennyson, his friend, has consecrated one of the most beautiful works of moral poetry, ‘In Memoriam.’ Instead of embittering and rendering him gloomy, misfortune and advancing age had upon Mr. Hallam the effect of rendering him gentle and affable. Every trace of asperity vanished from his manner; he preserved all his alertness of mind, all his literary and social tastes, and seemed to enjoy existence as one may who finds it sweet yet, and desires to render it sweet to those who surround him, although having known acute griefs, he can never, in the depths of his soul, love it as before. . . . A rare man, and modest as he was rare, lacking only a little more brilliancy in his mental endowment, and a somewhat more ardent desire for success, to have had over the public as much power as he obtained esteem and affection from those who knew him well.

THE NATURAL HISTORY MUSEUM, SOUTH KENSINGTON.

“I was not equally intimate with Lord Macaulay, and even after seeing him frequently, my acquaintance was still rather with the author than with the man. Before we met I had admired his brilliant skill in gathering facts, in grouping them, in giving life to them, and transforming the narrative into a drama, while, in the character of a spectator of this drama, he followed each actor with his observations and his criticisms; he excelled in throwing a flood of light and color over the past, and bringing it constantly face to face with the ideas and manners of the present. When I personally knew Lord Macaulay, I enjoyed even keenly the pleasure of admiring him; the harmony was perfect between the man and the artist, the causeur and the writer. Lord Macaulay's conversation exactly resembled his writings; the same rich and ready memory, the same facile impetuosity of thought, the same wealth of imagination, the same cast of reflections, at once natural and piquant. It was as pleasant and almost as profitable to hear him as to read him. And when, after so many extraordinary and charming essays, he published his great work, — the "History of England from the Accession of James II." — the same merits appeared with even more abundance and brilliancy. I know no history where the past and the historian who narrates it live more intimately and familiarly together.

"Lord Macaulay paints the events and the men of the eighteenth century with as much detail, and with as brilliant colors, as if they had been his own contemporaries. It is a method full of power and charm, but leading to that peril which Lord Macaulay has not always escaped. I often feel in reading it a regret at meeting in history the party spirit of politics. I do not desire to think or to speak ill of political parties. They are the necessary elements of a free government. I have passed many years of my life in this arena, and I know how indispensable it is, in order to strive successfully, in order to govern, and, equally, in order to make a strong opposition, that one should be surrounded by a compact, disciplined, permanent party. The Whigs and Tories have made for two centuries the strength of authority and of liberty in England. But parties and party-spirit have their rightful place only in active and actual political life. When the historian goes back into the past, when he opens tombs, he owes to the dead whom he calls forth a complete and scrupulous justice; he is bound, in bringing them again upon the stage, to exhibit clearly the ideas and convictions which actuated them in life; he must do justice to their interests and their rights, and never mingle with their ashes the hot coals of our own fires. Lord Macaulay has not obeyed this law, which concerns truth as well as historic equity. He has at times carried into his narrative, and especially into his judgments of facts and of men, the passion and prejudice with which the Whig party has fought its battles both ancient and modern. And I have reason indeed to believe that he was himself aware of this. As he went on with his great work, he disengaged himself more and more from his earlier methods. The justice of the historian got the better of the habits of political life. He was much more impartial in his history of William III. than in that of James II., and especially, than in his summary of the reigns of Charles I. and Charles II. He has judged the Whigs of 1692 more severely than he did the Republicans of 1648. . . .

“In 1840, during my residence in England as ambassador, I had a striking proof of the extent and the charm of Lord Macaulay’s historical knowledge. He offered to serve me as cicerone in a visit to Westminster Abbey, that famous church peopled with the dead, interred at random,—kings, queens, soldiers, statesmen, magistrates, orators, authors, private individuals; some, illustrious, placed there by public admiration and gratitude: others, obscure, thus honored only by domestic affection or vanity. Queen Elizabeth and Mary, Queen of Scots, Buckingham and Monk, Lord Chatham and Lord Mansfield, Pitt and Fox, Shakespeare, Milton, Newton, Gray, Addison, Watts,—destinies and natures the most diverse placed side by side; heaven’s peace between men after the hatreds and rivalries of earth. I was not shocked, as many have seemed to be, at the great number of obscure names. What matters that to the illustrious dead? They are none the less conspicuous, none the less alone. There is no crowd there; the tombs are not in each other's way and do not conceal one another; the visitor stops only before those which contain an immortal. . . . For three or four hours I walked with Lord Macaulay through this monumental gallery of the English nation and of English families. At every step I stopped or he stopped me, and, now replying to my questions, now anticipating them, he explained to me an allegorical monument, recalled to me a forgotten fact, related to me a scarcely-known anecdote, or recited to me some fine passage from the writers or orators whose names we met.

“We passed before the monument of Lord Chatham, who stands erect, his head thrown back, and his arm lifted as with an orator's gesture; at his feet a modest stone bears the name of his son, William Pitt, and occupies the place for the moment until the completion and erection of the monument which is to be consecrated to him. ‘Would you not say,’ Macaulay said to me, ‘that the father is standing there, pronouncing the funeral oration of his son?’ And, upon this, some of the finest orations of Lord Chatham and Mr. Pitt recurring to his memory, he repeated to me many extracts from them. The tombs of the great authors, prose-writers, and poets, awakened in him the same abundance and raciness of recollection. Milton and Addison were his favorites, and he detained me several minutes before their names, recalling to me facts of their history or quoting passages from their works, with an evident pleasure in reciting almost as great as my own in listening to him. We passed near a bas-relief, which represented an incident in the war between England and the American colonies struggling for their independence. ‘Notice that figure which has lost its head,’ said Macaulay; ‘that is Washington's. Some ardent English patriot, still exasperated against this rebel chief, revenged himself upon him by secretly breaking his head. The figure was repaired; it was found again broken, and the attempt to restore it was abandoned. Observe how patriots of one country understand and treat those of a rival country.' The visit to the Abbey was full of interest and delight; like the great dead of Italy when Dante passed, the most illustrious personages in English history and literature came forth from their tombs, at the voice of one who so worthily represented them."

Lord Macaulay, while yet young, went to join the illustrious crowd, among whom he had led M. Guizot, and many of those who, like himself, were students of history at the beginning of Queen Victoria's reign are, like himself, dead. Tytler brought down his History of Scotland to the period when the two crowns were united, in 1603; Lord Mahon's History of England fills an important interval in historic narrations, the author's conscientiousness and impartiality of research doubling its value. Before, in his turn, quitting the scene, he was also to raise to his illustrious kinsman, William Pitt, a monument worthy of him, by its sagacity and patriotic fairness. Mr. Grote and Bishop Thirlwall were at this time occupied with their great Histories of Greece, works which reached completion before the death of their eminent authors. Dr. Arnold had scarcely more than commenced his History of Rome when he died, in 1842, leaving, however, in the great school at Rugby, a monument, perhaps more noble and durable, of his strong and salutary influence over the minds and hearts of the young. The history of modern times has been drawn by Lord Brougham with that fire and energy which distinguished his sketches of the statesmen of George III.'s reign; and Sir William Napier has told the great story of the Peninsular War, in which himself and his family bore so conspicuous a part.

The ever-rising wave of historic labors has not fallen back in the second part of Queen Victoria's reign; but with a few exceptions, it has been less brilliant. The most eminent historic writers had finished their work before the Crimean War, or were hastening to complete it before it should escape from their hands.

The crowd of novels, at once distinguished in their literary merit and unexceptionable in their morals, which have signalized the reign of Queen Victoria, are a great and rare good fortune to England. Sir Walter Scott may be said to have opened this path of moral and intellectual relaxation. He pursued it in the historic romance; and others have followed him afar off. Ainsworth and G. P. R. James have multiplied their pictures of past days in works extremely unequal in literary value and in historic exactitude. Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton has made bold and brilliant excursions into this domain, as into all the other territories of romantic art; while among the most illustrious of its modern representatives, Thackeray has retraced two important epochs of the history of England, with a knowledge and skill as admirable as his talent.

But it is to another end that the romantic literature of our time seems especially to have devoted itself in England. In painting manners and the social condition, the novelist has almost constantly pursued an aim, at one time economic, like Miss Martineau in her tales of political economy; at another, moral and philanthropic, like Dickens, Thackeray, Kingsley, Mrs. Gaskell, and others.

Not only has the novelist's art in England, at our epoch, had the honor to fall into honorable hands, habitually depicting pure manners, or touching upon corruption with a high-mindedness and a delicacy of pencil, which the most distinguished of our French novelists have so lacked that the judgment of the whole world has been thereby deceived in respect to the moral and social state of France, but a great number among the authors of modern English romances have regarded, and do regard, their art as a talent for which they must give account, as a weapon put into their hands to defend the cause of justice, charity, and eternal truth. We are bound to say, to the honor of the women who, in our time, stand in the first rank of English novelists,—some already gone from earth, as Mrs. Gaskell and Charlotte Bronte; others still at work with an incomparable strength of study and talent, as the author of Adam Bede and Romola,* or devoted to the moral improvement of those whom they instruct while they amuse them, as Mrs. Dinah Muloch Craik, and Miss Yonge,—all have exercised over their age a deep and salutary influence. They have led their readers into a region whose air is not merely pure, but also healthful and strength-giving; they have put at the service of their country and their generation a talent of observation, the rectitude of a moralist, an elevation of thought and sentiment, often served by the finest intelligence and the acutest talent, thus contributing to the moral reputation of England throughout the world. Painfully in contrast with this are the pictures heaped up in France by men pretending to depict the manners of a social life to which they are and must be strangers, or to paint the domestic life of honest homes into which their works never penetrate.

Neither novelists nor poets have been lacking to modern England, and, like the novelists, the poets have led the English public into a pure and elevated region. No one has more perfectly merited this praise than Mr. Tennyson, and his influence over the mind and the imagination of his time is to the honor both of the public and of the poet. At times obscure and eccentric in his genius, Browning has had aims no less high, and his wife has walked before him in those lofty paths. Names crowd beneath the pen, of poets of the second rank, among whom it would have been unjust to place Mr. Matthew Arnold, had he not divided his mental work into such diverse fields that his poetic compositions lack the abundance necessary to place him in the highest rank.

* Marian Evans Cross (George Eliot), author of Scenes of Clerical Life, Adam Bede, The Mill on the Floss, Silas Marner, Romola, Middlemarch, Daniel Deronda, and other works, died Dec. 22, 1880. — Tr.

The slightly naturalistic tendency of the poems of Mr. William Morris belongs to a more recent epoch in the reign of Queen Victoria. The same falling off in the moral element can be detected among the novelists of the later period. Here lies a danger, and the ranks of the defence are becoming aware of this. England has need to put herself on guard, and to protect the imaginations and hearts of her children, the very ramparts of a social state unique in the world's history, and threatened at the present day with the invasion of a destructive democracy.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE CRIMEAN WAR.

THE Duke of Wellington, the most illustrious representative of the great European wars, was dead ; at the head of affairs in England was Lord Aberdeen, a man ardently attached to a peace policy, both by natural disposition and by the ever-present memory of those evils of war which he had labored to assuage in 1814, at the opening of his career ; and yet, a certain anxiety pervaded the minds of all. A breath of war seemed beginning to blow over Europe once more. The increasing power of the Emperor Nicholas, and his views upon the Eastern question, gave offence to England ; he was unfriendly to French influence at other points. Diplomatic foresight took the alarm, and the public mind at once shared in the anxiety

Russia was at this time involved in a dispute with France on the question of the rights of the Greek clergy, or of the Latin monks, to the custody of the sanctuaries at Jerusalem, Nazareth, and Bethlehem. The possession of these holy places was regarded by each Power as a proof of supremacy in the East, as a symbol of the all-powerful protection extended by the one, over all Roman Catholics in the East ; by the other, over the children of the Greek Church, to whatever nationality they might belong. Already the emperor was beginning to exercise his right and fulfil his duty of defending the numerous subjects of the Porte who professed the Orthodox faith. In the czar's mind, as well as in that of his predecessors, this efficient and decisive protection was intimately connected with the possession of Constantinople, that promised city, which the old Russian language called Tzar-grad,—the city of the czars. Crowded hard by Russia and by France, obliged to yield to the one, and fearing to offend the other, the Turkish government had placed itself in the wrong towards Russia, by failing to perform all that it had promised. The Greek clergy at Jerusalem complained that they had not been allowed all the concessions which had been promised at Constantinople. — The Emperor Nicholas was both angry and anxious on this subject. He knew the English ministry to be less favorable to the policy of the Emperor Napoleon than its predecessors had been. Lord Palmerston was Home Secretary, and Lord John Russell had the charge of foreign affairs; an intimate alliance with England seemed possible, and, with her, the czar could dictate his own terms to Turkey and to the rest of Europe. He opened the subject to Sir G. Hamilton Seymour, English ambassador at St. Petersburg, at a ball given by the Grand Duchess Helena, on the 9th of January, 1583. After protesting his friendship towards the new ministry, and particularly Lord Aberdeen: “You know my feelings toward England,” said the czar; “it is essential that the two governments, that is to say,—the English government and I, I and the English government,—should be on the best terms; and the necessity was never greater than at present. I beg you to convey these words to Lord John Russell. When we are agreed, I am quite without anxiety as to the rest of Europe; it is immaterial what the others may think or do. As to Turkey, that is another question; that country is in a critical state, and may give us all a great deal of trouble.”

The czar was about to turn away, after these vague but significant words, but the English ambassador was very anxious to hear more. He ventured to question the emperor, who, after a little hesitation, continued: "The affairs of Turkey are in a very disorganized condition; the country itself seems to be falling to pieces. . . . Stay: we have on our hands a sick man, a very sick man; it will be, I tell you frankly, a great misfortune if one of these days he should slip away from us, especially before all necessary arrangements were made. But, however, this is not the time to speak to you on that matter."

A MOHAMMEDAN AT PRAYER.

And, in fact, a fortnight later, Sir Hamilton Seymour was summoned to the palace, and there, in a confidential interview with the czar, was enlightened as to the designs which were fermenting in the brain of the autocratic master of the Russian empire. He referred to the Empress Catherine the origin of those dreams of Oriental dominion, which he had not however inherited, he said. But, while desiring no increase of territory for himself, he was bound to watch over the interests of the Greek Christians, subjects of Turkey. "The right of doing so is secured to me by treaty," said the emperor. "I may truly say that I make a moderate and sparing use of my right, and I will freely confess that it is one which is attended with obligations occasionally very inconvenient; but I cannot recede from the discharge of a distinct duty. Our religion came to us from the East, and there are feelings, as well as obligations, which must never be lost sight of. Now Turkey, in the condition which I have described, has, by degrees, fallen into such a state of decrepitude that, as I told you the other night, eager as we all are for the prolonged existence of the man,—and that I am as desirous as you can be for the continuance of his life,—I beg you to believe he may suddenly die upon our hands; we cannot recuscitate what is dead; if the Turkish Empire falls, it falls to rise no more; and I put it to you, therefore, whether it is not better to be provided beforehand for a contingency, than to incur the chaos, confusion, and the certainty of a European war,—all of which must attend the catastrophe if it should occur unexpectedly, and before some ulterior system has been sketched. This is the point to which I am desirous that you should call the attention of your government. . . . I tell you plainly that if England thinks of establishing herself one of these days at Constantinople, I will not allow it. . . . For my part, I am equally disposed to take the engagement not to establish myself there, as proprietor, that is to say; for, as occupier, I do not say. It might happen that circumstances, if no provision were made,—if everything should be left to chance,—might place me in the position of occupying Constantinople.”

To these overtures of the czar, as communicated by the English ambassador, the English government replied, complimenting the Emperor Nicholas upon the wise policy he had so long pursued, and admitting the utility of an agreement among the great Powers on the subject of Turkish affairs, upon condition that Austria and France should also take part in the transactions which England would not decline, acting in the interest of the Ottoman Empire. The English government thus placed itself in the attitude of expecting the prolonged existence of this “sick man,” whose estates the czar was already scheming to divide.

The Emperor Nicholas did not regard himself as defeated. “If your government,” he said, a month later to Sir Hamilton Seymour, “has been led to believe that Turkey retains any elements of resistance, your government must have received incorrect information. I repeat to you that the sick man is dying, and we can never allow such an event to take us by surprise. We must come to some understanding. . . . I have confidence in the English government. It is not an engagement, a convention which I ask of them; it is a free interchange of ideas, and in case of need, the word of a gentleman; that is enough between us. . . . You observe there are certain things that I will never allow: as regards ourselves first, I do not desire the permanent occupation of Constantinople by the Russians, as I have already told you; but I am not willing on the other hand that Constantinople should ever be occupied by the English or by the French, or by any of the great Powers. Neither will I permit a reconstruction of the Byzantine Empire, nor that Greece should receive such an accession of territory as would make her a state of any importance. Still less could I allow the empire of Turkey to be broken up into little republics, to afford shelter to the Kossuths, the Mazzinis, and the other revolutionary leaders of Europe. Rather than endure any such arrangements, I would make war, and carry it on as long as a man and a gun were left in my Empire. . . . Oh! I see clearly, you think in England that it is better to put off the crisis as long as possible, and keep the Ottoman Empire alive. This is what my chancellor tells me every day. But the crisis will come; it is inevitable, and we shall not be ready for it. In regard to Egypt, I understand perfectly the importance of that territory for England. In case of a division after the fall of the Ottoman Empire, if you were to take possession of Egypt, I should offer no objection. I say the same in regard to Candia; that island may be useful to you; and I see no reason why it should not belong to England."

This was making proposals and offering temptations in too distinct a form. The necessity of reserve had been felt by the czar himself, in 1844, when, in communicating to England his views on the Eastern question in a memorandum drawn up by Count Nesselrode, he had expressed the conviction that it was for the common interest of both England and Russia that the Ottoman Empire should be maintained. The czar also declared at that time that in the event of the destruction of the Turkish Empire he should not be willing to have England take possession of Constantinople, and for himself disclaimed any intention so to do. "In the uncertainty which hovers over the future," continues the memorandum, "a single fundamental idea seems to admit of a really practical application, that is, that the danger which may result from a catastrophe in Turkey will be much diminished if, in the event of its occurrence, Russia and England have come to an understanding as to the course to be taken by them in common. That understanding will be the more beneficial inasmuch as it will have the full assent of Austria, between whom and Russia there already exists an entire accord."

The appeal and the temptation were both replied to by Lord Clarendon, who succeeded Lord John Russell in the Foreign Office. England, he said, desired no territorial aggrandizement, and could not participate in any arrangement by which she was to receive an advantage of that sort. Nor could she enter into any combination which must be secret from the rest of Europe. Lord Clarendon declared that it was the conviction of the queen's government that Turkey only needed indulgence on the part of her allies, their avoidance of any measures humiliating to the sultan's dignity and independence, and lastly, to receive from them that friendly support, which, among states as well as among individuals, the weak have always a right to expect from the strong.

This indulgence and consideration was precisely what the czar had resolved not to manifest towards Turkey. Already (February 28th) Prince Mentschikoff, one of the principal dignitaries of the Russian empire, had arrived at Constantinople, accompanied by a numerous and important staff. Relying upon former treaties, the prince demanded, in the name of the Emperor Nicholas, an express engagement on the part of the sultan, securing to the czar the exclusive protectorate over the Christian subjects of the Porte. On the 5th of May, a formal ultimatum was addressed on this subject to the ministers of the sultan, Prince Mentschikoff, meanwhile, attempting to obtain from the sultan personally the concessions which he had hitherto failed to wring from the vizier.

VIEW OF CONSTANTINOPLE.

The alarm in Constantinople was extreme at first, but was soon in some degree abated by the support of the English ambassador, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, and by the even more significant attitude of France. On the 10th, a reply was made by the Turkish minister, in which it was declared to be the intention of the Porte to maintain unimpaired the rights of all the tributary subjects of the empire, and a willingness was expressed to negotiate with Russia concerning the Holy Places at Jerusalem; but the reply objected to that portion of the demands of Russia which concerned a protectorate of the Greek church in Turkey. Prince Mentschikoff was extremely offended. He did not, however, at once leave Constantinople, but a further interchange of notes ended finally by the departure of the Russian envoy on the 22d of May

The czar had already taken his precautions in prospect of this negative response from Turkey. As early as the 6th of March, Colonel Rose, English chargé d'affaires, wrote to his government that Russia was advancing her forces into Turkish territory, and provisioning her army in Moldavia and Wallachia, without having indicated to the Porte her causes of complaint; "a thing unheard-of," wrote the chargé, "and contrary to the rights of civilized nations." The intention of Russia was manifestly, in Colonel Rose's judgment, either to destroy the independence of Turkey or to make war upon her. On the 2d of July, the Russian columns crossed the Pruth, and three days later Prince Gortschakoff entered Bucharest. Meanwhile, on the 2d of June, the British fleet under Admiral Dundas was ordered to the neighborhood of the Dardanelles; and three days later, the French squadron received instructions to proceed to Besika Bay.

The English government had for a long time persisted in a benevolent incredulity with respect to the ambitious designs of the Emperor Nicholas upon Turkey. She was at last obliged to recognize them ; but the first steps in opposition to that aggressive policy were to be made by France. The latter country had no direct and personal interest in the question. France had not to guard, as had England, the road toward Oriental supremacy, but the balance of power in Europe was endangered, and also an occasion was offered for an English alliance, and the Emperor Napoleon was impelled towards it by that blending of personal obstinacy and vague hopes which so often characterized his policy. The combined action of France and England was sustained by Austria and Prussia in so far as it remained a question of diplomacy, the German Powers being disinclined to actual war.

For some time a conference was in session at Vienna, proposing expedients, preparing notes, lured by the apparent concessions of the czar, irritated by the obstinate resistance of the Turks. A note was finally submitted to Turkey, backed by the recommendations of the four Powers ; but the Turkish government refused to accept the terms, which virtually were the same as those proposed by Prince Mentschikoff, in May. The Vienna note, although recommended by the four Powers, was really the work of the Austrian representative, Count Buol, and has long since come to be regarded as a trap laid by Russia through Austria. That the sultan ventured to refuse it is now well understood to have been in great measure due to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, the English ambassador in Turkey, who, while laboring assiduously to secure peace, had too wise a judgment and sincere a regard for the right to allow Turkey to be sacrificed.

The sultan summoned his grand council, composed of nearly two hundred of the most distinguished men in the Turkish

A BULGARIAN SOLDIER

Empire; and this council at once recommended that Prince Gortschakoff be summoned to quit the Principalities within fifteen days, his refusal to be regarded as a commencement of hostilities.

For Turkey, the war had commenced. For France and England, it was soon to begin; but even before that moment, the French and English fleets were ordered to enter the Dardanelles.

The first efforts of the Turks were crowned with success. Omar Pasha coolly and skilfully resisted Prince Gortschakoff; at certain points even, he took the offensive. Europe was yet depending upon the promised moderation of Russia, who designed merely, she said, to occupy the Principalities for the purpose of compelling Turkey to treat with her, when, on the 30th of November, the Russian Black Sea fleet, which had been for some days hovering in the neighborhood, attacked a Turkish squadron lying in the harbor of Sinope; the action was short and sharp, the Turkish fleet was entirely destroyed, and the town of Sinope suffered severely from the bombardment. One steam-vessel alone escaped, and carried news of the disaster to Constantinople.

German diplomacy essayed to extenuate the character of the blow struck at Sinope, but England and France at once recognized it as a casus belli. Lord Clarendon at once directed Sir Hamilton Seymour to give notice to Russia that a repetition of the affair at Sinope must be prevented, and that every Russian ship thenceforward met in the Black Sea would be requested, and if necessary, constrained, to return to Sevastopol, or to the nearest Russian port. "We shall hold the Black Sea as a pledge until the evacuation of the Principalities and the restoration of peace," were the words of M. Drouyn de Lhuys, Minister of Foreign Affairs in France. On the 4th of January, 1854, the fleets of England and France moved up, and entered the Black Sea. Diplomatic relations were broken off between France and England on the one side, and Russia on the other, and the ambassadors of the respective countries received orders to quit their posts.

“There remains to us the shadow of a shadow of hope,” said Lord Fitzwilliam in the House of Lords, at this critical moment. The Emperor Napoleon wrote personally to the czar. “If your Majesty,” he said, “desires as much as I do a peaceful conclusion, what more simple than to declare that an armistice shall be signed to-day, that affairs shall resume their diplomatic course, that all hostilities shall cease, and all belligerent forces be withdrawn from the places to which reasons of war have called them. Thus the Russian troops will abandon the Principalities, and our squadrons the Black Sea. Your Majesty, preferring to negotiate directly with Turkey, might appoint a plenipotentiary to deal with a Turkish plenipotentiary, their agreement to be submitted for confirmation to the four great Powers. If your Majesty will accept this plan, upon which the Queen of England and myself are perfectly agreed, peace is restored, and all the world is content. But if, through motives difficult to comprehend, your Majesty refuses it, then France as well as England will be obliged to leave to the decision of arms and the hazards of war that which to-day might be decided by reason and justice.”

The national pride of Russia and the personal will of the czar were equally opposed to this proposal of an arrangement at the last moment. “I learn,” replied the Emperor of Russia on the 8th of February, “that, while protecting the re-victualling of Turkish garrisons upon their own territory, the two Powers have resolved to forbid to us the navigation of the Black Sea, that is to say, apparently the right to bring supplies to our own coasts. I leave your Majesty to judge if this will facilitate the conclusion of peace, and if in the alternative proposed to me, I can discuss, examine even for a moment, its propositions of an armistice, of the immediate evacuation of the Principalities, and of negotiation with the Porte of an agreement to be finally submitted to a conference of the four Powers? If you were yourself, sire, in my place, would you accept a similar proposition? Would your national feeling permit it to you? I boldly answer, no. Whatever may be your Majesty's decision, I shall not draw back before threats. My confidence is in God and in my right; and Russia, I can answer for it, will know how to show herself the same in 1854 that she was in 1812." The remembrance of the disasters which had overwhelmed the Emperor Napoleon I. and the Grand Army during the terrible campaign in Russia, added strength to Russian hopes and Russian obstinacy. "Are we not now the same Russian nation of whose deeds of valor the memorable events of 1812 bear witness?" said the imperial manifesto of the 11th of April, 1854. "May the Almighty assist us to prove this by deeds!" On the day following the battle of the Alma, the Emperor Nicholas still held the same language: "Sevastopol may be taken, our fleet may be destroyed, the Crimea may be lost by us for a time. Great sacrifices may become necessary in order to dislodge the enemy. All these events shall not make me forget what I owe to the honor of Russia, and what Russia has the right to expect of me. Though any or all of them should occur, my language and my determination will remain the same."

It was in this spirit of haughty and indomitable resolution that the czar received, on the 17th of March, the joint summons of France and England to withdraw his troops from the Principalities. A refusal, even though tacit, would be regarded as a declaration of war. "The emperor does not think it becoming to make any reply," Count Nesselrode said to the consuls of France and England, who had waited upon him to receive the answer of the czar. On the 27th of March, a message from the queen and a message from the Emperor Napoleon to the Houses of the two nations respectively, announced to all the world that war was declared between France and England, coming to the assistance of Turkey, on the one side, and Russia on the other, Austria and Prussia limited themselves to a proclamation of the necessity of maintaining the Ottoman Empire, and an agreement to enter into negotiation with no Power which should not from the beginning recognize the fundamental principle of the integrity of the Turkish territory.

Peace had now reigned in Europe for forty years; the nations had unlearned the terrible art of war. Among the French, a series of campaigns in Algeria had kept up the military spirit natural to the nation; but the ability to organize great armies, the skilful and prudent administration which had once distinguished the French generals, had disappeared, and a presumptuous levity had often taken the place of experience. Diplomatic hesitations had been so prolonged, attempts at reconciliation had been so persistent, that it would seem as if military preparations might have been completed on both sides of the channel. This, however, was not the case. When war movements were first decided upon, their magnitude was not determined, and more and more troops were collected every day; while the transportation, the commissariat, and even the command of the forces, remained as yet unprovided for. The haste with which preparations were carried forward was prejudicial to their efficiency. Marshal St. Arnaud, a brilliant soldier of fortune, whose life had been flung from one adventure to another up to the time when he had assisted in the coup d'état of the 2d of December, had been placed by the Emperor Napoleon at the head of the French army. Upon his arrival at Gallipoli, where the troops were gathered, he wrote to his sovereign: "I say with regret to your Majesty that we are not organized nor in a condition to carry on war, as we are now; we have here but twenty-four pieces of field artillery, and five hundred horse, including chasseurs and dragoons. The rest, personnel and matériel, is detained at sea by northerly winds, and will arrive God knows when. Our situation is yet more unfortunate in the matter of provisions. I have biscuit for ten days, and I ought to have enough for three months at the least. It has been thought that I was jesting when I asked for three million rations, which would be only enough to last fifty thousand men twenty days, and it was proposed to give me one million; no calculation could be more incorrect. It is impossible to make war without bread, without shoes, canteens, and camp-kettles. I am left with two hundred and fifty pair of shoes, forty camp-kettles, and about two hundred and fifty canteens. I beg pardon of your Majesty for these details, but they will prove to the emperor the difficulties which surround an army six hundred leagues distant from its supplies. It is no one's fault, it is the result of the haste with which every thing necessarily has been done. The troops were sent out in steam-vessels, and supplies, munitions, and horses in sailing-vessels; the men arrive and there is nothing here for them. We must allow forty days at least for sailing-vessels to come from France or Spain to Gallipoli."

The commander-in-chief of the English forces, Lord Raglan, formerly aide-de-camp, under the name of Lord Fitzroy Somerset, to the Duke of Wellington, had learned the art of war on a grand scale, under the auspices of his illustrious chief; he was reasonable, moderate, and of brilliant personal bravery. Lord Raglan found himself often embarrassed by the rapid evolutions and the changes of plan of his French colleagues. Marshal St. Arnaud formed designs; he prevailed on Lord Raglan to agree in them, sometimes against the latter's will; then he himself became aware of the disadvantages of his own plans, and the English commander-in-chief was compelled to announce to the English government the relinquishment of the designs he had but just now explained to them. When the allied armies, thirty thousand French, and twenty thousand English, finally selected Varna for the base of their operations, the plans of the commanders had been repeatedly changed and modified, and the decisive advance was not yet determined upon.

The resistance offered to the Russian forces by a small Turkish town had given the allies time to complete their movements, and at last collect their resources. The 19th of May Silistria had been besieged by the Russians, and Omar Pasha, the Turkish commander-in-chief, already regarded the place as lost. "Silistria will infallibly be taken," he said to Marshal St. Arnaud and Lord Raglan, when the two generals visited him in his camp at Schouvala. "I hope the place may hold out six weeks, but it may be taken in a fortnight. I am not strong enough to go to its help. I should be destroyed without having done any good." On the 20th of June Silistria was yet holding out, its Turkish garrison having been cheered and directed by two young English officers, and afterwards by a third, who had come thither of their own free will. On the 23d of June the Russians raised the siege, and retreated across the Danube.

Meanwhile the allied forces had gradually arrived at Varna, and were now encamped in the neighborhood of the town, at the foot of a spur of the Balkan range. The country was rich and picturesque; everywhere were gardens and cultivated fields. By degrees the material, so painfully lacking at the outset, had been accumulated, and was at the generals' orders; and now only the great question remained to be decided: upon what point should the blows of the allies be directed, upon what side should they make their attack?

The Emperor Napoleon assumed to direct, from afar, the operations of his army; and his orders succeeded one another by telegraph, contradictory at times, and difficult to understand, varying from day to day, as the somewhat vague will of the master was modified by events or negotiations. The Duke of Newcastle, the English war minister, was ardent and resolute, and he also took his share in the councils of the distant army. It was in London that the final plan was determined, and it was accepted, not without hesitation, by the French Emperor. When Lord Raglan received orders from home to direct his operations against the Crimea, the two generals had scarcely thought such a resolution possible. "The Crimea has been my favorite idea," wrote the French marshal to his brother. "I have studied its plans assiduously. At first I regarded the conquest as a fine and important stroke; but I have seen the embarking and disembarking of troops, and am of opinion that to make a descent upon the Crimea immense preparations are needful,—an entire campaign, a hundred thousand men, perhaps, and all the resources of the French and English fleets united, with a thousand transport ships besides."

MAP OF THE

Scale

On the 9th of July, Marshal St. Arnaud wrote to the emperor: "I have expressed to your Majesty all my own views, those of Lord Raglan and of the two admirals, on the subject of the Crimea. To undertake a great thing, great appliances are necessary; we have absolutely none. For six months the Minister of the Marine has been plied with appeals from all quarters for lighters, launches, flat-boats, and all the means for debarkation, which will be needed by an army operating in the presence of a strong and watchful enemy. A week ago the minister replied, in a letter which has been shown me by Admiral Hamelin, that the subject was under consideration. Sire, a year of preparation is necessary to make a descent upon the Crimea with any chance of success."

Lord Raglan's opinion coincided with that of his French colleague. Admiral Dundas said frankly, that he could undertake to land the army on the coast of the Crimea, but not to supply it, nor to bring it back.

Marshal Bugeaud used to say, "What I require is a government." In their secret souls, notwithstanding the independence of their language, and even of their thoughts, most generals feel as he did, that they have need of the organized strength of the government of their country. Lord Raglan had no lack of orders from home. Upon the minds of the English ministers was deeply impressed the same conviction which had led Count Pozzo di Borgo to say, in 1838: "Although it is scarcely probable that we shall ever see an English fleet in the Black Sea, it will be prudent to fortify Sevastopol against an attack from the sea. If the English ever are at war with us, they will direct their attacks against this point, if they think success possible."

The English fleet was now in the Black Sea, and the Russian fleet was collected at Sevastopol. An attack upon Sevastopol was evidently the most useful thing for English interests. "The heaviest blow which could be struck at the southern extremity of the Russian empire," wrote the Duke of Newcastle to Lord Raglan, June 29th, 1854, "would be the taking or destruction of Sevastopol. . . . The difficulties of the siege . . . appear to be more likely to increase than diminish by delay, and as there is no prospect of a safe and honorable peace until the fortress is reduced and the fleet taken or destroyed, it is on all accounts most important that nothing but insuperable impediments — such as the want of ample preparations by either army, or the possession by Russia of a force in the Crimea greatly outnumbering that which can be brought against it — should be allowed to prevent the early decision to undertake these operations."

Lord Raglan accepted the orders of government with that calm, though somewhat sad resolution which was constantly manifested in his conduct. Marshal St. Arnaud at once entered into the plan with an ardor which swept away from before his eyes all those difficulties which he had lately himself pointed out; a reconnoissance of the coast near Sevastopol was projected under the orders of General Canrobert and Sir George Brown, accompanied by several French and English officers of experience.

Meantime the cholera had broken out among the allied troops. From the time of their arrival in the neighborhood of Constantinople the French army had suffered constantly and severely; the English had been more exempt from disease, and their hospital arrangements were less complete. But during the month of August the cholera became a virulent epidemic, ravaging not only the camps, but also raging on shipboard with such severity that on board a single ship a hundred and five men died in a few days. It was natural, therefore, that all awaited with the greatest impatience the results of the reconnoissance which would give, it was hoped, the signal for departure from a sea-coast which had proved so pestilential.

On the 28th of July, the brave and experienced men who had visited the Crimean coast returned to Varna. They reported favorably in respect to an invasion, and from this moment preparations were pushed forward with the greatest ardor. In vain did Omar Pasha from the Danube appeal for aid from the allies in driving the Russians out of the Principalities; in vain did the Austrian generals, keeping watch on the endangered frontier of their own country, urge, like Omar Pasha, the opportuneness of a joint attack. All the strength of the French and English armies scarcely sufficed for the expedition against Sevastopol. On the 7th of September, the English and French transports, guarded by the fleets of the two countries, set forth from Varna, and directed their course towards the southwest coast of the Crimea. The weather was favorable for the voyage, and on the 14th the landing on the Crimean coast commenced. Before leaving Varna the military ardor of the troops had been fired by the news of the bombardment and capture of Bomarsund, at the entrance of the Gulf of Bothnia. Upon the north and south the attack was simultaneous, and the soldiers of the Crimean armies confidently expected to carry Sevastopol as easily as the Baltic fleet had taken Bomarsund.

The point of debarkation selected by the allied forces was not far from the mouth of the river Alma, and about thirty-five miles from Sevastopol. Beyond this great military stronghold, now the object of all hopes and efforts, lay the port of Balaklava, separated from Sevastopol by a promontory.

The debarkation continued during five days, and on the evening of the 18th there had been landed on the coast of the Crimea thirty-seven thousand French and Turks, with sixty-eight pieces of artillery, all under the command of Marshal St. Arnaud; and twenty-seven thousand English, with sixty guns, under the orders of Lord Raglan. The landing had been effected in perfect order and without disturbance; not an enemy had appeared. The weather was beautiful. "The sun, declining to the horizon," writes a French historian of the Crimean war, "bathed in crimson light a sight worthy of admiration: on the one side, upon the plateau, yesterday sombre and solitary, the activity of a sudden life; men in uniform with glittering weapons, alert and gay, cheerily preparing their bivouacs for the night; tents pitched, fires lighted, and further away towards the darkening east, the cavalry corps going out to establish, for the safety of all, the network of outposts and the chain of sentinels. On the other side, countless vessels, their black hulls rising out of the undulations of the sea, and the fine lace-work of their spars and rigging relieved against the crimson background of the sunset; finally, to complete the effect, the far-off accompaniment of the guns that had been heard to roar since noon, a feint made by the 4th French division at the mouth of the Alma, and as far along the coast as Katscha, with the design of distracting the attention of the enemy. Later, when the darkness came on, these ships returned to the rest of the fleet moored off the coast. The wind came up with the night, and a heavy storm broke over the encampment; the French soldiers in their well-sheltered tents were scarcely protected, while the English, who had not yet their arrangements completed, suffered much from the storm."

On the 19th of September the allied troops broke camp and began their march towards Sevastopol. "I am not disposed to stay forever before the place," wrote Marshal St. Arnaud, "and leave the Russian armies time to arrive from Perekop, and dispute my conquest. I wish to take Sevastopol quickly, and make myself master of the Crimea in order to be able to choose an advantageous battle-ground where I can wait for the Russians, that is, if I do not have time to hold the isthmus of Perekop against them. The very name of Sevastopol has had an effect like magic; everybody looks up, the coldest are excited. The general enthusiasm grows stronger daily. The cannon will do the rest." During the first day's march many from both armies fell behind. Some were overwhelmed by the heat of the sun, others were yet feeble from illness and unable to bear the fatigues of the march; it was in vain to tell them that they would be made prisoners by the Cossacks; exhaustion spoke louder than reason. When the troops arrived on the banks of the Bulganak, where it had been determined to bivouac for the night, it was necessary to send back a detachment to pick up the stragglers who had been left behind.

Before nightfall, a reconnoissance with four squadrons of cavalry, made in the direction of the Alma, encountered a Russian reconnoissance, behind which the keen eye of one of the English officers was able to detect what appeared to be, and in reality was, the main body of the Russian army drawn up on the left bank of the Alma, to prevent the advance of the allies. By a judicious retreat, the English squadrons were saved from destruction, but it became evident that a battle must take place at this point. It was apprehended that the Russians might issue from their entrenchments and be ready to fall upon the allies at the dawn of day. The troops therefore bivouacked in order of battle; but the night passed without disturbance, and before sunrise, on the morning of the 20th of September, the advance of the French and English commenced.

Prince Mentschikoff was personally in command of the Russian troops. His forces consisted of three thousand four hundred cavalry, thirty-three thousand infantry, and two thousand six hundred artillerymen, making in all thirty-nine thousand men, with one hundred and six guns. Besides this, he expected considerable reinforcements. He believed himself perfectly secure in the admirable position he had chosen, until enormous superiority in numbers and the fatigue of the enemy thus held at bay, would enable him to destroy them without difficulty. At the foot of his position flowed the Alma, bordering like a moat the high ground occupied by the Russian army. The little river, though strong and rapid, is shallow during the summer season, and has several fords; a wooden bridge existed, also, at the time of the action. All along the right bank are gardens and vineyards, enclosed by low walls. There were also two villages, somewhat more than a mile apart. The immediate approach to the river is gentle on the north side, but the ground on the south side has been cut away a good deal by the action of the spring torrents, and, at one point, a steep cliff rises almost vertically to a height of from eight to fifteen feet. The great high road coming from the north crosses the bridge and goes on towards Sevastopol through a ravine, by which the ascent is easy to the top of the plateau. This road made the weak point in the Russian position, and was defended by the heavy guns of a redoubt and by a great force of infantry, cavalry, and artillery.

It is not important to relate the details of a disorderly battle, feebly planned, and having no other object than by a direct attack in front to force the Russians to abandon their position and leave open to the allies the road to Sevastopol. Like most of the battles fought in Europe since the long peace, the battle of the Alma was rather an affair of officers and soldiers than of generals. There were the heights crowned by a brave and resolute army composed of men who were ready to die at their posts rather than give way; the Russian artillery was there, sweeping the ranks of the assailants; little it mattered to the indomitable valor of the English and French soldiers. They were resolved to conquer the position; and some running, others in formal order of march, as Marshal St. Arnaud said, the allies pushed the attack with equal ardor.

Shortly after one o'clock in the afternoon the battle began; at four o'clock it was over. The river had been crossed, the heights mounted, the redoubt carried, the Russians were in full retreat. Twice repulsed, but still returning to the attack, the English had made themselves masters of the Russian positions on the left of the ravine, while the French were establishing themselves on the plateau at the right. General Bosquet had been entrusted with the task of turning the enemy's flank. His movement had succeeded, and his guns soon overpowered the Russian artillery. But the sound seemed doubtful for a time. "I tell you those are the guns of Bosquet," cried the French marshal; "he has gained the position on the plateau: I see the red trousers; oh, I am certain that is my old Bosquet of Africa!" "Our soldiers have no longer a doubt;" he wrote on the 21st, "and still the Russians held their ground well yesterday. Three times we had to advance to the attack. They are good soldiers,—but the English and the French! what troops! what solidity on the one side, what ardor, what dash on the other! I have never seen a more splendid panorama than this battle! I ascended the heights in order to better observe the movements of the army; thence I could see the positions carried by our Zouaves and the English army advancing in line under the Russian fire. It was sublime. Lord Raglan's courage is of the antique mould; in the midst of balls and shells there is always the same composure."

At four o'clock the battle was over; the Russians were retreating, dreading a pursuit which might have brought upon them utter destruction. But the pursuit did not take place. The French cavalry was insufficient; for lack of transportation the horses had not been sent forward; and Marshal St. Arnaud, ill and worn out with fatigue, opposed the prolongation of the contest. Lord Raglan, who was better supplied with cavalry, reluctantly yielded to the wish of the French commander. The Russian loss was heavy; it was officially stated to be five thousand seven hundred and nine, but is believed to have been considerably greater. The English, who bore the heaviest of the battle, lost, in killed and wounded, about two thousand men; the French official account reports a loss of one thousand three hundred and thirty-nine.

For forty years Europe had been happily unused to the bitter joys of war; the news of the victory of the Alma excited raptures exaggerated by distance and novelty; no one in France or England doubted the speedy surrender of Sevastopol. The most moderate allowed the besieging forces a month in which to carry the place, and only a few persons of political sagacity ventured to doubt that the complete humiliation of the Russian power would immediately follow the entry of the allies into Sevastopol.

Confidence and enthusiasm were soon to be followed by discouragement and anxiety. A new feature in military operations was the presence in the English camp of the "special correspondent," intelligent, active, keen-sighted, to whom was entrusted the duty of sending home, at brief intervals, all the information that he could gather in respect to the condition of the army and the military operations which were going on. Among his brethren of the press, the correspondent of the Times, Mr. Russell, soon gained, both in England and in the Crimea, a reputation which overtopped those of the other journalists by as much as the importance of the newspaper to which he was attached surpassed others. From him England began to learn the sad condition of her army. The victory of the Alma had not conquered the cholera, of which the ravages, wrote Lord Raglan, extended to the very battle-field.

The fine order of the troops could not conceal the gaps of every kind daily manifested in the organization of the commissariat and of the hospital-service. The confusion in these departments was extreme; the ample supplies furnished by the English government were wasted, or never reached the sufferers who needed them. Some transport vessels had been lost at sea; others had landed their freight at remote points where it was totally useless. Inexperience was conspicuous at all points, and this just at the time when the hopes and illusions of the public and of the army were beginning to disappear. There was no more talk heard of taking Sevastopol by a coup de main, but rather of entering upon the formal siege of a place fortified in an unusual and irregular manner, and garrisoned by about thirty-two thousand men, under the command not only of some of the most important personages in the Russian Empire, Prince Mentschikoff, and the old admirals, Korniloff and Nachimoff, but also by Colonel Todleben, recently sent from the army of the Danube to that of the Crimea, and serving at first merely on the staff of Prince Mentschikoff, but soon after by his rare genius as a military engineer placed in the first rank, and united forever in history with the memory of the brave and skilful defence of Sevastopol.

The allies remained for two days upon the banks of the Alma, burying the dead and transporting the wounded to the ships. On the morning of the 23d of September, the two armies moved forward as far as the valley of the Katscha, where they bivouacked for the night. On the morning of the 24th, the intended advance towards Sevastopol was checked by news from the fleet that during the night of the 22d the Russian ships of war lying in the harbor of Sevastopol had been sunk by the Russians themselves, thus barring the entrance to the roadstead, and rendering impossible the co-operation of the allied fleet in the attack upon the town.

When Prince Mentschikoff fell back upon Sevastopol, he appears to have given up all hope of barring the approach of the allied armies, but there yet remained the possibility of keeping out the fleet from the great harbor of Sevastopol. He sent for Admiral Korniloff, and ordered him to sacrifice, to this end, the oldest and heaviest of the Russian ships, seven in number. The sailor at first refused: "I will never do it," he said. "In that case," replied the prince, "you will return to your post at Nicholayeff, after having given to Admiral Staniovitch the necessary orders." At this, Korniloff yielded, not being able to endure the idea of leaving Sevastopol in this hour of danger. He proceeded to give the orders which it broke his heart to speak, stifling the germs of resistance which showed themselves among the officers, and preaching resignation to the sailors.

"It is indeed cruel to destroy our navy," he said; "we had made great efforts to bring these unlucky ships to a perfection which excites the world's envy. But we must yield to a stern necessity. Moscow was burned, but Russia did not perish. On the contrary, she gained new strength. God is merciful. Doubtless He prepares to-day a like destiny for his faithful people. Let us then pray to the Lord, and not allow ourselves to be conquered by our powerful enemy!"

All day, on the 22d, the ships destined to bar with their sunken wrecks the entry to the harbor, lay at anchor in line between the two forts, Alexander and Constantine, not otherwise than as if they were made ready to sail out against the enemy. At six o'clock in the evening, upon Prince Mentschikoff's final and peremptory order, the crews began to dismantle them. Towards morning the work was completed; then, one after another, the great ships were scuttled, and sank amid the whirling waves. On the 23d, at daybreak, there remained above water only two of the victims mortally wounded and desperately struggling against death. One of them, the frigate Flora, went under a few minutes after sunrise. The other, a ship of a hundred and thirty guns, the most heavily armed of all the fleet, still floated, and seemed to cling to life. The agony of the marines crowded on the shore united with the long torture of the ship. At last, by order of the Admiral, the steam-frigate Thunder-Bearer poured a broadside into the colossus; it was the coup de grace; the great ship slowly settled to the water's edge, and in a few minutes disappeared from sight. The destruction of the Russian ships had been witnessed from a great distance, and the sound of the cannonading plainly heard by the allied fleets. Information of what had occurred was brought to the headquarters of the French and English armies early on the morning of the 24th, and occasioned an important change in the plans of the two generals.

- The city of Sevastopol is situated on the southwestern coast of the Crimea, partly on the northern and partly on the southern shore of an arm of the sea, which, with a breadth of about three-quarters of a mile, stretches inland to a distance of three miles and a half. This forms the "great harbor," or roadstead of Sevastopol, and it was across the entrance to this inlet that the ships were sunk. The entrance and the shores of this inlet were guarded by great casemated forts and enormous earthworks. On the high ground on the north side stood the Star

Fort, an octagon earth-work looking down upon the open sea to the west and upon the roadstead to the south. This fort had not been designed against attacks from the north, and was commanded by higher ground lying northward. On news of the approach of the allies the ground adjacent to the Star Fort had been strengthened in haste, and another earth-work erected further to the north, commanding the mouth of the Belbec, a point important to the allies as the landing-place for their siege-trains and other heavy munitions.

Notwithstanding these precautions, Prince Mentschikoff had not deemed the protection of the north side of the roadstead sufficient, and it was his design to abandon it and concentrate the defence on the south side, at the same time withdrawing with nearly all his army from the town, and taking up a position to the eastward, at Batschi Seräi, on the great high-road leading to the interior. In this way he would keep open his communications, and also be able to harass the allies to a degree which would prevent them from making a successful attack upon Sevastopol. During the night of the 24th, this design was carried into effect. The main army, with the exception of five thousand militia and one battalion of sappers, moved out of Sevastopol, crossing the valley of the Tchernaya, and ascended the Mackenzie Heights. The defence of the town was thus left almost entirely to the sailors. Vice-Admiral Korniloff had taken command of the forces on the north side. The seamen, withdrawn from the fleet to defend the south side, were under the orders of Vice-Admiral Nachimoff, and the small land-force left behind by Prince Mentschikoff was under the command of General Möller.

The south side of Sevastopol was much the larger and more important part of the town, containing the admiralty, the arsenal, great storehouses and docks, and barracks on a large scale. The main part of the town occupied a long hill, two hundred feet above the level of the sea; and parallel to this hill a creek, the prolongation of a deep ravine, makes a second and inner harbor, in which the largest men-of-war can ride at anchor close to the shore. South of the city lies a great plateau, crowning the promontory called by the Russians the Chersonese, which here extends ten miles westward into the sea. This plateau is deeply cleft by many ravines, running from south-east to north-west, prolonged, all along the northern side of the Chersonese, in creeks and inlets, like the inner harbor of Sevastopol. The southern side of the promontory, however, presents to the sea an unbroken wall of rock until the inlet and port of Balaklava are reached; and thence northward to a point on the Tchernaya, half a mile from the head of the roadstead of Sevastopol, another steep wall, rising to a height of from five to seven hundred feet, separates the plateau from the plain lying eastward. Only one gap in this rocky defence exists, at a point about three miles from the southern coast, and has been called the Col di Balaklava. The inlet, about three-quarters of a mile long, and half a mile wide, affords water deep enough for the largest ships. On the eastern shore of this little bay lies the town of Balaklava, little more than a single street of houses, surrounded by hills, a road leading northward through a gap in these hills. At about three miles beyond the town, this road, branching to the west, leads up through the Col to the summit of the plateau, and itself continues in a north-easterly direction, becoming the main road into the interior.

The sinking of the Russian ships of war had rendered it impossible for the allied fleet to enter the roadstead and co-operate in an attack on the north side, as had been at first designed. Even before this, the plan of a flank march around the head of the great harbor and an attack on the south, had been seriously considered, and now the question was at once decided. In a letter dated at six in the evening of the 24th, Marshal St. Arnaud wrote: "To-morrow morning early, I start and march upon Balaklava." And before noon of the 25th of September, the whole army, in one long column, was in motion. Lord Raglan was anxious to gain the high road at a spot called Mackenzie's Farm, and to reach this point it was necessary to strike across a low wooded country, almost without roads. Only a narrow lane led from the river to the farm, and this was taken by the artillery, while the infantry were obliged to force their way by compass through the forest, and the cavalry picked out a path where it was possible to find one. In this way the artillery went forward, the rest of the English troops following as best they might, and the French troops bringing up the rear. Just before the English advance reached the main road on the Mackenzie Heights, they encountered the rear of Prince Mentschikoff's army moving north-eastward. It was a surprise to both, and might have brought a great disaster upon the English army, but the Russians seemed to be unaware of their opportunity. A slight skirmish ensued, a little plunder was taken by the English, and both armies continued their march. From the Mackenzie Farm a steep road ran down to the Tchernaya, and on the banks of this stream the English bivouacked, while the French were not able to get further than the Mackenzie Farm. On the morning of the 26th, Lord Raglan, with the advance guard of his army, arrived in Balaklava, and almost simultaneously, an English man-of-war came into the harbor.

The next day the French divisions came up, and it was soon evident that the town and harbor were too small to receive both French and English. The French vessels therefore moved to the westward, and, passing the point of the Chersonese, occupied the bays of Kamiash and Kazatch, while the land forces spread out over the south-western part of the plateau.

Before arriving upon the ground to be occupied by the siege operations of the allies, the French army had changed leaders. For a long time suffering from disease, yet sustained by an indomitable will, Marshal St. Arnaud was attacked on the 24th of September by cholera, and on the 26th he was considered fatally ill. Upon the announcement of his condition he at once sent for General Canrobert and resigned to him the command. This was in pursuance of the Emperor Napoleon's orders in case Marshal St. Arnaud should be in any way disabled, a commission having been entrusted to General Canrobert, the existence of which was not at the time made known to the marshal. An order of the day was addressed to the army, containing the farewell and last words of encouragement of the dying leader. "Soldiers, you will pity me," it said, "for the misfortune which falls upon me is immense, irreparable, and perhaps unexampled. You will surround General Canrobert with your respect, your confidence. . . . He will continue the victory of the Alma, and will have the happiness which I had hoped for myself, of leading you into Sevastopol." On the 29th, the marshal, wrapped in the French flag, was carried on board ship. The vessel put out to sea, but before night, Marshal St. Arnaud had ceased to breathe.

In consequence of the English troops occupying Balaklava, a change of position was agreed upon between them and the French, the latter henceforth keeping the left, and the English occupying the right in the attack upon Sevastopol. The hope of speedy victory had not yet completely abandoned the besieging forces. "I am of opinion," wrote General Canrobert, on the 20th of September, "that we shall not be obliged to proceed with the methodical delays of a regular siege, and that the town can be taken by assault, after its defensive works have been breached by our cannon."

These defences, however, had been made very formidable.

In the interval that had elapsed between the battle of the Alma, and the time when the allied army commenced its siege operations, the city had been converted by the genius of Colonel Todleben into a strongly intrenched camp. Sailors and soldiers, civilians, and even women, had worked day and night, throwing up earthworks and mounting guns. All the vast resources of an arsenal — perhaps the largest in the world — crowded with warlike material of every kind, had been utilized in the best possible manner, and a moral and religious enthusiasm on the part of the besieged added an incalculable element of strength to all the preparations made for resistance. The three principal works were the Malakoff Tower, at the eastern angle of the fortifications, the Redan, southwest of the Malakoff, and the Flagstaff Bastion, west of the Redan. Just beyond the latter bastion, the line of fortifications turned towards the north, going down to the great harbor, and on this western side, the Central and Quarantine Bastions were the principal points of defence. Owing to the relative positions taken up by the allied armies, the English confronted the Malakoff and the Redan, and the French the Flagstaff and the bastions of the west side. The position of Balaklava, — the British base of operations, — was defended by a force of marines with heavy ship-guns, and by redoubts garrisoned with Turks. The cavalry camp was also established in the neighborhood, and a French force, with some Turks, barred the road to the plateau by the Col di Balaklava. The weak point of the British lines was at the extreme right, which was open to an attack from the north. Meantime, the access to the city being open on the north side, Prince Mentschikoff had drawn near with his army, and fourteen battalions were detached to serve with the garrison, the prince still remaining outside with his main army, to fall, at suitable occasion, upon the allies' flank.

From the 7th to the 9th of October, the French and English

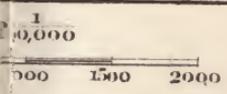

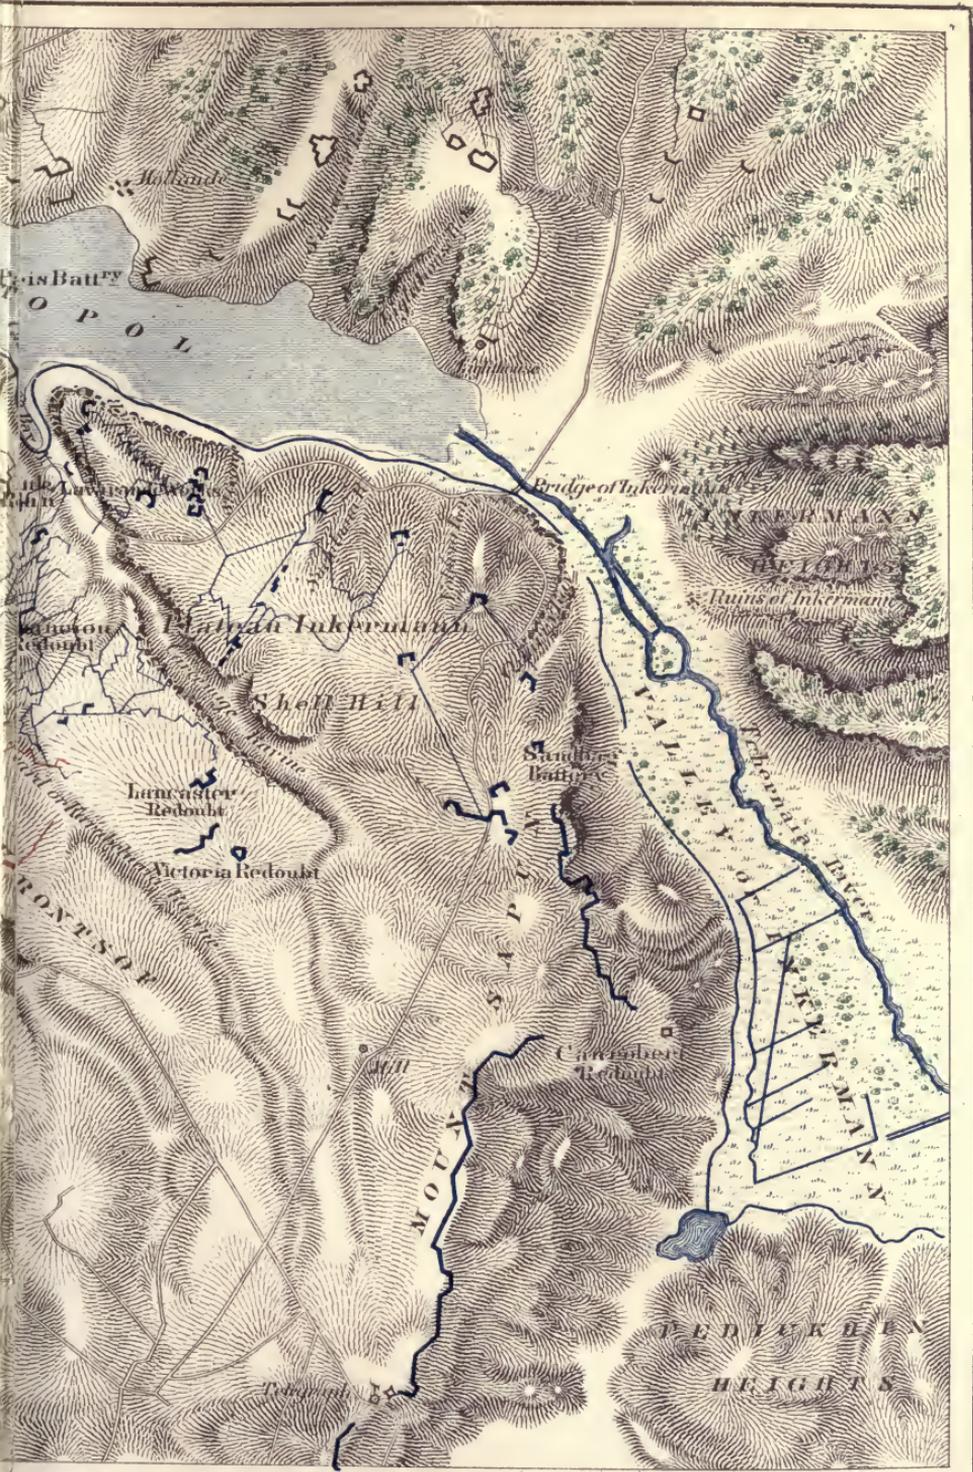

French Works

Scale

500 0 50

POPOL

by the Allies

began the sinking of trenches and formation of batteries. On the 8th, General Bizot, the French engineer in charge of the works, wrote: "It would be difficult to estimate in advance the length of time we shall be obliged to employ in the siege. We are before a place newly created, in respect to which no document or plan is within our reach; we are going to make trial of material whose range and calibre is unknown to us. Lastly, it is impossible completely to invest the place."

Up to the 16th, the work went on, somewhat molested by the artillery of the Russians. On that evening the English had their batteries all established, and stood ready with the French, to open fire in the morning. The English had seventy-three guns in position, and the French, fifty-three. Against these the Russians had in position over two hundred guns. It was decided that the allied fleets, which lay off the roadstead of Sevastopol, should move up and join in the attack, assailing the great sea-forts, Constantine and Alexander.

At half-past six on the morning of the 17th, the attack began by land, but it was after one o'clock before the first cannonading came from the fleet. From the batteries a tremendous storm of shot and shell was poured upon the town, to which the Russian guns responded with murderous precision. The positions of the French artillery had been badly chosen; disastrous explosions took place in their works, the material damage was heavy and the loss of life great, and at half-past ten in the morning their batteries ceased fire. The English attack was more fortunate. They demolished the Malakoff Tower, exploded its magazine and the magazine of the Redan, and nearly destroyed the Redan itself.

Upon the whole, however, the advantage remained with the Russians. The attack upon the great forts was entirely unsuccessful, and the only irreparable calamity to the besieged was the loss of Admiral Korniloff. While examining the disasters suffered by the Malakoff, his thigh was shattered by a round shot. A group of officers at once surrounded him: "I entrust to you the defence of Sevastopol," he said to them in a firm voice, "never surrender it!" He was carried to the naval hospital, where in two hours he died. "Tell everybody," he said, "how pleasant it is to die when the conscience is pure!" His last words were the prayer of a dying patriot: "O God! bless Russia and the emperor! Save Sevastopol and the fleet!" The bastion near which he had been wounded was thenceforth called by his name.

Meanwhile Prince Mentschikoff was maturing a plan of attack, in the hope of forcing the allies to raise the siege. The position at Balaklava was manifestly weak, and here he decided to make his first attempt. A large Russian force was gathered in the valley of the Tchernaya, and, on the 25th of September, at five o'clock in the morning, the Russian columns moved forward to attack the outer line of the defence, a row of knolls strengthened by redoubts and garrisoned by about one thousand Turks, with seven twelve-pounder guns. The redoubts were quickly taken, one after another, and the Russians continued their advance toward the English positions. The English cavalry meanwhile had been on the alert, and were posted to receive them, together with the 93d Highlanders. The English division of horse consisted of two brigades, the Light Cavalry and the Heavy Dragoons. The general in command of the division was Lord Lucan; and the Earl of Cardigan and General Scarlett were at the head of the brigades. Sir Colin Campbell had command of the infantry, and of the general defences of Balaklava.

After taking the redoubts, a body of Russian cavalry made an advance towards the gorge leading to the town, but being resolutely received by the Highlanders, turned their horses' heads and retreated rapidly. Meantime the main body of Russian cavalry advanced toward the west until it came within range of the batteries on the plateau of the Chersonese, and received two shots. Upon this, the whole force, about three thousand strong, wheeled obliquely aside and turned southward. This movement brought them upon the English Heavy Cavalry, four squadrons of Greys and Enniskilleners. "The Russians," wrote Mr. Russell, who was an eye-witness of the scene, "advanced down the hill at a slow canter, which they changed to a trot, and at last nearly halted. Their first line was nearly double the length of ours, and it was at least three times as deep. Behind them was a similar line equally strong and compact. They evidently despised their insignificant-looking enemy, but their time was come. The trumpets rang out through the valley, and the Greys and Enniskilleners went right at the centre of the Russian cavalry. The space between them was only a few hundred yards; it was scarcely enough to let the horses gather way, nor had the men quite space enough for the play of their sword-arms. The Russian line brought forward each wing as our cavalry advanced, and threatened to annihilate them as they passed on. Turning a little to the left, so as to meet the Russian right, the Greys rushed on with a cheer that thrilled every heart. The wild shout of the Enniskilleners rose through the air at the same instant. As lightning flashes through a cloud, the Greys and Enniskilleners pierced through the dark masses of Russians. The shock was but for a moment. There was a clash of steel, and a light play of sword-blades in the air, and then the Greys and red coats disappeared in the midst of the shaken and quivering columns. In another moment we saw them emerging with diminished numbers and in broken order, charging against the second line. . . . By sheer steel and by sheer courage, Enniskillener and Scot were winning their desperate way right through the enemy's squadrons, and already red coats and gray horses had appeared at the rear of the second mass, when, with irresistible force, like one bolt from a bow, the 4th Dragoon Guards, riding straight at the right flank of the Russians, and the 5th Dragoon Guards, following close after the Enniskilleners, rushed at the remnants of the first line of the enemy, and put them to utter rout." The Russian cavalry fled in disorder, and did not draw rein till they had gone two miles, and were sheltered behind their own guns and among their infantry. General Scarlett pursued them a short distance, but stopped before coming under fire of the enemy's guns. Lord Raglan and General Canrobert, with many officers from both of the besieging armies, watched this action from the edge of the plateau, and the delight and enthusiasm of the spectators was extreme.

Shortly after, Lord Raglan, attentively observing the ground below him, perceived what seemed to be a movement on the part of the Russians to remove the guns from the captured redoubts. This was too much for the scrupulous honor of the general-in-chief, trained by the Duke of Wellington in the belief that an officer should never lose a gun. He sent down a message to Lord Lucan to the effect that the cavalry should advance and try to prevent the enemy from carrying off the guns. Lord Lucan, it appears, misunderstood the order, construing it to mean that the cavalry should not only advance but should attack, and the aid-de-camp Captain Nolan, who brought the message, shared in the misconception. After a few words, Lord Lucan rode up to the Earl of Cardigan, who, with the Light Cavalry, had remained a near but inactive spectator of the conflict between the Russians and the Heavy Dragoons. Lord Lucan delivered the order of the commander-in-chief. "Lord Lucan," says Lord Cardigan, in his testimony under oath, "then came to our front, and ordered me to attack the Russians in the valley. I replied, 'Certainly, Sir, but allow me to point out to you that the Russians have a battery in our front, and batteries and riflemen on each flank.' Lord Lucan said, 'I cannot help that; it is Lord Raglan's positive order that the Light Brigade attacks immediately.'” Upon this Lord Cardigan turned to his soldiers, and said simply, “The brigade will advance.” The Light Brigade was drawn up facing a valley which led to the bridge over the Tchernaya. The hills on the left of this valley were black with infantry, sixteen guns were in position, and a body of Cossack riflemen were extended as skirmishers on the lower slopes; across the mouth of the valley stood the Russian cavalry, having in front of them a battery of guns. On the right two redoubts were occupied, and more than half the Russian infantry, and a body of lancers, were in position. Riflemen were also extended along both sides of the valley.

CHARGE OF THE LIGHT BRIGADE.

Six hundred and seventy-three men: the 13th Light Dragoons, the 17th Lancers, the 11th Hussars, the 4th Light Dragoons, and the 8th Hussars, were the attacking force. Lord Cardigan rode in front of the centre of the first line, a conspicuous figure in hussar uniform. He rode forward steadily, looking neither to right nor left, straight on towards the guns, themselves invisible, but indicating their location by the white bank of smoke cut every few minutes by jets of flame. The spectators upon the heights were filled with horror at the sight of this gallant handful of men riding steadily to destruction, without blenching for an instant from their duty. Voices cried out, “Stop! Stop! this is madness!” But they were drowned in the tumult and the Light Cavalry galloped forward, involuntarily increasing their speed until the advance had become almost a race, while still Lord Cardigan kept the regulation distance between himself and the foremost lines. The guns on their left, the battery in front, and guns from the redoubt were firing incessantly into their ranks; the valley was strewn with men and horses dead or dying, while the survivors closed in with a regularity which had the effect of a terrible piece of mechanism, so prompt and incessant was its operation.

At the battle of Essling, in defending the island of Lobau, General Mouthon for four hours was under the fire of all the Austrian artillery, walking up and down through the lines, saying only, "Close up the ranks!" as the soldiers fell all around him. During the charge of the Light Brigade at Balaklava, the thinned ranks closed up continually without orders; and when at last the survivors disappeared from sight into the smoke which overhung the Russians' guns more than half of the brigade were already left behind disabled, no man stopping to look after his fallen companions. "It is magnificent, but it is not war!" was the exclamation of General Bosquet, as he watched the advance of the decimated cavalry.

At an early hour in the day reinforcements, both English and French, had been despatched from the besieging army on the plateau to join their comrades fighting on the lower ground, but the difficulties of their march had retarded them for several hours. At this time, however, the Chasseurs d'Afrique under General d'Allonville were standing, drawn up at the left of the ground whence the Light Brigade had started, and General Morris ordered them at once to attack the Russian batteries upon the hills at the left. The attack was most brilliant and successful; the artillery was forced to retreat, and thus one of the flanking fires had been brought to an end, when the moment came for the return of the Light Brigade.

Arriving at the Russian battery, the squadrons charged in between the guns; the Russian artillerymen still sought to defend them, but were finally cut down or put to flight. The Russian cavalry, posted behind the guns, showed signs of weakness, and, with strong reinforcements, a brilliant victory might have been gained. The two hundred and thirty English horsemen who reached the Russian guns were not, however, able to drive before them thousands of cavalry, and, by degrees, gathering themselves together, the shattered squadrons extricated themselves and rode back through the battery and up the valley, to rejoin the rest of the army. On their return, one flanking fire still harassed them, and when they reached the open ground, only one hundred and ninety-five mounted men remained of the six hundred and seventy-three who, twenty minutes before, had answered to Lord Cardigan's order,—“The brigade will advance.” When the shattered band re-formed, Lord Cardigan rode up to the front: “Men,” he said, “this has been a great blunder; but it is no fault of mine.” And the men cheered, and called out, “Never mind, my lord; we are ready to go again!”

The charge of the Light Brigade was the last important event of the day. At four o'clock the final guns were fired, and, at dusk, the French troops and the British infantry divisions, with the exception of the Highland Brigade, returned to the plateau. The allies lost in killed and wounded, about six hundred officers and men; the Russians about six hundred and thirty. The Russians remained in undisturbed possession of the ground which they had taken, and of seven English guns from the redoubts. The garrison in Sevastopol gave thanks for a victory, and Prince Mentschikoff urged forward his hostile preparations. On the 30th of October, he wrote to Prince Paschevitch, at Warsaw: “The enemy does not show himself outside of his lines; we harass him incessantly, and kill his soldiers; our squadrons make frequent raids and attacks. The enemy sends them a few shells, but the cavalry dares not risk itself from under cover of the batteries. The army is full of enthusiasm. General Liprandi, whose coolness and resolution I cannot sufficiently praise, has thrown up earthworks, strongly armed, on the enemy's right flank, and, from the position he holds, threatens their rear. The enemy cannot operate without exposing himself to immense loss; if the weather serves us, nothing can save him from complete destruction. All the world will remember, I feel certain, the exemplary chastisement inflicted upon the allies. When our beloved grand-dukes arrive, I shall be able to give over to them, intact, the precious trust which the emperor has confided to me. Sebastopol will remain ours. Heaven visibly protects Holy Russia."

Prince Mentschikoff daily expected the arrival of the two sons of the Emperor Nicholas. He had been heavily reinforced, and was now able to oppose one hundred and twenty thousand men (including the sailors of the fleet), to the sixty-five thousand remaining to the allies.

On their part, the French and English worked with great industry at strengthening their position and advancing the siege works. It was the plan of the allied generals to open a fierce fire upon Sevastopol early in November, in the hope of taking the city by assault. But again attention was diverted from the siege by an aggressive movement on the part of Prince Mentschikoff. The right flank of the English position had always been the weak point of the entire line. Here valleys lying between the projecting spurs of the plateau gave access to an attacking force from below. Here an attack was, in fact, made and repulsed, on the day after the battle of Balaklava. The attention of the generals was called to the danger, but it seemed impossible to heed the warning. "The various exigencies to be provided for on other points at that time," afterwards wrote Sir De Lacy Evans, who was posted there with the 2d Division, "scarcely left it possible, I believe, to afford any material reinforcements or means for the construction of defences." At five o'clock in the morning of Sunday, November 5th, General Soimonoff with nineteen thousand infantry and thirty-eight guns marched out of the eastern gate of Sevastopol and, climbing a ravine, reached the crest of the hill almost before his movements had been detected. On the preceding day unusual signs of activity had indeed been discerned in the region to the east of the plateau, distinguished by the ruins of the ancient city of Inkerman, but no important military change had been discovered. On the morning of the fifth a heavy mist overhung the entire plateau, and the officer from headquarters, making the rounds before daybreak to ascertain if any change was observed in the attitude of the enemy, learned that the night had been unusually quiet. After a few minutes General Codrington, the officer commanding one of the brigades encamped on Mount Inkerman, rode to the front, as he was accustomed to do daily; the relieved pickets had just come in, dripping with the fog and chilled by the cold; and no advance had been detected. Suddenly a fire of musketry on the left was audible, and soon after the same ominous sound made itself heard from the right. The skirmishers of General Soimonoff's column had touched the line of English pickets at the left, while from the side of the Tchernaya, another column under General Pauloff was advancing to co-operate with the troops under Soimonoff, upon the crest of the hill.

The general at once galloped back to call out the division, and the troops formed in haste, while the sound of firing was now heard from almost every part of the twelve miles' front of battle which the enemy had prepared himself to present. The attack on Mount Inkerman was the central movement, but all along under the plateau towards Balaklava on the English right, Russian troops were posted and batteries established, while the whole garrison of the city made part of the line, ready for sorties upon the allied camps whenever the fortune of the day should favor such movements.

The position upon Mount Inkerman was extremely open to attack. Some days before, Sir De Lacy Evans had remarked that such was the character of the ground occupied by his division, that the enemy might be upon them any day, almost without notice. The whole northern half of Mount Inkerman had been deliberately left to the Russians, being so commanded by the batteries of Sevastopol and by the ships of war in the great harbor as to be practically untenable. The formation of the ground is peculiar; making the north-eastern angle of the Chersonese, it is separated by a deep ravine, running north-west and south-east, from the rest of the plateau. In length about three miles, and about two miles and a quarter in width at its northern extremity, it narrows irregularly toward the south, till the isthmus of land connecting it with the main plateau has only a width of about four hundred yards along its crest. The ground is extremely broken and irregular, a ridge running through it lengthwise and throwing out lateral ribs, and in the centre an elevation of considerable height, which was at the time called Shell Hill, (a point constantly shelled by the enemy) with its ribs to the right and left, offered a commanding site for the establishment of field batteries. Eastward, and nearer the English camp, had been erected some earth-works, but these were soon after abandoned and disarmed; but around one of them, known as the Sand-bag Battery, a parapet eight or ten feet high, the fight raged that day so fiercely that, taken and re-taken three times before nine o'clock in the morning, the French, arriving later, could call it nothing but "the slaughter-house."

At the isthmus lay encamped the 2d Division, and a low ridge of ground, the English Heights, protected them on the north. They threw out a chain of pickets to ground about a mile in advance of the camp, the chain being a good deal drawn in towards the camp at night.

Rapidly and silently making the ascent by the ravines on the north-east and north-west of Mount Inkerman, the two Russian army corps reached the crest of the hill, General Soimonoff, however, so much in advance that he had posted his batteries on Shell Hill, and opened fire upon the English camp, and thrown forward his infantry in an attack, before General Pauloff effected the designed junction.

Meantime General Pennefather, who was, in consequence of Sir De Lacy Evans' illness, in charge of the 2d Division, was obstinately disputing every step of ground with the enemy. The attack in its early stages had not the appearance of being the opening of a great battle, for the English force was very small, and the Russians so held back that their immense numbers, through the mist of the early morning, were quite unapparent to those who stood opposed to them. For more than an hour this resistance was effectual. General Soimonoff, present in the thickest of the fight, was mortally wounded, and an English force, including in all about three thousand six hundred men, with the aid of some batteries, kept at bay twenty-five thousand, and even drove off the field no less than twenty battalions, consisting of fifteen thousand men.

The immense numerical strength of the Russians, however, soon began to tell. Ten thousand fresh infantry, with ninety-seven additional guns, had just reached the summit of the hill. General Dannenberg, who was to take the supreme command in the field, had arrived, and the attack was renewed. Reinforcements brought to General Pennefather were as follows: three field-batteries, and about three thousand infantry of the Guards and the 4th Division. Lord Raglan had been in the field for some time, not with the view of superseding General Pennefather, but of offering him succor, and of keeping himself well informed of the progress of the battle. General Canrobert had also arrived, and it was agreed to call upon two battalions of French infantry belonging to General Bosquet's division.

At a very early period of the engagement, General Bosquet—whose troops guarded the Col di Balaklava, and commanded the ground below, from their camp along the edge of the plateau whose extreme left was less than three miles from the camp of the 2d Division—had detected that the Russian attack at the left was little more than a feint, and that the real point of danger was Mount Inkerman. He ordered, therefore, a considerable reinforcement to move up towards the isthmus, and hastened thither in person. On the way, he met Sir George Brown and Sir George Cathcart, and offered his aid, saying that he had some infantry and artillery already on the way, and should be able to send up more. The two generals declined the offer, and assuring General Bosquet that the English reserves would be sufficient, begged him merely to watch the ground which had been specially intrusted to him. Upon this, General Bosquet sent back his battalions, but he did not dismiss his anxiety to be of service to the little band so hardly bested upon Mount Inkerman. Hence, when messengers came from Lord Raglan, intimating that his assistance would be welcome, he at once ordered Bourbaki to proceed to the scene of conflict with the same troops he had before ordered to advance: two thousand one hundred and fifteen infantry, and two troops of horse-artillery. He also ordered two battalions of the 3d Zouaves, a battalion of Algerines, and the two battalions of the 50th Regiment to follow. More than half of these six thousand troops were in time to bear a brilliant and important share in the day's events, and the remainder, though not sent into the active fray, were on the spot and ready, two hours before the battle ended.

Vehement cheers from the English greeted the two battalions — the 7th Léger and the 6th of the line — answering back the drums and clarions of the French, as the latter arrived upon the isthmus. They were halted for a few minutes, awaiting orders, then led over the ridge and into the battle. Other French battalions shortly followed them, and the contest was renewed with tremendous vigor. General Bosquet took the offensive, and Russian writers agree that from the moment the French entered the field the fate of the day was decided. For four hours eight thousand British troops had held their ground, defeating successively great masses of Russians, and now, the accession of fresh troops, fired with enthusiasm and eager for conflict, came at the very moment when their presence was able to turn the scale. The battle still raged for hours; the Russian artillery still thundered upon the allies, and the heavy masses of Russian infantry moved forward with determined courage, and were driven back with the sharpest fighting.

Between eleven and one o'clock, the aggressive movements gradually slackened. But the Russians had suffered heavily. Finally, General Dannenberg decided on a retreat, and gave his orders accordingly. Slowly and in good order the Russians fell back, the infantry guarding the withdrawal of the guns. A pursuit was judged inexpedient on the part of the allies, and it was eight o'clock in the evening when the last piece of cannon entered within the Russian lines of defence.

A loss of nearly eleven thousand killed and wounded was reported by the Russians; among their number were twelve officers of high position,—generals and colonels. The losses of the English were two thousand three hundred and fifty-seven, thirty-nine officers being killed and ninety-one wounded. The French loss was thirteen officers and one hundred and thirty men killed, and thirty-six officers and seven hundred and fifty men wounded.

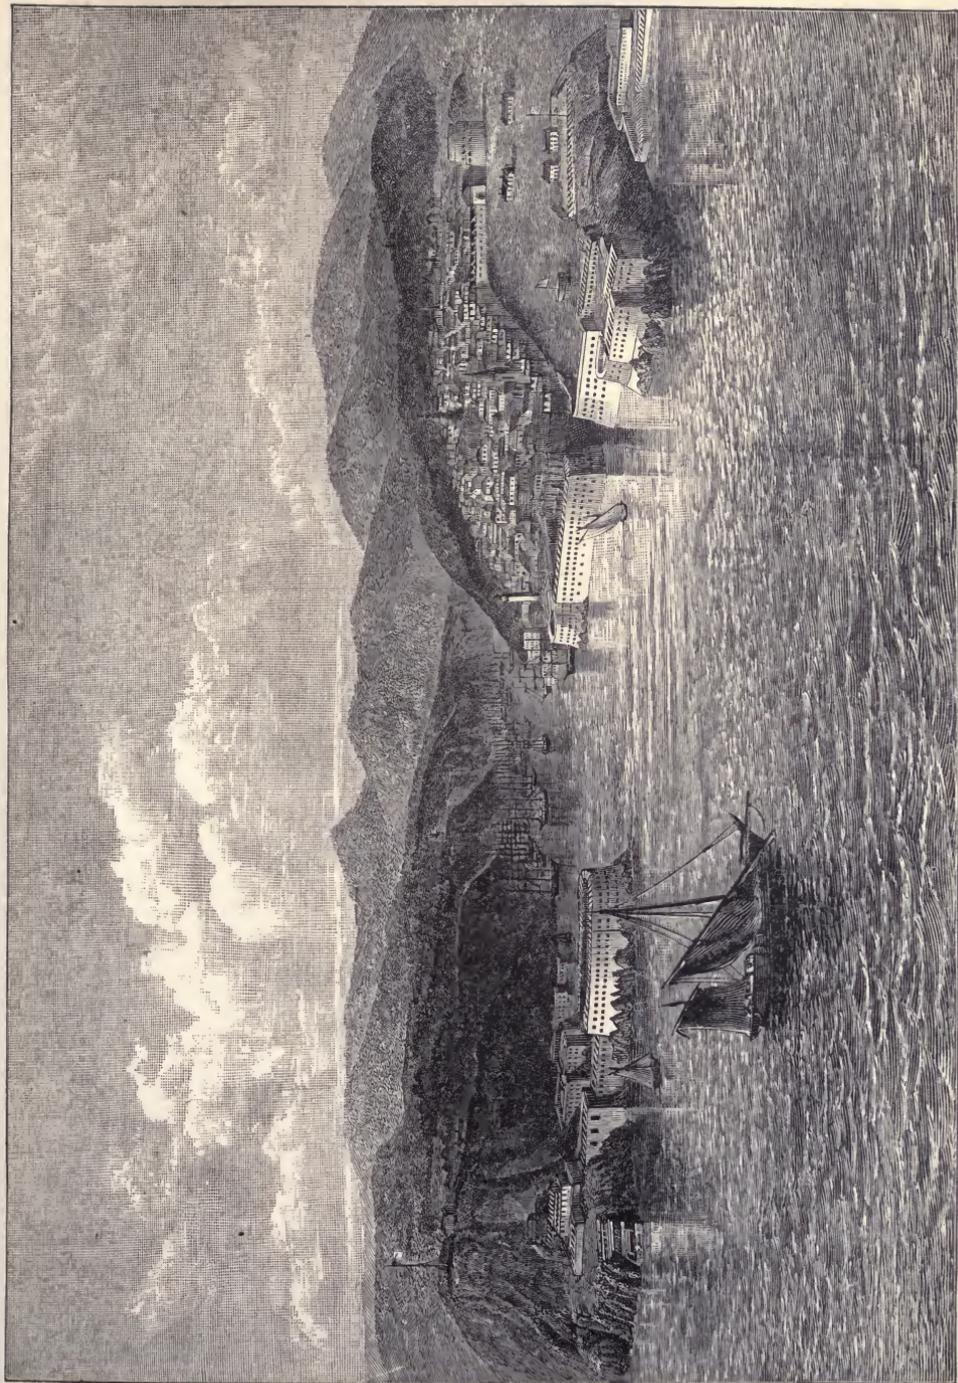

Victory remained with the allies, but it had been won at a cost that put an end to all hope of active operations on their part for the winter. Henceforth their object was to make themselves as secure as possible in the position they occupied. Lord Raglan, in a private letter to the Duke of Newcastle, explained the situation, dwelling especially on the smallness of the force under his command. "To speak frankly," he wrote, "we want every man you can send us."

Since the arrival of the troops in the Crimea, they had sufferred extremely from illness. On the day before the battle of Inkerman more than seven thousand were reported unfit for duty. Overwork and exposure constantly increased this number. The ignorance and recklessness of the English soldiers were a surprise to their French comrades, and Lord Raglan himself felt the contrast between the two. The French soldier has but a half-pound of meat a day, while the Englishman, receiving three times as much, is more poorly fed. "My lord," General Bosquet once said, laughingly, to the English commander-in-chief, "let us make an arrangement which will be profitable to both nations: give me for one English soldier and one French one, your pound and a half of meat; we can save our ration, one man shall make soup for both, and English and French soldiers will both fare well on it, I can promise you." The culinary talent of the French soldier was not put to this test, however, and the English continued to suffer.

With the beginning of November, the severities of the climate were added to all the other hardships of the allied troops. Rain fell almost incessantly, and the earth changed to mud. On the 14th of November, a memorable storm burst upon the southern shores of the Crimea. Nearly every tent on the Chersonese was blown down, and its contents scattered. "The air," says Mr. Russell, "was filled with blankets, hats, great coats, little coats, and even tables and chairs! Mackintoshes, quilts, india-rubber tubs, bed-clothes, sheets of tent canvas, went whirling like leaves in the gale towards Sevastopol." Heavy wagons were blown over; and neither horse nor man could face the fury of the storm on the exposed plains. No fires could be lighted nor food cooked, and the sick with the well were all alike exposed, shelterless, to the fury of the weather.

Upon the sea the storm was, if possible, more violent; twenty-one transports were wrecked, loaded with the winter supplies for the army, and the ships that escaped were so much damaged, that the army was for a long time deficient in sea-transport, and hence unable to repair the ravages inflicted by the storm on stores of all kinds.

VIEW OF SEVASTOPOL

When the people at home learned through the revelations of Mr. Russell and other war-correspondents, of the distress and privations endured by their sons and brothers in the Crimea, the heart of the English nation was deeply moved, and a most admirable outburst of useful liberality made itself manifest throughout England. In countless homes, supplies of all sorts — both garments and provisions — were made ready for the army in the Crimea. We, in France, know by experience of suffering, what the wealth and generous liberality of England can do in consoling and alleviating the miseries caused by war. In the winter of 1854–5, the sons of England suffered and fought side by side with our army, and upon her own children England had then occasion to lavish those fruits of her tender care which she would, one day, bestow upon us.

Especially the condition of the hospitals excited distress and commiseration. Although more men and more supplies were sent out to the medical department in the East than were ever supplied to a force of similar strength, yet, from want of foresight and administrative skill, the department became almost inefficient in the presence of the unusual and unexpected demands upon it. Finally, to a woman belongs the honor of bringing order and system out of disorder and confusion. Anxious to remedy these great evils, Mr. Sidney Herbert made an appeal to a distinguished woman of his acquaintance, Miss Florence Nightingale, who had long taken a deep interest in hospital work; he begged her to go out to Scutari and take charge of the hospital there, and offered her authority over all the nurses, and the unlimited power of drawing upon government for whatever she might judge needful for the success of her enterprise. Miss Nightingale, a singularly amiable and attractive person, endowed, besides, with great intellectual gifts, had never felt willing to limit her usefulness to the peaceful circle of an elegant and luxurious life; she had long since recognized her vocation for the care of the sick, and was occupied in reorganizing a charitable institution in London at the time of Mr. Herbert's appeal to her. She hesitated not a moment, and gathering about her a few women of her own station, who were fired by her noble example, and a band of trained nurses, set out for Scutari. The party consisted of ten Roman Catholic nuns, eight Protestant Sisters, and twenty nurses already experienced in hospitals. She went from one hospital to another, reforming and reorganizing; everywhere respect and affection surrounded her, lightening a task that her own feeble health made every day more heavy. The maladies from which the soldiers were suffering in turn smote Miss Nightingale, but the moment she was able to walk she was once more at the bedside of the sick, the wounded, and the dying. "I have visited many thousand sick-beds," she said, "and I have never heard a word which could offend me." Her health in the end broke down utterly under the burden, but until the last day of the war, she remained at her post, devoted to the mission of patriotism and charity which she had undertaken. Her name will be forever associated with the story of the Crimean war, and the fruits of her devotion have been of lasting benefit. Her example brought many volunteers to the service of the Red Cross, while in the quiet homes of her own country, to this day, many a sufferer has blessed the lessons which her practical experience recorded for the instruction of persons having the care of the sick.

The misfortunes of the English army in the Crimea wrought upon the pride as well as upon the pity of the nation. Parliament met before Christmas, and, after the recess, Mr. Roebuck gave notice that he should move for an inquiry into the condition of the army before Sevastopol, and the conduct of those departments of the government which minister to the wants of the army. Lord John Russell urged upon Lord Aberdeen the substitution of Lord Palmerston, as secretary of war, for the Duke of Newcastle. Lord Aberdeen refused to do this; and Lord John Russell, in spite of Lord Palmerston's earnest remonstrances, resigned, being of opinion that Mr. Roebuck's motion could not be conscientiously resisted. Mr. Roebuck's motion, though opposed by Lord Palmerston and Mr. Gladstone, was accepted by a majority of 157. The ministry, being thus signally defeated, at once resigned, and Lord Palmerston was called upon to form a new Cabinet.

On the 15th of February, the new premier wrote to his brother: "A month ago, if any man had asked me to say what was the most improbable events, I should have said, 'my being prime minister.' Aberdeen was there; Derby was the head of one great party, John Russell of the other, and yet, in about ten days' time they all gave way like straws before the wind; and so here am I, writing to you from Downing Street, as first lord of the treasury."

The changes in the ministry were at first more important than numerous. Lord Derby and Lord John Russell having successively failed in the attempt to form a Cabinet, Lord Palmerston merely took Lord Aberdeen's place, and Lord Panmure, who had formerly, as Mr. Fox Maule, had the management of army affairs, took the place of the Duke of Newcastle as secretary of war; but after a time the changes became more radical. Lord Palmerston urged the House not to insist upon the inquiry for which Mr. Roebuck had called; he had already dispatched two commissions to the Crimea, and promised that government would thoroughly investigate the whole question. But public opinion was not satisfied. Lord Palmerston was forced to yield, and Sir James Graham, Mr. Sidney Herbert, and Mr. Gladstone resigned.

Sir Charles Wood, Lord John Russell, and Sir George Cornwall Lewis filled the offices thus vacated.

About this time the allies were promised a reinforcement by the Sardinian contingent. The great minister who was to found the kingdom of Italy, Count Cavour, judged it useful for his country to take part in the wars of Europe in order to gain a right to take part in European councils. The brave Piedmontese regiments supported in the Crimea the cause of France and England against Russia, although it concerned them in no direct way. But this wise and far-seeing policy of Count Cavour had its result, and may be said to have laid the first stone in the edifice of the future greatness of their country and their sovereign.

Meanwhile an event to which all thoughts turned as favorable for peace had occurred in Russia, — the death of the czar, on the 2d of March, 1855. His disease was said to be pulmonary apoplexy, but it might perhaps more truly have been stated that he died of a broken heart, like Mr. Pitt after the battle of Austerlitz. The failure of an attack directed against Eupatoria, a seaport town north of Sevastopol which the allies had held through the winter, drawing thence large supplies of cattle and forage, had filled the measure of the czar's disappointments. He was unable longer to struggle against the despair which overwhelmed him and had so many times sent him to his oratory to pass hours in prayer, prostrated before the holy pictures of his patron saints. The two grand-dukes, who had been in the Crimea since the battle of Inkerman, and Prince Mentschikoff hastened to quit Sevastopol at the first news of the emperor's illness, but they had gone but a short distance on their journey when they received tidings of his death. The Emperor Nicholas had been accustomed to encourage himself with the recollection of 1812. "Russia has two generals upon whom she can always count," he used to say, "General January and General February." An English caricature in Punch depicted General February, turned traitor, laying an icy hand upon the emperor's breast, and leading him away to the tomb. The Emperor Nicholas died with a firm and simple tranquillity, and his eldest son Alexander was immediately proclaimed. As is often the case, the heir-apparent had not shared in all his father's views and ideas. He was believed to be opposed to war theoretically, and to be at the present moment favorable towards negotiations for peace. At the instigation of Austria, a new Vienna conference was assembled, Lord John Russell representing the interests of England, and at the same time protecting those of Turkey. One of the main points of his instructions concerned the limitation of the Russian power in the Black Sea; but here the Russian plenipotentiaries were inflexible. Meanwhile, in his first proclamation to his subjects, the new czar was addressing to heaven a prayer as ambitious as any of those of his late father. "May Providence grant," he said, "that, under Divine guidance and protection, we may make Russia strong in the highest degree of power and glory, and that, through us, may be fulfilled the wishes and designs of our illustrious predecessors, Peter, Catherine, Alexander the well-beloved, and our illustrious father of imperishable memory." The negotiations at Vienna came to an end. Lord John Russell returned home, where he was accused of having been ensnared by Austrian subtleties. He sought vainly to defend himself in Parliament; he was obliged to resign and his office was filled by Sir William Molesworth.

Meantime work continued in the trenches before Sevastopol; and, on the Russian side, the fortifications of the town were continually strengthened. The heights of Inkerman were now covered by the English and French with strong field-works, so that all danger of an attack from that quarter was removed. From time to time sorties were made by the Russians, and sometimes a heavy fire of guns was opened upon the working-parties and the outposts of the allies. Late in December, the hostile movements of the allies around Balaklava had so far intimidated the Russians as to remove all anxiety in regard to the safety of the port. The main work of the allies, however, consisted in advancing their trenches. Above ground and under it the belligerents labored, advancing their parallels, mining and countermining. January was, in a sense, the turning-point of the winter, for, although till the last of February the proportion on the sick-list constantly increased, yet the accommodations for the troops were better, the supplies had become abundant, and the roads and wharves built at Balaklava, together with a railway connecting it with the heights, abated the discomforts of the earlier season.

In February, General Niel, one of the first engineers in the French army, and especially in the confidence of the Emperor Napoleon, was sent out to the Crimea, and, under his recommendation, the French took up ground on the plateau leading to the Malakoff, where they began to work with great vigor. Upon this the Russians concentrated their energies at the same point; they pulled down the tower ruined in the attack of the 17th of October, and began the construction of that enormous redoubt which so long defied its assailants. Large works were constructed to the right and left, which the allies in vain endeavored to destroy, and the Russians took possession of a hill in front of the Malakoff, which was afterwards known as the Mamelon, and raised the nucleus of a very formidable work. All along the town-front the same system was developed. Lodgments were made in advance of the bastions, and, quite at the left of the allied position, a large cemetery was converted into a strong post. The Russian works, both inside and outside their main line, were on a colossal scale, and their forts and trenches were endless.

The command of the Russian army was now assigned to Prince Gortschakoff, who arrived on the 21st of March, and soon proved himself a very capable soldier. A vigorous sortie was made by the Russians, but they were repulsed with heavy loss. Early in April, it was determined to bombard the town a second time, and a tremendous fire day after day, from the 9th of April to the 16th, was poured upon the devoted city, but the defences stood firm; and the allies were a second time repulsed.

At all times serious differences of opinion existed between the two commanders. Lord Raglan favored prompt and direct action; while General Canrobert, in receipt of secret instructions from his emperor, inclined to more deliberate and guarded measures, and operations more remote from the central point. This strife of contending influences did not extend to the two governments, which appeared more closely united than ever. The Emperor and Empress of the French paid a visit in London, and were received with transports of popular enthusiasm. The emperor at this time had the idea of going out himself to take command in the Crimea. An attempt at his assassination made in Paris on the 25th of April, caused him to relinquish that idea, against which his most trusted advisers had already remonstrated, while the general sentiment of the English army was strongly opposed to it. As a commander-in-chief, however, General Canrobert had not the confidence of those about him. General Pélissier, who had lately arrived from Algeria, urged an attack upon Sevastopol. The general-in-chief was wearied out; honest and brave, he felt himself, however, not strong enough for the burden which had rested on him since the death of Marshal St. Arnaud, and on the 16th of May he telegraphed to Paris begging to be relieved and to be permitted to return to his former rank of general of division. On being authorized to resign, he wrote on the 19th of May to Marshal Vaillant, minister of war: "I have to-day transferred to General Pélissier, conformably to the authorization which the emperor has had the goodness to grant me, the command in chief of the army of the Crimea. In the presence of difficulties incessantly recurring, which aside from my army render my task daily more heavy, it has seemed to me my imperious and first duty to commit the supreme direction to a general officer whom his age, his military antecedents, his capacity and the firmness of his mind and character recommend to the confidence of the army, while they render him better suited than myself to surmount the inevitable difficulties arising from the juxtaposition of allied armies having each its independent chief. The army which I transfer to him has emerged from the severest and most dangerous trials, finer, more enthusiastic and more confident than before; it is an honor to France, and has been to me a source of the noblest consolation by the devotion which it has given to me up to this day. It is ready to accomplish the grandest achievements which the emperor's service and glory may require. For myself, Monsieur le Maréchal, I beg you to obtain from his Majesty the confirmation of my appointment by General Pélissier to the command of my former division (first of the 2nd Corps). I am sure that I have no need to explain and justify the feelings which give rise to this request, to the fulfilment of which I attach the greatest importance. A general-in-chief who has sustained the morale of his soldiers amid the severest trials, who abdicates his authority and remains with them, ought to be brought as near to them as possible."

General Canrobert obtained the gratification of his noble and modest wish. General Pélissier assumed the chief command of the army, coming to it with a reputation for courage and decision rarely fettered by scruples or hesitations; his name had all at once become conspicuous throughout all Europe by the painful resolve to which he had not long before felt himself obliged in Algeria, where, in order to save the column which he commanded he had caused a body of Arab troops, who would not surrender, to be suffocated in the caves of Dahra. Ludlow had once done the same in Ireland. At the battle of Austerlitz, the Emperor Napoleon had given orders to break up the frozen river under the feet of the Russians by firing into the ice. The progress of gentler manners had, however, made men regard with horror the rough deed of General Pélissier; he was attacked in the French Assembly, and was defended with difficulty; but Europe had not forgotten that he had been willing to assume the responsibility, heavy though it was. Great hopes, both in France and England, gathered about the new French leader. He at once took measures to free himself from the hindrances which had been thrown in the way of General Canrobert by the Emperor Napoleon's desire to direct the war from his cabinet in Paris, — writing to Marshal Vaillant: “I have already seen Lord Raglan; we are perfectly agreed in respect to the position of affairs. Like all the army, I have faith in the future. I have measured the extent of my vast duties, but in order to fulfil them successfully for any length of time, I must ask you to solicit for me from the emperor that latitude and liberty of action indispensable in the conditions of the present war, and above all necessary for the preservation of the intimate alliance of the two countries.”

From this time the character of the war was changed; henceforth the siege was to be pressed with a new vigor. Vainly did the Emperor Napoleon and General Niel urge a series of exterior operations. General Pélissier paid no heed, and intrepidly pursued his own personal designs. “The march of two bodies of troops, one from Alooshta, the other from Baidon, upon Simferopol, is fraught with difficulties and uncertainties. A direct investment by securing the Mackenzie Heights would cost as dearly as an assault, and its result would be most uncertain. Lord Raglan and myself are agreed upon the capture of the advanced works, the occupation of the Tchernaya, and, finally, an expedition to Kertch. The siege which we are carrying on has almost nothing in common with those of which Vauban has consecrated the theory. The war which we are carrying on, with a line of ships and two seaports as our base of operations, is almost equally unlike all ordinary wars. I sum up my ideas in expressing once more to you the desire that a sufficient latitude be left me for the direction of operations in whatever manner the course of events may render, in my judgment, most useful."

The attack upon Kertch proved most successful. An immense amount of shipping and stores were destroyed. The expedition made the tour of the Sea of Azof; not one place escaped them, and thus the defenders of Sevastopol were deprived of an enormous proportion of their supplies, just as preparations were making for an especially vigorous attack upon the town itself. The line of the Tchernaya was also occupied about this time by a combined force of French, Sardinians, and Turks.

General Pélissier, meanwhile, was perfectly in agreement with Lord Raglan in respect to the method of carrying on the siege. The Malakoff had now become manifestly the key to the place, and an assault on the outworks protecting it, of which the Mamelon was chief, was decided upon. The bombardment began at half-past two in the afternoon of the 6th of June, one hundred and fifty-seven pieces of ordnance being put in battery by the English, and three hundred pieces by the French. The fire continued all night and until late in the following day. Finally, at 6 45 P. M., the storming parties which had been held ready for some time, under the command of General Bosquet, received the signal and dashed upon the works. The Mamelon was taken, and from that time remained in the possession of the allies.

On the 17th, a fourth bombardment of Sevastopol was commenced, and was kept up with tremendous vigor all day, and even continued through the night. The Malakoff and the Redan were nearly silenced; but, during the night, the enemy had been able to replace the guns and was ready to begin anew. It had been originally designed to precede the assault of the 18th by a three-hours' cannonade of the heaviest description, in order to prevent the Russian troops from being gathered in masses at any point, but this plan was relinquished, and the signal for the storming-parties was given before daybreak in the morning. All night long the troops appointed for the assault were moving into their places. The trenches and the ravines were crowded with men, sitting under the parapets or lying on the ground in the ravines. Behind the Malakoff and the Redan and their connecting parapets, and in the houses of the town, the Russians were waiting the attack. The gunners were ready beside their pieces, and the war-steamers in the harbor were all prepared for instant action. The allied assault was a little confused by a mistaken signal, and commenced on the left too early. Accepting the mistake, the assault was ordered all along the line, and was made with heroic courage. At all the main points, however, it was unsuccessful. Driven back with heavy loss, the English and French retreated; many officers were killed; the English total loss amounted to about fifteen hundred, while that of the French was more than twice as heavy. Within the city the rejoicing and thanksgiving were great.

FIELD MARSHAL LORD RAGLAN, K.C.B. & C.

The allies were extremely disappointed, for their hopes had been very sanguine. They were not discouraged, but the check reacted upon the health of the army; the cholera, never quite subdued, at once increased with great virulence. Lord Raglan himself became ill; on the 24th of June he wrote an autograph letter to General Pélissier, reassuring the latter in respect to his health. On the 28th of June the English leader was dead. Great grief was felt in the two camps. His loyalty, his gentleness, his unshaken firmness had attached all hearts to him. On the 3d of July, a double line of infantry, French and English, stood from the English headquarters to Kasatch Bay, while the coffin, resting on a platform placed upon a nine-pounder gun, drawn by eight horses, moved slowly towards the sea. The four generals-in-chief, — General Simpson (succeeding Lord Raglan), General Péliissier, General La Marmora, and Omar Pasha, on horseback, accompanied the coffin; then followed the dead soldier's favorite war-horse, and then the relatives and staff, with hundreds of officers of every grade from all the allied armies. Guns were fired at intervals, and solemn music played by military bands. At sunset the coffin was placed on board the Caradoc, and the mortal remains of the brave general-in-chief of the English army were borne homeward to rest in native soil.

General Simpson, as the senior officer of the army, succeeded to the command, and the home government confirmed him in that difficult post at a moment of disappointment and of increasing danger.

The harsh and domineering temper of General Péliissier had often offended his comrades, and it was at this time still more trying to his subordinates. Lord Raglan's death had taken from him a firm support. Disgrace threatened him, for his enemies found in the emperor's own mind the frequent echo of their complaints, and it was only with the greatest difficulty that Marshal Vaillant was able to defend the general-in-chief and calm the dissensions. The condition of the garrison within Sevastopol was far from being understood by the besieging armies; the heroism of the defence had deceived all the world, and the Emperor Napoleon was out of patience at the length of the siege. He recurred incessantly to his own plans of operation, while all dreaded the idea of a second winter in the trenches, the Russians behind their shattered defences dreading it more than even did the allies.

General Todleben had been wounded in the bombardment of the 18th; the anxiety was intense in respect to him, for his wound appeared to grow worse. "In the army and in the marine," says the French historian before quoted, "two names above all others were honored with the gratitude of the Russians: Todleben and Nachimoff. Since the day of Todleben's injury, every morning at his bedside had been placed a fresh handful of flowers, sent by Nachimoff to his brother in arms. 'Take care of Todleben, and do not be anxious about me,' had been his constant reply to those who begged him to spare himself. 'If peace were concluded to-day, I should be ill with fever at once; it is nothing but ceaseless excitement which sustains me.' One day, the 16th of July, the flowers were not sent. The evening before, Nachimoff was standing in the Malakoff, near the spot where Korniloff fell, observing the enemy's works. Suddenly a ball buried itself near him in a sand-bag. 'They do not aim well,' he said, with a smile, to the officers who stood near him; a moment later he fell, shot through the head. He lived two days but without recovering consciousness, and when he lay dead, covered by the Empress Marie's own flag, all the sailors of the fleet defiled past him and pressed his icy hand."

The men, like the generals, perished in the besieged city; the reinforcements asked by the commander-in-chief came in slowly, scarcely keeping the numbers good. The Russian empire itself was beginning to be exhausted; transportation was growing difficult; the long distances traversed by the new levies were strewn with those who had fallen by the way; supplies became scarce, the ration was reduced one half since the first of June. The officers of the garrison besought the general-in-chief to make one desperate attempt; at St. Petersburg the same cry was in the mouths of all; but Prince Gortschakoff resisted the universal wish. On the 17th of July, he wrote to Prince Dolgorouki: "It would be simply madness to take the offensive against an enemy superior in number and entrenched in impregnable positions. I could, doubtless, some morning make an advance; on the morrow I might drive back the enemy's outposts, and prepare a marvellous report of this military exploit; on the third day I should be defeated with a loss of ten or fifteen thousand men; and one day later, Sevastopol would be taken, together with the larger part of the army. I sincerely wish, my dear prince, that you could be convinced, as I am, that the circumspect conduct in which I persevere is really the one best suited to our present condition." But suffering and anxiety spoke louder than prudence; on the 9th of August, notwithstanding the advice of General Todleben and that of Prince Gortschakoff, an attack was determined upon in a council of war, where General Vresky, the czar's aide-de-camp, just arrived from St. Petersburg, vehemently supported this decision. "It is useless to deceive ourselves," wrote the general-in-chief on the 15th of August, "we attack the enemy under most disadvantageous conditions. If things go badly, it will not have been my fault. I have done what I could, but the situation, ever since my arrival in the Crimea, has been too bad."

Prince Gortschakoff was not deceived; the Russian movement, carried out with great courage, had been well planned, but fatal mistakes in its execution brought it to naught. The attack was upon the French and Sardinian troops, with General Scarlett's English cavalry, who were established along the Tchernaya. The Russians had commenced their sortie before midnight, on the 15th of August with a force of about sixty thousand men; they were sheltered by the fog in the early hours of the morning, and were at first successful in their attack on the French and Sardinians. But the tide of battle soon turned; the Russians were driven back across the river, and routed with very heavy loss. The Russian loss was estimated at fifteen thousand men, while that of the allies fell below two thousand.

The fate of Sevastopol may be said to have been determined by the battle of the Tchernaya. Closer and closer the lines of the besiegers were drawn around the place, until in front of the Flagstaff and Central bastions the trenches were but a few yards distant from the Russian works. From the 17th of August the city was cannonaded day and night incessantly. On the other hand, the Russians, who had already one bridge over the harbor, were beginning another; within the city they were throwing up a new interior line of defences, and from the battered earthworks the guns thundered as ever, and a bright and heavy fire of musketry from the parapets showed the courage and devotion of the garrison.

The allied forces before the town now amounted — exclusive of the Turks — to about one hundred and fifty thousand men; they had in battery eight hundred and three guns. The final bombardment of the town — that described by Gortschakoff as a “fire of hell” — began at daybreak, on the 5th of September. Over two hundred guns and mortars were brought to bear upon the Malakoff, and it was almost immediately silenced, but the Redan and the other principal batteries continued to fire all day long. Sometimes the fire of the allies would slacken a little, and then be renewed with redoubled fury. When night came it did not put a stop to this hurricane of fire and iron which beat upon the devoted town. For two days and two nights longer this bombardment continued, while a steady fire of musketry was directed upon the parapets from the advanced trenches. And now the assault was announced for noon of the 8th. That hour had been selected because it had been the custom, on both sides, during the hot weather, to slacken fire for two or three hours in the heat of the day, and it was believed the enemy would be deceived into the supposition that this was merely the usual respite; and such proved to be the case.

On the 8th of September the grand assault was made. The 1st Zouaves and the 7th of the line led the French attack. Leaping over the trenches, they ran forward, dashed into the great moat six yards deep and seven wide, scaled the steep slope of the opposing bank, and, climbing over the parapet and through the embrasures, crowded into the Malakoff redoubt. Inch by inch, the Russians gave way. New masses of French troops were poured in, until at least ten thousand men were collected within the great work, three hundred and fifty meters long and one hundred and forty-six wide. A great French flag was raised above the broken walls, signal to all the allied armies that the Malakoff was taken. The attack upon the Little Redan, a redoubt further to the right, was made with equal gallantry, but proved unsuccessful, the heavy guns in the second line of defence, with the guns of the Russian ships-of-war, forcing the assailants back at last with heavy loss.

The English attack was destined to bear upon the Great Redan, but to reach it the storming-parties had to cross an open space of one hundred and eighty meters, swept by the guns of the Redan and of the Barrack batteries. Moreover, they could not hope to surprise the garrison, for the French flag was already flying above the Malakoff at the moment fixed for the English advance. The attack was made bravely, but was repulsed, and General Simpson was compelled to withdraw his troops, promising a new effort in the morning.

The morrow came, but there were no longer enemies to be attacked. At four in the afternoon of the previous day Prince Gortschakoff, satisfying himself by a personal inspection that there was no chance to recover the Malakoff, had decided upon a retreat. As soon as it was dark, riflemen and artillerymen were placed in all the works left to the Russians with orders to keep up a steady fire. Behind them some battalions were posted as reserves, and all the rest of the troops were to march over the bridge to the north side. This being accomplished, the reserves were to follow ; then the rear guard was to spike their guns, fire the magazines and effect their retreat. These orders were carried out punctually, but so great a commotion could not entirely escape the notice of the allies. It had been detected from the Malakoff, from Mount Inkerman, and from the allied fleet. Before midnight the French had reconnoitred the Little Redan, and Sir Colin Campbell of the Highland Divisions posted for the attack of the Great Redan, had ascertained that this redoubt was also abandoned. But an anxiety in relation to mines kept back the allies from an advance, and their prudence saved them. Very soon explosions were heard in every direction within the town, and fires broke out. About four o'clock in the morning the magazines of the Redan and the batteries near it blew up with tremendous noise. Not less than thirty-five magazines exploded from the forts and bastions, adding to the general wreck of the town. Most of the ships had been scuttled ; two were burned where they lay. A thick smoke hung like a canopy above the town.

CAPTURE OF THE MALAKOFF.

“ It is not Sevastopol that we abandon to them,” wrote Prince Gortschakoff, “ but the burning ruins of the city, which we ourselves have destroyed, having maintained the defence in a manner which our grandchildren will be proud to tell of to their posterity.” It was with the greatest hesitation, and with endless precautions, that the allied armies ventured to take possession of the mutilated corpse of their conquest. For many months fires yet smouldered at certain points, and as late as the 10th of November the Quarantine sea-fort was blown up by the explosion of one of the garrison's mines. The last farewell of the Russians, on the afternoon of the 9th, had been the explosion of Fort Paul. Fort Nicholas alone, of all the forts on the south side, escaped destruction. On the 11th the Russians from the north side burned their last ships in the Great Harbor. Of the great Black Sea fleet, there were left only stumps of masts floating on the water, or smoking pieces of timber which the waves bore on shore, and the allied soldiers picked up to feed their camp-fires.

At the commencement of the war, when the allies laid siege to Sevastopol, the statesmen of Europe had been very careful to say that the taking of the city would not put an end to hostile operations, or bring about the defeat of Russia. In the month of September, 1855, after the long phases of the siege, and the unheard-of obstinacy of the defence, the fall of Sevastopol represented the complete and final victory of the allies. All Europe felt this; and notwithstanding the resolute attitude of the Czar Alexander, who went himself to the Crimea to visit the brave defenders of Sevastopol, Russia felt it also. An unfruitful attempt upon Eupatoria, the little encounter at Khanghill, and the loss of Kinburn, a Russian fort at the mouth of the Dnieper, completely proved the exhaustion of the Russian army. The defence of Kars, a city of Asiatic Turkey, by Colonel Williams, an English officer in command of a Turkish garrison, had attracted the attention of all Europe, lasting from the early part of June till late in November. Its fall, which circumstances rendered inevitable, gave to the czar that show of a success which, even though of small value, is precious to brave hearts sadly relinquishing their efforts at resistance.

Fresh troops had been sent out to Crimea, making for the allies a total of over two hundred thousand men, of which nearly three-fourths were French, and there was some idea of another campaign to complete the conquest of the Crimea. Meanwhile, a complete demolition went on of what remained of the forts, docks, and barracks of Sevastopol, both the north and south sides. The destruction of the docks was a work of vast labor and difficulty, requiring almost as much skill as had been bestowed upon their construction. With this ended the military operations of the war.

THE FORTRESS OF KARS.

For some weeks Austria had busied herself once more with negotiations in the interests of peace. Russia was at last ready to yield; France was weary of a war, glorious indeed, but practically unuseful to herself; England had gained the most by the war, and the English nation would not have consented to any terms but those specially to her advantage. When the congress, which opened at Paris on the 25th of February, adjourned (April 16th), those who in the English Parliament had advocated a prolongation of the war, found themselves reduced to silence. At the opening of the session, Lord Palmerston had expressed the opinion that the future chances of the war were in England's favor. "No doubt," he said, "the resources of the country are unimpaired. No doubt the naval and military preparations which have been making during the past twelve months, which are now going on, and which will be completed in the spring, will place this country in a position, as regards the continuance of hostilities, in which it has not stood since the commencement of the war. We should, therefore, be justified in expecting that another campaign—should another campaign be forced upon us—would result in successes which might, perhaps, entitle us to require,—might, perhaps, enable us to obtain even better conditions than those which have been offered to us and have been accepted by us. But if the conditions which we now hope to obtain are such as will properly satisfy the objects for which we have been contending—if they are conditions which we think it is our duty to accept, and with which we believe the country will be satisfied, then, undoubtedly, we should be wanting in our duty, and should not justify the confidence which the country has reposed in us, if we rejected terms of that description, merely for the chance of greater successes in another campaign." Lord Clarendon and Lord Cowley represented the interests of England at the Congress of Paris; in concert with the plenipotentiaries of France, Austria, Prussia, Russia, Turkey, and Piedmont, they decided upon the conditions under which peace should be re-established in Europe.

The exchange of conquered places; a recognition of the dignity and independence of Turkey; the "neutralization" of the Black Sea henceforth to the commerce of all nations, and its interdiction to the ships of war of all with the exception of a few light vessels belonging to the different nations as a kind of maritime police, and the prohibition of any military or maritime arsenal on the shores of that sea; the free navigation of the Danube, and a rectification of the frontier of Bessarabia to the advantage of Moldavia; certain regulations concerning the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus; finally, a guarantee to the Principalities, Moldavia and Wallachia, under the suzerainty of the sultan, of the immunities and privileges now enjoyed by them, no separate right of intervention in their affairs being claimed by any one of the contracting Powers: these were the main points of the treaty signed at Paris, March 30th. Meantime (February 21st), a firman had been issued by the sultan, granting, as a free concession, the right to hold and exercise all creeds in the Ottoman States, making all subjects of the Ottoman Empire eligible to public office, and instituting other important reforms. A special tripartite treaty was later agreed to for the protection of the Ottoman Empire. This was signed on the 15th of April, and the last days of the convention were occupied in regulating the right of search, and other rules of maritime war.

Thus ended the Crimean war. It had cost England about twenty-four thousand men, and fifty-three million pounds sterling; the French loss was about eighty thousand men. The Russian loss cannot be estimated with exactness; from three to five hundred thousand men are believed to have perished on the field of battle, in hospitals, and along the roads. Sufferings such as these surely outweigh the advantages definitely attained. The Russian fleet had been destroyed, and the road to the East made more secure for English commerce. At the same time, England had prolonged the existence of the Ottoman Empire.

“The war may perhaps secure peace in the east of Europe for the next twenty-five years,” Lord Aberdeen said. The practical gain from the war belonged, in the end, to England, notwithstanding her disappointments and failures, while the military glory fell to the share of France, intoxicated too often with successes in which are lacking the elements of real and lasting advantage.

CHAPTER IX.

THE INDIAN MUTINY.

THE important advantages which she alone had derived from the Crimean war did not console England for the feeling of humiliation which weighed upon her. Her army's exploits had been glorious; the indomitable courage of her soldiers had been conspicuous in every engagement; the nation's strength and her liberality had been displayed before the eyes of Europe in all the phases of the struggle, but the broad daylight of free speech and a free press had revealed the faults of generals as well as the courage of the troops, the incapacity of the administration as well as the wealth of the country, which had, in the end, supplied all deficiencies, so that at the close of the war the English soldiers were better fed and better cared for than those of England's allies. The national pride still suffered keenly from those early failures in management which had revealed to England and to the entire world how serious was the disorganization into which the army of Great Britain had fallen during the long years of peace; the national pride was wounded by the last military episode of the war, terminating, as it did, immediately after a disaster suffered by the English troops. This jealous susceptibility soon showed itself in the dissensions which broke out at the close of the year 1856 between England and China, and it weighed heavily in the political balance of the home government.

A little boat—a lorcha, to use the local designation—had taken the name, the “Arrow,” and sailed under the English flag.

SCENE IN A CHINESE HARBOR.

C. SANDS

Her crew was composed of Chinese, who occupied themselves in piracy. She was boarded in the river Canton by Chinese officers, and most of her sailors were arrested. The owners of the lorcha maintained that she was registered as an English vessel, and the English consul at Canton demanded that the sailors should be set at liberty. The Chinese governor, Yeh, formally refused. The registration of the "Arrow" had expired a few days before, and, in respect to the flag, the Chinese governor argued in this way: "A Chinese lorcha buys an English flag," he said; "does that make her an English vessel?" Upon this the English consul appealed to Sir John Bowring, the English plenipotentiary at Hong Kong, and the latter, with decision, supported the demand of the consul and the pirates' claims: "It is no matter whether the lorcha 'Arrow' had the right to fly the English flag or not; the Chinese government had not the right to board a vessel protected by the colors of Great Britain." Notwithstanding this haughty declaration, the Chinese authorities still declined to give up the prisoners, and Sir John Bowring ordered the bombardment of Canton by the English fleet. Upon this, Commissioner Yeh offered a reward for the head of every Englishman. From the 23d of October to the 13th of November the town was besieged; the suburbs were destroyed, the forts reduced, and many Chinese war vessels captured. The English plenipotentiary was believed to have been actuated by a childish desire to make a formal entry into Canton.

Upon the opening of the session of Parliament in February, 1857, the royal speech announced that war had existed for several months between Great Britain and China. Her Majesty informed the country that the insults offered to the British flag, and the infractions of treaties by the local authorities at Canton, had obliged her officers in China to have recourse to force in order to obtain the satisfaction which was refused them. On the 24th of February, Lord Derby brought forward in the House of Lords a motion condemning the conduct of Sir John Bowring, and, two days later, Mr. Cobden moved in the House of Commons that "the papers which have been laid upon the table fail to establish satisfactory grounds for the violent measures resorted to at Canton," and also asked for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the state of the commercial relations of Great Britain with China. The aged Lord Lyndhurst condemned the violence which had been employed towards the Chinese, with all the weight of his eloquence and great legal attainments. "When we are talking of treaty transactions with Eastern nations," he said, "we have a kind of loose law and loose notion of morality in regard to them." In the House of Commons Mr. Cobden's motion was supported by men of all parties, convinced of the injustice of the proceedings and the principles that had been applied to the Chinese. The vote of censure in the House of Lords failed by a minority of thirty-six; the measure proposed in the House of Commons was carried by two hundred and sixty-three votes against two hundred and forty-seven.

Mr. Disraeli challenged the government to appeal to the country. "I should like," he exclaimed, "to see the programme of the proud leaders of the liberal party, — no reform, new taxes, Canton blazing, Peking invaded." Lord Palmerston took at his words the bold spokesman of the Tories. He announced a dissolution, and his appeal to the electors of Tiverton proved that he well understood the temper of the English mind. The national excitability, smouldering since the Crimean war, blazed up at the prime minister's voice, against the "insolent barbarian," who had "violated the British flag, broken the engagements of treaties, offered rewards for the heads of British subjects and planned their destruction by murder, assassination and poison." This was enough for the voters, in vain did the advocates of peace maintain that the Chinese were not barbarians, that their logic was older than Aristotle's, and their moral code antedated that of Socrates. Lord Palmerston declared that the measures taken by the government had been censured by a faction which, if it were to come into power, would make advances to the Chinese government and offer it compensations. "Will the British nation," he asked "give their support to men who have thus endeavored to make the humiliation and degradation of their country the stepping-stone to power?" The electors responded with enthusiasm to the premier's adroit appeal; his adversaries were defeated in their very strongholds. The supporters of peace at any price, as they were called, Messrs. Cobden, Bright, Milner, Gibson, Layard, and others, were not re-elected. The authority of Lord Palmerston emerged from the conflict consolidated and strengthened. The queen's speech on the opening of Parliament announced that her Majesty had sent to China a plenipotentiary fully entrusted to deal with all matters of difference, and that he would be supported by an adequate military and naval force in the event of such assistance becoming necessary. At this very time English troops were fighting in Cabul, in the cause of their old enemy Dost Mohammed, aiding him to repulse the Shah of Persia, who had seized upon Herat in defiance of existing treaties. An expedition commanded by Sir James Outram had set out from Bombay for the Persian Gulf. The campaign proved successful; the Shah of Persia withdrew from Afghanistan and abandoned his claims to Herat. In March, 1857, peace was concluded between England and Persia.

PAGODA, BOMBAY.

The haughty attitude of England, and her promptness to intervene in oriental quarrels, caused a secret feeling in the depths of the little native courts all through the regions of India which were under English supremacy. At the moment when England had been victorious over Persia, and was making ready to coerce the Chinese, a terrible revolt, whose germs were as remote as its outburst was violent and unlooked-for, broke out suddenly at many different points throughout British India. A few days after the celebration in London of the hundredth anniversary of the battle of Plassey, the news of the mutiny arrived there. For six weeks India had been in a blaze, and English rule had been shaken to its foundations; Mahommedans and Buddhists, former conquerors or native population, all who had been subjected to the yoke of the white race, were in arms against it, and labored for its destruction.

The immediate pretexts seemed trivial, and easy to have been avoided by the English rulers of India. It had been determined to arm the Sepoys with the Enfield rifle, and it was said that the cartridges employed with this weapon were greased with a mixture of bullock's fat and hog's lard. It was usual at that time to bite off the end of the cartridge in order to pour out the powder. To taste hog's lard was an abomination to the Mahomedan; to taste the grease of their sacred animal was a profanation to the Hindoo; the former believed themselves defiled, the latter would at once and forever lose caste; both protested against the use of the English cartridges. The Indian government were conscious of their danger, and a proclamation at once denied the wide-spread report of the fatal mixture used upon the cartridges. The use of them was discontinued by order, in January, 1857. Still the rumor spread among the Sepoys that designs fatal to their religion were cherished in high quarters. Manifestations of a mutinous spirit appeared here and there, and several native regiments were actually disbanded.

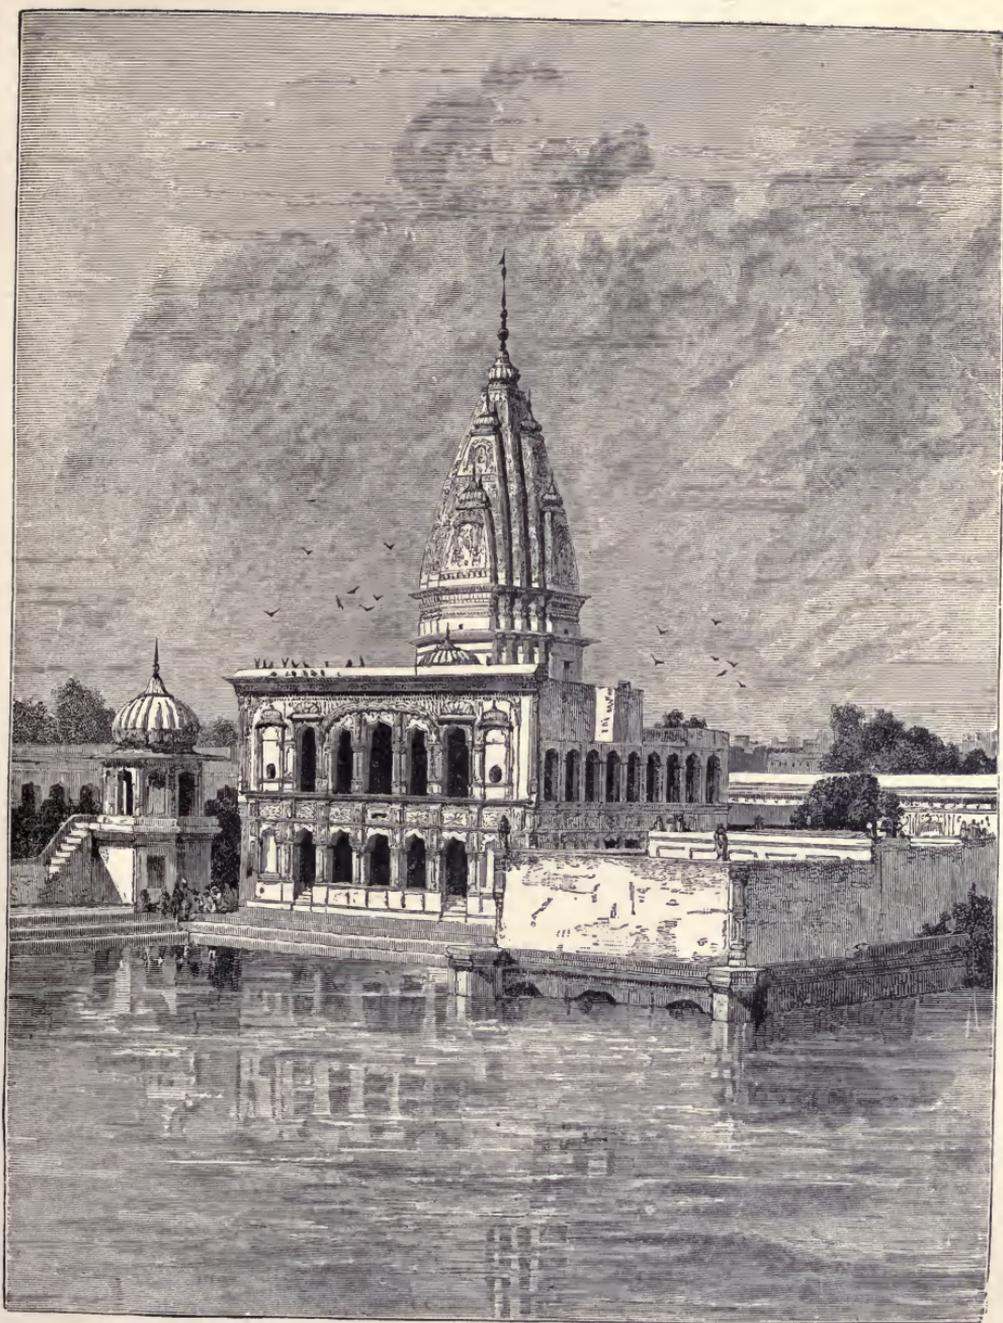

The half-concealed anxiety of the native troops in respect to some attack upon their religion was not the only thing cast into the scale against British rule; a vast network of secret intrigues, independent one of another, yet all directed against the British government of India, spread through the courts of the various princes who had been successively dispossessed. Ten years before the breaking out of the revolt, a new governor-general, Lord Dalhousie, had been sent out to India. His great ability was already well known in England, and he had been a member of Sir Robert Peel's cabinet. His administration transformed the face of India. He introduced there the system of cheap postage; he constructed railways, established the electric telegraph, began great works of irrigation, opened new roads, and began the Ganges Canal. The question of schools attracted his attention, and he instituted a new system for the education of women, a matter so difficult to deal with in the East. The crime of infanticide became rare under the severe legislation with which he punished it. The murderous association of Thugs was broken up, and the practice of the Suttee was absolutely prohibited. In spite of their manifest advantages, so many reforms could not but wound the native population, whose interests Lord Dalhousie thus promoted against their will. His activity did not stop there, however. During the nine years of his government he subjugated the Punjaub, incorporated part of the Burmese territory, and annexed Nagpore, Sattara, Jhansi, Berar, and Oudh. "We are lords-paramount of India," he said, "and our policy is to acquire as direct a dominion over the territories in possession of the native princes as we already hold over the other half of India." Pretexts were not wanting for an application of this policy. The native rulers of the Punjaub had caused, or, at least, permitted the massacre of some English officers. Lord Dalhousie at once invaded their territory. The "Land of the Five Rivers" was peopled by Mussulmans, Hindoos, and Sikhs, the latter a new sect of reformed Hindoos. The Afghans lent their aid to their neighbors. Lord Gough, in command of the English troops, ventured an attack against an overwhelming force, and was repulsed in the battle of Chillianwallah (January 13, 1849). This disaster was soon repaired by the signal victory of Guzerat. The Sikhs were crushed, the Afghans driven back, and Lord Dalhousie annexed the Punjaub. The Maharajah of Lahore offered in sign of submission the famous diamond the Koh-i-Noor, now one of the crown jewels of England.

The kingdom of Oudh had long been under the protection of the East India Company. The terms of the treaty imposed upon the native princes the duty of governing well the population submitted to their rule. The sovereigns of Oudh failed signally in keeping this engagement; their misgovernment was extreme, and its effects were felt by the neighboring nations, frequently molested by bandits in the service of the King of Oudh. Notwithstanding, these neighboring people were far from grateful when Lord Dalhousie seized upon the territory of Oudh in the name of outraged justice and humanity, and submitted the entire region to the regular and equitable rule of the British government; everywhere existed the same feeling brooding beneath the heavy yoke, now less odious because so firmly established.

The discontent spreading among the Sepoy troops, the far-off rumor, strangely exaggerated, of English disasters in the Crimea, the uneasiness caused by the wars in Persia and China, served, in 1857, the bitter hate and long-cherished rancor of the Indian princes. The leaven of revolt was beginning to work in the hearts of all. All subsequent inquiries have not been able to establish the fact of a determined and general plan; however, a concerted signal seems to have excited a simultaneous outbreak at many different points. This was the mysterious distribution of chupatties, or cakes of unleavened bread, through the villages of the north and north-west. Two of these would be brought by a native policeman to the head man of a village, with orders to make ten more, and give them in turn to the policemen of the five next villages. Like the fiery cross of Scotland, calling out the population more rapidly than the regular orders of the best organized government could do it, these chupatties conveyed a mysterious intimation to be ready for some momentous event at hand. Nowhere in the villages still under the control of the Indian princes were these cakes distributed. It was against British rule that the population was thus called to revolt. The propitious moment for the outbreak appeared to be early in the year 1857, shortly after Lord Canning had succeeded Lord Dalhousie, and it was in February of that year that the signal above described was given.

MAUSOLEUM AT LAHORE.

The outbreak of the revolt was local, and manifested itself among the native troops who had been for more than a century employed by the East India Company under the name of Sepoys. Many times, in their various wars with the Hindoo princes, the English had tested the fidelity of the native regiments. The number of native soldiers in the employment of England throughout northern India at that time amounted to about one hundred and twenty thousand, and the European soldiers to about twenty-two thousand. In the whole extent of the three presidencies were nearly three hundred thousand native troops, and only forty-three thousand Europeans in all, of whom five thousand had just been detached for the expedition to Persia, and others had also been ordered for service in China.

The native soldiers in the presidency of Bengal had been since the beginning of the year in more or less open mutiny. Some regiments had been disbanded, some Sepoys executed and others imprisoned. On the 9th of May, several of the Bengal Native Cavalry at Meerut, who had been tried by court-martial for refusing to use the cartridges, were put in chains in presence of their comrades, preparatory to imprisonment for a term of years. On the following day, May 10, at five in the evening, all the native troops encamped at Meerut broke out into open mutiny. They fired upon their officers, killing some of them, broke open the jail, released their comrades and with them fourteen hundred convicts, and massacred some European residents. The English troops rallied, and repulsed the Sepoys, but the latter made their escape and took the road to Delhi, thirty-five miles away. There in a vast and fortified palace, a very lair of Oriental corruption and conspiracy, still dwelt the old King of Delhi, dispossessed of his sovereign authority, it is true, but richly endowed with pensions and privileges, the last representative of the Great Mogul. The revolted Sepoys of Meerut had conceived the idea of taking refuge with this prince, important as a symbol of the past dominion of his race. They were allowed to escape without being pursued, and at nine o'clock on the morning of the 11th, their advanced troops were seen approaching Delhi. They crowded into the palace, claimed the king's protection and promised him theirs, and planted his standard upon the walls. An attack was at once made upon all the white residents of the town, and a frightful scene of carnage followed. The English rallied and defended themselves with the courage of despair, but the Sepoy regiments in and near the town united with the mutineers. A few English officers finally made their escape; forty-three persons, chiefly women and children, remained, who had taken refuge in the palace under the idea that the king would protect them, but on the 18th these were deliberately massacred.

The blaze broke out in all quarters simultaneously. The Punjaub seemed particularly endangered, for it had been but recently annexed after a violent struggle. Sir John Lawrence, the governor, was, however, a man of distinguished ability, as reasonable and moderate as he was able and brave. The population had been well governed and they knew it. Sir John Lawrence was absent from Lahore at the moment when news was received by telegraph of the mutiny at Meerut and Delhi, — the last message sent from Delhi before the city fell into the hands of the mutineers. On the 12th a plot was discovered to seize the fortress in Lahore and massacre every white man. Mr. Robert Montgomery, judicial commissioner at Lahore, who had full authority in the governor's absence, gathering the English troops, ordered a parade of all the regiments, and just when the Sepoys were brought by their evolutions in front of twelve loaded cannon, ordered them to pile arms. They obeyed, and the Punjaub was saved. Similar action was taken at other points in the Lower Punjaub, and the province, remaining faithful to English rule, became a base for military and administrative operations which made it possible to stifle the rebellion and re-establish the authority of the English government.

PALACE AND PARK OF THE GRAND MOGUL.

Lord Canning, the governor-general, was happily endowed with a calm, firm courage, and a generous equity capable of resisting the pressure of his own anxiety and the panic-terrors which at this time agitated all the English population of India. Anger, indignation, and alarm had invaded even the bravest souls, and rumor outran reality in its tales of terror. Calcutta was in a frenzy against the rebel Sepoys, and almost against her own governor, because he did not share in the frantic excitement of the hour. "Clemency Canning," he was called, with an irony converting the praise into an insult. Lord Canning's sympathy for the Sepoys was well known; he had regarded them as the ignorant victims of an error not entirely contemptible, which it was necessary to correct without resorting to violence. When the insurrection broke out, Lord Canning displayed the most indefatigable activity, and the most indomitable resolution to remedy a terrible evil without at any time aggravating it by unwholesome irritation and reprisals unworthy of a Christian country and a Christian faith. Seconded in his difficult task by his noble wife, who shared all his fatigues and all his anxieties, he was destined, with her, to sink under the burden after having courageously borne it to the end. Lady Canning died without seeing England again; Lord Canning, a solitary and broken man, returned home only to die.

When the news of the victorious insurrection at Delhi reached General Anson, the commander-in-chief of the army in India, he was at Simla, among the Himalayas. Orders were at once sent to assemble regiments and artillery to march upon Delhi. More than two weeks, however, elapsed before they were near the city. As soon as he received news of what had occurred at Delhi, Lord Canning dispatched orders to Ceylon, Madras and Mauritius for reinforcements, countermanded the regiments bound for China, and ordered the army from Persia to come to Calcutta. On the 23d of May, the Madras Fusiliers were dispatched towards the scene of war. It was useless to count upon succor from England. Before reinforcements from home could arrive, either India would have saved herself, or else it would remain for the English government to reconquer a country all in arms against her, and intoxicated with success. Extreme personal anxieties excited the ardor of the English troops, for the insurrection was spreading in every direction. All the stations were menaced; the officers and soldiers knew that their own families were in imminent and terrible danger. General Anson, on the road to Delhi, had suddenly died, and Sir Henry Barnard took command. Meanwhile, from all points in the north-west, regiments of revolted Sepoys arrived at Delhi, coming to the defence of their commander and the new emperor of India. Everywhere the mask of submission was quickly thrown off, and hidden passions, excited almost to madness, broke out with a violence and spontaneity which left the little English garrisons no resource but a desperate resistance, ending often in a horrible massacre.

It would be impossible to describe in detail all the isolated tragedies which made the English authorities and residents at Calcutta shudder with horror. The headquarters of the mutiny was at Delhi; at three other important points the revolt broke out with great intensity, and gave rise to unheard-of treachery as well as to the most heroic resistance. At Lucknow, at Cawnpore, and at Jhansi, the influence and efforts of the Indian princes were clearly manifested, directing the fanatical frenzy of the native soldiers. The revolt of the Sepoys became the terrible instrument of royal revenge.

VIEW IN THE HIMALAYAS.

The city of Lucknow, capital of the former kingdom of Oudh, stands upon the right bank of the river Goomty. Its population, said to number three hundred thousand, is crowded in narrow and winding streets; the royal palace stood empty, the former king and his family having been transferred to a residence in the neighborhood of Calcutta. Around the deserted palace were the dwellings of the old courtiers, now deprived of their importance and almost of their means of existence, and regarding with savage hatred the conquerors who had thus reduced them to insignificance. The extreme of corruption prevailed among this colony of parasites, and extended thence into the city. There were about five hundred English soldiers in the city, while the native force amounted to five thousand men. From the beginning of the month, symptoms of revolt had manifested themselves in a regiment of Sepoys, but Sir Henry Lawrence, the noble brother of him who had so bravely secured the Punjaub, had immediately disbanded them, subduing the revolt for the moment by the firmness of his attitude, the leaders of the mutiny being thrown into prison by the hands of their own comrades. The majority of the native troops appeared loyal, but the leaven was already at work; the mutineers were secretly regarded as martyrs. On the 30th of May, the revolt broke out. Sir Henry Lawrence endeavored to drive out the rebels, but their number was too great; malcontents in the town joined with the mutineers. The governor found that his only resource was to fall back upon the Residency and the houses surrounding it, a vast fortified enclosure containing several buildings, many of them having large underground rooms. Here he made preparations to sustain a siege. A strong fort, known as the Muchee Bhowun, commanding the bridge over the river was also occupied by the English; and all the English population, the soldiers' families, the civilians and merchants in the town, were gathered in these two places of safety. Meantime the whole kingdom of Oudh was in a state of revolt, and a force of mutineers were known to be advancing upon Lucknow. Sir Henry Lawrence, with a small force of English and a few native troops who yet remained faithful, sallied out to attack them. An engagement ensued, disastrous to the English, who retreated, and were pursued back to the town. The Muchee Bhowun was separated from the Residency by a force of rebels, and by night the garrison of the fort made their way out of it and joined their companions, having laid mines beneath the Muchee Bhowun, which was blown up, destroying the powder and ammunition which the garrison had not been able to remove.

On the 2d of July, Sir Henry Lawrence, exhausted with fatigue, lay upon the sofa in his room, preparing the morrow's work with his nephew and another officer. Suddenly a shell burst in the room, filling it with smoke and murderous fragments of metal. "Sir Henry, are you hurt?" cried one of the officers, who had been knocked down by the explosion but was uninjured. There was a moment's silence, and then a voice faintly answered, "I am killed." The shell had wounded him so fearfully in the thigh, that there was no possibility of doing anything to save him. He died two days later, brave and calm in the midst of extreme suffering, winning more than ever at this last moment of his life the hearts of those who had been already devotedly attached to him. "Never surrender!" he repeated to those around him; and he desired that there should be engraved upon his tomb: "Here lies Henry Lawrence, who tried to do his duty. . . . Be merciful unto me, O Lord!"

Decimated by disease and casualties, and sorely afflicted by the loss of their brave and able chief, the little garrison at Lucknow still held its ground, the women equalling in courage the most heroic soldiers. Lord Canning was vigilant and prompt in devising measures for their relief. On the 20th of June, General Havelock, just returned from Persia, had been placed in command of the moveable column destined to operate in the kingdom of Oudh. Havelock was as brave as a lion, and one of those Puritans, devotedly religious in heart and life, who have at various epochs been an honor to the English army. A considerable number of his soldiers shared the religious convictions of their leader, — "Havelock's Saints" they were called in the army. Always ready to endure fatigue and to brave danger, the general and his subordinates derived from their faith a courage never soiled by any of those cruel passions too often excited at this fearful crisis. General Havelock cherished no illusions in respect to the task he undertook. On the 3d of July he wrote to his wife: "Mutiny and treachery have been gaining ground every day since I last wrote, and you must expect to hear of great calamities. Lawrence still holds Lucknow triumphantly, but has great odds against him. It is believed that the force at Cawnpore has been entirely destroyed by treachery, having been unfortunately seduced into a treaty by its foes. I march to-morrow to endeavor to retake Cawnpore, and rescue Lucknow."

When General Havelock set out from Allahabad on the 7th of July, Sir Henry Lawrence was no longer living, and the tragedy of Cawnpore was drawing to its close. The little English army, about a thousand men with six guns, set out upon its avenging and succoring mission, at every step hampered on its march by attacks from the rebels scattered throughout the country. Dispatched for the relief of Lucknow, General Havelock learned on his route the fate of the Cawnpore garrison, and perceived that it would be his duty first to recover Cawnpore, and then to march to the relief of Lucknow.

The military station of Cawnpore, midway between Lucknow and Allahabad, was, by its position, one of great importance, and had attracted many merchants and traders, who, with the civil and military servants of the East India Company, formed a considerable European community. It is situated on the right bank of the Ganges, at a point where that river, in the dry season, has a width of a quarter of a mile, — swelled, in the rains, to more than a mile. The city commands the bridge and high road leading to Lucknow, about forty miles away. There were three native regiments of infantry and one of cavalry in Cawnpore. There were also about sixty English artillery-men, and six guns. There were at Cawnpore the wives and children of one of the English regiments which was itself at Lucknow, and there were also the families of the English residents to be protected. Sir Hugh Wheeler, in command at Cawnpore, was an old veteran of more than fifty years' experience, and a good and brave soldier.

On the 20th of May, Sir Hugh Wheeler began to make preparations for defence, and collect the women and children under shelter. On the 21st, a company arrived from Lucknow, sent by Sir Henry Lawrence, and a week later one hundred and sixty English troops arrived with news that others were on the way. There were now in the garrison about four hundred and fifty men in all, and over three hundred women and children. On the 6th of June, the native cavalry revolted, and was shortly joined by the other regiments, and the siege commenced.

A cruel and unscrupulous Hindoo, a man who had been believed a friend of the English, was the leader of the mutineers. Nana Sahib, whose real name was Seerek Dhoondoo Punt, lived at Bithoor, a little town twelve miles up the river from Cawnpore. He was the adopted son of Bajee Rao, Peishwah of Poonah, the last representative of one of the great Mahratta dynasties. This prince had been dethroned in consequence of his treachery towards the English, but he was in receipt of a large pension from the East India Company, and had been assigned a residence at Bithoor. Among the Hindoos it is held a great misfortune to die without sons who will render the last services to the dying, and perform the rites held to be indispensable for the safety of the soul, and adopted children fulfil the same duties and possess the same rights as the natural heirs. Upon the death of Bajee Rao, in 1851, Nana Sahib claimed the continuance of his pension; Lord Dalhousie refused it. The Nana was not discouraged; he sent a confidential agent to London, Azimoolah Khan, a person who had been a servant in an Anglo-Indian family, and had thus added some knowledge of the English language and of English manners to the natural subtlety of his race.

The emissary of the Hindoo prince was well received in English society. He was handsome, clever and insinuating; he was overwhelmed with civilities of every kind, and his personal vanity was flattered to the most inordinate degree. He was in London during the time when the Crimean war was causing a clamorous discontent, and he imagined that he could detect grave anxieties and a serious diminution of English power. On his return by way of Constantinople in the winter of 1855, he was confirmed in these ideas; arriving in India, unsuccessful in his errand, he, however, entertained the Nana with an account of the decline of English power, and nourished in the mind of his master the hope of revenge. Nana Sahib had been allowed to succeed to all the personal possessions of his adoptive father, and he surrounded himself with all the luxury of Oriental life, attracting Europeans about him and lavishing upon them flatteries and attentions. The English residents of the neighborhood of Bithoor were frequent guests at his palace. Now, upon the approach of danger, Sir Hugh Wheeler believed him faithful to the English government, and called upon him for assistance. Nana Sahib at once promised fifteen hundred men, and led them himself to Cawnpore. From the day when he entered the city, the destruction of the English was sure.

The place selected for defence by Sir Hugh Wheeler was unfortunate. It was an old military hospital, consisting of two low buildings large enough to accommodate one company of soldiers. A mud wall had been made by digging a trench and throwing the earth outwards, thus forming a shelter about five feet high. The space enclosed was about two hundred and thirty meters square. A few guns were placed in position, and there were large quantities of muskets and ammunition. Within the barracks were lodged the women and children, while the men fought outside.

Outside of the hospital, in the city and in the suburbs, Nana Sahib reigned as master. He very soon abandoned all pretence; it was a mortal enemy, bloodthirsty and cruel, whom the English general had introduced into the place. On all sides the rebels hailed him as their leader, while all the robbers and scoundrels in the province flocked around their fitting chief.

A summons to yield had been addressed to Sir Hugh Wheeler on the 10th of June, by the Nana, who had now relinquished his first design of leading the mutineers to Delhi to swell the triumph of the new emperor of India. The lure of ambition had added itself to the desire of revenge, and stimulated by those around him and especially by Azimoolah Khan, he now proposed to establish an independent sovereignty upon the ruins of the English dominion. It was, therefore, in this character that he summoned Sir Hugh to surrender, and on refusal, opened fire upon the devoted garrison. From this time, night and day for twenty days, the firing continued. In a few days the original force of mutineers had increased until over ten thousand armed men were collected in Cawnpore.

Meanwhile the greatest distress prevailed in the beleaguered garrison, who were exposed, almost without protection, to the burning rays of an Indian sun in midsummer. Once or twice muskets exploded from the mere heat. A single well within the enclosure supplied water, but it was entirely out of shelter, and men who went to draw water did so at the peril of their lives. The sight of a man going to the well was a signal for the assailants to take aim ; and at night, the sound of the creaking wheels as the men drew water brought upon them a shower of musket-balls. The diet was meagre, and sickness added its ravages to the extreme distress of the situation. In the three weeks that the garrison held out, two hundred and fifty persons died. And still the indomitable courage of a handful of men held in check the murderous wretches, greedy of blood, who howled like wolves outside the enclosure.

Among the revolted Sepoys who had joined Nana Sahib were some of the best native troops in India, and, after a time, these men were again led to the assault ; again repulsed, a feeling began to spread among them that it would be impossible to subdue their formidable opponents. The munitions of the garrison were diminishing as well as their numbers, but the English wasted not a ball nor a grain of powder ; their fire was deadly. The ardor of the Sepoys began to cool, and the prestige of Nana Sahib to diminish. Then the Hindoo prince, with perfidy in his heart, offered proposals for a capitulation. The extreme exhaustion of the little garrison seconded his projects ; vainly had the English courage shone out splendidly in brilliant sorties day after day ; the force outside of men and guns could be constantly strengthened ; the situation of the garrison was desperate, and they knew it better than did their enemies. A proposal was sent to the garrison by the hands of an Englishwoman whom Nana Sahib had captured in the town. It was addressed: "To the Subjects of her Most Gracious Majesty, Queen Victoria," and ran as follows: "All those who are in no way connected with the acts of Lord Dalhousie, and are willing to lay down their arms, shall receive a safe passage to Allahabad." Provisions were promised for the journey, and Nana Sahib undertook to provide transportation.

The agreement was signed on the 26th of June, and the immediate execution was demanded by those acting in behalf of Nana Sahib. The English general refused; it was evening, and he preferred to wait until the next day. Nana Sahib threatened to open fire. "We have powder enough left to blow up the entrenchments and all who attack them," replied Sir Hugh Wheeler. The surrender of the little fort was postponed till the following day.

On the 27th of June, very early in the morning, the feeble garrison, which had held out so bravely, was on its march towards the river. Four hundred and fifty persons, men, women, and children, — the women and children upon elephants and in palanquins, the men, except the wounded, walking, — formed the sad procession. A sufficient number of covered boats had been provided, and at nine o'clock all were on board. At this moment the blast of a trumpet was heard. At this signal the native boatmen, setting fire to the straw roofs of the boats, leaped into the river and made for shore, while a shower of musketry and grapeshot from both sides of the river was poured upon the boats. A great slaughter ensued; only two or three of the boats were floating, the rest not having yet been pushed off, and of the former only one escaped, which, followed by bands of Sepoys, firing upon it, made its way down the river. This boat was finally sunk; and of all its passengers four only at last escaped.

When the firing had ceased, the surviving women and children were brought ashore and taken back into the city, where they were imprisoned in an old hospital, called the Savada House. From this place they were in a few days transferred to narrower quarters, where they were kept closely confined. Disease broke out among them, and several died. The Hindoo princesses, widows of Bajee Rao, commiserated the sufferings of the English captives, and declared that they would throw themselves out of the windows if any further harm were done to the prisoners. The fearful stories of wrong and outrage which later made the blood boil in the veins of every Englishman, whether soldier or citizen, added exaggerated horrors to the cruel reality. The unfortunate women shut up in Cawnpore were destined to die, every one of them, but it was only death, and not shame, which awaited them.

Nana Sahib, meanwhile, was proclaimed Peishwah of Poonah. He visited Bithoor, and there formally assumed the sovereignty. The town was illuminated in his honor, and salvos of artillery saluted the new sovereign. But already plots were rife against him in Cawnpore; the Mussulmans were not disposed to accept the rule of a Hindoo; the population began to dread the vengeance of the English, whose approach was a matter of daily rumor, and they began to escape to the adjacent villages. The Sepoys also began to murmur, claiming their share of the plunder. The new prince returned to Cawnpore, disquieted and anxious, and striving vainly to stupefy himself by every form of excess, in his dread of the terrible anger of those who had been so long the masters of India. Notwithstanding the considerable successes of the rebellion at different points, the more clear-sighted among the Hindoos began to perceive that the English power was by no means overthrown, and would soon re establish its empire.

General Havelock was drawing near. On the 13th of July, he wrote to his wife, after the battle of Futtehpoore: "One of the prayers oft repeated throughout my life since my school-days has been answered, and I have lived to command in a successful action. . . . I will here only say that I marched down upon this place yesterday with harassed troops, intending to attack the insurgents next day, but their fate led them on. Out they sallied and insulted my camp, whereupon I determined to try an immediate action. We fought, and I may say that in ten minutes the affair was decided, for in that short time our Enfield rifles and cannon had taken all conceit of fight out of the mutineers. Amongst them was the 56th, the very regiment which I led on at Maharajpore. I challenged them: 'There's some of you that have beheld me fighting; now try upon yourselves what you have seen in me!' But away with vain-glory! Thanks to Almighty God who gave me the victory! I captured in four hours eleven guns, and scattered the enemy's whole force to the winds. I now march to retake Cawnpore, where alas! our troops have been treacherously destroyed, and to succor Lawrence at Lucknow."

Havelock was advancing, fighting all the way, incessantly harassed by the enemy's bands, but constantly victorious in his encounters with them. On the 15th he secured a bridge which opened to him the road to Cawnpore, and had been vigorously defended by the rebels. The news of this defeat came to Nana Sahib in the night; his star was paling more and more before the reviving prestige of the English. Alarmed and exasperated, he resolved once more to manifest his vengeance upon a detested race. Four or five among the English prisoners were men; these he had called out and shot, and then a company of Sepoys were sent to the building where the women and children were imprisoned, with orders to fire through the windows; but, still dreading their former masters, or, possibly, actuated by motives of humanity, the Sepoys fired over the heads of the captives. Upon this Nana Sahib sent to the prison five men upon whom he could rely; they entered sword in hand, and immediately shrieks began to be heard from within. Twice one of the soldiers came out with his sword broken at the hilt and supplied himself with a new weapon. After awhile, the cries were heard no longer, the men came out, and locking the door went away. In the morning they returned with some attendants; and all the victims, some of whom were apparently not quite dead, were thrown into a dry well near by. On the 17th of July, when General Havelock with his army entered Cawnpore, the horror of one look into that crowded grave was enough to excite in their minds transports of fury which scarcely their rigid Christian convictions were able to control.

During their combat before Cawnpore, the English had been sustained by the hope that they were arriving in season to deliver their countrywomen; at the moment of victory, however, they learned what had happened, and simultaneously the noise of a tremendous explosion indicated that Nana Sahib had blown up the powder magazine. The rebel prince escaped to Bithoor, and thither English vengeance pursued him; losing his adherents daily, he made no attempt to defend himself, and once more fled, setting fire to his palace. From this time he disappeared; he is believed to have taken refuge in Nepaul, but no Englishman ever saw him again.

Having made themselves masters of Cawnpore, General Havelock and his troops were eager to make their way to the relief of Lucknow, but they were surrounded with enemies on all sides. The force at his command did not exceed one thousand men in all, and even this little number was daily wasted by disease. Until the 16th of August he continued in the field, but he was then obliged to fall back upon Cawnpore and await reinforcements.

In the mean time, Sir Colin Campbell, the Crimean veteran, had been sent out to take command of the Indian army. The appointment was made immediately after news of General Anson's death had been received in London, and, on the 13th of August, Sir Colin arrived in Calcutta. His first care was to order reinforcements under Sir James Outram to join General Havelock, but it was not until the 15th of September that these troops actually reached Cawnpore. General Outram, invested with complete civil and military authority for the province of Oudh, would naturally have superseded General Havelock on his arrival, but this the generous soldier would not consent to do. He wrote privately to Havelock: "To you shall be left the glory of relieving Lucknow, for which you have already struggled so much. I shall accompany you only in my civil capacity, placing my military service at your disposal, should you please, and serving under you as a volunteer." On his arrival he issued a divisional order as follows: "The important duty of first relieving Lucknow has been entrusted to Major-General Havelock, C. B., and Major-General Outram feels that it is due to this distinguished officer and the strenuous and noble exertions which he has already made to effect that object, that to him should accrue the honor of the achievement. Major-General Outram is confident that the great end for which General Havelock and his brave troops have so long and so gloriously fought, will now, under the blessing of Providence, be accomplished. The major-general, therefore, in gratitude for and admiration of the brilliant deeds in arms achieved by General Havelock and his gallant troops, will cheerfully waive his rank on this occasion, and will accompany the force to Lucknow in his civil capacity as chief commissioner of Oudh, tendering his military services to General Havelock as a volunteer."

It was, therefore, as a volunteer at the head of a troop of cavalry that Sir James Outram took part in the battle of Munghulwar. The rainy season had now set in, impeding the march of the relieving army and also greatly adding to the discomfort of the besieged in Lucknow, now every day more closely pressed by the enemy. The position fortified by the English at Lucknow was a piece of table-land crowned by the buildings of the Residency. Around these buildings were a number of other houses. A low rampart ran along the northern face of the position; the north-eastern and eastern fronts consisted of houses connected by barricades and banks of earth; on the south a battery commanded the Cawnpore road; on the west the line of fortified buildings continued, and finally an entrenchment completed the circle of defence. Within the outer line were inner posts, and at several points guns had been placed in battery. Each point had its allotted defenders, while the women and children with the sick and wounded were lodged in the underground rooms of the Residency and the other buildings. Around this position were gathered the rebel hosts, who from batteries posted near by, from adjacent houses, and from the roofs and upper stories of the lofty buildings in the eastern part of the town, kept up an incessant fire upon it. The garrison consisted in all of about seventeen hundred men, of whom over seven hundred were natives, the few faithful Sepoys of the province, who had elected to cast in their lot with their masters. The force of the assailants varied from thirty thousand to more than three times that number. In the disorderly condition of the rebel government, if such it may be called, chiefs with large bands of retainers came and went at their will, thus suddenly augmenting or suddenly reducing the besieging force. The active operations of the siege went on, however, without interruption, and the investment was so strict that until after the arrival of the relief in September, only one messenger had been able to get out of the place and return.

Besides an incessant cannonading, the enemy attacked frequently by assault, and carried on a series of mining operations which the English were constantly obliged to counter-work.

Brigadier Inglis, in command of the 32d Infantry, in a very able report gives a view of the situation. "Had it not been," he says, "for the most untiring vigilance on our part in watching and blowing up their mines before they were completed, the assaults would probably have been much more numerous, and might perhaps have ended in the capture of the place. But, by countermining in all directions, we succeeded in detecting and destroying no less than four of the enemy's subterraneous advances towards important positions. . . . The labor, however, which devolved upon us in making these countermines, in the absence of a body of skilled miners, was very heavy. . . . I can conscientiously declare my conviction that few troops have ever undergone greater hardships, exposed as they have been to a never-ending musketry fire and cannonade. They have also experienced the alternate vicissitudes of extreme wet and intense heat, and that too with very insufficient shelter from either, and in many places without any shelter at all. In addition to having to repel real attacks, they have been exposed night and day to the hardly less harassing false alarms which the enemy have been constantly raising. The insurgents have frequently fired very heavily, sounded the advance, and shouted for several hours together, though not a man could be seen, with the view, of course, of harassing our small and exhausted force, in which object they succeeded; for no post has been strong enough to allow of a portion only of the garrison being prepared, in the event of a false attack being turned into a real one. All, therefore, had to stand to their arms and remain at their posts until the demonstration had ceased; and such attacks were of almost nightly occurrence. The whole of the officers and men have been on duty night and day, during the eighty-seven days which the siege had lasted up to the arrival of Sir James Outram, G. C. B. . . . I feel that any words of mine will fail to convey any adequate idea of what our fatigue and labors have been, — labors in which all ranks and classes, civilians, officers, and soldiers, have all borne an equally noble part. . . . Owing to the extreme paucity of our numbers, each man was taught to feel that on his own individual efforts alone depended in no small measure the safety of the entire position. This consciousness incited every officer, soldier, and man to defend the post assigned to him with such desperate tenacity, and fight for the lives which providence had entrusted to his care with such dauntless determination that the enemy, despite their constant attacks, their heavy mines, their overwhelming numbers, and their incessant fire, could never succeed in gaining one inch of ground within the bounds of this straggling position, which was so feebly fortified that, had they once obtained a footing in any of the outposts, the whole place must inevitably have fallen.

“During the early part of these vicissitudes we were left without any information whatever regarding the posture of affairs outside. We sent our messengers daily, calling for aid and asking for information, none of whom ever returned, until the twenty-sixth day of the siege, when a pensioner named Ungud came back with a letter from General Havelock’s camp, informing us that they were advancing with a force sufficient to bear down all opposition, and would be with us in five or six days. . . . The sixth day, however, expired, and they came not. We knew not then, nor did we learn till the 29th of August, thirty-five days later, that the relieving force, after having fought most nobly to effect our deliverance, had been obliged to fall back for reinforcements; and this was the last communication we received until two days before the arrival of Sir James Outram, on September 25th.”

And now, on the 23d of September, General Havelock had arrived before Lucknow. The enemy were in position at the Alumbagh, a large park containing a royal palace outside the town. A hot encounter took place, the insurgents were routed, and General Havelock was master of the Alumbagh. The 24th was spent in devising plans of attack. It was decided to hold the park and palace as a base of operations, and thence to force a way through the palaces and large houses in the eastern part of the town up to the Residency. Before nine o'clock in the morning of the 25th, the troops moved out. Very shortly they came under fire; musketry and grape mowed their ranks, but they pressed on. Early in the afternoon they had made themselves masters of one of the palaces, and here there was a short halt and a discussion among the generals, whether to rest there for the night or complete the work and join their comrades in the Residency. General Outram was in favor of a halt; General Havelock desired to push on, and the eagerness of the soldiers was soon so manifest that the order was given to advance. The column led by the Highlanders dashed out into the streets with a loud cheer, the generals riding foremost. From the windows and roofs of the houses a rain of shot poured upon them, and the street itself had been cut by deep trenches, so that the artillery had to take another road. But the distance was short; the Highlanders and Sikhs stormed up the street, loading and firing as they advanced, and in a few minutes General Outram was dismounting at one of the long-unused gates of the Residency.

Meanwhile the garrison had for two days been aware of the approach of their deliverers. Distant firing had been heard; unusual agitation was visible in the city; finally, the same messenger, who had before served them, brought word that General Outram was at the Alumbagh. "Finally," says an officer, in his diary of the siege, "the sound of musketry was heard, and the smoke of guns distinctly perceived, within the limits of the city! Once fairly seen," continues the narrator, "all our doubts and fears regarding them were ended. And then the garrison's pent-up feelings burst forth in a succession of deafening cheers. From every pit, trench and battery ; from behind the sand-bags piled on shattered houses ; from every post still held by a few gallant spirits, rose cheer on cheer, even from the hospital. . . . It was a moment never to be forgotten."

When the gate was opened and the soldiers entered, the scene was one of the wildest excitement. A special enthusiasm centred around the little group of women and children. The Highlanders crowded about them to grasp the ladies by the hand, and to take the children in their arms. The besieged garrison, on their part, were eagerly asking for news from outside, especially in respect to the progress that had been made in the suppression of the mutiny. For nearly four months they had been kept in ignorance of what was occurring in other parts of India, and their anxiety had, very naturally, reached the highest pitch.

It had been expected that the garrison would be at once withdrawn from Lucknow, but the danger of this movement would have been very great, and Sir James Outram decided to reinforce the post and await further succor. The garrison remained within the lines they had so long defended, while General Havelock with a strong force occupied the palaces and buildings in the eastern part of the city which the troops had seized on their path. The English remained for eight weeks longer in a state of siege in Lucknow, till, finally, Sir Colin Campbell, arriving in person, completed the work General Havelock and Sir James Outram had begun.

Meanwhile Delhi had at length surrendered, after a long and arduous siege. About the middle of May, it will be remembered, upon the defection of the Sepoy regiments, the English officers and civilians who remained alive had made their escape from the city. A month later a little army of English and faithful native troops fought their way up to the very walls of Delhi, and sat down before the city in a siege which was destined to last three months. The position of the besiegers was strong and defensible, they were, nevertheless, harassed by incessant attacks, which they repulsed gallantly, and often themselves were, in turn, the attacking party. Reinforcements, meantime, arrived on both sides, and the siege assumed daily more and more formidable proportions. The British army, at the beginning of July, amounted to nearly seven thousand men. Their force, however was far inferior to that of the rebels, and it was only when the last reinforcements and the siege-train arrived that it was possible to assault successfully. On the 13th of September there had been made two great breaches in the walls, and on the 14th the city was stormed. The assault was successful, and at night the English army had made a lodgment in Delhi. Four-fifths of the city remained still in the hands of the enemy, and it was not until the 20th that the victory was completed, every large building or fortified post having been taken or abandoned.

The victory was saddened by the death of Brigadier-General Nicholson, one of the most brilliant and highly esteemed officers of the Indian army. He was leading an attack upon the Lahore gate of the city when he fell, shot through the chest. He died on the 23d, and was buried outside the walls of Delhi.

The old king, with three princes of his family, had taken shelter in the tomb of the Emperor Humayoun, a vast structure which, with the buildings surrounding it, formed a sort of suburb to the city. A young officer, Lieutenant Hodson, begged permission to go and capture him. Hodson had once been in a civil charge in the Punjaub, whence he had been dismissed in consequence of his severity towards an important native chief. An ambitious, brave and able man, he had eagerly sought an opportunity to make a new path to success, and on the outbreak of the mutiny had gladly accepted a commission to raise a full regiment of Irregular Cavalry. He had also been made chief of the Intelligence Department, and he had already distinguished himself more than once by the most brilliant and daring acts. It seemed to him that the capture of the royal family of Delhi was essential to complete the English victory. Having obtained the desired permission he rode out with fifty of his troopers to the tomb. The whole place was crowded with natives, but Hodson rode boldly up, and a negotiation was opened. His life being promised him the king surrendered, and, with his favorite wife and her son, were brought in prisoners and delivered over to the English general. The old king was eventually tried, found guilty, and sentenced to transportation; and finally died five years later at Rangoon.

The next day Hodson returned to complete his work by seizing the three royal princes, who yet remained surrounded by their followers. The princes tried to obtain conditions, but this was denied them; but it seems probable that they anticipated that the same clemency which had been shown to the king would be extended also to them. They, therefore, yielded unconditionally and were taken away under escort. Then the crowd of their followers, five or six thousand in number, were ordered by Hodson to lay down their arms. They obeyed for the moment, but as the little English band made their way back towards the city with their prisoners the crowd gathered again and pressed so closely around them that Hodson and his lieutenant began to feel that the danger was becoming too great. "I think we had better shoot them here; we shall never get them in," Hodson said at last. He halted his troop, barred the road with a guard before and behind the cart in which the prisoners were; then taking a carbine from one of his men he explained who the criminals were and why they were to suffer death, and then shot them with his own hand.

Some days before this Hodson had written in a letter to a friend that if he should get into the palace of Delhi the House of Timour would not be worth five minutes' purchase. And on the day after he wrote, "In twenty-four hours I disposed of the principal members of the House of Timour the Tartar. I am not cruel, but I confess that I do rejoice in the opportunity of ridding the earth of such ruffians."

Lieutenant Hodson, however, deceived himself; at this terrible moment he was actuated by that fierce and instinctive cruelty which had been aroused in the heart of almost all Englishmen at home as well as in India, at this moment of peril for English rule in India, and at the long cry of grief and terror raised by those who were victims of the mutiny. The moral sense was obliterated in almost every soul, and the few who, like Lord Canning, resisted the contagion, were accused of weakness and cowardice by their infuriated countrymen. At more than one point the savage character of the punishment testified to the fierce instincts of the human animal, excited by prolonged atrocities and maddened by the thirst for vengeance. Mr. Disraeli in the House of Commons, asserted this with indignant truth: "Public anger in India," he said, "is making Nana Sahib an example for English officers to imitate." Lieutenant Hodson was himself killed before the close of the war, but his action has remained the type of much that was done in India, and of yet more that was said in public and in private both in Calcutta and in England.

Other successes followed the fall of Delhi. The tide had turned, and the full restoration of English authority in India was but a question of time. The final relief of Lucknow was now the matter in hand. Sir Colin Campbell occupied himself through the month of October in organizing a force which was collected at Cawnpore. Here, on the 5th of November, he arrived personally; on the 9th he reached the Alumbagh, and on the 14th the advance was made. All the force which he had been able to collect amounted, at this time, only to about five thousand men, but the English in India were accustomed to great disadvantages in numbers, and their courage was not at all diminished by the conditions under which they were to fight. From point to point the English advanced, but the enemy was very strong, and disputed the ground inch by inch, so that it was not until the 17th that the lines of the Residency were reached, and Sir Colin Campbell had "the inexpressible gratification" of meeting face to face Sir James Outram and General Havelock.

The two generals had supposed that Sir Colin would at once complete the capture of Lucknow; but the necessity of other operations prevented this. To withdraw the garrison and treasure in safety was all that the commander-in-chief was now able to do, and this was accomplished with great skill. He directed a heavy fire against one of the enemy's strongholds, as if it were his design to storm it; then, during the night of the 22d of November, all within the Residency were withdrawn through the lines of pickets, first the sick and wounded, then women and children, the stores of grain and the large mass of treasure, finally, the troops, and halted in the Dilkoosha park and palace, not far from the Alumbagh. Thither, on the following day, they were transferred, and, on the 27th of November, Sir Colin Campbell, leaving a strong force in the Alumbagh under Sir James Outram, marched to Cawnpore, where his presence was urgently required.

Before Sir Colin marched away, however, General Havelock died after a few days' illness, universally honored and lamented. He had just been made Knight Commander of the Bath, and had received the rank of baronet, a fitting reward for his long and brilliant services in India. Through the late campaigns the solitudes of a father had been added to a general's anxieties. His son had fought by his side with a gallantry worthy of his name. Fighting his way up to the Residency in Lucknow, under a rain of fire, the moment General Havelock was within the gates, amid the acclamations and tears of the relieved garrison, his first words had been, turning to the aide-de-camp at his side: "Look to the boy, he is wounded." The father had been forced to see his son fall without himself turning an instant from his duty, but, the work accomplished, the father's heart at once remembered his wounded child, whose suffering saddened the victory. On the 24th of November General Havelock died. "For more than forty years," he said, "I have so ruled my life that, when death came, I might face it without fear."

"On the 25th," says Mr. Brock, his biographer, "a grave was prepared for his remains in the Alumbagh, and Sir Colin Campbell with his surrounding comrades, who had followed him through so many vicissitudes, buried him out of sight, in sure and certain hope of the resurrection and eternal life."

The rebels at Lucknow were held in check by General Outram while Sir Colin Campbell returned to Cawnpore. There he found the English troops besieged by the rebels. As soon as the general-in-chief had quitted the town, one of Nana Sahib's lieutenants, Tantia Topee, a Mahratta Brahmin, endowed with rare military talent, had advanced upon Cawnpore at the head of a large hostile force. General Windham, who was left in command at Cawnpore had gone out against them, but being defeated, had been compelled to retreat into his intrenchments within the city while the enemy occupied Cawnpore. Sir Colin Campbell's arrival was most opportune; he was for a few days obliged to occupy himself in securing passage for the huge convoy from Lucknow to Allahabad, but as soon as he was free from these encumbrances, he at once made a sharp and prompt attack upon the rebels, defeating them with great loss. Thirty-seven guns were taken, the rebel force scattered in the most demoralized condition, and Tantia Topee made his escape. In April, 1859, he at last fell into the hands of the English, when he was tried for his share in the Cawnpore massacre, and hanged.

THE IMAMBARRA, LUCKNOW.

In March, 1858, Lucknow was finally completely subdued. For many months the campaign had now been carried on with a consummate skill which had not been possible amid the terror and difficulty of the first period. Strong reinforcements had also been sent out from England. The losses of the English had been numerically inconsiderable, those of the rebels were everywhere enormous. Among the officers who died at this time in India, Captain Sir William Peel, son of the great statesman, was one of the most lamented. He made part of Sir Colin Campbell's relieving army at the head of a sailor brigade, and conducted himself "with extraordinary gallantry," says Sir Colin Campbell.

The attack upon Lucknow was directed by Sir Colin Campbell in person. Sir James Outram was also there. On the 4th of February, the siege began in form; Lucknow was at this time defended by about one hundred and thirty thousand men, regulars and irregulars; the English army did not exceed twenty-five thousand men. On the 11th, some of the most superb palaces of Lucknow were stormed, the Imambarra, the Kaiserbagh, and the Begum's Kothie. Mr. Russell, the Times correspondent, writes of the sack of these palaces: "It was one of the strangest and most distressing sights that could be seen. . . . The men are wild with fury and lust of gold — literally drunk with plunder. From the broken portals issue soldiers laden with loot, shawls, rich tapestry, gold and silver brocades, caskets of jewels, arms, splendid dresses. Some come out with China vases or mirrors, dash them to pieces on the ground and return to seek more valuable booty. . . . Lying amid the orange-groves are dead or dying Sepoys, and the white statues are reddened with blood. Leaning against a smiling Venus is a British soldier, shot through the neck, gasping, and at every gasp, bleeding to death. Here and there officers are running to and fro after their men, persuading or threatening in vain."

Far in the heart of Central India the standard of rebellion was held up vigorously to the very last by a woman's hand. When the territory of Jhansi had been annexed by Lord Dalhousie, the English governor had declined to recognize the adopted heir of the late rajah. Upon this the ranee, his wife, had refused to accept a pension from the English government, and as soon as the mutiny broke out in the north-west she eagerly instigated revolt among the native regiments in her city. There were in all but fifty-five Europeans in the city, including women and children; they took refuge in the fort and for a couple of days defended themselves bravely. Finally, the ranee sent word that if they would surrender their lives should be spared, and they should be sent in safety to some other station. The little garrison surrendered, and marching out were received by the soldiery and murdered, men, women, and children alike.

The ranee thus coming into full possession of the town, fortified it strongly in every way, and held it almost undisturbed till late in March, 1858. At this time Sir Hugh Rose, in command of the Central India force, having swept the country round about, arrived before Jhansi and laid siege to the place. Tantia Topee, Nana Sahib's former lieutenant, was co-operating with the ranee, and on the arrival of the British troops he departed for Calpee to organize a relieving force. On the 5th of April, Jhansi was taken. The ranee made her escape, and, joining Tantia Topee, they took the field against Scindia, the prince of Gwalior. Scindia had remained faithful to the English, and the rebel chiefs resolved to dethrone him. Tantia Topee entered Gwalior in disguise, and intrigued so successfully with the leaders of the disaffected in the town, that, in a sortie ventured by Scindia on the 30th of May, his troops deserted him, with the exception of a body-guard of horse. Scindia made his escape to Agra, while Sir Hugh Rose advanced upon Gwalior; the rebel army in and near Gwalior was led by the ranee, dressed as a man, and fighting like one. Again and again she rallied her forces to the charge, and finally fell, mortally wounded, on the 17th of June. "The best man upon the side of the enemy," wrote Sir Hugh Rose, in a general order, "was the woman found dead, the Ranee of Jhansi."

SCINDIA, PRINCE OF GWALIOR.

The last sighs of the dying rebellion now no longer lifted the inert mass upon which weighed the English rule in India. The revolt was crushed, and order re-established. The offenders had been punished, their accomplices terrified; and now the English government had time to express its approval of those princes and territories which had remained faithful, and to prepare their recompense. With less delay, the English, both people and government, had rendered homage to the brave men whose gallantry had saved the Indian Empire.

On the 20th of December, 1858, Sir Colin Campbell, recently made Lord Clyde, announced officially to the governor-general at Calcutta that the campaign was at an end, and that there was no longer even a vestige of rebellion in the province of Oudh, the last remnant of the mutineers and insurgents having been finally driven across the mountains which form the barrier between the kingdom of Nepaul and her Majesty's empire of Hindostan. On May 1st, 1859, there was public thanksgiving in all the churches of England for the pacification of India.

For more than two hundred and fifty years a commercial association under the name of the East India Company had exercised a control over the interior affairs as well as over the commerce of the peninsula of Hindostan. For more than a century the victories of Clive and the base negligence of the government of Louis XV. had secured to the English the empire of India, an empire which France had for a moment gallantly disputed with her. Province after province had been annexed to the territory which bore the yoke of the East India Company; prince after prince of the native races had been dispossessed, imprisoned, or exiled; while, up to the day of the outbreak of the Indian mutiny, the great mass of the English people had remained absolutely ignorant of the events as well as of the interests that were rife in their vast Oriental possessions, visited only by men eager to make a fortune rapidly, or by soldiers ordered for duty there. In his brilliant essay upon the life of Lord Clive, Lord Macaulay complains loudly that, while every school-boy knows the story of the Spanish conquests in America, the history of Montezuma, of Cortez, and of Pizarro, the majority of cultivated men in England are quite ignorant in respect to the conquests and growth of the English empire in India. Questions in Parliament relative to the government of this vast country were the affair of but a few persons, and seemed to excite no interest whatever in the public mind. As the lightning's flash suddenly tears the clouds which cover the sky, so the mutiny in India had torn the clouds of tradition, ignorance, and indifference. All England desired to know this country which she had now, for the first time, learned to dread, the control of which, long negligently held, she had seen nearly slipping from her grasp. The first emotion was that of surprise, followed immediately by indignation and the desire of vengeance. When the mutiny had finally been extinguished, English statesmen began to ask themselves what had been the causes, whether these causes might not again recur, and whether the measures of repression employed had been in all cases just and moderate. In earlier times, when Lord Clive and Warren Hastings had ruled the Hindoos with despotic sway, the clear light of parliamentary investigation had been let in upon the darkness and intrigues of Oriental courts and upon all the procedures of the English ruler in his dealings with the native princes. With even stronger reason in 1858 was the government of this ever-increasing empire destined to become the object of a discussion as searching as it was ardent and impassioned. The spontaneous act of Lord Ellenborough, one of the members of the Indian government, furnished the first and a very legitimate pretext for this discussion.

On the 3d of October, 1858, Lord Canning had issued a proclamation addressed to the chiefs of Oudh, announcing that, with the exception of the lands held by six loyal proprietors, all the territory of Oudh had become the property of the English crown, to be disposed of as might hereafter seem suitable. Their personal safety was promised to all who should immediately surrender to the chief commissioner, with the exception of those personally guilty of the murder of English subjects. Their hope for any favors and indulgences, hereafter to be shown them, would depend entirely upon the justice and the clemency of the English government.

The commissioner, Sir James Outram, at once protested against the wholesale confiscation ordered by Lord Canning, affirming that its effect would be disastrous since no doubt the land-owners would refuse to submit, and that it would be necessary to institute a guerilla warfare for their extirpation, in which thousands of Englishmen would be forced to sacrifice their lives. Lord Canning, however, persisted in his intentions. Naturally disposed to clemency, equable and moderate, as had been clearly shown in the early days of the mutiny, when the voices of all urged him to a severity which he was never willing to exercise, it was his design to use gently and generously the power he had arrogated to himself over the inhabitants of the revolted province. He judged, however, as Lord Durham had done years before in Canada, that a new life must begin in the relations between England and the province of Oudh, that the usual course of law was suspended by the fact of a rebellion, and that to exercise the power of a dictator was the surest and best way to re-establish order and justice in a territory but lately independent, revolting, as we have seen, almost immediately upon its annexation.

A liberal reaction had now begun in England. Lord Canning's own supporters in his former policy of moderation and equity at once attacked a measure which they believed both unjust and illegal. Lord Ellenborough went further. President of the Board of Control, and himself formerly governor-general of India, he condemned, with all the fiery enthusiasm of his nature, Lord Canning's proclamation, and took upon himself to make this known at Calcutta, through the medium of the secret committee of the Court of Directors, without consulting his colleagues upon the subject. "Other conquerors," wrote Lord Ellenborough, "when they have succeeded in overcoming resistance, have excepted a few persons as still deserving of punishment, but have, with a generous policy, extended their clemency to the great body of the people. You have acted upon a different principle; you have reserved a few as deserving of special favor, and you have struck, with what they feel as the severest of punishments, the mass of the inhabitants of the country. We cannot but think that the precedents from which you have departed will appear to have been conceived in a spirit of wisdom superior to that which appears in the precedent you have made." Lord Ellenborough's language was as unsuitable as his conduct was unconstitutional, acting as he did without the advice of the council over which he presided. The wisdom, the indomitable courage, the moderation of Lord Canning had powerfully contributed to the re-establishment of the English power in India. He had deserved better of his country than to be lectured thus by Lord Ellenborough, through the medium of the decrepit committee of an expiring Company. England felt this, and the question was at once laid before Parliament; and Lord Ellenborough, taking upon himself the entire responsibility for his act, resigned his office.

The opposition had endeavored to make this incident the ground for an attack upon the ministry; but Lord Ellenborough's resignation changed the situation. Mr. Disraeli commented on the disappointment of the opposition with his usual brilliant sarcasm: "It was like a convulsion of nature," he said, "rather than any ordinary transaction of human life. I can only liken it to one of those earthquakes which take place in Calabria or Peru. There was a rumbling murmur, a groan, a shriek, a sound of distant thunder. No one knew whether it came from the top or the bottom of the house. There was a rent, a fissure in the ground, and then a village disappeared; then a tall tower toppled down; and the whole of the opposition benches became one great dissolving view of anarchy." Parties were, however, much more divided on this matter than Mr. Disraeli's triumph would make us believe. In France, M. de Montalembert, always well informed in respect to the great questions which agitated the Parliament of England, and always eagerly desiring for his own country the noble enthusiasms of a free government, summed up the question itself and the discussions upon it, in a pamphlet, entitled: "Un débat, ou l'Inde dans le parlement anglais." His powerful voice broke the silence which at that time reigned in France, and awakened painful comparisons; the article and the author were prosecuted, and the eloquence of MM. Berryer and Dufaure did not suffice to obtain M. de Montalembert's acquittal.

The discussion in Parliament was heard in the East only as a far-away sound, in no way affecting the conduct of Lord Canning, however bitterly he may have felt it. It had never been his desire to make a literal and strict application of the principles he had judged it useful to lay down. Almost all the great land-owners in the province of Oudh hastened to swear allegiance to the English government. They were responsible for the conduct of the villages, the supreme authority of England moderating their tyranny. The abuses of an earlier time had been abolished, and the native farmers felt themselves under a protection as equitable as it was strong. Lord Caning's plan, condemned in principle, had succeeded in practice, and soon had the suffrages of all, serving as the base on which was founded the great reform now proposed in the government of India by the English.

The Indian mutiny was the death-blow to the famous East India Company. Mr. Pitt had made the Company's administration completely subject to the English ministry; he, however, preserved the independence of the Company in matters of patronage and commerce, while Fox desired to place them under the control of a council nominated by the crown. The Company had held the patronage of the Civil Service until 1853, at which time the system of competitive examinations was put in force. It was in support of this principle that Lord Macaulay spoke for the last time in the House of Commons. A Board of Directors nominated partly by the crown and partly by the Company governed Indian affairs, but its decisions were reviewed and at times revised by the parliamentary Board of Control. The crown nominated the governor-general, but the Company had the power of recalling him. This mixed power necessarily brought about many delays and embarrassments, which made themselves strongly felt at a moment when prompt resolve and decided action were manifestly requisite to save English dominion in India. Public opinion ardently favored the crown's taking possession of the government of India.

The first measure to this effect was proposed by Lord Palmerston in 1858, but his power was already weakened, and he was very soon to resign office. The bill presented by Lord

Derby, which had been Lord Ellenborough's work, introduced into the formation of the council destined to rule the affairs of India so many complications that Parliament would not even listen to a second reading of it. The parliamentary resolutions called out by Lord John Russell served as the base for a new law, which came under hot discussion. The East India Company did not accept its sentence of death with passive resignation. Among the best servants of the Company were Mr. James Mill, and his son, John Stuart Mill; the latter skilfully and eloquently pleaded the Company's cause. In his essay on Representative Government the younger Mill referred to this subject: "It has been the destiny of the government of the East India Company," he says, "to suggest the true theory of the government of a semi-barbarous dependency by a civilized country, and after having done this, to perish. It would be a singular fortune if, at the end of two or three more generations, this speculative result should be the only remaining fruit of our ascendancy in India; if posterity should say of us that, having stumbled accidentally upon better arrangements than our wisdom would ever have devised, the first use we made of our awakened reason was to destroy them, and allow the good which had been in course of being realized to fall through and be lost, from ignorance of the principles on which it depended."

Mr. Mill's presages of evil have not been realized; the bill of 1858 put an end to the authority of the East India Company, but it did not sound the knell of the English rule in India. The governor-general is now a viceroy. The army of the East India Company has now become the queen's army. The bill declares that except for the purpose of preventing or repelling actual invasion of India, Indian revenues should not, without the consent of both Houses of Parliament, be applied to defray the expenses of any war outside of India. Also, that if a commencement of hostilities should be ordered in India, the fact shall be promptly communicated to Parliament. In the matter of civil government, it was determined that the power previously exercised by the Company and the Board of Control should be vested in a Secretary of State for India, assisted by a Council of fifteen members, seven of these to be elected from their own number, by the Board of Directors of the East India Company, and the remaining eight to be named by the crown. Vacancies ensuing among the latter class were to be filled by the crown, and those among the former, after a certain time, by the secretary. The principle of competitive examinations was extended very widely and made permanent.

In accordance with this bill, on the 1st of September, 1858, the government of the East India Company over India ceased forever, and in November of the same year the queen was proclaimed throughout India. The treaties, dignities, rights, and usages then existing were confirmed. The Hindoo people received the assurance that the English government did not claim the right or entertain the desire to interfere in questions of caste or religion. Unconditional amnesty was proclaimed to all in arms against the government who should now return peaceably to their homes, with the exception of those who had been or should be convicted of having taken part in the murder of British subjects, and of those who had harbored such murderers or acted as leaders of the revolt. To the latter class only their lives were guaranteed. In respect to the former, the proclamation asserts, "the demands of justice forbid the exercise of mercy."

India was by no means as yet pacified and submissive. More than once she was destined again to cause England the most serious anxieties, and be to her the occasion of many and grave faults; but she had felt the strong hand of her masters, and she now received from them for the first time, an established constitution and the acknowledgment of her rights. One viceroy after another, called to apply this grand charter of the British Empire in India, was to be chosen from among the most honored and honorable servants of the crown. The first of all was, with good reason, the man who had held up the name and honor of England in India, at a moment when her subjects were in revolt against her all through the vast territory, and when the unreasoning anger of her own children threatened to tarnish her glory. The measures of reform and of economy which marked the last years of Lord Canning's government were the first steps in the new path so wisely and boldly marked out. In March, 1862, Lord Canning left India, and but a few months later, he was laid to rest in Westminster Abbey, that last home of England's great servants.

CHAPTER X.

THE TORY ADMINISTRATION.

LORD PALMERSTON and his ministry had passed through momentous crises, the Crimean War and the Indian Mutiny. They had met and supported the domestic shocks caused by the financial panic of 1857, which had brought ruin to some of the most famous and well-established houses. The Bank Charter Act of 1844 had been suspended, and the Bank of England had been authorized to augment its circulation of notes to two millions sterling; but already confidence was returning, the bank had remained well inside of the limits allowed it, and even a certain reserve had been established. Parliament adjourned at Christmas, and the nation was rejoicing with its sovereign over the projected union of the Princess Victoria, eldest child of the queen, and Prince Frederick of Prussia, eldest son of Prince William, heir presumptive to the Prussian throne. Power seemed secure in the hands of the Whigs, and their sway established on solid bases. The new enterprise of a foreign conspirator, in a foreign country, and against a foreign sovereign, was about to disturb this tranquillity by disturbing the judgment of the English ministry.

Count Orsini was well known in England. Imprisoned by the Austrians in Mantua, he had made his escape and taken shelter across the channel. The incidents of his escape, his noble and handsome face, his expressive eyes and jet-black hair, and that natural eloquence which animates almost all the men of his race, had rendered him popular in all the English cities where he had addressed public meetings, seeking to excite sympathy for oppressed Italy and wrath against her oppressors. The somewhat superficial enthusiasm of the English for all liberal causes has often deceived the exiled patriots of other lands, themselves superficial observers and ignorant of the principles, or, one may say, the instincts which govern the conduct of the English nation. Like Kossuth and like Garibaldi, Orsini allowed himself to be deceived by the flattering welcome which he received personally, and by the sympathy openly and sincerely manifested for his cause. Imbued with the conviction, prevalent throughout Europe, that English public opinion governs England, fatally intoxicated by the empire he believed himself to hold over that public opinion, he hoped for an open intervention in favor of Lombardy and Venetia, an actual taking up of arms, like that of France eighteen months later. At one of Orsini's meetings in Liverpool, a merchant of that city had the courage and good sense to declare openly to the ardent patriot that he was cruelly deceived in respect to the value of the enthusiasm with which the crowd received him, and the practical results for his country to be expected from his generous efforts. Orsini himself soon became aware of the uselessness of his attempts. He was wounded and indignant; proud and inconsiderate, he did not attribute his failure to the mere force of circumstances, to the patriotic good sense of a foreign nation resolved never to be drawn into adventures, even though it may admire the adventurer. The Emperor Napoleon III. had just paid a visit to the Queen of England. Once himself a conspirator, and not very long ago engaged in all the plots of the Italian patriots, the prince had forgotten his oaths; he had sacrificed his promises to his ambition; and now, one of the most powerful sovereigns in Europe, he was employing his power to support the oppressor in Italy and dissuade the English from lending aid to the liberal cause. The imagination of the disappointed patriot grew heated at these thoughts; he went so far as to believe that the emperor was the real obstacle to the intervention of Europe in favor of Italy; that his death would remove this obstacle, and would be, indeed, the just punishment of his perfidy. The secret societies of Europe had long accustomed their members to regard assassination as a legitimate method of serving the cause; Orsini resolved to destroy the Emperor Napoleon III.

On the 14th of January, 1858, as the emperor and empress were driving up to the door of the Opera House in the rue Lepelletier, three bombs went off under the horses' feet, and almost in the carriage. Ten persons were killed and a hundred and fifty-six wounded. As in the case of the infernal machine of Fieschi, directed against King Louis Philippe, the innocent had been pitilessly sacrificed in the hope of destroying a dangerous enemy. The attempt was as foolish as it was criminal; it was directed against a man already favorably disposed towards Italy, whose mind was even then occupied with vague intentions which Count Cavour would soon persuade him to execute. The odious and criminal act of Orsini was not, however, absolutely without effect; it remained and was destined during his life to remain in the mind of Napoleon III. as a warning and a menace. Prince Albert suspected this, without knowing what were the engagements made by the emperor with Count Cavour, when he wrote April 1, 1858: "I fear the emperor is at this moment meditating some Italian development which is to serve as a lightning-conductor; for ever since Orsini's letter, he has been all for Italian independence."

It was an honor to Count Orsini, as it has been to more than one conspirator drawn into crime by political passion, that he cared nothing for his life, if he could by any means serve his cause after the failure of his attempt at assassination. Himself wounded by a fragment of shell, Orsini was tracked by his own blood, and arrested without difficulty. He exhibited no anxiety except to exculpate a man unjustly accused of complicity; while avowing his attempt, he wrote to the emperor imploring his aid in favor of Italy. Righteously condemned, without the emperor's natural clemency being permitted to avail in his favor, he was put to death with Pierri his comrade, and two other accomplices were condemned for life to the galleys.

The public excitement was extreme, and the horror at the crime profound, even among those unfriendly to the imperial government and policy. The general anger was directed against England much more than against down-trodden and oppressed Italy, more even than against the criminal himself. "England is a den of brigands," it was said; "she gives shelter and support to all who work to overthrow European society. Orsini's bombs were made in England; in England the whole plot was laid." The addresses of felicitation which rained down from all quarters upon the Tuileries almost all testified to this national indignation; the language of the colonels of certain French regiments was so insulting towards England that the government was obliged to apologize for having allowed them to be published in the Moniteur. Diplomatic communications were scarcely less aggressive. "Is hospitality due to assassins?" asked Count Walewski, Minister of Foreign Affairs. "Ought the English legislature to favor their designs and their attempts, and continue to protect persons whom their acts have placed outside the common law, and under the ban of mankind?" The declarations of the Duke de Persigny, at that time French ambassador at London, were even more violent both in manner and in substance. "France does not understand this state of things," he said in reply to a deputation from the Corporation of London, "she cannot understand it, and there lies the danger, for she may be deceived in respect to the sentiments of her ally, and cease to believe in England's sincerity."

Better than any other man the Emperor Napoleon III. did understand that state of things whose former advantages his early and constant friend, M. de Persigny, had for the moment forgotten. All the plots of Prince Louis Napoleon had been matured in England; it was in England that he had found shelter after his various attempts to excite rebellion in France; there he had gathered his friends about him, waiting for the day when the wave of revolutions should once more bear aloft a name and a memory. All political refugees, all exiles of all parties had sought and found in London the shelter of which they had need, and that English protection of liberty which extends to opinions and causes the most diverse. In former days the Roman Catholic religion had offered to exiles the asylum of a kindly neutrality. Fugitive princes had found shelter in Rome; but now, the Roman Catholic Church herself was no longer in safety there, and the shipwrecked crowd was flung upon the hospitable shores of Great Britain. Lord John Russell openly acknowledged this in the House of Commons; he declared that it would be impossible to put into execution the English law against enlistments for the service of a foreign power, because all parties in succession were in the habit of violating these laws. In 1820, the cause of Greece against Turkey had been publicly advocated in London by men of the highest distinction, and money, arms, and men were sent out to Greece without the slightest pretence at secrecy. At that very time a legion was recruiting to fight for Victor Emmanuel against the pope, and another to fight for the pope against Victor Emmanuel. In short, for all political refugees, London was at once a sanctuary and an arsenal, where they might at their leisure forge weapons against the government that had driven them out. Undoubtedly this was a formidable privilege, and might become a danger and a menace, if the country granting it did not feel itself absolutely safe against the contagion of the political and moral maladies whose germs were brought to it by all the winds of heaven, and remained confusedly working there.

Upon Orsini's attempt, the French government took the alarm and demanded guarantees from England against the conspirators. "Full of confidence," said Count Walewski, "in the wisdom of the English Cabinet, we abstain from indicating to them the measures which it may be suitable to take. We rely upon them to carefully determine what decision will be most suitable, and we felicitate ourselves in advance upon the firm persuasion that we shall not have appealed in vain to their conscience and loyalty." Lord Palmerston was touched by the confidence which the emperor's government felt in him, and, from the beginning of the reign had been personally pledged to its support; he felt himself obliged to comply with this request, and he advocated in the House of Commons the measures of conciliation which the popular feeling in France appeared to him to demand. A few days later he introduced the "Conspiracy to Murder Bill," which had the object of applying in England the same legislation which already prevailed in Ireland. Conspiracy to murder had been heretofore a mere misdemeanor punished by imprisonment, while in Ireland, it had been made a felony, punishable by penal servitude for a period not less than five years. Lord Palmerston introduced his measure as one of needed reform in legislation, without making any reference to the demands of France or Orsini's attempt upon the emperor's life. The opposition did not allow itself to be deceived by this apparent indifference; the partiality of Lord Palmerston for the Emperor Napoleon was sharply commented on, and the total inefficiency of the proposed measure, — a fanatic plotting the assassination of a foreign ruler, and deterred by the fear of a few years of penal servitude!

About this time, a Frenchman, accused of complicity in Orsini's crime, was arrested in London, at the instigation, it was said, of French emissaries, and public sentiment became every day stronger against Lord Palmerston's bill. Bernard was acquitted by the court before which he was summoned under the existing law. The bill, which had passed on the first reading, was hotly attacked on the second, Mr. Milner Gibson proposed an important amendment, and Mr. Gladstone also spoke eloquently against it. Mr. Disraeli, who had up to this time, skilfully manœuvred in the hope of not compromising himself, while at first voting for the law, now suddenly placed himself in opposition to the proposed measure. Lord Palmerston was irritated and anxious as well as excited; his defence showed this, and the bill was rejected by a majority of nineteen, conservatives and liberals voting together. Lord Palmerston at once decided to resign.

A Tory Cabinet was readily formed under the lead of Lord Derby. Mr. Disraeli merited and received the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, and became the leader of the House of Commons. Lord Stanley, the eldest son of the Earl of Derby, became Colonial Secretary, and soon after Secretary of State for India. He had not inherited his father's oratorical talents, but his prudent and reserved character, his industry, and his devotion to the affairs intrusted to him, gave rise to great hopes in the Tory party, of which later he became one of the most able and trustworthy leaders.

The new ministry was not, and did not feel itself to be, powerful in the Houses. Both brilliant oratory and long experience rendered the opposition master of the situation whenever it should choose to open the campaign. But this was not the tendency of the moment. Lord Palmerston had lost public favor and the majority in the House of Commons; Lord Derby dropped the bill, and the French government did not insist upon its demand, the fruit of a momentary panic. A good understanding was promptly restored between the two nations so lately, also, united by a war waged in common. The internal government of India was reconstructed by a tacit agreement with the chiefs of the Whig party. Questions of domestic policy now occupied the Houses. The Whig Cabinet had laid before Parliament several important measures which had been the objects of serious debate; and the Tory administration now followed in its footsteps. We will rapidly enumerate the important reforms which were thus introduced into the legislation of England from 1857 to 1859.

AUSTRALIAN PIONEERS.

One of the first measures brought before the new Parliament in 1857 was a change in the procedures concerning divorce. This legal and complete separation had always been possible in England in the case of infidelity proven against either party, but the decree could be pronounced only by act of Parliament, and entailed very considerable expense. It was now proposed to remove the jurisdiction from Parliament, and to establish a Court of Divorce expressly to deal with conjugal differences. The opposition was long and eloquent. Mr. Gladstone and many members of Parliament were opposed on principle to rendering divorces facile and within the reach of all. But they strove against a democratic tendency impossible to be resisted in a land where divorce had long been legal in the higher classes of society. The bill was passed, and Parliament was relieved from the scandalous discussions inevitable so long as it was the final arbiter in these unhappy affairs, while the new court was soon crowded with applicants.

Another grave question came up about the same time, — that of the transportation of criminals. This means of getting rid of criminals dated from the reign of Charles II., in whose time magistrates for the first time authorized the deportation of certain convicts to the colonies of North America. The war of independence having set free the American colonies, it became necessary to establish a penal settlement at some more remote point, deportations having meanwhile been legally established by an act of Parliament in 1717. In 1787, the first vessel laden with criminals arrived at Botany Bay, on the eastern shore of New South Wales, and not far from the spot where to-day stands the large and thriving city of Sydney. Convicts were also transported soon after to Van Diemen's Land or Tasmania, and to Norfolk Island, a solitary island in the Pacific Ocean, more than eight hundred miles distant from New South Wales. This little spot, lost in space, became itself the penal colony of the other colonies; convicts committing crimes after their deportation to Botany Bay or Tasmania being a second time transported to Norfolk Island.

In theory, and for the good of the offender as well as for that of society which thus cast him out of its midst, the system of deportation appeared at once the most efficacious and the most humane. The crimes of these convicts had not been such as to call for the death-penalty, while yet rendering them unsuitable to live on terms of equality with honest men. At the same time that it relieved English society of their corrupting presence, deportation offered to them a new career, the possibility of reform, and the means of commencing a better life, while the ticket-of-leave system admitted them to the privilege of working as free men in colonies where often the demand for labor far exceeded the ordinary supply.

The law of 1717 declared that "in many of her Majesty's colonies and plantations in America there was a great want of servants who, by their labor and industry, might be the means of improving and making the said colonies and plantations more useful to this nation." This was the sole solicitude of the statesmen of that period, and such their conception of their duty towards the country they served. The colonies themselves were not slow in complaining. The crimes which had occasioned the deportation of the offenders were in general of such a nature and brought about by such antecedents that the guilty persons brought to their new country more brutality than energy, more demoralization than zeal for labor. When the convicts occupied alone a district converted into a penal settlement, the place became a lair of demons; when they were allowed to be at large in a colony, the honest population was filled with alarm at their crimes, and could with difficulty endure their presence. New South Wales protested against this infected importation. In 1840, Lord John Russell, then Colonial Secretary, turned away the torrent of criminals from the Australian territory, and from that time forward, Van Diemen's Land alone received them. Lord Stanley, when he became Secretary, prohibited the colonists from employing convicts at a price below that of free labor, thus depriving the former of the only advantage they could derive from an insupportable situation. The colonists in Van Diemen's Land protested, following the example of those of New South Wales. Mr. Gladstone for a time suspended the system of deportation. When Sir George Grey attempted to send a considerable number of criminals to the colony of the Cape of Good Hope, the colonists rose against this innovation, and prohibited the landing of the convicts.

The difficulty became every day more serious. A parliamentary commission was appointed in 1837 to investigate the question. The state of affairs brought to light deeply agitated the firmest minds. Norfolk Island, given up to the most hardened of the criminals, had become a very image of the infernal regions. In the colonies where the deported were allowed to work in the service of the free inhabitants, they were under severe restrictions, which, however, did not hinder the development among them of the most frightful corruption of morals. The result of the investigation made it clearly impossible henceforth to oblige the colonies to accept a burden which in general they repulsed with horror. In vain parliamentary commissions studied the subject; they found no issue. In 1853, penal servitude was substituted for transportation for the majority of criminals. Lord Grey proposed that the system of partial liberation, the ticket-of-leave system, practised in the colonies, should be applied to all criminals not under sentence of penal servitude, good conduct being recompensed by a conditional liberation and the right to labor under certain conditions and with the inspection of the police. The system was applied in Ireland under a wise and careful direction; its fruits were excellent, the moral effect upon the criminals real and lasting. But the conditions of success were not always and everywhere attainable; liberation was too readily granted in all cases where the conduct of the prisoners had not been scandalously contrary to the laws of the penal establishment. A crowd of criminals, scarcely trained to submit to the interior discipline of the prison, and having undergone no moral change whatever, were thus every year returned to the society whose laws they at once violated anew. Most of them fell back again into crime, the liberated convicts were again convicted, and the public became more and more alarmed. In 1857, the system of deportation was definitively abolished, save in rare cases, and in a very restricted territory. The system of penal servitude was generally substituted for it,—the ticket-of-leave was suppressed or rendered difficult of application. A new attempt and a new experiment were thus substituted for the earlier systems, whose disadvantages had become manifest. A new step was essayed in the difficult path of punishment necessary for the protection of society, yet not such as to close the door upon the reform and restoration of the criminal,—a difficult problem and often seemingly insoluble even to faith and charity, in presence of human free-will and the natural bent towards evil.

About the same time, the legislation concerning marriage underwent, in Scotland, a first transformation, destined later to become more radical and bring a remedy to the frequent irregularity in unions of this nature; marriages contracted before a blacksmith at Gretna-Green were henceforth practically abolished, a residence of twenty-one days in Scotland became indispensable, elopements and hasty vows were no longer possible. Some years, however, were to elapse before legislation suppressed also the marriage by mutual consent before witnesses, much more dangerous in its inconsiderate application than the ancient practice of the Roman Catholic Church, for that required at least the presence and witness of the priest.

It was not until 1858, after long and persevering effort, that the Jews finally succeeded in obtaining recognition of their political rights in the person of Baron Lionel Rothschild, three times elected to Parliament by the City of London. The civil incapacities which had crushed the Jews throughout all Europe, and of which France had first broken the unjust tradition, yet weighed cruelly upon the English Israelites up to the beginning of Queen Victoria's reign. The oaths required upon entrance into all offices barred to them the doors. "The operation of the law was fatal," says Sir Erskine May, "to nearly all the rights of a citizen. A Jew could not hold any office, civil, military, or corporate. He could not follow the profession of the law as barrister or attorney; or attorney's clerk; he could not be a schoolmaster, or an usher at a school. He could not sit as a member of either House of Parliament, nor even exercise the electoral franchise, if called upon to take the electoral oath."

By degrees the civil incapacities had been abolished. In 1850, Baron Lionel Rothschild presented himself to be sworn as member of the House of Commons. He accepted without difficulty the oaths of allegiance and supremacy; but, when the oath of abjuration of the Stuarts was offered him, he omitted from it the words, "on the true faith of a Christian." Admittance to the House was refused him, and also, the year following, to Mr. David Salomons, elected from Greenwich. This latter gentleman decided to bring the question to an issue: he resolutely took his place among the members, explaining in a calm and moderate speech that he did so from a sense of duty towards himself and his constituents, and should withdraw if sufficient force were used to enable him to declare that he was acting under coercion. Upon this, the sergeant-at-arms, being ordered by the Speaker to remove Mr. Salomons, touched him on the shoulder, and Mr. Salomons at once withdrew.

The question was thus brought before the Court of Exchequer, and it was there decided that the words must be held to constitute a specially Christian oath, which could be taken by no one but a Christian, and without taking which, no one could be a member of Parliament. It was not until 1857, and upon the proposal of Lord John Russell, that the House of Commons admitted Jews to a seat among their number. The definite reform of the oaths took place some months later. Mr. Disraeli had the satisfaction of seeing, during his ministry, the doors of that English Parliament of which he has been one of the ablest chiefs, open to the ancient race whose descendant he is proud to call himself.

Coincident with the abolition of the last political disabilities of the Jews, was the removal of the landed-property qualification of members of Parliament. The clauses of this law dated from the time of Queen Anne, and its application had been so often evaded, that in the reign of George II. candidates had been required to take oath that they possessed the property legally requisite. The actual practice remained, however, the same: members well known to be without property were qualified by friends or patrons, who placed them in possession for the moment of the landed estate necessary. "After every general election," said Mr. Locke King, in the House of Commons, "there are from fifty to sixty cases in which it is found that persons have declared themselves to be possessed of the requisite qualification, who are notoriously not in possession of it." In 1858, a defeated candidate prosecuted his successful opponent on the ground of the latter's legal incapacity. The sentence was inevitable, and the new member was condemned to three months in prison. Upon this, a bill was at once introduced to modify the law, and the property qualification for English and Irish members of Parliament was abolished.

The disturbance caused in the Houses by the dissension between Lord Ellenborough and Lord Canning having ended in the latter's resignation as President of the Board of Council, and Lord Stanley becoming Secretary of State for India, Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton succeeded Lord Stanley as Colonial Secretary. The political life of Sir Edward had been, up to this time, irregular and erratic; he had commenced life as a Radical, and now found himself in the ranks of the Conservatives. His literary reputation and his rare talent as a novelist were not of use to him in the new career upon which he had entered. Notwithstanding the oratorical facility which he soon displayed, and the industry upon which he prided himself, the public were of opinion that the imaginative and romantic element held too large a place in the government of the country when it presided both at the Exchequer and over the colonies. The persevering ambition of Mr. Disraeli and of Sir Edward Lytton did not suffer discouragement from these unfriendly dispositions, over which they were destined ultimately to triumph.

The first personal act of Lord Lytton as Colonial Secretary was the formation of British Columbia, comprising all the territories subject to the queen, bounded on the south by the United States, on the east by the principal chain of the Rocky Mountains, on the north by Simpson's River and the Finlay Branch of the Peace River, and on the west by the Atlantic Ocean. Vancouver's Island was soon after annexed to British Columbia, and the whole colony was swallowed up in the Dominion of Canada in the year 1871.

At the same time that he was establishing the colony of Columbia, Sir Edward Lytton was preparing England to renounce the protectorate of the Ionian Islands. From the time of the Treaty of Vienna, the Seven Islands had formed a kind of republic, whose protectorate had been, by general consent, confided to England. The Lord High Commissioner, generally appointed from the army or navy, combined the duties of commander-in-chief and civil governor. The Ionian senate consisted of six members, and its legislative assembly of forty. This little assembly, which owed its existence to the popular constitution granted, ten years before, to the young republic, loudly made known the discontent of the inhabitants of the islands under the English rule. It was useless to reiterate to them the assurance that they were a republic, enjoying all the privileges of self-government, the Lord High Commissioner was able to dispense with the republican parliament whenever its volubility became annoying, and English soldiers were ever present to keep the Seven Islands in proper submission. They aspired to the liberty of independent action, not with a view of remaining free and isolated, but with the desire of uniting themselves to the little Kingdom of Greece and claiming their rights as Greek citizens. Ionian politicians secured popularity among their fellow-citizens by denouncing the abuses of the foreign power and proclaiming the national aspirations towards liberty. The unreasonableness of these claims appeared evident to many in England; regardless of logic, they maintained that the discontent of the Ionians was due to that free constitution of which the English nation itself was so proud; Sir Edward Lytton judged otherwise. He had long maintained the principle of national independence, and in resolving to have an examination made of the serious opinions of the Ionians he addressed himself to another spirit pledged in advance and by instinct to generous ideas. Mr. Gladstone had not been concerned in public affairs for several years. He had been an independent supporter of Lord Palmerston's Cabinet. His sympathy for the cause of the Greeks was well known; his Greek studies were equally a matter of notoriety. To him Sir Edward Lytton confided the charge of examining the subject of the Ionian protectorate, under the title of Lord High Commissioner Extraordinary. In the month of November, 1858, Mr. Gladstone landed in Corfu.

English policy and the English statesman were decided to employ great prudence in dealing with the Ionian patriots. Mr. Gladstone asserted at once and in the most public manner that his mission was solely to ascertain what advantages could be accorded to the inhabitants of the islands under the protectorate of England. His precautions were useless. His reputation counted for more than his assertions. He was everywhere received and welcomed as "Gladstone, the Philhellene." His arrival was regarded by all the Ionians as the era of deliverance. In vain did Mr. Gladstone protest against the logic of the islanders and against his own personal popularity; the public hopes became so eager that the National Assembly passed a resolution for union with Greece. It was all that Mr. Gladstone could do to prevent them from declaring upon the spot their independence and to prevail upon them to draw up a memorial addressed to the protecting Powers. The rumor of Mr. Gladstone's popularity in the islands and at Athens caused much excitement in England. The Lord High Commissioner Extraordinary and his mission were attacked with violence. Mr. Gladstone was declared false to his country, and the madness and ingratitude of the islands excited the indignation of the press as well as of the opposition in Parliament. More skilful than the Ionians in discovering wherein consisted supreme felicity, the English papers declaimed violently against the natural and patriotic illusions of these people who wished to become Greeks again, at the price of losing the excellent administration which the English protectorate assured to them. The Ionians, however, were obstinate, and took no account of the arguments of England; but Mr. Gladstone returned home without completing the work of their deliverance, whatever hopes his presence may have authorized. A new Lord Commissioner was sent out, less popular, and less compromised in the cause of Greek independence; the conviction, however, remained among the people of the Archipelago that England would one day yield to their urgency. The revolution which, in 1863, drove King Otho from the throne of Greece, was to serve as a pretext and an occasion for bringing this false situation to an end.

The great Powers were resolved to maintain the kingdom of Greece; they had with much difficulty succeeded in finding a king for this little country, whose people seemed to be as hard to govern as their ancestors had been in the old Athenian days. The Greeks had asked for Prince Alfred of England, in the evident hope of securing a powerful protector. To this request Queen Victoria had replied as King Louis Philippe did, when, upon the first establishment of the kingdom of Greece, the Duke de Nemours had been offered its crown. The Emperor Napoleon III. cherished in secret a desire to place his cousin, Prince Jerome Napoleon, upon an independent throne whose duties would remove him far from France; but Europe was no more inclined to see the balance of power lean towards the side of France than of England; and it was upon a young prince of Denmark, the brother of the Princess of Wales, that the hopes of Greece and the goodwill of the diplomatists at last united. The new sovereign was proclaimed, and as a gift in honor of the occasion, Lord John Russell, in the name of England, renounced the protectorate of the Ionian Islands, which were immediately united to the kingdom of Greece. The act was as politic as it was generous and sensible. It took its rise from a just conviction of the legitimate independence of all nations, even the smallest, and their imprescriptible right to control their own destinies. It met even then a lively opposition in England, and left behind a secret ferment of wounded pride and irritation, which many a time interfered with the true policy of the nation, and forced the English government into paths less wisely liberal than that followed by Sir Edward Lytton, by Mr. Gladstone, and by Lord John Russell in the affair of the Ionian Islands.

It was not enough for the most moderate Liberals — really masters of the situation even while their opponents were in the Cabinet — to see Mr. Gladstone welcomed in Greece, and the principle of nationalities ardently supported by the National Assembly in session at Corfu, and of this Mr. Disraeli was well aware. He was from that time forward the true leader of the Conservative party. Lord Derby was now growing old; his ambition, never very ardent, had long been fully satisfied. He had loyally employed all the great gifts which race and nature had given him. Eloquent without effort, he had ruled his country as by hereditary right; he was a farmer, a sportsman, a judge of horses, as well as a man of letters and a translator of Homer. The thirst for power had never been excited in his soul; he possessed naturally all that he could desire. Mr. Disraeli was still pursuing the objects of his ambition, which destiny had not thrown at his feet; he had yet conquests to make, a position to secure and strengthen. The idea of Reform remained ever present to the minds of the Liberals; it was, above all, ever present to the mind of Lord John Russell, the original author of the Reform Bill, which he had twice sought, in 1852 and in 1854, to render more extensive and efficient. Mr. Bright, moreover, had lately reappeared upon the political stage after a long absence occasioned by ill health. He was eloquent and bold, and as soon as his strength was re-established he began to work in behalf of electoral reform, holding great meetings in the north, and preparing a Reform Bill of his own. The constant reproach addressed to the Tories was their ill-will towards reforms of every kind. Mr. Disraeli resolved to make the attempt, and to contrive, if it were possible, formulas which might deceive the Liberal without revolting the Conservative instincts. He prepared a Reform Bill whose clauses were for the most part absurd; the only serious modification of the existing law was, that it proposed to equalize the franchise in counties and boroughs.

Mr. Bright and his friends had but one aim, and this was to admit the working-classes to a share in legislation; the scheme of Mr. Disraeli proposed to give the franchise to clergymen, teachers, and professional men. It afforded to the Liberals no satisfaction, and at the same time it wounded the rigid and consistent Tories. Mr. Walpole and Mr. Harley withdrew from the Cabinet, resolved not to sustain measures which they would have opposed if brought forward by Lord Palmerston or Lord John Russell. The Liberals, on their part, were not contented with what the leader of the Conservatives offered them. Lord John Russell moved an amendment to the effect that the modifications offered by government would not be satisfactory to the House of Commons without a wider extension of the franchise in cities and boroughs being provided for. In vain did Mr. Gladstone skilfully defend the little boroughs, enumerating the eminent men who had made their début in Parliament as representatives of a very small number of electors whose votes had been controlled by some great land-owner. Lord John Russell's amendment was passed by three hundred and thirty votes against two hundred and ninety-one, and Parliament was at once dissolved.

The general elections were favorable to the Conservative party, without, however, bringing into its ranks a reinforcement strong enough to secure them against the attacks of their opponents. The patience of the Liberals was nearly at an end. It was becoming time for them to return into power. An alliance was concluded between the Whigs and the Radicals, and the Peelites consented to take part in it. Parliament met, and almost at once Lord Hartington, eldest son of the Duke of Devonshire, as yet a very young man, and but lately become a member of the House of Commons, proposed a vote of want of confidence. He was personally but little known, and this was his first step in the political career which was to make him one of the chiefs of the great Whig party. His resolution was accepted; the ministry, which had foreseen its fate from the moment a coalition had been formed among the various sections of the opposition, resigned, and the queen entrusted Lord Granville with the formation of a new Cabinet.

Lord Granville was an amiable and popular man; he was still young, extremely well-informed in European affairs, and at the same time strongly English in tastes and principles. The queen had hoped to conciliate the ancient rivalry between Lord John Russell and Lord Palmerston by selecting a prime minister under whose more modest flag the two great Liberal chiefs might be willing to serve. This design failed by reason of Lord John Russell's determination not to take office under Lord Granville. He would have been willing, he said, to serve under Lord Palmerston, but would form no other alliance. This unexpected concession facilitated ministerial combinations. Lord Granville promptly and willingly withdrew. Lord Palmerston became prime minister; the Conservatives as well as the Liberals felt, without saying it, that he grasped the power with a triumphant hand, and that he would never let it escape him until that supreme moment when all human power is effaced before the uncontested authority of death.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

CHAPTER XI.

THE LIBERALS WITHOUT REFORM. EASTERN DIFFICULTIES.

THE Liberal Ministry was strongly constituted, and stretched its far-reaching roots through all the parliamentary soil. Mr. Gladstone was Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord John Russell had the Foreign portfolio, Sir George Lewis was Home Secretary, and Mr. Sidney Herbert, Minister of War. Colonial affairs were entrusted to the Duke of Newcastle, the Irish Secretaryship to Mr. Cardwell, and India to Sir Charles Wood. Lord Palmerston had even made advances to the Radical founders of the Manchester school, offering a place in the Cabinet to Mr. Cobden and to Mr. Milner Gibson. Mr. Cobden at the time of the formation of the ministry was at sea, on his way home from the United States; as he set foot on shore his friends hastened to inform him that he had been elected member for Rochdale, that the Tory Ministry had fallen, and in the construction of the Liberal Cabinet, a place had been reserved for him by Lord Palmerston. He was urged to accept it, but refused to commit himself until he had had a personal interview with Lord Palmerston. His decision, however, was made; he disapproved of Lord Palmerston's foreign policy, and would not agree to serve under his flag. Nevertheless he counselled Mr. Milner Gibson not to follow his example, and that gentleman did, in fact, enter the new Cabinet.

The Whig Ministry had been formed at a moment of European agitation, of which the shock was felt in England. The long ambition and foresight of Count Cavour were bearing fruit.

The little kingdom of Piedmont was beginning to bring forth Italy, that ancient fiction of poets and patriots, until now without historic existence, without any real traditions. The battlefield of centuries was again opened in Lombardy, and the Emperor Napoleon III., proclaiming that France was the only country in the world which made war for an idea, marched to deliver Lombardy and Venetia from the odious rule of the Austrians. The declaration of war had not been spontaneous, and the emperor had hesitated long before entering upon the performance of his engagements with Count Cavour. He was in no hurry to begin hostilities whose end no man could foresee. The military reputation of the Austrians was great; personal renown had very small place in the mind of Napoleon III., who, in the depths of his soul, was not perfectly sure of his own military talent. Europe weighed heavily in favor of peace, and England in particular strongly urged it.

The influence of Count Cavour outweighed that of all Europe. Resolved to serve his country by all means, unscrupulous in the choice of them, Count Cavour went forward to his goal with a will as determined as his intelligence was prompt and his decisions bold and judicious. "There are only two ambitious men in Europe," M. Guizot was accustomed to say at that time, "Count Cavour and Count Bismarck." Both of these two men have since attained their objects through the dark ways of politics and the violence of war. Prince Bismarck was able to say on the morrow of his victory: "Force has the advantage over right." Count Cavour was too moderate in manner and too refined in language to risk an axiom like this, he simply limited himself to ignoring the right. In 1859, and by the support of the Emperor Napoleon III., he boldly put on the glorious mantle of liberal patriotism. It was in the name of Italian independence, too long oppressed, that he declared war; Italy rose beneath his hand to drive out the stranger. The Italian war was as short as it was brilliant; the power of the Austrians in Italy vanished, like their former military reputation; the Emperor Napoleon stopped suddenly in the career which he had announced his intention to follow out to its completion. The breath of deliverance did not reach as far as the Adriatic; for some years longer Venetia was destined to remain under the German yoke, until German dissensions should throw her, astonished at her own liberty, into the hands of Napoleon as a trust to be held for the benefit of Italy.

The peace of Villafranca disturbed Europe and caused great anxiety. Count Cavour could not be expected to stop there; of this Europe was conscious; the annexation of Savoy and Nice seemed an exorbitant price for the assistance lately granted by the emperor in the name of liberty; the people of England were even more anxious than her government. The Italian question henceforth seemed to considerate minds to contain remote dangers, as well as other more evident ones. "The first time the subject was mentioned to Lord Palmerston," said M. Guizot, "he did not repulse it absolutely, but he said, 'It is strange; the Emperor Napoleon declared in beginning the war that he wished the integrity of the Papal States, and by no means the territorial aggrandizement of France; and in closing it he seems to have obtained neither of his wishes.'"

At this time M. Guizot wrote, "There is an effort made to persuade London to be satisfied that France should have Savoy and Nice, on condition of her approving and assuring the union of Central Italy to Piedmont. I incline to believe that we shall obtain it, perhaps at the price of some commercial concessions." The commercial question had already come up. The cause of Free Trade, fought for in England so brilliantly and with so much vigor, was henceforth won for all Europe, and it was England who was to be its propagandist. Mr. Gladstone, as Chancellor of the Exchequer and as an ardent follower of Sir Robert Peel, supported, with all his personal and official influence, Mr. Cobden, engaged unofficially in negotiating with the Emperor Napoleon. A treaty of commerce between France and England resulted from this bold and irregular conference. The somewhat confused ideas which crowded in the emperor's brain, aided by the practical information and the resolute firmness of his minister, M. Rouher, the influence of French political economists and a certain confidence which the emperor felt towards England and Mr. Cobden, inspired and effected the great change in the commercial relations of France with Great Britain, — a change too sudden not to excite grave remonstrances and bring after it enormous difficulties, but impossible to revoke, being as it was one of those forward steps which admit of no retrogression, however serious may one day become the doubts and the regrets in regard to them.

The shock produced in France by the treaty of commerce made itself felt in England as an anxiety. The English nation was not at that time favorable to the emperor and to his policy; the war in Italy and the results which had followed in the peninsula, as well as in France itself, had shocked and pained many good men. The Tories had no taste for Italian independence; the Liberals troubled themselves very little about it. A new power was coming into existence which must be taken account of. The imprudence of a French policy creating with its own hands a compact state upon its frontier seemed so incredible that all manner of dark and underhand designs were ascribed to the emperor; even danger to public morals was apprehended in England from the establishment of free trade with France. French wines, freely imported into Great Britain, would bring about, it was believed, an increasing demoralization. Mr. Gladstone was accused of having sacrificed the national interests to his theories, and of rendering defenceless the frontiers of his country. The clamor grew louder when the able Chancellor of the Exchequer presented his budget, with considerable reductions upon the taxes. He had with great difficulty obtained in Parliament the acceptance of his treaty of commerce with France; he had reduced or abolished a part of the burdens which weighed upon the press; he now proposed an important abatement in the duty on paper. The manufacturers leagued with the great journals to oppose the reduction which, by lowering the price of paper, threatened to multiply periodical publications to an enormous degree, and the clamor increased from day to day. Mr. Gladstone carried his point, but his partisans diminished in number, and the measure was passed by only a majority of nine. The House of Lords, however, rejected it upon a proposition offered by Lord Monteagle and brilliantly supported by Lord Lyndhurst, eloquent and ardent even then, in spite of his eighty-nine years, although the infirmities natural to so great age required for him the erection of a temporary railing in front of his seat, upon which he leaned while speaking.

Lord Lyndhurst was even more afraid of the dangers with which England was menaced by the possible schemes of the Emperor Napoleon than of the development which journalism might take upon the reduction of the paper duty. His influence upon the House of Lords brought about a conflict between the two Houses which came near assuming the importance of a grave constitutional question. Lord Palmerston's parliamentary skill succeeded in turning away the difficulty by leaving the way open for the Lords to retrace their steps and vote at the following session the reduction in taxes which had been accepted by the House of Commons and had just been refused by themselves. The weakness of the majority in the Lower House had evidently brought on the conflict. Mr. Gladstone was disposed to attach to it more importance than did the head of the Cabinet; he had characterized the act of the Lords as a "gigantic innovation," and shared the impatience of the Liberals and their disapproval of Lord Palmerston's prudent ingenuity. From day to day, the Tory Liberal, brought up in the school of Sir Robert Peel, detached himself more and more completely from the party with which he had been at first allied and the principles he had long supported. The advanced Liberals congratulated themselves openly on seeing Mr. Gladstone separate from Lord Palmerston, and from the prime minister's home policy, which was always conservative, whatever might be his foreign sympathies, and their gratification was increased by Mr. Gladstone's manifest sympathy with themselves, whose leader he was eventually destined to become.

Meantime, the Cabinet had in its turn proposed a Reform Bill. Lord John Russell had long urged its necessity, supported by the Radicals, but the moderate Whigs were opposed to the measure, and Lord Palmerston felt no interest in its success. Its clauses were simple, proposing to lower the county franchise to ten pounds and that of the boroughs to six. A considerable redistribution of seats was made, to the advantage of the cities and the larger counties. A minority representation was assured to constituencies naming three members. Mr. Disraeli made a sharp attack upon the scheme as a whole. He had himself not long before proposed some measures not very dissimilar, but he felt that the law was unpopular in the Cabinet itself, and that it was abandoned to its fate by Lord Palmerston; he thought it well, moreover, to reserve for a possible future to his own party the honor of carrying through a Reform Bill, and he therefore was unsparing in his ridicule and criticism. The discussion was prolonged in a languid and inefficient manner until on the 11th of June, 1860, Lord John Russell gave notice that the government had decided to withdraw their bill. Lord Palmerston had forfeited the good will of the Liberals; once again he had manifested his determination not to serve them in the matter of transforming the English constitution which they had so much at heart, and while he should live, Reform was evidently impossible. Of this Lord John Russell himself was perfectly aware. Mr. Pitt once promised George III. that he would never again bring up the question of the emancipation of the Roman Catholics, so long as the old king's life and his scruples barred the way. Without formal engagement and with a tacit submission, Lord John Russell consented to await the day when Lord Palmerston should yield to him the headship of the Whig party. It is a curious example of obstinate resolve and prudent moderation between these two rival statesmen, who had for so long a time disputed the supremacy in the House of Commons in the name of the Liberals, of whom, however, so large a number escaped their sway.

Parliamentary struggles were not, however, the sole anxiety of England at this time: she was in constant fear of aggressions on the part of the Emperor Napoleon, and the Houses had already voted two millions sterling for strengthening the coast defences; strikes in the manufacturing districts had brought disorder and great suffering; finally, China was causing serious anxiety, with new probabilities of a war, more serious and wide-spread than it had before been.

When in 1857 the Mutiny in India broke out, hostilities with China were at once suspended; troops which had been destined for Canton were retained for the protection of the English dominion in India. In 1858 that terrific conflagration having been reduced to a few smoking brands, the English government had leisure to turn its attention to China, and accepted the co-operation of France, who had to avenge the wrongs done to certain missionaries. The allied forces attacked Canton; the city was taken, and the Chinese commissioner, Yeh, sought shelter in some obscure corner. He was recognized by his enormous size, and a British officer laid hands upon this great dignitary of the Middle Kingdom. The latter tried to escape, and a sailor seized the mandarin's pig-tail and twisted it so sharply that the unfortunate Yeh was obliged to surrender. He was taken on board an English ship and presently sent to Calcutta, where he died the following year. The remembrance of his cruelties long remained among the people of Canton; it was said that he had ordered the death of a hundred thousand rebels, but the English "barbarians" manifested no consideration for his importance.

The two plenipotentiaries of France and England, Lord Elgin and Baron Gros, then signed a new treaty with China, by which the two countries were authorized on certain occasions to send ministers to the court of Peking, and it was agreed that China should be represented at the French and English courts. Toleration was secured to the Christian religion; the entrance into Chinese rivers was permitted to French and English merchant vessels; and French and English subjects were allowed to travel freely in China. The Chinese Empire was to pay the expenses of the war. In Chinese official language, the name "barbarians" was no longer to be applied to the European powers. Finally, the conditions of the treaty of Tien-tsin were to be ratified at Peking, within a year from the date of signature, June, 1858.

Lord Elgin had returned to England. His brother, Mr. Frederick Bruce, was appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to China. He was instructed to insist upon the literal fulfilment of the stipulation that the treaty should be ratified at Peking, which would be in itself a sign of the important concessions made to the allied powers by the treaty of Tien-tsin. In anticipation of obstacles which might be interposed by the Chinese functionaries, when it was a question of foreigners being permitted to penetrate into the capital of the empire, Mr. Bruce was instructed to have a sufficient naval force to make his entry into the river Peiho, and Admiral Hope, naval commander-in-chief in Chinese waters, received orders to furnish Mr. Bruce with the required vessels.

PORCELAIN TOWER, PEKIN.

The Peiho rises near the Great Wall of China, and flows in a south-easterly direction into the Gulf of Pe-chee-lee, in the north-east corner of the Chinese territory. Peking, about a hundred miles inland from the mouth of the Peiho, is not built directly upon the river's bank but stands at a distance of several miles, and is connected with the river by a broad canal. Tien-tsin, on the Peiho, is the seaport of Peking, from which it is about seventy miles distant. The entrance to the river is defended by the Taku forts. On the 20th of June, 1859, Mr. Bruce, with the French minister, arrived at the mouth of the Peiho, escorted by nineteen vessels of Admiral Hope's fleet. Three days before, the Chinese authorities had been notified of the approach of the plenipotentiaries, and Admiral Hope's messenger had found the forts defended and the river obstructed. The armed force at work upon the defences declared themselves to be militia, uninstructed in regard to the passage of the envoys, but willing to transmit messages to Tien-tsin and return answers.

Upon the arrival of the envoys in person, it was found that a passage had not been cleared for them; but rather that the defences had been strengthened. An official sent down from Tien-tsin seemed disposed to make delays and the letter of which he was the bearer was not sufficiently respectful, it was thought, towards the great Powers whose representatives it addressed. The English envoy believed that the occasion apprehended by Lord Malmesbury had come, — that the Chinese were designing to interdict to the envoys the entrance into the country; and Mr. Bruce called upon Admiral Hope to open the way for him. On the 25th of June, the admiral attacked the barriers under fire from the forts. The Chinese gunners were more skilful than they had been believed to be. Four of the English gunboats were quickly disabled, and all got aground; the admiral ordered an attack upon the forts; it was beaten back, and a hundred and fifty men, out of the small attacking force, were killed or wounded. Admiral Hope was wounded himself, and so was also the French officer whose vessel had contributed its contingent to the storming-party. The situation of the allies was critical although they had had the good fortune to be supported in their retreat by an American man-of-war, whose captain could not endure the sight of Europeans destroyed by Chinese. The mission to Peking was necessarily abandoned, and news of the diplomatic and military disaster of the plenipotentiaries of France and England went home to Europe.

The wrath and indignation of the English people was extreme. The Liberals had come into power; Lord John Russell had succeeded Lord Malmesbury in the Foreign Office, and the instructions of the late minister were violently attacked and also the conduct of his envoy. Before the exchange of ratifications the Europeans had not the right to ascend the Peiho, and nothing obliged Mr. Bruce to insist upon taking a route which was specially displeasing to Chinese pride. The Chinese had merely availed themselves of their natural defences, they had not employed perfidy, and the allies had not been the victims of double-dealing. Admiral Hope knew in advance that the river was barred and that the forts were in a state of defence. However, the check received by England and France in attempting to enforce a point of international law, very doubtful though it was, could not be endured for a moment. The two diplomatists who had made the treaty of Tien-tsin, Lord Elgin and Baron Gros, were sent back to obtain in one way or another the ratification promised. Sir Hope Grant and General Montauban were placed in charge of the land forces. The naval armament was quite important; and in the spring of 1860, the allies again appeared off the Peiho.

The Chinese were not disheartened; they showed no signs of weakness, and made a courageous defence; but this time the attack had been well-planned, the force was sufficient, and the most cordial harmony prevailed between the English and French commanders. The forts were taken, the entrances of the river forced, the European vessels went up as far as Tien-tsin, the troops occupied the city, and the plenipotentiaries at the head of their army advanced upon Peking. Meantime one Chinese official after another vainly attempted to negotiate and retard the march of the victorious Europeans. Finally Lord Elgin consented to receive the Chinese commissioners at Tung-chow, a walled town, ten or twelve miles below Peking. The secretaries of Lord Elgin and Baron Gros were sent to Tung-chow to make the necessary arrangements for an interview. Mr. Bowlby, the correspondent of the London Times, and a few English officers, were also of the party. In returning, the European party was obliged to pass through the lines of a large Chinese force encamped upon the very ground which the Chinese commissioners themselves had designated for the use of the allies. A quarrel occurred between one of the French officers and some Tartar soldiers, and a general melley ensued. Lord Elgin's secretaries and those of the French minister, with several more of the party, — in all, twenty-six Englishmen and twelve Frenchmen, — were seized by the Chinese soldiers and dragged off to prison, with entire disregard of the fact that they bore a flag of truce, and that they were arranging a conference which had been begged for by the Chinese themselves. Thirteen Englishmen and several of the French officers died from the ill-treatment they had endured. Those who survived all bore traces of the cruelty they had suffered. Lord Elgin at once sent word to the commissioners that negotiations would not be pursued until the captives had been released; meantime, he advanced rapidly upon Peking. He was already before the city and about to force an entrance with his cannon, when Prince Kung, the emperor's brother and plenipotentiary, accepted the terms proposed, and it was only after entering the city that the envoys learned of the murder of the captives.

Within the gates of the city of Peking stood the Summer Palace of the Chinese emperor, an enormous enclosure filled with independent palaces, temples, and pagodas scattered through magnificent pleasure-grounds, which were watered by artificial lakes and rivers, with ornamental bridges and terraces in the greatest variety. Here had been accumulated for ages all the treasures and curiosities which Chinese art was able to produce at the period of its greatest perfection. The emperors had followed one another in this treasure-house of beautiful things, and each had added new embellishments to its magnificence. The French soldiery had already entered and plundered this palace when Lord Elgin, on hearing of the murder of the European captives, resolved to give to all China a terrible proof of the power of the allies and of the vengeance which they would take for acts of treachery like that just committed. Baron Gros did not share in this determination; he did not, however, oppose it; the pillage which he had allowed to the French soldiery effectually barred him from making any remonstrance. By order of Lord Elgin, the Summer Palace of the Emperors of China was given up to the flames, and absolutely destroyed; there, the English prisoners had endured the most cruel outrages, there, a mass of ruins should testify to England's indignation. "This condition," wrote Lord Elgin, "requires no assent on the part of His Highness" (the Chinese plenipotentiary), "because it will be at once carried into effect by the commander-in-chief." Two days were scarcely enough to complete the destruction of the palace. The plunder was immense. General Moutauban brought back to France a magnificent collection of Chinese antiquities, acquired for the most part at this time; but pillage was severely prohibited to the English soldiers. When the desolation was completed, a monument was raised on the spot, on which was inscribed in Chinese characters : "Such are the rewards of perfidy and cruelty."

GARDEN OF THE SUMMER PALACE, PEKIN.

The conduct of Lord Elgin was sharply attacked in England, and as vigorously defended. He himself acknowledged that the capture of the Englishmen was not an act of deliberate treachery on the part of the Chinese. "On the whole," he wrote, "I come to the conclusion that in the proceedings of the Chinese plenipotentiaries and commander-in-chief in this instance, there was that mixture of stupidity, want of straightforwardness, suspicion, and bluster which characterizes so generally the conduct of affairs in this country; but I cannot believe that after the experience which Sang-ko-lin-sin" (the Chinese general-in-chief) "has already had of our superiority in the field, either he or his civil colleagues could have intended to bring on a conflict, in which, as the event has proved, he was sure to be worsted." The lesson which Lord Elgin had inflicted upon the Chinese empire was destined to protect in the future, in the extreme East, those messengers of peace whom all nations have agreed to hold sacred. Violence had presided over all the acts of this war, but in the one which crowned it, that violence brought with it its justification.

The submission of China was complete; the port of Tien-tsin was open to European commerce. Ratifications were exchanged, diplomatic relations formally re-established between China and the European Powers, and the emperor was obliged to pay a heavy war indemnity and also a large sum as compensation to the families of the murdered prisoners. Henceforth China was to have no hidden recesses, inaccessible to the inquisitive traveller; the gates of the Middle Kingdom were to stand open, and ere long a tide of Chinese emigration was to set towards America and even Europe. With the walls of the Summer Palace crumbled the barriers between Orient and Occident.

It was not alone towards the extreme East that, in 1860, military and diplomatic solicitude was directed. In regions less remote than were the vast domains of the Chinese emperor,— upon the slopes of Lebanon, the hostility of races was awakened between the Maronites and the Druses. A Maronite monk was found murdered, the Druses were suspected of the crime, and some of them were assassinated in turn. Anger was kindled on both sides. On the 28th of May, the Maronite villages in the neighborhood of Beyroot were attacked by the Druses, and also a large town, built near the base of Mount Hermon. The Turkish authorities in the town ordered the Maronites to lay down their arms, promising to protect them; the Maronites obeyed, but were abandoned to their enemies, who made an indiscriminate massacre. The Mussulman fury spread from point to point, and in July, Damascus was invaded by a fanatical multitude, who destroyed the consulates of the European Powers and massacred more than two thousand Christians, in spite of the efforts of Abd-el-Kader, himself a resident of Damascus ever since his liberty had been restored by the Emperor Napoleon. The Turkish governor made no serious attempt to put a stop to the massacre. For a long time the Porte had felt a certain distrust of the Maronites, whom it regarded as disposed to shake off the Turkish yoke. The intervention of the great Powers in their favor (1840-41) had contributed to develop this idea. The population of Damascus in some way felt themselves authorized to murder the Christians and pillage their houses.

In 1860, all the great Powers were interested in the re-establishment of order in the Lebanon, for all had suffered outrage in the person of their representatives. France and England were intrusted with the duty of obtaining the reparation which the case demanded. France promised the necessary troops, and England sent out Lord Dufferin as commissioner to deal with the Turkish government. The Porte had become alarmed, and had shown great resolution in searching out and punishing the offending Druses. The Minister of Foreign Affairs, Fuad Pasha, was sent to the Lebanon, where he exercised without mercy the unlimited powers intrusted to him. The governor of Damascus and the commander of the Turkish troops were put to death, and about sixty persons with them, who were held to be more or less responsible for what had taken place. On every side were seen the results of their criminal indolence. "At Deir-el-Kamr," wrote Lord Dufferin, "almost every house was burnt, and the street crowded with dead bodies, some of them stripped and mutilated in every possible way. My road led through some of the streets, my horse could not even pass, for the bodies were literally piled up. Most of those I examined had many wounds, and in each case the right hand was either entirely or nearly cut off; the poor wretch, in default of weapons, having instinctively raised his arm to parry the blow aimed at him. I saw little children of not more than four years old stretched on the ground, and old men with gray beards."

The intervention of the great Powers in the affairs of the Lebanon was efficacious in re-establishing peace in Syria. The conference decided that a Christian governor of the Lebanon should be appointed, in subjection to the sultan, it is true, but appointed neither upon the sultan's nomination nor at his desire. In 1861, the French troops evacuated Syria, after their prolonged occupation had begun seriously to disquiet the English nation. The 26th of June, Lord Palmerston wrote to Sir Henry Bulwer, the British ambassador at Constantinople: "I am heartily glad we have got the French out of Syria, and a hard job it was to do so. The arrangement made for the future government of the Lebanon will, I dare say, work sufficiently well to prevent the French from having any pretext for returning thither."

The sultan, Abdul-Medjid, had just died; great hopes were conceived in respect to his successor. "If the accounts we have heard of the new sultan are true," Lord Palmerston wrote, "we may hope that he will restore Turkey to her proper position among the Powers of Europe."

Yet once more England had come to the aid of her "sick man," while openly acknowledging his feebleness. Turkey had scarcely been permitted to have any voice in the settlement of the Lebanon affair. The new conditions had been imposed upon her by a conference of the great Powers. She yet existed, however, and her independence was recognized in theory, at least, if it was not in practice. Lord Wodehouse announced in Parliament the opinion of government that a new era was dawning upon Turkey. Her weakness and her vitality were destined for many a year yet to astonish Europe, and more than once to disturb its tranquillity.

CHAPTER XII.

WESTERN TROUBLES. THE WAR IN THE UNITED STATES.

EUROPE had watched with curiosity the war between England and China; she had been interested in the burning of the Summer Palace; she had been excited for a moment by the report of the massacre at Damascus, and had applauded, first, the generous interference of Abd-el-Kader in favor of the Christians, and afterwards the more efficacious intervention of the great Powers in the affairs of the Ottoman Empire, but she had never felt and she could not feel that interest in the shocks agitating the ancient East which was inspired in her by the war which tore asunder a new country, rapidly grown to be one of the first in the world, and now threatened with being divided into two nations by the result of civil discords unexampled in their duration and bitterness. The whole world looked on in horror at the battles which ravaged America, and the diversity of opinions and impressions in Europe in respect to the two parties thus engaged across the Atlantic in a death-struggle, gave rise to the most complex passions. Nowhere were these sentiments more complicated than in England; nowhere did hidden motives act more manifestly in the form of eloquent arguments and public declamations.

For months the dull rumblings of the coming earthquake had been audible to even the least attentive ears. John Brown, the enthusiastic apostle of abolition, had attempted for the last time an expedition for the purpose of liberating a few slaves; he had been seized at Harper's Ferry, on the confines of Virginia and Maryland; he had been brought to trial and suffered the penalty of death. He had died bravely, assured of the final success of his cause. "His gibbet," said Victor Hugo, "was to be the Calvary of the abolition of slavery." And the French poet was not in error. The cup of dissensions already full, overflowed by reason of this drop of legal iniquity; the presidential election close at hand would manifestly strengthen the abolitionist party; the southern states believed their existence menaced. The more inconsiderate and fiery of southern leaders demanded a separation; the wiser and more clear-sighted, while encouraging this project which served their designs, had broader and deeper views. They well understood that, in order to maintain its existence, a society founded upon slavery needed not only to be independent, but to be mistress of America.

"In reality, the maintenance of the Union, even under the presidency of the most ardent abolitionist, would have been less dangerous for America than a separation, pure and simple, dividing the United States into two unequal parts: one of these sections would have had a population of eight million whites and four million blacks, supposing it to include all the slave states; the other would have been composed of all the rest of the American Union, that is to say, of the entire mass of the free states, continuing to form, in the federal bond, a united nation from the Atlantic to the Pacific. From friendly or, at least, tolerant associates, they would at once have become formidable rivals and implacable enemies. Drawing from their vast population, from the fruitful principle of useful industry, and from their immense financial resources an irresistible force of colonization, they would have been at every point the victorious rivals of the southern states, hampered by slavery, divided into hostile castes, deprived of the resources which emigration supplies to a new continent. Within a few years, the free states would have completely surrounded the territory occupied by slavery, and, barring its way to future aggrandizement, would have given it a death-stroke. The vast frontier of the free states would have been everywhere open to fugitives, from the moment that the shameful pact by which the United States agreed to return the fugitive negro had been destroyed with the Union in the name of which it was made. In spite of all artificial hindrances, a double contraband, on one side favoring the escape of the slave, would have brought, on the other, into the South an active abolitionist propaganda to work among an enslaved population whom the slightest gleam of liberty was sufficient to excite. This inevitable consequence of a separation was long ago foreseen by the sagacious mind of M. de Tocqueville, who predicted the moment when slavery would bring on in American affairs a terrible crisis, in the midst of which it would disappear. He therefore counselled the South to remain at all costs faithful to the Union, for, supported by the numerous population of the northern states, they could, he said, quietly abolish slavery, and at the same time preserve their social superiority; whereas, if they should have the whites of the North for enemies, the latter could easily set free their slaves, without their aid and against their will."*

The southern leaders were not willing to entertain the idea of abolishing slavery, which they regarded as a fundamental institution, indispensable to the existence of society as they conceived it; on the contrary they sought to strengthen and develop the system, and to this end they required the aid of the northern states. This aid they could obtain in two ways: either by reconstructing the Union to their advantage, or by dividing the North so that it should no longer form a compact nation at their side, and that among its fragments the slave power might find feeble states always ready to solicit the protection of the South. In order to lay the foundations of this new edifice which they hoped to construct upon the ruins of the Union, the southern leaders of the pro-slavery party took care to insist upon the original constitution prepared by the founders of the country, thus clothing themselves with the mantle of historic and traditional unity. Two important modifications, however, it was necessary for them to introduce, the first recognizing the right of secession, the second proclaiming slavery as an indispensable element in civilized society. In the name of these two new principles, inevitably destructive to the old Union, the South entered upon the struggle whence she hoped the triumph of her cause, and the definitive preponderance of her social theories.

* La guerre civile aux États-Unis, by the Comte de Paris. Vol. I. p. 196.

On the 4th of February, 1861, seven of the southern states, having solemnly withdrawn from the Union, sent delegates to a convention at Montgomery, Alabama, with the object of agreeing upon a constitution. The Southern Confederacy was formed,* and Mr. Jefferson Davis of Mississippi being elected president, announced the determination of the South to maintain her independence by the sword, "if passion or lust of dominion should cloud the judgment or influence the ambition of the North." Two weeks later, Mr. Lincoln was inaugurated President of the United States. He also had a declaration to make, less aggressive than that of Mr. Davis, but very serious, however, notwithstanding its moderation. Mr. Lincoln announced that he had no intention of interfering with slavery in the states where it already existed, that he had no right to do so, even if he had wished it; but, on the other hand, that no state could by its own act, lawfully sever its connection with the Union, and that all resistance to the established authority of the United States must be considered insurrectionary or revolutionary. All that Mr. Lincoln claimed was merely the support of the status quo; and this proclamation of the principles which were to actuate the conduct of the government, seemed of good augury to the friends of peace. A door even seemed to be opened to pacific negotiations on the subject of the dissolution of the Federal compact. This at least was a prevalent idea in England up to the time when the warlike impetuosity of South Carolina suddenly put an end to all hopes of peace. This state had been the first to proclaim the principle of secession. The inhabitants of Charleston, her capital city, beheld daily just at the entrance of their harbor a little artificial island, upon which the heavy mass of Fort Sumter reared itself. Like all the forts in the land, this post was garrisoned by federal troops, and, in presence of the excitement prevailing in South Carolina, the general government had deemed it advisable to send thither additional troops. The vessel bringing reinforcements was fired upon, and on the 12th of April, the fort itself was bombarded. The little garrison could not oppose any prolonged resistance to the batteries on the shore; it surrendered, and the war was begun.

* Consisting of South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas.

On the 15th of April, President Lincoln issued a proclamation calling for seventy-five thousand volunteers to protect the national capital and to suppress such combinations as had been made to resist the enforcement of the laws of the United States. At the same moment, the southern leaders were intriguing to obtain the control in the convention of Virginia, then in session, and at first indisposed to join in the rebellion. This attempt was successful; on the 17th of April, the State of Virginia seceded. Meanwhile, the Confederate government had organized and sent into the field a force of twenty thousand men. The city of Washington was at this time nearly defenceless, but the energy and ardor of the Northern States at once came to its aid. Several companies from Pennsylvania reached Washington on the 16th; the Massachusetts Sixth, a regiment of volunteers, passing through Baltimore, (where they were attacked by a mob) arrived in Washington a few days later; and, being soon followed by others, the capital was speedily in a state of excellent defence.

Immediately upon the fall of Fort Sumter, Mr. Davis issued a proclamation inviting applications for privateering service in which, under letters of marque and reprisal, private vessels might be fitted out to prey upon the commerce of the United States. On the 29th of April he wrote to the Confederate Congress that "it is proposed to organize and hold in readiness for instant action, in view of the present exigencies of the country, an army of one hundred thousand men." Between the 6th and 21st of May, three other states, Tennessee, Arkansas and North Carolina, solemnly separated from the Union and cast in their fortunes with the Confederacy.

The war opened amid the greatest excitement on both sides: the two parties seemed to be of nearly equal strength. In England, from an instinct of ancient jealousy, of secret rancor, and of commercial rivalry, the general inclination was favorable to the southern cause, a cause morally difficult to defend, but wearing upon its exterior the air of a chivalrous impulse against the oppression and tyranny of the North. "The gentlemen of the South have risen against the northern shopkeepers," said the English newspapers; and the people of England did not stop to inquire whether the southern gentlemen had risen in defence of their personal liberty, or merely in defence of their right to keep their fellow-creatures in slavery; the English nation did not at all measure the sovereign importance of the struggle now beginning in the New World, upon the great question of free labor, or slave labor. The hour was come, in their judgment, when America was about to pay dearly for her separation from the English crown, her abandonment of the mother-country.

Neutrality did not exist in the spirit of the English nation at the time when the English government officially proclaimed it. On the 8th of May, 1861, Lord John Russell announced in Parliament that, after consulting the law-officers of the crown, her Majesty's government were of opinion that the Southern Confederacy must be recognized as a belligerent power. On the 13th of May, neutrality was proclaimed by England, and all English subjects were forbidden to enlist, either for sea or land, in the service of either party, to furnish munitions of war, to equip vessels for privateering, to engage in transport-service, or in any manner to afford assistance either to Federals or Confederates. England thus publicly recognized the existence of the Southern Confederacy. The promptness with which this recognition was made, rendered it still more offensive to the United States. Lord John Russell had not even waited the arrival of the American minister, then daily expected, who had been sent out expressly charged to explain to the English government the condition of affairs beyond sea.

On the other hand, it was urged that this recognition had been made in no spirit unfriendly towards America, but had been rendered imperatively necessary and urgent by a Union measure adopted upon the very outbreak of the war. This was the blockade of the ports of the seceded states, proclaimed by Mr. Lincoln on the 19th of April. The very fact of this proclamation was a recognition by the United States of the Southern Confederacy as a belligerent power, inasmuch as a government cannot blockade its own ports. All that England had done was to accept the situation which the President of the United States had himself admitted. Later, and under the pressure of the growing excitement in England, the English Cabinet was to have great difficulty in supporting this blockade against those who claimed that it ought to be broken in the interests of European commerce. France was even more sympathetic than England in the cause of the seceded states, and the Emperor Napoleon III. would have very gladly persuaded England to join with him in recognizing the government of the Southern Confederation. But the attitude of the Radical party in the House of Commons; and the general sentiment of the working-classes in favor of the North, held back the Cabinet from this disastrous mistake. France, as well as England, was obliged to content itself with proclaiming its neutrality.

The fortunes of war seemed at this moment to be on the side of the Confederacy. More accustomed than the "shopkeepers" of the North to the duties and fatigues of war, and animated by an ardor which rapidly recruited their ranks, the "gentlemen" of the South had not, however, begun by assuming the offensive. On the 21st of July, General Beauregard, on the plateau of Manassas near a little stream known as Bull Run, awaited the attack of the federal troops, under the command of General McDowell. This officer, who had been in part educated in France, was well informed in the art of war; he knew perfectly that the forces under his command were but a crowd of men just taken from their fields, their workshops, their counting-rooms, and that he needed time to drill them, to discipline them, and to teach them how to employ their courage and their enthusiasm. He saw himself compelled by the exigencies of the situation and the insistence of government to engage at once in the struggle. General Beauregard's position was strong; the result of the battle was doubtful until three o'clock in the afternoon, when reinforcements arrived for the Confederate troops. The Federal army was seized with panic, the defeat became a rout, and, disorganized and demoralized, the survivors retreated upon Washington. The alarm was extreme in the capital, which believed itself once more in danger, and the distress and anger of the North was unbounded. A corresponding triumph was felt through the South, their cause had received the consecration of victory, and their popularity increased with their success. In France, and still more in England, a cry went up against the weakness and cowardice of "the Yankees." Everywhere, the victory of Bull Run was regarded as the assurance of the ultimate victory of the South.

The men of the North had not lost courage; and they had learned their lesson; they perceived that their forces were not yet ready for battle; time must be spent in preparing them. The very prolongation of the war was in itself useful to the North, richer, more populous, and better able to sustain that long effort, without which all its courage and indomitable perseverance would not be able to triumph over the heroic resolution of the Confederates.

Congress was in session when the battle of Bull Run took place, and it promptly acceded to Mr. Lincoln's request for men and money. It even did more than he asked. Instead of four hundred million dollars and four hundred thousand men, there was placed at his disposal five hundred millions of money, and five hundred thousand men. The first Union army sent into the field, an inconsiderable and ill-prepared force, had been routed by the rebels; in future, the federal government would see to it that its volunteers were well-trained, and the first care was to reorganize those forces which had suffered defeat at Bull Run. On the 25th of July, General McClellan was appointed to reconstruct and organize the army of the Potomac; he acquitted himself of this task with such ability that his soldiers and his operations became the foundation of the great manœuvres of the succeeding campaign. For several months, during this period in which new armies were forming, the war remained in some degree suspended; it was incessantly threatening and imminent, but did not break out in violent activity, for the southern leaders still retained their attitude of defence. Arms as well as armies were being made ready; an indescribable activity prevailed throughout the United States; everywhere the nation was astir in preparation for the great conflict, wisely accepting the early lesson of the inefficiency of improvised armies and raw levies of volunteers. The people of the northern states, true children of the Puritans, were resolved to endure all things, to put all things at stake, to suffer to the last extremity in this great conflict for supremacy between North and South, beneath which lay the supreme question of slavery, — that slavery once willingly tolerated by the statesmen of the Union as a condition of the federal pact, now sentenced to death by the universal judgment, and making one last and tremendous effort in the struggle of the southern planters, resolved to defend their hereditary possessions as well as the independence of their institutions.

At first sight and from a theoretic point of view, the adherents to the Union had a right to expect and did in fact count upon the sympathy, if not the material support even, of Great Britain. Herself the first to enter on the path of the abolition of slavery, England had persuaded almost all the nations of Europe to follow in it; she was accustomed to reproach her daughter, established beyond the sea, with having retained the blacks in slavery, so long tolerating this stain upon her free institutions. And now, when the United States of America were risking their very existence in the strife which was to destroy the system of slavery, the public voice in England accused the American abolitionists of hypocrisy, and the English government proclaimed its neutrality, while showing itself secretly favorable to the rebels. The indignation of the North against England was all the stronger because France alone, of all the European countries, shared in this unfriendly attitude; through sincere hatred of slavery, or through hatred of rebellion against constituted authorities, the majority of the European states proffered to the American government a sympathy which, if inefficient, was still very sincere. The difficulties which occurred between the United States and England borrowed from this condition of public feeling a bitterness not fully justified by the affairs themselves; the temper of the public mind appeared even in diplomatic communications beneath the customary reserve and moderation of official language.

THE SAN JACINTO STOPPING THE TRENT.

The first cause of disagreement between the two countries was singularly aggravated by this condition of the public mind on both sides of the Atlantic. The Confederates, not content with the neutrality of England and France, were desirous to obtain the recognition of their independence, and with this end in view they hastened to establish their envoys at the two courts. Mr. Slidell was designated for France, and Mr. Mason for England; escaping the federal cruisers, these two gentlemen made their way to Havana, and there embarked on the 7th of November on board the English mail-steamer, the Trent.

The United States sloop-of-war, the San Jacinto, was just at this time cruising in the neighborhood of the West Indies in search of the privateer Sumter, and Captain Wilkes, her commander, learning that the Confederate agents were on their way to England resolved to intercept them. For this end he posted himself in the Bahama Channel, and on the approach of the Trent hailed the English vessel, firing a shot across her bows to bring her to. An armed party then boarded the Trent, and after a search took off Mr. Mason and Mr. Slidell, against the protest of the English officers. The two emissaries were transferred to the San Jacinto, and brought to New York, whence they were taken to Fort Warren, in Boston harbor.

The protection of the English flag had thus been audaciously violated. It had been in past years the custom of England to claim a right of search in the case of neutral ships suspected of carrying contraband of war. The war of 1812 was caused by the attempt to exercise this right, and Mr. Lincoln and his Cabinet at once perceived the dangerous illegality of the act of Captain Wilkes. To all moderate and reasonable minds the question admitted of no doubt. The princes of the House of Orleans, who had come from England with the wish to serve this American cause, dear to their race, urged upon the President and Secretary of State the necessity of reparation and release of the prisoners.

On the 30th of November, Mr. Seward communicated to Mr. Adams, the American minister in London, a statement of the facts, with the assurance that Captain Wilkes had acted without instructions, and that the American government was prepared to discuss the matter amicably. Unfortunately the Secretary of the Navy had not been so prudent, and had officially congratulated Captain Wilkes upon his action. A vote of thanks had also been passed in the House of Representatives; public meetings were held to applaud his conduct, and an enthusiastic crowd followed his footsteps, and cheered him whenever he appeared in public. Captain Wilkes himself was astonished at the public approval, for his first instinct had been that it would be necessary to justify himself.

The news of the insult to the British flag produced throughout England a legitimate indignation. The whole country felt itself injured by this violation of the right of asylum; the entire nation shared in the feeling with which the passengers on board the Trent saw American marines occupying the vessel's deck; neither laws nor precedents were brought up; a complete forgetfulness prevailed in respect to the aggressions of the British navy in the matter of the right of search at the beginning of the century, when Great Britain was the belligerent, and the United States the neutral. The enemies of the American republic, specially numerous in the upper classes, encouraged the public feeling by all means in their power. At their head was Lord Palmerston, the prime minister, who in spite of his political sagacity had more than once allowed himself to be blinded by his prejudices. After a summary and partial investigation, the crown lawyers had declared that the seizure of the Confederate commissioners was illegal; and the English government hastened to act as if war would at once be necessary. A great display of forces was ordered; the exportation of arms and munitions of war was forbidden; military preparations were hurried forward, and a considerable body of troops at once sent out to Canada. Public opinion insisted upon regarding these troops as sent out to co-operate with the South, and the latter, for their part, felt themselves about to realize all their warmest hopes of English recognition and assistance.

Meantime the two ministers, Lord Lyons and Mr. Adams, were happily able to preserve their prudence and their equanimity; and, the demands of England appearing evidently just, although her attitude was more menacing than the occasion required, President Lincoln and his Cabinet decided to yield to them. On the 26th of December, Mr. Seward addressed a note to Lord Lyons, in which he announced that the persons held in military custody at Fort Warren, would be "cheerfully liberated." He, however, reminded Lord Lyons of the former practice of England herself in regard to neutrals, and expressed his gratification that Great Britain had at last fully acceded to the American doctrine, that "free ships make free goods." The liberation of the Confederate envoys produced but little feeling in America, and was received with indifference in England. It had become plain to both nations that Messrs. Slidell and Mason had been too much honored by having even for a moment rendered possible a war between England and the United States.

The agitation caused by the Trent affair had scarcely subsided when other and more serious dissensions began to threaten the official good understanding between the two countries. At this time also, one of the wisest, as well as the most trusted of the queen's advisers, was taken away, an adviser whose last expressed opinion on public affairs is believed to have been a recommendation of patient and moderate measures in the affair of the Trent.

On the 8th of December, Prince Albert was reported to be slightly indisposed, confined to his room by a heavy cold. On the 11th it was announced that his illness, though without unfavorable symptoms, was likely to continue for some time. About midnight on the 14th, all London was surprised and disturbed by a very unusual sound, the tolling of the great bell of St. Paul's. The Prince Consort was dead. A few minutes before eleven he had expired, in the presence of his wife and three of his children. His last look had been for the queen, sole and tender object of his love, faithful thenceforward to his memory with a pathetic devotion rare in any station in life. But souls truly touched by love and grief are consoled by no grandeur.

All England wept with their sovereign. It has been already said that Prince Albert had often to suffer from suspicion, that more than once he had seen melt away what degree of popularity had been slowly gained by him; he had been accused of exercising an excessive influence in affairs of state contrary to constitutional principles, and habitually to the detriment of the Liberal cause. But amid all obstacles and under all shadows, the national esteem for him had on the whole gained strength; the purity of his private life, his constant and modest devotion to the public welfare, the moderation and wisdom of his counsels, had by degrees conquered for the Prince Consort the place that he deserved in the public opinion of England. That which he held in the queen's heart had long been known to the nation; consternation equalled regret. In the secret councils of her government the country, as well as the queen, had lost a safe and disinterested support, a modest and firm guidance, and the English people, as well as the queen, felt this. In the same measure that the happiness had been long and exceptional, did the sudden bereavement appear cruel. Victoria Regina was indeed "an unhappy queen," as she inscribed herself in presenting to M. Guizot a copy of Prince Albert's public addresses.

Distrust had been followed by hostility in the relations between England and the United States. The parade of English forces had offended the American republic; the violation of the English flag had irritated British pride; public sentiment in England still remained divided, but the favor towards the South increased every day, it manifested itself loudly, and penetrated all parties, strengthened as it was by the success which had for the moment signalized the resumption of hostilities. The Liberals even went beyond the Tories in predicting the triumph of the Confederacy. It was a Liberal, Mr. Roebuck, who presented a motion in the House of Commons calling on government to recognize the Confederate States. It was Lord John Russell who attributed to the North, the thirst for empire, to the South, the thirst for independence. It was Mr. Gladstone who exclaimed that President Davis had made an army, had made a navy, still more, had made a nation. By their very existence as an opposition, the Conservatives were impelled to use more moderation in their language; some, however, of the Liberals remained faithful to the principles of their life and of their former party; the Duke of Argyll ardently supported the cause of abolition; Sir George Lewis, Mr. Charles Villiers and Mr. Milner Gibson were favorable to the North; Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright recognized the justice of the war waged for the support of the Union. Even the suffering artisans of Lancashire, reduced to the most frightful distress by the lack of the raw material accumulated in the ports of the Confederacy, resolutely opposed all measures tending towards breaking the blockade, considering the cotton famine a less evil than the continuance of slavery in America. With the great dumb mass of the working population, the cause of the North was almost everywhere preferred, while all the noise and glitter of public favor were on the side of the South.

This public good-will manifested itself more than once by an indulgence on the part of the English government which amounted to a violation of neutrality. Mr. Gladstone was in error when he said that Mr. Jefferson Davis had made a navy; he had merely ordered and paid for one. The vessels of war themselves had been built in English shipyards; they were manned by English sailors; they frequently sailed under the English flag, only running up the Confederate colors at the moment of combat. Nearly all the privateers which attacked the merchant vessels of the United States during the war of secession had been built in England, under divers pretexts. The English shipbuilders went even further, and constructed iron-clads for the service of the Confederate government, but the sailing of these vessels was, however, prohibited upon the reiterated complaints of Mr. Adams. Against the fitting out of privateers, Lord Russell constantly refused to take any measures. Many of these had inflicted heavy damage upon American commerce. The most conspicuous among these was the Alabama, commanded by Captain Semmes, who had formerly been in command of the Sumter.

This vessel was destined to play an important part in the relations between England and the United States, and to bring about the decision of a capital point in international law. While the vessel was yet upon the stocks in the Messrs. Lairds' shipyard, Mr. Adams notified the English government that she had been ordered by Mr. Davis for service under the Confederate government. Earl Russell requested proof of this. The United

THE KEARSARGE AND THE ALABAMA.

ADMIRAL FARRAGUT.

States minister had provided himself with the legal opinion of an eminent English jurist to the effect that the permitted construction of this vessel was a flagrant violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act; Lord Russell still hesitated, and in his turn asked legal advice, which not being promptly given, the Alabama was, meantime, completed; she sailed out of the Mersey well equipped and well manned, and set forth upon her destructive career, during which she captured nearly seventy Northern vessels. These captured vessels were, in general, set on fire. More than once the light of this conflagration at sea served to attract other ships to their destruction, the humane instinct of the sailor leading him to hasten to offer assistance, and so bringing him straight towards the Alabama, yet cruising near the burning wreck.

Usually Captain Semmes kept away from the armed vessels of the United States. Once he engaged with a small blockading vessel, the Hatteras, and sunk her in a few minutes; a second encounter of this sort proved fatal to the privateer. Her antagonist was the ship-of-war Kearsarge; the encounter took place off Cherbourg, and in an hour the Alabama was sunk. Captain Semmes being taken off by an English yacht, was carried to England, where for a short time he enjoyed immense popularity.

For two years the Alabama had roved the seas, destroying American commerce, until finally ship-owners became unwilling to send out their vessels. She was now gone; the waves swept above her shattered hull; but the damage she had inflicted upon American commerce and the claims of the American government for indemnification, kept her memory fresh in the minds of all. Lord Russell and Lord Palmerston entrenched themselves behind the doctrine of the rights of neutrals, and the fact that a few British subjects had been secretly enlisted for the Union service. The relative unimportance of this latter plea remained indisputable; as did the indifference of the English authorities in respect to the harm done by privateering, sometimes changing indeed into cordial sympathy towards these enterprises of the Confederacy.

This controversy was destined to be protracted for many years, and to be complicated with divers incidents. It was to pass from the hands of the Liberals into those of the Tories, more equitable judges of the question, and finally, under Mr. Gladstone's ministry, terminate by the arbitration of an international tribunal in session at Geneva, whose decision, pronounced in 1872, was contrary to the claims of England. The indemnity which Great Britain was obliged to pay amounted to about three millions sterling, and even this was but a small part of the damage inflicted by the Alabama upon American commerce.

The tribunal of arbitration consisted of five persons, to be respectively appointed by the Queen, the President of the United States, the King of Italy, the President of the Swiss Confederation, and the Emperor of Brazil. It was provided for by the Treaty of Washington (May 8, 1871). The importance of the decision reached was extreme. From the beginning the English plenipotentiaries who negotiated the Washington treaty openly acknowledged that the American claims should rightfully be regarded as national, in this respect taking a different ground from that on which in 1870, Lord Clarendon and Mr. Reverdy Johnson had negotiated a settlement which the United States refused to accept. The English commissioners expressed also "the regret felt by her Majesty's government for the escape, under whatever circumstances, of the Alabama and other vessels from British ports, and for the depredations committed by those vessels." The principles which were to preside over the arbitration were then summed up as follows: "A neutral government is bound, first, to use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping within its jurisdiction of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or to carry on war against a Power with which it is at peace, and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction to warlike use; secondly, not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men; thirdly, to exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters, and as to all persons within its jurisdiction, to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties." The English commissioners took the precaution to declare that these principles of international law were now for the first time established, but they agreed to decide the claims arising from the Alabama question in accordance with them, and also "to observe these rules between themselves in future, and to bring them to the knowledge of other maritime Powers, and to invite them to accede to them."

The result of the Geneva arbitration was not well received in England, and Mr. Gladstone's influence was considerably impaired by it. It had, however, established an equitable principle, and definitively settled an important question of the reciprocal duties of nations. The Trent affair had given a ratification to the decisions of the Paris Congress in respect to the flag of neutrals; the affair of the Alabama was the basis of an important negotiation ended by a treaty which did honor to all the contracting parties. The concessions made by England were just and proper; the United States on their side withdrew their "indirect claims." In 1862, Mr. Adams prudently dropped the question of the Alabama; when, after the triumph of the Union cause and the subsidence of public feeling in England, the subject recurred, justice and moderation gained the victory over the excitement and exasperation of the earlier time.

In 1862 and 1863, the public feeling was more excited than ever, and the efforts of the South were persistent to obtain a recognition of the Confederate government. The Emperor Napoleon had for a long time been favorable to this idea, which in his mind was connected with certain vague, ambitious projects of his own. As early as 1861, he had engaged England and Spain in a diplomatic convention on the subject of Mexico. The state of anarchy which had for some years prevailed in that country had been the cause of various wrongs committed against foreign subjects, a redress of which was now claimed by the European governments. The power was at this time in the hands of Benito Juarez, a man as violent and corrupt as his predecessors, but more energetic in outward appearance, and especially desirous of being on good terms with the established governments of Europe. In pursuance of this design, he had pledged himself to the payment of certain indemnities, promising to make over for this purpose a part of the customs revenues. These indemnities, however, had not been paid, and the Emperor Napoleon availed himself of this pretext to claim from Spain and England the fulfilment of the agreement into which they had entered. The protection of foreign subjects and their most pressing interests required, it was said, a military demonstration.

The position of affairs in America gave reason to expect a final separation of the Northern and Southern States; nothing was to be feared in the way of intervention; the allied expedition, therefore, set sail. The English contingent was small. The projects of the Emperor Napoleon began already to excite suspicion. It was no longer a question of redressing the grievances of the foreign subjects resident in Mexico. But even here the claims of France proved too aggressive. The emperor had extended his protection to a M. Jecker, a banker of Swiss origin, who claimed from the Mexican government an enormous sum, as payment of a debt which was in part fictitious. These unjust claims France supported with decision. The Emperor Napoleon was dazzled by the old traditions of Mexican treasures; the men who surrounded him were greedy of gain; financial schemes were mingled with historic reminiscences and illusive theories of the dominant destiny of the Latin races. Napoleon resolved to found in Mexico a new empire which should be closely bound to him by all the claims of gratitude and the necessities of weakness. He offered the crown to Maximilian, brother of the Emperor of Austria, a brave, ambitious, and imaginative man; the ambition of the Archduchess Carlotta, daughter of Leopold I., King of the Belgians, took fire at the thought of imperial dominion; the archduke accepted, running blindly to his ruin.

PARK IN THE CITY OF MEXICO

D. LANGELOT

The demonstration against Mexico became a war of invasion, from which England and Spain at once withdrew, renouncing an alliance which had led them into an enterprise contrary as well to their views as to their interests. One French army corps after another was sent out to strengthen the invasion. Juarez was defeated, Pueblo taken, and the city of Mexico occupied, at immense cost of men and money; the Emperor Maximilian was proclaimed in the capital of his new empire, while French soldiers surrounded the sovereign to protect him from his new subjects.

The United States protested against the establishment of the Mexican monarchy, or rather against the French intervention which had founded it. Mexico had long been the object of their own desire, as was proved by the expedition of 1847. The Emperor Napoleon paid no heed to their protest; he counted upon the triumph of the Confederacy and its good-will towards him in return for his constant sympathy. Meanwhile, however, affairs were changing their aspect in America. After their long and courageous efforts, after disasters so many times repeated that they had at last shaken the confidence of even the firmest partisans of the American Union, the soldiers of the North were at last gaining the advantage. General Meade had won the victory of Gettysburg, (July, 1863); simultaneously the stronghold of Vicksburg, on the Mississippi, had surrendered to General Grant. At that very time Mr. Roebuck's motion for the recognition of the Confederacy was before the House of Commons. But it did not come to a division. In the fashionable world of London the news of the Southern disasters was received for a time with incredulity; but the evidence became overwhelming, and the hopes lately so confident now faded gradually away. The decisive moment had passed, and though the war was by no means at an end, the ultimate defeat of the Confederates was no longer doubtful, every day bringing them new disasters. English opinion, however, still supported them with a sympathy colored by self-interest; the English press kept alive the obstinate illusions of the public mind. As late as the 31st of December, 1864, the Times complained that "Mr. Seward and other teachers or flatterers of the multitude still affect to anticipate the early restoration of the Union."

On the 3d of April, 1865, the Confederate capital was occupied by the Union forces, and within two weeks from that time General Lee had surrendered, and President Davis was captured. The Confederacy was destroyed, the American Union re-established, and the emancipation of the blacks, a measure which had been forced by the exigencies of the war, was henceforth an established fact. And now, the United States, bleeding, exhausted, but victorious, and sure of the speedy return of their national prosperity, had leisure to look about them, and to un-undertake the redressal of the wrongs they had suffered at the hands of foreign Powers; and they commenced by signifying to the Cabinet of the Tuileries that a longer occupation of Mexico by French troops could not be permitted. The Emperor Napoleon withdrew his army. Two months later the Mexican empire fell before the republican forces, Maximilian paid with his life for the brief and barren honor he had received, and, as a final stroke of misery in this sad incident, the Archduchess Carlotta, beloved daughter of the most sagacious prince in Europe, lost her reason at the news of her husband's death, and was brought home to the palace of her family, there to drag out a miserable and hopeless existence.

The Mexican expedition had resulted fatally for Maximilian and his royal wife; it had also the effect of deepening the abyss which already yawned beneath the feet of the French emperor. The frivolity, imprudence, and incapacity so long hidden under a brilliant fortune began at last to be revealed. England became alarmed at the ambitious projects which she perceived forming in her neighborhood, her armaments were increased, and the distrust which she felt towards France grew stronger day by day. Lord Palmerston at last yielded to this national sentiment which he had resisted for so many years. More than any other English statesman he had contributed to render the Emperor of the French secure upon his throne: now, when age had abated his natural ardor without abating that dominant passion for the exclusive interests of England which gave him his strength, and had been almost always the cause of his errors, the octogenarian prime minister seconded, to the utmost of his ability, the efforts of the country in view of a possible invasion by the French. England was making ready the weapons which she was not to be obliged to use, and Lord Palmerston looked on approvingly; the country, he said, had now got rid of an apathetic blindness on the part of the governed and the governors, as to the defensive means of England compared with the offensive means acquired and acquiring by other Powers.

While still expecting the final destruction of the American Union, England had not, however, remained an uninterested observer of the numerous incidents transpiring afar off in the colonies, whither the bold subjects of Great Britain had gone to seek the space and the wealth which the narrow territory of their own island denies them. In 1862-3, these slight wars with barbarous tribes occupied attention, if they did not excite uneasiness, in England. In Australia, in Africa, and in Japan, English subjects were molested.

The native population of New Zealand are a numerous, intelligent, and resolute race. A tribe of Maoris, living near Auckland, had risen in insurrection, and the movement soon became general throughout the Maori nation. The encroachments of the colonists had long been a cause of irritation to the natives, themselves skilled in agriculture, and jealous of their possessions. They were also so well versed in the principles of attack and defence that, at the outset, they gave the English troops a somewhat serious repulse. They were, of course, defeated at last; and the legislature of New Zealand naturally justified the colonists. A vast amount of native lands were confiscated, and a dictatorial power over the native inhabitants was conferred upon the governor, Sir George Grey. The guarantee of a loan to cover the expenses of the war was hotly discussed in Parliament, but finally passed. Mr. Roebuck set forth as a theory the practical fact, that wherever the savage and the white man met, the savage must disappear. The Maoris had not as yet accepted this necessity, but they were conquered and reduced to submission at England's expense.

The King of the Ashantees was even less willing to be reduced to obedience. Some of his slaves had fled into British territory, and the governor of the Cape Coast Colony refused to give them back. The king raised troops, invaded the territory of neighboring chiefs, and was drawing near the frontier of the English Colony. Upon this the English governor, anticipating the probable invasion, sent a body of troops into Ashantee. It was during the pestilential heats of spring, and even the black troops from the West Indies could not endure the unhealthiness of the climate. The mortality was soon so great that it became necessary to withdraw the troops, leaving the king to express his triumph by practising horrible cruelties upon his subjects and his neighbors. Government obtained but the very smallest majority in the vote taken in the House of Commons, after a discussion of this expedition.

In 1862, the kingdom of Japan was upon the eye of a revolution destined to shake to its foundations the ancient order of its social life, to open its gates to Europeans, and to bring in the germs of a new civilization worthy of the most intelligent nation of the extreme East. The old restrictions were, however, still in force for the most part, and at the few points where they had given way, extreme bitterness of feeling guarded the ancient state of things. The English had establishments in Japan, and the right to move about freely within certain limits. A British subject, Mr. Richardson, was assassinated in September, 1862, within the territory open to Englishmen. The assassins belonged to the household of Prince Satsuma, one of the most powerful among the great feudal lords who divided the authority of the kingdom with the established government. Reparation was demanded both from the government and from the prince personally. The government yielded to the demand of the English chargé d'affaires, Colonel Meade, but Satsuma made no reply. On the 11th of August, 1863, Admiral Kuper, naval commandant, entered the bay of Kagosima, Satsuma's capital, with his squadron, to obtain satisfaction. No steps were taken by the Japanese prince, and the admiral seized a few vessels; upon this the forts protecting the town fired upon him. The admiral at once bombarded the city; the buildings were mostly of wood, and, taking fire from the bombardment, were nearly all consumed. Satsuma then decided to pay the indemnity and promised justice upon the murderers. Severe attacks were made in England upon the admiral's conduct, but government had a majority in supporting him. The bombardment of Kagosima seemed to be the only resource of the English admiral; time was given for the women and children to be withdrawn; and the burning of the town was to be regarded as an accident.

Amid these lesser warlike incidents, which were attracting the attention and exciting the interest of England, and amid the excitement caused by the desperate struggles of the American war, there occurred suddenly the explosion of another rebellion, which gained for itself the sympathies of almost all the world, without, however, presenting to any considerate mind, the slightest prospect of success. In 1863, all Poland rose once again against Russian tyranny. As had been the case many years before in La Vendée, the rigors of an odious conscription gave the signal for the outbreak of an insurrection which had been long seething. The young men liable to conscription escaped to the woods and there formed armed bands. Profiting by the indulgence of Austria, which country has been always more favorable to Poland than were Russia and Prussia, her associates in the partition of that kingdom, the Polish insurgents from time to time crossed the frontier to escape from the Russian troops, returning again when they were in a position to resume their guerilla warfare. The effort of the Polish insurrection was merely to prolong the strife until the great Powers, for whose support they hoped, should at last decide to interfere.

For a moment the Polish patriots might have believed their cause successful with France and England. The excitement in France was extreme; a sympathy for Poland had always been very strong in that country; from every quarter partisans made themselves heard. M. de Montalembert pleaded the cause of this "nation in mourning, begging that its country be given back to it." Prince Napoleon in the Senate urged the duty of a prompt intervention; Count Walewski pleaded the same cause in the intimate councils of the emperor. But the latter was unable to enter alone upon the struggle; Mexico weighed yet upon France, a burdensome and expensive folly.

England seemed upon the point of responding in her turn to the hopes of the Poles. Lord Russell addressed to Russia a note, in which France and Austria concurred, recommending to the Russian government a scheme of pacification for Poland, under the following heads: complete amnesty, a national representation, a national administration of Poles for Poland, liberty of conscience, official use of the Polish language, and the establishment of a regular system of recruiting. The friends of Poland, both on the Continent and in England, entertained the hope that in the very probable event of a peremptory refusal on the part of Russia to accept these recommendations, England, France and Austria would feel themselves obliged to take up arms in behalf of Poland.

Bitter and oft-repeated illusion! Lord Palmerston had made no difficulty at Lord Russell's manifestation in favor of Poland; he was personally sympathetic with the Polish cause, and had no great liking for Russia, but he had now come to dread the Emperor Napoleon's ambition and to seek everywhere traces of the latter's machinations. The French might choose to occupy the Rhenish provinces under pretext of holding Prussia in check; the occupation might be followed by annexing them; Lord Palmerston was determined to furnish no pretext for any invasion of this kind. Prince Gortschakoff's response to the English note was firm and positive. "The Emperor Alexander understood perfectly the responsibility he had incurred," said the Russian minister, "the Polish insurrection was the outbreak of a cosmopolitan revolution which menaced all the governments of Europe." The old Russian bitterness was discernible in all the words as well as in all the acts of repression and of oppression. Once more Poland fell into the hands of her tyrants, rendered implacable by the fear they had for a moment felt in respect to a European intervention — an intervention which was, in fact, impracticable, and of which it would have been far wiser never to hold out the hope. The Polish insurrection went out, therefore, in the silence of death, of exile and of prison, while there arose in Europe a new question of peace or war, a new cause of discord, dissension, and oppression.

For a long time the possession by Denmark of the duchies of Holstein, Lauenburg and Schleswig, had been to Germany the cause of an irritation largely theoretic, founded upon the deceitful principle of the unity of races and languages which has been the cause of so much injustice and has served as the pretext of so many unscrupulous ambitions. As Duke of Holstein and Lauenburg, the King of Denmark had, of old, a seat in the Imperial Diet, and his rule over the duchies was much the same as had been that of the English kings over Hanover. The King of Denmark had not, however, that dominant sympathy for this portion of his states which the English sovereigns of the House of Hanover felt for their electorate. On the contrary, it was rather the royal desire to absorb these states into the monarchy, while it was the ambition of the Schleswig-Holstein provinces to enjoy a more independent existence, ruled, it is true, by the King of Denmark, but after the manner in which the kingdom of Hungary is ruled by the Emperor of Austria. In Germany, and in the depths of the soul of Count Bismarck — that grand schemer who had not as yet unveiled either the boldness of his views or the fatal extent of his abilities — it was believed that the duchies would one day become, not merely German, but Prussian.

ROYAL PALACE AT COPENHAGEN.

Frederick VII., King of Denmark, died in November, 1863. He left no children, and the succession to the throne fell, as had been settled by the treaty of London in 1852, to Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Glücksburg. The Prince of Holstein-Augustenburg, however, claimed the succession to the duchies, which right had been renounced by his father at the time of the European convention. The pretext was favorable for a separation of the duchies from the Danish monarchy. The sentiment of Germany was in accord with Count Bismarck's secret designs. Prussia championed the rights of the Duke of Augustenburg. The question came before the Germanic Diet, the King of Denmark refused to accept the conditions offered him, and was driven to the alternative of war. Austria and Prussia undertook the carrying on of hostilities, and the little kingdom of Denmark found itself alone opposed to these two great military powers.

The hopes of Denmark depended entirely upon England, who had many times advised them in the management of their affairs, and whose heir-apparent had very lately contracted marriage with the eldest daughter of the new King of Denmark. Repeatedly the counsels of the English ministry had availed to procure for the duchies an indulgent and equitable treatment, which they otherwise would not have received at the hands of the Danish government, while, in accepting the advice and sanction of England, the Danes had regarded themselves as sure of her protection.

A few words by Lord Palmerston in the House of Commons, on the 23d of July, 1863, when the storm which was about to burst upon Denmark had begun to threaten in the horizon, had seemed to set the seal to the hopes entertained by Denmark: "We are convinced — I am convinced, at least — that if any violent attempt were made to overthrow the rights, and interfere with the independence of Denmark, those who made the attempt would find in the result that it would not be Denmark alone with which they would have to contend." The hour of peril had now arrived; the attempt was in process of execution; the Austrian and Prussian armies had entered Schleswig and Holstein; the Danes were fighting desperately against overwhelming odds, and England did not raise her hand in defence of them. In England public opinion was strongly in favor of Denmark, and the public indignation broke out everywhere, but the English government would not enter alone into the struggle; England had need of the French alliance, of the weight and influence of France in Europe. The same firmness of attitude, the same resolution with which the two allies entered upon the Crimean war, would in this case have very probably sufficed to arrest the impulse of German ambition; the question would have become one of diplomacy rather than of war; but the Emperor Napoleon had not recovered from his irritation at the coldness of England in the Polish question a few months before, and at the jealousy she had allowed to appear in respect to his possible designs upon the Rhenish provinces; he therefore refused to join in the action of the English government, and the English government relinquished all thought of intervention in behalf of Denmark. "The truth is," wrote Lord Palmerston to Lord Russell, "that to enter into a military conflict with all Germany on continental ground would be a serious undertaking. If Sweden and Denmark were actually co-operating with us, our 20,000 men might do a great deal; but Austria and Prussia could bring 200,000 or 300,000 into the field, and would be joined by the smaller German states." England therefore contented herself with an isolated and necessarily inefficacious diplomatic action in the affair; and in spite of their efforts and of the transports of joy with which their naval victory off Heligoland was received in England, the Danes were soon crushed. A suspension of arms was agreed upon, and a conference of the great Powers was called together at London.

The population of the duchies speedily became aware that their independence had never been at all considered in the case, and that they had merely passed from the hands of one master into those of another, who would probably be even less considerate of their rights. The delegates which the duchies sent to London were refused a seat in the conference. In the end, the Danes rejected all proposals for a settlement, and the war recommenced. Finally, however, it was with Prussia herself that Denmark consented to negotiate. Europe had allowed a little nation to be crushed. One of the two conquerors was soon to receive the bitter wages of injustice. The successes of the principal oppressor had not yet reached their culminating point.

England's pride, as well as her sense of right, was deeply wounded. Lord Malmesbury, in Lord Derby's absence, proposed a resolution censuring the Cabinet, and it was carried by a majority of nine. In the House of Commons Mr. Disraeli, on the 4th of July, 1864, offered a similar resolution. He called upon the House to express its regret that "while the course pursued by her Majesty's government has failed to maintain their avowed policy of upholding the integrity and independence of Denmark, it has lowered the just influence of this country in the capitals of Europe, and thereby diminished the securities for peace." The eloquent leader of the opposition attacked the weakness and inconsistency of the Cabinet with much skill. "Yes," he exclaimed, "France is equally responsible; and how comes it then that the position of France in relation to Denmark is so free from embarrassment, and so dignified, that no word of blame is uttered anywhere in Europe against France for what she has done in regard to Denmark, while your position is one of infinite perplexity, — while you are everywhere accused and unable to defend yourselves? How could this be but because of some fatal mistake, some terrible mismanagement?"

Mr. Disraeli had not, however, correctly estimated the address and vigor of his adversary. Mr. Kinglake presented an amendment which gave the ministry an opportunity to evade the difficulty, and the opportunity was skilfully seized. Lord Palmerston closed the debate by a speech, in which, very soon dismissing the question of the Danish war and the hopes which he had raised only to disappoint, he brought before the House the entire policy of his administration, calling attention to the financial triumphs of Mr. Gladstone, and interposing the latter's name as a shield to ward off the blows which he had reason to dread from the extreme Liberals. The question was no longer one of foreign policy, of intervention or non-intervention, but of the existence of the Cabinet, of Lord Palmerston's power, still more of that of Mr. Gladstone. The Liberals rallied around the government, and Mr. Disraeli's motion was rejected by a majority of eighteen votes. For the last time the voice of Lord Palmerston had gained the victory in the House of Commons, where he had sat for nearly sixty years. Already he had been forced to call to his aid the name of another; another chief was coming forward to seize the authority about to drop from his hands. The new elections were preparing; many places were vacant in the parties as well as in society. The ranks were thinner of those names and acts that had made their country famous. They were destined to be thinned still more.

Sir James Graham died in October, 1861; Mr. Sidney Herbert (late Lord Herbert of Lea), had preceded him by a few months. Sir George Lewis died in 1863; Lord Elgin, and his predecessors in the government of India, — Lord Dalhousie and Lord Canning, — were also dead. In 1864, the Duke of Newcastle died. Most of these statesmen were still comparatively young, "swept away," said Mr. Gladstone in a speech made at Glasgow, "in the full maturity of their faculties, and in the early stages of middle life — a body of men strong enough of themselves in all the gifts of wisdom and knowledge, of experience and of eloquence, to have equipped a Cabinet for the service of the country." In the month of February, 1865, died also Cardinal Wiseman, for many years actively occupied in the service of the Roman Catholic church in England, and caring but little for the popular clamor raised against him. A few weeks after this (April 2), Mr. Cobden expired, leaving to all, both friends and enemies, the conviction that the life just ended had been noble and pure, and that his death was indeed a public calamity. In the new Parliament about to assemble, new men were destined to fill the places left vacant by these their illustrious predecessors.

Once more the prime minister had witnessed the assembling of a new Parliament. He had witnessed a Liberal victory, more decided and conspicuous than he himself would have wished. The democratic tendency of the times had always caused him alarm; the Tories knew and felt that Lord Palmerston's authority was henceforth the only barrier against the advancing waves of reform. Meantime the minister was failing daily, the session of 1865 rarely saw him at his post, and when he did attend, he was evidently ill and weary. His physical as well as intellectual vigor had already lasted beyond the usual limits of human strength. To the last he bore the burden of public affairs, but evidently now bent under it. The news of his severe illness reached London on the 17th of October, 1865; for some time he had suffered from the gout, the disease had now fastened upon the vital organs, and on the following day he was dead, close upon the completion of his eighty-first year. He fell on the field of battle where he had fought all his life. The policy of conservatism lost in England one of its firmest adherents. In foreign affairs and European policy, age had abated his excessive and often injudicious ardor; he had served his country with an intense and steady passion which sometimes blinded him in respect to the legitimacy of the measures he employed and the result toward which he was tending. Solely concerned with the present success of England and her interests of the moment, he had more than once contributed by his unscrupulousness to lower the moral level of diplomatic relations in Europe. Fortune had habitually served him; his faults were in great part forgotten. England remembered the unbounded devotion he had always been ready to put at the service of that national sentiment which he obeyed without ever seeking to direct it. The regrets that he inspired were sincere, and the honors paid him were worthy of those regrets. A new era was beginning in the political destinies of England, and no man, whatever his party, could fail to be aware of the approaching changes.

Palmerston.

CHAPTER XIII.

INSURRECTION IN JAMAICA. CONTINENTAL CHANGES.
AFFAIRS AT HOME. THE ABYSSINIAN WAR.

THE Cabinet changes caused by Lord Palmerston's death were unimportant. Lord Russell became Prime Minister, and Lord Clarendon, Foreign Secretary. It was in the House of Commons that the revolution took place. Mr. Gladstone became the leader of the Liberal party; the old Whigs as well as more recent recruits were still hesitating on the border of radicalism; Lord John Russell, raised to the peerage in July, 1861, had been thus withdrawn from all rivalry in the House of Commons with Mr. Gladstone, and henceforth the latter was to stand face to face with Mr. Disraeli, as his great opponent both in oratory and in statesmanship. All return towards the Conservatives was now cut off for Mr. Gladstone; the University of Oxford, so long faithful to him, had returned Mr. Gathorne Hardy at the last election, and Mr. Gladstone now represented South Lancashire. That which he soon after said, speaking of the Cabinet: "The Rubicon is passed; the ships have been burned; the bridges have been broken down," was yet more true of himself. Mr. Gladstone was destined henceforth to march at the head of the boldest reformers, without permitting himself to be deterred either by the memory of his past career, or by the astonished indignation of his former friends.

Earl Russell had not yet relinquished, however, the leadership of his party upon the question which had been the guiding star of his life, amidst the almost regular alternations of the parliamentary tide which had so many times swept him into or out of power. The Reform Bill of 1832 had been his first triumph; he aspired to crown his parliamentary career by a new Reform, demanded, in his judgment, by the progress of liberal ideas, as well as by the development of popular prosperity and enlightenment. The moment, however, was not propitious for a measure of importance; the House had just met, after the expenses and excitement of the general elections, and men were not disposed to undergo at once the shocks which a Reform Bill might involve. Lord Russell did not regard these secondary considerations; he counted upon the decisive action of all the supporters of Reform in Parliament and in the country. He was occupied in the preparation of a bill when the news of insubordination in Jamaica, and of the measures taken to repress it, came suddenly, absorbing the attention of all, and turning away all thoughts from the theoretic question of an electoral law. In an English colony, where the mother-country had of her own will broken the yoke of slavery, negro insurrection had been suppressed with a severity at which all men stood appalled. To the first reports of the disturbances were soon added details of the vindictive pursuit which had followed the first legitimate and justifiable measures of repression. Letters of officers stationed in Jamaica depicted without reserve the rigid enforcement of martial law. "I visited," wrote an officer to his superior, "several estates and villages. I burnt seven houses in all, but did not even see a rebel. On returning to Golden Grove in the evening, sixty-seven prisoners had been sent in by the Maroons. I disposed of as many as possible, but was too tired to continue after dark. On the morning of the 24th, I started for Morant Bay, having first flogged four and hung six rebels. I beg to state that I did not meet a single man upon the road up to Keith Hall; there were a few prisoners here, all of whom I flogged, and then proceeded to Johnstown and Beckford. At the latter place I burnt seven houses and one meeting-house ; in the former four houses." Another writes: " We made a raid with thirty men, flogging nine men and burning their negro houses. We held a court-martial on the prisoners, who amounted to about fifty or sixty. Several were flogged without court-martial, from a simple examination. This is a picture of martial law. The soldiers enjoy it ; the inhabitants here dread it. If they run on their approach, they are shot for running away."

A colored man named George William Gordon, a member of the Colonial Assembly, a Baptist, and a person of some influence with the negro population, had been accused of stirring up sedition. He surrendered himself to the governor at Kingston, and was placed on board a government vessel and carried to Morant Bay, where martial law had been proclaimed. He had a summary trial, was found guilty, and was immediately hanged. There were no more rebels, but the punishments continued. The public voice was raised in indignation against the governor, and the colonial secretary sent out a Commission of Inquiry to investigate the matter.

The abolition of slavery in Jamaica had left the colony in a condition both enfeebled and agitated. The troubles of 1839 recurred over and over again ; the colored population, naturally on bad terms with their former masters, could always depend upon the support of the officers of the crown, of the government and council ; the interests of the planters were represented by the elective assembly. The bad condition of many estates left uncultivated after the cessation of slave labor, had caused a cession to the blacks of a considerable extent of territory, which they had been authorized to cultivate on condition of paying the arrears of quit-rent due to the crown. In one or more cases, however, the actual owner had endeavored to repossess himself of his lands ; the negroes had resisted, and the case had been brought before a legal tribunal. Meanwhile, a general anxiety prevailed among the planters, and a dread of one of those negro insurrections which more than once have terrified the colonies with their unspeakable horrors. Military precautions had been taken, and no sooner did the negroes, armed with sticks and knives, present themselves before the court house at Morant Bay, than the volunteer troops were there to receive them. The force, however, was not sufficient; the court-house was set on fire, eighteen persons were killed and thirty wounded. Upon this, a general disturbance broke out through the neighborhood, which subsided at once upon the arrival of a small force of regulars, sent by the governor; and the negroes who had been concerned in the outbreak fled in every direction. Such were the facts of the "insurrection," as established before the commission sent out from England.

The chastisement inflicted was out of all proportion to the offence; it could be explained only by the alarm with which the white population, always a very small minority, habitually regarded the subject of an insurrection of the negroes, who were in this case excited not only by the wrongs of which they complained in the matter of the land, but also by a liberty to which they were not yet fully accustomed. The Governor of Jamaica, Mr. Edward John Eyre, was a brave and intelligent man. He had been a successful explorer in Australia, and a resident magistrate there, also Lieutenant-Governor in New Zealand and the Leeward Islands, and everywhere had been esteemed an upright and kindly-tempered man.

Yielding to the influence of the local terror, Governor Eyre had proclaimed martial law throughout the island, with the exception only of the city of Kingston. According to the report made by the commission, four hundred and thirty-nine persons were put to death, and more than six hundred suffered the cruel penalty of flogging, most of them, without any process of law whatever. A thousand houses were burned. The commission, in its report, declared that the punishments were excessive, and the repression cruel. Chief-Justice Cockburn declared that there was not a stone in the island of Jamaica which, if the rains of heaven had not washed off from it the stains of blood, might not have borne terrible witness to the manner in which martial law had been administered for the suppression of negro discontent.

It is to England's honor that, in the distant administration of her numerous colonies, which it is impossible always to govern with strict legality, public sentiment and public indignation have always rectified abuses and effectually repressed that tyranny to which the possession of absolute power sometimes leads even the most moderate men. The tumult of indignation with which England received the report of Governor Eyre's severity, the prosecution at once instituted against him, the bitterness of Chief-Justice Cockburn's language in charging the grand-jury, were all guarantees against the possible recurrence of a similar iniquity. At the same time, Mr. Eyre's conduct was defended by some persons as hotly as it was attacked by others; the urgency of the situation was pleaded, and, indeed, not unjustly, by way of palliation of the excesses of a government bewildered by the danger; Governor Eyre was never brought to trial, but his official career was ended, and he retired into private life, overwhelmed by debts incurred in defending himself before the grand-juries, which debts were, however, finally paid by government. Public equity and humanity were satisfied; Jamaica henceforth was ruled by a new governor, and received a new constitution, but the traces of what she had suffered were not and could not be effaced; countries which have long maintained slavery know that its imprint stamped for ages upon the soil and upon human souls, requires ages more before its traces can be finally obliterated.

While the deposed Governor of Jamaica was defending his conduct before his indignant countrymen, other disputes of a much wider importance were going on or being brought to a close in Europe. The despoilers of Denmark had quarrelled over their plunder, war had been declared between Austria and Prussia, and the battle of Sadowa fought and lost by Austria. Henceforth her power in Germany was forever weakened. The remnants of her Italian possessions were escaping from her; Venetia had been abandoned to France by the conquerors, and France had given it up to Italy. A new European state was developing with increasing rapidity; a threatening power was assuming vast proportions; the Powers dominant in the past saw their authority and their strength diminishing; they were bearing the penalty of their faults, and clear-sighted minds already perceived the grave consequences likely to ensue.

M. Guizot thus judged of the victory of Prussia over Austria, and the preponderance Prussia had by this event suddenly gained in Germany:

“Two great facts, one occurring in the eighteenth century, the other in our own times, have profoundly modified — I may say, have destroyed — the ancient organization of the German peoples. In the eighteenth century, by the political and military genius of Frederic II., Prussia, one of the states of the German Confederation, gained in territory and in internal strength, to the point of being able to dispute, and of disputing in fact, the preponderance in that confederation with Austria, who had for many centuries enjoyed it. The French Revolution and Napoleon, by their ideas and their wars, put a stop, for the time, to this rivalry between the two great German powers, and, by turns, humiliated Prussia and Austria, the former even more than the latter. Reduced, both of them, to the last extremity, they then rallied together in the general rising of the German populations to shake off the yoke of Napoleon, and in the great struggle which brought about his fall. The German Confederation rallied also at that time with many mutilations and a new organization, and again appeared the rivalry between Prussia and Austria, abated, however, and restrained by the prolonged effect of their late alliance, by the personal-sentiments of their rulers, by their common fear of revolutions, and by the German distrust of all foreign influence, especially of that of France. Thirty-four years of European peace had exhausted in the German Confederation these causes of harmony, real or apparent, and had sowed the germs of new ambitions, more popular than royal. The revolution of 1848 developed these germs, and rekindled the rivalry of the two Powers. An apparently unimportant question, and one which the slightest European wisdom might have stifled or might have settled, — the question, namely, of constitutional rights in dispute between Denmark and Holstein, precipitated events. Allies for a moment, in order to perform together a joint act of superior power against the little nation of Denmark, Austria and Prussia soon entered upon a violent quarrel. At one blow the battle of Sadowa put an end to the struggle, and opened a question infinitely more important than that which had given cause for the movement.

“It would be equally puerile to see in this great fact all that the victors at Sadowa or that systematic dreamers pretend to discern therein, or, on the other hand, to underestimate its importance. . . . The words and the ideas, ‘German nationality,’ and ‘German unity,’ played a vociferous part in this great event of 1866, but they did not constitute its real and serious character. It was a radical change accomplished by a German Power for its own profit, in the political condition of Germany and of Europe. There is no longer a German Confederation; there is no longer a struggle and balance of power between the great German States, and independence with secured means of resistance for the secondary German States. The fact of Sadowa is a fact of aggrandizement and conquest, achieved by the military strength of Prussia, and by her influence upon the intellectual life of Germany. It is the work of Frederic II. taken up and carried forward by his people, rather than by his successors upon the throne. It is a warlike, ambitious, and sagacious nation, which has unquestionably taken rank among the foremost Powers of Europe.

“Without doubt there is cause here for the elder Powers to be most watchful and wary. This new German State creates for them all, and most of all for France, a new situation, full of obscure possibilities. This situation it would have been easy for them to prevent; easily, by means of influence and diplomacy, might they have resolved the question between Germany and Denmark, on the subject of Schleswig and Holstein. Thus they would have stifled a war which has settled that trifling question only in raising other and much more serious ones. But foresight and decision were alike lacking at this crisis, to the great Powers of Europe. Through her German sympathies, Austria was betrayed into the enormous fault of uniting with Prussia to crush Denmark. Through hesitation or through miscalculation in respect to the future, the French government not merely failed to take the initiative, which belonged to it in this affair, but refused the proposal of joint, and, if need should arise, decisive action, made by England. Russia, who seemed by geographical position, as well as by family ties, to be the natural protectress of Denmark, spoke only as a matter of form, willing at heart to witness divisions, uncertainties, and inertia among the Western Powers. Prussia alone acted judiciously and vigorously, pursuing a design clearly marked out and of admirable policy; she had put herself at the head of the Danish event; it was natural that she alone should profit by the German success and all that followed from it. . . . Since the fall of Napoleon, Europe had seen no war so rash as that made by Prussia and Austria in 1866, nor any success so prompt and decisive as the battle of Sadowa."*

For more than twenty-five years, amid the diverse phases of the French revolution, the influence and the action of England had been dominant in Europe. From her island empire she had acted upon the destinies of the world by her policy, by her sacrifices, by her indomitable resolution, even at a time when her military forces were comparatively small and with difficulty recruited. Henceforth, at the close of a long peace, broken a few years before by the Crimean War and the Indian Mutiny, in presence of important changes in Europe and the new relative position of the Continental Powers, England resigned her share and control in the affairs of the Continent. She seemed to shut herself up in her narrow empire, extended only by commercial relations, and to abandon her interest in the world's history. Lord Palmerston had often pushed too far the tradition of English interference in European affairs. After his death, his country was silent in the councils of Europe. For more than ten years England had not a word to say in respect to foreign matters. Upon her own affairs, her domestic resources and home agitations, were concentrated all the efforts of English statesmen. "By degrees," wrote M. Guizot to Mr. Gladstone, in his letter of January, 1871, "England has ceased to consider foreign affairs as the main subjects of her policy; it is upon domestic questions, upon the condition and relations of the various parts of the British Empire, Ireland, India, the colonies, upon her own civil institutions and administration, that her attention and her labor have been for the most part concentrated; she has modified her parliamentary régime, her judicial, ecclesiastical, commercial, and colonial systems, her public instruction, her police; and the government which was esteemed the most obstinately conservative has become the most active of reformers.

* La France et la Prusse devant l'Europe, par M. Guizot.

“I am far from blaming this new direction of thought and of public administration among our neighbors; I call in question neither the value nor the opportuneness of the reforms they have made. I am convinced that, taking everything into account, England to-day is more equitably governed and is more prosperous than she has ever been. But she cannot, she should not forget that it is to her foreign policy during a period of forty years that she owes her wonderful gain in importance, and the world's unhesitating acknowledgment of her power. It is by reason of her energetic sympathy in the general affairs of Europe, by reason of the share she has had in them, the part she has played in them, that the firmest partisans of order have been accustomed to consider her the type of strong governments, and that the most faithful friends of liberty have been grateful to her for presenting at the same time the spectacle of a free people. In presence of new and grave European crises, England cannot to-day remain unconcerned and inactive without being accused of egoism and indolence, and without soon declining, morally and politically, in the opinion and consideration of the world.”

England remained and was to remain inactive, if not indifferent, in the presence of the great events which took place and were to take place in Europe. In 1870 as in 1866, she was absorbed by the objects of her domestic policy, and too much occupied in moving her pawns upon the parliamentary chess-board, to interfere in the great game then going on in Europe. In 1870, she was founding her system of public instruction; in 1866, she was again busy in parliamentary reform. It had been the general expectation that Lord Russell would at once avail himself of his predominance in the queen's councils to present a project of reform. The royal speech announced it, upon the opening of the new session, but with a certain reserve which surprised the public mind. Information had been sought for, it was said, in reference to the right of voting in the election of members of Parliament, and when the information should be complete "the attention of Parliament will be called to the result thus obtained with a view to such improvements in the laws which regulate the right of voting in the election of members of the House of Commons as may tend to strengthen our free institutions, and conduce to the public welfare."

The Reform Bill presented in the House of Commons on the 12th of March had in fact that character of a compromise which the royal speech had foreshadowed. The county franchise was to be reduced from fifty pounds to fourteen, and the borough franchise from ten to seven. An additional clause extended the right of suffrage to certain classes outside these limits, but this was only a trifle. The redistribution of seats was to be the object of a second bill which Mr. Gladstone announced while skilfully and eloquently developing the ministerial project of reform.

Disappointment was general among the ardent Liberals; and the hostile and contemptuous indifference of the Conservatives soon extended to the moderate Whigs; the reform measure was not popular with the public, and even less so in a House but just elected, and more eager to enjoy its electoral victory than to engage in a new struggle. The changes proposed appeared to all parties too insignificant to excite any enthusiasm or seriously to satisfy the public mind. In vain did Mr. Gladstone appear at public meetings during the Easter recess, and display the resources of his marvellous eloquence in the hope of enkindling a general enthusiasm. In the House he was sustained by the most ardent reformers, but it was the ministry rather than the measure that Mr. Bright defended, and his contempt for the bill itself sometimes was manifest under his argument.

The Conservatives were not backward in the attack, but it was from among the Liberals themselves that came forth the most eager champion against the bill proposed by Lord Russell and Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Robert Lowe had twice been a member of Liberal administrations since quitting the practice of law in Australia; he had always been a Liberal, and now he attacked the Reform Bill with a passion and an ability that he never again manifested upon any subject. For a moment Mr. Disraeli was thrown into the background by the zeal and eloquence of this new recruit. Mr. Bright compared the little party which had gathered about this unexpected champion of the Conservatives to the band of malcontents who collected in the cave of Adullam under the leadership of David, and the name long clung to this new parliamentary group.

Disorganization penetrated into the ranks of the Liberals. Mr. Gladstone foresaw the momentary check while predicting with confidence the final triumph of the cause which he supported. "You cannot fight against the future," "he said. "Time is on our side. The great social forces which move on in their might and majesty, and which the tumult of our debates does not for a moment impede or disturb — those great social forces are against you; they are marshalled on our side, and the banner which we now carry, though perhaps at this moment it may droop over our sinking heads, yet soon again will float in the eye of heaven, and it will be borne by the firm hands of the united people of three kingdoms, perhaps not to an easy, but to a certain and a not distant victory."

This proud prophecy of the great Liberal leader betrayed the anticipation of a present defeat; and in this he was not deceived. Passing, by a very small majority, to its second reading, upon its third reading the bill was overwhelmed by amendments from all sides of the House. An amendment proposed by Lord Dunkellin, making the franchise in boroughs a little higher than the government proposed, was finally passed by a majority of eleven. The ministry being thus defeated, resigned at once, and Lord Derby was invited to form a Cabinet.

The burden was one to which the shoulders of the Tory leader were accustomed, having borne it many times before. But this time Lord Derby was reluctant to undertake the task; he was now an old man, and in feeble health; the parliamentary methods of the day were different from those which had obtained in his youth; year by year the faces with which he had been familiar were disappearing. The European situation was critical; the domestic outlook was gloomy; the cattle-pest ravaged the country; a financial panic paralyzed business; the failure of the great banking-house of Overend and Gurney had brought about innumerable disasters. Lord Russell at this time announced his intention to retire from the arena of politics, in which he had been so long an impetuous and disinterested champion; and he nominated Mr. Gladstone as his successor in the leadership of the Liberal party. Lord Derby hoped, and not unreasonably, to recruit his party from the ranks of those whom Mr. Bright had named the Adullamites. He offered places to Mr. Lowe and his friends, but they all declared with one voice that, having overthrown the late ministry, they could not profit by its downfall without exposing to suspicion the purity of their motives, and Lord Derby was obliged to make up his Cabinet exclusively from the Conservatives. Mr. Disraeli naturally succeeded Mr. Gladstone; Lord Stanley became Foreign Secretary; Lord Cranbourne (afterwards Marquis of Salisbury), who, as Lord Robert Cecil, had been distinguished by the uncompromising severity of his ideas, and by his political eloquence, had the care of Indian affairs; Mr. Walpole accepted the office of Home Secretary.

The country had remained indifferent to the project of Reform proposed by the Liberals; the House had disdainfully rejected it. No sooner had the power fallen into the hands of the Conservatives than the seeds of agitation sown broadcast during the discussion of the bill, germinated suddenly with a vigor and energy until then unknown. Everywhere leagues were formed, and Reform meetings held. The agitators in the capital had announced a monster meeting to be held in Hyde Park; the authorities prohibited it, but the partisans of reform denied the right of the authorities so to do, and on the 23d of July, from all quarters of London, numerous processions with bands of music and banners marched towards the Park. The gates were locked, and a line of policemen stationed outside. The president of the League, Mr. Beales, a well-known lawyer, presented himself and demanded admittance. On being refused, he re-entered his carriage and drove to Trafalgar Square, followed by a considerable crowd. There a meeting was improvised; resolutions of thanks to the Reform leaders were passed, and an intention announced of pursuing the work of Reform. After this the meeting dispersed quietly; the law had been scrupulously respected; it was from the law that Mr. Beales and the wiser among his followers hoped the success of their cause.

All of them were not of the same mind, however. The crowd which had gathered at the gates of Hyde Park was irritated and angry; mingled with it were many turbulent men, at all times ready for scenes of disorder. The multitude were crowded against the rails, and by a sudden movement along the line, a general thrust was given, and the rails were thrown down. In an instant, the Park was invaded; grass, shrubs, and flower-beds were trampled down by the crowd, intoxicated with its success, and violating at pleasure all the regulations for the maintenance of an ornamental pleasure-ground. A triumph of liberty was proclaimed; occasional altercations with the police brought about small breaches of the peace; but nothing serious occurred, and it was not found necessary to call out the soldiery who were held in readiness near by. The crowd indeed cheered the soldiers, manifesting no ill-will or fear towards them. All through the next day a throng of sight-seers visited the Park, to examine the scene of this popular victory. No serious disorder, however, occurred to aggravate the terror with which the peaceable citizens of London at first received the news of this invasion of forbidden ground.

VIEW IN HYDE PARK, LONDON.

The chief importance of the Hyde Park riot was that it had a certain influence upon the Conservative Cabinet. The Reform party were conscious that it aided them, and redoubled their noisy efforts. In all the large towns meetings and speeches were multiplied; there were interminable processions and banners without number; the organized trades-associations took more part in these demonstrations made to order than did the general public. That concealed power which had organized so many strikes was beginning to manifest itself in broad day and take part, for the first time, in a great political movement. The Conservative Ministry was placed in a position where it must itself propose Reform, or else yield to those who had lately failed in a similar attempt, and who had by their own lack of harmony been compelled to relinquish the authority, while they still retained a large share of effective power.

The new session opened on the 5th of February, 1867. The royal speech bore the stamp of Mr. Disraeli's skill in the use of language. "Your attention," the queen said, "will again be called to the state of the representation of the people in Parliament, and it is hoped that your deliberations, conducted in a spirit of moderation and mutual forbearance, may lead to the adoption of measures which, without unduly disturbing the balance of political power, shall freely extend the elective franchise." The ambiguity of the terms in which this wish was expressed left the government free; and on the 11th of February Mr.

Disraeli announced that it was his intention to present to the House, not a Bill of Reform prepared in advance, but a considerable number of resolutions, for the purpose of establishing certain principles on which the two parties could agree; in this following the example set by Lord Russell at the time of the Indian Mutiny, when it became necessary to reconstruct the government of that distant land still trembling from the shock it had just endured.

The two cases were not analogous; upon the question of Elective Reform, political passions had been for a long time violently excited; when the affairs of India came under discussion, the sole desire of all parties was to promote the public good in a case of urgent necessity. The failure of Mr. Disraeli's plan was inevitable; he abandoned it, and a few days later, presented a Reform Bill of a singularly incoherent and futile character. The bill was badly received by the House, and for the third time, the conduct formally announced by government was changed. Mr. Disraeli announced that in a few days he should present to the House a project of the most serious and thorough Reform. Two bills had been, it was said, prepared from the first. An effort had been made to satisfy the public demand at a cheaper rate; this had failed, and Mr. Disraeli was ready for the alternative. Three members of the Cabinet resigned, General Peel, Lord Carnarvon, and Mr. Cranbourne. "It is a leap in the dark," said Lord Cranbourne.

He spoke truly; the boldness of the Conservative Minister went far beyond that of all preceding Whig Cabinets. Lord Derby asserted that he could see no reason why a monopoly of Reform should be abandoned to the Liberals. From debate to debate, from one amendment to another, the bill went on, growing more and more democratic at every step. Mr. Disraeli had declared that the government would never introduce household suffrage pure and simple. But when the last readings and the last voting had made the bill a law, household suffrage, pure and simple, was made a right of the inhabitants of towns.

This was more than Mr. Bright himself had asked. Mr. Gladstone began to fear that the excessive extension might in practice bring it down to that level of universal suffrage whose caprices and incredible surprises had more than once been exhibited in France. Mr. Bright and Mr. Gladstone were, however, powerless to restrain the ardor of the more advanced members of their party. A considerable group of Liberals refused to support Mr. Gladstone's amendment restricting the suffrage. Mr. John Stuart Mill proposed to extend the electoral right to women who possessed the legal qualifications of men. The Reform League continued its noisy demonstrations, and a meeting was called for the 6th of May in Hyde Park. Mr. Walpole, the home secretary, issued a proclamation on May 1st, prohibiting this gathering and warning all persons not to attend it. The League took legal advice, and it was made clear that the law which gave the crown control over the parks, and the right to prosecute trespassers, did not give the right to anticipate trespass, and close the gates against a peaceable meeting. The prohibition was therefore removed; the meeting took place without disorder and also without importance; and Mr. Walpole, wearied by the difficulties of his office, resigned.

On the 15th of August, 1867, the Reform Bill was passed. The work of the Reform League was thus achieved, and their agitations since that time have been superficial, and without serious influence upon the public opinion of the country. The measure was a radical one, and gave over the government of England to the masses of the people to a degree which had not been foreseen by the members of the Cabinet, who resisted at every new amendment and threatened to withdraw the bill. It enfranchised in boroughs all householders paying poor-rates, and all lodgers resident for one year and paying not less than ten pounds a year rent, and in counties all persons possessing property with an annual income of five pounds, and occupiers of lands or tenements, who paid twelve pounds yearly rent. Many small boroughs were disfranchised, the representation of others was reduced, and several new constituencies created. The great cities — Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, and Leeds — obtained each a third member. The University of London was to have a representative. For the purpose of securing a minority representation it was provided that in places returning three members, each elector should vote for only two. The choice of the minority might, however, be of the same party as his two colleagues, and owe his numerical inferiority only to some personal unpopularity. Lord Cairns, who proposed the amendment, had not anticipated this possibility, and his project was only one concession more, added to all those which government had already consented to make. The electoral reform was completed by the hands and in the name of the conservative party. With grave and keen irony, Mr. Lowe remarked, "All that remains to us to do now is, to educate our new masters."

The reforms for Scotland and Ireland were postponed till the following year. The Scottish Reform Bill gave a borough franchise the same as that of England, and a county franchise nearly equivalent to the English. The Irish bill was extremely unimportant. The condition of Ireland, however, was now a matter of extreme solicitude.

There had been for some time a secret anxiety felt by the English government on the subject of a conspiracy believed to be slowly maturing in Ireland, directed by distant hands and based upon that hatred of England which broods forever in the depths of the Irish heart. "If the majority of the people of Ireland," said Mr. Bright, "had their will and had the power, they would unmoor the island from its fastenings in the deep, and moor it at least two thousand miles to the west."

More than one English statesman endured the humiliation of this long and fruitless effort to unite two races, differing in manners, in religion, and in character. Shortly after, Mr. Gladstone was destined to make a great and decisive effort, justifiable in right as well as in policy, yet not fully satisfactory to the Irish, while it shocked even his most faithful friends in England. In 1866, the government of which he was a member saw itself obliged to ask from Parliament the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland. On the 16th of February the bill passed the two Houses, having received its three readings; the royal authorization was not obtained from Osborne, whither the queen had lately gone, until after midnight. The bill became a law, and the Cabinet thus found itself endowed with an almost unlimited authority over the liberty of persons suspected of conspiracy.

A condition of treasonable intrigue had been for centuries the normal state of Ireland. She had endured long years of oppression, and even the increase of liberty had not abolished the nation's private griefs; plots had been, one after another, detected and defeated; the leaders of Young Ireland had been imprisoned or banished; then followed the Phœnix clubs recruited among the very peasantry, not even selecting its leaders from the higher or middle classes. The intrigues of these clubs were discovered; some prosecutions followed, but the whole matter was of comparatively little importance. Far more serious was the Fenian movement, which took its rise among the Irish who had emigrated to the United States. In the new country where they had sought the means of existence denied them at home, they had forgotten neither the traditions nor the griefs of their beloved land; and it was the name of the ancient Irish militia that they now gave to the association founded by the Irish in New York. "Here we have the long arm of the lever," wrote one of the Irish conspirators of 1848, who had taken refuge in America, and had there acquired a wide influence. The kernel of the conspiracy was sheltered from English spies and from popular indiscretions. The Irish who had served in the American armies during the war of secession were numerous and well-trained; they had learned to rely upon themselves, and they had formed close relations with their comrades in arms; they hoped to profit by this in gaining the support of the Americans in their campaign against England. The state of parties in America added to the influence of the Irish there resident; Irish votes turned the scale at many an election; the apparent sympathy of the people of the United States in the affairs of Ireland contributed to the agitation kept up by the Fenians in behalf of their native country. Also, the general irritation felt in America towards England at the close of the civil war lent its assistance to the Fenian hopes. As early as 1865, an address was issued by the Fenian leaders in America, to the effect that an Irish army was about to be raised in Ireland, recruited by Irish officers from America; and quite a number of bold adventurers landed one after another upon the Irish coast. Mr. James Stephens, the chief of the Fenian movement, did not hesitate to follow his subordinates, and was speedily arrested; in a few days, however, he succeeded in making his escape.

Meanwhile the association in the United States, deprived of its head, had broken into two parties, one clamorous for an expedition to Ireland, the other advocating an attack upon Canada. On the 31st of May, 1866, a band of Fenians crossed the river Niagara, seized Fort Erie, and repulsed the Canadian volunteers who had taken up arms against them. Other bands were already on the march to support this advanced guard, when the United States government interposed, forbidding the passage of the river, while the frontier was strictly guarded. Some of the adventurers paid for their temerity with their lives, others escaped, and the enterprise ended in failure. Mr. Stephens meanwhile had returned to New York, and announced the intention of making an attack in Ireland. The recruits that crossed the sea to act under his orders were every day more and more numerous. Meanwhile the leader was in vain expected; in America it was believed that he had already returned to Ireland; but neither on one shore of the Atlantic nor the other could he be found; he had vanished, but the fate of the insurrection was no longer in his hands. Too many lives, too many interests were concerned in the Fenian association, and agitation broke out everywhere. A plan had been formed among the English Fenians to march upon the city of Chester, capture the ancient castle, cut the telegraph wires, thence make for Holyhead, seize some vessels and cross over to Ireland. Government received warning of this scheme, and the enterprise was never attempted. In March, 1867, a general insurrection was planned for Ireland. This time the weather contributed to the failure of the attempt. An unusual and heavy snow covered the hills and valleys, effacing all paths, betraying every footprint. Some attacks were made on police-barracks at different points: at Cork, at Kerry, at Tipperary, at Limerick, at Louth; all failed with but little bloodshed. The leaders were brought to trial, firm in their patriotic resolve. English sympathy at once awoke in their favor. A great meeting was held in St. James' Hall, London, to obtain the commutation of the capital penalty pronounced against one of the leaders, Colonel Burke. Mr. John Stuart Mill spoke ardently in the name of mercy; and the sentence of the condemned was, in fact, commuted.

The rigor of justice was displayed, however, a few months later, when a prison-van, conveying two Fenians to jail, was attacked, at Manchester, by an armed band demanding the surrender of the prisoners. A policeman was killed in the performance of his duty, the two prisoners were rescued and made their escape, but five of the liberators were captured, tried, and sentenced to death. Three of them underwent the penalty with the habitual courage of the Irish conspirator. Of the other two, one, it was proved, had been arrested under a mistake, and the second in some way escaped as being an American citizen. Lord Derby, at that time prime minister, had absolutely refused to listen to extenuating circumstances in the case of the three who suffered the penalty of death, although public opinion in England was very strongly excited in their favor. A new Fenian attempt, however, shortly after, drove back the swelling wave of popular compassion.

The three Manchester criminals, Allen, Larkin, and O'Brien, had been hanged on the 23d of November. On the 13th of December all London was startled and alarmed by the violent shock of a sudden detonation. In the hope of delivering the Fenians in prison at Clerkenwell, some of their friends had exploded a barrel of gunpowder under the wall of the prison. An enormous chasm was made in the wall; many small houses in the neighborhood were destroyed, a dozen persons were killed or mortally wounded, a hundred and twenty received injuries more or less severe. The prisoners whose deliverance had been thus attempted themselves escaped death only because the governor of the prison, warned by the authorities of the attempt that might be made, had confined them to their cells. The alarm and indignation were great throughout London. One man only was condemned and executed for the crime which had cost the lives of so many. Even this man was found guilty upon the evidence of an informer, and Mr. Bright spoke in the House of Commons in the prisoner's behalf. But though the verdict was confirmed, and the sentence executed, it did not seem to act as a warning to the crowd of known or unknown conspirators who successively tried their fortune in Ireland and England. The Fenian disturbances continued without signal events, without great and general outbreaks, but always menacing, and always in aim and origin exclusively Irish. If sometimes it happened that one of the habitual agitators of the European democracy found himself by chance in their ranks, he made haste to get away. The Fenians pursued the idea of the deliverance of Ireland and of her vengeance upon England; they concerned themselves with continental thrones no more than with the Red Republicans who strove to overthrow those thrones.

The Fenians were not at this time the sole cause of anxiety and trouble to the English government. The misconduct and oppression arising from those secret organizations known as trades-unions, were of late beginning to be very openly manifested. Workingmen who did not belong to the society which secretly ruled the workshops of their trade, or, if members, ventured to disobey orders, were conscious of being pursued, tracked, exposed to a thousand dangers in their work, and even in their homes and surrounded by their families. The first inquiries made by government failing to bring to light the truth, the ministry ordered, in 1869, a serious investigation, and the commissioners took evidence on oath in Sheffield, Manchester, and other great manufacturing centres. Everywhere the same state of things was found to exist. Almost everywhere a secretly organized tyranny pursued the workingmen whom it pretended to protect. The masters themselves suffered from the same tyranny when they ventured to discharge men who were members of the unions. The workmen had been sometimes pursued even to death by the vengeance of the secret societies. Employment of any kind was debarred them when they had incurred the displeasure of this mysterious power. The facts which were revealed and the light which was thrown upon the origin and continuance of strikes, awakened in serious and considerate minds doubts of the utility of the legislation, which, in making trades-unions illegal, had forced the artisan into the dangerous paths of secret organizations. The question was made a matter of careful study, and was destined finally to result in new legislation on the subject, recognizing and regulating the rights of the workingman as well as those of the employer; recognizing, also, the principle of association and establishing its legitimate limits, and authorizing the co-operative enterprises already in their early stages of development. In this way, the revelation of crimes committed by the secret societies of Sheffield and Manchester, while exciting the horror and indignation of all England, was to bear fruits of wisdom and equity which the mysterious oppressors had never dreamed of. It is in this way that the daylight of publicity and the healthful air of freedom, existing together with order, bring a remedy and a cure to the maladies which have grown up in shadow. Strikes have not ceased entirely, but they have become less frequent and of shorter duration; the tyranny of trades-unions has diminished and at some points disappeared, falling naturally under the hand of the law.

The principle of combined action for the purpose of obtaining at the cheapest price the necessaries of life, has rapidly made its way through all classes of society and all associations. The poor flannel-weavers of Rochdale who established in 1844 a humble shop, where with great difficulty they gathered a stock of the most needful commodities, for the purpose of escaping the extortions of the tradesmen with whom they had before dealt, did not suspect that the day would come when the civil service would establish their great warehouses on the co-operative principle, nor dream that the influence of their humble enterprise was to make itself felt upon all the trade of Great Britain.

Quietly and smoothly the work of Legislative Reform was going on at the same time in the most diverse directions. Early in 1868, an important change occurred in the Cabinet. Lord Derby, suffering under the increasing infirmities of age and with a constitution much impaired by illness, had determined to withdraw from public life, and Mr. Disraeli succeeded him as prime minister. The hour of Mr. Disraeli's great political success was not yet come; as a party leader he had been, in a sense, isolated in the House of Commons, never commanding the enthusiastic confidence of his adherents; as prime minister he exercised an often disputed authority, yet one that increased daily, and was destined to reach much greater development.

The last duty of the minister who had just resigned was to bring before Parliament a measure for the quasi-independent organization of the North American territories belonging to Great Britain. From this time, these provinces formed a confederation, closely united among themselves, but destined to be more and more set free from the control of the mother-country. Already the almost complete independence of Australia was beginning to dawn upon the political horizon. With wise foresight the home-government was gently breaking the bonds which might indeed retard the development of the colonies, but would bring neither strength nor profit to the mother-country. The children of old England remain proud of her name and of their common origin; scattered abroad throughout the world, henceforth their quarrels or difficulties are to bring no embarrassment to her. From colony to colony the same destiny awaits all the territories where the Anglo-Saxon race has established itself, founding its empire and slowly destroying the native populations by the sole force of its presence and its superiority. The East alone remains indefinitely bound to England; the English dominion in India cannot introduce liberty there.

In the summer of 1867, nearly at the time when the Houses were accepting the new constitution of the Anglo-American provinces, the Sultan of Turkey, Abdul-Aziz, visited England, where he was eagerly followed by a crowd curious to behold him, as it had beheld Kossuth, and later, Garibaldi, and, a few years after this, would follow and watch the Shah of Persia. The Turkish monarch in his turn looked about him with a somewhat unintelligent curiosity, surprised and pleased, however, to find himself welcomed by the popular good-will. He learned nothing of the great lesson of liberty, nor acquired new strength for his empire, in treading the soil of England. The "sick man," to hasten whose end the Emperor Nicholas had formerly labored, remained sick and feeble in spite of friends and enemies alike, destined to cause long-protracted anxieties to Europe and vain hopes to his neighbors eager to seize upon his goods. The eyes of Abdul-Aziz were not clear-sighted enough to perceive the striking contrast between the policy of England, emancipating, one after another, her far-off colonies, and the weakness of the Sublime Porte, losing unwillingly province after province; he was even less capable of comprehending the progress of good sense and justice presiding over the modifications introduced into the interior legislation of Great Britain. The prohibition of public executions; the transfer of jurisdiction in the case of contested elections from the House of Commons itself to one of the judges of the superior courts at Westminster; the practical relinquishment by the House of Lords of their ancient privilege of voting by proxy; the concentration in the hands of government of all control over the telegraph system of England: these useful labors and reforms, salutary rather than brilliant, occupied the Houses during the sessions of 1867 and 1868, without exciting, very keenly, the interest of the nation at large.

At this time much attention was directed towards the little force sent out to Abyssinia in search of certain English subjects, men and women, for some time held as prisoners in the hands of King Theodore. European curiosity has been from all time attracted by the wild tales of travellers who have visited that remote kingdom of Africa, over which have ruled a race of Abyssinian princes from the time, it is asserted, of that Queen of Sheba who paid a visit to Solomon. Sir John Mandeville has related the history of Prester John, an Abyssinian king who was so charmed with a Christian church which he saw in Egypt, that he adopted the title of priest as an honorable distinction. The Travels in Abyssinia of Mr. James Bruce had revived this interest among the people of England. The captivity of Captain Cameron, British consul at Massowah, a Turkish island off the Abyssinian coast, and of certain other English subjects in the hands of King Theodore, excited the sympathy and offended the pride of Great Britain. The Abyssinian king was in reality a usurper. A former English consul at Massowah, Mr. Plowden, had supported him in putting down a rebellion, and had been killed in consequence. Captain Cameron, Mr. Plowden's successor, had taken no part in the domestic quarrels of the Abyssinians, being instructed by government to preserve entire neutrality. King Theodore resented this attitude of the consul, and even accused the latter of intriguing against him with Egypt. Captain Cameron, having imprudently ventured into Abyssinia, was seized, together with several other English persons, and thrown into prison, in Magdala, the Abyssinian capital. Several German missionaries with their wives, some of whom were Englishwomen, were among the captives in Magdala, and of these a few had been not less than four years in captivity.

The assistant British resident at Aden, Mr. Rassam, who was sent by the English government to remonstrate with Theodore, was, in his turn, made prisoner by the exasperated king, and sent with his companions to join Captain Cameron within the walls of Magdala. Upon this an ultimatum was despatched by Lord Stanley, requiring King Theodore to relinquish his captives within three months, on penalty of war. This ultimatum, it is believed, never reached the savage court of Magdala. About the close of the year 1867, a military expedition set out from India, under the orders of Sir Robert Napier, commander-in-chief of the army of Bombay. The expedition in itself was an extremely difficult and perilous one, across wild regions without roads, exposed to all the rigors of a rude and variable climate, through mountain gorges and over heights ten thousand feet above the sea, for a distance of about four hundred miles. To add to the difficulties of the march no supplies could be obtained, and it was necessary to carry provisions for the entire march.

Early in the month of April, 1868, Sir Robert Napier, with his little army, arrived at the foot of the rocky cliffs whereon stood the Abyssinian capital. The prisoners had tasted again and again all the bitterness of death before their liberators had been able to cross the deserts and mountains, and come to their relief. King Theodore fluctuated between paroxysms of rage and caprices of friendly intercourse with his prisoners; he was at times boastful, but at last seemed to fall into increasing dejection. More than once the captives believed their last hour had come; but, as if by an instinct of prudence, the barbaric sovereign still spared their lives, until at last the near approach of the English force was announced. The armed multitude of the Abyssinians flung themselves upon the invaders and were repulsed with heavy loss, while the little English army stood steadily under the shock. The attacks were renewed again and again. Finally, King Theodore sent down all the prisoners to Sir Robert Napier, but he himself still refused to surrender, and the English general ordered an assault.

The fortress of Magdala was built upon a rocky height, the ascent to which was possible only by two narrow paths, each leading up to a strong gateway. Sir Robert Napier selected the northern side for his attack. The English soldiers made the ascent, forced the massive gates and rushed into the town. At their first step inside the walls, they came upon the dead body of King Theodore. Unable to defend himself, he would not survive his defeat, and had fallen by his own hand.

The fortress of Magdala was razed to the ground, and the town destroyed. "Nothing but blackened rock remains," wrote the conqueror. He had been unwilling to leave the place to become the almost inaccessible stronghold of a fierce Moham-medan tribe of the neighborhood, hostile to the Abyssinian Christians.

The expedition had been conducted with a regularity and precision both in the plan and its execution that left no room for accident or for uneasiness. The task was accomplished; King Theodore's widow had survived him but a few days, and their son, a boy of seven years, was taken charge of by Queen Victoria, and brought to England to be educated, where, however, the climate soon proved fatal to him. The English general did not seek to interfere in the quarrels of the Abyssinian chiefs who disputed for King Theodore's possessions among themselves. In less than a week after the taking of Magdala, the English troops were on their way to the coast. On the 21st of June, the first detachment of troops sent home from Abyssinia landed at Plymouth. Their victorious chief was made Baron Napier of Magdala, and the acclamations of all England saluted the success of his arms, skilfully and effectively employed toward a praiseworthy end, never for a moment overstepped, — a rare example of military precision and political good sense, doing honor to the leader and to the army who had wisely and bravely carried out the wise instructions of their government.

CHAPTER XIV.

MR. GLADSTONE'S ADMINISTRATION.

THE Fenian Association openly formed in America for the service of Ireland and in her interests, the secret ramifications of this society upon the Western Continent, and the outbreaks in Ireland and England which had already resulted from it, had excited the attention and the anxiety of many Englishmen, thus painfully made aware of the malady always secretly rife in Ireland. Mr. Gladstone had been more impressed by these signs of danger than had any other person; and certain convictions which had long been forming in his mind suddenly came to maturity. Henceforth he felt that England had a duty to perform, that the complaints of Ireland, at one time uttered in low murmurs, at another, breaking into loud clamor, could no longer be disregarded, and that the evil had become so great as to demand an immediate remedy. The deep and indestructible antagonism between the two races did not, in his opinion, arise merely from their difference in religion, but from the fact that the Established Church, consisting of a very small minority, practised oppression towards the members of the Roman Catholic communion, who form the large majority of the population of Ireland. From this time, the project of establishing equality between the two churches which divide the sister kingdom became in Mr. Gladstone's mind a panacea for all the discords which had embittered and still saddened the union of Ireland and England. As courageous as he was positive in his convictions, and always eager to bring a remedy

Eng^d by G. R. Hall.

GLADSTONE.

where he perceived an evil, Mr. Gladstone determined to put an end to a state of things whose injustice was manifest to him, mitigated though it had been when the system of tithes was abolished in Ireland. On the 16th of March, 1868, at the close of a debate upon a series of resolutions offered by Mr. John Francis Maguire, an Irish member of Parliament, Mr. Gladstone distinctly announced his opinion that the time had come when the Irish Church as a state institution must cease to exist. All the reasons which have made the Established Church dear and precious in England as the mother of souls, the guardian of the faith, were so many arguments against her existence as a predominating power in Ireland. The poet Moore has expressed this idea in one of his poetic allegories, where a profound meaning is veiled under the impassioned elegance of the language; the Irish peasant has a mistress whom he loves, whom he serves, to whom he will remain faithful even unto death; what matter to him the splendors of the rival who would supplant her, the golden crown, the sumptuous palaces of the one he loves not? The Irishman has but one mistress, — one sovereign of souls, the only powerful and positive influence over an ignorant, passionate and excitable race. The Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, once persecuted and oppressed, now for many years free, and active and influential as ever, was about to be officially recognized by the English Parliament as a legitimate authority and one worthy of respect. Ireland had refused to abandon her hereditary faith, she had not become Protestant; and the missionary work that Protestant England had undertaken among the Irish population — a work sustained by all the efforts of a richly-endowed National Church — was henceforth to assume a different character. Protestants and Roman Catholics were henceforth to be placed upon the same footing, in a position of equality and independence; the revenues of Ireland were no longer to be employed in supporting an establishment to which she was hostile; the religious interests of a small minority were no longer to be served at great expense, while the analogous needs of an overwhelming majority were totally neglected. Acquired rights were to be respected, all due consideration would be shown to the former order of things; but inequality was to cease, and equity was to take the place of injustice.

Such were the general outlines of the design which Mr. Gladstone unfolded in three resolutions which he presented on the 30th of March, 1868. The issue already appeared clear and the fate of the Irish Church decided, when Lord Stanley proposed an amendment, reserving for a new Parliament the right to decide upon a new question of such great importance. This seemed, on the part of the Conservatives, to be merely asking for delay. The amendment, however, was rejected, and Mr. Gladstone's first resolution was passed, some weeks later, after a discussion as brilliant as it was impassioned and violent. The defenders of an establishment in Ireland urged the danger of such a precedent, exposing to peril the English Church, so tenderly loved by so many hearts, the most solid pillar of the constitution as well as of social order. The partisans of Mr. Gladstone's resolutions maintained, on the other hand, that the Established Church in England was embarrassed and endangered by the existence of a State Church in Ireland; that she shared the reproaches and enmities justly falling upon the other; that she would be free and more powerful than ever upon her own ground when she should be relieved from a burden which dragged her down.

The success of Mr. Gladstone's measure was of a nature to bring about, and did in fact occasion, an appeal to the country. Parliament was dissolved on the 31st of July, and the general elections took place in the month of November. The great question was apparently on the subject of the disestablishment of the Irish Church; in reality, however, the more important and underlying question to be settled was that of the supremacy of one or the other of the two great parties dividing England, the Conservatives or the Radicals of all shades. In many places, the general expectation was disappointed, and the most unexpected variations in public opinion were manifested. Lancashire, once ardently devoted to the Liberals, returned to the Tories with a zeal that cost his seat to Mr. Gladstone himself; but he had stood also for Greenwich, and was elected there. Lord Hartington, Mr. Stuart Mill, Mr. Roebuck, Mr. Milner Gibson, were all unseated. The "workingmen's candidates" were everywhere rejected, whether they were simply persons appealing for the support of the new class of voters, or whether they appeared before the public as themselves members of that class. The purely democratic element found no favor, even among those to whom it owed its growth and power. The Liberal party made a great gain in the new Parliament. The Liberal side was represented by a class of men less advanced in their views and more moderate in their language than their predecessors had been. The majority secured to Mr. Gladstone was, however, overwhelming, and Mr. Disraeli did not attempt to enter upon a conflict. Before the session opened the queen had accepted the resignation of her Cabinet, and had intrusted Mr. Gladstone with the formation of a new ministry. All the strength of the Liberal party rallied around their illustrious chief, called into power just as he was entering his sixtieth year, ardent and vigorous in his conscientious enthusiasm as in the earliest days of his career, carried away sometimes beyond his own convictions by the rising tide of the opinions which served and supported him, and at times mastered him, unconsciously to himself.

The task Mr. Gladstone now proposed to himself, and at once announced to the new Parliament, was one which had weighed, before his time, upon the most robust shoulders. It was his intention to undertake to govern Ireland in accordance with the ideas and wishes of the Irish themselves; the Irish Church, the question of the tenure of land, and that of university education, were in turn to be the objects of parliamentary consideration and discussion. Both Mr. Pitt and Sir Robert Peel had undertaken tasks analogous to this, more restricted, naturally, and less radical, as both these statesmen were limited by the spirit of their age, and by their own firm judgment. Neither had fully succeeded, yet both had certainly produced great ameliorations in the condition of Ireland.

As might have been expected, the government formed by Mr. Gladstone was one of great strength. Lord Granville was Secretary for the Colonies, Lord Clarendon Foreign Secretary, the Duke of Argyll had the charge of India, Lord Hatherly was Lord Chancellor, and Mr. Bright entered the Cabinet as President of the Board of Trade. Mr. Bright had not sought for office, and in a speech made at Birmingham he referred to his new position in terms which plainly indicated his views. "I should have preferred," he said, "to remain in the common rank of the simple citizenship in which heretofore I have lived. There is a charming story contained in a single verse of the Old Testament, which has often struck me as one of great beauty. Many of you will recollect that the prophet, in journeying to and fro, was very hospitably entertained by what is termed in the Bible a Shunammite woman. In return for the hospitality of his entertainment he wished to make some requital, and he called her and asked her what there was that he should do for her. 'Shall I speak for thee to the king or to the captain of the host?' And it has always appeared to me a great answer that the Shunammite woman returned. She said, 'I dwell among my own people.' When the question was put to me whether I would step into the position in which I now find myself, the answer from my heart was the same — 'I wish to dwell among my own people.' ” The independence of the Shunammite was to appear more than once in Mr. Erigh's relations with his colleagues, as well as in his public language.

The propositions of government for the disestablishment of the Irish Church were as radical in their scope as they were prompt in their effects. Mr. Gladstone's measure at once destroyed the position of the Irish Church as an establishment, and converted it into an independent Episcopal Church. The Irish bishops lost their seats in the House of Lords. A synodal body, entrusted with the government of the church, was to be chosen from the laity and the clergy, and recognized by the State. The union was dissolved which had heretofore existed between the Churches of England and Ireland. The existing interests of the clergy of the Irish Church were to be suitably appraised and their holders paid off or pensioned. The sums devoted to this purpose were very large; former endowments disappeared with the establishment; and, all claims being satisfied, there remained a considerable fund (about nine millions sterling) in the hands of government. This it was proposed to devote to the relief of “unavoidable calamity and suffering.” The liberty left to government in this matter, and the diversion to general philanthropic purposes of property left or given to the Irish Church, roused, with good reason, serious difficulties in enlightened and equitable minds. The principle was an arbitrary one, and the precedent dangerous.

As formerly upon the question of Roman Catholic emancipation, the bishops were divided in regard to the disestablishment of the Irish Church. The historian of Greece, Bishop Thirlwall, sustained, as he had always done, the liberal principle. The Bishop of Peterborough, Dr. Magee, combated the measure with eloquence and enthusiasm. For the last time was heard in the House of Lords the voice of Lord Derby, that voice which skilled judges of parliamentary eloquence were wont to rank with the most eloquent of the greatest oratorical periods of England. "I am," he said, "an old man; I have already passed three-score years and ten; my official life is entirely closed, my political life is nearly so, and in the course of nature, my natural life cannot now be long." He did, in fact, die before the Irish Church had ceased to exist. He had defended it with that pathetic accent vibrating from the edge of the tomb into the very depths of his listeners' hearts. On the 23d of October, 1868, Lord Derby died at Knowsley in Lancashire, the hereditary residence of his illustrious race. He was a veritable English nobleman, occupying himself sincerely and naturally with the government of his country, as a man would with his own personal and domestic affairs; he wielded power as a right which had cost him nothing, as a duty which he willingly accepted and conscientiously fulfilled. His son succeeded to his authority, in great measure, but not to the sweet and charming influence of his personal character.

In spite of Lord Derby's efforts, and notwithstanding the excitement which prevailed in the House of Lords, Mr. Gladstone's measure passed to the third reading by a considerable majority. Numerous amendments had been attempted, but unsuccessfully. The Upper House yielded with regret before the violence of public opinion, which had free expression on both sides, but preponderated in favor of the measure among the mass of the nation, as it did in the House of Commons. The time fixed for the measure to take effect was in the month of January, 1871.

As soon as Mr. Gladstone had decided the fate of the ecclesiastical institutions of Ireland, he undertook the reconstruction of the relations existing from time immemorial between the Irish landed proprietors and their tenants. These relations were manifestly the result of the ancient conquest, embittered by long neglect on the part of the land-owners, and by the blending of idleness, improvidence and discouragement which often held in a state of extreme poverty the wretched cultivators of the soil. Great cities are rare in Ireland; manufacturing establishments are but few; hence it arises that the population, almost as a whole, live from the produce of the land in the precarious situation of the farmer who is a tenant-at-will, liable at any time to be ejected without legal remedy or right to indemnity for improvements he may have made during his occupancy. Secret associations, acts of personal violence, the antagonism of the armed band, had been and still were the sole and guilty resource of the Irish peasantry against a tyranny which they sought to weaken by individual terrorism.

In Ulster alone, where the Scottish Protestant emigrants had made their home, the customs which they had brought with them ameliorated the condition of things, although no difference existed in the laws regulating the relations of owner and tenant. In this favored country the tenants were in the position of farmers protected by a long lease. They were never dispossessed, so long as they continued to pay their rent. On giving up the land, they had a right to compensation for the improvements they had made. They even were allowed, with the authorization of the proprietor, to make over their rights to another. The condition of the farmers in Ulster was an object of envy to every intelligent and reasonable Irish peasant. Under the influence of this system, the industry of the farmers and the prosperity of the district had developed in equal measure. Mr. Gladstone cherished a hope of seeing the same progress inaugurated throughout Ireland. He adopted as the foundation of his new measures the principle of reciprocal rights between the land-owner and the tenants, as recognized in the county of Ulster. The Irish peasantry did not in all cases desire a change which would, at many points, raise the rent while it protected the rent-payer. The habits of foresight and systematic labor, hereditary among the descendants of the Scottish Protestants, were rarely to be met in the other counties of Ireland. The great land-owners lived for the most part out of the country, strangers to the Irish life as they were in origin foreign to the Irish race, and spending in England or on the continent the meagre revenues which their agents wrung from the peasantry. These agents, on their part, were hostile to any modification in the state of things which would diminish their often despotic authority and reduce their personal gains. Too often the land-owners shared the views of their agents. More than one maintained, with Lord Palmerston, that "tenant-right is landlords' wrong." Mr. Gladstone made no allowance for this conflict of interests and views existing in Ireland. He attacked the land question as resolutely as he had attacked the question of the Irish Church. The tenant-right of Ulster was made the law throughout Ireland, with this modification, that the owners were permitted to settle for themselves certain points in their relations to their tenants. This clause gave anxiety to the more zealous of the Irish reformers, and did, in fact, cause great suffering among the small farmers, ignorant of their rights or indifferent to them, and destitute of means, with whom the proprietors refused to deal upon the new bases. The bill, however, was not seriously opposed by the Conservatives; only a few votes were against it at the second reading. An amendment moved by Mr. Disraeli was defeated by a considerable majority; and the House of Lords as well as the House of Commons adopted the measure after prolonged and serious discussion in committee, but without violence in the open debates. August 1, 1870, the bill received the royal assent and became law.

The system of education alone remained to be discussed. The Irish Church had been dispossessed; the tenant-right question had been re-adjusted, not without agitation, but without violent shock; and Mr. Gladstone advanced triumphantly from one reform to another. He believed the time was come to undertake the subject of popular education in England, and that of national instruction in Ireland, an intellectual work, if ever such there were, and touching no material interest. There, however, lay the danger, the first step towards weakness and fall. Neither Mr. Gladstone nor the Liberals had any idea of this. Mr. Forster's bill, providing for public elementary instruction in England and Wales, was presented February 17, 1870. It was not until three years later that the measure in respect to Irish University Education was brought before the House, and caused by its defeat the overthrow of the Liberal Administration. Meantime public opinion was destined to undergo profound modifications, and public interest to be turned into other channels.

While the English Parliament was yet discussing the Irish Land Bill, war, long threatening between Prussia and France, had broken out, — a war frivolous in its pretexts, inconsiderate and imprudent in its origin, and, from the first, disastrous to one of the belligerents. The Second Empire — imposed upon France by a coup d'état as bold as it was unscrupulous, accepted through lassitude and love of repose — had long deceived France and all Europe by an outward show of proud strength and prosperity. Suddenly, as by some unforeseen stage-trick, it fell before a foreign army, dragging down France in its own ruin. A third time the Bonaparte name and the principle of absolutism brought invasion upon France and unspeakable patriotic humiliation. The Emperor Napoleon III. was a prisoner in Germany, and the power which had risen upon the ruins of the empire, calling itself the Government of the National Defence, gathered around it all efforts, however hostile men's hearts might be to its origin and to a portion of the elements composing it.

England's first sentiment had been, and justly, opposed to the imperial policy. War had been declared by France upon pre-texts unworthy of a great nation and its sovereign. It had been entered upon with a levity and improvidence whose bitter fruits the nation was soon obliged to gather. The success of Prussia in 1866 had already modified public opinion in England in respect to the worth of the Prussian army and the political skill of Prussian councils. Royal alliances had their weight in the popular balance as well as in the hearts of the rulers of the two nations.

When, however, a series of disasters had scattered the French armies and all serious resistance was concentrated in Paris, besieged by the enemy, the eyes of all Europe were fixed upon this intellectual capital of the world, this centre of pleasure and of agreeable civilization, now the théâtre of patriotic sufferings and of the patient courage of an immense population, animated by the same spirit of indomitable resolution. And now all charitable effort and generous sympathy on the part of England were directed towards Paris and France, the noblest impulses actuating the hearts of all, the English government alone remaining inert and apparently indifferent to the great struggle which was breaking down the balance of power in Europe. Inconsiderate and inefficient, it seemed wholly occupied in guarding the English frontier, already sufficiently protected by nature against the evils which were desolating France. Eager to strengthen the treaty obligations which pledged the great Powers to maintain the neutrality of Belgium, now believed to be menaced by the ambitious views of the Emperor Napoleon and by the schemes of Count Bismarck, — constrained also to yield to the demands of Prussia, who profited by the critical situation of Europe to modify the treaty of Paris and destroy the neutrality of the Black Sea, Mr. Gladstone and the English government remained deaf to the most weighty and serious appeals of that large-minded and wise policy which had formerly established the English power in Europe. In January, 1871, M.

M. GUIZOT.

Guizot wrote to Mr. Gladstone, setting forth, in a letter afterwards made public, the interest that England had in European questions, the share that she ought to take in them, and the rôle that she was able to fill.

“ Without question, the events which have been taking place in Europe during the last few years, and the struggle between France and Prussia which has arisen out of them, are facts sufficiently grave and weighty to attract towards her foreign policy all the attention and all the energy of England. Is this equivalent to saying that she is necessarily called to take a part in the war and to unite her armies with those of the continent already engaged in strife? I am far from the thought! It is not in carrying on war, it is, on the contrary, in bringing war to an end, that the mission of England to-day consists. She is not obliged, as formerly, to recruit armies, to form and maintain coalitions, for the purpose of repelling and even of destroying a hostile army and an aggressive and powerful sovereign. Of the two present belligerents, the one who declared war has fallen; he who now pushes war to an extreme has long been in the most friendly relations towards England; she decided in his favor at the beginning of the conflict, and she ought, therefore, to have the more influence in persuading him to bring it to a close. The situation, the motives of action, the aim,—all is radically different to-day from that which, sixty years ago, determined the conduct of England. She has now infinitely less effort to make, less risks to run to attain an end infinitely less complicated, less contested, than that which she then sought, and yet one which will be, beyond doubt, no less salutary for Europe. It is in the interests of peace that England now ought to form a coalition of the great Powers who at this moment, Prussia alone excepted, have no other ambition than the restoration of peace.

“ But it may be said, that efficacious measures cannot be employed by a government acting with sincerity to re-establish peace between belligerents when that government does not feel itself obliged to go so far as actual coercion, when, in a military sense, it desires to remain neutral? Have we then been so dominated, so subjugated by material force, either in the form of popular revolutions or of military despotism, that we have lost all confidence in the moral influences, in the authority of ideas of right, of justice, of humanity, when these influences, these ideas, have only pacific representatives? Can it be possible that these sublime ideas no longer have authority? Is it fitting that a great people and a great government should recognize and declare that it can do nothing, when it does not stand ready to dispatch its fleets and its armies to the scene where it desires to exercise its power? It would be a great retrogression for mankind, a great disgrace to our civilization, so proud of its progress. I do not admit this nullity of moral influences, and it is my profound conviction that he who learns how to employ them opportunely, with confidence, energy and perseverance, will find therein a power more efficacious than he perhaps himself expected.

“I will allow myself, my dear Mr. Gladstone, to bring to your notice on this subject an individual and contemporary example which I am able to cite with certainty, for it passed under my own observation, and I know well the man of whom I speak and the circumstances in which he was called to act. When, on the eve of our disasters, General Trochu was appointed Governor of Paris, he had for such a duty in such a position of affairs no material force, no organized means of action. He, however, succeeded; he drew Paris out of chaos and nothingness; he made of her a living and powerful entity, devoted to the great work of national defence. How was General Trochu able to obtain a result like this? It was because he believed in moral forces; it was because, in the name of duty and right, of honor, and of the country, he made appeal daily, in every act and every word, to the population of Paris. They responded to his confidence, they regained confidence in themselves; under this pure and brave inspiration, material strength was recovered, and Paris endured for four months the trials of a siege which, four months before, neither besiegers nor besieged would have deemed it possible for her to support.

“I cannot, I will not believe that Europe, Prussia included, will be more deaf to the voice of England, armed with moral influences, than was Paris to that of General Trochu. But it is not with timidity and hesitation, with a low voice and an air of doubt that the moral influences should and can be exerted. It is essential that those who interpret them should feel strongly and maintain boldly their worth and their authority. It is in the name of international equity, of justice, of humanity, in the name of the illegitimacy of the spirit of aggression and conquest that the present war should be censured and peace demanded. England has need to make use of this firm and noble language. Let her not deceive herself on this subject; she is suspected of being always inclined to take undue advantage of her geographical security, and to see with indifference the wars and sufferings of the continent, so long as she is not evidently and directly menaced by them. Egotism, an egotism overpassing the needs and rights of national self-interest, is the reproach habitually made against her policy, and her influence often suffers by it as much as does her moral honor. How often has it been said of late: ‘Prussia may do what she pleases, England will not interpose.’ But precisely because of this general opinion, as soon as England shall act distinctly, her action will be efficacious, for, if she is believed egotistic, it is also believed that she is in earnest, and if her government take any action in the case, that action will not be insignificant in its results.

“Let not England fear, then, that unless she interposes with material force in the present war, her action in behalf of peace would be in vain. After having firmly employed the moral influences and developed them to the utmost, if they prove insufficient to restrain the ambition of Prussia, England will still hold in her hands another measure of great weight; she will be able to declare that, if conditions irreconcilable with a real and lasting peace should be imposed upon France, the English government will not recognize the changes of frontier arising from such conditions, and will not give her consent to a European order thus rendered more than ever troubled and insecure. Who can doubt that an act like this would be a great obstacle in the way of Prussian ambition, and a great encouragement to French resistance? In 1831, when the Belgian question engrossed the attention of Europe, if Austria and Prussia, without offering material resistance to the separation of Belgium and Holland, had refused to recognize the existence of the two kingdoms, is it credible that France and England, even though agreed, would not have experienced extreme difficulty in re-establishing a durable European peace and order? These are questions which cannot be truly settled without the consent of all Europe. England is in a position to declare, without effort and without danger to herself, that she will not regard the question now at issue between France and Prussia as decided, so long as the belligerents do not accept a solution which re-establishes and truly secures peace. I do not attempt to indicate here upon what precise terms such a peace is to-day possible between France and Prussia. Special questions, questions of the moment, exist therein which it would be unwise to enter upon in advance, since they can only be treated by the persons appointed to represent the contradictory interests of both sides, and fully informed in respect to the circumstances under stress of which the negotiations would be conducted. I desire only to call the attention of the friends of peace to the two great principles which would be powerful, were they resolutely put in practice, to second them in their pacific intentions, and to remove the most serious difficulties which weigh upon them.

“History has already accepted the task of proving the efficiency of one of these ideas. When two powerful nations have long disputed the possession of a territory important by its geographical position, its population, its wealth, — when this country has been many times taken and re-taken by the belligerents, never definitively acquired by either, and continually compromising the general peace, Europe has finally resolved to put an end to this situation by declaring the territory thus contested neutral, and placing its neutrality under the protection of the Great European Powers. It is thus that Switzerland and Belgium have become neutral states, no longer incessantly ravaged, no longer an apple of discord in European politics. This salutary principle of neutrality is susceptible of applications much more numerous and more varied than it has hitherto received.

“When, in 1831, the neutrality of Belgium was established, guaranteed by the five great Powers, it was determined to give a visible sign and a further pledge of this, by ordering the demolition of the principal fortresses constructed in Belgium against France. By the convention of December 16, 1831, the fortified towns, Menin, Ath, Mons, Philippeville and Marienbourg were accordingly dismantled, and all munitions and military stores withdrawn from them. Why should not two States establish between them, in a certain portion of the territory of each, a military neutrality, that is to say, the prohibition of all fortified places, arsenals and munitions, each at the same time preserving full and free political sway over the territory? Why should not, for example, the two banks of the Rhine cease to be, for France and Prussia, a perpetual menace and instrument of war, by each nation's relinquishing the right to cover a certain length and breadth of territory with fortresses and guns? Doubtless, in order to have such an agreement equitable and efficient, it would be necessary to have it reciprocal, — Mayence and Landau must be dismantled as well as Strasburg and Metz ; and this would be the most certain token that France and Prussia were both sincerely desirous of a durable peace. And although by reason of our late reverses, this special neutrality of the banks of the Rhine would remain for some time incomplete and unequal, still, its adoption in principle, and the strength that it would receive from the guarantee of the other Powers, would not fail to have great weight. No one assumes to render war impossible ; what we can do is to make it more difficult, and, where it is unjust, to make its injustice more manifest ; this is the maximum of human power and wisdom.

“The second idea — I ought rather to say the second pacific force — to which I wish to call your attention, my dear Mr. Gladstone, is the idea of the European balance of power, and of the influence of congresses or conferences of the great Powers in defending or establishing this equilibrium. It is hard for reasonable and clear-sighted men to suppress a smile when they see with what disdain many people, even those of much intelligence, speak at the present day of the European balance of power, treating it as a vain chimera. Since when, then, has it been required that a principle should always keep its promises, and a thing be done perfectly, before any merit be acknowledged or any good results recognized ? Since when have good and evil ceased to be intimately blended in this world, and the good often defeated on some given day, while yet, on the whole and in the end, the good has triumphed over the evil ? It is certain that during the last four hundred years, that is to say, since the idea of a balance of power in Europe has entered into our history, European society, despite its errors and its crimes, its disturbances and its misfortunes, is by no means in a state of decadence ; it has been and is, upon the whole, much less a prey to violence and to chance, than it was during the previous centuries; it is better regulated, more prosperous, more firm in its advance towards justice for all, the well-being of all, towards that which we call, and rightly, general civilization. What has been the share in this progress of the principle of the European equilibrium, and the influence of European congresses gathered in its interest? I do not attempt to determine the question; I will only recall some historic facts, which may throw light upon it.

“After our religious wars of the sixteenth century, it was the concert between France and England, between Henry IV. and Queen Elizabeth, — it was the great reign and the “Great Plan” of Henry IV. which saved Europe from falling under the gloomy tyranny of Philip II., which laid the foundations of religious liberty in France, and made the balance even between France and Austria. In the middle of the seventeenth century, it was the Congress of Westphalia, which established in Germany the peace between Roman Catholics and Protestants, and crowned the success of Richelieu’s labor for the security and grandeur of France. In 1712, the beginning of the eighteenth century, it was the renewed concert between France and England at the Conferences of Utrecht, that restored peace to Europe, repressing the ambition and pride of Louis XIV., without humiliating France. Lastly, in our own days, after our revolutionary shocks and the conquering despotism of Napoleon, it was the Congress of Vienna which restored to their places, so to speak, the principal members of the European body, and secured to the nations of Europe forty years of a repose which, notwithstanding its afflictive events, has not been without life and progress. Let it be admitted that all these Congresses, these reconstructions of the European equilibrium, have been full of omissions and of faults, that unworthy concessions and ignoble passions have had a large place in them; I am as much aware of this as any man can be; but I am equally convinced that the European equilibrium is and remains in principle a just, rational, and liberal idea, and that, upon the whole, its results have been extremely salutary in regard to the progress as well as to the peace of European society.

“Undertake, my dear Mr. Gladstone, the cause of the European equilibrium and of European peace; defend it against the ambition and love of conquest now manifested. To do this has been in past ages the natural, historic, and illustrious rôle of England. For fifteen years you have had France for an adversary in this great strife; you will have her henceforward — I ought indeed to say you have her now — for an ally. Modern France has passed through her fever of ambition and conquest. She has paid dear for it, and for her, destiny is yet severe; the pain returns though the fever is gone, and the error seems to recur for a moment, only to prove that France will no more of it. There are still, I confess, in this quick-tempered and impetuous nation traces of its former inclinations and its former errors; it still easily allows itself to be tempted by brilliant novelties, by military reputation and glory. And still, this is not its true bias nor its true aim; it is the movement still agitating the surface of the ocean after a storm. What France to-day seriously desires is peace, and a free and fruitful scope for her own domestic activities. It is a land of assiduous labor, — agricultural, industrial, commercial, — of a civilization at once scientific and practical, animated and tranquil. It eagerly desires to gather the fruits of the experiences through which it has passed, and of the institutions towards which, for three-quarters of a century, it has incessantly aspired without being really able to practise and preserve them. In this path England is its natural and most useful ally, and it is towards the English alliance, notwithstanding all memories of strife and rivalry, that the various governments which have had any claim to durability in France since 1815, have always turned. This was to be expected from the Restoration; it owed much to you, and it remembered with dignity and independence its obligations. The government of 1830 owed you nothing; it made, nevertheless, the English alliance the habitual characteristic of its foreign policy; and when, in the affair of Egypt and in that of Spain, it deviated from this line of conduct, France did not design to abandon it definitively, and made haste to return to it at the earliest moment. Even the Second Empire, notwithstanding many causes were contradictory and many feeble attempts were made at diplomatic conspiracies, also desired England as an ally. In almost all the great questions which have arisen, and the great events which have occurred, during this period, the two nations have walked together and acted in concert; after having, in 1827, protected Greece against Turkey, in 1854 they protected Turkey against Russia, and their flags were united at Sebastopol as at Navarino. From 1830 to 1833, they united in establishing the kingdom of Belgium; together they have maintained the independence of Switzerland and of Italy, and have assisted in the establishment of a constitutional monarchy in Spain and Portugal.

“These facts have been by no means accidents, momentary impulses on the part of the different governments; they have been the natural and necessary result of the true interest and the deepest instincts of the two nations. They are not obliged to require great sacrifices from each other, and they are able to do each other great services. You see it yourself: France, it is true, has become a lover of peace, but her pride and valor have not been lessened; she manifests in defence the same ardor, the same heroic courage that she once showed in attack; painful as is her position at this moment, she is not a troublesome ally nor one difficult to sustain. Let the two nations be well agreed:

let them mutually feel the worth of their united strength, moral and material, and they will secure tranquillity to Europe and their own prosperity; they will acquire glory of a new kind, which will cost contemporary generations neither blood nor tears, and they will leave to future generations a heritage good to receive, for it will not be laden with violent national hatreds and desires for vengeance."

The effort was in vain. The English government did not understand the great work that M. Guizot pointed out to them, the great place that they might secure in Europe for their country. Vaguely, confusedly, without great national ardor, England caught a glimpse of that which her government refused through weakness and a patriotic egotism as inconsiderate as it was selfish. The English government allowed France to be dismembered. English generosity exerted itself vainly to relieve the material wants which keenly excited national sympathy. The hour for efficient and powerful action went by. European preponderance had been once more within the grasp of England. Holding herself apart in her island she suffered it to escape her. Prudence is sometimes blind, and courage has its moments of unexpected timidity. Mr. Gladstone unhesitatingly shook to its foundations and modified the constitution of Great Britain. Venturesome even to rashness at home, he remained powerless and inactive in presence of extreme crises in European policy. He left France alone against Prussia, struggling and suffering with resolution and courage, amid the most frightful interior and exterior perils. Slowly rising from her disasters, painfully and with difficulty defending herself from her domestic foes, France stands at last upon her feet, and still relies upon that recuperative power which God has bestowed upon her—a power she has so often manifested amid the most afflicting reverses.

Labor upon great domestic reforms was not, meanwhile, slackened in England. For the first time, the English government entered upon the path of a serious attention to the necessity of public instruction. The Anglican Church, the dissenting sects, the landed proprietors, had labored long in this vast field; a great portion of it, however, still remained neglected; notwithstanding the assistance of the State, two-thirds of the children in Great Britain were, it was said, absolutely without instruction. From this time, the State extended over them its powerful hand, and England adopted, in spite of herself and of all her former prejudices, the system that had for many years prevailed more or less widely among the nations of the Continent. It was proposed to establish a system of School Boards in England and Wales, each Board being authorized to establish its own regulations, for the purpose of obliging all the children of the district between five and ten years of age to attend school. Government was reluctant to establish a system of compulsory education, and, on certain conditions, the schools already existing were recognized as institutions aided by the State, being submitted to the examination of an undenominational inspector. A special clause, protecting liberty of conscience, was also to make part of their regulations. Where the poverty of the population manifestly required it, free schools were to be maintained.

The principle adopted by Mr. Forster tended to admit at the outset to the number of schools aided by the State those already established under the patronage of the Anglican Church, of dissenters, and of Roman Catholics. The religious instruction given in these schools was to be of a nature to give offence to no conscience. But Mr. Forster soon perceived that his precautions had not been sufficient. The dissenting sects protested unanimously against religious instruction of any kind being given in schools receiving aid from the State. It was their wish that only secular instruction should be furnished by these schools, leaving all religious training to home influences and to expressly religious teachers. This cause had the singular fortune to be advocated by the most ardent religious believers, persons the strictest both in faith and practice, and, on the other hand, by free-thinkers, anxious to remove their children from all religious influences whatever. A very large portion of the community, however, were opposed to these views, holding that no education was complete and useful unless religious teaching accompanied and guided it.

The violent opposition of the dissenters more than once obliged the government to fall back for support upon the Conservatives in order to secure the success of the measure ; this opposition weakened the ranks of the Liberals, and impaired Mr. Gladstone's authority with his own party ; but it did not succeed in banishing all religious instruction from the schools of a nation Christian both in principle and profession. The bill passed by a large majority in both Houses. The earlier School Boards were made up from the most eminent men of each district. Women were also eligible to this position and, in many cases, filled it. Popular instruction, in becoming a national institution, became a national care ; the principles on which the law rested were, in the main, sound, and the bases of education solid ; the germs of new progress were sown broadcast. The struggle did not, however, end ; the partisans of distinct religious instruction in schools, and the partisans of a purely secular education, still held their ground with ardor. The compromise which Mr. Gladstone's government had accepted was powerless to appease religious animosities and conscientious scruples ; yet once more, and on a point of importance, the great chief of the Liberal party had put his hand to a work which he was not able to carry out to completion. He continued his advance, however, bringing forward new ideas, shaking long-established prejudices and ancient institutions, sometimes rash in his undertakings and more considerate of the rights of the future than of those of the past, but always useful, efficient, and animated by a sincere and passionate zeal for the right, whatever might be his errors and his lack of foresight in moving toward his aim.

In an affair of importance, public sentiment had reason to accuse the reforming minister of allowing himself to be carried away by his ardor beyond the legitimate limits of his authority. It was impossible that the army should escape Mr. Gladstone's reforms. The secretary of war, Mr. Cardwell, presented a plan for the general reconstruction of the regular army, the militia, the volunteers and the reserve, placing them for the future under the same discipline. A fundamental change was at the same time proposed in the method of officers' promotion, abolishing the sale of commissions among the officers themselves, and regulating promotion in accordance with personal merit. The established custom had come to be recognized in England as conducive to the high character of the service, since it effectually barred promotion to the lower classes of society. Prejudice and sincere conviction were leagued together against Mr. Cardwell's projected reforms, and he found himself obliged to sacrifice the larger portion of them, retaining only that which concerned the method of promotion. After a violent struggle the bill passed in the House of Commons, but the majority was small. In the House of Lords, the Duke of Richmond acting as spokesman of the Conservative party, proposed an amendment, declaring that the Upper House was unwilling to agree to the measure till a complete and comprehensive scheme of army reorganization should have been laid before it. The duke's amendment was adopted and the subject thus postponed to a future period. It was undoubtedly the right, as it had always been the practice of the House of Lords, to leave to public opinion the time to enlighten itself and free itself from passion in the matter of an important reform proposed by bold innovators. The delay which would have been imposed upon the measure was not long; but the determination to carry his point and the passion for reform had seized upon the mind of the premier; he had recourse to an expedient, at once ingenious and rash. The sale of grades in the army had been regulated by the crown, a minimum price being fixed, which was always far exceeded by the real price in the actual transaction. The same power which had authorized was competent to interdict; Mr. Gladstone announced that he had advised her Majesty to cancel all regulations made by herself or any of her predecessors authorizing the purchase or sale of commissions in the army. A royal warrant was issued to this effect, to go into force on the 1st of November, 1871. The question was thus suddenly and definitively decided by an act of royal authority, technically and strictly legitimate, it is true, but contrary to the habitual practice as to the fundamental principles of a free government. The opposition gained a new weapon against Mr. Gladstone; and among serious and sincerely liberal men, even of his own party, the prime minister was severely judged; a slow change began to work in the state of public opinion, and the local elections began to be favorable to the Conservative party.

The ballot question had for years agitated the House of Commons. It was asserted that the political influence of the upper classes, an influence legitimate and useful to the country, would be completely undermined by the proposed plan of secret, instead of public voting as heretofore; on the other hand, it was urged that corruption and intimidation, as well as the disgraceful scenes of violence common at elections, would be rendered impossible under the new plan. The new elements introduced into the electoral system by the Reform Bill had not yet had time clearly to manifest their scope and tendencies, and already there was exhibited an eagerness to proceed further along this dark and unexplored path.

The secret ballot was a fatal blow to natural influences, and the Conservative party opposed it resolutely. Among the Liberals themselves objections to it were numerous and serious. The discussion was prolonged intentionally, and the final disposal of the question was left over till the following year. When at last Mr. Gladstone's persistency carried it, over the secret reluctance of many of the Liberal party and the declared opposition of the Conservatives, the measure was accepted only as an experiment, and its action limited to a period of eight years, that is, the close of the year 1880, a satisfaction easily granted to regrets and scruples, but of little consequence in itself, and involving no serious results. It was one step more in that rapid march which is hurrying even England herself towards the reign of a pure democracy. A superficial and momentary excitement seemed at that time to precipitate the coming of this transformation in the social condition and in the public opinion of England. As usual, the action of France was making itself felt; a republic had been established upon the ruins of the empire as the sole form of government which could rally around it the forces of the diverse parties, all interested in the restoration of the sick and enfeebled country. Entrusted once more to skilful and wise hands, the new régime seemed indeed to bring forth fruits of pacification and prosperity. The criminal attempts of the Commune had been suppressed; labor and economy were resuming their sway. The English Radicals ascribed the honor of these renewed elements of prosperity to the republican form of government. For the first time since the Restoration, monarchy, as an institution, was attacked in an indirect manner in the Parliament of England. Sir Charles Dilke asked for an inquiry into the employment of the revenues of the Crown. He did not limit himself to this parliamentary proposition, supported by two of his colleagues; for many months he had been travelling through the north of England, from county to county, presiding at popular meetings, and repeating to the crowds who gathered to hear him that royalty was for a nation an expensive toy, an extravagant luxury. Just at this time, the serious illness of the Prince of Wales, and the general anxiety caused thereby, had the effect of reviving the instincts of loyalty in hearts till then believed inaccessible to such an emotion. The attacks made by Sir Charles Dilke were received in the House of Commons with a storm of indignation and anger. Mr. Gladstone launched all the thunder of his eloquence against the audacious person who had dared to raise a question contrary to all the principles of the English constitution, hateful to the larger part of his audience, inopportune and premature, even in the judgment of those who, in theory, agreed with him. For the time, and for several years to come, Sir Charles Dilke and his friends were constrained to silence. "I hope and believe it will be a long time," wrote Mr. Bright to a person who asked his opinion, "before we are asked to give our opinion on the question of monarchy or republicanism. Our ancestors decided the matter a good while since, and I would suggest that you and I should leave any further decision to our posterity."

Agitation was not, however, stifled everywhere. The sufferings of the agricultural laborers now began to occupy public attention. The miseries of this class seemed to be increasing. For the first time, at the instigation of certain agitators sprung from their own ranks, the cultivators of the soil began to gather in threatening masses, and agricultural strikes were organized in different parts of England. All persons at this time complaining had not so legitimate grievances as the unhappy tillers of the ground. One of Mr. Gladstone's reforms limited the number of drinking-shops, reduced the hours of sale, and increased the penalties for drunkenness. The liquor-sellers protested in a body against this governmental tyranny. Ireland did not feel satisfied with the reforms which had been made by Mr. Gladstone in her condition. Henceforth, the Protestants of Ireland were the leaders of the discontent, displeased with the measures that had despoiled their church, and with the decisive authority wielded in their affairs by the British Parliament. They were now in accord with the national Irish party who clamored for the government of Ireland by Ireland (Home Rule), so long the object of the fears and hopes of Irish patriots. Storms of every nature gathered in the horizon. The country was growing weary of the rapid reforms which the untiring energy of the great reform minister had laid upon them, and felt the need of pausing to take breath. Mr. Gladstone did not permit it. He had devised a further remedy to apply to the woes of Ireland. On the 13th of February, 1873, he introduced a measure for settling the question of university education in Ireland. A reform had been introduced into the régime of the English Universities, which was as useful as it was equitable. The religious test, which had closed to all dissenters the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, had been suppressed. All could henceforth profit by the same instruction and compete for the same honors and rewards. Mr. Gladstone's desire for equality and uniformity extended farther in relation to Ireland.

G. Cook. Sculp.

H. R. H. THE PRINCE OF WALES.

Boston. Estes & Lauriat.

Two universities existed in Ireland, — that of Dublin, a strictly Protestant institution, and the Queen's University, where the instruction was exclusively secular. The Roman Catholics, five-sixths of the population of Ireland, were in the position of being, as such, excluded from one university, and, the heads of their church condemning the principle of secular instructions, they were debarred by their own convictions from entering the other. They therefore claimed the establishment of a Roman Catholic University. Mr. Gladstone proposed to centralize all the existing colleges, Roman Catholic as well as Protestant, around the University of Dublin, each college making laws for its own government, and having the right to send members in proportion to its number of pupils to the governing council of the university. The university itself would not only give diplomas but also maintain chairs of instruction,—theology, moral philosophy and modern history being excepted, in order to maintain its strictly neutral position in matters of religion. The income of the university was to be derived from the revenues of Trinity College, Dublin, a very wealthy Protestant foundation, from the fund remaining after the disestablishment, and from students' fees.

The plan was both complicated and revolutionary. It destroyed ancient and honored institutions, without satisfying the real wishes of either party. The senate of the University of Dublin condemned Mr. Gladstone's project as decidedly as did the Roman Catholic bishops. Dissenters, as usual, exclaimed against the design of spending the State's money upon denominational education. Objections rained down upon it from all quarters, bitter and passionate on the part of those very Irish for whom Mr. Gladstone had so many times endangered his authority, and whose cause he was about to defend once more with the last efforts of his eloquence. Mr. Disraeli made a violent attack upon the new scheme, and the certainty of triumph rang in his words. Mr. Gladstone felt himself defeated. He expressed the poignant regret that he felt in separating from his Irish friends, with whom he had so long worked successfully. It was, in fact, the votes of the Irish members which wrought his downfall. The measure was defeated by a majority of three; it was, however, defeated. The great liberal union which had since its accession to power changed the face of England by its reforms, fell to pieces before a secondary question, which it was difficult to make the country understand.

Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues resigned office (March, 1873), and the queen sent for Mr. Disraeli; but the latter declining to accept office with the existing House of Commons, Mr. Gladstone consented to return. In the autumn, some elections were favorable to the Conservative party. Various changes took place in the Cabinet, and symptoms of weakness and discord were plainly to be observed. The new year opened. Parliament had been summoned for the 5th of February, when suddenly and unexpectedly, Mr. Gladstone decided upon a dissolution, with the view of testing the sentiments of the country.

The general elections at once proved the change that had taken place in the public mind. In 1868, the elections had secured to the Liberals a majority of a hundred and twenty votes. In 1874, the estimates most favorable to the ministry indicated a Conservative majority of fifty. Mr. Gladstone did not wait to put his inferiority to the proof; he at once resigned, as Mr. Disraeli had done six years before. The great Liberal administration fell, less wearied than was the country by its long-continued and mighty exertions, enfeebled, however, in its hidden springs. In its foreign and European policy it had more than once disappointed English pride and enthusiasm; in its home administration it had frequently been in advance of popular wants and national aspirations. It was destined, however, to leave behind it deep and lasting traces. Amid many errors and grave faults, it had labored conscientiously to remedy evils and to found useful institutions. It had been serious and sincere; and rivals and enemies themselves will not dispute its title to the honor posterity will decree it.

THE END.

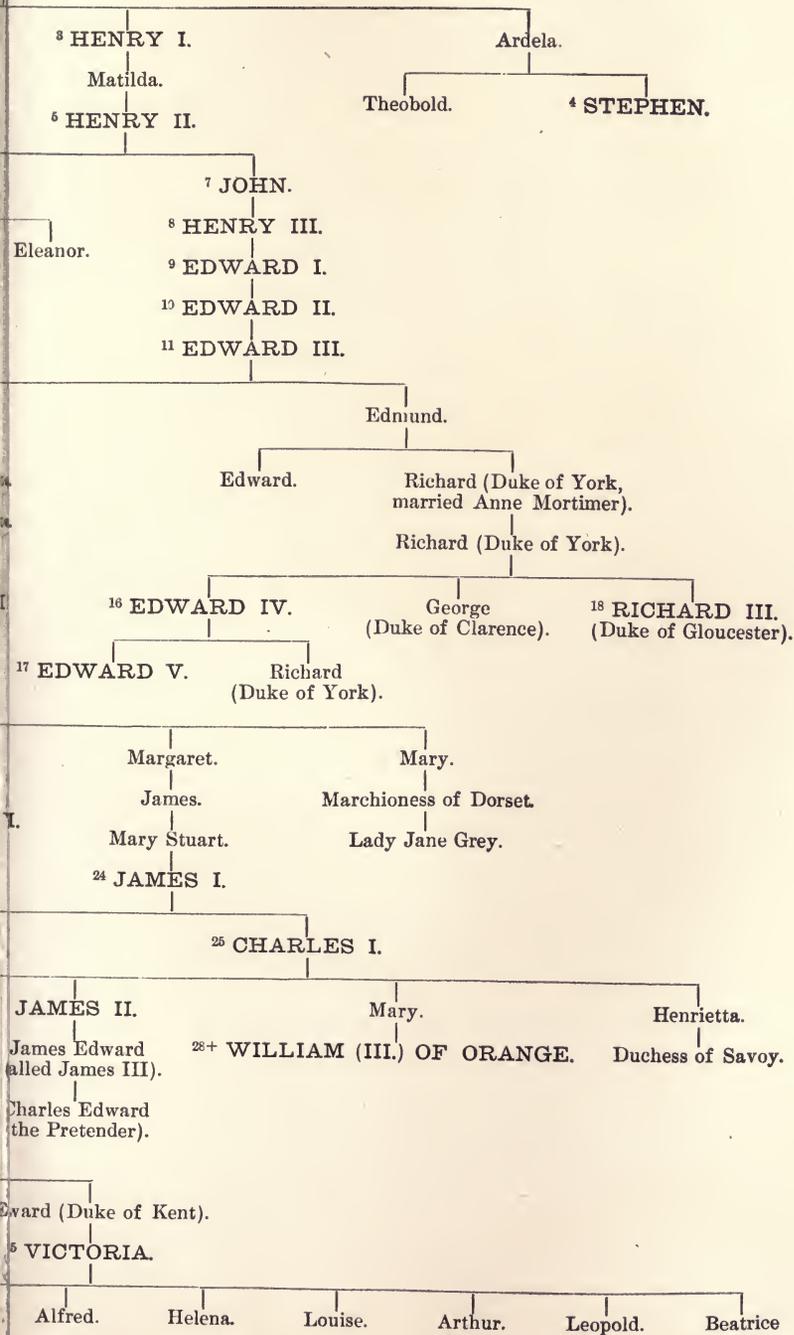

KINGS AND QUEENS

NS OF ENGLAND.

CONQUEROR.

GENERAL INDEX.

A.

- ABBEYS, spoliation of, in reign of Henry VIII., ii. 190, 191.
- ABBEVILLE, Marquis d', ambassador of James II. to Holland, iii. 348; dispatch to the king, 349.
- ABBOT, CHARLES (afterwards Lord Colchester, 1757-1829), as speaker, gives casting vote against Lord Melville, iv. 367.
- ABD-EL-KADER, Emir, v. 104; war with French in Morocco, 108, 109, 110; efforts to prevent massacre of Christians in Damascus, 314.
- ABD-EL-RHAMAN, Emperor of Morocco, his war with the French, v. 108, 109, 110.
- ABDUL AZIZ. See Turkey, Sultans of.
- ABDUL MEDJID. See Turkey, Sultans of.
- ABERCROMBY, Sir RALPH (1738-1801), takes possession of the Antilles, iv. 331; his unsuccessful expedition against Holland, 343; wounded at Aboukir; his death, 354.
- ABERDEEN, George Gordon, Earl of (1784-1860), in Wellington's cabinet, iv. 418; in Sir Robert Peel's cabinet, v. 57; his character, 60; desire for friendly relations between England and France, 100; accompanies Victoria to Chateau d'Eu, 101; conversation with Guizot, 104; position on Morocco question, 110; on Spanish marriage, 112-114; Guizot's sketch of, 114-118; advice to Palmerston on quitting the ministry, 118; Peel's approbation of his policy, 133, 134; becomes prime-minister, 147; opposed to emancipation of the Jews, 157; attached to peace policy, 171; resigns, 217; quoted, 235.
- ABERDEEN, University of, founded, ii. 363.
- ABJURATION BILL, proposed by Whigs, iii. 380.
- ABOLITIONISTS in United States, their party strengthened by election of 1860, v. 318.
- ABOUKIR, battles of, ix. 343, 354.
- ABRAHAM, Heights of, taken by Wolfe, iv. 200; attempted recapture of, by French, 201.
- ABSOLUTISM, its decline, iv. 137.
- ABYSSINIA, Napier's expedition to, v. 376, 378, 379.
- ACADIA, French territories in, ceded to England by treaty of Utrecht, iv. 68; depopulation of, 190.
- ACHE, M. d', in command of French fleet in India, defeated by the English, iv. 208.
- ACRE, taken by Crusaders, 1191, i. 191; retaken from Templars by Keladeen, 243.
- , JOAN of. See Joan of Acre.
- ACTON, Sir ROGER, friend of Oldcastle, put to death, i. 382.
- ADAMS, CHARLES FRANCIS, United States minister to England, v. 323; despatch from Seward concerning the Trent, 323; action in regard to the Alabama, 332, 333, 334.
- ADAMS, DANIEL, prosecuted for political libels, iv. 325.
- ADAMS, JOHN (1735-1826), interview with Mr. Oswald, iv. 277; minister to England, 280, 281.
- ADDA, FERDINAND, Count of, papal nuncio, iii. 330, 335, 342.
- ADDINGTON, HENRY. See Lord Sidmouth.
- ADDISON, JOSEPH, English essayist (1672-1719), his connection with politics, iv. 85; secretary of state in cabinet of 1717, 113.
- ADELAIS, widow of Henry I. of England, i. 143.
- ADIGE, the, becomes frontier of Cisalpine Republic by peace of Luneville, iv. 344.
- ADMIRALTY, English, courts of, ignore rights of neutrals, iv. 255.
- ADRIAN IV., Nicholas Breakspeare. See Popes.
- ADRIAN VI., Cardinal of Tortosa. See Popes.
- "ADULLAMITES," Mr. Bright's name for followers of Robert Lowe, v. 362, 363.
- AFGHANISTAN, government of, in 1837, v. 47.
- AFGHANS, their difficulties with England, v. 44; character of; their war with the English, 49-55; independence secured, 55, 56; assist in defence of Punjab, 241, 242.
- AGACE, GOBIN, conducts Edward III. to the passage of the Somme, i. 306.
- AGATHA, wife of Edward Atheling, i. 75.
- AGENOIS, overrun by Black Prince, i. 321; ceded to English by treaty of Bretigny, 329.
- AGHRIM, battle of, iii. 388.
- AGINCOURT, battle of, i. 390-392.
- "AGREEMENT of the People," republican pamphlet, iii. 92.
- AGRICOLA, Roman prætor in Britain, i. 22-24.
- AGRIPPINA, Roman Empress, i. 19.
- AHMAD-SHAH, founder of Afghan Empire, v. 47.
- AIGUILLON, defended by Sir Walter Manny, i. 311.
- , Duke d', repulses invasion of Normandy and Brittany, iv. 197.
- AINSWORTH, WILLIAM HARRISON, historical novelist, v. 168.
- AIRE, JOHN d', citizen of Calais, i. 316.
- AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, peace of (1668), iii. 266; peace of (1748), England and Holland with

- France and other powers, iv. 180, 181; discontent excited by it in France and England, 183.
- AKBAR KHAN, son of Dost Mohammed, v. 49; at head of insurrection in Afghanistan; murders Macnaghten, 50; attacks the English in pass of Koord Cabul, 51; his proposal to them, 51, 52; lays siege to Jellalabad, 53.
- ALABAMA, State of, joins Southern Confederacy, v. 320.
- , the, Confederate privateer, v. 332, 333; destroyed by the Kearsarge, 333; controversy in regard to between England and the United States, 332-335.
- ALAMAYOU, son of King Theodore of Abyssinia, brought to England; his death, v. 379.
- ALBA, Duke of (1508-1582), Spanish general in the Netherlands, ii. 293, 303, 306; his correspondence with Mary Stuart, 310; recalled to Spain, 317.
- ALBAN, historical name of Scotland, i. 141.
- ALBANY, Duke of, brother of Robert III. of Scotland, i. 365; assists Earl of Douglas, 367; imprisons his nephew, Rothesay, 373; his ascendancy in Scotland, 374; negotiations with court of France, 399.
- , Duke of, brother of James III. of Scotland, his conspiracy, ii. 70; death, 103.
- , Duke of, sent to Scotland by Francis I., ii. 129; becomes regent, 130; his quarrels with Queen Margaret, 144; with Henry VIII. 145.
- ALBEMARLE, Duke of, consin of Richard II., joins Bolingbroke, i. 357; divested of his title by Henry IV., becomes earl of Rutland, 361; betrays conspiracy against Henry IV., 363.
- , Duke of. See General Monk.
- , Duke of, son of General Monk, in command of militia, in Monmouth's insurrection, iii. 315.
- , KEPPEL, Earl of, influence with William III., iv. 30; Portland's jealousy of, 32; his mission to Holland, 47; in command at Denain, 74.
- ALBERONI, Cardinal Giulio (1664-1752), prime-minister of Spain, his administration, iv. 113; schemes for aggrandizement of Spain; expedition against Sardinia and Sicily, 114; retaliation for Bing's destruction of Spanish fleet, 115; leagues with the Pretender, is connected with Cellamare's conspiracy, 116; requests the Pretender to leave Madrid, 117; his illusions in regard to the French, 117, 118; attempts to incite revolt in France and England, is dismissed from office and banished, 119; retires to Rome, 120.
- ALBERT (1819-1861), Prince of Saxe Coburg Gotha, his advice concerning the royal household, v. 21; marriage with Queen Victoria decided upon, v. 28; Guizot's estimate of, 30, 31; marries the queen, 32; congratulated by Parliament on birth of Prince of Wales, 63; meets Louis Philippe, 103; corrects translation of the king's address to London, 104; his anxiety concerning Sir Robert Peel, 134; his project for Great Exhibition, 136; letter concerning it, 139; criticism of Palmerston's conduct, 142; suspects Napoleon's Italian designs, 282; his death, his character, 330.
- ALBERT EDWARD, Prince of Wales, his birth (1841), v. 63; illness, 406.
- ALBIGENSES, i. 203; Simon de Montfort, persecutor of (1208), 231.
- ALBINUS, Roman general in Britain, i. 24.
- ALBRET, Count d', assists Duke of Brittany against Charles VIII., ii. 95; aspirant for Anne of Brittany, 97.
- , JOHN, King of Navarre. See Navarre.
- ALCAZOR, battle of, ii. 347.
- ALCOBA, battle of, iv. 395.
- ALDERMEN, council of, i. 38.
- ALDRED, Archbishop of York, crowns William the Conqueror, i. 107, 109, 110.
- ALENÇON, JOHN, first Duke of, assumes badge of the Armagnacs, i. 375; death of, at Agincourt (1415), 391.
- , Duke of, taken prisoner at Verneuil, ii. 17; present at capture of Jargeau, 26; his greeting to Lord Talbot, 27.
- , FRANCIS, Duke of, afterwards Duke of Anjou (1554-1584), negotiations for his marriage with Queen Elizabeth, ii. 310; his visit to England postponed, 314; conspiracy against Henry III., becomes Duke of Anjou, 316; visits England, receives promise of marriage from Elizabeth, 318; his disappointment, his death, 319.
- ALEXANDER II. See Popes.
- III. See Popes.
- , emperors of Russia. See Russia.
- , kings of Scotland. See Scotland.
- ALFRED the Great (848-901), birth, i. 42; boyhood, 42, 43; taken to Rome, at the French court, 43; his marriage, defeated by Danes before Reading, victorious at Assendon, 45; becomes King of Wessex, 46; unsuccessful war with the Danes, 46, 47; a fugitive, 47, 48; anecdote of, 48; discovered by his subjects, undertakes to recover his kingdom, 49; defeats Danes at Ethandune, captures Godrun, compels him to embrace Christianity, 50; marches against Hastings, 51; defeats him at Farnham, his generosity, 52; shuts up the Danes in Chester, constructs canal to stop their navigation, 53; opposes them with a navy, 54; finally subdues the Danes, organizes his kingdom, 54; relations with Danish kingdom in Northumbria, organizes his army, 55; relations with the clergy, 56; administration of justice, 56, 57; compiles code of laws, 57; laws in respect to serfs, 58; zeal for learning, 58-60; quoted, 59, 60; literary attainments, 60; measurement of time, 61; dying words to his son, 61; death, celebration of his birthday in 1849, 62.
- , son of Ethelred the Unready, i. 73; lands in England (1042), and is taken prisoner, 79; death of, 80.
- , Prince, son of Queen Victoria, the crown of Greece offered to (1862), v. 296.
- ALGAROTTI, Count, letter from Frederick the Great, iv. 212.
- ALGERIA, effect of war in, on the French, v. 182.

- ALGIERS, bombarded by Lord Exmouth, iv. 404.
- , Dey of, English expedition against, iv. 404.
- ALLECTUS, ruler in Britain, i. 26.
- ALLEN, concerned in Fenian outbreak at Manchester, v. 371; hanged, 372.
- ALMA, battle of the, v. 191, 192.
- ALMAQUE, Henry of, assumes the cross, i. 239; is assassinated, 239.
- ALMANZA, battle of, iv. 57.
- ALICE, Princess of France, imprisoned by Henry II., i. 180, 181.
- of Thouars, daughter of Constance of Brittany, proclaimed by Bretons, i. 206.
- ALINAGORE (or God's Port), name given by Surajah Dowlah to Calcutta, iv. 206.
- ALPHONSO X., King of Castile (1222-1284), threatens Guienne, i. 229.
- , son of Edward I., dies, i. 248.
- ALTHORP, Lord. See Spencer.
- ALUMBAGH, park of, Sepoys defeated at, v. 261, 262.
- ALURED, Colonel, devoted to cause of Long Parliament, iii. 226.
- AMBOISE, Cardinal d' (1460-1510), minister of Louis XII., his wise administration, ii. 128.
- AMELIA, Princess, daughter of George II., present at her father's death, iv. 213.
- , Princess, daughter of George III., her death, iv. 394.
- AMERICA, English colonies in, Grenville proposes their taxation, iv. 222; their resistance to the Stamp Act, 223-225; Declaratory Act in regard to, 227; grave aspect of affairs in, 230; oppose importation of English goods, 231, 233; their Declaration of Independence, 240. See United States.
- AMHERST, Lord (1717-1797), English general in Canada, takes Ticonderoga from the French (1759), iv. 199, 200.
- AMIENS, captured by Spanish army (1596), ii. 344.
- , peace of (1802), England with France, Spain, and Holland, iv. 354; difficulties in regard to its execution, 356.
- AMNESTY BILL, of Charles II., iii. 247.
- AMORANT, Viceroy of Wales, under Alfred, i. 54.
- AMOY, port of, opened to British traders, v. 46.
- AMPÈRE, JOSEPH MARIE (1775-1836), his experiments in use of electricity, v. 22.
- AMPTHILL, residence of Catharine of Aragon, ii. 171.
- AMSTERDAM, Shaftesbury's arrival at, iii. 292, 293; its hostility to House of Nassau, 310; resistance to second Partition Treaty, iv. 33.
- ANABAPTISTS, persecuted under Henry VIII., ii. 175; by Presbyterians under Long Parliament, iii. 40, 41; engaged in plot against Cromwell, 187.
- ANASTASIUS II. See Popes.
- ANDRASTA, British goddess of victory, i. 22.
- ANDRE, Major, sent by Sir Henry Clinton to negotiate with Arnold for surrender of West Point, arrested as a spy, iv. 259; his trial, 260; letter to Washington, 260, 261; his execution, 261; monument in Westminster Abbey erected to, 261.
- ANGLES, invade Britain, i. 29-33.
- ANGLESEA, Lord, Hanoverian Tory, iv. 95.
- ANGLESEY, Isle of, taken possession of by Edward I., i. 246.
- ANGLIA, East, Anglian kingdom of, founded, i. 31; accepts Christianity, 38; occupied by Danes, 44-51; Danish inhabitants rise against Ethelred the Unready, 68.
- ANGLO-SAXONS, i. 64.
- ANGOULÈME, promised by Armagnacs to Henry IV., i. 376.
- , FRANCIS, Count of. See France, Francis I.
- , ISABEL of. See Isabel of Angoulême.
- , LOUIS, Duke of (1775-1844) re-establishes Bourbon monarchy in Spain (1823), iv. 416.
- ANGOUMOIS, becomes possession of English crown on accession of Henry II., i. 149.
- ANGUS (Archibald Douglas, "Bell-the-cat") fifth Earl of, at battle of Flodden (1513), ii. 125.
- , sixth Earl of, marries Margaret, widow of James IV., ii. 130; quarrels with her, 144; joins English army, 204; grandfather to Lord Darnley, 283.
- ANJOU, bequeathed to Geoffrey, second son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, is retained by Henry II., i. 149; Cœur-de-Lion does homage for, to Philip Augustus, 181; nobility of, in favor of Prince Arthur, 203; insurrection in, 206; regained by France (1203), 207; ravaged by English, 376; claimed by Henry V., 383; overrun by English, 405; restored to René, ii. 38; claimed by Henry VIII., 119.
- , House of, its claims to crown of Sicily, i. 248.
- , CHARLES of, i. 241-243.
- , Duke of, brother of Charles V. of France, Governor of Languedoc, i. 333.
- , FRANCIS, Duke of. See Alençon.
- , FULKE, Count of, marries his daughter to son of Henry I., i. 132.
- , HENRY, Duke of. See France, Henry III.
- , LOUIS, Duke of, sole representative of elder branch of House of Bourbon. See France, Louis XV.
- , MARGARET of. See Margaret of Anjou.
- , MARY of. See Mary of Anjou.
- , MATILDA of. See Matilda of Anjou.
- , PHILIP, Duke of. See Spain, Philip V.
- ANNA, Infanta of Spain, negotiations for her marriage with Prince Henry of England, ii. 394; with Prince Charles, 395-401; her marriage with the King of France, 406.
- ANNATES, suppressed by Parliament, ii. 171; vested in the crown, 186; restored to Holy See by Mary, 258; return to the crown, 269.
- ANNE, Queen (1664-1714), daughter of James II. and Anne Hyde, her Protestant education, iii. 273; as princess, her friendship for Sarah Jennings, 345; resolution

- against Catholicism, 346; conversation with Lord Clarendon, 351; joins Prince of Orange, 352; her claims brought forward by the Tories, 363; declared heir to the throne after children of Mary, 364; retires with Duchess of Marlborough to the country on disgrace of the Duke, 392; asks permission to visit William after Mary's death, iv. 13; her interview with him, 14; William refuses to make her regent in his absence, 15; her accession, 49; character, 50; resolution to carry on William's policy; bestows favors on Marlborough, declares war against France, 51; her growing indifference to Duchess of Marlborough, 58, 67; interview with Mesnager, 68; forbids German ambassadors to appear at court, 69; her cold reception of Prince Eugene, 71, 72; speech in Parliament on the peace, 73; dissolves Parliament, 76; death of her husband, 77; gives her consent to the union of England and Scotland, 79; formation of political parties in her reign, 80; establishes "Queen Anne's Bounty," 81; her affection for Mrs. Masham, 82, 83; dissolves Parliament, 83; last interview with Duchess of Marlborough, 84; refuses to summon the Elector of Hanover to House of Lords, 86; proclaims reward for arrest of Pretender, 87; dismisses Oxford, transfers her confidence to Bolingbroke, 88; her illness, 89; death, 90; landed-property qualification for members of Parliament dates from her reign, v. 292.
- ANNE, Grand-duchess of Russia, Napoleon's negotiations for marriage with, iv. 392.
- , of Austria (1602-1666), queen of Louis XIII., remark of Cardinal Retz in regard to, iv. 224.
- , of Bohemia, queen of Richard II., i. 350; her death, 352.
- , of Brittany (1476-1514), daughter of Duke Francis, ii. 96; married to Maximilian of Austria, 97; annuls the marriage, marries Charles VIII., 98; subsequently wife of Louis XII., her death, 127.
- , of Burgundy, sister of Duke Philip, marries Duke of Bedford, ii. 15; her efforts to renew their alliance, 29; her death, 35.
- , of Cleves, fourth wife of Henry VIII., ii. 196; her personal appearance, 196; marriage with the king, 197; is supplanted by Catharine Howard, accepts title of "adopted sister" of the king, 198.
- MORTIMER, mother of Richard, Duke of York, ii. 42.
- NEVIL, daughter of Earl of Warwick, marries Edward, son of Henry VI., ii. 60; marries Richard of Gloucester, 65; is crowned, 77; her death, 81.
- ANSELM. See Archbishops of Canterbury.
- ANSON, COMMODORE GEORGE (1697-1762), his expedition to Peru, circumnavigates the globe, iv. 147.
- , General (1797-1857), commander-in-chief of English army in India, his death, v. 246.
- ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE, formed, Chartists refuse to ally themselves with, 71; Fox's speech in support of, 72, 73; its rapid progress, 73; its attacks on Sir Robert Peel, 74; further progress, 77.
- ANTILLES, the, D'Estaing's campaign in, iv. 253; Guichen and Rodney in, 256, 257.
- ANTRIM, Marshal Schomberg lands at, iii. 378.
- ANTRIM, Earl of, in command of Irish corps in Scotland, iii. 31.
- ANTWERP, surrenders to Louis XV., iv. 179; to Marshal Gérard, 1832, 449.
- ANNWAR-OD-DEEN, Indian Prince, iv. 203.
- APPEALS, Statute of, voted by Parliament, ii. 171.
- AQUITAINE, part of marriage portion of wife of Henry II., i. 147, 149; English princes do homage for, 164; designed by Henry II. for his son Richard, 174, 176, 205; Cœur-de-Lion does homage for, to Philip Augustus, 181; revolts, 182; recognizes John (Lackland) as liege-lord, 203; intrigues of Philip, the heir, to gain possession of, 250, 251; recovered by Edward I., 258; Edward III. does homage for, to Philip of Valois, 295; Black Prince established in, 331; claimed by Henry V., 383.
- , Eleanor of. See Eleanor of Aquitaine.
- ARAGON, its claims to Sicily, i. 248; defended against the Bonapartes, iv. 385.
- , CATHARINE of. See Catharine of Aragon.
- , King of, accompanies Henry II. against Toulouse, i. 152.
- ARAPILES, battle of, iv. 396.
- ARBROATH, Abbot of, bearer of Baliol's renunciation of homage to King of England, i. 253.
- ARC, JOAN of. See Joan of Arc.
- ARCHBISHOPRIC of Canterbury founded, i. 36.
- ARCON, Chevalier d', French engineer, constructs floating batteries at siege of Gibraltar, iv. 273.
- ARCOT, capital of the Carnatic, captured and defended by Clive, iv. 204.
- ARDEN, PEPPER, his motion to supply vacancy occasioned by Mr. Pitt's acceptance of office, iv. 296.
- ARGENSON, M. d', Secretary of war to Louis XV., hesitates to send Lally-Tollendal to India, iv. 207.
- ARGYLE, Archibald Campbell, fourth Earl of, governs Scotland with Earl of Arran, in name of Queen Mary, ii. 305.
- , Archibald Campbell, Marquis of, (1598-1661), attempts of Charles I. to arrest, ii. 440; made Marquis, 441; defeated by Montrose in Scotland, iii. 58; his advice to Scottish commissioners, 59; reception of Cromwell at Edinburgh, 102; enmity to Montrose, 135; present at his execution, 136; his treatment of Charles I., 138; rivalry with Hamilton, 142; executed, 285.
- , Archibald Campbell, ninth Earl of, imprisoned for making reservation in taking oath of submission, iii. 289; his escape, 290; in exile at the Hague, 309; at head of insurrection in Scotland in favor of Monmouth, 311; taken prisoner, 312; his execution, 1685, 313.

- ARGYLE, Archibald Campbell, tenth Earl of, (afterwards first Duke, 1701), commissioner of Scottish parliament to William and Mary, iii. 375.
- , John Campbell, second Duke of, at meeting of privy council on illness of Queen Anne, iv. 89; commander-in-chief of royal troops in 1715, 99, 100; defeats Mar at Sheriffmuir, 101, 102; reinforced, 103; marches against insurgents, 105.
- , George Campbell, Duke of, ardent supporter of abolition of slavery, v. 331; Indian secretary in Gladstone's cabinet (1868), 334.
- ARGYLL. See Argyle.
- ARKANSAS, State of, joins Southern Confederacy, v. 322.
- ARLINGTON, Henry Bennet, Earl of, (1618–1685), member of Cabal ministry, iii. 265; in favor of Dutch alliance, 267; his impeachment proposed; leaves the ministry, 271.
- ARMADA, the Spanish, sets sail; dispersed by storm, ii. 340; its disasters, 341, 342.
- ARMAGNAC, Count of, afterwards constable of France, father-in-law of Duke of Orleans, i. 375, killed in massacre of Armagnacs in Paris, 1418, 395.
- ARMAGNACS, the, partisans of the House of Orleans, i. 375; their struggle with Burgundians, 384; powerful in Paris, 394, 395; massacre of, at Paris, 1418, 395.
- ARMY, of the Long Parliament, Parliament surrenders authority to, by Self-Denying Ordinance, iii. 59–60; under control of the Independents, 74; disbanded voted by Parliament, 78, 79; insurrection incited by Independents, 79, 80; concessions of Parliament to, 80; refuses to disband without further guarantees, 81; removes the king from Holmby, 82–84; advances on London; demands expulsion of eleven Presbyterian members, 85; consents to withdraw, 85; enters into negotiations with the queen, 86, 87; Independent members take refuge with, 88, 89; enters London, and restores the fugitive members, 89; assumes complete ascendancy, 90; disorders fomented by the Republicans, 90, 91, 92, 93; outbreak of insurrection, 96; suppressed by Cromwell, 96, 97; in alliance with the Republicans, causes expulsion of Presbyterian members from Parliament, 104, 105; insurrection incited by the Levellers, 126–128; bill for its reduction passed, after battle of Worcester, 159; Cromwell seeks its support against Parliament, 186, 187; in opposition to Parliament, 201, 202, 203, 204; on good terms with the Republican Parliament, 211; the struggle renewed, 213–217; appoints commissioners to treat with Monk, 220; becomes disorganized, 224; is disbanded, 226.
- ARNOLD, BENEDICT, (1740–1801), American general, failure of his attempt against Canada, iv. 41; negotiations for giving up West Point to the English, 259; joins British army, 261; reply of American prisoner to, 261, 262.
- , MATTHEW, English author, v. 169, 170.
- ARNOLD, RICHARD, shot for insubordination, iii. 95.
- , THOMAS, Dr. (1795–1842), of Rugby, letter of, v. 25; his death, 167.
- , the king's brewer, juror on trial of the seven bishops, iii. 342.
- ARRAN, James Hamilton, second Earl of, afterwards Duke of Châtelherault, (regent of Scotland 1542–1554) and chief of Protestant party, ii. 205; returns to Catholicism, 207; leader of Catholic party, 221; heir-presumptive to Scottish throne; his marriage with Elizabeth contemplated, 274; revolts against Mary Stuart, 284; flight to England; reception by Elizabeth, 285; governs Scotland in Mary Stuart's name, 305; his domains ravaged by English troops, 306.
- , JAMES STUART, Earl of, favorite of James VI. of Scotland, ii. 319; his power in Scotland; imprisoned, 320.
- , Earl of, son of Duke of Hamilton, proposes negotiations with James II., iii. 360.
- ARRAS, congress assembled at (1435), ii. 36. "ARROW," the Lorcha, difficulties between England and China in regard to, v. 233–237.
- ARTEVELDT, JACQUES VAN, brewer of Ghent, contracts friendship for Edward III., i. 296; supports his cause in Ghent, 302; slain by the populace, 1345, 303.
- , PHILIP VAN, killed at battle of Rosebecque, 1382, i. 350.
- ARTHUR, King, tradition concerning, ii. 91.
- ARTHUR (1187–1202), son of Geoffrey Plantagenet and Constance of Brittany, i. 203; attempts to become king of England, is imprisoned and put to death, 205.
- ARTHUR, Prince of Wales, son of Henry VII., (1486–1502), his birth, ii. 90; marriage to Catharine of Aragon; death, 110.
- ARTOIS, ravaged by Edward III. i. 128; by Earl of Buckingham, 342.
- ARTOIS, ROBERT OF, brother-in-law of Philip of Valois, accompanies Countess of Montfort to Brittany, i. 300.
- , Count d', brother of Louis XVI., at siege of Gibraltar, iv. 273; fails to appear at Quiberon Bay, 328. See France, Charles X.
- ARUNDEL, Archbishop of Canterbury. See Canterbury.
- ARUNDEL, Earl of, proposes truce between Stephen and Prince Henry, i. 147.
- , Earl of, arrested, i. 352; executed by Richard II., 357.
- , Earl of, warns Queen Mary of Northumberland's design against her, ii. 239; announces his resolution to support her cause, 241; advances against Wyatt, 248; favorite of Elizabeth, 278; joins Leicester, 300; leaves Elizabeth's court, 302; his imprisonment and death, 321.
- , Earl of, father of Lord Stafford, iii. 285.
- , Earl of, made privy councillor by James II., iii. 330.
- , HUMPHREY, heads insurrection against Edward VI., is executed, ii. 226.

- ASCALON, taken possession of by Cœur de Lion, i. 192.
- ASCHAM, ROGER, tutor of Elizabeth, ii. 266.
- ASGILL, Captain, chosen to be hanged in reprisal for execution of an American officer, iv. 275, pardoned, 275.
- ASGILL, Lady, mother of the above, applies to Marie Antoinette for release of her son, iv. 276.
- ASHAM, ANTHONY, adherent of Parliament, murdered at Madrid, iii. 150.
- ASHANTEE, English expedition into, v. 341.
- ASHANTEES, King of, v. 340, 341.
- ASHBURNHAM, valet of Charles I., iii. 73; his negotiation with Cromwell, 86; declines to treat with the soldiers, 88; carries letter of the king to the army, 89; withdrawn from service of the king, 93; accompanies his flight, 94, 95.
- ASHE, Mr., moves the re-establishment of monarchy under Cromwell, iii. 178.
- ASHLEY, Ashley Cooper, Lord, iii. 235; member of "Cabal" ministry, 265; suspends payment of principal of loans advanced by London, 268. See Shaftesbury.
- ASKE, ROBERT, at head of insurgents against Henry VIII., ii. 187; overtures made to, 188; executed, 189.
- ASKEW, ANNE, preaches reformed doctrines, ii. 210; burned, 211.
- ASPERN, battle of, iv. 391.
- ASSAS, Chevalier d', his heroism at siege of Wesel, iv. 213.
- ASSENDON, battle of, i. 45.
- ASSER, historian of Alfred the Great, quoted, i. 45-47; invited to court of Alfred, 59.
- ASTLEY, Sir JACOB, major-general in army of Charles I., iii. 26; defeated at Stow; taken prisoner, 72.
- ASTURIAS, LOUIS, Prince of, son of Philip V., in Spanish camp, iv. 118.
- ATH, taken by Marlborough, 1706, iv. 56; its fortifications dismantled, 1831, v. 395.
- ATHELING, MARGARET. See Margaret Atheling.
- ATHELING EDGAR. See Edgar Atheling.
- , EDWARD. See Edward Atheling.
- ATHELNEY, (Ethelningaia), Island of the Nobles, i. 48, 49.
- ATHELSTAN, (895-940), first king of the Anglo-Saxons, i. 63, 64.
- ATHENS, Mr. Gladstone's popularity in, v. 295.
- ATHERTON MOOR, battle of, iii. 34.
- ATHLONE, captured by Ginckel (1691), iii. 388.
- ATHLONE, Earl of. See Ginckel.
- ATHOL, Duke of. See Tullibardine.
- ATHOL, Marquis of, remains neutral during insurrection of Dundee, iii. 376.
- ATREBATES, Belgian tribe, i. 15.
- ATTERBURY, FRANCIS, (1662-1732), made Bishop of Rochester, iv. 83; proposes proclaiming James III. on death of Queen Anne, 90; letter of Bolingbroke to, 94; member of council for conducting affairs of the Pretender; organizes plot in his favor; imprisoned in the Tower, 125; his appeal to the House on his trial, 126-128; exiled to France, 128.
- ATTWOOD, Mr., speech in Parliament on the general distress (1833), iv. 443.
- AUCKLAND, capital of New Zealand, v. 340.
- AUCKLAND, Lord, governor of India, his reasons for entering on the Afghan War, v. 48; his proclamation, 53, 54; superseded by Lord Ellenborough, 54.
- AUDLEY, Lord, at head of insurrection against Henry VII., ii. 105, 106; executed, 106.
- AUDLEY, Sir James, at battle of Poitiers, i. 325.
- AUGEREAU, Marshal, his delay in joining Napoleon, iv. 398; Napoleon's reproaches, 399.
- AUGUSTENBURG, Duke of, his claim to the Schleswig-Holstein provinces, v. 345.
- AUGUSTINE, first missionary to the Anglo-Saxons, i. 34-37.
- AULUS PLAUTIUS, Roman general in Britain, i. 18.
- AUMALE, Count of, at capture of Verneuil, ii. 17.
- , Duc d', his marriage with Queen Isabella proposed, v. 112.
- AUSTERLITZ, battle of, iv. 373.
- AUSTIN, juror on trial of the seven bishops, iii. 342.
- AUSTRALIA, penal colonies in, v. 288, 289; almost complete independence of, 375.
- AUSTRIA, concludes Treaty of Worms with France and Sardinia, iv. 153; accedes to peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, 180; concludes alliance with France, 192; weakened by the Seven Years' War, 220; concludes peace with Prussia (peace of Hubertsburg, 1763), 220-221; peace of Campo-Formio with France (1797), 334; joins coalition against French Republic, 343; concludes peace of Luneville with France, 344; accedes to coalition against Napoleon (1805), 369; mediates between the allies and Napoleon (1813), 397; interferes in affairs of Naples, 416; her policy in regard to Turkish question, v. 34, 35; concludes with England convention of July, 1840, 36; concurs in treaty of 1841, 100; Hungarian revolt against, 141; takes part in conference at Vienna, 178; her proclamation in favor of maintaining the Ottoman Empire, 182; instigates new conference at Vienna, 219; negotiates for peace, 233; Italian revolt against, 302; loss of power in Italy, 303; connives at Polish insurrection, 342; concurs in scheme for pacification of Poland, 343; her power weakened by war with Prussia in 1866, v. 356; Guizot's estimate of her rivalry with Prussia and consequences of defeat in war of 1866, 356-359; folly of her alliance with Prussia against Denmark, 358.
- , Archdukes of:—
- ALBERT, takes possession of Calais, ii. 344; married to daughter of Philip II., 350.
- CHARLES. See Emperors of Germany.
- , son of Ferdinand I., ii. 278; negotiations for his marriage with Queen Elizabeth, marries daughter of Duke of Bavaria, 299.
- , son of Leopold I., iv. 33; made

- AUSTRIA, Archdukes of (continued):—
 heir to Spain by second Treaty of Partition, 34; disputes the throne with Philip V., 51, 55; brought to Madrid, 66; proposed elevation to the empire, 68. See Germany, Charles VI.
- CHARLES, son of Leopold II., defends hereditary states of Emperor of Austria, iv. 334; defeats Napoleon at Aspern (1809), 391.
- LEOPOLD, plants his banner on the ramparts of Acre, i. 191; leaves army of the Crusaders, 192; imprisons Richard Cœur-de-Lion, 196; excommunicated, 199.
- MAXIMILIAN. See Emperors of Germany.
- , proclaimed Emperor of Mexico, v. 337; his death, 339.
- PHILIP. See Sovereigns of Spain, Philip.
- , Don John of, Governor of Low Countries, his project to invade England, ii. 317.
- , Don John of, Spanish general, iii. 190; defeated at battle of the Dunes, 191.
- , Duke of, ally of Edward I., i. 258.
- , Margaret of. See Margaret of Austria.
- , Emperors of:—
FRANCIS I. (II. of Germany), declares war against France, iv. 321; his army takes possession of Conde and Valenciennes, 325; subsidies voted for by Parliament, 333; his hereditary states invaded by French, 334; joins Holy Alliance, 1815, 403, 404.
- LEOPOLD, iv. 320. See Germany, Leopold II.
- FRANCIS JOSEPH, v. 337.
- AUSTRIA, House of, domains claimed by Elector of Bavaria, iv. 148; alliance with House of Bourbon, 192.
- AUSTRIAN Succession, war of (1741-1748), iv. 143.
- AUTEROUCHE, Count d', at battle of Fontenoy, iv. 155.
- AUVERGNE, becomes possession of English crown on accession of Henry II., i. 149; overrun by the Black Prince, 321.
- AVAUX, Count d', French envoy at the Hague, iii. 347; with James II. in Ireland, 339; his difficulties, 370; quoted, 371; his account of the battle of Newton-Butler, 373; returns to France, 383; recalled to Paris, iv. 40.
- AVEJOU, Baron, in army of William III. in Ireland, iii. 383.
- AVIGNON, first Pretender takes refuge in, iv. 107.
- AVRANCHES, William the Conqueror entertains Harold at, i. 90; regained by France, ii. 40.
- AXTELL, DANIEL, in command of the guard at trial of Charles I., iii. 112, 114; excluded from amnesty of 1660, 253.
- AYALA, DON PEDRO, Spanish ambassador, ii. 107.
- AYLOFFE, compromised in Whig conspiracies, in exile in Holland, iii. 309; engaged in Monmouth's insurrection, 310; attempts suicide, interrogated by James II., 314.
- AYMERIE of Pavia, Governor of Calais under Edward III., i. 318; put to death by Chargny, 319.
- AYSCOUGH, Sir GEORGE, English admiral, iii. 156.
- AZELIN, citizen of Caen, i. 119.
- AZIMOO LAH KHAN, emissary of Nana Sahib to London, v. 251; stimulates ambition of his master, 252.
- AZORES, expedition against, ii. 345.

B.

- BABINGTON, Sir ANTHONY, his conspiracy in favor of Mary Stuart, ii. 324, 325.
- BACIOCCHI, Princess Elisa, sister of Napoleon Bonaparte, Lucca bestowed upon her by Bonaparte, iv. 369.
- BACON, FRANCIS, Lord (1561-1626), his anecdote of Queen Elizabeth, ii. 268, 269; prosecutes Earl of Essex, 351, 352; joins Somerset in intrigues against Parliament, gains name of Undertaker, 396; conducts trial of Somerset, 397; made Keeper of the Seals, disgraced, made Lord Verulam and Chancellor, 399; charges against him, his trial, confession, 404; sentence, literary works, death, 405.
- BACON, NICHOLAS (1510-1579), Keeper of the Seals under Elizabeth, ii. 269; reprimands the Commons, 308.
- BADAJOZ, capture of, by Wellington, 1812, iv. 396.
- BADLESMERE, Lady, wife of Governor of Leeds Castle, i. 281.
- BAGNALL, Sir HENRY, defeated and killed at Blackwater, ii. 348.
- BAGNARA, taken possession of by Richard Cœur-de-Lion, i. 188.
- BAILLIE of Jerviswood, refuses to inform against Whig conspirators, iii. 293.
- , General, his detachment destroyed by Hyder Ali, iv. 289.
- BAIREÜTH, MARGRAVE of, unsuccessful campaign on the Rhine, 1807, iv. 58.
- BAJEE RAO, Peishwah of Poonah, v. 251.
- BAKARA, Ameer of, English prisoners in his power, v. 55.
- BAKER, Major HENRY, takes command at Londonderry, iii. 371.
- BALAKLAVA, v. 188, 197; British base of operations in Crimean War, 199, 200.
- , battle of, v. 202-207.
- BALANCE of Power, in Europe, disturbed by Franco-Prussian War, v. 390; M. Guizot's estimate of its importance, 396, 397.
- BALCARRAS, Count, concerned in Dundee's insurrection in Scotland, iii. 374.
- BALDOCK, Chancellor, in reign of Edward I., his death, i. 284.
- BALFOUR, Sir WILLIAM, Governor of the Tower, ii. 434; deprived of his position, 447; in command of cavalry under Earl of Essex, iii. 52.
- BALIOL, BERNARD, at battle of the Standard, I. 141.
- , EDWARD. See Sovereigns of Scotland.
- , HENRY, brother of the above, killed at Annan, i. 294.

- BALL, JOHN, priest, one of the insurgents in reign of Richard II, hanged, i. 349.
- BALMERINO, Lord, concerned in Jacobite rebellion of 1745, his trial and execution, iv. 178.
- BALTIC SEA, the, war between Sweden and Denmark in regard to, iii. 210; English expedition to, under Parker and Nelson, iv. 353; English fleet in, during the Crimean war, v. 188.
- BALTIMORE, Massachusetts regiment attacked by mob in, v. 322.
- BANGOR, Abbot of, i. 37; monks of, massacred by Saxons, 37.
- BANISTER, delegate to American Congress, Washington's letter to, iv. 250.
- BANK Charter Act of 1844, v. 280.
- of England, established in 1694, iii. 404; its jealousy of South Sea Company, iv. 122; attacked in the Gordon riots, 255; authorized to increase its circulation, v. 280.
- BANTRY BAY, action in, iii. 399.
- BAR, Duchy of, Margaret of Anjou takes refuge in, ii. 55.
- , Earl of, son-in-law of Edward I., i. 254.
- BARANTE, M. de, Guizot's letter to, v. 27, 28.
- BARBAZON, Sire de, defends Melun against Henry V., i. 403.
- BARBÉZIEUX, Marquis of, son of Louvois, secretary of state to Louis XIV., iii. 400.
- BARBIER, Advocate, his journal quoted, reference to Emperor Charles VII., iv. 150; remarks on assistance promised by France to Charles Edward, 163, 164; letter on French War in America, 189.
- BARCELONA, captured by Vendôme, iv. 23; by Peterborough, 54.
- BARCLAY, Sir GEORGE, heads plot for assassination of William III., commissioned by James, iv. 17, 18.
- BARDOLF, Lord, friend of Earl of Northumberland, dies of wound received at Branham Heath, i. 374.
- "BAREBONES Parliament." See Parliament.
- BARFLEUR, taken by Edward III., i. 304.
- BARILLON, ambassador of Louis XIV. to England, iii. 294, 307, 308; quoted, 317; letter to Louis on revocation of Edict of Nantes, 323, 324; letters to Louis, 326, 327, 329, 333; interview with James II., 330; under influence of Sunderland, 347; explanation of James II. to him, 353; letter on return of James II., 357.
- BARSTEAD, Colonel, Lieutenant of the Tower under Cromwell, iii. 188.
- BARNARD, Sir HENRY, takes command of Indian army on death of Anson, v. 246.
- , Sir ALEXANDER, agent of Lord Auckland in Afghanistan, v. 47; murdered, 49.
- , Dr. ROBERT, dependant of Thomas Cromwell, ii. 197; burned at the stake (1540), 198.
- BARNET, battle of, ii. 62, 63.
- "BARONETAGE," James I. creates title of, ii. 396.
- BARONS, urge William the Conqueror to take the crown, i. 107; council of, assembled to judge Odo of Bayeux, 115; invade France under the Conqueror, 117; their discontent under William Rufus, 120; assembled in London, proclaim Henry I., 126; divided in allegiance, 128, 129; convoked to swear allegiance to Prince William, 132; protest against marriage of Empress Maud, 135; elect Stephen, 138; his popularity with the majority, 139; insurrections of those supporting Maud, 139, 140; unite in acknowledging her, 143; fortify themselves in their castles, 146; council of, convoked by Henry II., 168; their disloyalty to him, 182; do not support Longchamp, 197; remain faithful to Richard, 199; won over by John, 204; their discontent, 207, 209; convoked by Archbishop Langton, 211; their oaths, 212, 213; present their demands to John, 213; rise against him, 214; extort Magna Charta from him, 215; wage war against him, 216, 217; call in aid from France, 218; their discord, 219; acknowledge Henry III., 221; their quarrels, 223; their assembly first called Parliament, 224; refuse to support war with France, 227; exact ratification of their liberties, 229; their demands, 230; under Simon of Montfort, 231; exact oaths from Henry III. and Prince Edward, 232; their dissensions encourage the king to resist them, 233; defeat him at Lewes, 234; swear allegiance to Edward I., 239; their resistance to him, 256, 257; demand ratification of his concessions, 261, 262; their victory, 263; discontent under Edward II., 273, 274; capture Gaveston, 275; execute him, 276; their jealousy of Despencer, 280; rise against Edward, 280, 281; depose him, 285.
- BARRAS, Count de (1755-1829), his power in France after 18th Fructidor, iv. 338.
- BARRE, Colonel, Pitt's arrangement with him as to clerkship of the polls, iv. 301.
- BARRÈRE, BERTRAND (1755-1841), moves in the Convention, decree of no quarter to English and Hanoverians, iv. 325.
- BART, JEAN, French privateer, iii. 402.
- BARTHÈLEMY, M., envoy of French Republic at Basle, iv. 329.
- BARTON, ANDREW, naval commander of James V. of Scotland, defeated and killed in engagement with Sir Edward Howard, ii. 121.
- , ELIZABETH, Holy Maid of Kent, ii. 173; executed, 1534, 174.
- , JOHN, brother of Andrew, naval commander of James V., ii. 121.
- BARUKZYES, tribe of, v. 47.
- BARWICK, JOHN, his letter to Edward Hyde, iii. 200.
- BASELE, Monk of, Knight of King Philip of Valois, i. 308.
- BASLE, Congress at (1794-1795), iv. 328, 331; peace of (1795), Tuscany, Prussia, and Sweden with the French Republic, 331.
- BASTILLE, the, fall of, Fox's exultation at, iv. 315.
- BASTWICK, JOHN, arrested, ii. 421; his sentence, 422.

- BATBY, JOHN, heretic, burned at Smithfield, i. 331.
- BATEMAN, executed for giving assistance to Titus Oates, iii. 322.
- BATES, servant of Catesby, ii. 391.
- BATH, Bishop of, Thomas Ken, signs petition against Declaration of Indulgence, iii. 338, 339.
- , Earl of, present at deathbed of Charles II., iii. 297.
- , Earl of, William Pulteney, his enmity to Robert Walpole, iv. 134; in opposition, 140; becomes Lord Bath, 150; Walpole's observation to him; declines office, 151.
- BATTERSEA, country-house and birth-place of Bolingbroke, iv. 146.
- BATTLE ABBEY, built by William the Conqueror near Hastings, i. 106.
- BATTLES:—
- Aboukir, 1798, iv. 343; 1801, 354.
- Aghrim, 1591, iii. 388.
- Agincourt, 1415, i. 390-392.
- Alcoba, 1810, iv. 395.
- Alma, the, 1854, v. 191, 192.
- Almanza, 1707, iv. 57.
- Arapiles, 1812, iv. 396.
- Ardoch Moor, i. 23.
- Aspern, 1809, iv. 391.
- Assendon, 871, i. 45.
- Atherton Moor, 1643, iii. 34.
- Austerlitz, 1805, iv. 373.
- Balaklava, 1854, v. 202-207.
- Bannockburn, 1314, 276-278.
- Barnet, 1471, ii. 62, 63.
- Baugé, 1421, i. 405.
- Bautzen, 1813, iv. 397.
- Baylen, 1808, iv. 387.
- Beachy Head, 1690, iii. 386.
- Bergen, 1759, iv. 210.
- Blenheim, 1704, iv. 53.
- Bosworth, 1485, ii. 82, 83.
- Bothwell Bridge, 1679, iii. 284.
- Boyne, the, 1690, iii. 384.
- Brandywine, 1777, iv. 246.
- Branham Heath, 1408, i. 374.
- Brentford, 1642, iii. 28.
- Brenville, 1119, i. 133.
- Bull Run, 1861, v. 324.
- Bunker Hill, 1775, iv. 238.
- Camperdown, 1797, iv. 338.
- Canterbury, 839, i. 41.
- Chalgrove, 1643, iii. 33.
- Chevy Chase, 1388, i. 351.
- Chillianwallah, 1849, v. 241.
- Coleshill, 1157, i. 151.
- Copenhagen, 1801, iv. 353.
- Corbiesdale, 1650, iii. 134.
- Corrachie, ii. 282.
- Corunna, 1809, iv. 387.
- Crécy, 1346, i. 307-311.
- Crevant, 1423, ii. 15, 16.
- Crevelt, 1758, iv. 197.
- Cropredybridge, 1644, iii. 48.
- Culloden, 1746, iv. 173.
- Dantzic, 1807, iv. 381.
- Denain, 1712, iv. 74.
- Dettingen, 1743, iv. 153.
- Drayton, 1459, ii. 46.
- Dresden, 1813, iv. 397.
- BATTLES (continued):—
- Dunbar, 1650, iii. 141.
- Dunes, battle of the, 1658, iii. 191.
- Duplin Heath, 1332, i. 293.
- Edgehill, 1642, iii. 27, 28.
- Essling. See Aspern.
- Ethandune, 878, i. 50.
- Evesham, 1265, i. 236.
- Eylau, 1807, iv. 381.
- Falkirk, 1298, i. 262.
- , 1746, iv. 170.
- Farnham, 884, i. 52.
- Flodden, 1513, ii. 125, 126.
- Fleurus, 1690, iii. 386.
- Fontenoy, 1745, iv. 154-156.
- Formigny, 1450, ii. 40.
- Friedland, 1807, iv. 381.
- Futtehpoore, 1857, v. 255, 256.
- Germantown, 1777, iv. 246.
- Gettysburg, 1863, v. 338.
- Gravelines, 1558, ii. 262.
- Grossmont, 1405, i. 372.
- Guzerat, 1849, v. 242.
- Halidon Hill, 1333, i. 295.
- Hastenbeck, 1757, iv. 195.
- Hastings, i. 1066, 104.
- Hedgely Moor, 1464, ii. 55.
- Heliogoland, 1864, v. 346.
- Heliopolis, 1800, iv. 353.
- Hexham, 1464, ii. 55.
- Hochkirch, 1758, iv. 197.
- Hochstett, 1800, iv. 344.
- Hohenlinden, 1800, iv. 344.
- Homildon Hill, 1402, i. 367.
- Inkerman, 1854, v. 209-213.
- Inverlochy, 1645, iii. 58.
- Jarnac, 1569, ii. 302.
- Jemmapes, 1792, iv. 322.
- Jena, 1806, iv. 378.
- Killicrankie, 1689, iii. 376, 377.
- Kolin, 1757, iv. 194.
- La Hogue, 1692, iii. 399.
- Langport, 1645, iii. 64.
- Lawfelt, 1747, iv. 170.
- Leipzig, 1813, iv. 397.
- Lexington, 1775, iv. 236.
- Ligny, 1815, iv. 401.
- Lincoln, 1141, i. 143.
- Lissa, 1757, iv. 196.
- Little Caglar, 1488, ii. 103.
- London, 839, i. 41.
- Loudon Hill, 1307, i. 270.
- Lowestoft, 1665, iii. 261.
- Lutzen, 1813, iv. 397.
- Maida, 1806, iv. 380.
- Malplaquet, 1709, iv. 64.
- Marengo, 1800, iv. 344.
- Marignan, 1515, ii. 129.
- Marston Moor, 1644, iii. 49, 50.
- Meance, 1843, v. 152.
- Methven, 1306, i. 267.
- Minden, 1759, iv. 210.
- Moncontour, 1569, ii. 302.
- Mortimer's Cross, 1461, ii. 49.
- Mungulwar, 1857, v. 258.
- Nancy, 1477, ii. 78.
- Naseby, 1645, iii. 61-63.
- Navarette, 1367, i. 332.
- Neerwinden, 1693, iii. 402, 403.
- Nesbit Moor, 1402, i. 367.

BATTLES (continued):—

Nevil's Cross, 1346, i. 301.
 Newburne, 1640, ii. 427.
 Newbury, 1643, iii. 39.
 —, 1644, iii. 53, 54.
 Newton-Butler, 1689, iii. 372, 373.
 Northampton, 1460, ii. 46.
 Oakly, 851, i. 42.
 Orthez, 1814, iv. 400.
 Oudenarde, 1708, iv. 59.
 Patay, 1429, ii. 27.
 Pavia, 1525, ii. 149.
 Philip-Haugh, 1643, iii. 68.
 Pinkie, 1547, ii. 222.
 Plassey, 1757, iv. 207.
 Poitiers, 1356, i. 322-325.
 Porto Novo, 1781, iv. 289.
 Preston, 1648, iii. 102.
 Prestonpans, 1745, iv. 161, 162.
 Princeton, 1776, iv. 242.
 Quatre Bras, 1815, iv. 401.
 Ramilies, 1706, iv. 55.
 Raucoux, 1746, iv. 179.
 Revoux, 207, i. 24.
 Rochester, 839, i. 41.
 Roncesvalles, 1813, iv. 398.
 Rosbach, 1757, iv. 196.
 Rosebecque, 1382, i. 350.
 Sadowa, 1866, v. 356.
 St. Albans, 1455, ii. 45.
 —, 1461, ii. 49.
 Saint-Aubin-du-Cormier, 1488, ii. 95.
 Saint Vincent, 1797, iv. 334.
 Sedgemoor, 1685, iii. 317.
 Sherbourn, 1645, iii. 68.
 Sheriffmuir, 1715, iv. 101, 102.
 Shrewsbury, 1403, i. 369, 370.
 Sole Bay, 1672, iii. 269.
 Solway Moss, 1542, ii. 204.
 Spurs, battle of the, 1513, ii. 123, 124.
 Standard, battle of the (North Allerton),
 1137, i. 141, 142.
 Steinkirk, 1692, iii. 401.
 Stirling, 1297, i. 260.
 Stoke, 1487, ii. 93.
 Stow, 1646, iii. 72.
 Talavera, 1809, iv. 389.
 Tchernaya, 1855, v. 224.
 Teneriffe, 1656, iii. 186.
 Tewkesbury, 1471, ii. 63.
 Tinchebrai, 1106, i. 130.
 Torrington, 1646, iii. 71.
 Toulouise, 1814, iv. 400.
 Towton, 1561, ii. 52.
 Trafalgar, 1805, iv. 371, 372.
 Ushant, 1778, iv. 251.
 Valladolid, 1818, iv. 385.
 Valmy, 1792, iv. 322.
 Verneuil, 1424, ii. 17.
 Villa Viciosa, 1710, iv. 65.
 Vimero, 1808, iv. 386.
 Vittoria, 1813, iv. 398.
 Wagram, 1809, iv. 391, 392.
 Wakefield, 1460, ii. 48.
 Waterloo, 1815, iv. 401.
 Wilton, 1142, i. 146.
 Worcester, 1651, iii. 145, 146.
 Zorndorf, 1758, iv. 197.
 Zutphen, 1586, ii. 345.

BAUDIN, French vice-admiral, his fleet dispersed by English, iv. 394.
BAUDRAND, General, M. Guizot's letter to, v. 36.
BAUDRICOURT, Sire de, his treatment of Joan of Arc, ii. 23.
BAUGÉ, battle of, i. 405.
BAUTZEN, battle of, iv. 397.
BAVARIA, Duke of, his daughter marries Archduke of Austria, ii. 299.
 —, Elector of, Maximilian Emanuel (1662-1726), death of his son, adopted by Charles II. of Spain, iv. 31; at head of German Princes, 34; Governor of Low Countries, orders surrender of frontier towns to Louis XIV., 39, 40; joined by Tallard, 52; effects retreat after Blenheim, 53; harasses march of Prince Eugene, 58.
 —, Elector of, Charles Albert, (1697-1745), his claim to part of dominions of Austria on death of Charles VI., iv. 148; becomes Emperor of Germany, 1742, 150. See Germany, Charles VII.
 —, Elector of, Maximilian Joseph, gains Tyrol by Peace of Presburg (1805), iv. 373.
 —, Electoral Prince of, adopted by Charles II. of Spain, his death, iv. 31.
 —, ISABEL of. See Isabel of Bavaria.
 —, LOUIS of, letter from Henry VIII. to, ii. 138.
BAXTER, RICHARD, opposes Declaration of Indulgence, iii. 334, 335.
BAYARD, (1475-1524), Chevalier, marches to relieve Therouanne, ii. 123; his death, 149.
BAYEUX, regained by France, ii. 40.
BAYEUX, ODO, Bishop of, brother of William the Conqueror, i. 95-104; intrusted with government of England, 108; made Earl of Kent; his character; aspires to papacy, 114; imprisoned by the Conqueror, 115; supports Robert Curthose, 120, 121.
BAYLEN, battle of, iv. 387.
BAYONNE, camp of Marshal Soult at, iv. 400.
BEACHY HEAD, battle of, iii. 386.
BEALES, EDMOND, President of Reform League, v. 364.
BEATON, Cardinal DAVID, his influence over James V., ii. 203; claims the regency; imprisoned, 205; regains his liberty; is reconciled with Arran, 207; his fanaticism; his assassination, 209.
BEAUCHAMP, Lord, nephew of Earl of Essex, iii. 51.
BEAUFORT, Cardinal, half-brother of Henry IV., as Bishop of Winchester, his speech in Parliament, i. 385; appointed to educate Henry VI., ii. 14; his quarrel with Gloucester; made cardinal, 19; sends reinforcements to Duke of Bedford, 28; his disposal of remains of Joan of Arc, 34; crowns Henry VI., 35; at council of Arras, 32; his death, 39.
BEAUFORT, JANE, marries James I. of Scotland, ii. 16.
 —, MARGARET. See Richmond, Countess of.
BEAUJEU, M. de, in command of French troops in America, defeats Braddock, iv. 191.

- BEAUJEAU, Madame de, sister of Charles VIII. of France, ii. 98.
- BEAULIEU, favorite of Charles VII. of France, ii. 20.
- BEAUMARCHAIS, M. de, (1732-1799), his interest in American affairs, iv. 243.
- BEAUREGARD, confederate general, defeats McDowell at Bull Run, v. 324.
- BEAUVAIS, Bishop of, imprisoned at Rouen, i. 201.
- BECKER, General, accompanies Napoleon in his flight, iv. 402.
- BECKET, GILBERT, father of Thomas à Becket, i. 155, 156.
- , THOMAS A. See Canterbury, Archbishops of.
- BEDDINGFIELD, Sir HENRY, governor of the Tower, ii. 252.
- BEDFORD, opens its gates to barons, i. 214.
- , Duke of, (John), brother of Henry V., appointed regent in his absence, i. 385; relieves Harfleur, 393, 394; repulses incursion of Scots, 395; in Paris, with King Henry, 404; assumes command of English army, 406; intrusted by Henry with government of France, 407; seizes power in France, ii. 13; chief mourner at funeral of Charles VI., 14; unopposed in France, 14; causes large towns in France to swear allegiance to Henry VI.; marries Anne of Burgundy; despatches aid to Crevant, 15; sends James I. back to Scotland, 16; defeats the French at Verneuil, 17; chosen as arbitrator between Gloucester and Brabant, 18; compelled to visit England, 19; returns to France, 20; receives reinforcements from England, 21; negotiates for surrender of Orleans, 22; his anger at Talbot's defeat, 27; receives fresh reinforcements, 28; gives up command of allied forces, and retires to Normandy, 29; crowns Henry VI. King of France; marries Jaquette of Luxembourg, 35; his death, 37.
- , Duke of, John Russell, (1710-1771), in Grenville's cabinet, iv. 227.
- , Earl of, imprisoned for heresy, ii. 263.
- , Earl of, sent by Elizabeth to Scotland, ii. 287; her instructions to, 288.
- , Earl of, (William Russell) made Duke (1694), iii. 404.
- BEDLOE, accomplice of Titus Oates, iii. 280.
- BELISME, ROBERT of, Earl of Shrewsbury, i. 129.
- BELGIANS, or Cymri, early invaders of Britain, i. 13-18.
- BELGIUM, campaign of Marlborough in, iv. 55, 56; invaded by army of French Republic, 322; again in possession of the allies, 325; under control of Bonaparte, 360; invaded by him, 401; kingdom of, its formation, 448; accession of Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, 449; Louis Philippe refuses to accept throne of, for his son, v. 111; its neutrality menaced, 390; separated from Holland in 1831, 394; its neutrality established, 395.
- , LEOPOLD I., king of (1790-1865), husband of Princess Charlotte, daughter of George IV., iv. 405; his accession, 1831; marries Louise, daughter of Louis Philippe, 449.
- BELHAVEN, Lord, imprisoned by Duke of York, iii. 289.
- BELLAYSE, JOHN, Lord, made Privy Councillor by James II., iii. 330.
- BELLEFONDS, Marshal de, at battle of La Hogue, iii. 399.
- BELLE-ISLE, captured by English (1761), iv. 215.
- BELLE-ISLE, Marshal, his influence with Cardinal Fleury, iv. 148.
- BELLIARD, General, in command of French in Cairo, capitulates, iv. 354.
- BELLEVRE, ambassador extraordinary from Henry III. of France to Elizabeth, ii. 331.
- , M. de, French ambassador to Charles I., iii. 76; recalled, 149.
- BELOOCHEES, the, attack Hyderabad, v. 151, 152.
- BELLEVILLE, JOAN of. See Joan of Belleville.
- BEMBOW, Captain, adherent of Charles II. executed, iii. 147.
- BENARES, CHEY-TA-SING, Rajah of, driven from his country by Warren Hastings, iv. 290.
- BENEDICT III. See Popes.
- , XII. See Popes.
- , XIII., anti-pope, annuls the second marriage of Jacqueline of Hainault, ii. 18.
- BENGAL, becomes possession of England, iv. 207; Clive appointed Governor-General of, 209, 210; his reorganization of, 281-283; desolated by famine, 283; British supremacy finally established in, 285; Presidency of, its authority over possessions of East India Company, 286.
- BENTINCK, Lord GEORGE, his attack on Sir Robert Peel, v. 82; forms alliance with Whigs and Radicals, 86; his remarks on results of repeal of the Corn-Laws, 99; growth of his reputation, 126.
- , WILLIAM, his devotion to William of Orange, iii. 344; made Earl of Portland. See Portland.
- BERAR, annexed to British possessions in India, v. 241.
- BERBICE, Dutch colony in Guiana, iv. 266.
- BERENGARIA of Navarre, i. 181; marries Richard Cœur de Lion, 189.
- BERESFORD, SIMON, accomplice of Mortimer, hanged at Tyburn, i. 293.
- BERGEN, battle of, iv. 210.
- BERGEN-OP-ZOOM, besieged by the French, iv. 179.
- BERKELEY Castle, Edward II. murdered at, i. 286, 287.
- , Admiral, present at the attack on Brest, iii. 405.
- , Sir JOHN, his negotiations in behalf of Charles I., iii. 86, 87, 88; urges the king to consider proposals of the army, 89; removed from the king, 93; accompanies his flight, 94; carries letter from him to the army, 97.
- BERLIN, Marlborough's negotiations at, iv.

- 58; capture of by Russians, 212; decimated by Seven Years' War, 220; entered by Napoleon, 378.
- BERLIN Decree, issued by Napoleon, 1806, iv. 378.
- BERNARD, accused of complicity in Orsini's plot, v. 285; acquitted, 286.
- BERNICAIA, Anglian kingdom founded, i. 32; its union with Deira forms Northumbria, 32, 33.
- BERNIÈRE, Madame de, Voltaire's letter to, iv. 130.
- , Président de, iv. 130.
- BERNIS, Cardinal, Minister of Foreign Affairs to Louis XV., his love for peace, iv. 197.
- BERRI, CHARLES, Duke of, grandson of Louis XIV., the English demand his renunciation of right to the Spanish throne, iv. 70, 71.
- , Duke of, uncle of Charles VI., assumes Armagnac badge, i. 375; effects reconciliation between Orleans and Burgundy, 376; resists pretensions of Henry V., 383, 384; supports the Dauphin, Louis, 384; attempts negotiations with Henry, 385; his advice at Agincourt, 388, 389.
- BERRYER, M., advocate of Montalembert, v. 275.
- BERTHA, Christian queen of Kent, i. 35.
- BERWICK, captured by Edward I. 253; Parliament convened at (1296), 254; falls into the hands of the Scotch, 279; besieged by Edward III., 294; by the Scotch, 320; surrenders to Henry IV., 372; ceded to the Scotch by Margaret of Anjou, ii. 53; peace concluded at, between Charles II. and the Scotch, 425.
- , James Fitzjames, Duke of, accompanies James II. in his flight from Rochester, iii. 359; commissioned to rouse English Jacobites, iv. 17; interview with James on return to France, 18; in service of Philip V. of Spain, 55; gains victory of Almanza (1707), 57; quoted, 58, 88; interview with Bolingbroke, 96; criticism of Earl Mar, 99; censures the Pretender's folly in dismissing Bolingbroke, 107; takes command in French army against Philip V., 118.
- BESSIÈRES, Marshal, defeats Spanish at Valldolid, iv. 385.
- BETHLEHEM, dispute for possession of sanctuaries at, v. 171, 172.
- BEVERING, VAN, Dutch statesman, his letter to John De Witt, iii. 166.
- BEYROOT, bombarded by the English, v. 40.
- BEVERLEY, Saxon church at, attacked by Normans, i. 111.
- BIBLE, forbidden to be read in public, ii. 201; Wickliffe's translation of; Parker's, Coverdale's, 357.
- BIDASSOA, the, crossed by Wellington, iv. 338.
- BIGOD, ROGER, Earl of Norfolk, his replies to Henry III., i. 230-233; opposes commands of Edward I., 255; retires to his estates, 256; resists the exactions of Edward, 257-263.
- BISHOPRICS, British, i. 28; Saxon, 37; English, their rich revenues, 154; offered for sale by Richard I., 186; Anglican founded by Henry VIII., ii. 192.
- BISHOPS, Anglican, bill for their exclusion from Parliament, ii. 445; their declaration to Parliament; impeachment resolved upon, 447; restored to House of Lords, iii. 256; endeavor to obtain from Monmouth profession of doctrine of non-resistance, 316; refuse to support James II. against Prince of Orange, 351; divided in regard to repeal of Test Act, iv. 120; on question of disestablishment of Irish Church, v. 385; in Scotland, efforts to introduce English liturgy, ii. 423; in Ireland, their address to William IV., iv. 446; lose their seats in English Parliament, v. 485.
- , British, their dissensions with Roman missionaries, i. 34; take refuge in Wales, i. 36, 37.
- , English, convoked to decide upon marriage of Henry I., 127; side with Henry I. against his brother, 128; condition imposed by them upon Stephen, 138, 139; ratify accession of Maude, 143; in council of Clarendon, 157; propose arbitration of Louis IX. between Henry III. and his barons, 234; join with barons in drawing up Dictum of Kenilworth, 239; unsuccessful resistance to Edward I., 255; protest against sentence of the Despencers, 281; Catherine of Aragon summoned before court of, ii. 171; commission of, composes liturgy of English church, 233; married, deprived of their sees by Mary, 245.
- , Roman Catholic, in England, deposed by Cranmer, ii. 235; deposed by Elizabeth, 237; in Ireland, oppose Irish University Bill, v. 408.
- , the Seven, protest against Declaration of Indulgence, iii. 338, 339; sent to the Tower, 340; allowed to return to their palaces, 340, 341; their trial, 341, 342; their acquittal, 343; their trial opens the eyes of the Tories, 346.
- BIRCH, Colonel, arrested by Colonel Pride, iii. 105; his speech on necessity of relieving Londonderry, 372.
- BIRMINGHAM, obtains third representative in 1866, v. 368.
- BRON, Duke de, at battle of Fontenoy, iv. 155.
- , Marshal, his generosity to Rodney, iv. 257.
- BISMARCK, Count, his ambition, v. 302; his projects upon Schleswig-Holstein provinces, 344, 345; designs upon Belgium, 390.
- BIZOT, General, French engineer at siege of Sebastopol, v. 201.
- BLACKFRIARS' THEATRE, Shakespeare's first connection with, ii. 367; his direction of, 380.
- BLACK FRIDAY in London, iv. 168.
- BLACKHEATH, Wat Tyler at, i. 345; Jack Cade encamped at, ii. 41, 42.
- "BLACK HOLE" of Calcutta, iv. 206.
- BLACKLOW HILL, Gaveston executed at, i. 275.

- BLOCKNESS CASTLE, Cardinal Beaton imprisoned at, ii. 207.
- BLACK PRINCE. See Edward, the Black Prince.
- BLACK SEA, occupied by English and French fleets, v. 179, 180; its interdiction to ships of war, 234.
- BLACKWATER, battle of, ii. 348.
- BLAKE, Admiral (1599-1657), his successes against Prince Rupert, iii. 152; captures French ships, 154; encounter with Dutch fleet, 156; victory over De Witt, 157; defeated by Van Tromp, 157, 158; expedition to Mediterranean, 173, 174; victory at Tenerife, his death, 186; tomb desecrated, 254.
- BLAKENEY, General, surrenders Fort St. Philip in Minorca to the French, iv. 192.
- BLANCHE of Castile, wife of Louis VIII. of France, niece of King John, i. 219; her defence of Brittany, 224.
- BLANCHE-TACHE, ford of the Somme, i. 306, 387.
- BLECHINDON, captured by Cromwell, iii. 60.
- BLENHHEIM, battle of, iv. 53.
- , palace of Duke of Marlborough, iv. 54.
- BLOIS, CHARLES of, nephew of Philip of Valois, i. 299, 300; made prisoner, 313.
- , PETER of, description of Henry II., i. 180.
- BLOUNT, Sir THOMAS, renounces allegiance to Edward II., i. 286.
- BLUCHER, Prussian general, at battles of Ligny and Waterloo, iv. 401.
- BOADICEA, British queen, i. 21, 22.
- BOCCACCIO, DECAMERON of, i. 343.
- BOHEMIA, claimed by Spain at death of the Emperor Charles VI., iv. 148.
- , ANNE of. See Anne of Bohemia.
- , Sovereigns of:—
- JOHN of Hainault, ally of Philip I. of France, i. 305; after battle of Crécy, 311.
- FREDERICK V., Elector Palatine (1596-1632), son-in-law of James I., called to throne of Bohemia by Protestant party, his elevation opposed by the Catholics, ii. 403; driven from Bohemia, takes refuge at the Hague, 405; scheme of James I. for his re-establishment, 406.
- CHARLES ALBERT, Elector of Bavaria (1697-1745), crowned, iv. 150.
- BOHUN, Sir HENRY, killed by Bruce at Bannockburn, i. 276, 277.
- , HUMPHREY. See Hereford Earl of.
- , Lady MARY de, wife of Henry IV., i. 378.
- BOILEAU, Racine's letter to, iii. 403.
- BOISDALE, MACDONALD of. See Macdonald.
- BOLEYN, ANNE, maid of honor to Catharine of Aragon, ii. 153; King Henry's devotion to her, 154, 155; her enmity to Wolsey, 155; her illness, 157; her influence exerted against Wolsey, 160; her marriage with Henry VIII., 170; crowned, 172; excommunicated, 172; her children declared legitimate successors to the throne, 173; exultation at death of Catharine, 181; arrest, 182; letter to the king, 183, 184; nullity of her marriage declared, 184; her death, 185; buried in chapel of the Tower, 244.
- BOLINGBROKE, Henry St. John, Viscount (1678-1751), secretary of state in Harley's cabinet of 1710, his secret negotiations with the French, iv. 67; his reply to the Dutch delegate, 68; quoted in regard to peace of Utrecht, 69; transmits the queen's orders to Ormond, 72; his successful manoeuvres to secure peace with France, 73; finally arranges peace of Utrecht, 75; his political intrigues, 76; in council of Queen Anne, 81; beginning of his rivalry with Walpole, 82; his remark on trial of Sacheverell, 83; made secretary of state (1710), 84; his eloquence, rivalry with Oxford, 85; engages in Jacobite plots, 85; presents Schism Bill in Parliament, 86; placed at head of commission for drawing up bills of attainder against Jacobites, 87; the queen transfers her confidence to him, 88; his intrigues in favor of the Pretender, 88, 89; letter to Strafford, 89; forced to propose Shrewsbury as treasurer, 90; overthrow of his schemes, 90, 91; his disgrace, 94; flight, 94, 95; impeachment in Parliament, 95; in Paris, joins the Pretender, 96; made secretary of state by the Pretender, his account of Jacobites in France, 97; the Pretender writes to him from Scotland, 103; dismissed by the Pretender in favor of Ormond, 106; abandons the Jacobites, 107; pardoned by George I., 128; permitted to return to England (1723), again retires to France and returns in 1725, 129; visited by Voltaire at Uxbridge, 130; his attempts to ruin Walpole, 134; interview with the king, 135; enmity to Walpole, 140; Walpole's attack on him, 141; inspires Wyndham's attack on Walpole, 142; leaves England (1734), his return, death, 146.
- BOLOGNA, University of, declares in favor of the divorce of Henry VIII. from Catharine of Aragon, ii. 167.
- BOLTON, agitation against Corn Laws in, v. 69, 70.
- BOLTON CASTLE, Mary Stuart imprisoned at, ii. 295.
- BOMARSUND, captured by Baltic fleet, v. 188.
- BONAPARTE, JEROME, becomes King of Westphalia (1807), iv. 381, 382.
- , JOSEPH, becomes King of Naples, iv. 377; declared King of Spain, 385; quits Madrid in alarm, 386; letter to Napoleon, 386, 387; obliged to remain on throne of Spain, 387; established at Madrid, 387; defeated at Vittoria, 392.
- , LOUIS, becomes King of Holland, iv. 381; abdicates, 395.
- , CHARLES LOUIS NAPOLEON. See France, Sovereigns of.
- BONIFACE. See Canterbury, Archbishops of.
- VIII. See Popes.
- BONNER, Bishop of London, emissary of Henry VIII. to the Pope, ii. 172; judges Anne Askew, 210; discourse at St. Paul's Cross, 234; deprived of his see and imprisoned, 235; set free, 243; gives public thanks for enforcement of laws against

- heretics, 254; his zeal not equal to that of Queen Mary, 255; rebuffed by Elizabeth, 267; imprisoned by her, 273.
- BONNIVET, Admiral, commands French army in Italy, ii. 147, 149.
- BONREPAUX, envoy of Louis XIV. to England, iii. 327; his criticism of James II., 337; conveys offers of Louis XIV. to James, 347.
- BOOTH, Sir GEORGE, revolts in favor of Charles II., iii. 212; imprisoned in Tower, 213.
- BOOK OF SPORTS, the, ii. 398, 399.
- BORA, CATHERINE, wife of Martin Luther, ii. 152.
- BORDEAUX, Earl of Derby besieged in (1346), i. 311; court of Black Prince at, 331; surrenders to English, ii. 43; is recaptured by French (1453), 44; proclaims Bourbons (1814), iv. 400.
- , Archbishop of, bears message from Henry II. to his son Henry, i. 178.
- , M. de, envoy of Mazarin to England, iii. 154, 155, 169; negotiates with Monk, 242.
- BORGO, Count Pozzo di, opinions in regard to fortifying Sebastopol, v. 186.
- BORN, BERTRAND de, poet of Aquitaine, intrigues with the sons of Henry II. against him, i. 178; is taken prisoner and set free by Henry, 179; spoken of by Dante, 179.
- BOSCAWEN, Admiral EDWARD (1711-1761), captures French vessels, iv. 189; his attack on Pondicherry, 203.
- BOSQUET, General, at battle of the Alma, v. 191; his exclamation at Balaklava, 206; in command of French division at Inkerman, 211, 212; anecdote of, 214; commands storming party at the capture of the Mamelon, 224.
- BOSSUET, his eulogies of Queen Henrietta Maria and the Duchess of Orleans, iii. 272.
- BOSTON, opposition to the Stamp Act in, iv. 224; to importation of tea, 233; port rights withdrawn, 234; British garrison besieged in, 236; evacuated by British, 238.
- BOSWORTH, battle of, ii. 83, 84.
- BOTANY BAY, transportation of criminals to, v. 288.
- BOTHWELL BRIDGE, battle of, iii. 284.
- BOTHWELL, Earl of, levies forces for Mary Stuart, ii. 287; accused of Darnley's murder, 289; acquitted, carries off the queen, 290; marries her, nobles attempt to take possession of, 291; his escape from Carbery, leaves the kingdom, 292; his correspondence with Mary, 293; Mary's accusation of, 296; declares his divorce, 301.
- BOUCHAIN, captured by Villars, iv. 74.
- BOUCAULT, Marshal, taken prisoner at Agincourt, i. 392.
- BOUFFLERS, Marquis de, at capture of Namur, iii. 401; his defence of Namur, iv. 15; forced to capitulate, 16; plenipotentiary of France at Ryswick, 23; evacuates Lille, 59; at battle of Malplaquet, 64.
- BOUILLE, Marquis of, captures Dominique, iv. 253; recaptures St. Eustace, 266; captures St. Christopher, 270.
- BOUILLON, Duke of, nephew of Turenne, iii. 212.
- BOULOGNE, Hastings encamped at, i. 51; captured by Henry VIII., ii. 208; restored to France, 230; Bonaparte's camp at, iv. 363.
- , EUSTACE of. See Eustace of Boulogne.
- BOURBAKI, French general of division at Inkerman, v. 212.
- BOURBON, CHARLES, Constable de (1490-1527), intrusted with government of Milan, ii. 131; his plot against Francis I., 147; at head of the emperor's army, defeats Francis I. at Pavia, 149; his death at siege of Rome, 153.
- , Duke of, Jean, (1381-1434), i. 364; taken prisoner at Agincourt, 392.
- , Duke of, at storming of Gibraltar (1782), iv. 273.
- , Duke of, Louis Henri (1692-1749), becomes regent upon death of Duke of Orleans, iv. 130, 131; breaks off marriage of Louis XV. with Infanta of Spain, 131; supplanted by Cardinal de Fleury, 133.
- , JOHN of, defeated by free bands, i. 330.
- , House of, its growing power, iii. 152; Louis XV. sole representative of elder branch, iv. 69; in Spain and France, divided against itself, 132; in alliance with House of Austria, 192; recognizes American independence, 248; princes of, at head of emigrant army invading France, 322; dynasty in Spain overthrown by the Bonapartes, 383, 384; re-established in 1823, 416; its maintenance in Spain necessary to France, v. 111, 112; England's attitude toward, 113; in Naples, declares war against England, 331.
- BOURCHIER, Cardinal-Archbishop, crowns Henry VII., ii. 85.
- , Sir JOHN, partisan of Henry VII., ii. 89.
- BOURGES, Archbishop of, ambassador to England, i. 385.
- BOURGUENY, M. de, French chargé-d'affaires, v. 42.
- BOURN, Canon of St. Paul's, ii. 243.
- BOWER, Sir GEORGE, besieged in Barnard Castle, ii. 304.
- BOWLBY, "Times" correspondent, v. 311.
- BOWLES, Dr., chaplain of Fairfax, iii. 222.
- BOWRING, Dr., supports cause of free trade, v. 69, 70.
- , Sir JOHN, orders bombardment of Canton, v. 237.
- BOYNE, battle of the, iii. 384.
- BRABANT, inherited by Philip of Burgundy, ii. 30.
- , CLIQUET de, killed at battle of Agincourt, i. 390.
- , Duke of, ally of Edward I., i. 258.
- , Duke of, ally of Edward III., i. 296.
- , Duke of, Anthony, killed at Agincourt, i. 391.
- , Duke of, John, marries Jacqueline of Hainault (1418), ii. 18; assisted by Duke of Burgundy, 19; his death (1427), 20.
- BRABANTINES, mercenaries in England, i.

- 150; in service of Henry II., 152, 176; in service of John, 217; of Isabel, wife of Edward II., 283; at Agincourt, 390.
- BRACKENBURY, Sir ROBERT, guardian of the Tower, ii. 78.
- BRADDOCK, General, English commander in French war in America (1755), iv. 188, 189; defeat of his expedition against Fort Duquesne, his death, 190.
- BRADFORD, reformed preacher, ii. 243.
- BRADSHAW, JOHN (1586-1659), President of High Court of Justice for trial of Charles I., 107; conducts the trial, 109-113; made President of Council of State, 121; Cromwell's letter to, 140; protests against dissolution of the council, 163; made President of High Court of Justice under Cromwell, 167; not elected to Parliament in 1656, 174; condemns action of the army, 216; his death, 217; disinterred and decapitated, 254.
- BRANDON, Sir CHARLES. See Suffolk, Duke of.
- BRANDYWINE, battle of, iv. 246.
- BRANHAM HEATH, battle of, i. 374.
- BROSE, WILLIAM OF, Lord of Bramber, i. 207, 208.
- BRAZIL, Emperor of, Pedro II., appoints commissioner to the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva, v. 334.
- BREADALBANE, John Campbell, Earl of, negotiates for Master of Stair with Highland chiefs, iii. 335.
- BREAKSPEARE, NICHOLAS, Pope Adrian IV., i. 149.
- BREDA, conferences at, iii. 133; treaties of (1667), 261.
- BREMEN, Duchy of, gained by George I., iv. 120.
- , recovered from the French by Ferdinand of Brunswick, iv. 196.
- BRENTFORD, battle of, iii. 28.
- , Earl of, commander-in-chief of royal army, iii. 52.
- BRESSON, M., employed in negotiations in regard to Spanish marriage, v. 122.
- BRETEUIL, WILLIAM OF, his quarrel with Henry Beauclerc, i. 125.
- BRETHOLTE, Earl, Dane settled in England, i. 68.
- BRETIGNY, treaty of (1360), i. 329.
- BRETONS, banished from England by William the Conqueror, i. 113; in favor of Prince Arthur, 203; march into Poitou, 205; proclaim Alice of Thouars, 206; summon French to their aid, ii. 94; unite against France, 95.
- BRETWALDA, Chief of the Heptarchy, i. 35, 37, 39.
- BREWSTER, Sir DAVID (1781-1868), his name beginning to be known in 1837, v. 161.
- BRÉZE, RENÉ de, partisan of Margaret of Anjou, ii. 54.
- BRIDGEWATER, Duke of, his subscription to Pitt's loan, iv. 333.
- , Lady, daughter of old Duchess of Norfolk, imprisoned, ii. 199; condemned to imprisonment for life, 220.
- BRIDGNORTH, Henry I. takes, i. 129.
- BRIDPORT, Alexander Hood (1724-1816), Lord, English Admiral, in command against the French at Quiberon Bay, iv. 328; mutiny in his squadron, 335; promises redress and pardon, 336.
- BRIGANTES, British tribe, i. 19.
- BRIGHT, JOHN, speech on Peel's course with regard to Corn-Laws, v. 77, 78; supports peace policy in affair of the "Arrow," 239; work in behalf of electoral reform, 298; his sympathy with United States, 331; his name for followers of Mr. Lowe, 362, 363; Disraeli's Reform Bill more than he had asked, 367; remarks on Ireland, 363; speech in behalf of Fenian prisoner, 372; in Gladstone's cabinet, 384; his speech in Birmingham, 384, 385; opinion on monarchy in England, 406.
- BRISACII, ceded by Louis XIV. at treaty of Ryswick, iv. 23.
- BRISTOL, surrenders to Charles I., iii. 35; held by Prince Rupert, 66; taken by Fairfax, 67; Cromwell lands at, 137; held against Monmouth, 316; outbreak on rejection of Reform Bill (1831), iv. 438.
- , Bishop of, Sir John Trelawney, signs petition against Declaration of Indulgence, iii. 338.
- , DIGBY, Earl of, ambassador of James I. at Madrid, letter to the king, ii. 407; recalled, 410.
- BRITAIN, early inhabitants of, i. 13; early invaders of, 13; early commercial relations of, 13; invaded by Romans, 14-22; under Roman rule, 22-26; condition of, after departure of Romans, 27, 29; division of by Saxons, 33; becomes England, 33.
- BRITO, RICHARD, murderer of Becket, i. 163.
- BRITONS, their wars with Romans, i. 14-22; mode of warfare, 16; wars with Caledonians, 24, 25; converted to Christianity, 27, 28; conquered by Saxons, 30; in Wales, 63.
- BRITTANY, invaded by Henry II., i. 152; Becket's negotiations concerning, 154; taken possession of by Henry II., 163; English princes do homage for, 164; designed by Henry II. for his son, Geoffrey, 174; Cœur-de-Lion does homage for, to Philip Augustus, 181; revolts, 182; nobility of, in favor of Prince Arthur, 203; ravaged by both parties, 204; insurrection in, organized by Philip Augustus, 200; regained by French, under Philip Augustus, 207; unsuccessful invasion of by Henry III., 224; conflicting claims to succession, 209; war in, 290-301, 313, 318; annexed to France, 341; population of Normandy take refuge in, 395; partisans of Henry Tudor assemble in, 80; invaded by French, 94, 95; finally assured to crown of France, 98; Alberoni attempts to incite revolt in, iv. 119; war of Chouans in, 328.
- , ANNE OF. See Anne of Brittany.
- , Duke of (John III.) dies without issue, i. 299.
- , Duke of, assumes badge of Armagnacs, i. 375; expected at Agincourt with reinforcements, 390, 391; his private alliance with Burgundy, ii. 15; declares in - favor of Charles VII., 19; forced to break the alliance, 20.

- BRITANNY, Duke of (Francis), his treatment of Henry Tudor, ii. 80; war with Charles VIII., 94-96.
- , Duke of, great-grandson of Louis XIV., his death, iv. 69.
- , Pearl of. See Eleanor, Pearl of Brittany.
- BROC, RANULPH de, i. 166, 167, 170.
- , ROBERT de, i. 167.
- BROCK, biographer of Havelock, v. 268.
- BRODERICK, his letter to Hyde, iii. 246.
- BROGHILL, Lord, (Roger Boyle), makes overtures to Cromwell in regard to restoration of Charles II., iii. 176; his opinion on the monarchy, 181; defends himself against Cromwell's charges, 188; adviser of Richard Cromwell, 202; desires Restoration, 203, 241.
- BROGLIE, Count (1647-1727), invests Marchiennes, iv. 74; joins George I. in Germany, 132, 133; his opinion of George I., 133.
- , Duke of (1671-1745), Marshal of France, evacuates Bavaria, iv. 153.
- , Duke of (1718-1804), repulses Ferdinand of Brunswick, iv. 210; generalissimo of French army, 212.
- , Duke of (1785-1879), M. Guizot's letter to, v. 40, 41; arranges treaty of 1845 between France and England, 100.
- BROKE, Lord Willoughby de, in command of troops of Henry VII. in Brittany, ii. 93.
- BROMLEY, Secretary of State to Queen Anne, iv. 90.
- BROMPTON, Lady, Perkin Warbeck travels in her suite, ii. 101.
- BRONTË, Charlotte, English novelist, v. 169.
- BROOK, Lord, receives command of regiment in Parliamentary army, iii. 25; at battle of Brentford, 28.
- BROUGHAM, Lord, Henry (1779-1868), his inquiry into Holy Alliance, iv. 403; advocate of Queen Caroline, 407; his speech in her defence, 408-409; chancellor in Lord Grey's cabinet, 1830, 429; account of debate on Reform Bill of 1831, 432; interview with William IV., 434, 435; does not take office in Melbourne's cabinet, 455; attacked by opposition in Parliament, v. 19; his reproach to Melbourne's ministry, 21, 22; opposition to use Hyde Park for the Exhibition, 139.
- BROWN, General, Presbyterian leader, iii. 129.
- , Sir GEORGE, his report in favor of invasion of Crimea, v. 187; at battle of Inkerman, 212.
- , JOHN, his attempt at Harper's Ferry, v. 317; his execution, 318.
- BROWNING, ELIZABETH BARRETT, English poet, v. 169.
- , ROBERT, English poet, v. 169.
- BROWNISTS, the, their use as a sect, ii. 358; persecuted by Presbyterians, iii. 41. See Independents.
- BRUCE, EDWARD, brother of King Robert, at battle of Bannockburn, i. 278; invades Ireland and is crowned king; defeated and killed at Fagher, 279.
- BRUCE, FREDERICK, brother of Lord Elgin, appointed minister to China, v. 308; his instructions, 308, 309; attempts to force his way to Peking, 309; attack on his conduct, 310.
- , JAMES, his travels in Abyssinia, v. 377.
- , NIGEL, younger brother of Robert Bruce, put to death, i. 269.
- , ROBERT, Norman knight, i. 141.
- , ROBERT. See Scotland, Sovereigns of.
- BRUEYS, Admiral, defeated by Nelson at the battle of Aboukir (1798); his death, iv. 343.
- BRUGES, truce concluded at, between France and England, i. 336; surrenders to Duke of Burgundy, (1708), iv. 58; given up to allies, 59.
- BRUMAIRE, the 18th, (Nov. 9th, 1800), date of Bonaparte's overthrow of the Directory, iv. 344.
- BRUNSWICK, pillaged by Marshal Richelieu, iv. 195; recovered in part from the French by Ferdinand of Brunswick, 196.
- , CAROLINE of. See Caroline of Brunswick.
- , Duke of (1735-1806), commander-in-chief of Austrian and Prussian armies in France, iv. 322; refuses command of Anglo-Dutch army, 327.
- , Prince FERDINAND of, in command of George II.'s army in Germany, iv. 196; defeats the French at Crevelt, 197; at Minden, 1759, 210.
- BRUOT, Admiral, governor of Tahiti, his conduct in regard to Pritchard, v. 106.
- BRUSSELS, evacuated by Villeroi, iv. 55; taken possession of by Marlborough, 56; retaken by French, 327; allied armies assembled at, 1815, 401.
- BRYDON, Dr., brings news of disaster at Koord Cabul, v. 53.
- BUCER, MARTIN, heretic, disinterred and burned, ii. 260.
- BUCHAN, Countess of, a fugitive with Robert Bruce, i. 268.
- , Earl of, John Stuart (1380-1424), appointed Constable of France by the Dauphin, i. 405; besieges Cosne, 406; attacks Crevant, ii. 15; loses an eye, 16.
- BUCHANAN, GEORGE, tutor of James VI., ii. 320; his History of Scotland, 364.
- BUCKHURST, Lord, announces her sentence to Mary Stuart, ii. 330.
- BUCKINGHAM, Duke of (Stafford), allied with Richard III., ii. 72, 73; accomplishes his succession to the throne, 76; conspires in favor of Edward V., 77; supports Earl of Richmond, 78, 79; beheaded (1483), 79.
- , Duke of (Stafford), accused of treason, ii. 137; executed (1521), 138.
- , Duke of, George Villiers (1592-1628), favorite of James I., ii. 396; his influence with the king and Prince Charles, 397; conduct toward Bacon, 399; malversations, 399-400; favors Gujana Expedition, 400; letter to Spanish ambassador, 401; his part - in the disgrace of Bacon, 404; abandons him, 405; accompanies Prince Charles in his expedition to Spain, 407; responsible for his failure, 408; ceases to favor Charles' marriage with the Infanta, 409; his parting with Olivarez; his efforts to break off the alliance, 410; opposition of Parliament to; his disastrous expedition to, 414; advises convocation of Parliament, 415; assassinated, 416.

- BUCKINGHAM, Duke of, George Villiers (1627-1688), iii. 145; member of Cabal ministry, 205; in favor of French Alliance, 267; secret treaty with France concealed from, 268; ambassador to the Hague, 269; follows Shaftesbury into opposition, 271; in favor of dissolution of Parliament, 275.
- , Duke of, in Sir Robert Peel's cabinet; resigns, v. 67.
- BUCKINGHAMSHIRE, Lord, retires with Lord Sidmouth, iv. 367.
- BUCKNER, Admiral, sends detachment to arrest Parker, the mutineer, iv. 337.
- BUDDHISTS in India revolt against English, v. 240.
- BUEN RETIRO, royal palace at Madrid, occupied by first Pretender, iv. 116.
- BUGEAUD, Marshal, governor-general of Algeria, v. 108, 109, 110; quoted, 186.
- BULLER, CHARLES, prepares Lord Durham's report, v. 19.
- BULL RUN, battle of, v. 324; its effect on the North, 325.
- BULWER, Sir HENRY, English ambassador at Madrid, v. 114; his resignation, 120; foments revolutionary press in Madrid, 123; ambassador to Constantinople, 315.
- BULWER LYTTON. See Lord Lytton.
- BUNKER HILL, battle of, iv. 238.
- BUNYAN, JOHN, opposes Declaration of Indulgence, iii. 334, 335.
- BUOL, Count, representative of Austria at Congress of Vienna, v. 178.
- BURDETT, Sir FRANCIS (1770-1844), in opposition to Pitt, iv. 338.
- BURGH, HUBERT de, defends Dover against barons, i. 219, 221; shares power with Pierre des Roches, 223; accusations against him, 224; his arrest, imprisonment in the Tower and escape, 225.
- BURGOS, unsuccessful siege of, by Wellington, iv. 396.
- BURGOYNE, General, British commander in America, defeated by Gates, surrenders at Saratoga, iv. 246.
- BURGUNDIANS, faction of Duke of Burgundy, i. 375, 384; enter Paris, 395; massacre Armagnacs, 396; capture Montrebeau, 402; discontent with their English allies, 403; besiege Compiègne, ii. 29.
- BURGUNDY, Duchy of, refuses oath of fidelity to Henry V, i. 401; invaded by Germans, ii. 147; secured to children of Mary Tudor, 248.
- , ANNE of. See Anne of Burgundy.
- , Bastard of, at court of England, ii. 57.
- , Duchess of, Maria Adelaide of Savoy, iv. 41; her death, 69.
- , Duke of, John the Fearless, uncle of Charles VI. of France, i. 364; assassinates Duke of Orleans, all-powerful in France, his struggle with Armagnacs, 375; his temporary reconciliation with them, 376; begins to incline toward English, quoted, 394; releases the queen, 395; enters Paris in triumph, 396; his negotiations with Henry V., his treaty with the Dauphin, i. 398; his murder by the Armagnacs, 399, 400; his character, 400.
- BURGUNDY, Duke of, Philip, as Count of Charolais, i. 392; his negotiations with Henry V., 400, 401; procures their acceptance, 401; carries his father's body to Dijon, 403; demands justice on his murderers, 404; allied with Henry V., 406; his treaty with Bedford and Brittany, ii. 15; assists Duke of Brabant, 19; recognized as heir by Jacqueline of Hainault, 20; consults Bedford as to surrender of Orleans, 22; in command of allied forces, 29; returns to Flanders, master of Brabant, 30; separates himself more and more from England, 35; relieved of his oaths to England by Congress of Arras, ii. 36; declares war against England, 37; refuses to receive Margaret of Anjou, 55; his death, 57.
- , Duke of, Charles the Bold, as Count of Charolais, seeks Margaret of York in marriage, ii. 57; anger at Louis XI., 59; assists Edward IV., 61; fails to keep his agreement, 66; his death at battle of Nancy (1477), 68.
- , Duke of, Louis, (1682-1712), grandson of Louis XIV., married to Marie Adelaide of Savoy, iv. 41; captures Ghent, 58; his death, 69.
- , Mary of. See Mary of Burgundy.
- BURLEIGH. See Cecil.
- BURKE, Colonel, Fenian leader, commutation of sentence, v. 371.
- , EDMUND (1730-1797), private secretary to Lord Rockingham, iv. 227; his criticism of Chatham's ministry, 228; account of reception in Parliament of Lord North's American bills, 247; supports petitions for economical reform, 254; defends bill in favor of Catholics, 256; attack on North's ministry, 267, 268; paymaster of the forces in Rockingham's second cabinet, 269; opposes Parliamentary reform, 270; conducts inquiry into conduct of Warren Hastings, 290; bitter adversary of Hastings, 291; his accusation of Hastings, 292; opening speech on impeachment, 292, 293; separates from Fox, 293; supports Fox's Indian Bill, 296; eulogy of Fox, 296, 297; advocates abolition of slave-trade, 308; letter on French liberty, 315; severe judgment of opening measures of French Revolution, 316; breach with Fox on question of French Constitution, 317-319; letter to agent of French emigrants, 319; "Letters on Regicide Peace," 329, 330; pension granted to him, 330; letter to Pitt, 330, 331; death, 338.
- BURLEY, Sir SIMON, tutor of Richard II., executed, i. 351.
- BURNET, Bishop, Gilbert (1643-1715), quoted on Catholicism of Mary Tudor, ii. 237; his "History," iii. 261; quoted on the Plague, 261, 262; on interview of Louis XIV. and Montague, 275, 276; on murder of Godfrey, 279; criticism of Stafford, 285, 286; quoted on Charles II.'s dissolution of Parliament, 287; present at execution of Lord Russell, 294; interview with Mary, Princess of Orange, 344, 345; translates manifesto of Prince of Orange, 349; conversation with Halifax, 354; informs Danby of Mary's intentions as to government, 363; conversations with William III., 380, 381; becomes Bishop of Salisbury, 381; memoirs quoted, 393; declares William's ignorance of purport of order for destruction of the Macdonalds, 395; at deathbed of Queen Mary, 408; tutor of Duke of Gloucester, iv. 37; at deathbed of William III., 47.

BURNEY, FRANCES, account of interview of Thurlow and Pitt with the king, iv. 311.

—, Dr., his lecture on the Corn-Law, v. 69.

BURTON, Nonconformist, arrested, iii. 421; his sentence, 422.

—, JAMES, concerned in plots against James II., iii. 321.

BUSSY-CASTELNAU, lieutenant at Dupleix in India, iv. 204; his campaign in the Deccan, 206; retaliation upon English, 207; joins Lally-Tollendal, taken prisoner, 208; in Gondelcur, relieved by De Suffren, 272.

BUTE, John Stuart, Marquis of, favorite of George III., iv. 211; becomes secretary of state, 215; forced upon violent measures by public opinion, 218; concludes peace with France, 219; calls Henry Fox to his aid against Pitt, 220; resigns, 221; his unpopularity, 226, 227; his influence favorite theme for pamphleteers, 229.

BUTLER, General, commander of Parliamentary army, iii. 230.

—, SAMUEL, English poet, iii. 301.

BUTLERS, the, Irish clan, ii. 202, 347.

BYNG, Admiral, in command of English fleet at Minorca, defeated by Galissonière, iv. 191; retreats to Gibraltar, is recalled to England and executed (1757), 192.

—, Sir GEORGE. See Torrington.

BYRNE, Irish conspirator, iv. 340.

BYRON, Sir JOHN, governor of the Tower, ii. 448, iii. 17.

—, Lord (1788-1824), v. 161.

C.

CABAL, the. See Cabinets.

CABINETS :—

Aberdeen's, Coalition (1852-1855), v. 147-217.

Addington's, Tory (1801-1804), iv. 348, 362.

Bolingbroke's (1714), iv. 88, 90.

Bute's, Tory (1761-1763), iv. 218-221.

"Cabal," (1667-1673), iii. 265-271.

Carteret's, Earl Granville (1741-1744), iv. 138, 151-153.

Chatham's, Tory (1756-1760), iv. 138-217; second (1766-1768), 227-229.

Derby's, Tory (1852), v. 146, 147; second

CABINETS (continued) :—

(1858-1859), 286-299; third (1866-1868), 363-375.

Disraeli's, Tory (1868), v. 375-383.

Gladstone's, Liberal (1868-1874), v. 383; iv. 108.

Goderich's, Coalition (1827-1828), iv. 417.

Godolphin, Whig (1702), iv. 80.

Grafton's, Whig (1768-1770), iv. 229.

Grenville's (George), Whig (1763-1765), iv. 221-227.

Grenville's (Lord), All the Talents (1806-1807), iv. 376-381.

Grey's, Whig (1830-1834), iv. 429-447, v. 148.

Harley's (1710-1714), iv. 83-88.

Liverpool's, Tory (1812-1827), iv. 393.

Melbourne's, Whig (1835-1841), iv. 455, v. 60.

North's, Tory (1770-1782), iv. 229-269.

North and Fox, Coalition, Duke of Portland, premier (1783), iv. 281-292.

Palmerston's Whig (1855-1858), v. 217-286; second (1859-1865), 299-349.

Peel's, Tory (1834-1835), iv. 451-455; second (1841-1846), v. 60-86.

Pelham's (Henry), Whig (1744-1756), iv. 138.

Perceval's, Tory (1709-1812), iv. 393-397.

Pitt's (William), Tory (1783-1801), iv. 298-348; second (1804-1806), 362-375.

Pitt and Newcastle, Coalition (1757-1761), iv. 217.

Portland's, Tory (1807-1809), iv. 381.

Rockingham's, Whig (1765-1766), iv. 227; second (1782), 269-281.

Russell's, Whig (1846-1852), v. 115-146; second (1865-1866), 351-363.

Shelburne's, Whig (1782-1783), 269-281.

Shrewsbury's (1714), iv. 190.

Sunderland's, Charles Spencer (1718-1721), iv. 113-125.

Sunderland's, Robert Spencer (1686-1688), iii. 307-350.

Walpole's, Whig (1721-1741), iv. 125-150.

Wellington's, Tory (1828-1830), iv. 417-429.

CABOT, JOHN, discoverer of Canada, ii. 112, 113.

—, LEWIS, son of the above, ii. 112.

—, SANCHO, son of John Cabot, ii. 112.

—, SEBASTIAN, discoverer of Canada, ii. 112, 113.

CABUL, kingdom of. See Afghanistan.

—, capital of Afghanistan, Shah Shooja installed in, v. 48; popular insurrection against English in, 49; capitulation of the English in, 50; Shah Shooja assassinated in, 53.

CADE, JACK, his insurrection in reign of Henry VI., ii. 41, 42.

CADIZ, taken by Earl of Essex, burned, ii. 345; Jacobite squadron armed at, iv. 116; French fleet seized at, 1385.

—, Duke of, son of Francisco de Paula, proposals for his marriage with Isabella of Spain, v. 119; his claims supported by France, 121; his marriage with Isabella announced by the Cortes, 122; celebrated at Madrid, 123.

CADOGAN, General (William, Earl of Cado-

- gan), sent against insurgents of 1715, iv. 105.
- CAEN, church of St. Stephen's at, burial-place of the Conqueror, i. 119; replaced by Edward III., 305; by Henry V., 395; regained by France, ii. 40.
- CAERMARTHEN, Marquis of (Sir Thomas Osborne, Lord Danby), minister to Charles II., iii. 274; connives at treaty with France, negotiates marriage of Princess Mary, 275; impeached, 277; his letter to Prince of Orange, 345; signs invitation to him, 346; in favor of proclamation of Princess Mary, 362, 363; becomes member of William's privy council, 368; entrusted with government in the King's absence, 379; bearer of Act of Grace to Parliament, 381; letter of Queen Mary to, v. 30. See Leeds.
- , PEREGRINE, Marquis of, iii. 394; leads attack on Brest, 405.
- CAHORS, attacked by Thomas à Becket, i. 155.
- CAILLEMOTTE, M. de, brother of Marquis of Ruigny, in command of Huguenots at battle of the Boyne, iii. 383; his death, 384.
- CAIRNS, Lord, proposes amendment to Disraeli's Reform Bill, v. 368.
- CAIRO, its surrender to English (1801), iv. 354.
- CAJETAN, Cardinal, speech in favor of Adrian of Tortosa, i. 142.
- CALABRIA, Normans established at, i. 126.
- CALAIS, besieged by Edward III., i. 311, 313, 317; captured, 318; peace of Bretigny ratified at, 329; last English possession in France, ii. 40; Henry VIII. lands in, 122; recovered by France, 262; captured by Archduke Albert, 344.
- CALCUTTA, captured by Surajah Dowlah, iv. 205; sufferings of English prisoners in "Black Hole," 206; retaken by Clive, 206; supreme court established at, 286; anxiety at, on outbreak of the Indian Mutiny, v. 245, 246.
- CALDERWOOD, banished for opposition to Episcopacy, ii. 398.
- CALEDONIANS, early inhabitants of Scotland, attacked by Agricola, i. 23; invade the Roman province of Britain, 24, 25; yield their place to the Picts, 26.
- CALVERLEY, Sir JOHN, abandons Henry of Transtamare, i. 332.
- CALVIN, Knox's confession of faith founded on his doctrines, ii. 277.
- CAMALODUNUM, Roman colony in Britain, i. 21.
- CAMBRAY, delivered from Spaniards by Duke of Anjou, ii. 318; taken by Archduke of Austria, 344.
- CAMBRESIS, ravaged by Edward III., i. 128.
- CAMBRIA (see Wales), i. 33.
- CAMBRIDGE, Earl of, marries daughter of Peter the Cruel, i. 332. See Edmund, Duke of York.
- , Earl of, marries sister of young Earl of March, i. 362; conspires to place him on the throne, is executed (1415), 386.
- , University of, letter of Latimer concerning, ii. 192; eight colleges founded at (1494-1584), 363; protected by Cromwell, iii. 173; opposition of its dignitaries to James II., 336; privileges restored, 349; religious test for admission suppressed, v. 407.
- CAMDEN, Lord, Sir Charles Pratt (1714-1797), Lord Chief Justice, iv. 221; pronounces acquittal of Wilkes, 222, 223; member of Chatham's cabinet, 229; prediction as to American independence, 233; entrusted by Pitt with direction of House of Lords, 310.
- , Marquis of, John Pratt (1759-1840), son of Charles Pratt, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1798), iv. 333.
- CAMERON, Captain, his captivity in Abyssinia, v. 377.
- of Lochiel, DONALD, is persuaded by Charles Edward to support his cause, iv. 158, 159; wounds himself in crossing the border, 166; wounded at Culloden, 174.
- of Lochiel, Sir EVAN, takes oath of allegiance to William III.'s government, iii. 395.
- , RICHARD, Scotch preacher, killed in insurrection against Charles II. (1680), iii. 289.
- CAMERONIANS, in Scotland, effect of Presbyterian triumph upon, iii. 389.
- CAMERONS, clan of, in favor of James II., iii. 375; first to join Charles Edward, 159; at battle of Prestonpans, 160.
- CAMISARDS, insurrection of, in France (1704), iv. 52.
- CAMP OF REFUGE, Hereward's camp in Isle of Ely, i. 111; destroyed, 112.
- CAMPBELL, Captain, of Glenlyon, massacres the Macdonalds of Glencoe, iii. 396.
- , Sir COLIN, in command at Balaklava, v. 202; at storming of the Redan, 231; appointed to command of Indian army, 257; his arrival in India, 258; at Lucknow, 263, 266; transfers garrison of Lucknow to the Alumbagh, 267; defeats Tantia Topce at Cawnpore, 268; made Lord Clyde, announces end of the mutiny, 271.
- CAMPBELLS, the, clan of Argyle, iii. 310, 311, 375; hereditary hatred for the Macdonalds of Glencoe, 395.
- CAMPEGGIO, Cardinal, sent to England, ii. 157; procrastinates, 158; adjourns tribunal, 159; leaves England, 160.
- CAMPERDOWN, naval battle of, iv. 338.
- CAMPES, treaty of (1546), ii. 210.
- CAMPION, Jesuit priest, executed, ii. 321.
- CAMPO FORMIO, peace of (1797), iv. 334.
- CANADA, war between French and English in, iv. 188, 189; invaded by the English (1757), 198, 199; Wolfe's capture of Quebec, 200, 201; attempted recapture of Quebec by the French, 201; Montreal falls into the hands of the English, 202; Pitt's bill on administration of, 317; invaded by United States army in 1812, 398; characteristics of the population of its two divisions, v. 17; revolt in reign of Victoria, 17, 18; Lord Durham made governor of, 18; his report basis for reforms in its constitution, 19; Fenian attempts against, 370; reorganization of, 375.
- CANDIA, offered to England by the czar, v. 175.

- CANDLEMAS, Burnt, name given to expedition of Edward III. into Scotland, i. 321.
- CANGI, British tribe, i. 19.
- CANNING, CHARLES, Lord, succeeds Dalhousie as governor-general of India (1855), v. 243; his administration during the mutiny, 245; measures to obtain reinforcements, 246; moderation during the mutiny, 266; confiscation of territory of Ondh, 273; Ellenborough's attack on his policy, 274; success of his measures, 275, 276; his death (1862), 279.
- , GEORGE (1770-1827), his fidelity to Pitt, iv. 351; member of Pitt's second cabinet, 363; his displeasure at Pitt's reconciliation with Addington, 365; attacks measures of government in regard to Prussia and Russia, 380; his treaty with Junta of Seville, 389; duel with Castle-reagh, resigns, 393; his Roman Catholic Relief Bill, 413; speech in support of it, 413, 414; opposes Parliamentary reform, 415; succeeds Castlereagh, as foreign secretary, 416; his death, 417; influence on Catholics in Ireland, 420; his refusal to take possession of Tahiti, v. 105.
- , Lady, wife of Charles (Lord Canning), her death, v. 245.
- CANROBERT, General, surveys coast near Sebastopol, v. 187; succeeds St. Arnaud in command of French army, 199; present at battle of Inkerman, 211; resigns command (1855), 221; letter to Vaillant, 221, 222.
- CANTERBURY, Archbishops of:—
- ANSELM, expelled from England, i. 126; his justice toward the Saxons, 127; courted by Henry I., 128.
- ARUNDEL, accuses Lord Cobham, 381; death, 382.
- AUGUSTINE, first archbishop, missionary to the Saxons, i. 34-37.
- BECKET, THOMAS à, story of his birth, i. 153; magnificence as chancellor of England, 154; respect for royal prerogative, 155; change of manners upon becoming Archbishop of Canterbury, 156; defends privileges of the clergy, 157; refuses to sign Constitutions of Clarendon, 158; is sentenced to fine, 158; appears before council at Southampton, 159-161; escapes to France, 161; reception by the pope, 162; his friends proscribed by Henry II., 163; at conference of Montmirail, 164; reconciled with Louis VII., 165; his office usurped, 165; reconciliation with Henry, 165, 166; returns to England, 166, 167; excommunicates Henry's favorites, 167; interview with conspirators, 168, 169; his courage, 169, 170; his murder, 170; spoliation of his tomb, ii. 191.
- BOURCHIER, crowns Henry VII., ii. 85.
- BONIFACE, in reign of Henry III., i. 226.
- CHICHELEY, ardent against heresy, i. 382; causes execution of Cobham, 383.
- CORBOIS, WILLIAM, in favor of election of Stephen (1135), i. 138.
- CRANMER, THOMAS, chaplain to Henry VIII., writes in favor of his divorce, ii.
- CANTERBURY, Archbishops of (continued): 166; secret marriage, 167; declares nullity of Henry's first marriage, 170; of his second marriage, 184; endeavors to save some part of monastic institutions, 192; dares not protest against persecutions, 193; his influence defeated, 195; informs against Catherine Howard, 198; his subservency, 202; at deathbed of Henry, 214; member of Privy Council of Edward VI., 218; controversy with Gardiner, 232, 233; introduces liturgy, 233, 234; measures against obstinate prelates, 234, 235; signs sentence of Northumberland, 243; sent to the Tower, 244; kept there on charge of heresy, 245, 246; his argument with the doctors, 256; his abjurations, 258; death, 259; his efforts to promote learning, 363.
- DUNSTAN, Abbot of Glastonbury, i. 64; influence over Edgar, 63; character, 66; crowns Ethelred the Unready (978), 67.
- ELPHEGE, i. 72; murdered by the Danes, 73.
- ETHELNOTH, refuses to crown Harold Harefoot, i. 80.
- FITZ-ALAN, brother of Lord Arundel, banished by Richard II., i. 353, returns to England with Bolingbroke, 356.
- GRINDALL (1575), his translation of the Bible, ii. 357.
- HOWLEY, WILLIAM (1765-1848), goes to announce her accession to Victoria, v. 14.
- HUBERT, sent to England by John, to assemble the barons, i. 203; declares the crown to belong to the worthiest claimant, 204.
- LANFRANC, sent to Rome by William the Conqueror, i. 94; suppresses Norman insurrection in England, 112, 113; desired by the Conqueror to crown William Rufus, 118; administers oath to Rufus, 120; his death (1089), 121.
- LANGTON, Cardinal STEPHEN, nominated by Innocent III. (1207), i. 207; sent to Philip Augustus, 209. joins English barons, 211; presents to them charter of Henry I., 211, 212; fidelity to their cause, 213; head of deputation to King John, 214; at Runnymede, 215; goes to Rome, 216; fails in his mission, 217.
- LAUD, minister of Charles I.; his character, ii. 418; commissioner of the treasury, 418, 419; enrolls Anglican church in service of the king, 419; his severity to non-conformists; zeal for supremacy of Anglican church, 420; consequences of his measures; fails to suppress Independents, 421; enforces Anglican liturgy in Scotland, 423, 424; assembling of Parliament fatal to him, 428; imprisoned in the Tower, 430; his farewell to Stratford, 437; summoned before bar of the Lords, iii. 41; condemned and executed (1645), 56.
- MORTON, prime minister of Henry VII., ii. 105; his death, 111.
- ONO, i. 64; at head of austere party of the church, 65.

- CANTERBURY, Archbishops of (continued):—
- PARKER, MATTHEW (1504–1575), reprimands the Commons, ii. 308, 309; his translation of the Bible, 357.
- POLE, REGINALD, ii. 177; his attack upon Henry VIII., 178; made cardinal and papal legate, 189; unsuccessful mission, 190; revenge of Henry on his family, 193, 194; excepted from amnesty, 220; projected marriage with Queen Mary, 246; legate to England, 253; endeavors to moderate Mary's zeal against heretics, 255; made archbishop, 260; opposes war with France, 261; death, 264.
- RICH, EDMUND, in reign of Henry III., i. 225; excommunicates all who violate English charters, 229.
- ROBERT of Jumièges, in reign of Edward the Confessor, i. 85–94.
- SANCROFT, at death-bed of Charles II., iii. 297; refuses to sit in Court of High Commission, 331; draws up petition against Declaration of Indulgence, 338; enthusiasm of the people for him, 341; his conversation with James II., 351; resigns his seat in the council, 356; in favor of regency, 362; his refusal to take the oath, 407.
- SIMON of Sudbury, killed in the Tower by mob under Wat Tyler, i. 347.
- STIGAND, chosen in opposition to Robert of Jumièges, i. 94; endeavors to organize Saxon army, 106; swears fidelity to the Conqueror, 107; in Normandy, 108.
- STRATFORD, president of council of Edward III. i. 298.
- TENISON, in reign of William and Mary, announces her approaching death to the Queen, iii. 408; at death-bed of William III., iv. 47.
- THEOBALD, papal legate, i. 147; negotiates peace between Stephen and Prince Henry, 148; patron of Becket, 154; death, 155.
- TILLOTSON, JOHN (1630–1694), at execution of Lord William Russell, iii. 294; defence of Anglican church, 334; death, 406, 407; popularity, 407.
- WARHAM, in reign of Henry VIII., his letter to Wolsey, ii. 150.
- WHITGIFT (1530–1604), at deathbed of Queen Elizabeth, ii. 355; his struggle with the Puritans, ii. 358.
- WINCHELSEA, leader of resistance of clergy to Edward I., i. 256; joins barons against Gaveston, 274.
- , archiepiscopal see, founded, i. 36; Henry II.'s pilgrimage to, 171; cathedral of, the Black Prince buried at, 337.
- , battle of, i. 41.
- CANTON, East India Company's establishment at, authorized, v. 45; opened to British traders, 46; taken by English, 1858, 307.
- CANUTE, proclaimed King of England, i. 74; divides the kingdom with Edmund Ironsides, 75; becomes King of all England (1016), 75; marries widow of Ethelred, 75; England under his rule, 76; anecdotes of, 76, 77; his death (1036), 77.
- CAPE BRETON, island of, surrendered to France by Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, iv. 181.
- CAPEL, Lord, in army of Prince of Wales (Charles II.), iii. 64; joins him in Scilly Isles, 72; tried by High Court of Justice 123; executed, 123.
- CAPTAN Pasha, High-Admiral of Turkish fleet, v. 34.
- CARACALLA, Roman emperor, concludes a peace with the Caledonians, i. 25.
- CARACTACUS, British chief, i. 18–20.
- CARAUSIUS, general in Britain, appointed Cæsar, i. 25.
- CARBERY HILL, Mary Stuart meets insurgents at, ii. 291.
- CARDENAS, DON ALONZO de, Spanish Ambassador to England, iii. 149, 152; 154, 169; returns to Spain, 174.
- CARDIFF, castle of, Robert Curthose imprisoned at, i. 131.
- CARDIGAN, Earl of, in command of Light Brigade at Balaklava, v. 202; his account of Lord Lucan's order, 205; leads the charge, 205–207.
- CARDWELL, Irish secretary in Lord Palmerston's second ministry, v. 301; secretary of war in Gladstone's cabinet, his plan for reconstruction of the army, 404.
- CARENTAN, taken by Edward III., i. 304.
- CAREW, SIR ALEXANDER, governor of St. Nicholas, iii. 56; executed (1645), 57.
- , SIR PETER, takes arms to oppose Philip II., ii. 248; is defeated, 249.
- CAREY, SIR ROBERT, carries news of Elizabeth's death to James I., ii. 383.
- CARFINNY, ancient title of Irish chiefs, i. 172.
- CARGILL, DONALD, executed for revolt against Charles II., iii. 289.
- CARISBROOK CASTLE, Charles I. takes refuge at, iii. 95.
- CARLETON, SIR GUY, appointed to command of British troops in America, his attempt to negotiate with Congress, iv. 276.
- CARLISLE, taken by Parliamentarians, iii. 65; by Charles Edward, iv. 166; surrendered royal troops, 169.
- , Earl of, brother-in-law of Sir John Fenwick, iv. 22.
- , fortress of, Mary Stuart imprisoned at, ii. 294.
- CARLISTS, insurrection of, in Spain (1833), iv. 450.
- CARLOS, DON (1545–1568), son of Philip II. and Isabella of Portugal, ii. 248; proposed by his father as husband for Mary Stuart, 282.
- , Don, son of Philip V. and Elizabeth Farnese, iv. 132.
- , Don, claims throne of Spain on death of his brother Ferdinand VII., iv. 450; embarks for England, 451.
- CARLOTTA, DOÑA, sister of Christina of Sweden, v. 121.
- , Empress, wife of Maximilian of Austria, v. 337; becomes insane, 339.
- CARLOVINGIANS, i. 68.
- CARLYLE, THOMAS (1795–1881), v. 162.
- CARNATIC, Indian province, iv. 203; war between the French and English in, 289.

- CARNARVON, Lord, member of Derby's cabinet of 1866, resigns, v. 366.
- CARNWATH, ROBERT, Earl of, in Royalist army at Naseby, iii. 62.
- , ROBERT, Earl of, condemned for high treason (1715), his pardon, iv. 108.
- CAROLINA, North, discovered by Sir Walter Raleigh, ii. 361; joins Southern Confederacy, v. 322.
- , South, member of Southern Confederacy, v. 320; fires on Fort Sumter, 321.
- CAROLINAS, the, Sir Henry Clinton rallies the Royalists in, iv. 258.
- CAROLINE, Princess of Anspach, wife of George II., her character, iv. 138; influence over the king, 139; persuades him to retain Sir Robert Walpole, 139, 140; her reception of Lady Walpole, 140; friendship for Walpole, 142, 147; death (1737), 147.
- , of Brunswick (1768-1821), wife of George IV., her name erased from the liturgy, iv. 406, 407; reception in England, 407; trial, 408, 409; gains her cause, 409, 410; refused admittance to Westminster Abbey, her death, 411.
- CARPENTER, General, serves against insurgents of 1715, iv. 100.
- CARR, ROBERT, favorite of James I., made Viscount Rochester, ii. 394. See Rochester.
- CARRICK CASTLE, capture of, by Bruce (1307), i. 269.
- CARRICK-FERGUS, taken possession of by Schomberg, iii. 378; William III. lands at, 382.
- CARTER, Rear Admiral, at battle of La Hogue, iii. 399, 400.
- CARTERET, JOHN, Viscount (1690-1763), quoted, iv. 110; secretary of state, his rivalry with Walpole and Townshend, 129; secretary of state, 138; driven from office by Robert Walpole, 140; his attack upon Walpole, 148; forms cabinet, becomes Lord Granville, 151; his character, 151, 152; resigns, 153.
- CARTHAGENA, attacked by Admiral Vernon, iv. 148.
- CARTISMANTUA, British queen, i. 19.
- CARTWRIGHT, THOMAS, excluded from his professorship for non-conformity, ii. 308.
- CASSI, a British tribe, i. 16.
- CASSITERIDES, Scilly Isles, i. 13.
- CASSIVELANUS, commander-in-chief of the Britons against Cæsar, i. 16-18.
- CASTANOS, General, supports the Bourbons in Spain against the Bonapartes, iv. 385.
- CASTELMELHOR, Count, iii. 297.
- CASTILE, Sovereigns of:—
- ALPHONSO X., threatens Guienne, i. 229.
- PETER IV., the Cruel (1334-1369), begs assistance of the Black Prince, i. 331; gains victory at Navarette, 332; regains his throne, his death, 333.
- HENRY of Transtamare (1333-1379), gains the throne through assistance of Charles V. of France, i. 331; is defeated at Navarette, 332; kills his brother Peter the Cruel, 333; strengthens his alliance with France, 335.
- CASTILE, sovereigns of (continued):—
- ISABELLA the Catholic (1451-1504), wife of Ferdinand of Aragon, ii. 110; assists Columbus, 112; death, 114.
- , ELEANOR of. See Eleanor of Castile.
- , JOANNA of. See Joanna of Castile.
- CASTILLON, Charles VII. besieges, ii. 44.
- CASTLEMAINE, BARBARA, Lady, iii. 261.
- , Roger Palmer, Lord, English ambassador to the pope, iii. 335.
- CASTLEREAGH, Viscount (1769-1822), assists Cornwallis in restoring order in Ireland (1798), iv. 340; efforts in favor of union with England, 341; his bill passed, 343; in favor of Catholic emancipation, 345; member of Pitt's second cabinet, 363; minister of war in 1807, 381; sends reinforcements to Spain, 385; duel with Canning, 393; attacks of opposition upon, 403; opposes production of Holy Alliance, 404; demands of Queen Caroline, 407; predicts popular reaction, 411; his foreign policy resembles that of Metternich, 413; becomes Lord Londonderry, his suicide, 415; character, 415, 416.
- CASTRIES, M. de, sent to relief of Wesel, iv. 212.
- CATEAU-CAMBRÉSIS, treaty of, ii. 272.
- CATESBY, ROBERT, his plot against James I. and Parliament, ii. 387; accomplices and designs, 388, 389; is betrayed, 388-390; his death, 390.
- CATHCART, SIR GEORGE, at battle of Inkerman, v. 212.
- , William Schaw, first Earl of (1755-1843), in command with Wellesley of expedition to Denmark (1807), iv. 382.
- CATHARINE of Aragon (1483-1536), marries Prince Arthur, ii. 110; marries Henry VIII., ii. 118; her letter to him, 126; aunt of Charles V., 133; Henry's neglect of, 133; his schemes for annulling his marriage with, 154; temporarily restored to favor, 157; her entreaties to Henry, 158; her appeal to the pope, 159; political importance of her divorce, 166; her resistance to Henry, 170; her title of queen withdrawn, 171; her death, 181.
- of Braganza (1638-1705), her marriage with Charles II., iii. 259; unable to appear at his deathbed, 297.
- of France (1401-1437), daughter of Charles VI., asked in marriage by Henry V. of England, i. 383, 384, 398; married to him, 402; crowned at Westminster, 405; birth of her son, 406; accompanies her husband's body to England, ii. 13; marries Owen Tudor, 38; dies, 38.
- , Empress of Russia. See Russia.
- CATHERINE, Princess of Anhalt-Zerbst. See Russia, Sovereigns of.
- CATHOLIC Association, its work in Ireland, iv. 420, 421.
- Emancipation Bill, Peel's (1829), iv. 422-424.
- CATHOLICS. See Roman Catholics.
- CATINAT, Marshal, obtains possession of Nice, iii. 392; in command of French army in Italy, iv. 41.
- CATO Street Conspiracy, iv. 410.

- CATUS, Roman procurator, i. 21.
- CAUCHON, PETER, Bishop of Beauvais, claims Joan of Arc from Luxembourg, ii. 30; cause of his hatred of Joan, presides over council of Inquisition, 31; becomes Bishop of Lisieux, 35.
- CAVALIERS, name first used, ii. 446. See Royalists.
- CAVOUR, Count (1809-1861), his motive for taking part in Crimean war, v. 218; Napoleon's engagements with, 282; his foresight, 301; obtains alliance of Napoleon in behalf of Italian independence, 302; anxiety in Europe in regard to his policy, 303.
- CAVENDISH, chamberlain of Wolsey, ii. 165.
- , WILLIAM, Lord (1640-1707), afterwards Earl of Devonshire, retires from privy council on dismissal of Shaftesbury, iii. 282.
- CAWDOR, Lord, captures insurgents in Wales, iv. 334.
- CAWNPORE, siege and massacre of. See Indian mutiny.
- CEARLS, i. 57.
- CEAWLIN, Saxon king of Wessex, i. 35.
- CECIL, Sir ROBERT (Lord Cranborne and Earl of Salisbury), son of Lord Burleigh, ii. 343; negotiates for peace with Spain, 345; unable to replace his father, 346; enmity to Essex, 349; correspondence with King James, 353; at deathbed of Elizabeth, 355; management of the finances, 359; discourages the protective system, 360; secures the succession to James, 383; the new king at his house, 384; made treasurer, 392; his death and character, 393.
- , Sir WILLIAM, Lord Burleigh, (1520-1598), adviser of Elizabeth, ii. 242; his counsels to her, 263; her orders to him, 266; despatches couriers announcing her succession, 267; makes known her wishes to Parliament, 269; supports Protestant policy, 274; urges Elizabeth to aid Protestant insurgents in Scotland, 275; his action impeded by Elizabeth, 276; quoted, 278; his plan for marriage of Leicester, ii. 284; informs Elizabeth of the birth of Mary Stuart's son, 287; his policy toward Mary Stuart, 294; his assurances to Murray, 296; thwarts the scheme of Maitland, 297; his support of the Protestant cause, 298; his distrust of Norfolk, ii. 300; his toleration of the Puritans, 307; made Lord Burleigh, 312; convinced of the necessity of execution of Mary Stuart, 313; denies the charge of putting Campden to the torture, 321; his reason for desiring Mary's execution, 326; one of the commissioners appointed for her trial, 327; his disgrace after her execution, 336; desires vacant office of Walsingham for his son, 343; his death, 346.
- CELESTINE II. See Popes.
- , III. See Popes.
- CELLAMARE, Prince of, Spanish ambassador to France, his conspiracy against the Regent Orleans, iv. 116.
- CELTs, early inhabitants of Great Britain, i. 13, 18.
- CERDIC, first Saxon king of Wessex, i. 31.
- CEUTERA, Spanish ships destroyed at, iv. 118.
- CEYLON, retained by England in Peace of Amiens, iv. 354.
- CHABANNES, Comte de, at battle of Fontenoy, iv. 155.
- CHALGROVE, battle of, iii. 33.
- CHALLONER, executed for complicity in Royalist plot, iii. 33.
- CHALMERS, Dr., founder of Free Church of Scotland, v. 160.
- CHAMBER OF ACCOUNTS, assembled at Paris, i. 401.
- CHAMBERS, RICHARD, alderman of London, iii. 121.
- CHAMPAGNE, ravaged by English, i. 342; fortified by Napolcon, 1813, iv. 398.
- CHANDERNAGORE, captured by Clive, iv. 206; restored to France by treaty of Fontainebleau, 219.
- CHANDOS, Sir JOHN, his advice to the Black Prince at Poitiers, i. 324, 325.
- CHANNEL ISLANDS submit to the Commonwealth, iii. 149.
- “CHARACTER OF KING CROMWELL,” pamphlet, iii. 129.
- CHARIBERT, king of Paris, i. 35.
- CHARLEROI, restored by Louis XIV., at peace of Ryswick, iv. 23; taken by French, 179.
- CHARGNY, GEOFFREY de, betrayed by Aymerie of Pavia, i. 619.
- CHARLES I. as Prince, Catesby's design in favor of, ii. 389; negotiations for his marriage, 395; assumes title of Prince of Wales, 397; abandons Bacon, 405; negotiations for his marriage with Spanish Infanta, 406, 407; goes to Spain to win the Infanta, 407; his reception at Madrid, 408; recalled to England, 409; his marriage with Henrietta Maria arranged, 411; accession; difficulties with his first Parliament, ii. 413; dissolves second Parliament for attempt to impeach Buckingham; imposes ship-money, 414; his struggle with third Parliament; promises to grant Petition of Right, 415; evades it; makes Wentworth member of his council, 416; dissolves Parliament for contumacy, and endeavors to govern alone, 417; gives his confidence to Strafford and Laud, 418; inefficiency of his government; his alliance with the Church, 419; forbids emigration of Puritans, 421; resistance of Hampden to his collection of ship-money, 422; attempts to establish Anglicanism in Scotland, 422-424; prepares to enforce obedience, 424; concludes temporary peace with the Covenanters; letter to Louis XIII. falls into his hands, 425; convokes Short Parliament; his attempts at compromise, 426; dissolves Parliament; his army repulsed in Scotland, 427; forced to convoke Long Parliament, 428; reassures Strafford, 429; his intrigues with the army against Parliament, 431; attempts to save Strafford, 434, 435; letter of Strafford to him, 436; his last effort to save Strafford, 437; the increasing weakness of his position, 438;

his visit to Scotland, 439, 440; the object of his journey; his connection with Montrose, 440; compelled to favor Hamilton and Argyle, 441; entrusts Parliament with suppression of Irish insurrection, 442; his return to London, 444; receives remonstrance of Parliament; secures chiefs of royalist party in Parliament, 445, 446; approves action of bishops, 447; his conduct in regard to governorship of the Tower, 447, 448; refuses to grant guard, 448; orders accusation of the five members, iii. 13; his attempt to arrest them in the House, 14, 15; claims their surrender by the Common Council, 16; leaves London, 17; makes secret preparation for war, 18; promises redress of grievances; his reception of Petition of the Commons, 19; his concessions to Parliament, 20, 21; continued negotiations between him and the houses, 21; his unsuccessful attempt to secure Hull, 22; attended by Parliamentary committee at York; convokes assemblage on Hayworth Moor, 23; his poverty, 24; his reception of propositions of reconciliation, 24, 25; raises his standard at Nottingham, 25; final attempts at negotiation; his army at Shrewsbury, 26; advances on London, 27; fights the battle of Edgehill, 27, 28; in winter-quarters at Oxford, 29, 30; his negotiations with Parliamentary commissioners, 31, 32; declares the Long Parliament non-existent, 35; negotiations with Presbyterians and Independents, 42; concludes truce with Irish papists, 43; his desire to dissolve Parliament, 43, 44; convokes royalist Parliament at Oxford, 44; attempts to treat with Essex, 45; answer of Parliament to his letter, 46; besieged in Oxford, his escape, 48; is defeated at Marston Moor, 49, 50; attempts further negotiations with Essex, 51, 52; battle of Newbury, 53, 54; his reception of emissaries of Parliament, 54, 55; negotiations with Parliament at Uxbridge, 57; withdraws his concessions, 58; marches to relieve Oxford, 62, 63; is defeated at Naseby, 62, 63; his secret correspondence falls into the hands of Parliament, 63; wanderings after battle of Naseby, 64, 65; letter to Prince Rupert, 65, 66; anger at Rupert's surrender of Bristol, 67; reverses of his partisans in Scotland, 68; his unsuccessful overtures for peace, 69; treaty with Irish Papists discovered, 70; letter to Vane; offers to return to London, 72; gives himself up to the Scots, 73; his projected alliance with the Presbyterians, 74, 75; secret proposals to Glamorgan, 75, 76; urged to accept terms of Parliament, 76; the Scots agree to surrender him, 77; delivered to the English, 78; arrested by Joyce at Holmby, 82, 83; his reception by Fairfax, 83, 84; established at Newmarket, 84; accompanies the army, 86; rejects proposals of Cromwell, 87; his double-dealing with the army, 87, 88; letter to the army, 89; at Hampton Court, 90; his promises to Cromwell; his duplicity, 91; seizure of his letter to the queen, 91, 92; ominous change in his situation, 93; escapes to Isle of Wight, 94, 95; his letter to the generals, 97; concludes treaty with the Scots; unsuccessful attempt to escape from Carisbrooke, 98; risings in his favor, 100, 102; further negotiations with Parliament, 102, 103; his letters to Ormond and Hopkins, 103; removed to Hurst Castle, 103, 104; to Windsor, 105, 106; his impeachment voted by Parliament, 106; court appointed for his trial, 107; removal to St. James's Palace, 108; his trial, 108-113; treatment by the soldiers: interview with Juxon, 114; parting with his children, 115; preparations for death, 116; conducted to the scaffold, 117; his death; burial, 118; effect of his execution in Europe, 149.

CHARLES II., as Prince of Wales, presents letter of his father to Parliament, ii. 437; at Greenwich, iii., 20; accompanies his father's flight from Oxford, 48; in command of royalist army after Naseby, 64; advised by his father to prepare for flight, 69; embarks for Scilly Isles, 71; secures intervention of Holland in favor of his father, 111; proclaimed in Scotland and Ireland, 129, 130; leaves Ormond to support him in Ireland, 133; letter to Montrose, 133, 134; signs treaty with Scotch Parliament, 136, 137; embarks for Scotland, 137; his treatment by the Scots, 138, 139; at Perth, 141; crowned at Scone, 142; invades England, 143; advances to Worcester, 144; is defeated, 145, 146; his flight, 147; arrives in France, 148; reception of his ambassadors in Europe, 150, 151; fleet raised in his behalf, 151; at Court of France, 155; at Bruges, 177; unsuccessful insurrection in his favor, 212, 213; unable to negotiate with Mazarin, 213, 214; Monk's proposal to him, 240; offers of the Presbyterians, 240, 241; establishes himself in the Netherlands, 242; his letters to Parliament, 244, 245; his "Declaration of Breda," 246, 247; at the Hague, 247; arrives in England, 248; enters London, 249; characteristics of his reign, 250, 251; his ministers, 251; his promises to Presbyterians, 253; promulgates Healing Declaration, 254; marries Catherine of Braganza, 259; his prodigality, 259, 260; sells Dunkirk to France; declares war on United Provinces, 260; concludes peace with France, Holland, and Denmark, 261; the Plague; the fire in London, 262; his alienation from Clarendon, 264; ministry of the Cabal, 265; concludes secret treaty with France, 267, 268; declaration of indulgence for non-conformists, 268; declares war on Holland, 269; yields to religious measures of Parliament, 270; dismisses Shaftesbury; forced to conclude peace with Holland, 271; Shaftesbury's criticism of him, 273; secret treaty with Louis XIV., 274, 275; prolonged prorogation of Parliament, 275; temporary breach with Louis XIV., 276; position in Europe, 277; disbelief in Popish plot, 278; prorogues Parliament to prevent passage of

- Exclusion Bill; dissolves it, 281; recalls Duke of York; again dismisses Shaftesbury, 282; places Monmouth in charge of Scottish affairs, 283; attachment to Monmouth, 284, 285; dissolves Parliament of 1680; new treaty with Louis XIV., 286; dissolves Parliament of 1681 for passing Exclusion Bill, 287; measures against Whigs, 288, 289; Whig conspiracy, 291, 292; refuses to pardon Lord Russell, 294; made independent of the people by French subsidies, 295; illness, 296, 297; death, 297; his character, 297, 298.
- CHARLES, Archduke of Austria. See Austria, Archdukes of.
- , the Bad. See Navarre.
- , the Bold. See Burgundy.
- , Kings of France. See France.
- , Emperors of Germany. See Germany.
- , Duke of Normandy, in command at battle of Poitiers, i. 323; made regent of France by States-general, 326.
- , Kings of Spain. See Spain.
- CHARLOTTE AUGUSTA, Princess of Wales, daughter of George IV., her birth, iv. 329; wife of Leopold of Saxe-Coburg; her death, 405.
- , of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, queen of George III., iv. 218.
- , Princess Royal, daughter of George III., marries Duke of Wurtemberg, iv. 336.
- CHARNOCK, ROBERT, joins in Barclay's conspiracy, iv. 18; his execution, 21.
- CHAROLAIS, Comte de, son of Duke of Burgundy, i. 392.
- "CHARTER," the Programme of the Chartists, v. 26.
- CHARTER-HOUSE, London, opposition of its governor to James II., 336.
- CHARTERS, of England, i. 211, 212.
- CHARTISTS, the first appearance of, their programme, v. 26; first demonstrations, 27; meeting in 1843, described by Guizot, 27, 28; led by O'Connor, 28; their opposition to Anti-Corn-Law-League, 71, 72; present petition to Parliament, 126; come to an end in England, 127.
- CHARTLEY CASTLE, Mary Stuart imprisoned at, ii. 325.
- CHARTRES, Hastings, the pirate, established at, i. 53.
- CHATEAU d'EU, Victoria's visit to, v. 101-102.
- CHATELHERAULT, Duke of. See Arran.
- CHATHAM, Earl of, William Pitt (1708-1778), appears in politics as one of the "patriot" Whigs, iv. 151; opposes levying of Hanoverian troops at English expense, 152; his attack on treaties with Prussia and Hesse, 189; temporary accession to power, 192; speech on recruiting the army from the Highlands, 192-193; becomes secretary of state, 1757, 193; character of his administration, 193, 194; his war measures, 194; defence of Cumberland, 195, 196; concludes agreement with Frederick of Prussia, 196; resolves to complete conquest of Canada, 198; gives Wolfe command of the expedition, 199; his enmity to France; ascendancy in Parliament, 211; England's position in Europe during his administration, 214; his loss of influence in the cabinet on accession of George III., 215; reply to French overtures for peace, 216; resigns the seals on defeat of his proposition of war with Spain; his interview with the king, 217; popular enthusiasm for him, 218; denounces the peace with France, 219-220; does not protest against passage of Stamp Act, 224; his speech demanding its repeal, 225, 226; twice called upon by the king to return to office, 226; refuses to form cabinet on fall of Grenville; becomes premier on fall of Rockingham; takes title of Lord Chatham, 227; his cabinet and political plans; illness and retirement, 228; the king's appeal to him, 228-229; his interview with Grafton; resignation, 1768; reappearance in public, 229; attack on Bute, 229-230; his taxation of American colonies while in office, 230; speech against North's American policy, 234; last appearance in Parliament, 235; motion for cessation of hostilities in America; speech against France, 244; against employment of Indian auxiliaries, 245, 246; his motion rejected, 246; last speech in Parliament, 248, 249; death, 249; his monument in Westminster Abbey, v. 166.
- CHATHAM, Lady, refuses to admit visitors to her husband during his illness, iv. 228; letter from her son on recovery of George III., 314; her death (1803), 359.
- CHAUCER, GEOFFREY (1328-1400), father of English poetry, i. 343.
- CHAUMONT, given as portion to wife of William Clinton, i. 136.
- CHAUVELIN, M., French ambassador in London, iv. 323.
- CHERBOURG, surrendered to English by Charles the Bad, of Navarre, i. 341; taken by Henry V., 395; taken back by Charles VII., ii. 40.
- CHERSONESE, v. 197, 203.
- CHERTSEY, abbey of, Henry VI., interred at ii. 64.
- CHESTER, Danes take refuge in, i. 53; besieged by Parliamentarians, iii. 60, 67; captured by Parliamentarians, 213.
- CHESTERFIELD, PHILIP STANHOPE, Earl of, quoted, iv. 112; his farewell to Bolingbroke, 146; member of Pelham's cabinet, 180; his thanks to Whitfield, 185, 186.
- CHEVY CHASE (Otterburn), battle of, i. 351.
- CHEY-TA-SING. See Benares.
- CHICHELEY. See Archbishops of Canterbury.
- CHICHESTER, Lake, Bishop of, signs petition against Declaration of Indulgence, iii. 338, 339.
- CHILDERSLEY, Charles I. received by Parliamentary army at, iii. 83.
- CHILLIANWALLAH, battle of, v. 241.
- CHINON, Joan of Arc at, ii. 23.
- CHINA, Opium War in, v. 44-46; commercial relations with Europe and America, 45; makes peace with England, 46; difficulties with England concerning the "Ar-

- row," 236, 237; renewal of disturbances, 307; concludes treaty of Tien-tsin with England and France, 308; difficulties as to its ratification, 309; war with England and France, 310, 311; complete submission, 313.
- "CHINA MONEY," v. 47.
- CHIPPENHAM, fortress of, i. 50.
- CHISWICK, death of Charles Fox at, iv. 379.
- CHOLERA, in Crimean army, v. 187, 183, 295.
- CHOISEUL, Duc de, minister of Foreign Affairs under Louis XV., iv. 197; proposes a congress, 215; his propositions for peace refused by Pitt, 216; his hopes for rupture of England with her colonies, 243.
- CHOLMONDELEY, Sir HUGH, promises to surrender Scarborough to the queen, iii. 31.
- CHOUANS, the, war of (1794), iv. 328.
- CHRISTIAN, of Denmark. See Denmark.
- CHRISTIANS, persecuted in Britain, in reign of Dioclesian, i. 27; take refuge in Wales, 33; their celebration of Easter, 34; slaves, granted freedom by Alfred, 58; called to deliverance of Holy Sepulchre, 180. See Crusaders, massacre of, in Damascus, v. 314.
- CHRISTIANITY, preached to Britons, i. 27; to Saxons, 35-39; accepted by Danes in England, 50, 69; propagated by Alfred, 55; its effect on Danes, 76; toleration of, secured in China by treaty of Tien-tsin, v. 308.
- CHRISTIANN, Lady of the Isles, i. 269.
- CHRISTINA, Queen, wife of Ferdinand VII. of Spain, her views as to marriage of her daughter, Queen Isabella, v. 118, 120, 121, 122.
- CHRISTINA, of Sweden. See Sweden.
- CHRISTINE, Princess of France, negotiations for her marriage with Prince Henry of England, ii. 394.
- CHRISTINOS, political party in Spain, v. 112.
- CHRISTOPHER, Mr., partisan of protection, v. 67.
- CHUNDA SAHIB, Indian prince, iv. 203; besieges Clive in Arcot; his death, 204.
- "CHUPATTIES," distribution of. See Indian Mutiny.
- CHURCH, British, organized, i. 28.
- of England, founded by Henry VIII., ii. 173; full of contradictions, 215; its liturgy introduced, 233, 234; forty-two propositions drawn up, 236; finally lost to the holy see, 273; its thirty-nine articles of faith, 309; odious to Puritans, 308; finally established under Elizabeth, 357; established in Scotland, 398; attempt of Charles I. to enforce its observance there, 423; its liturgy abolished by Long Parliament, iii. 57; protected by Cromwell, 173; restitution of its property, 254; reinstated at the Restoration, 256-258; defended by Parliament of 1661, 270; its dread of James II.'s inclination toward Catholicism, 305; supports James II. against Monmouth, 323; struggle with James II., 336, 337, 346; alienated from him, 351; Royalist from taste and principle, 366; its distrust of William III., 367-368; disendowed in Ireland by James II., 371; devotion of English Jacobites to, 374, 375; Queen Anne's attachment to, iv. 80; Tories present bill against "occasional conformity," 81; Bolingbroke's apparent zeal for, 83; the Pretender refuses to tolerate, 104; languor of, in time of Wesley, 185; separation of Wesley and Whitefield from, 186; effect of Methodist movement upon, 187; growing toleration toward Catholics, 421; Romanizing tendencies in, led by Pusey and Newman, v. 137; popular education in its hands, 154; Evangelical and Tractarian parties in, 158, 159; its disestablishment in Ireland, 381, 382, 385; its work in direction of public instruction, 401.
- CHURCH, Greek, claims possession of sanctuaries in Palestine, v. 171.
- of Rome, severity to John (Lackland), i. 208; his submission to it, 210; he throws himself under its protection, 214; excommunicates Prince Louis, 222; abuse of its power in England, 235; persecution of Lollards in England, 381; condemns Joan of Arc, ii. 32; defended by Henry VIII., 138, 139; its corruption, 153; its indignation with Henry VIII., 178; receives fatal blow in Scotland, 208; receives restitution from Mary, 245; England reconciled with, 253; England forever lost to, 273; its corruption in Scotland, 275; James II. determined to establish it in Ireland, iii. 371; no longer in safety even in Rome (1858), v. 284; devotion of Irish to, 381.
- of Scotland, Presbyterian, demands banishment of Charles I. in case of his refusal of the Covenant, iii. 77; Scotland called to revolt in the name of, 311; its security provided for in Act of Union, iv. 79; Victoria takes oath for its security, v. 15; its division on principle of organization, 159, 160; separation of Free Church from, 161.
- CHURCHILL, Lord. See Duke of Marlborough.
- CINQUE PORTS, the, Pitt appointed warden of, iv. 321.
- CINTHIO, GIRALDI, Shakespeare's Othello derived from, ii. 378.
- CINTRA, Convention of (1808), iv. 386; disapproved by English government, 387.
- CISALPINE REPUBLIC, organized, iv. 356; Bonaparte's disposal of its resources, 360.
- CISTERCIANS, order of, i. 163.
- CIUDAD RODRIGO, capture of, by Wellington, iv. 396.
- CINDADELLA, in Minorca, English garrison driven from, iv. 191.
- CLOSTER-SEVERN, Convention of, iv. 195.
- CIVIL SERVICE, in India, v. 276.
- CLAIRET, MAITRE PIERRE, ii. 68.
- CLARE, ELEANOR de. See Eleanor de Clare.
- , GILBERT de, sends spurs to Bruce, i. 266.
- , Lord, chancellor of Ireland, his reply to Lord Moira, iv. 339, 340; seconds Cornwallis in restoring order in Ireland, 340.
- , MARGARET de. See Margaret de Clare.
- , RICHARD de. See Earl of Pembroke.

- CLAREMONT, residence of Warren Hastings at, iv. 284.
- CLARENCE, Duke of, Lionel (1338-1368), third son of Edward III., his great-grand-son, Earl of March, heir to English throne, i. 362.
- , Duke of, Thomas, second son of Henry IV., leads army into France in behalf of the Armagnacs, i. 376; at battle of Agincourt, 391; in Paris with Henry V., 404; at head of English army, killed at Beaugé (1421), 405.
- , Duke of, George (1449-1478), brother of Edward IV., his dissatisfaction at Edward's marriage, ii. 56; marries daughter of Earl of Warwick, 58; abets insurgents against Edward, 59; allied with Lancastrians, 60; deserts to Edward, 62; contends with Gloucester for inheritance of Warwick, 65; excites jealousy of Edward, 68; is imprisoned and murdered, 69.
- , Duke of, William Henry. See William IV.
- CLARENDON, Constitution of, the, i. 157, 162.
- , Lord, Edward Hyde (1608-1674), leader of Royalist party in Long Parliament, ii. 443; attempts of the king to secure his support, 445; directs affairs of Charles in Parliament, 446; joins the king at York, iii. 23; his grief at loss of Falkland, 40; dissuades the king from attempt to dissolve Parliament, 43, 44; letter on accession of Richard Cromwell, 196; letter from John Barwick, 200; receives account of fall of the Cromwells, 209; letter from England concerning chances of the Royalists, 213; mistake as to English feeling, 224; letter from Royalists, 230; joins Charles II. at Breda, 242; composes letters from him to Parliament, 245; letter from Broderick, 246; dissatisfied with recommendation of Monk, 248; becomes lord chancellor, 251; his character, 251, 252; marriage of his daughter to James, Duke of York, 255; his zeal for the English Church, 258; sketch of, by M. Guizot, 263; his impeachment and banishment, 264; his writings, death, 265.
- , Lord, Henry Hyde (1638-1709), appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland, iii. 307; dismissed from the office, 333; grief at his son's desertion to William III., 351; advice to James II., 352; concerned in Jacobite plots, Mary signs warrant for his arrest, 387; William's lenity toward him, 394.
- , Lord, George Villiers (1800-1870), succeeds Lord Russell as foreign secretary, his statement to Russia of England's policy in regard to Turkey, v. 176; orders to Sir Hamilton Seymour, 179; represents England at Congress of Paris, 233; negotiates with Reverdy Johnson, Convention of 1870, 334; foreign secretary in Lord Russell's cabinet, 351; in Gladstone's cabinet, 384.
- CLARGES, brother-in-law of General Monk, commissioner from English army to him, iii. 220, 221; bearer of letter to Charles II., 245.
- CLARKSON, THOMAS (1760-1846), his efforts for emancipation of slaves, iv. 187, 188.
- CLAUDE, Huguenot refugee in Holland, his pamphlet burned, iii. 329.
- CLAUDIUS, Roman Emperor, invades Britain, i. 18; merciful to Caractacus, 20.
- CLAVERHOUSE, John Graham of. See Dundee.
- CLAVERING, General, chairman of council at Calcutta, iv. 288.
- CLAYPOLE, Lady, daughter of Oliver Cromwell, iii. 189; her death, 192.
- , Lord, son-in-law of Cromwell, iii. 177.
- CLEMENT VII. See Popes.
- XI. See Popes.
- CLÉMENT, JACQUES, assassin of Henry III. of France, ii. 344.
- CLERGY, Saxon, driven by Danes into France, i. 47; relations with Alfred the Great, 56; quarrel with Edwy, 64, 65; influence in Middle Ages, 66; English not in favor at Rome, 95; side with Henry I. against Robert Curthose, 128; support Stephen, 138; alienation from him, 142; support Empress Maud, 143; juridical rights, 157; benefit of, protects assassins of Becket, 171; attachment to Cœur-de-Lion, 198; pronounce interdict in England, 207; resist Innocent IV., 230; favorable to Simon of Montfort, 235; appeal to the pope against Edward I., 255; its uneasiness under Henry IV., 371, 372; their reservation concerning supremacy of Henry VIII., ii. 169; authority in convocation conferred upon the crown, 171; persecuted by Henry VIII., 179, 180; influence in Scotland, 205, 206; refuse to take oath of fidelity to Commonwealth, iii. 121; forbidden to use controversy in the pulpit, 330; disapprove of Declaration of Indulgence, 337; in Ireland, issue of bonds in their favor sanctioned by Parliament, iv. 442, 443; in Greek Church, their claim to custody of sanctuaries in Palestine, v. 171, 172. See also Bishops.
- CLERKENWELL, Fenian attempt to blow up prison at, v. 372.
- CLERMONT, Comte de, defeats Kyriel at battle of Formigny (1450), ii. 40.
- , Comte de (1709-1771), in command of French army in Germany (1758), superseded by Contades, iv. 197.
- CLEVES, ANNE of. See Anne of Cleves.
- , Duke of, brother of Anne of Cleves, sends ambassador to Henry VIII., ii. 199.
- CLIFFORD, Lord, Thomas, killed at battle of St. Albans (1455), ii. 45.
- , Lord, John, son of the above, at battle of Wakefield, ii. 48; kills Earl of Rutland, 49.
- , Lord, Thomas (1630-1673), member of Cabal ministry, iii. 265; resigns office, 270.
- , Sir ROBERT, bribed to betray conspirators in favor of Perkin Warbeck, ii. 102.
- , ROGER, made governor of Wales by Edward I., i. 246.
- CLIFTON MOOR, skirmish at, iv. 169.

- CLINTON, Sir HENRY, English general in America, iv. 246; made commander-in-chief, 252; withdraws garrison from Rhode Island, 254; rallies royalists of Georgia and the Carolinas, 258; receives overtures from Arnold, 259; encourages mutiny in English army, 262; Washington's designs concealed from him, 263; recalled, 275.
- , Lord, in command of fleet on coast of Brittany in reign of Bloody Mary, ii. 262.
- CLISSON, OLIVER de, beheaded by Philip of Valois, i. 301.
- , OLIVER de, the younger, contests authority of Count de Montfort, i. 336.
- CLIVE, ROBERT, Lord (1725-1774), clerk in service of East India Company, iv. 203; takes possession of Arcot, is besieged by Chunda Sahib, his victories over the French, 204; returns to India after visit to England, 205; commands expedition against Surajah Dowlah, his relations with the Hindoos, 206; gains battle of Plassey (1757), 207; returns to India as governor-general, 209, 210; appointed to organize interior administration of Bengal, 281; his measures for establishment of English authority, returns to England, 282; accusations brought against him in Parliament, 283; acquitted, his death, 284; secures Empire of India to the English, v. 271; his despotic sway, 272.
- CLONTARF, "monster meeting" at, v. 93.
- CLOSTER-SEVERN, capitulation of, iv. 195; George II. refuses to ratify it, 196.
- CLOTH OF GOLD, Field of, ii. 134.
- "CLUBMEN," bodies of peasantry formed to resist pillage in the civil wars, iii. 64.
- CLYDE, Lord. See Campbell.
- COALITION, European, against French Republic (1799), iv. 343; against Napoleon Bonaparte, 369; against Bonaparte, ending by peace of Presburg, 373.
- COBBETT, Lieutenant-general, transports Charles I. to Hurst Castle, iii. 103.
- COBDEN, RICHARD (1804-1865), demands abolition of duties on corn, v. 67; his character, 70; creates Anti-Corn-Law League, 71; holds aloof from the Chartists, 72; his appeal to English aristocracy, 75, 76; declaration concerning Sir Robert Peel, 86; Peel's encomium of him, 87, 88; his proposition for inscription on Peel's tomb, 89; motion for inquiry into Chinese affairs, 238; loses his seat in Parliament, 239; refuses to take office in Palmerston's cabinet, 301; negotiates commercial treaty between England and France, 304; his sympathy with the Union cause in America, 331; death, 349.
- COBHAM, ELEANOR, second wife of Humphrey of Gloucester, ii. 20; accused of sorcery, 38.
- , Lord, Sir John Oldcastle, leader of the Lollards, i. 381; his trial by the clergy; rising in his favor, 382; his death, 1417, 383.
- , Lord, disgraced on accession of James I., ii. 384; conspires against him; betrays Raleigh; is condemned and pardoned, 385.
- COBHAM, Sir REYNOLD, at battle of Poitiers, i. 325.
- COBURG, Prince of (1737-1815), generalissimo of allied army against French Republic, iv. 326.
- COCHRAN, Earl of Mar, favorite of James III. of Scotland, ii. 70.
- COCHRANE, Sir JOHN, connected with Argyle's insurrection, iii. 311; arrested, 312; saves himself by turning informer, 320.
- COCKBURN, Chief-Justice, his condemnation of Governor Eyre's conduct in Jamaica, v. 355.
- CODE NAPOLÉON, iv. 392.
- CODRINGTON, General, in command of brigade on Mount Inkerman, v. 209.
- COERCION BILL, iv. 442.
- COEUR-DE-LION. See Richard.
- COIMBRA, English forces under Wellesley concentrated at, iv. 389.
- COKE, Sir EDWARD (1552-1634), colleague of Bacon in prosecution of Essex, ii. 351; his accusations against Somerset, 397; marries grand-niece of Buckingham, 399; his aid in Buckingham's malversations, 400; leader of Parliamentary coalition against Charles I., 415.
- , JOHN, sent to the Tower by House of Commons, iii. 326.
- , JOHN, solicitor-general, reads indictment against Charles I., iii. 109.
- COLBERT, minister of Louis XIV., ii. 165; iii. 270.
- COLEMAN, his letter to Père La Chaise, iii. 278, 279.
- COLEPEPPER, Sir JOHN, leader of Royalist party in Long Parliament, ii. 443; the king attempts to secure his support, 445; conducts the affairs of Charles in Parliament, 446; member of Parliamentary deputation to the king, iii. 14; his opinion as to question of the soldiery, 20; with Prince of Wales after Naseby, 64.
- COLERIDGE, SAMUEL TAYLOR (1772-1834), Harriet Martineau's anecdote of, v. 23.
- COLIGNY, Admiral, leader of Protestants in France, ii. 281; killed at the St. Bartholomew massacre, 314.
- COLLEGE, executed on charge of corrupting the royal guard, iii. 288.
- , Sacred, affirm validity of first marriage of Henry VIII., ii. 172.
- COLLINGWOOD, Admiral Lord (1748-1810), as Captain, contributes to defeat of Spanish fleet off Cape St. Vincent (1797), iv. 334; commands with Nelson at Trafalgar, 371; in command of fleet at Cadiz, 385; his death, 394.
- COLOGNE, archbishop of, aided by Louis XIV., iii. 348.
- , electorate of, falls into possession of Grand Alliance at Blenheim, iv. 53.
- COLPOYS, Admiral, commissioned to treat with delegates of mutineers at Spithead, iv. 335; forbids delegates to be received 336.
- COLUMBIA, British, formation of, by Lord Lytton, v. 293; absorbed in Dominion of Canada, 294.
- COLUMBUS, BARTHOLOMEW, brother of Christopher, ii. 112.

- COLUMBUS, CHRISTOPHER, applies to Henry VII., ii. 112.
- COMIUS, king of Belgian Atrebrates, i. 14.
- COMMENTARIES, of Cæsar, referred to, i. 15.
- COMMINES, historian, quoted, ii. 59, 61, 62, 65, 69; at Pecquigny, 67; quoted, 69, 70.
- COMMITTEE of Public Safety (1793), in France, iv. 325.
- of Two Kingdoms, iii. 47, 51, 60, 70.
- COMMODOUS, Roman Emperor, i. 24.
- COMMONS, House of, its beginning, i. 235. See Parliament.
- “ — of England,” name assumed by insurgents in reign of Richard II., i. 344.
- COMMONWEALTH, established in England, iii. 121; colonies accept its authority, 149; recognized by Spain, 152; sends envoys to the Hague, 153; establishes relations with France, 154, 155; at war with Holland, 156-158; re-organized under Cromwell, 164-167; concludes peace with Holland 168, 169; alliance with France, 174; unfavorable to literary activity, 302.
- COMMUNE, the French, suppressed, v. 405.
- COMMUNISTS, Parisian, compared to Chartists by Guizot, v. 28.
- COMNENUS, Emperor ISAAC, made prisoner by Cœur-de-Lion, i. 190.
- COMPiegNE, defended by Joan of Arc, ii. 30.
- COMPTON, Bishop of London (Henry, 1632-1713), his speech in House of Lords, iii. 328; ordered to suspend Dr. Sharp, 330; suspended from his ecclesiastical functions, 331; unable to sign petition against Declaration of Indulgence, 338; signs invitation to Prince of Orange, 346; reinstated, 349; displeasure at elevation of Tillotson, 407.
- , Sir SPENCER (afterwards Lord Wilmington), entrusted by George II. with communication to Privy Council; Walpole draws up speech for him, iv. 139; his death, 153.
- COMYN, Sir JOHN (the Red), at head of Scottish council of regency, i. 262; betrays Bruce, is murdered at Dumfries, i. 263.
- , Sir ROBERT, murdered at Dumfries, i. 266.
- CONDÉ, claimed by Dutch, iv. 60; taken possession of by Austrians, 325.
- , Prince of (Louis I. de Bourbon, 1530-1569), head of Protestant party in France, ii. 281; applies to Elizabeth for assistance, 298; his death, 302.
- , Prince of (Louis II. de Bourbon, “the great Condé,” 1621-1686), French general in service of Spain, iii. 190, 191; offers assistance to Charles II. 212.
- CONFLANS, Marquis de, in command of French fleet for descent on England, iv. 197; defeated by Hawks in the Vainae, 198; in command in the Decean, 208.
- “CONGREGATION of the Lord,” ii. 275
- CONGREGATION, Lords of, head the Protestants rising in Scotland, 275, 276; rise against Darnley, 284.
- CONGRESS, Continental (of American Colonies), assembled at Philadelphia, appoints Washington commander-in-chief, iv. 236; signs second petition to the king, 238; adopts Declaration of Independence, 240; invests Washington with full powers, 242; conditions of negotiation with England, 251; plans expedition against Canada, 252; loss of authority, 257; refuses to make peace without concurrence of France, 276; dispute with the army, 279.
- CONGRESS, of United States, war measures after battle of Bull Run, v. 325; vote of thanks to Wilkes passed by the House, 328.
- CONINGSBY, Lord, impeaches Earl of Oxford, iv. 95.
- CONNAUGHT, Irish kingdom of, i. 172.
- CONQUEST, the Norman, i. 100-105.
- CONRAD, son of Frederick II. of Sicily, resists claims of Pope Innocent IV. i. 229.
- CONSERVATIVES, name adopted by Tories, iv. 432; Disraeli becomes leader of, v. 297; more moderate than the Liberals in support of Southern Confederacy in America, 331; opposition to Russell's Reform Bill of 1866, 361, 362; come into power in 1866, 363; forced to propose Reform, 355; defeated in election of 1868, 383; their opposition to Gladstone's Army Bill, 403, 404; to Ballot Bill, 405; restored to power in 1874, 409.
- “CONSPIRACY to Murder Bill,” v. 285.
- CONSTANCE of Brittany, marries Geoffrey, son of Henry II. of England, i. 163.
- , of France, sister of Louis VII. betrothed to Prince Eustace, son of King Stephen, i. 139.
- CONSTANTINE, Roman emperor, proclaimed in Britain, i. 27; first Christian emperor, 23.
- CONSTANTINOPLE, becomes capital of Roman Empire, i. 26; Russian protectorate of, v. 35; protectorate of Greek Church connected with possession of, 172; Nicholas I. declares his policy in regard to, 175-176; Prince Mentschikoff's embassy to, 176-177.
- CONSTANTIUS, CHLORUS, Roman governor in Britain, i. 26, 27.
- CONTADES, Marshal, invades Hesse; defeated at Minden, iv. 210.
- CONTI, Prince of, commander-in-chief of army against Spain in 1719, iv. 118.
- CONTRECEUR, M. de, French commander in Ohio Valley, iv. 188.
- CONVENTION, National, of France, iv. 322, 323; declares war against Holland, 323; fall of the Girondists, 1793, 325; passes decree of no quarter to English and Hanoverians, 326.
- CONVENTIONS of 15th July, 1840, concluded, v. 36; its effect on France, 37; accepted by the Sultan, 39.
- , of 13th July, 1841, v. 43.
- CONVENTION Parliament, called by William of Orange, iii. 360.
- CONWAY, General, accuses government of bribery, iv. 300.
- CONYERS, Sir JOHN, made governor of the Tower, iii. 20.
- COOK, Colonel, attempts to persuade Charles I. to escape from Carisbrook, iii. 103.
- COOKE, WILLIAM F., takes patent for invention in use of electricity, v. 22.

- COOPER, ASILEY. See Lord Ashley.
- COOTE, Colonel (Sir Eyre) (1726-1783), his capture of Fort Wandewash, iv. 208; his letter on Lally-Tollendal's defence of Pondicherry, 209; defeats Hyder Ali at Porto-Novo, 289.
- COPE, Sir JOHN, in command of English army against Charles Edward, iv. 159; defeated at Prestonpans, 161, 162; carries the news to Berwick, 162.
- COPELAND, JOHN, makes prisoner of King of Scotland, i. 312.
- COPENHAGEN, battle of, iv. 353; bombarded by the English (1807), 382.
- CORBESDALE, MONTROSE, defeated at, iii. 134.
- CORBOIS, WILLIAM (see Archbishops of Canterbury).
- CORDOVA, Don JOSEPH de, commander of Spanish fleet, defeated off Cape St. Vincent, iv. 334.
- CORK, captured by Marlborough, iii. 387; Fenian attempt at, v. 371.
- CORNBURY, EDWARD, Viscount, son of Lord Clarendon, deserts to Prince of Orange, iii. 351.
- CORNISH, excused for complicity in Rye House Plot, iii. 322.
- CORN LAWS, v. 58; Peel's proposed revision of, 63; free traders attack his revision of, 66, 67; Birney's Lectures on, 69; popular opposition to, 70; league formed against (see Anti-Corn-Law League), 71; Fox's speech against, 72, 73; Peel's attitude with regard to, 78; debate on, 79; bill for repeal passed, 86.
- CORNWALL, visited by Phœnicians, i. 13; subjugated by Egbert, 40; under Athelstane, 63; insurrection in, against Henry VII., 105, 106, 107; faithful to Charles I. iii. 35; Royalist successes in, 51, 53.
- , Earl of (see Gaveston).
- , Richard of (see Richard of Cornwall, King of the Romans).
- CORNWALLIS, Lord (Charles, 1738-1805) in command of British army in America, besieged in Yorktown, iv. 263, 264; his surrender, 264; lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 1798, 340; skilful tactics in Irish Parliament, 341.
- COROMANDEL, English driven from, iv. 208.
- CORPORATION ACT, of Charles II. abolished, iii. 371.
- CORRICHIE, battle of, ii. 282.
- CORSAIRS, Barbary, appear in the English channel, ii. 419; repressed by Blake, 173, 174.
- CORSICA, revolt of, against French Republic, iv. 327.
- CORTES, of Spain, ratify Philip V.'s renunciation of French crown, iv. 70; Isabella's marriage announced to, v. 122.
- CORTOSPINE, heights of, iv. 159.
- CORUNNA, junction of French and English fleets at, iv. 256; battle of, 387.
- COSNE, besieged, i. 406.
- COUCY, ENGUERRAND de, left in command at London by Prince Louis, i. 222.
- COUNCIL OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS under Charles II., iii. 252.
- COUNCIL OF STATE, under Parliament, iii. 120, 121; takes measures to repel invasion of Scotch, 137; dismisses French ambassador, 152; dissolved by Cromwell, 163; reorganized by him, 164; becomes Republican, 216, 217; secret meetings, 224, 225.
- COUNCILS, Arles (314) i. 28.
- , Constance (1414), ii. 18.
- COURCY, JOHN de, Earl of Ulster, governor of Ireland, i. 174.
- COURTENAY, Sir EDWARD, made Earl of Devon by Henry VII. ii. 85.
- , Sir WILLIAM, imprisoned for complicity in plot of Earl of Suffolk against Henry VII., ii. 114.
- , Lord EDWARD, son of Marquis of Exeter, Queen Mary's attachment to, ii. 246; opposes her alliance with Philip of Spain, 247; project for his marriage with Elizabeth, 248; in the Tower, 250; removed to Fotheringay, 252. set at liberty, 254.
- COUSIN, M., his advice to Louis Philippe. v. 42.
- COVENANT, the, established in Scotland, ii. 424; devotion of Scotch Presbyterians to, iii. 75, 78; accepted by Charles II. 137; publicly burned in England, 257.
- COVENANTERS, Scotch, raise army against Charles I. ii. 424; conclude temporary peace at Berwick; their letter to Louis XIII. 425; their army victorious at Newburne on the Tyne, 427; commission to negotiate with, 429; insurrection of, in Scotland, iii. 262; their resistance to Lauderdale, 282; assassinate Archbishop Sharp, 283; defeated by Monmouth at Bothwell Bridge, 284; severities of Duke of York toward, 289; persecuted under Conventicle Act, 306; Argyle's confidence in their support, 310; do not join his insurrection, 311, 312; regain freedom by revolution of 1688, 374; superstition concerning Dundee, 377.
- COVENTRY, Mary Stuart imprisoned at, ii. 304.
- , Sir JOHN, his treatment by Cavaliers, iii. 273.
- COVERDALE, MILES, translator of the Bible, ii. 193, 357.
- COWLEY, ABRAHAM, English poet, iii. 301.
- , Lord, meets Victoria at Chateau d'Eu, v. 101; represents England at Congress of Vienna, 233.
- CRAGGS, JAMES, secretary of state, bribed by South Sea Company; his death, iv. 125.
- CRAIK, DINAH MULOCK, v. 168.
- CRANBOURNE, Lord (Marquis of Salisbury), becomes Indian Secretary in Lord Derby's Cabinet, v. 363; resigns, 366.
- CRANMER (see Archbishops of Canterbury)
- CRECY, battle of, i. 307-311.
- CREQUY, Duc de, ambassador of Louis XIV to Cromwell, iii. 191.
- CRESPY-EN-VALOIS, negotiations at, ii. 208.
- CRESSINGHAM, HUGH de, treasurer of Scotland, i. 254; odious to the Scotch; his death, 260.
- CREVANT, battle of, ii. 15, 16.
- CREVANT-SUR-YOYNE, fortress of, ii. 15.
- CREVELT, battle of, iv. 197.

CREWE, Presbyterian member of Parliament, iii. 238.

CRILLON, Duc de (1718-1796), besieges Fort St. Philip in Minorca, 1782; his offers to the English general, iv. 266; his reply on Murray's refusal; captures the fort, 267; conducts siege of Gibraltar (1782), 273, 274.

CRIMEAN WAR, the controversy leading to, v. 171-179; Russians enter Danubian principalities, 177; destroy Turkish squadron at Sinope, 179; allied fleets enter Black Sea, 179-180; France and England declare war against Russia (1854), 182; Russians besiege Silistria; retreat across Danube, 184; plans for invasion of the Crimea, 185-187; cholera in allied armies, 187, 193, 225; allies land in the Crimea, 188; march toward Sevastopol, 189; Russian position on the Alma, 189-190; allies victorious at the battle of the Alma, 191-192; Mentschikoff's measures for defence of Sevastopol, 194-197; allies march toward Balaklava, 193; death of French commander; English occupy Balaklava, 199; Todleben's defences of Sevastopol, 199-200; unsuccessful attack of the allies on Sevastopol, 201; Russians attack English position at Balaklava, 202; battle of Balaklava, 202-207; weak position of the English at Inkerman, 208-210; battle of Inkerman, 209-213; sufferings of allied armies before Sevastopol, 214-215; organization of hospitals under Miss Nightingale, 215-216; allies reinforced by Sardinian contingent, 218; failure of Russian attack on Eupatoria, 218; Russian fortifications strengthened, 219, 220; Gortschakoff made commander-in-chief of Russian army, 221; Pelissier assumes command of the French, 222-223; successful attack by allies, upon Kertch; battle of the Tchernaya; capture of the Mamelon, 224; unsuccessful assault on Sevastopol, death of Lord Raglan, 225; Russians defeated in sortie, 228; bombardment of Sevastopol, 229; final assault, 230; Russians evacuate Sevastopol, 230-231; end of the war, 232; peace signed at Paris (1856), 234; results of the war, 235.

CROFT, James. See Duke of Monmouth.

CROFT, Lord, guardian of Duke of Monmouth, iii. 284.

CROMARTY, Lord, concerned in Jacobite rebellion of 1745; pardoned, iv. 178.

CROMWELL, Oliver, his attempt to emigrate prevented by Charles I., ii. 421; political attitude during first session of Long Parliament, 431; remarks to Falkland concerning debate on remonstrance, 443-444; receives command of regiment in Parliamentary army, iii. 25; complaint of Parliamentary cavalry, 32; organizes "Ironsides," 33; defeats Rupert at Marston Moor, 49-50; advice to Manchester, 50; speech urging vigorous prosecution of war, 55; secures appointment of Fairfax to command of Parliamentary army, 58; his resignation not accepted, 60; joins Fairfax, 61; in command of Ironsides at Naseby, 62; capture of royalist towns, 69; his command prolonged, 71; instigates discontent in the army, 79; appointed to treat with it, 80; declares necessity of the king's arrest, 83; accusations of Presbyterians against him, his speech, 84; places himself at the head of the army, 85; negotiations with the king, 86, 87; urges Charles to consider proposals of the army, 89; distrusted by republicans in the army, 90; uncertain as to intentions of the king, 91; seizes letter of Charles to the queen, 92; his resolve in regard to the king, 93; insinuates to Charles the necessity of flight, 94; notifies Parliament of the king's flight, 95; suppresses insubordination of the army, 96; message to the king, 97; supports Ireton's motion to settle affairs without the king, 99; campaign against Scottish royalists, 100-102; returns to London, 103; approves of exclusion of Presbyterian members, 105; opinion on trial of the king, 106, 107; exhortation to the court before the trial, 108; signs warrant for the king's execution, 116; at the coffin of Charles, 118, 119; becomes member of Council of State, 120; votes for execution of Capel, 123; Lilburne's attack upon him, 125; suppresses mutiny in the army, 127; general of Irish expedition, 130; lands in Ireland, 131; capture of Drogheda and Wexford, 132; skilful management of affairs in Ireland, 132, 133; returns to England, 137; appointed generalissimo in place of Fairfax, invades Scotland, 138, 139; falls back on Dunbar, 140; defeats Lesley, 141; illness, 142; letter to Parliament in regard to Charles II.'s invasion of England, 143; defeats Charles at Worcester, 145, 146; establishes himself at Whitehall, 148; intrigues to gain absolute power, 158-161; dissolves Long Parliament, 162, 163; re-organization of government, 164, 165; assumes title of Lord Protector, 166; incorporates Scotland with England, 167; treaty with United Provinces, 168, 169; convokes a Parliament (1654), 169; difficulties with it, 170; dissolves it, 171; imposes income-tax on royalists, 172; religious toleration, 173; rupture with Spain; treaty with France, convokes Parliament (1656), 174; aspires to title of king, 175; overtures of cavaliers to him, 176; intrigues to gain the crown, 177; invited to assume title of king, 178, 179; conference with Parliament, 180, 181; opposition of his friends and the Republicans, 182; refuses the title, 183, 184; adoption of new constitution; power concentrated in his hands, 184; his assassination proposed, 185; opens Parliament (1658), 185; his address, 186; appeal to the army, 187; conspiracy against him, 187, 188; forms High Court for trial of conspirators, 188; precautions against assassination, successes on the continent, 189; sends contingent to army of Turenne, 190; ratifies alliance with France, 191; domestic afflictions, his illness, 192, 193; his death, 194; his character, 194, 195; desecration of his remains, 254.

CROMWELL, Lady Elizabeth, widow of Oliver Cromwell, her flight, iii. 144.

—, HENRY, son of Oliver Cromwell, iii. 176; Thurlow's letters to him, 192, 193, 194; his letter to his brother, 197; Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, 198-207; his resignation, 208, 209; disappointment of the Royalists, 209-211.

—, RICHARD, son of Oliver Cromwell, iii. 175, 176; proclaimed his father's successor, 195; petition of the army to, 197; his government revives electoral system of the monarchy, 198; debate in Parliament in regard to his recognition, 199, 200; vote for recognition passed, 200; his position between the army and Parliament, 201-204; dissolves Parliament, 204, 205; overtures of the royalists to, 207; retires from Whitehall, 208.

—, THOMAS, his suggestion to Henry VIII., ii. 168; his report, 169; secretary of state, 178; his measures against the monasteries, 179, 180; his fears for Cardinal Pole, 190; desires to unite Henry with a Protestant queen, 195; suggests Anne of Cleves, 196; arrested for high treason, condemned and executed (1540), 197.

CROPREDY BRIDGE, battle of, iii. 48.

CROULLE, M. de, his letters to Mazarin, iii. 121-131; secretary of French ambassador to England, 149; ordered to leave England, 152.

CRUSADERS, meet at Vezelay, under Cœur-de-Lion and Philip Augustus, i. 189; besiege Acre, 190; their dissensions, 191; capture Ascalon, 192; relieve Jaffa, under Cœur-de-Lion, 193, 194; attack Nazareth under Prince Edward (Edward I.), 242; disappearance from the East, 243.

CRUSADES, the, begin to agitate Christendom, i. 123; under Pope Gregory VIII., 180; joined by Cœur-de-Lion, 187-194; led by St. Louis, 239; by Prince Edward (Edward III.), 242; their end, 243.

CRYSTAL PALACE, the, v. 139, 140.

CUBA, taken by English (1762), iv. 218.

CUESTA, GENERAL supports cause of Bourbons in Spain, defeated in Valladolid, iv. 385.

CUFFE, Secretary of Essex, ii. 350.

CULLODEN, battle of, iv. 173-175.

CULPEPPER, executed for complicity with Catherine Howard, ii. 199.

CUMBERLAND, Duke of, William Augustus, (1721-1765), son of George II., his courage at battle of Dettingen, iv., 153; commands allied armies in campaign of 1745, attacks the French at Fontenoy, 154; congratulated by Königseck on his victory, 156; his retreat, 156, recalled from Germany, marches against Charles Edward takes command of English army against Charles Edward, 167; pursues him on his retreat, 169; joins Hawley at Edinburgh, 171; enters Stirling, 172; attacks Charles Edward at Culloden, 173; his victory, 174; his view of the rebellion, 175; his cruelty towards Jacobites, obtains name of the Butcher, 176; in command of English troops in Holland; difficulties with William IV., 180; unpopularity in England, 184; in command of English army for defence of Hanover, driven back to the Weser, 194; forced to conclude convention of Closter-Severn; wounded by his father's anger, resigns his command, his death in 1765, 195; negotiates for Chatham's return to power, 227.

CUMBERLAND, Duke of, Ernest Augustus (1771-1851), son of George III., becomes King of Hanover, v. 16.

CURTIS, Captain, his rescue of Spanish sailors at siege of Gibraltar, iv. 274.

CUSTINE (1740-1793), general of French Convention, invades Germany, iv. 322.

CYMRU, early invaders of Great Britain, i. 13.

CYPRUS, island of, taken by Richard Cœur-de-Lion, i. 190.

D.

DACRE, Lord, in English army at Flodden, ii. 125; in command on English frontier, frightens Duke of Albany into an armistice, 145.

—, Lord Lennard, insurgent against Elizabeth, ii. 304, 305.

D'ALBINAY, member of council of twenty-five, defends Rochester, i. 216.

DALHOUSIE, Lord, George Ramsay (1770-1838), governor-general of Canada, erects monuments to Wolfe and Montcalm, iv. 201.

—, Lord, James Ramsay (1812-1860), governor-general of India, his administration, 241, 242; his death, 348.

D'ALLONVILLE, General, attack on Russian batteries at Balaklava, v. 206.

DALRYMPLE, Sir Hew, English governor of Gibraltar, iv. 285.

—, Sir JAMES, of Stair (1619-1695), agent of William III. in Scotland, iii. 394; obtains order for extirpation of Macdonalds of Glencoe, 395, 396; displaced from office, 397.

DAMASCUS, massacre of Christians at, v. 314.

DANBY, Lord. See Marquis of Caermarthen.

"DANEGELD," Danish money, i. 68, 72.

DANES, the, first invade England in reign of Egbert, i. 40, 41; in reign of Ethelwulf, 41; invade France; return to England, ascend the Thames and sack London; are defeated by Ethelwulf at Oakley, 42; penetrate as far as Reading; overrun the country; in possession of East Anglia and part of Northumbria, 44; entrenched at Reading; their characteristics; defeat Saxons at Reading; are defeated by Alfred and Ethelred at Assendon, 45; consent to peace with Alfred; attack the coast of Dorset; make peace again; resume hostilities, 46; overpower Alfred, 47; their cruel rule in England, 49; defeated by Alfred at Ethandune; compelled to embrace Christianity; settle in Northumbria, Mercia, and East Anglia, 50; unsuccessful invasion of; land in Kent, under Hastings, 51; opposed

- by Alfred; defeated at Farnham, 52; take refuge in Chester; retreat to Isle of Mersey; compelled to abandon their fleet, 53; finally subdued by Alfred, 54; land in East Anglia under Sweyn; exact tribute from Ethelred, 68; further invasions under Sweyn; required to accept Christianity, 69; invade England in revenge for the massacre of their countrymen; pillage and burn Exeter, 70; their ravages and exactions, 71-73; land at York and take possession of the soil, 73; establish their dynasty in England under Canute, 74, 75; effect of Christianity upon them, 76; end of their dynasty in England, 81; assist insurgents in Northumbria against William the Conqueror; their secret negotiations with William, 110; threaten England during his reign, 115.
- DANES, the Northumbrian, relations of their kingdom with Alfred the Great, 55; their wars with the Saxons, 63, 64; invade Ireland under Olaf and capture Dublin, 63; revolt against Edwy, 65; rise in support of the invasion of their countrymen under Sweyn, 68; their massacre by Saxons, 69, 70.
- DANNENBERG, General, succeeds Soimonoff in command of Russians at Inkerman, v. 211, 213.
- DANTE, quoted, i. 179.
- DANTZIC, battle of, iv. 381.
- DARBY, Admiral, re-victuals Gibraltar, iv. 272.
- DARCY, Lord, leader of insurgents against Henry VIII., ii. 188; is executed, 189.
- D' ARGENTINE, Sir GILES, at battle of Banockburn, i. 278.
- DARNLEY, Lord, cousin to Mary Stuart, ii. 283; marries her; is proclaimed king, 284; Mary alienated from, 285; assists at murder of Rizzio, 286; refuses to take part in baptism of his son; coldness between him and Mary, 287; his illness; Mary's apparent reconciliation with, 288; death, 289.
- DARTMOUTH, George Legge, Lord (1648-1691), commander of James II.'s fleet, iii. 350; refuses to assist escape of Prince of Wales, 354; William III.'s lenity to him, 394.
- DARU, Comte (1767-1829), minister of Napoleon Bonaparte, iv. 370.
- DAUBENEY, Lord, advances against insurgents in 1499, ii. 106.
- , WILLIAM, executed for complicity with Perkin Warbeck, ii. 102.
- D'AUBIGNY, Captain, provisional commander at Tahiti, v. 106.
- DAUN, Marshal, co-operates with Admiral Byng against Spain, iv. 115; defeats Frederick the Great at Kolin, 194; at Hochkirch, 197.
- DAUPHIN, title of, first used, i. 327.
- , MESSIRE GUICHARD, sent to negotiate with Henry V., i. 390.
- DAVID, brother of Llewellyn, prince of Wales, supports Edward III. against his brother, i. 243; joins his countrymen, 246; his rebellion, 247; condemned to death, 248.
- DAVID, Kings of Scotland. See Scotland.
- DAVIS, JEFFERSON, president of the Southern Confederacy, v. 320; issues letters of marque, 322; Gladstone's declaration concerning, 331; orders navy in England, 332; taken prisoner, 338.
- , JOHN, his voyages; gives his name to a strait, ii. 330.
- DAVISON, secretary of state under Elizabeth, ii. 333; imprisoned for dispatching Mary Stuart's death-warrant, 336; supported by Essex, 343.
- DAY, Bishop of Chichester, imprisoned, ii. 235.
- DAYLESFORD, family seat of Warren Hastings, iv. 294.
- DEAN, Cornet, pardoned by Fairfax, iii. 128.
- DEANE, General, Republican officer, iii. 222, 223.
- , SILAS, American agent at Paris, iv. 243.
- DECCAN, the, Indian province, iv. 203.
- DECLARATION OF INDULGENCE, proclaimed at Edinburgh, iii. 330, 331; published in England, 337, the seven bishops protest against, 338, 339.
- of Rights, iii. 365; accepted by William and Mary, 366.
- DECRÈS, M., minister of finance to Napoleon Bonaparte; the emperor's letter to, iv. 369, 370.
- DECRY, persecuted for opposition to Episcopacy, ii. 398.
- DEFENDER of the Faith, name bestowed on Henry VIII., ii. 139.
- DE FOE, DANIEL (1661-1731), his pamphlets in defence of Revolution of 1688, iv. 85.
- DEIRA, Anglican kingdom of, founded, i. 32; its union with Bernicia forms Northumbria, 32, 33.
- DELACROIX, M. CHARLES, French minister of foreign affairs, iv. 333.
- DE LA POLE, WILLIAM, brother of Earl of Suffolk, ii. 114.
- DELHI, insurrection of Sepoys at, v. 244; headquarters of mutineers, 247; siege of, 263, 264; surrenders, 264.
- , King of, v. 244; takes refuge in tomb of Humayoun, 264; his death, 265.
- "DELINQUENTS," proceedings of Long Parliament against, ii. 429; attitude of the Republicans toward, iii. 90.
- DEMERARA, Dutch colonies in Guiana, iv. 266.
- DENAIN, battle of, iv. 74.
- DENDERMONDE, taken by Marlborough, 1706, iv. 56.
- DENBIGH, Lord, emissary of Parliament to Charles I., iii. 54, 55.
- , Lord, supporter of Bute in House of Lords, iv. 221.
- DENMAN, THOMAS, afterwards Lord (1779-1854), advocate of Queen Caroline, iv. 407.
- DENMARK, forms alliance with France, England and other powers against House of Austria (1624), ii. 411; at war with Sweden (1659), iii. 210; concludes peace with England at Breda (1667), 261; war with Sweden ended by intervention of England (1720-1721), iv. 120; included in treaty of

- Hanover (1725), 133; joins Russia against England, iv. 344; concludes armistice with England after battle of Copenhagen (1801), 353; its possession of Schleswig-Holstein provinces a source of irritation to Germany, v. 344; at war with Austria and Prussia for possession of those provinces 1863-1864), 345, 346; consents to negotiate with Prussia, 347.
- DENMARK, ANNE of, wife of James I. of England, ii. 392.
- , Prince GEORGE of. See George of Denmark.
- , Sovereigns of:—
- CHRISTIAN II. (1481-1559), at Bruges, ii. 40.
- FREDERICK II. (1534-1588), sends his nephew, Duke of Holstein, to England as aspirant for Elizabeth's hand, ii. 278.
- CHRISTIAN IV. (1577-1648), brother-in-law of James I., ii. 391; visits England, 392.
- FREDERICK V. (1723-1766), neutral in Seven Years' War, iv. 195.
- VI. (1768-1839), as crown-prince, concludes armistice with Nelson (1801), iv. 353; rejects alliance with England, 382.
- VII. (1808-1863), his death, v. 345.
- CHRISTIAN IX., Prince of Schleswig-Holstein, forced into war with Austria and Prussia (1864), v. 345.
- DENNY, Sir ANTHONY, gentleman of the bed-chamber to Henry VIII., ii. 219.
- DEPUTIES, Chamber of, Marshal Soult's speech in, v. 16.
- DERBY, limit of Scottish expedition into England, iv. 167; outbreak in, on rejection of Reform Bill (1831), 438.
- , Countess of, Charlotte de la Trémoille, iii. 144; her defence of Isle of Man, 147.
- , Earl of, in Guienne (1345), i. 301; in Gascony, 304; besieged in Bordeaux (1346), 311; at bridge of Nieulay, 314.
- , Earl of, Thomas Stanley, at reception of Charles V. in England (1520), ii. 133.
- , Earl of, James Stanley (1606-1651), joins Charles II.'s invasion of England, is defeated by Lilburne, iii. 144; executed, 147.
- , Earl of, Charles Stanley, son of the above, revolts in favor of Charles II., imprisoned, iii. 213.
- , Earl of, Edward Stanley (1799-1869), prime minister (1852), v. 146; resigns, 147; his cabinet nominally in favor of protection, 153; fails in attempt to form cabinet on resignation of Aberdeen, 217; his motion censuring Sir John Bowring, 238; his Indian Bill rejected, 277; becomes prime minister on resignation of Palmerston, 286; character, 297; resigns, 299; prime minister on Russell's resignation (1866), 363; passage of Disraeli's Reform Bill during his administration, 366-368; his severity to Fenian leaders, 372; withdraws from public life, 375; speech in defence of Irish church, 385, 386; death, 386. See Lord Stanley.
- DERWENTWATER, Ratcliffe, Earl of, joins insurrection of 1715, iv. 99; surrenders himself as hostage, 101; accused of high treason, 107; executed, 108.
- DESBOROUGH, General, Republican, brother-in-law of Oliver Cromwell, proposes to prolong income-tax on royalists, iii. 177; urges Cromwell to refuse title of king, 178, 179; conversation with Pride, 183; Republican leaders assemble at his house, 197; urges Richard Cromwell to convoke council of officers, 201; instigator of disturbances in the army, 203; demands dissolution of Parliament, 204; presents petition of the army to Parliament, 215; appears before Council of State, 216; excluded from amnesty, 253.
- DESMOND, Earl of, attempts to incite rebellion in Ireland against Henry VIII., ii. 144.
- , Earl of, rival of Ormond, ii. 347; beheaded (1579), 348.
- DESPENCER, Earl of Winchester, father of Hugh le Despencer, i. 282; executed by Queen Isabella, 284.
- , HUGH le, favorite of Edward II., i. 280; banished, recalled, 281; the queen's hostility to, 282; his advice to Edward, 283; arrested and executed, 284.
- DES ROCHES, PIERRE, Bishop of Winchester, shares power with Hubert de Burgh, i. 223; their rivalry, 224.
- D'ESTE, MARY BEATRICE. See Mary of Modena.
- DEREHAM, FRANCIS, cousin of Catherine Howard, executed, ii. 199.
- DETTINGEN, battle of, iv. 153.
- DEVEREUX, WALTER, brother of Earl of Essex, killed at siege of Rouen, ii. 344.
- DEVICOTAH, captured by Lally-Tollendal, iv. 208.
- DEVIL'S DYKE, i. 32.
- DEVIZES, Castle of, fortified by Bishop of Salisbury, i. 145.
- DEVON, Jeffreys' cruelty in, iii. 322.
- DEVONSHIRE, Duchess of, Georgiana (1757-1806), partisan of Charles Fox, iv. 303.
- , Duke of, William Cavendish, (1640-1707), as Earl signs invitation to Prince of Orange, iii. 346; accompanies William III. to Holland, 389; raised to dukedom, 404; sends Fenwick's confession to William, iv. 21; in council of Queen Anne, 81.
- , Earl of, beheaded after battle of Towton (1461), ii. 52, 58.
- , Earl of, defends Exeter against Perkin Warbeck (1499), ii. 107.
- DE WINTER, Admiral, in command of Dutch fleet, defeated at battle of Camperdown, iv. 338.
- DE WITT, CORNELIS, brother of John De Witt, in command of Dutch fleet against Blake, defeated (1652), iii. 157; his report to the states-general, 167, 168; in command of Dutch fleet with De Ruyter, ascends the Thames (1666), 261; killed in revolution in Holland (1672), 269.
- , CORNELIS, his "History of Washington" quoted, iv. 231.
- , JOHN, Grand Pensioner of Holland

- (1625-1672), quoted, iii. 153; Beverning's letter to, 167; his letter to his ambassador in London, 210, 211; desire for peace with England, 248; for Protestant alliance, 265, 266; killed in Dutch revolution, 269; his influence on the development of Holland, iv. 75.
- DICKENS, CHARLES (1812-1870), English novelist, v. 168.
- DICKINSON, Pennsylvania delegate to Congress, iv. 239.
- DIET, Imperial, right of King of Denmark to a seat in, v. 344.
- DIGBY, Sir EVERARD (1581-1606), joins Catesby's conspiracy (1605), ii. 389; arrested, 390; executed, 391.
- , Lord, becomes confidant of Charles I., ii. 447; his conduct in regard to the five members, iii. 13, 14; enmity to Prince Rupert, 67; defeated at Sherbourne, 68; the king's letter to, 75.
- DIGGES, Sir DUDLEY, imprisoned by Charles I., ii. 414.
- DILKE, CHARLES, his inquiry in regard to employment of crown revenues, v. 405; attacks on monarchy in England, 406.
- DINANT, restored by Louis XIV. at peace of Ryswick, iv. 23.
- DIOCLETIAN, Roman emperor, persecution of Christians in time of, i. 27.
- DIRECTORY, French, established (1795), iv. 328; preparations for invasion of England, 333; overthrown by Bonaparte, 344.
- DISCOVERERS:—
- CABOT, JOHN and Sebastian, ii. 113.
- COLUMBUS, CHRISTOPHER, ii. 112.
- GAMA, VASCO DA, doubles Cape of Good Hope, ii. 113.
- RALEIGH, Sir WALTER, discoveries in North America, iv. 361.
- DISPENSING power, James II.'s claim to recognized, iii. 330; he refuses concessions in regard to, 349.
- DISRAELI, BENJAMIN (1805-1881), his attacks on Sir Robert Peel, v. 76, 77, 82; growth of his reputation, 126; chancellor of the exchequer in Derby's cabinet (1852), 147; his challenge to the Liberals, 238; indignation at cruelty of the English in India, 266; comment on Ellenborough's resignation, 275; opposes "Conspiracy to Murder" Bill, chancellor of the exchequer in Derby's cabinet of 1853, 285; Jews admitted to Parliament during his ministry, 292; becomes leader of the Conservatives, 297; his Reform Bill, 298; criticism of Russell's Reform Bill, 306; attack on course of the government in regard to Denmark, 347, 348; opponent of Gladstone, 351; becomes chancellor of exchequer and leader of House of Commons (1866), 363; unsuccessful measures for Parliamentary reform, 365, 363; passage of his Reform Bill (1867), 366, 367; succeeds Lord Derby as prime minister (1868), resigns, 383; his amendment to Gladstone's Tenant-right Bill, 388; attack on Irish University Bill, 408; declines to form cabinet, 408, 409.
- DISSENTERS, oppose religious instruction in state schools, v. 401, 402; oppose Irish University Bill, 408.
- DIVORCE, Court of, established, v. 287.
- DODDINGTON, GEORGE BUBB, his comment on Pitt, iv. 218.
- DOGGER-BANK, the, naval engagement between Dutch and English off, iv. 266.
- DOLGOROUKI, Prince, Gortschakoff's letter to, v. 227, 228.
- DOMESDAY BOOK, compiled in reign of William the Conqueror, i. 116.
- DOMFRONT, captured by Henry V., i. 395.
- DOMINICA, retained by the English at peace of Fontainebleau, iv. 219.
- DOMINIQUE, captured by the French (1778), iv. 253.
- DOMITIAN, Roman emperor, i. 24.
- DONCASTER, Prior of, hanged, ii. 198.
- DON ANTONIO, aspires to crown of Portugal, ii. 343.
- DORISLAUS, Dr., assassinated, iii. 150.
- DORSET, Monmouth's insurrection in, 314, 315; Jeffreys' cruelty in, 322.
- , Duke of, father of Lord George Sackville, iv. 210.
- , Earl of, ambassador of Henry V. to France, i. 384.
- , Earl of, Charles Sackville (1637-1706), accompanies William III. to Holland, iii. 389.
- , Marquis of, deprived of his title by Henry IV., i. 361.
- , Marquis of, proclaims Henry VII., ii. 79; rewarded by Henry, 89.
- , Marquis of, commands army of Henry VIII. in France, ii. 119, 120.
- DORSETSHIRE, agitation against Corn-Laws in, v. 73.
- DOST MOHAMMED, prince of Afghanistan, seeks alliance with England, v. 47; driven from his throne, his attempt to regain it, 48; surrenders to the English, 49; restored to the throne of Cabul, 56; at war with Persia, 239.
- DOUAI, captured by Marshal Villars, iv. 74.
- DOUELLEUS, captured by Spanish army, ii. 344.
- DOUGLAS, Sir ARCHIBALD, brother of James the Good, regent of Scotland, killed at Halidon Hill, i. 294.
- , the Black, anecdote of, i. 289.
- , Earl of, James the Good, makes raid into England, i. 279; at head of Scottish army, 288; his answer to Edward III., 289; carries the heart of Bruce to Palestine, 291; slain by Moors of Spain (1330), 293.
- , Earl of, James, killed at Chevy Chase (1388), i. 351.
- , Earl of, his daughter marries Duke of Rothesay, i. 367; made prisoner at Homildon Hill, 368; set free, 369; joins Lord Buchan in France, 406; made Duc de Touraine, ii. 16; killed before Verneuil (1424), 17.
- , Sir GEORGE, conspirator in interest of England in reign of Henry VIII., ii. 206.
- , Sir GEORGE, one of the murderers of Rizzio, ii. 286.

- DOUGLAS, of Liddesdale, accompanies King David on expedition against England (1346), i. 301.
- , Sir JOHN, mortally wounded at battle of Worcester, iii. 146.
- , Lady MARGARET, mother of Lord Darnley, ii. 283.
- , WILLIAM, custodian of Mary Stuart at Lochleven, ii. 292.
- DOURO, the, crossed by English army under Wellesley, iv. 389.
- , BARON. See Duke of Wellington.
- DOVER CASTLE, attacked by the Normans, i. 109; besieged by Prince Louis (Louis VIII.), 219, 222.
- DOVER, treaty of (1670), iii. 267, 268; feeling in England concerning it, 308.
- , Lord, Henry Jermyn, made privy councillor by James II., iii. 330; refuses to aid escape of Prince of Wales, 354.
- DOWNES, Colonel, member of tribunal for trial of Charles I., 113.
- DOYLEY, Colonel, in Parliamentary army at Naseby, iii. 62.
- DRAKE, Sir FRANCIS (1540-1595), admiral of Queen Elizabeth, ii. 323; destroys Spanish shipping, 337, 338; in command against Spaniards, 339; engaged in battle with the Armada, 341; his letter to Walsingham, 342; his voyage round the world, 361; rescues settlers in Virginia, 362.
- DRAYTON, battle of, ii. 46.
- DRESDEN, bombardment of, by Frederick the Great, iv. 212.
- , battle of, iv. 399.
- DROGHEDA, capture of, by Cromwell, iii. 132; Jacobite army at, 378, 382.
- DROUOT, French Bonapartist general, iv. 385.
- DRUIDS, i. 14, 20, 21.
- DRUMMOND, Lord, John, joins the Pretender in Scotland, his notification to the Dutch in English army, iv. 172.
- DRURY, Sir DREW, custodian of Mary Stuart, ii. 325.
- , Sir WILLIAM, at Berwick, ii. 306.
- , Lane Theatre, iv. 94.
- DRUSES, their massacre of the Maronites, v. 314.
- DRYDEN, JOHN, English dramatist, iii. 302; receives thirteen hundred pounds for his Virgil, 407.
- DUBLIN, captured by Northumbrian Danes, i. 63; Trinity College founded at, ii. 363; besieged by royalists, iii. 131; James II. at, 378; entered by William III., 385.
- , University of, condemns Mr. Gladstone's project, v. 408.
- DUBOIS, ABBÉ, former tutor of Duke of Orleans, at head of foreign affairs, iv. 110; negotiates Triple Alliance of 1717, with England and Holland, 111, 112; becomes secretary of foreign affairs, 112; discovers conspiracy of Cellamare, 116; consults Lord Stanhope on overtures of Alberoni, 119.
- , de la MOTTE, French admiral, iv. 189.
- DUCLOS, CHARLES PINEAU, his "Mémoires" quoted, iv. 119.
- DUDLEY, EDMUND, agent of Henry VII., ii. 111; his exactions, 116; his execution, 118.
- , Lord, Guilford, marries Lady Jane Grey, ii. 230; imprisoned in the Tower 242, 244; sentence of death against him not executed, 246; order of his execution signed by Mary, 250; his death, 251.
- , Lord, Robert, (see Earl of Leicester).
- DUFAURE, M., counsel of Montalembert, v. 275.
- DUFFERIN, Lord, English commissioner to the Porte, v. 314; his account of Turkish cruelty in the Lebanon, 315.
- DUGUAY-TROUIN, French privateer, iii. 402.
- DUMBLANE, occupied by Argyle, iv. 101.
- DUMFERMLINE, abbey of, Scotch barons negotiate peace with Edward I. at, i. 264.
- DUMOURIEZ, CHARLES FRANÇOIS (1729-1823), general-in-chief of army of French Convention, defeats the allies at Jemappes, iv. 322; his overtures to the enemy; takes refuge in England, 325.
- DUMBARTON, captured by Edward I., i. 253; DUNBURY, Sir GILES, partisan of Henry VII., ii. 89.
- DUNCAN, Lord, desertion of his fleet to the mutineers (1797), iv. 336; his mortification, 336, 337; defeats Dutch at Camperdown, 338.
- DUNBAR, captured by Edward I., i. 253; recovered by Bruce, 276; battle of, iii. 141.
- , Earl of, George Hume, agent of James I. in Scotland, 398.
- DUNDAS (1785-1862), English admiral in Crimean War, v. 177, 185.
- , Sir JOHN, nominates Fox for borough of Kirkwall, iv. 303.
- , HENRY (see Lord Melville).
- DUNDEE, Viscount (John Graham of Claverhouse) (1650-1689), his cruelty to prisoners at Bothwell Bridge, iii. 284; persecution of Covenanters, 306; heads insurrection in favor of James II., 374, 375, 376; his death at Killiecrankie, 377, 378.
- DUNES, battle of the, iii. 191.
- DUNKELLIN, Lord, his amendment to Reform Bill of 1866, v. 362, 363.
- DUNKIRK, besieged by the Spaniards, iii. 154; by the French under Turenne, 190; captured; surrendered by Louis XIV. to the English, 1658, 191; sold to France by Charles II., 260; feeling in England in regard to, 308; claimed by England, iv. 60; placed as a pledge in hands of the English, 72; debate on, in Parliament, 141; razed to the ground, 216.
- DUNOIS, Bastard of Orleans, ii. 21, 22, 23; his reception of Joan of Arc, 24; takes Rouen, 40.
- DUNSTAN, abbot of Glastonbury. See Canterbury, Archbishops of.
- DUPLIN HEATH, battle of, i. 293.
- DUPPLIN, Lord, arrested for complicity in Jacobite plot, in 1815, iv. 99.
- DUPLEIX, JOSEPH (1695-1763), governor-general of Pondicherry, his rivalry with La Bourdonnais, his marriage and character, iv. 202; successes in India arouse suspicions of French government, 203; supports cause of Chunda Sahib; compelled to yield to Clive; recalled, 204; reception in France, his death, 205.

DUPLESSIS-MORNAY, advises Henry IV. to send Essex to England, ii. 344.

DUPONT, French Bonapartist general, his defeat and capitulation at Baylen, iv. 386.

DUQUESNE, Fort. See Fort Duquesne.

—, Marquis, French governor of Canada (1754), his forts in valley of the Ohio, iv. 188.

DURHAM, Normans massacred at, i. 110.

—, Bishop of, imprisoned by the Normans, i. 111.

—, Bishop of, at battle of the Standard, i. 141.

—, Bishop of, sent to castle of Brechin by Edward I., i. 253; warned of Scotch attack, 261; in command at Falkirk, 262.

—, Bishop of, a chief of Catholic party in reign of Henry VIII., ii. 197.

—, Bishop of (Nathaniel Crewe), ecclesiastical commissioner under James II., iii. 331.

—, Bishop of, letter of Lord John Russell to, v. 237.

—, Lord (1792-1840), governor-general of Canada (1838), his character, v. 18; dictatorial measures, 18, 19; recall and death; his report the basis of reforms in constitution of Canada, 19; measures compared to those of Lord Canning in India, 273.

DUTCH, the, allies of Queen Elizabeth, ii. 339; their method of warfare, 341; enormous subsidies furnished them by Elizabeth, 346; ascend the Thames, iii. 261; preference of William III. for, 367; under him in Ireland, 333; distinguish themselves at Beachy Head and Fleurus, 386; guards of William III., dismissed, iv. 31; indignation of Parliament at grants bestowed upon, 37; occupy frontier towns of Spanish Netherlands, 39; withdraw, 40; their desire for peace, 59; auxiliary troops sent to assist English government in 1715, 103; claim commercial advantages in Triple Alliance, 112; join Quadruple Alliance, 112; in army of Duke of Cumberland, obliged to leave Scotland, 172.

DWELLINGS, early British, i. 17.

DYKWELT, EVERARD VAN, envoy of William of Orange, his interview of James II., iii. 345; brings to William the congratulations of his native country, 360.

E.

EALAN GHIEREY, castle of, captured by troops of James II., iii. 312.

EASTER, celebrated by British Christians on the date fixed by the Greek Church, celebration of, by Western Church, i. 34.

EASTERN QUESTION, the, policy of Nicholas of Russia in regard to, 172-176; of England, 176.

EAST INDIA COMPANY, English, origin of, ii. 362; Parliament occupied with affairs of, iii. 392; convicted of having corrupted the ministers of William III., iv. 14; empowers Lord Clive to reorganize interior Administration of Bengal; authority of, permanently established, 1767, 282; appoints Hastings Governor of Bengal, 285; change in organization of its government, 286; supports policy of Hastings, 287; accepts his resignation; confirms his title, 288; refuses to displace him, 290; tenders its thanks on his return, 290, 291; Oudh under protection of; employs native troops, v. 242; pensions Bajee Rao, 251; its control over India; 271, 272; the mutiny a death-blow to its power, 276; efforts to maintain its position, 277; its government in India ended by Bill of 1858, 278.

EAST INDIA COMPANY, French, at war with the English in India, iv. 203-209; final loss of its power, 209.

"ECCLESIASTICAL TITLES" BILL (see Parliament of 1849).

ECLUSE, taken by Lowendall, iv. 179.

EDGAR, Anglo-Saxon King, i. 65, 66.

—, ATHELING, son of Edward Atheling, i. 88-91; chosen king of England, 106; swears allegiance to William the Conqueror, 107; in Normandy, 108; assumes title of king, 110; takes refuge in Scotland, 111; received into favor by the Conqueror, 112; his life at Rouen, 112.

EDGEHILL, battle of, iii. 27, 28.

EDINBURGH, captured by Edward I., i. 253; recovered by Bruce, 276; taken by Montrose, iii. 66; taken possession of by Charles Edward, iv. 160, 161; visit of George IV. to, 416; excitement in, over Reform Bill of 1831, 436.

EDINBURGH CASTLE, Mary of Guise, dies at, ii. 276; held for James II. (1689) surrendered, iii. 376.

EDINBURGH, treaty of (1560), ii. 276, 277; Mary Stuart refuses to ratify it, 288.

—, University of, founded (1852), ii. 363.

EDITH, daughter of Earl Godwin, and wife of Edward the Confessor, i. 81-83-86.

— (the Swan-necked), i. 105.

EDMUND, Anglo-Saxon king, i. 64.

— (Ironsides), i. 74, 75.

—, son of Edmund Ironsides, i. 75.

—, brother of Edward I., i. 251; death of, 254.

EDRED, third king of the Anglo-Saxons, i. 64.

EDWARD, son of Alfred the Great, i. 52-61; his reign, 63.

—, sixth king of the Anglo-Saxons, i. 66; murdered, 67.

—, the Confessor, son of Ethelred the Unready and Emma of Normandy, i. 73; makes attempt on England, 79; marries daughter of Godwin and becomes King, 81; his preference for the Normans, jealousy of the English, 82; banishes Godwin, 83; summons William of Normandy to his court, 84; his friendly reception of him, threatened in London by army of Godwin, 85; forced to consent to demands of Godwin, his hatred for him, 86; his affection for Harold, son of Godwin, 87; sends for Edward Atheling, advises Harold not to go to Normandy, 88; his death and burial, 91.

EDWARD I., as prince, marries Eleanor of Castile, i. 229; is governor of Gascony, 231; takes oath required by barons, 232; offers his support to them, 233; embraces his father's cause, 234; made prisoner by the barons, 235; attacks Earl of Leicester's camp, 236; at battle of Evesham, 237; assumes the cross, 239; joins the French King at Tunis, 241; wounded by Arab assassin at Acre, 242; hears of his father's death, 243; visits France, 243; his tournament at Chalons, 243, 244; is crowned, persecutes the Jews, 244; prosperity of his kingdom, begins war with Wales, 245; his government of Wales, 246; represses rebellion there, 247, 248; death of his wife, 248; arbitrates on claims to the crown of Sicily, 248; on claims to that of Scotland, 249, 250; decides in favor of Baliol, 250; prepares to reclaim French provinces, 251; subdues insurrection in Wales, 251; marches against Baliol, 253; his treatment of Scotland, 254; imposes immense taxes in England, 255; undertakes expedition to Flanders and Guienne, 255; his appeal to the people, 256; signs act of Parliament at Ghent, 257; concludes peace with France, marries Princess Margaret, 258; marches against Wallace, 261; defeats him at Falkirk, 262; ratifies concessions to Parliament, 263; gains Guienne by treaty of Montreuil, marches again into Scotland, 264; condemns Wallace to death, 265; his oath to avenge Comyn, 267; his illness at Carlisle, 268; marches in person against Bruce, 270; his death, inscription over his tomb, 270; liberties secured during his reign, 270, 271.

II., son of Edward I., first Prince of Wales, i. 248; declared regent, 256; affianced to Isabel of France, 258; succeeds his father, his weakness of character, 271; his affection for Gaveston, makes him Earl of Cornwall and regent, his marriage, 272; is forced to banish Gaveston, appoints him governor of Ireland, 273; recalls him, convenes Parliament, stipulations of the barons, 274; agrees to their demands, escapes with Gaveston, 275; marches against Scotland, 276; attacks the Scotch near Bannockburn, 277; is defeated, 278; besieges Berwick, obliged to abandon it, 279; concludes truce with Scotland, his attachment to Despencer, 280; is obliged to banish him and his father, recalls them, marches against Hereford and Lancaster, defeats them, 281; allows his wife to go to France, is persuaded to cede Guienne and Ponthieu to his son, endeavors to appease the queen, 283; London refuses to assist him against the queen, surrenders himself, 284; deposed by Parliament, 285; imprisoned in Berkeley Castle, 286; murdered, 287.

III., as prince, accompanies his mother to France, i. 283; proclaimed king, 285; his minority, 286-288; marches against the Scots, 289; surprised by Douglas, in his camp, marries Philippa of Hainault, 290; under the control of his mother, 291; birth of his son, arrests Mortimer, 292; espouses the cause of Baliol, 294; his claim to the crown of France, 295; begins the "Hundred Years War," 296; meets the French fleet at Sluys, 297; compelled to consent to truce, 298; concludes armistice with Scotland, 299; again invades France, 300; arranges truce, re-opens hostilities, 301; attempts to establish his son in Flanders, 302; his schemes frustrated by death of Artevelde, 303; lands at La Hogue, 304; advances to Paris, 305; crosses the Somme, 306; prepares for battle at Crécy, 307; his message to his son, 310; congratulates him after the victory, lays siege to Calais, 311; receives Copeland, 313; his message to King Philip, 314; offers conditions to Calais, 315; receives the six citizens, grants their lives to Philippa, 317; takes possession of Calais, concludes truce with France, 318; crosses again into France, his encounter with Ribamont, 318; his victory over Spanish pirates, conference at Guines, 320; ravages Scotland, 321; his son in France, 321-326; receives John of France in London, his treaty with Scotland, 326; conditions of his treaty with France, 327, 328; repulsed before Rheims, 328; concludes peace with France and renounces his pretensions to the crown, 329; claims sovereignty of Aquitaine, 334; sends reinforcements to his son in France, 334; his reverses, 336; influence of Alice Ferrers over him, death of his son, 337; his last public act, 338; his death, 338, 339.

EDWARD IV., as Earl of March, supports his father's cause, ii. 43; wins battle of Wigmore, 49; enters London and is proclaimed king, 50; takes possession of the throne, 51; defeats Lancastrians at Towton, 52; is crowned, 53; pardons Somerset and Percy, 54; his marriage, 56; his breach with Warwick, 57, 58; capture at Middleham, 58, 59; purchases his liberty; accuses Warwick of treason, 59; flees to Low Countries, 60; his return, 61; his reception, 62; defeats Lancastrians at Barnet and Tewkesbury, 63; his revenge upon them, 64; his war with France, 65; his interview with Louis XI., 66, 67; their treaty, 67, 68; imprisons Clarence, 69; his Scottish war, 69, 70; his death, 71.

V., his birth, ii. 61; declared heir to the throne, 65; receives oaths of fidelity, 71; in the power of Gloucester, 72; lodged in the Tower, 73; conspiracy in his favor, 77; murdered, 78.

VI., his birth, ii. 190; promised in marriage to Mary Stuart, 207; his Protestantism, 218; under influence of Lord Seymour, 223; abandons him, 224; insurrection in his reign, 224, 226, 227; causes of disaffection, 225; abandons Somerset; his health declining, 230; his zeal for the Protestant faith, 231; progress of the Reformation during his reign, 231, 232; struggle between Cranmer and Gardiner, 232;

- extension of the royal power, 233; liturgy of the English church introduced, 233, 234; controversy among the bishops, 234, 235; his efforts to convert the Princess Mary, 233; his act regulating the succession, 237; his death, 233.
- EDWARD, the Black Prince, his birth, i. 292; his father's plans to establish him in Flanders, 302; placed in command by his father, 307; at battle of Crecy, 310; his peril during engagement with Spanish pirates; his expedition into Guienne, 320; overruns French provinces; meets French army at Poitiers, 321; his small force; consents to negotiations with French king, 322; does not agree to French demands; his address to his knights, 323; his victory, 324, 325; his reception of King John, 325; concludes truce; conducts King John to London, 325; marries Joan of Kent, 330; establishes himself at Aquitaine, 331; supports Peter of Castile, 331, 332; his victory at Navarette; his subsequent misfortunes, 332; returns to Guienne; his ill health, 333; makes war on Charles V. of France; his siege and capture of Limoges, 334, 335; end of his military career, 335; his death; grief of the people, 337.
- , Prince, son of Henry VI., his birth, ii. 44; flees into Scotland with his mother, 46; excluded from succession, 48; again takes refuge in Scotland, 53; his adventure with outlaws, 54, 55; married to Anne of Warwick, 60; made prisoner at Tewkesbury, 63; killed, 64.
- , son of Richard III., declared legitimate heir to the throne, 79; his death, 81.
- , son of John Balliol, promised in marriage to Jane of Valois, i. 252.
- ATHELING, son of Edmund Ironsides, i. 75, 83.
- EDWIN, Saxon king of Northumbria, accepts Christianity, i. 33; becomes Bretwalda, 39; disturbances after death of, 39.
- , son of Elfgar, count of Mercia, his sister marries King Harold, i. 93; marches against Tostig, 97; attempts to resist the Normans after Hastings, 103; taken to Normandy by William the Conqueror, 108; withdraws from the court, 109; his death, 111.
- EDWY, the Fair, Anglo-Saxon king, i. 64, 65.
- EGBERT, Saxon king of Wessex, Bretwalda, i. 40.
- EGERTON, Lord Keeper, demands explanation of proceedings of Earl of Essex, ii. 351; at deathbed of Elizabeth, 355.
- EGMONT, Count, emissary of Philip II., ii. 253; victorious at Gravelines, 262.
- EGREMONT, Lord, in Westmoreland's insurrection, ii. 304.
- , Lord (Secretary of State, 1763), signs warrant for arrest of Wilkes, iv. 222.
- EGYPT, Bonaparte's expedition to (1798), iv. 343; restored to the Porte by peace of Amiens, 354; Mohammed Ali's claims upon, v. 34, 35; Lord Palmerston's policy in regard to, 36; secured to Mohammed Ali by convention of July, 1841, 48; offered to England by the Czar, 175.
- "EIKON BASILIKE," iii. 124.
- ELBA, island of, Napoleon exiled in, iv. 400.
- ELDON, Lord, John Scott (1751-1838), consulted by George III. on abolition of the Test Act, iv. 346; his friendship for Pitt; becomes chancellor in Addington's cabinet, 1801, 351; his correspondence with Pitt, 362; account of Pitt's indignation with Grenville, 363; chancellor in Portland's cabinet, 1807, 381; his remarks on Queen Caroline, 403; opposed to Catholic emancipation, 421; interview with George IV., 422.
- ELEANOR of Aquitaine, divorced wife of Louis VII. of France, marries Henry II. of England, i. 147; her claims on Toulouse, 152; imprisoned by Henry II. 175; much beloved in Aquitaine, 178; restored to liberty, 179; again imprisoned, 180; liberated by Richard, 185; powers intrusted to, 187; besieged by Arthur at Mirebeau, 205; retires to Fontevraud, 206.
- , of Brittany, sister of Prince Arthur, i. 206.
- , of Castile, daughter of King Alphonso, wife of Edward I. of England, i. 229; assumes the cross, 239; legend concerning her, 242; birth of her son, 248.
- , de Clare, sister of Earl of Gloucester, wife of Hugh Le Despencer, i. 280.
- , widow of Earl of Pembroke, marries Simon de Montfort, i. 231.
- , of Provence, wife of Henry III. of England, i. 223; Henry V. claims Provence as her descendant, 355.
- ELECTOR PALATINE. See Bohemia.
- ELFGAR, son of Leofric of Mercia, i. 87, 93.
- ELFRIC, Mercian chief, i. 71.
- ELFRIDA, Queen of Edgar, i. 66; murders her stepson, Edward, 67.
- ELGIN, Lord (1811-1863), plenipotentiary of England, signs treaty of Tien-tsin with China (1858), v. 308; sent back to obtain ratification of it, 310; consents to negotiations at Tung-chow, advances on Peking, 311; destroys Summer Palace in retaliation for murder of English prisoners, 312; defence of his conduct, 313; his death, 348.
- ELGIVA, queen of Edwy the Fair, i. 64, 65.
- EL-HASSIZ, Emir, said to have refused aid to King John, i. 208.
- ELIOT, Sir JOHN, imprisoned by Charles I., ii. 414.
- ELIZABETH, Queen, her birth (1533), ii. 172; as princess declared illegitimate, 184; restored to her civil rights and title to the throne, 208; Seymour aspires to her hand, 223; Northumberland's aim to exclude her from the succession, 231; warned of his design, 239; her conduct on the accession of Jane Grey, 242; feigns return to Catholicism, 244; Mary's coldness to, 246; Wyatt's insurrection in her favor, 248-250; sent for by Mary, 250; disclaims complicity in insurrection, 251; imprisoned in the Tower, 252; restored to liberty, 254; professes Catholicism, projects for her marriage, 263; her learning, her accession announced (1558), 226; inclines to Protestantism, 267; her coronation, forbids controversial preaching, 268; her measures concerning religion, 269; proclaims her aversion to marriage, 270; proposals of Philip to her, 271; makes peace with France, hears of Philip's marriage, 272; her measures against Catholics, 273, 274; her marriage with Arran suggested, 274; supports Protestants in Scotland, 275, 276; her suitors, 277, 278; her bitter feeling toward Mary Stuart, 279; her jealous disposition, 280; sends assistance to Huguenots, 281; makes peace with France, 282; her negotiations respecting Mary Stuart's marriage, 283; her violent opposition to Darnley, 284; her reception of Murray and Châtelherault, 285; hears of birth of Mary's son, sends Bedford to be present at his baptism, 287; her negotiations with Mary Stuart, 288; her anger at Mary's arrest, 292; her reception of the fugitive queen, 294; her offers of arbitration refused, her suspicion of Mary, 295; institutes commission for trial of Mary, 296; her motives for imprisoning Mary, 297; her foreign relations, 298, 299; resumes her matrimonial negotiations, 299; her fears concerning marriage of Norfolk and Mary Stuart, 300; warned of Leicester's plot, 301; her perilous position, 302; her seizure of Spanish fleet, conspiracy against her, 303; demands surrender of insurgents, 304; her declaration, supports Morton, 305; excommunicated, 306; growth of Puritans in her reign, 307; her contest with them in Parliament, 308; her overtures to France, 309; her marriage with Alençon proposed, 310; her hesitation to sign Norfolk's sentence, yields to Parliament, 312; her action after the massacre of St. Bartholomew, 314, 315; procures peace of St. Germain's, 316; refuses the protectorate of Holland, 317; promises to marry Duke of Anjou, 318; her change of mind, her sorrow at Anjou's death, her anxiety concerning Scottish affairs, 319; her intercession for Morton, 320; her severity to Catholics and Nonconformists, 321; Protestant association for her protection, 322; sends Leicester with army to Low Countries, 323; her anger at his acceptance of the governorship, 324; nominates commission for trial of Mary Stuart, 326; hesitates to carry out the sentence, 329, 330; receives embassy from Henry III., 331; repels foreign intervention, 332; signs Mary's death-warrant, 333; her conduct after the execution, 336; opens hostilities with Spain, 337; excommunicated by Sixtus V., 338; her preparations for war, 338, 339; her address to her troops, 340; her economy, 341; her indifference to Leicester's death, 342; makes favorite of Essex, 343; ally of Henry of Navarre, 344; quarrel with Essex, 345; grief for Burleigh, 346; condition of Ireland in her reign, 347, 348; displeasure with Essex, 349, 350; her relations with James VI.,

353; convokes her last Parliament, 354; death, 355; her character, 356; finally establishes Anglican Church, 357; persecutes the Puritans, supports continental Reformers, 358; her economy, encouragement of commerce and manufactures, 359; growth of English navy in her reign, 359, 360; introduction of slave-trade, 360; voyages of discovery, Frobisher's, Drake's, Raleigh's, 360-362; grants charter to India Company, 326; development of learning in reign of, 363; poets and literary men, 364-382; her patronage of Spenser, 365; visit to Kenilworth, 366; Merry Wives of Windsor written by order of, 373.

ELIZABETH, sister of Edward IV., mother of Earl of Lincoln, ii. 92.

—, Princess, daughter of James I., betrothed to Count Palatine, ii. 395.

—, Princess, daughter of Charles I., iii. 86; her parting with her father, 115.

— WOODVILLE, queen of Edward IV., crowned, ii. 56; her family, 57; birth of her son in Westminster Abbey, 61; accusations against her, 72, 73; parts with her youngest son, 75; death of her sons, 78; reconciled with Richard III., 80; arrested by Henry VII. and imprisoned, 92.

— of York, daughter of Edward IV., promised in marriage to the Dauphin, ii. 67; not claimed by Louis XI., 70; projects for her marriage, 78, 80, 81; released from imprisonment, 84; her marriage with Henry VII., 88; her coronation, 94; kindness to Catherine Gordon, 108; death, 111.

ELLA, Saxon king of Sussex, i. 31, 35.

ELLENBOROUGH, Lord, made governor of India, his character, v. 54; his policy with regard to Afghanistan, 55; member of Peel's cabinet, 60; his attack on Lord Canning's policy in India, 274; his resignation, 275, 293.

ELLIOT, Captain, superintendent of English trade in China, v. 46.

—, General, Lord Heathfield (1718-1790), defence of Gibraltar, iv. 273, 274.

—, Sir THOMAS, ambassador to Charles V. of Germany, ii. 177.

—, accomplice in Lord Preston's plot, iii. 394.

ELLIS, Mr., member of the House of Commons, quoted, ii. 146.

ELPHEDGE. See Canterbury, Archbishops of. ELPHINSTONE, General, commander-in-chief of English army in Afghanistan, v. 50; his letter to General Sale, 52; death, 55.

ELY, Isle of, i. 32; Camp of Refuge, 111; held by the barons, 239.

—, Bishop of, nephew of Roger of Salisbury, arrested by Stephen, i. 142.

—, Bishop of, imprisoned by Richard of Gloucester, ii. 74; proposes Henry Tudor as heir to the throne, 78.

—, Bishop of, Francis Turner, signs petition against Declaration of Indulgence, iii. 338.

EMAUN-GHUR, fortress of, captured by Sir Charles Napier, v. 151.

EMMA, Flower of Normandy, marries Ethelred the Unready, i. 69; marries Canute,

- 76; tries to secure power for Hardicanute, 79; exiled to Flanders, 80; returns to England with Hardicanute, 80.
- EMPSON, RICHARD, agent of Henry VII., ii. 111; his exactions, 116; his execution, 118.
- ENGHIEN, Duc d' (1772-1804), indignation at his execution, iv. 363.
- ENNSKILLEN, refuge for Irish Protestants, iii. 369; successfully held against James II., 372; Protestants of, guard of William III., at battle of the Boyne, 384.
- ENNSKILLEENERS, regiment of English cavalry at Balaklava, v. 203.
- ERASMUS, friend of Sir Thomas More, ii. 177; his paraphrase of the New Testament, 233.
- ERIC, Duke of Sweden. See Sweden.
- , first Saxon king in England, i. 30.
- ERIE, Fort. See Fort Erie.
- ERFURT, interview of Napoleon and Alexander at, iv. 387.
- ERSKINE, Lord, receives Mary of Guise in Edinburgh Castle, ii. 276.
- , Lord, Thomas, (1750-1823), joins the government (1797), iv. 338.
- ESLING, battle of. See Aspern.
- ESPARTERISTES, political party in Spain, v. 112.
- ESSEQUIBO, Dutch colony in Guiana, iv. 266.
- ESSEX, Saxon kingdom of, founded, i. 31; subjugated by Egbert, 40.
- , Countess of, her marriage with Leicester, ii. 318.
- , Countess of, widow of Philip Sidney, ii. 345.
- , Countess of, divorced from her husband, marries Somerset, ii. 396.
- , Earl of, hereditary standard-bearer of English crown, i. 151.
- , Earl of, Walter Devereux (1540-1576), father of Elizabeth's favorite, his projects for colonizing Ireland, ii. 347.
- , Earl of, Robert Devereux (1567-1601), ii. 340; favorite of Elizabeth, 343; joins Henry of Navarre, 344; sent to Spain; his quarrel with Elizabeth, 345; withdraws from court, 346; his influence saves Perrot, 348; sent to Ireland, 349; loses favor of the queen, 349, 350; his conspiracy, 350; taken to the Tower, 351; condemned to death; beheaded, 352.
- , Earl of, Robert Devereux (1592-1647), son of the preceding, his wife marries Earl of Somerset, ii. 396; in command of royal army in Scotland, 425; his words concerning Charles I., 436; letter from Lord Holland, 439; in command of Parliamentary arms, iii. 25; entrusted with petition to the king, 26; opens battle of Edgehill, 27; falls back upon London, 28; hesitates to take the offensive, 29; discontent at his delay, 32, 33; his overtures for peace, 35; reinforced, 36; regains his authority, 37; relieves Gloucester, 38, 39; defeats royalists at Newbury, 39; his answer to the king, 45; besieges Oxford, 47; advances to Lyme and Exeter, 48; his fidelity to Parliament, 51, 52; defeated by Royalists, 52; asks for trial; Parliament raises new army for him, 53; efforts for peace, 54; resigns his command, 59; advice to his friends, 60.
- ESSEX, Earl of, iii. 276; leader of Whig party, 280; member of Privy Council of Charles II., 281; retires on dismissal of Shaftesbury, 282; in alliance with Shaftesbury to gain passage of Exclusion Bill, 285; connected with Whig conspiracy, against Charles II., 292; kills himself in prison, 293.
- ESTABLISHMENT, Act of, clause forbidding British sovereigns to leave the kingdom, repealed, iv. 110.
- ESTAING, Count d' (1729-1794), in command of French squadron for assistance of United States, iv. 247, 251; mobbed in Boston, 252; guerilla warfare in Antilles, 253; attempt against Savannah, 254.
- ESTOUTEVILLE, Sire d', governor of Harfleur, surrenders to Henry V., i. 386.
- ESTRÉES, Count d', Jean (1624-1707), fails to join Tourville at battle of La Hogue, ii. 398.
- , Count d', Louis (1697-1771), Marshal of France, his successes in Westphalia; address to his generals, iv. 194; defeats Duke of Cumberland, 194, 195; recalled to France, 195.
- ÉTAPLES, treaties of, ii. 99, 100.
- ETHANDUNE, battle of, i. 50.
- ETHELBALD, brother of Alfred the Great, i. 43; revolt of, 44.
- ETHELBERT, Saxon King of Kent, accepts Christianity, i. 35-37.
- , brother of Alfred the Great, i. 43.
- ETHELBURGA, Christian Queen of Northumbria, i. 38.
- ETHELPLEDA, daughter of Alfred the Great, wife of viceroys of Mercia, i. 54, 63.
- ETHELNOTH. See Canterbury, Archbishops of.
- ETHELRED, brother of Alfred the Great, i. 43; king of Wessex, 44.
- , Ealdorman or Duke, viceroy of Mercia under Alfred the Great, 54.
- , the Unready, son of Edgar and Elfrida, i. 66; crowned by Dunstan, 67; subjected to a tax by the Danes, 68, 69; his quarrel with Richard, Duke of Normandy; marries Emma of Normandy, 69; massacre of Danes in his reign, 69, 70; his kingdom invaded, 70, 71; his helplessness, 71; takes refuge in Isle of Wight, 73; flees to Normandy; is recalled to England; his death, 74.
- ETHELWULF, Saxon King of Wessex, i. 41; father of Alfred the Great, 42; marries daughter of Charles the Bold, 43; his death, 44.
- ETON COLLEGE, built by Henry VI., ii. 39.
- EU, Comte d', Constable of France, i. 304.
- , Comte d', taken prisoner at Agincourt, i. 392.
- EUGENE, Prince of Savoy-Carignan (1653-1736), at head of Austrian army in Italy against Louis XIV., iv. 41; recalled;

- joined by Marlborough, 52; at Blenheim, 53; victory before Turin, 56; anxious for continuance of war; repulsed before Toulon, 57; fails to join Marlborough before Oudenarde, 58; generosity to Boufflers after capture of Lille, 59; enmity to France, 62; wounded at Malplaquet, 64; comes to England in behalf of Marlborough, 71, 72; besieges Quesnoy, 72; captures it, 73; defeated by Villars at Denain, 74; negotiates peace of Rastadt, 76.
- EUGÉNIE, Empress, wife of Napoleon III., her visit to London, v. 221.
- EUGENIUS IV. See Papes.
- EUPATORIA, base of supplies for allied armies in Crimea, v. 218, 232.
- EUPHUISM, language used at Elizabeth's court, ii. 363.
- EUSTACE of Boulogne, brother-in-law of Edward the Confessor, i. 82, 105, 107.
- , Prince, son of King Stephen, i. 139, 144, 147; his death, 148.
- , the Monk, defeated by Hubert de Burgh, i. 222.
- EVANGELICAL PARTY in Church of England, v. 158, 159.
- EVANS, Sir de LACY, English general in Crimea, v. 208, 209; his illness, 211.
- , MARIAN (George Eliot), English author, v. 169, note.
- EVELYN, JOHN, quoted, iii. 303; his estimate of Queen Mary, iv. 13.
- EVERARD, leader of agitation against Parliament, iii. 26.
- EVESHAM, battle of, i. 236, 237.
- "EVIL TOLL," i. 255.
- EWERTZ, Dutch naval commander, iii. 168.
- EXCHANGE, the Royal, built, ii. 360.
- EXCISE BILL, Walpole's, its unpopularity, iv. 141.
- EXCLUSION BILL, Parliament prorogued for attempt to pass it, 281; violent discussions upon; defeated, 285; renewed attempt in favor of, 286; new bill passed in 1681, 287.
- EXETER, city of, captured by William the Conqueror, i. 109; besieged by insurgents under Arundel, ii. 226.
- , Bishop of, brother of Earl of Warwick, ii. 50.
- , Duke of, brother of Richard II., i. 357; detained as prisoner by Bolingbroke, 358; deprived of his title by Henry IV.; becomes Earl of Kent, 361.
- , Duke of, accompanies Margaret of Anjou in her flight to Scotland, ii. 53.
- , Marchioness of, executed as a relative of Cardinal Pole, ii. 194.
- , Marquis of, grandson of Edward IV., executed, ii. 194; father of Edward Courtenay, 246.
- EXMOUTH, Lord, commands expedition against Algiers (1816), iv. 404.
- EYLAU, battle of, iv. 381.
- EYRE, EDWARD JOHN, governor of Jamaica, his severe measures against insurgents, v. 353, 354, 355; conduct censured in England, 355.

F.

- FAGEL, Grand Pensionary of Holland, iii. 349.
- FAGON, physician of Louis XIV., consulted by William III., iv. 46.
- FAIRFAX, Lady, wife of Sir Thomas Fairfax, present at trial of Charles I., iii. 111, 112.
- , Lord, Ferdinando, father of Sir Thomas Fairfax, succeeds Hotham in command at Hull, iii. 36, 38.
- , Sir THOMAS, afterward Lord (1611-1671), refuses to join guard of Charles I., iii. 23; presents petition at Hayworth Moor, 24; his services to Parliament, 32; defeated at Atherton Moor, 34; forces Newcastle into York, 46; at battle of Marston Moor, 48-50; made commander-in-chief of Parliamentary forces, 58; besieges Oxford, 60; advances to meet the king, 61; is victorious at Naseby, 62, 63; his campaign in western counties, 64; besieges Bristol, 66; captures it, 67; his moderation, 69; defeats Hopton at Torrington, 71; advances on Oxford, 73; ordered to suppress disorders in the army, 79; convokes council of war, 80; loses power over the soldiers, 81; his dissatisfaction at Joyce's arrest of the king, 83; marches to London, 85; consents to withdraw, 86; appointed governor of the Tower, 89, 90; assists Cromwell in suppressing mutiny in the army, 96; his reception of Berkeley, 97; reduces insurgents in the south, 100, 101; in ignorance of proceedings of Republicans, 104; disapproves of trial of the king, 107; his wife present at the trial, 111, 112; his promises to Dutch embassy, 116; member of Council of State, 120; suppresses sedition in the army, 125, 126, 127, 128; appointed generalissimo of Parliamentary forces, 131; resigns his command, 138; in favor of the Restoration, 225; insurrection of, 226; refuses command of Monk's army, 227.
- FALAISE, castle of, Arthur imprisoned at, i. 205.
- FALCONBERG, Lord, proposes proclamation of Edward IV., ii. 50.
- FALCONBRIDGE, Lady, daughter of Oliver Cromwell, iii. 189.
- , Lord, beheaded under Henry IV., i. 372.
- , Lord, son-in-law of Cromwell, iii. 189; ambassador of Cromwell to Louis XIV. 191.
- FALKIRK, surrenders to Charles Edward, iv. 159; battles of, i. 262; iv. 170.
- FALKLAND, Lord, leader of the royalist party in the Long Parliament, ii. 443, 444; the king attempts to secure his support, 445; becomes Secretary of State, 446; member of Parliamentary deputation to the king, iii. 14; his death, 39, 40.
- FALLOUX, M. de, leader of liberal Catholics in France, v. 157.
- FAMILY COMPACT, signed by France and Spain, 1761, iv. 217.

- FARADAY, MICHAEL (1791-1867), v. 161.
- FARNESE, ALEXANDER. See Parma.
- , ELIZABETH, wife of Philip V. of Spain, iv. 113; attentions to the Pretender, 116; in Spanish camp, 118; indignation at Louis XV.'s rupture of contract with her daughter, 131.
- FARQUHAR, Sir WALTER, physician of William Pitt, iv. 375.
- FASSEFFERN, brother of Cameron of Lochiel, iv. 158.
- FASTOLF, Sir JOHN, conveys provisions into English camp, ii. 21, 22; at battle of Patay, 26, 27.
- FAWKES, GUY, accomplice in Catesby's plot; his statements, ii. 388; selected to fire the mine, 389; discovered by Suffolk, 389, 390; arrested, his examination, 390; his death, 391; custom of burning his effigy, 391.
- FAY, GODEMAR de, defends passage of Blanche-Tache, i. 306.
- FEAKE, Anabaptist preacher, iii. 165, 166.
- FEATHERSTONHAUGH, Sir TIMOTHY, executed by Parliament, iii. 147.
- FELTON JOHN, assassin of Duke of Buckingham, ii. 416.
- FENIANS, their rise in America, v. 369; movement against Canada, 370; unsuccessful insurrection in Ireland, 371; attempt to deliver prisoners in London, 372; their aims exclusively Irish, 373.
- FENWICK, Sir JOHN, a Jacobite, refuses to join in Barclay's conspiracy, iv. 18; his confession, 21; his execution, 22.
- , Lady MARY, wife of Sir John Fenwick, iv. 22.
- FERDINAND of Aragon, marriage of his daughter to son of Henry VII., ii. 105; persuades Henry VIII. to join league against France, 119; makes use of English army for his own ends, 120; concludes private peace with France, 122.
- , Prince of Saxe-Coburg, husband of Queen of Portugal, v. 114.
- , Emperors of Germany. See Germany.
- , Kings of Spain. See Spain.
- FERGUSON, exiled in Holland, iii. 309; his declaration against James II., 314, 315.
- FERIA, Count of, ambassador of Philip II. to Elizabeth, ii. 266; his negotiations concerning Philip's proposals, 271, 272.
- FERRAR, ROBERT, Bishop of St. David's, burned, ii. 255.
- FERRARA, Duke of, proposed as husband to Mary Stuart, ii. 283.
- , university of, declares in favor of divorce of Henry VIII. and Catharine of Aragon, ii. 167.
- FERRERS, ALICE. See Perrers.
- FEUDALISM, established in England by William the Conqueror, i. 116, 117, 132.
- FEVERSHAM, Louis de Duras, Earl of, at deathbed of Charles II., iii. 297; sent against insurgents under Monmouth, 315; victorious at Sedgemoor, 317; letter of James II. to, 354; disbands his troops, 354, 355; brings back James to Rochester, 356.
- FIELD of the Cloth of Gold, ii. 134-136.
- FIESCHI, his machine for assassination of Louis Philippe, v. 282.
- FINLAND, Duke of, brother of King of Sweden, ii. 277, 278.
- FINLAY, Mr., his claims against Greek government, v. 131.
- FIRE of London, iii. 262.
- FISHER, Bishop of Rochester, refuses oath of allegiance to children of Anne Boleyn, is sent to the Tower, ii. 174; beheaded, 175.
- FITZGERALD, Lord EDWARD, at head of insurrection of United Irish (1798), iv. 339; taken prisoner and mortally wounded, 340.
- FITZGERALDS, clan of, in Ireland, ii. 202, 347.
- FITZHARRIS, prosecuted for seditious pamphlet, executed, iii. 288.
- , Lord, account of Pitt's emotion on passage of vote of censure against Melville, iv. 367; account of Pitt's excitement over victory at Trafalgar.
- FITZHERBERT, negotiates with Vergennes for peace with France, iv. 274.
- , Mrs., her marriage with Prince of Wales (1785), iv. 307; connection broken off, 329.
- FITZMAURICE, brother of Earl of Desmond, ii. 347.
- FITZ-OSBERN, WILLIAM, seneschal of Normandy, his negotiations with assembly at Lillebonne, i. 95; conveys their answer to William, 96. See Hereford.
- FITZ-OSBERT, WILLIAM (Longbeard), i. 201.
- FITZ-PIERS, chief-justicer, i. 211, 213.
- FITZROY, aide-de-camp, at battle of Minden, iv. 210.
- FITZ-ROBERT, WILLIAM. See Cliton.
- FITZ-STEPHEN, THOMAS, captain of the White Ship, i. 133.
- FITZURSE, REGINALD, murderer of Becket, i. 168, 169.
- FITZWALTER, Lord, beheaded under Henry VII., ii. 102.
- , ROBERT, leader of army of barons, i. 214, 215.
- FITZWILLIAM, Dr., chaplain of Lady Russell, iii. 329.
- , Lord, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, ii. 347.
- , Lord, remark in House of Lords, v. 180.
- FIVE-MILE ACT, directed against Nonconformists, iii. 262.
- FLAGELLANTS, the, i. 318.
- FLAGSTAFF BASTION, the, fortification at Sevastopol, v. 200.
- FLAHAUT, Comte de, French ambassador at Vienna, v. 113.
- FLAMBARD, RALPH, Bishop of Lincoln, i. 122, 127, 128, 131.
- FLAMMOCK, a lawyer, concerned in insurrection against Henry VII., executed, ii. 106.
- FLANDERS, conferred upon William Cliton, i. 136; expedition of Edward I. into, 258; under Jacques Van Artevelde, 296, 302; coasts of, desolated by Spanish pirates, 319; fleet prepared in, to transport Spanish army to England, ii. 338; army of Louis

- XIV. in, iv. 56; partially ceded to Louis XIV. by treaty of Utrecht, 75; success of French army in, 327.
- FLANDERS, Count of, Baldwin, great-grandfather of William Fitz-Robert, i. 136.
- , Count of, Charles the Good, assassinated, i. 136.
- , Count of, assists revolt of Prince Henry, son of Henry II., i. 175, 176, 177.
- , Count of, his quarrel with Philip Augustus, i. 210, 211; calls for aid from King John of England, 212.
- , Count of, Guy, imprisoned with his wife and daughter, i. 254; assisted by Edward I. against Philip of France, 255, 258; renewed imprisonment and death, 258.
- , Count of, Louis, in alliance with Philip of Valois, i. 296, 300, 302, 305.
- , JOAN OF. See Joan of Flanders.
- FLEETWOOD, Charles, commissioner of Long Parliament to the army, iii. 80; in command of troops under Cromwell, 145; marries daughter of Cromwell, 160; begs him not to accept title of king, 178; mentioned as successor to Cromwell, 193; heads petitioners to Richard Cromwell, 197; instigator of disturbances in the army, 201, 203, 204; wishes of the army in regard to, 214; his reply to letter of General Monk, 220.
- FLEMINGS, under Jacques Van Artevelde, i. 296, 302; rise against him, 303; send embassy to Edward III., 303, 304; resistance to his son, 344; massacre of, by insurgents in London, 346; revolt against Maximilian, ii. 97; unable to join the Armada, 341.
- FLETCHER of Saltoun. See Saltoun.
- FLEURANGES, Sire de, friend of Francis I., ii. 136.
- FLEURUS, battle of, iii. 386.
- FLEURY, Cardinal de (1653-1743), minister of Louis XV., iv. 133; treaty of Paris concluded through his influence, 134.
- FLODDEN, battle of, ii. 125, 126.
- FLORETZ, Dutch naval commander, iii. 168.
- FLORIDA, Spain confirmed in possession of, by treaty of Versailles, iv. 280; joins Southern Confederacy, v. 320.
- FLUSHING, captured by English fleet (1809), iv. 390.
- FOLLET, Sir WILLIAM, associated with Sir Robert Peel's government, v. 60.
- FOLLIOU, GILBERT, Bishop of London, his accusations against Becket, i. 155; his hopes of promotion to see of Canterbury, 156; his prognostication in regard to Becket, 159; present at trial of Becket, 160.
- FONTAINEBLEAU, preliminaries of peace of Paris signed at (1762), iv. 219; Napoleon's abdication at, 400.
- FONTARABIA, peace negotiated at, between France and Spain, iii. 210.
- FONTENOY, battle of, iv. 154-156.
- FONTEVAULT, Henry II. and Richard I. buried at, i. 184.
- FOO-CHOW-FOO, port of, opened to British traders, v. 46.
- FORBES, Chief Justice Duncan, adversary of the Pretender, iv. 173; appeals in favor of Jacobite prisoners, 178.
- "FOREIGN ENLISTMENT" Act, English construction of the Alabama a flagrant violation of, v. 333.
- FOREST CHARTER, i. 223.
- FORMIGNY, battle of, ii. 40.
- FORSTER, General, in command of the English in the Pretender's army, iv. 99; attacked at Preston, 100.
- , WILLIAM EDWARD, his bill for public education, v. 189, 401.
- FORTH, Earl of, commander-in-chief of royalist army, iii. 45.
- FORT ALEXANDER, in harbor of Sevastopol, v. 195; attacked by allied fleets, 201.
- FORT DUQUESNE, Braddock's expedition against, iv. 190, 191; falls into hands of the English in 1758, takes name of Pittsburgh, 191.
- FORT WILLIAM, at Calcutta, attacked by Surajah Dowlah, iv. 205; retaken by Clive, 206.
- FOSTER, Chief Justice, presides at trial of Vane, iii. 258.
- FOTHERINGAY CASTLE, trial of Mary Stuart at, ii. 327, 328.
- FOUCHE, JOSEPH, minister of police under Napoleon, iv. 365.
- FOX, Bishop of Durham, his negotiations with James IV. of Scotland, ii. 110; recommends Wolsey to Henry VII., 122.
- , CHARLES JAMES, embraces cause of American Colonies, iv. 234; his character, 235; supports petitions for economical reform, 254; in favor of religious freedom, 256; foreign secretary in Rockingham's second cabinet, 269; his resignation, 274, 275, 298; unites with North in attack on treaty of Versailles, forms with him coalition cabinet, 281; resigns, his motion on the charge against Warren Hastings, 292; breaks with Burke, 293; his Indian Bill passed by the commons, 296; rejected by the Lords, his consequent resignation, 297; speech on proposed dissolution of Parliament, 298; contest with Pitt, 301, 302; contests seat for Westminster, 302, 303; is elected by borough of Kirkwall, 303; inquiry concerning his election at Westminster, his appearance and character, 304; opposes Pitt's Irish measures and commercial treaty with France, 305; denies marriage of Prince of Wales with Mrs. Fitzherbert, 307; advocates abolition of slave-trade, 308; his visit to Italy, 309; his return, opposes suggestions of Loughborough, 310; supports claims of the Prince of Wales in regard to the regency, 311, 312; his exultation at fall of the Bastille, 315; breach with Burke on question of French Constitution, 317-319; resists suspension of Habeas Corpus Act, 325; opposes Pitt's bill for suppression of sedition, 329; speech on French invasion, 332; retires from politics (1797), 337; advocates peace with France, 345; his advice to Prince of Wales in regard to the regency, 349; visits Paris, 355; his retort to Bona-

- parte, 355, 356; account of Pitt's success on his return to Parliament, 359; allied with Grenville in opposition to Addington, 361; Pitt's proposed coalition with on resignation of Addington, opposed by the king, 362; his indifference in regard to his exclusion, 362, 363; takes part in debate on war with Spain, 365; the king persists in his opposition to, 371; becomes member of Grenville's cabinet, as foreign secretary, 376; his overtures for peace with France, 376, 377; warns Talleyrand of threatened assassination of Napoleon, 377; speech on the peace, 378; finally accomplishes abolition of the slave-trade, his death (1806), 379; character, 379, 380; opinions in regard to affairs of East India Company, v. 276.
- FOX, HENRY. See Holland.
- , General, wounded at battle of Orthez, iv. 400.
- , GEORGE (1624-1690), founder of the Quakers, iii. 173.
- , JOHN (1517-1587), author of the "Book of Martyrs," ii. 311.
- , W. J. speech on Corn-Laws, v. 72, 73.
- FRANCE, invaded by Danes, i. 41; by Henry III., 227; by Edward III., 297-320; by English under John of Gaunt, 341; under Earl of Buckingham, 342; under Duke of Clarence, 376; by Henry V., 385-394-406; by Henry VII., ii. 93; by Henry VIII., 122-208; by English under Earl of Surrey, 144; by English and Imperialists, 147-149; at war with Henry I. of England, i. 132; in minority of Louis IX., 224; its claims to Sicily, 248; order of Templars dissolved in, 272; allied with Scotland, 311; decimated by plague, 318; at peace with England, 329; renews the war, 334; prepares for war with England, 350; dissensions of Armagnacs and Burgundians, 374, 375, 379, 384; claimed by Henry V., 383; deplorable condition, 384; under regency of Henry, 400-406; attachment of the people to Charles VI., ii. 13, 14; during regency of the Duke of Bedford, 14-37; Henry VI. crowned in, 35; recovers English conquests, 38-40; claimed by Edward IV., 65; league against, 119; at war with Spain, 140; alliance of England and Germany against, 141; allied with England, 152; sends reinforcements to Scotland, 207; dread of Mary Tudor's Spanish marriage, 247; at war with Spain and England, 261; rising of Huguenots in, under Condé and Coligny, 281; massacre of St. Bartholomew, 313, 314; at war with Spain, 344; distrust of English royalists in, iii. 130; growth of its power in Europe, 152; recognizes the Commonwealth, 155; desires alliance with Cromwell, 169; concludes treaty with England in (1655), 174; allied with England under Cromwell, 190, 191; concludes treaty with England, 261; grand alliance formed in opposition to, 391; concludes treaty of Ryswick with the grand alliance, iv. 24; exhausted by war of Spanish succession, 57-59; rallies, appeal of Louis XIV., 63; peace indispensable to, 66; conditions imposed upon, at conference of Utrecht, 68-70; suspension of hostilities granted to, by England, 72; takes advantage of victory at Denain in conferences at Utrecht, 74; concludes peace of Utrecht (1713), 75; peace of Rastadt, 76; joins Triple Alliance of 1717, 111, 112; engaged with England in obtaining consent of Spain to the Quadruple Alliance, 114, 115; declares war against Spain, 116; concludes treaty of Hanover, 133; peace of Paris (1727), 134; decline of absolutism in, 137; jealousy of, in England, spoken of by Montesquieu, 141; supports claims of Elector of Bavaria to domains of Austria, 148; allied with Frederic of Prussia against Maria Theresa, 149; declares war on England, 153; victorious at Fontenoy, 156; assists Charles Edward, 163; sends army into Holland (1747), 179, 180; concludes treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, (1748), 181; gains no territory by the treaty, 183; at war with England in India and Canada, 188; formally declares war, 189; forms alliance with Austria, 192; supremacy in India, 202, 203; ascendancy in India ended by Godeheui's treaty, 206; reverses in Germany, 211; negotiates for peace, 215, 216; concludes family compact with Spain (1761), 217; peace of Fontainebleau with England (1762), 219; assists American colonies against England, 243; officially recognizes the United States (1778), 247; allied with the United States, 262, 263; colonies of, in India allied with Hyder Ali, 272; allied with Spain at siege of Gibraltar, 272-274; concludes peace of Versailles with England (1783), 278; internal embarrassments of, 309; outbreak of the revolution, 315; England's neutrality in regard to, 319, 320; Austria and Prussia declare war against, 321; under the convention, 322, 323; declares war on Holland, 323; under committee of public safety, 325; negotiates at Basle with Prussia and Sweden (1794), the Clonan war, establishment of the Directory, 328; concludes treaty of Basle (1795), 331; treaty with Spain against England (1796), 331; peace of Campo-Formio (1797), 334; ascendancy of Jacobins in, 338; European coalition against (1799), 343; under Bonaparte as first consul, 344; concludes peace of Amiens with England (1802), 354, 355; declares war on England, 359; under first empire, 363; concludes peace of Presburg with Austria (1805), 373; peace of Tilsit with Prussia (1807), 381; blockade of, declared by England, 383; Spanish Junta declares war against, 385; allied with Sweden (1810), 395; restoration of the Bourbons in (1814), 400; loss of Napoleon's conquests, 401; revolution of, (1830), 427; its policy in regard to the Eastern question, v. 33-36; excluded from convention of July (1840), 36; effect of exclusion on, 37, 38; interferes in favor of Mohammed Ali, 39; prepares for war, 40; adopts peace policy, 42; at war in Morocco, 108, 109, 110; establishes a protectorate over Marquesas islands and Tahiti, 105; her natural alliance with Spain, 110, 111; fall of Orleans monarchy (1848), 143; re-establishment of the empire, 146; disputes with Russia for possession of holy places in Palestine, 171, 172; forms alliance with England against Russia, 181, 182. (See Crimean war.) Sends plenipotentiaries to congress of Paris, 233; indignation against England for harboring Orsini, 283; demands guarantees, 285; good understanding restored, 286; at war with Russia, 302; establishes free trade with England, 304; allied with England against China, 307; concludes treaty of Tien-tsin, 308; intervenes in the Lebanon, 314; sympathizes with Southern confederacy, 323, 324; with Poland, 343; dependence of England on alliance with, 346; effect of rise of Prussia upon, 358; her war with Prussia in 1870, 383, 390; her concert with England important to peace of Europe, 398; desire for alliance with England, 399, 400; recovery from war of 1870, 400.

FRANCE, Isle of, (Mauritius) in hands of the English, iv. 396.

FRANCE, CATHERINE of. See Catherine of France.

—, Constable of, in command of French army against Henry V., i. 387, 388, 390; is killed at Agincourt, 391.

—, ISABEL of. See Isabel of France.

—, MADELINE of. See Madeline of France.

—, MARGARET of. See Margaret of France.

—, Sovereigns of:—

CHARLES the Bald (reign 840-877), i. 43.

CHARLES the Simple (reign 893-929), death of, i. 64.

LOUIS IV. [d'Outre-Mer], (reign 936-954), takes refuge at court of Athelstan, recalled to throne at death of Charles the Simple, i. 64.

PHILIP I. (reign 1050-1108), refuses assistance to William of Normandy, i. 99; intrigates Edgar Atheling in attempt against William, 112; assists Robert Curthose, 114.

LOUIS VI., the Fat (reign 1108-1137), promises investiture of Normandy to William Cliton; his war and treaty with Henry I., i. 132; accepts homage for Normandy from son of King Henry, 133; marries William Cliton to his sister-in-law; confers Flanders upon him, 136.

—, VII., the Young (reign 1137-1180), i. 139, 147, 152; his treatment of Becket, 162-165; espouses the cause of the sons of Henry II. of England, 174-176; death of, 177.

PHILIP AUGUSTUS (reign 1180-1223), ascends the throne, i. 177; his conference with Henry II. at Gisors, 180; espouses the cause of Richard against his father, 181, 182; drives the Jews from France, 185; forms alliance with Richard, 187; quarrels with Richard in Sicily, 188, 189; his jealousy of Richard, 190; returns to France, 191; his league with John Lackland, 195-199; attempts to keep Richard in prison, 200; his war with Richard, 200-202; his war with John and dispute with the Pope, 204; espouses Arthur's cause, 205; summons John to Paris, 206; regains French provinces from England, 207; forms army to enforce the Pope's bull, 209; his quarrel with Count of Flanders, 210; renounces expedition against England, 211; prepares for war, 212; sends Prince Louis with an army to England, 218.

FRANCE, sovereigns of (continued):—

LOUIS VIII., (reign 1223-1226), as prince, sent into England with army; his claim to English crown, i. 218; his behavior to the English, 219; deserted by barons, 221; death-blow to his cause, 222; leaves England, 223; succeeds Philip Augustus in 1223, A. D., 224.

—, IX. [St. Louis], (reign 1226-1270), his minority, i. 224; defeats English in Saintonge and concludes truce, 227; arbitrates between Henry III. and his barons, 234; his second crusade, 239; his death, 241.

PHILIP III., the Bold (reign 1270-1285), returns to France with the body of his father, i. 241.

—, IV., the Fair (reign 1285-1314), attempts to regain Aquitaine, i. 250, 251; forms alliance with John Baliol, 252; imprisons Guy of Flanders, 254; concludes peace with Edward I., 258; makes treaty of Montreuil, 264; breaks up the order of Templars in France, 272.

CHARLES IV., the Fair (reign 1322-1328), brother of Queen Isabel of England, seizes upon towns belonging to Edward II. i. 282; receives his sister, 283; his death, 1328, 295.

PHILIP VI., of Valois (reign 1328-1350), becomes king, 1398, i. 295; receives news of defeat of Sluys, 298; his treatment of Breton nobles; monopoly of salt, 301; prepares to meet English, 305; follows them to Crécy, 306; before the battle, 308; is defeated, 309, 310; his retreat; his serious position, 311; marches to relief of Calais; challenges English king, 314; his death, 320.

JOHN (reign 1350-1364), in conference with Edward III. at Guines, i. 320; advances to Poitiers, 321; before the battle, 322, 323; is defeated and made prisoner, 325; conducted to London, 326; his treaty with Edward III., 327, 328; his concessions to Edward; is restored to liberty, i. 329; returns to England and dies, 1364, 330; his ransom still unpaid, 355, 383.

CHARLES V., the Wise (reign 1364-1380), as Dauphin opposes citizens of Paris, i.

FRANCE, sovereigns of (continued):—
327; becomes king, 1364, 330; embraces cause of Henry of Transtamare, 331; his judicious government, 333; claims sovereignty of Aquitaine, 333, 334; his increasing success against England, i. 335, 336; takes advantage of weakness of English government, 340; at war with King of Navarre, 341; his death, 342.

CHARLES VI. (reign 1380-1422), i. 342; marries his daughter to Richard II., 352; his insanity, 354; rejects alliance with Henry IV.; claims his daughter's dowry, 354; condition of France under, 374, 375; brought to English camp at Melun, i. 403; in Paris with Henry V., 404; decree of, condemning murderers of Burgundy, 405; his death, ii. 13.

— VII. (reign 1422-1461), as Dauphin, joins the Armagnacs, i. 394; carried off from Paris by Tanneguy-Duchâtel, 393; his reconciliation with Duke of Burgundy, 393; his treachery toward him at Montreuil, 399; makes Buchan Constable, 405; takes refuge in Bourges, i. 403; proclaimed king and crowned, ii. 14; his position in France, 15; his army defeated; his foreign allies, 16; his army destroyed before Verneuil, 17; Duke of Brittany declares in his favor, 19; his weakness, ii. 20; desperate condition of his affairs, 22; receives Joan of Arc, 23; causes festivities in her honor, 25; crowned at Rheims, (1429), 23; makes attempt upon Paris, 29; requests rehabilitation of Joan of Arc, 34; national sentiment on his side, 35; sends nobles to Congress of Arras, 36; regains all the English possessions in France, except Calais, ii. 40; besieges Castillon, 44; death of, 53.

LOUIS XI. (reign 1461-1483), his assistance to Margaret of Anjou; his negotiations with Warwick, 57; his friendly relations with him, 59; assists the Lancastrians, 60; his gratification at their success, 61; obtains release of Margaret of Anjou, 64; challenged by Edward IV., 65; his interview with Edward at Pecquigny, 66, 67; his treaty with him, 67, 68; takes possession of part of Burgundy, 70.

CHARLES VIII. (reign 1483-1498), as Dauphin, betrothed to Elizabeth of York, ii. 70; assists Henry Tudor, 81; his war with Duke of Brittany, 94, 95, 96; his determination to marry Anne of Brittany, 98.

LOUIS XII. (reign 1498-1515), as Duke of Orleans, accused of conspiring against Charles VIII., ii. 94; taken prisoner, 95; set free, 98; lays claim to Milan, 119; driven out of Italy; enlists the aid of James of Scotland, 121; breaks up the Holy League; marries Mary of England, 127; death of, 128.

FRANCIS I. (reign 1515-1547), as Count of Angoulême provisions Théroutenne, ii. 123; becomes king; forms alliance with England; gains Duchy of Milan, 129; his treaty with Henry VIII., 131; unsuccessful rival of Charles V., 131, 132; at Field of the Cloth of Gold, 134-136; invokes Henry's aid against Charles V., 140; his misfortunes in Italy, 141; his measures against Henry VIII., 142; endeavors to incite Irish to revolt, 144; Bourbon's plot against, 147; defeated and taken prisoner at Pavia, 149; signs treaty of Madrid; returns to France, 151; forms league with Clement VII., and Henry VIII., 152; leaves Clement to his fate, 153; negotiates for the marriage of his son with Mary of England, 155; undertakes to intercede for Henry, 170; his interview with the Pope at Marseilles, 172; his grief at the death of More, 177; concludes alliance with Charles V., 193; his opposition to Henry, 196; assists the Scots, 207; concludes treaty with Charles V., 208; with Henry VIII., 210; death of, 220.

FRANCE, sovereigns of (continued):—

HENRY II. (reign 1547-1559), as Duke of Orleans; his marriage with Mary of England planned, 155; with Catherine de Medici, 172; under the influence of the Guises, 221; secures Mary Stuart for the Dauphin, 224; his encroachments on English possessions, 227; Elizabeth accused of correspondence with, 252; accused of countenancing Stafford's attempt against England, 261; marries his daughter to Philip II., 272; his death, 274.

FRANCIS II. (reign 1559-1560), as Dauphin, marries Mary Stuart, ii. 262; takes title of King of England, Scotland, and Ireland, 272; becomes king, (1559), 274; supports Catholics in Scotland, 274, 276; his death, 277.

CHARLES IX. (reign 1550-1574), his relations with Elizabeth, ii. 299; his consent asked to Norfolk's marriage, 301; ceases to support Mary Stuart, 310; his excuses to Walsingham for massacre of St. Bartholomew, 314; his death, 316.

HENRY III. (reign 1574-1589), as Duke of Anjou, proposed as husband to Mary Stuart, ii. 283; his marriage with Elizabeth proposed, 309, 310; king-elect of Poland, 314; ascends the throne of France, 1574; concludes peace of St. Germain, 316; intercedes for Mary Stuart, 331; endeavors to rouse James VI. to intercede for his mother, 332; his difficult position, 335; assassinated, 344.

— IV. (reign 1589-1610), as King of Navarre, marries Marguerite of Valois, ii. 313; raises army for the Huguenots, 316; his war against the leaguers; issues Edict of Nantes, 1598, 314; makes peace with Spain, 345; quoted, 352; his "Great Plan," v. 397.

LOUIS XIII. (1610-1643), letter of Scotch Covenanters to, ii. 425, 426.

— XIV. (reign 1643-1715), iii. 149; his opinion of Cromwell, 190; surrenders Dunkirk to England; ratifies treaty with Cromwell, 191; Charles II. sells

FRANCE, sovereigns of (continued):—

Dunkirk to him, 260; allied with the Dutch, 260, 261; concludes secret treaty with Charles II., 261; quoted, 266; efforts to detach Charles II. from Dutch alliance, 266, 267; secret treaty with Charles, 268; campaign in the Netherlands, 269; objects to Charles II.'s Declaration of Indulgence, 270; endeavors to prevent peace between England and Holland, 271; continues his subsidies to Charles, 272, 275; displeasure at Princess Mary's marriage, 275, 276; arbiter of Europe, 277; new treaty with Charles II., 286; intercedes for Lord Russell, 294; his subsidies render Charles II. independent of the English people, 295; ambitious projects interrupted by peace of Ratisbon, 302; transactions with James II., 308, 309; revokes Edict of Nantes, 323; design of William of Orange against his encroachments, 345; efforts in behalf of James II., 347; sends aid to Archbishop of Cologne, 348; his generous support of James II., 369; European coalition against, 379; sends Lauzun with troops to assist James in Ireland, 382; James II. takes refuge at his court after the battle of the Boyne, 385; successes at Beachy Head and Fleurus, 386; Irish brigade in his army, 388; captures Mons, 392; indifference to death of Louvois, 397; sends Tourville to invade England, 398; takes Namur, 400; English naval expedition against Brest, 405; places Villeroi at head of his armies, iv. 15; kindness to Boufflers after his loss of Namur, 16; weary of supporting James II., 18; concessions in Peace of Ryswick, 23, 24; secures toleration for German Catholics, 25; his reception of Portugal, 32; negotiates second Treaty of Partition, 33; his grandson made heir to Spanish throne, 34; accepts the bequest; breaks Partition Treaty, 35; obtains surrender of frontier towns from his grandson, 39, 40; Grand Alliance formed against, 40, 41; promises James II. to recognize his son as King of England, 42; strength of the Grand Alliance, 48; his cause abandoned by Duke of Savoy, 52; power shaken by defeat at Ramillies, 55; makes overtures for peace, 56; decides to negotiate with Dutch, 59; humiliating conditions imposed upon him, 61, 62; breaks off negotiations, 62; address to governors of provinces and towns, 62, 63; renews negotiations after defeat of Malplaquet, 64; again abandons them, 65; loss of his children, 69; letter to Philip of Spain, 69, 70; confidery at Denain demands honorable terms his last army to Villars, 73; after victory at Utrecht, 74; concludes peace, 75; finally concludes Peace of Rastadt, 76; recognizes George I., 93; his death, 97; his policy disappears in European politics, 183; his establishment of Bourbon dynasty on throne of Spain, mentioned by Guizot, v. 111.

FRANCE, sovereigns of (continued):—

LOUIS XV. (reign, 1715-1774), marries Maria Leczinska, iv. 131; Cardinal Fleury his minister, 133; before Tournay, 154; at Fontenoy, 155; alone opposed to Germany after Fontenoy, 156; reception of Charles Edward at his court, 178; captures Antwerp, 179; concludes treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, 180, 181; letter from Charles Edward, 181, 182; alliance with Maria Theresa, 192; his troops in possession of Hanover, 195; his negligence in Indian affairs, v. 271.

LOUIS XVI. (reign, 1774-1793), concludes alliance with United States, iv. 247; continues his assistance, 258, 263; his government makes manifestation in favor of states-general in Holland, 309; anxiety concerning his position, 319; insulted by the mob, June 20th, 1792, imprisoned in the Temple, 322; his death (1793), 323.

— XVII., Toulon rises in his name, iv. 326.

NAPOLEON I. (reign 1804-1815), lieutenant of artillery at siege of Toulon, iv. 323; suppresses revolt against Directory (13th Vendémiaire), 1795, 328; his successes in Italy, 324; expedition to Egypt, 343; overthrows Directory, becomes First Consul (1800), 344; encroaching ambition, 355; conversation with Fox, 355, 356; influence in Switzerland, 356; anger at England's retention of Malta, 357; interviews with English ambassador, 357, 358; declares war against England, 359, preparations for descent on England, 360; proclaimed Emperor of the French, 363; relinquishes design on England, is crowned by the Pope, 364; remarks on English Parliament, 364, 365; crowned King of Italy; furnishes appanages for his family, new coalition against him, 369; plan for invasion of England, anger at action of Villeneuve, 370; defeat of his fleet at Trafalgar, 371, 372; victory at Austerlitz, concludes peace of Presburg, relations with Charles Fox, 376, 377; negotiates for peace, raises his brother Joseph to throne of Naples, 377; victory at Jena, Berlin Decree, 378; concludes peace of Tilsit, 381; issues Milan Decree (1807), 383; overthrows Bourbon dynasty in Spain, 383, 384; places Joseph on Spanish throne, 385; concludes convention of Cintra, 386; alliance with Alexander of Russia, establishes Joseph at Madrid, 387; victories in Germany, 390; letter to Metternich on war with Austria, 390, 391; defeated at Aspern, 391; victories at Wagram, 391, 392; quarrel with Pius VII., 392; his divorce, contracted to Marie Louise, 393; decree of 1810 against English commerce, 394, 395; unites Low Countries and Hanseatic towns to France, prepares for Russian campaign, 395; disasters in Russia, 396, 397; campaign of 1813 in Germany, victorious at Lutzen and Bantzen, defeated at Dresden and Leipzig, 397; fortifies Lorraine and

FRANCE, sovereigns of (continued):—

Champagne, 398; letter to Augereau, 399, 400; abdicates at Fontainebleau (1814), retires to Elba, 400; reappearance in France, 400, 401; defeated at Waterloo (1815), 401; surrenders himself to Captain Maitland, is sent to St. Helena, 402.

LOUIS XVIII. (reign, 1814-1824), becomes king on abdication of Napoleon (1814), iv. 400; restored after Waterloo, 402.

CHARLES X. (reign, 1824-1830), Comte d'Artois, abdicates, iv. 427.

LOUIS PHILIPPE (reign, 1830-1850), placed on the throne by revolution of 1830, iv. 427; cordial recognition of by England, 448; conversation with M. Guizot, 448, 449; sends Marshal Soult to England, v. 16; his fall, 27; attempts on his life, 33; sends M. Guizot as ambassador to England, 34; recalls Guizot, 42; his request for remains of Napoleon, 44; desire for friendly relations with England, 100; visit from Queen Victoria, 101, 102; returns the visit, 102-104; policy in regard to Spanish marriage, 112, 118, 119; popularity in England diminished, 123; consequences of his fall, 126.

NAPOLEON III., his life in England, the coup d'état (1851), v. 144; re-establishes the empire, 146; English ministry unfavorable to his policy, 172; inclined to alliance with England against Russia, 178; letter to the czar in regard to Eastern question, 180; declares war on Russia, 182; directs operations of his army, 184; sends General Niel to the Crimea, 220; visits London, 221; direction of operations in the Crimea, 223; dissatisfaction with conduct of the war, 226; opposition to liberal cause in Italy, 281; Orsini's attempt to assassinate, 282; his career as refugee in England, 284; Palmerston's partiality for him, 285; desires to establish Jerome Napoleon on throne of Greece, 296; makes war on Austria in favor of Lombardy and Venetia, 302; concludes treaty of commerce with England, 304; English fear of his aggressions, 307; sympathy with Southern Confederacy, proclamation of neutrality, 324; projects in regard to Mexico, 336; establishes Maximilian of Austria as emperor in Mexico, 337; obliged to withdraw his army, 339; concurs in note to Russia in regard to Poland, 343; refuses to join England in behalf of Denmark, 346; his fall in 1870, 389.

FRANCIS, Kings of France. See France, Sovereigns of.

—, Sir PHILIP, probable author of "Letters of Junius," member of council in Bengal, his opposition to Warren Hastings, iv. 286, 288; duel with Hastings, 289; in House of Commons, 292; attack on Pitt's French treaty, 306; remarks on peace of Amiens, 355; speech on threatening attitude of France, 358.

FRANCISCO DE PAULA, Don, Infante of Spain, Bourbon Prince, v. 113; proposals for marriage of his sons to Spanish princesses, 118, 120, 122.

FRANKLIN, BENJAMIN (1706-1790), effect of Whitfield's eloquence upon, iv. 186; his remark on Grenville's American policy, 224; in England, as agent for the American Colonies, his interview with Pratt, 233; ambassador to France, 243; remark on Howe's capture of Philadelphia, 251; negotiates for peace with England (1782), 274; his description of temper of England, 276-277.

FREDERICK V., Count Palatine, betrothed to Princess Elizabeth, ii. 395; called to throne of Bohemia, 403; his misfortunes, takes refuge at the Hague, 405.

—, Emperors of Germany. See Germany.

—, Kings of Prussia. See Prussia.

— II., King of Sicily, his kingdom claimed as fief of holy see, i. 229.

—, Prince of Wales, son of George II., on bad terms with his father, iv. 147; comment on conduct of Lady Margaret Macdonald, 177; his death (1751), 184.

FREE TRADE, first step toward its establishment in England, v. 99; its definitive victory, 153; established between France and England, 304.

FRIAR, RICHARD, ii. 27.

FRIBURG, ceded by Louis XIV. at peace of Ryswick, iv. 23; captured by Villars, 76.

FRIEDERICKSHALL, in Norway, death of Charles XII. before, iv. 117.

FRIEDLAND, battle of, iv. 381.

FRIESLAND, devoted to republican government, iii. 367.

FROBISHER, MARTIN, admiral of Queen Elizabeth, ii. 339, 341; voyage in search of Northwest Passage, 360; death (1594), 361.

FROISSART, quoted, 302, 305, 306, 312, 315, 317, 335, 345, 346, 354.

FRONDE, the party of Parliament in France, iii. 149.

FRONSAC, Duc de, son of Marshal Richelieu, iv. 192.

FROUDE, JAMES ANTHONY, historian of Henry VIII., ii. 214.

FUAD PASHA, Turkish minister of foreign affairs, his measures for establishing order in the Lebanon, v. 315.

FUENTERABIA, taken by French (1719), iv. 118.

FULKE, Count of Anjou, i. 132.

FULLER, WILLIAM, his pretended discovery of a plot, iii. 400.

FURNES, NICHOLAS, keeper of the seals under Cromwell, iii. 175.

FURNISS, secretary of state under Richard Cromwell, iii. 204.

FUTTEHPORE, battle of, v. 255, 256.

G.

GAELS, early inhabitants of Britain, i. 13.

GAGE, General (Thomas), English commander in Massachusetts (1775), iv. 236; superseded by Howe, 238.

GAINSBOROUGH, King Sweyn dies at, in (1013), i. 74.

- GALGACUS, Caledonian chief, i. 23.
- GALISSONIERE, French admiral, defeats Byng at Minorca, iv. 191.
- GALLAS, Count of, German ambassador in London, iv. 68, 69.
- GALWAY, Lord. See Ruvigny
- , Lord, son of Marquis of Ruvigny, commands English troops in Spain, iv. 57
- GAMA, VASCO DE, doubles Cape of Good Hope, ii. 113.
- GANGES CANAL, the, begun by Lord Dalhousie, v. 241.
- GANTHEAUME, Admiral, French naval commander, iv. 370.
- GARDINER, Bishop (1483-1555), his revision of religious edict of Henry VIII., ii. 195; ordered to impeach Catherine Parr, 211; his controversy with Crammer, 232; imprisoned, 234; his trial and sentence, 235; set free by Queen Mary, made Chancellor, 243; crowns her, 245; opposes her marriage with Philip, 247; his argument in its favor before Parliament, 248; his house pillaged, 249; presides over tribunal for trial of heretics, 254; resigns, 255; his death, 257.
- , Colonel, in command in English army against Charles Edward, iv. 161.
- GARDNER, Admiral, commissioner to delegates of mutineers at Spithead, iv. 335; narrow escape, 335.
- GARNET, accomplice of Catesby, his confession and death, ii. 391.
- GARTER, herald of Edward the IV., ii. 65; his negotiations with Louis XI., 66.
- , Order of the, presented to Monk, iii. 250.
- GASCONY, retained by Philip the Fair, i. 251; Black Prince in, 326.
- GASCOIGNE, General, amendment of Lord Grey's Reform Bill, iv. 434.
- GASCOYNE, Chief Justice, refuses to preside at trial of Archbishop of York and Earl of Nottingham, i. 372.
- , Sir WILLIAM, treasurer of Wolsey, ii. 161.
- GASKELL, Mrs. (1822-1866), English novelist, v. 168, 169.
- GATES, Sir JOHN, executed under Queen Mary, ii. 244.
- , HORATIO, American general, defeats Burgoyne, iv. 246.
- GAUDEN, Bishop of Worcester, author of Eikon Basilike, iii. 124.
- GAUNT, ELIZABETH, burned at the stake, iii. 321.
- , JOHN of. See Lancaster.
- GAUTIER, Abbe, sent to negotiate with M. de Torey, iv. 67; Bolingbroke's assurances to, 88.
- GAVESTON, PIERS, favorite of Edward II., i. 271; made Earl of Cornwall, marries Margaret, niece of Edward II., made regent, 272; banished, 273; recalled, 274; besieged in Scarborough, and taken, 275; executed, 276.
- GENERAL ASSEMBLY of church of Scotland, v. 160.
- GENOA, annexed to France by Bonaparte, iv. 369.
- GENEVA, tribunal of arbitration at, v. 334, 335; principles of international law established at, 335.
- GENOÈSE, at battle of Sluys, i. 297; at Crècy, 309; in French fleet, 338.
- GEOFFREY, Prince, son of Henry II., i. 152; marries Constance of Brittany, 163; rebels against his father, 176, 178; his death, 179.
- GEORGE I., as elector of Hanover, allied with Emperor of Germany, iv. 75; becomes heir presumptive to the English crown, 86; preparations to bring him to England, 90; Whigs come into power on his accession, 91; proclaimed without opposition (1714), 92; his arrival, 93; confidence in the Whig party, 94; leaves England for the Continent, 110; absorbed in interests of his hereditary possessions, triple alliance concluded by his secretary of state, 112; sends fleet under Byng to the Spanish seas, 115; gains duchies of Bremen and Verden, his return to England, 120; consents to plan for limiting the number of peers, 121; returns from Hanover on failure of South Sea company, 123; Jacobite plot against, 125; pardons Bolingbroke, 128; his promise to Walpole, 129; goes to Hanover, 130; Philip V.'s desire for alliance with, 131; informed of treaty of Vienna, 132; concludes treaty of Hanover, accused of indifference to English interests, 133; his speech on opening of Parliament (in 1727), 133, 134; interview with Bolingbroke, death of his wife, 135; his death (1727), 136; essentially German in habits and language, 214; his accession unites Hanover to English crown, v. 16.
- , II., as Prince of Wales, accompanies his father to England, iv. 93; in charge of government during absence of his father, 110; distrust of his character, 121; becomes director of mining company, 123; his accession (1727), prosperity of England during his reign, 137; his ministries, 137, 138; discord between him and his son, death of his wife, 147; alarm for safety of Hanover at outbreak of war of Austrian succession, 149; signs treaty of neutrality, 150; levies Hanoverian troops at English expense, takes command in person, 152; gains battle of Dettingen, concludes treaty of Worms with Austria and Sardinia, 153; insurrection of Jacobites under Charles Edward, 157-176; returns to England, 162; his severity to Jacobite prisoners, 169; peace of Aix-la-Chapelle concluded in his reign, 180, 181; attempt on his life, 181; his anxiety in regard to Hanover, his treaties of alliance with Prussia and Hesse, 189; his aversion for Pitt, 192; obliged to make him prime minister, 193; his anger against Duke of Cumberland for loss of Hanover, 195; refuses to ratify convention of Closter-Severn, 196; refuses to see Lord George Sackville, 211; his sudden death (1760), 213; unpopularity in England, 214; candidates for Parliament required to swear to property qualifications in his reign, v. 292.

- GEORGE, III., as Prince of Wales, iv, 184; opposition forms about him, 190-211; his peaceable accession (1760), 215; affection of the people for him, makes Lord Bute secretary of state, 215; his reception of Chatham's resignation, 217; speech on proroguing Parliament (1763), 222; illness, proposes a regency, 226; dismisses Granville, 226, 227; calls Lord Chatham to form a ministry, 227; his letter to Chatham, 228, 229; does not understand the movement in America, 233; his speeches on the American war, 239-241; urges Lord North to continue in office, 248; his firmness in the Gordon riots, 253; letter to Lord Germaine on peace with America, 265; visits Admiral Parker on his ship, 266; his obstinacy in regard to peace with America, 268; speech, announcing American independence, 280; interview with Adams, 280, 281; desires Pitt to form a cabinet, 281-295; his interference in regard to Indian bill, 297, 298; dissolves Parliament (1784), 302; creates peers to sustain Pitt, 303; his message to Parliament in regard to his son's debts, 307; insanity, 309-311; convalescence, 314; correspondence with Pitt, 314, 315; dismisses Lord Thurlow, 320; appoints Pitt warden of the Cinque ports, 321; recalls the Duke of York, 327; assailed by the mob, indignation at the Prince of Wales' desertion of his wife, 329; communicates French ultimatum to Parliament, 333; his letter from Bonaparte, 344; opposition to Catholic emancipation, accepts Pitt's resignation, 347; temporary return of his illness, 349; attributes it to Pitt, 350; another slight attack of his illness, 361; accepts resignation of Addington, recalls Pitt, insists on excluding Fox, 362; letter to Pitt in regard to Melville, his blindness, 369; refuses to consent to Fox's entrance to the cabinet, 371; opposed to Catholic emancipation, 380; his confidence in Portland's cabinet, 381; his insanity returns, 394; death (1820), 405; character, 406; scruples in regard to Catholic emancipation, v. 307.
- , IV., as Prince of Wales, iv, 226; his friendship for Fox, 297-302-307; marriage with Mrs. Fitzherbert, 307; direction of royal household revolves on him during illness of the king, 310; his claim to the regency disputed, 311, 312; Pitt's proposition to restrict his power as regent, 312, 313; loses his power on recovery of his father, 315; marries Caroline of Brunswick, 329; consults Pitt on regency question on return of the king's illness, 349; becomes regent, 394; insulted by the populace, 404; proclaimed king (1820), 406; his aversion for his wife, 406, 407; asks for a divorce, 407; his coronation (1821), 411; requests Wellington to form a ministry, 418; opposed to Catholic emancipation, 422; his death (1830), 424; character, 424, 425.
- , Prince of Denmark, husband of Queen Anne, joins Prince of Orange, iii, 352; his death, iv, 77; inclined toward dissent, 81.
- GEORGIA, state of, the English make descent upon (1778), iv, 253; joins Southern confederacy, v, 320.
- GERARD, BALTHAZAR, assassin of William the Silent, ii, 323.
- , Marshal, besieges Antwerp, iv, 449.
- , Colonel, executed for complicity in royalist plot, ii, 167.
- GERBEROY, fortress of, besieged by the Conqueror, i, 114.
- GERMAINE, Lord GEORGE, intrusted with American affairs in North's cabinet, iv, 239; George III.'s letter to, 265.
- GERMAN CONFEDERATION, Guizot's estimate of the effect of rivalry of Russia and Austria upon, v, 356-359; effect of Prussian victory in (1866), 357.
- GERMANTOWN, battle of, iv, 246.
- GERMANY, English Puritans in, ii, 420; Protestant princes of, join coalition against Louis XIV. (See Grand Alliance.) Concludes treaty of Vienna with Spain, iv, 132; of Paris, with France, England and Holland, 134; war of Austrian succession in, 149, 150-152; outbreak of hostilities in (1799), 343; Napoleon's campaign in (1809), 390-392; national movement in, against Napoleon, 398.
- , emperors of:—
- HENRY III. (reign 1039-1056), marries Matilda, daughter of Henry I. of England, i, 132.
- HENRY VI. (reign 1190-1197), his claim to the throne of Sicily, i, 195; imprisons Richard I., 196; his letter to the king of France, 198; convokes Diet at Hagenau, 199.
- OTHO IV. (reign 1209-1218), calls for assistance from England, i, 212.
- ADOLPHUS of Nassau (reign 1292-1298), ally of Edward I. (1297), i, 258.
- LOUIS IV. (reign 1328-1347), ally of Edward III. in Hundred Years' War, i, 296.
- SIGISMUND (reign 1410-1437), visits Henry V. of England, i, 392; accompanies him to conference at Calais, 394.
- MAXIMILIAN (reign 1493-1519), rejects French alliance, ii, 70; as king of the Romans, assists Duke of Brittany against Charles VIII., 95; suitor for Anne of Brittany, 96; marries her, 97; his marriage annulled, 98; allied with Henry VIII., 122; his reception at Calais, 123; makes use of Henry VIII., 124; allied with Louis XII., 127; with Henry VIII., 130; his death, 131.
- CHARLES V. (reign 1519-1558), son of Philip the Fair, his betrothal to Princess Mary of England, afterwards to Renée of France, ii, 127; rival of Francis I. for the empire, 131; visits England, 133; is visited by Henry VIII., 136; concludes alliance with Leo X., 140; with Henry VIII., 141; visits England again, 143; his victory over France, 149; makes treaty of Madrid, 151; league against him, 152; his army captures Rome, 153; Wolsey exasperated with him, 155; indignation at Henry's

GERMANY, emperors of (continued):— divorce, 156; ascendancy in Italy, 157; negotiates with Pope and Francis, 158; refuses consent to divorce of Henry, 167; grief at death of Sir Thomas More, 177; does not permit Pole to enter his dominions, 193; concludes truce with Francis I., 193; allied with England, 208; his increasing power, 221; support of Princess Mary, 246; marriage treaty with England, 247; creates his son Philip king of Naples, 253; abdicates, 261; death, 267; union of Spain with Germany and the Low Countries in his reign, v. 111.

FERDINAND I. (reign, 1558-1564), brother of Charles V., ii. 278; elector of Bavaria claims Austria through his will, iv. 148.

— II., (reign, 1619-1637), project for his marriage with Spanish Infanta, ii. 406.

LEOPOLD I. (reign, 1658-1705), claims to regulate Spanish succession, iv. 24; hopes to secure it to his son, 33; recalls Prince Eugene from Italy, 52; offers Marlborough government of Low Countries, 56.

JOSEPH I., (reign, 1705-1711), his death, iv. 67.

CHARLES VI. (reign, 1711-1740), iv. 75; opposes conclusion of Peace of Utrecht, 76; concludes treaty of defensive alliance with England, 110; joins quadruple alliance, 114; his army in Sicily, 118; his pragmatic sanction, concludes treaty of Vienna with Spain, 132; protests against George I.'s opening speech to Parliament, 134; his death (1740), 148.

— VII., Charles Albert of Bavaria, crowned (1742), iv. 150; a fugitive, 152; hopes for assistance of France, 153; his death (1745), 154.

FRANCIS I., Duke of Lorraine, husband of Maria Theresa, becomes emperor (1745), iv. 156.

LEOPOLD II. (1791, 1792), signs declaration of Pillnitz (1791), iv. 320; his death, 321.

FRANCIS II. See Austria.

GERTRUYDENBERG, conferences at, iv. 64, 65.

GETTYSBURG, battle of, v. 338.

GHEENT, murder of Van Arteveldt at, i. 303; captured by the Duke of Burgundy (1708), iv. 58; given up to the allies, 59.

GHUZNEE, capture of, v. 58.

GHILZYES, tribe of, v. 51.

GIAC, Dame de, i. 399.

—, Sire de, favorite of Charles VII. of France, ii. 20.

GIANT'S DYKE, i. 32.

GIBBON, EDWARD (1737-1794), his axiom in regard to rebels, iv. 108.

GIBRALTAR, in possession of the English, iv. 54; retained by the English at peace of Utrecht, 75; Philip V. raises siege of, 134; besieged by English and Spaniards, 272-274; draws supplies from Tangier, v. 109.

GIBSON, MILNER, supports peace policy, v. 239; proposes amendment to conspiracy bill, 286; member of Palmerston's second cabinet, 301; his sympathy with unionists in the United States, 331; loses his seat in Parliament, 381.

GILES, Dr., at death-bed of Hampden, iii. 34.

GILBERT, Sir HUMPHREY, brother of Sir Walter Raleigh, ii. 361.

GINCKEL, General (1630-1703), accomplishes pacification of Ireland, made Earl of Athlone, iii., 388.

GIRONDISTS, moderate party in French convention, their fall, iv. 325.

GISORS, conference at, i. 176-180.

GITHA, mother of King Harold, escapes from Exeter, i. 109.

GLADSTONE, WILLIAM EWART, associated with Sir Robert Peel's government, v. 60; commencement of his contests with Disraeli, 147; chancellor of exchequer under Aberdeen, 148; resigns, 217; his speech against "Conspiracy to Murder Bill," 286; suspends system of deportation, 289; sent as commissioner to Ionian Isles, 295; returns to England, 296; wise policy in regard to Ionian Islands, 297; defence of little boroughs, 298; made chancellor of exchequer under Lord Palmerston, 301; supports Mr. Cobden's negotiations with Emperor Napoleon, 303, 304; indignation at his treaty of commerce, 304; his proposition for reduction of duty on paper, 305; separates himself from Lord Palmerston, 305, 306; admiration for Jefferson Davis, 331; his error, 332; settlement of Alabama claims during his ministry, 334; his influence impaired by result of Geneva arbitration, 335; speech at Glasgow, 349; leader of Liberal party, 351; Guizot's letter to him on England's indifference on foreign affairs, 359, 360; his prophecy in regard to the future of Liberal party, 362; his amendment to Disraeli's Reform Bill, 367; his Irish measures, 369; resolutions for disestablishment of Irish church, 380-382; becomes premier, 383; his cabinet, 384; measures in regard to Irish church, 385; his Irish Land Bill, 386, 387; reform in system of national education, 388, 389; preserves neutrality of England in Franco-Prussian war, 390, 400; letter of Guizot to him, 391-400; his authority impaired by the opposition to his Education Bill, 402; measures of reform for the army, 403, 404; calls in aid of royal prerogative, to abolish system of purchase in the army, 404; his Ballot Bill, 405; discouragement of liquor traffic, 406; Irish University Bill, 407, 408; resigns, 408; his temporary return; final resignation, 409.

GLAMORGAN, Earl of, son of Marquis of Worcester, negotiates treaty between Charles I. and Irish Catholics; arrested, iii. 70; released; renews his intrigues, 71; the king's letter to him, 75.

GLANVILLE, RANULPH de, i. 176; makes William of Scotland prisoner, 177; assists Henry II. to establish courts of justice, 477.

- GLASGOW, taken by Montrose, iii. 66.
 —, university of, Sir Robert Peel elected rector, iv. 456.
- GLENCOE, massacre of, planned by Sir John Dalrymple, iii. 395; the massacre, 396, 397.
- GLENDOWER or GLENDWYR, OWEN, claims sovereignty of Wales; raises insurrection against Henry IV., i. 366; joins conspiracy of Hotspur, 353, 359; marries his daughter to Edmund Mortimer; advances against England, 369; assisted by the French, 371; his son made prisoner, 372; abandoned by his adherents, 373.
- GLENFINNAN, rendezvous of Charles Edward and the Highland Clans, iv. 159.
- GLENGARRY, Macdonald of. See Macdonald.
- GLOUCESTER, besieged by Charles I., iii. 37, 38; siege raised, 39; English ships at, surrendered to the Americans, iv. 264.
 —, Duchess of, aunt of Queen Victoria, v. 133.
 —, Duke of, Thomas, uncle of Richard II., as Earl of Buckingham, in command of army in France, i. 342; seizes reins of government, 350; his revenge on the king's favorites, 351; deprived of power, 352; arrested, 352; death, 353.
 —, Duke of, Humphrey, brother of Henry V., made regent of England (1422), i. 407; receives title of Protector, ii. 14; falls in love with Jacqueline of Hainault, 17; marries her, 18; attacks Duke of Brabant; returns to England, 19; reconciled to his uncle, 19; marries Eleanor Cobham, 20; dissensions with Cardinal Beaufort, 28; claims dominions of his wife Jacqueline, 37; struggle for power with Cardinal Beaufort, 38; accused of high treason; his death (1447), 39.
 —, Duke of. See Richard III.
 —, Duke of, son of Charles I., iii. 86; his parting with his father, 115; sent to Holland, 160; in Spanish army at the battle of the Dunes, 191; arrives in England with Charles II., 248; his death, 254.
 —, Duke of, son of Princess Anne, iv. 37; his death, 33.
 —, Earl of, Robert, son of Henry I., renounces allegiance to Stephen, i. 139; supports Empress Maud; captures Stephen at battle of Lincoln, 143; taken prisoner and exchanged for Stephen, 145; defeats Stephen before Wilton; death, 146.
 —, Earl of, deprived of the title by Henry IV., becomes Lord Le Despencer, i. 361; beheaded by citizens of Bristol, 363.
- GODA, sister of Edward the Confessor, i. 82.
- GODEHEU, M., director of French East India Company, treats with English, iv. 205; his treaty deathblow to French empire in India, 206.
- GODERICH (Robinson), Lord, fails in forming coalition ministry, iv. 417.
- GODFREY, Sir EDMUNDSBURY, murdered, iii. 279.
 —, MICHAEL, his death before Namur, iv. 15, 16.
- GODOLPHIN, Lord, at head of Tory party, iii. 280; associated with Halifax and Sunderland in privy council of Charles II., 282; his advice to the king in regard to Exclusion Bill, 285; consents to accompany James II. to mass, 304; retained in his council, 305; his account of James II.'s letter, 359; accused of treason by Fenwick, iv. 21; resigns his office of Lord Treasurer, 22; Anne's confidence in, 59; Marlborough's letter to, 52; his power menaced, 58; protests against peace of Utrecht, 73; in Queen Anne's first cabinet, 80; dismissed, 83.
- GODOY, MANUEL, "Prince of Peace," favorite of Queen Louisa of Spain, iv. 331; his fall, 333; released from prison by order of Napoleon, 384.
- GODRUN, Danish king, accepts Christianity, i. 50; death of, 51.
- GODWIN, Earl, Saxon nobleman, i. 78, 79; swears allegiance to Harold, 80; sends for Edward the Confessor, 81; his power in England, 81-83; flies to Flanders, 83; returns to England and regains his power, 85, 86; his death, 86.
- GOFFE, Colonel, assists at dispersal of Barbones' Parliament, iii. 166.
- GONDOMAR, Spanish ambassador to England, ii. 401.
- GOOD HOPE, Cape of, colonists of, protest against transportation of criminals, v. 289.
- GOODMAN, CARDELL, joins in Barclay's assassination plot, iv. 18.
- GOODWIN, Mr. contested election of, ii. 383.
- GORDON, Duke of, holds Edinburgh Castle for King James, iii. 376.
 —, ARTHUR, son of Lord Aberdeen, v. 117.
 —, CATHERINE, wife of Perkin Warbeck, ii. 104, 107, 108.
 —, General, at battle of Sheriffmuir, iv. 102; left in command of insurgents after flight of the Pretender, 105.
 —, GEORGE WILLIAM, hanged for exciting sedition in Jamaica, v. 353.
 —, Lord GEORGE, president of the Protestant association, riot on occasion of his presenting petition against Catholics, 254, 255.
- GOREE, island of, William lands at, on his first visit to Holland, iii. 390.
- GORING, Lord, in command of royalist troops, iii. 64; abandons Prince Charles, 71.
- GORTSCHAKOFF, Prince, Russian general, enters Bucharest, v. 177; summoned by Turkey to quit Danubian principalities, 179; becomes commander-in-chief of Russian army, 221; refuses to take the offensive, 227; is overruled, 228; his description of bombardment of Sevastopol, 229; decides upon retreat, 230; quoted, 231; his response to English note in regard to Poland, 344.
- GORTZ, intriguer against George I., iv. 114.
- GOUGH, Lord, in command of British troops in Punjaub, v. 241.
- GOURDON, BERTRAND de, kills King Richard at siege of Chalus, i. 202.

- "GOVERNMENT of National Defence," in France, v. 389.
- GOWER, Earl, member of Pitt's cabinet of 1783, iv. 299; ambassador to Paris; recalled, 323.
- GOWRIE, Earl of, John Ruthven, entraps James VI. into imprisonment, ii. 320.
- , Earl of, William Ruthven, beheaded (1584), ii. 333.
- GRACE, Act of, of William III., iii. 381.
- GRAMMONT, Duc de, imprudence at battle of Dettingen, iv. 153; killed at Fontenoy, 155.
- GRATTAN, HENRY, his eloquence in service of Ireland, v. 269; opposes union of Ireland with England, 342, 343.
- GRAFTON, Duke of, his pursuit of Monmouth, iii. 316; joins Prince of Orange, 352.
- , Duke of, Fitzroy (1736-1811), visits Wilkes in the Tower, iii. 222; member of Chatham's cabinet; prime minister on Chatham's resignation, 229; keeper of the Seals in North's cabinet; resigns, 239.
- GRAHAM of Claverhouse. See Dundee.
- , Sir JAMES, member of Lord Grey's cabinet, offers his resignation (1834), iv. 446; refuses seat in Peel's cabinet, 452; member of Peel's cabinet, v. 60; in Aberdeen's cabinet; resigns, 217; his death, 1861, 348.
- GRANBY, Lord, in command of squadron at battle of Minden, iv. 210.
- GRAND ALLIANCE, congress of, assembled at the Hague, iii. 391; address of William of Orange, to, 391, 392; successful campaign of French against it, 392; victorious at La Hogue, 399; defeated at Steinkirk, 401; at Neerwinden, 402, 403; captures Namur, iv. 17; concludes treaty of Ryswick, 23, 24; religious stipulations, 24, 25; second, signed at the Hague (1701), 40, 41; survives death of William III., 49; declares war against France (1702), 51; internal dissensions of, 54; concludes Peace of Utrecht (1713), 75; of Rastadt (1714), 76.
- GRANDVAL, condemned for plot to assassinate William III., iii. 400.
- GRANT, Ulysses Simpson, President of United States, settlement of Alabama claims in his administration, v. 334; his capture of Vicksburg, in 1863, 333.
- , Sir HOPE, in command of land forces in China, v. 310.
- GRANVILLE, Lord. See Lord Carteret.
- , Lord (1773-1846), English ambassador in Paris, iv. 449.
- , Lord, successor of Lord Palmerston in Foreign Office (1851), v. 146; attempts to form cabinet on resignation of Lord Derby, 299; Colonial Secretary in Gladstone's cabinet, 384.
- GRASSE, Count de, in command of French fleet sent to aid of Americans, iv. 263; defeated by Rodney and Hood near Jamaica, 270, 271; taken prisoner, 271.
- GRAVELINES, battle of, ii. 362.
- GRAVES, Colonel, in charge of Charles I. at Holmby, iii. 82.
- GRAVINA, Admiral, French naval commander, with Villeneuve at Trafalgar, iv. 371.
- GRAY, THOMAS, his "Elegy," recited by Wolfe, iv. 200.
- GRAYMOND, M. de, agent of Mazarin in Scotland, iii. 151.
- GREAT EXHIBITION, the (of 1851), projected by Prince Albert, v. 136; opposition to, 139; Queen Victoria's account of its opening, 140, 141; its success, 141.
- GREECE, cause of, advocated in London, v. 284; Ionian Islands desire to unite with, 294; difficulty in finding a king, 296.
- , OTHO, king of, dethroned, v. 293; proclamation of, 397.
- GREENE, introduces Shakespeare to Blackfriars' Theatre, ii. 367.
- , NATHANIEL, George Washington's letter to, iv. 275.
- GREENWAY, accomplice of Catesby; escape of; ii. 391.
- GREENWICH, Charles I. at, iii. 20.
- GREGORY, the Great. See Popes.
- , VIII. See Popes.
- , X. See Popes.
- , XV. See Popes.
- GRENADA, retained by England in Peace of Fontainebleau (1762), iv. 219, captured by D'Estaing, 253.
- GRENVILLE, Sir BEVIL, adherent of Charles I., iii. 35, 64.
- , GEORGE (1712-1770), brother of Lord Temple, succeeds Bute as prime minister, 1763, iv. 221; his administration, 221, 222; proposition for taxation of American colonies, 222-224; his Stamp Act passed, 224; obstinate defence of his policy; his Regency bill, 226; dismissed, 227.
- , Sir JOHN, engaged in insurrection in favor of Charles II., iii. 213; negotiations with Monk, 219; interview with him, 239; bearer of proposals to Charles II., 240; to Parliament, 244.
- , Lord (1759-1834), minister for foreign affairs (1800), his reply to Bonaparte, iv. 344; interview with Pitt, 358; attacks on measures for national defence, 361; refuses to enter Pitt's cabinet, 363; grief at death of Pitt, 374; becomes premier, 376; fall of his ministry, 381; attitude toward Prince Regent, 394.
- , Sir RICHARD, his expedition to Virginia, ii. 362.
- , Sir RICHARD, in temporary command of Royalist troops after Naschy, iii. 64; abandons Prince Charles, 71.
- GRESHAM, Sir THOMAS, builds the Royal Exchange, ii. 360.
- GRETNA GREEN, marriages at, abolished, v. 291.
- GREY, emissary of James VI. to Elizabeth, ii. 332.
- , Lady CATHERINE, younger sister of Jane Grey, ii. 267, her marriage, imprisonment, and death, 280.
- , CHARLES, Lord (1764-1845), opinion of Lord Holland, iv. 220; manager of impeachment of Warren Hastings, 292; Wyndham's separation from, 293; retires

- from politics with Fox, 338; supports Fox in efforts for peace, 345; attacks Pitt's government, 352; in Lord Grenville's cabinet, 376; as Lord Howick, proposes modification of Test Act, 380; attitude toward Prince Regent, 394; supports Parliamentary reform, 427; speech in favor of it, 428; Wellington's reply, 429; becomes prime minister, 429; presents reform bill, 430; determined upon dissolution of Parliament, 434; address to the Lords, 437-438; resignation, 439; recalled, 449; remark on passage of reform bill, 441; resignation, 447; character, 455; father-in-law of Lord Durham, v. 18; opinion of Lord Stanley, 60.
- GREY, SIR GEORGE, attempts to send criminals to Cape of Good Hope, v. 289; governor of New Zealand, 340.
- , HENRY GEORGE, Lord, proposes extension of ticket-of-leave system, v. 290.
- , Lady JANE, daughter of Duke of Suffolk, married to Dudley, son of Northumberland, ii. 239; receives announcement of her accession, 239, 240; proclaimed in London, 240; arrested, 244; imprisoned, 244; sentence of death not executed, 245; project to release her, 248; order for her execution signed by Mary, 250; death, 251.
- , Lord JOHN, councillor of Queen Elizabeth, ii. 267.
- , Sir JOHN, killed at second battle of St. Albans, ii. 56.
- , Lady MARY, sister of Jane Grey, her marriage; imprisonment by Elizabeth, ii. 300.
- , Sir RALPH, executed by Earl of Warwick, ii. 55.
- , Lord, executed at Pontefract, ii. 74.
- , Lord, disgraced on accession of James I., ii. 384; conspires against him; is condemned and pardoned, 385.
- , de WILTON, Lord, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, his severity, ii. 348.
- GREYS, the English cavalry regiment at Balaklava, v. 203.
- GREVILLE, CHARLES, secretary of Privy Council; his account of Victoria's first meeting with the council, v. 14, 15.
- GRIMBALD, Saxon monk, i. 59.
- GRIMSTONE, his accusations of Cromwell, iii. 84, 85; Speaker in Parliament of 1630, 243; reads letter of Charles II. to the House, 244.
- GRINDALL, Archbishop of Canterbury, Parker's version of the Bible published under his name, ii. 357; his death, 358.
- GROS, Baron, French commissioner at Athens, v. 132; French plenipotentiary to China, signs treaty of Tien-tsin, 308; sent back to obtain ratification of it, 310; does not oppose destruction of Summer Palace, 312.
- GROSMONT, Prince HENRY defeats Welsh at, i. 372.
- GROTE, GEORGE, his history of Greece, v. 167.
- GRYME, EDWARD, cross-bearer of Becket, i. 169, 170.
- GUADALOUPE, conquered by English, iv. 218; returned to France by treaty of Fontainebleau, 218; French colonies at, seized by English, 333.
- GUELDERS, Duke of, ally of Edward III., i. 296.
- , province of, devoted to republican form of government, iii. 366, 367.
- GUESCLIN, BERTRAND du, assists Henry of Transtamare, i. 331, 332; placed at head of French army; made Constable of France, 335; his military successes, 336, 341.
- GUEST, General, in command at Edinburgh at the time of its surprise by Charles Edward, iv. 160.
- GUIANA, Raleigh's expedition to, 400, 401; Dutch colonies in, iv. 266.
- GUICHEN, Count de, French naval commander, iv. 256; his engagements with Rodney in the Antilles, 256, 257.
- GUIENNE, becomes possession of England through marriage of Henry II., i. 149; Edward I. does homage for it to Philip the Bold, 243; falls into the hands of Philip the Fair, 251; remains in possession of France, 253; recovered by treaty of Montreuil, 254; ceded by Edward II. to his son 283; its towns retaken by the English, 301; war in, 318; expedition of Black Prince into, 320; ceded to English by treaty of Brétigny, 329; regained by France, ii. 40; claimed by Henry VIII., 119.
- , Madame de, widow of first Dauphin, marries Count of Richemont, ii. 15.
- GUILDFORD, Earl of. See North.
- GUINEA, Hawkins ships slaves on the coast of, ii. 360.
- GUINES, Bishop of, prayers on the field of Agincourt, i. 392.
- GUISE, Duc de, uncle of Mary Stuart, captures Calais, ii. 262; prepares to invade Scotland, 277; his massacre of Protestants, 281; his assassination, 282; effect of his capture of Calais in England, iii. 191.
- , MARY of. See Mary of Guise.
- GUISES, the, their power in France, ii. 221; tyranny over Charles IX., 281; recommend Catholic marriage for Mary Stuart, 283; solicit Mary Stuart to join Catholic alliance, 285; influence over Henry III., 316, 336.
- GUISCARD, ROBERT, his sons established in Calabria and Sicily, i. 126.
- GUITRY, Sire de, defends Montreuil, i. 524.
- GUIZOT, FRANCOIS PIERRE GUILLAUME, quoted, i. 31; his sketch of Clarendon, iii. 263; character of General Monk, 273; letter to Barante on the Chartists, v. 27, 28; preface to "Speeches of Prince Albert," 28-31; negotiations with England on the Turkish question, 34, 35; letter to General Baudraud, 36; correspondence on the Eastern question, 37, 38; letter of Thiers to, 39; his letter to Broglie, 40, 41; recalled from England, 42; his account of disposition of the Eastern question, 43, 44; of the overthrow of the Whigs, 57, 58; remarks on the relation of France and England, 90-100; accompanies Louis

Philippe to England, 102-104; conversation with Lord Aberdeen, 104; speech in Chamber of Deputies, 107, 108; letter to Consul at Tangier, 109; remarks in regard to relations of France and Spain, 110, 111; letter to French minister in London, 112, 113; to ambassador at Vienna, 113; his friendship with Lord Aberdeen, 114; his account of his relations with Aberdeen, 115-118; letter to Count Bresson, 119; to Jarnac, 119-121; opinion on Christina's policy, 121, 122; letter to Jarnac, 122; remarks on causes of war of 1870, 123, 124; sketches of Hallam and Macaulay, 162-167; criticism of Bismarck and Cavour, 302; letter on Italian question, 303; judgment in regard to war between Russia and Austria in 1866, 356-359; letter to Gladstone, on England's policy, 359, 360; on responsibilities of England in European politics, 391-400.

GUMBLE, chaplain of Monk, requests pass to Holland, iii. 223; letter to Monk, 227, 228.

GUNHILDA, sister of King Sweyn, i. 70.

GURNEY, RICHARD, Lord-Mayor of London, ii. 444.

GURTH, brother of Harold, i. 102-104; death of, at Hastings, 105.

GUSTAVUS, Kings of Sweden. See Sweden.

GUY, count of Ponthieu, i. 89.

GUZERAT, battle of, v. 242.

GYTHA, mother of Harold, i. 101.

H.

HABEAS CORPUS ACT, passed in 1679, iii. 281; James II. announces his intention of suspending it, 325; suspended on discovery of Barclay's conspiracy, iv. 20; suspended in Ireland, 1798, 339; suspended during popular agitation in 1817, 405; suspended in Ireland, v. 369.

HACKER, Colonel, conducts Charles I. to his trial, iii. 109; to his execution, 116, 117; present at the burial, 119; excluded from amnesty, 253.

HAGENAU, Diet of the Empire convoked at, i. 199.

HAGUE, the Elector Palatine takes refuge in, ii. 405; asylum for family of Charles II., iii. 149, 150; William III.'s reception at, 390; ratifications of Triple Alliance of 1717, exchanged at, iv. 112; peace concluded at between Spain and the Triple Alliance, 120.

HAINAULT, Count of, ally of Edward III., i. 296; abandons him, 297.

—, ISABELLA of. See Isabella of Hainault.

—, JACQUELINE of. See Jacqueline of Hainault.

—, JOHN of, accompanies Queen Isabel to England, i. 283.

—, PHILIPPA of. See Philippa of Hainault.

HALES, Sir EDWARD, apostate to Catholicism, decision in his favor, iii. 330; governor of the Tower; his threats to the seven bishops, 341; dismissed, 353; escapes with James II., 354.

HALES, Sir THOMAS, prior of order of St. John of Jerusalem, i. 346; beheaded, 347.

—, attorney-general in reign of Henry VIII., his accusations of Wolsey, ii. 160.

HALIDON HILL, battle of, i. 295.

HALIFAX, Lord, Edward Montague, charges brought against, iv. 39; member of the "junta," 82.

—, Marquis of, George Saville (1630-1695), leader of the "Trimmers," iii. 280; member of privy council of Charles II., 281; becomes president on retirement of Shaftesbury, 282; persuades the king to inquire into Lauderdale's administration, 283; opposed to Exclusion Bill, 285; his influence with the king diminishes; remark in regard to Rochester, 295; bearer of the queen's excuses to Charles II., 297; refuses to attend mass with James II., 304; president of the Council, 307; his remark on condemnation of Argyle, 312; his dismissal, 324; disgrace owing to opposition to suspension of Habeas Corpus Act, 325; his joy at the acquittal of the seven bishops, 343; confidential letter to William of Orange, 345; takes no part in conspiracy against James, 351; draws up royal proclamation convoking Parliament, 353; bearer of proposals to William of Orange, 354; becomes president of the council, 356; heads deputation to James II., 357; leader of Whigs in Parliament, 362; offers the crown to William and Mary, 365; member of privy council, 368; referred to, by Macaulay, v. 29.

HALLAM, ARTHUR, son of Sir Henry, mentioned by M. Guizot in his Mémoires, v. 163.

—, Sir HENRY, quoted, iv. 38; sketch of, by M. Guizot, v. 162, 163.

HAMBURG, English goods seized at, by French, iv. 378.

HAMELIN, Admiral, v. 185.

HAMILTON, Colonel ALEXANDER, brings General Washington the news of Arnold's treason, iv. 260; at siege of Yorktown, 264; Washington's letter to, 278, 279.

—, Duke of, his rivalry with Argyle, iii. 142; mortally wounded at battle of Worcester, 146, 147.

—, General, in Jacobite army, 1715, iv. 102.

—, Lieutenant-Colonel, fails to execute plans for massacre of Glencoe, iii. 296.

—, Marquis of (1606-1649), agent of Charles I. in Scotland, ii. 424; attempts of the king to arrest, 440; made duke, 441; conference with Henrietta Maria, iii. 31; invades England in behalf of King Charles, 100, 101; defeated by Cromwell; surrenders to Lambert, 102; trial, 122; execution, 123.

HAMMOND, governor of Isle of Wight, Charles I. takes refuge with, iii. 94; asks instructions of Parliament, 95; prevents the escape of the king, 98.

HAMPDEN, JOHN (1594-1643), attempts to emigrate, ii. 421; resists the imposition of ship-money; his trial, 422; sent to Scotland at head of Parliamentary committee,

- 439; his information to Parliament, 441; charged with high-treason, iii. 13; attempted arrest of; his escape, 14; triumphant return to Parliament, 17; receives command of regiment in Parliamentary army iii. 25; desires to renew battle of Edgehill, 28; his services to Parliament, 32; mortally wounded at Chalgrove, 33; his death, 34.
- HAMPDEN, JOHN, grandson of preceding, connected with Whig conspiracy against Charles II., 1682, iii. 292, 293; ransoms himself, 295; attack on Halifax, 368.
- HAMPTON COURT, built by Wolsey, ii. 165; Charles I. at, iii. 90; William III. at, iv. 44; his accident, 46.
- HANOVER, jealous of England, iv. 133; endangered by outbreak of war of Austrian succession, iv. 149; assumes neutrality for a year, 150; devotion of George II. to, 152, 153; George II.'s anxiety in regard to the Seven Years' War, 189; lost to him by convention of Closter-Severn, 195; allotted to Prussia; Napoleon's proposal to restore it to George III., 377; George IV.'s visit to, 412; separated from the English crown on accession of Victoria, 1837, v. 16.
- , Elector of, Ernest-Augustus (1629-1698), father of George I. of England, iv. 39.
- , Elector of, iv. 75. See George I. of England.
- , House of, Protestant succession of, recognized by Louis XIV. at peace of Utrecht, iv. 75.
- , treaty of (1725), iv. 133.
- HANOVERIAN, term of reproach applied to George II., iv. 153.
- HANOVERIANS, French decree against, iv. 326.
- HANSEATIC TOWNS. Napoleon proposes to relinquish them, iv. 377; he unites them to France, 395; league of, described by Cobden, v. 71.
- HARCOURT, GODEFROY d', French baron in England, i. 304.
- , Sir SIMON, afterwards Lord, Chancellor of England, iv. 86.
- HARDICANUTE, son of Canute and Emma of Normandy, inherits Denmark, i. 77; his claims to England supported by Godwin, 78, 79; provinces south of Thames allotted to him by Wittenagemote, 79; becomes king, 80; his death, 81.
- HADRIAN, Roman emperor, i. 24.
- HARDY, Admiral, Sir CHARLES, his manœuvres against French and Spanish fleet, iv. 256.
- , GATHORNE, returned to Parliament by University of Oxford, v. 351.
- , prosecuted for political libels, iv. 325.
- HARFLEUR, captured by Henry V., i. 386.
- HARLEY, ROBERT. See Earl of Oxford.
- , withdraws from Lord Derby's Cabinet, v. 298. See Henley.
- HAROLD (Harefoot), son of Canute, i. 77; supported by Leofric and Northern chiefs, 78; provinces north of the Thames allotted to him by Wittenagemote; captures Alfred son of Ethelred, 79; crowns himself; his death (1040), 80.
- HAROLD, son of Earl Godwin, banished, i. 83; returns from Ireland and joins his father, 85; employed by Edward the Confessor to quell insurrection in Northumbria, 87; his desire to visit Duke of Normandy, 88; accompanies him to Brittany, 89; oaths extorted from him by William, 89, 90; elected King of England, 91; repudiates his oaths to William; marries daughter of Eilfgar, Count of Mercia, i. 93; marches against Hardrada, 97; his conference with Tostig before the battle, 98; defeats the Norwegians, 99; hears of arrival of William of Normandy, 101; marches against the Normans, i. 102; refuses proposals of William, 103; is defeated at Hastings, 104, 105; his death, 105.
- , HARDRADA, King of Norway, i. 93; invades England, 97; his death, 98.
- HARO, Don Luis de, quoted, iii. 130; negotiates with Mazarin, 213.
- HARRISCH, Count, his indignation at second Partition treaty, iv. 34.
- HARRINGTON, JAMES, his Oceana, iii. 173.
- , Sir JOHN, companion of Essex in Ireland, quoted, ii. 349.
- HARRISON, THOMAS, in command of cavalry in Parliamentary army, iii. 96, 144; removes Charles I. to Windsor, 106; appointed to draw up sentence against the king, 111; defence of Cromwell, 161; assists at dissolution of Long Parliament, 162; refuses to recognize new government, 166; not elected to Parliament in 1656, 174; excluded from amnesty of 1660; his death, 253.
- , Virginia delegate to Congress, iv. 239.
- HARROWBY, Lord, in charge of foreign affairs in Pitt's second cabinet, 1804, iv. 363; his resignation, 365; announces to Parliament the king's confidence in his ministry, 381.
- HARTINGTON, Lord, son of Duke of Devonshire, proposes vote of want of confidence in Derby's ministry, v. 299; unseated, 383.
- HASELRIG, ARTHUR, his attempt to emigrate, ii. 421; moves bill of attainder against Strafford, 432; charged with high-treason, iii. 13; attempted arrest of, 14; his escape, 15; triumphant return to Parliament, 17; opposed to continuance of the monarchy, 100; elected to Parliament in 1656, 174; refuses to sit in House of Lords, 186; opposes recognition of Richard Cromwell, 199, 200; his overtures to the officers of the army, 201; orders Richard Cromwell to quit Whitehall, 207; defends Parliament against aggressions of the army, 215, 216; rallies his friends at Whitehall, 225; leaves Parliament on reinstatement of the Presbyterians, 235; excluded from amnesty of 1660, 253.
- HASTENBECK, battle of, iv. 195.
- HASTINGS, battle of, i. 104.
- , Danish pirate, invades Kent, i. 51; defeated by Alfred at Farnham; ar-

- tacks Mercia, 52; defeated at all points by Alfred, finally retires from England, 53.
- HASTINGS, Lord, beheaded under Henry VI., i. 372.
- , Lord, chamberlain of Edward IV., accompanies the king to Pecquigny, ii. 67; interview with Clairat, 68; letter to Duke of Gloucester, 72; at head of noblemen at the Tower, 73; arrested and beheaded, 74.
- , WARREN (1732-1818), successor of Clive in India, iv. 284; governor of Bengal, 285; measures to obtain money, 285, 286; opposed by Francis; appeals to Directors in London, 286; causes death of Nuncomar; supported by Directors, 287; his refusal to abide by his resignation, 288; duel with Francis; successful measures against Hyder Ali, 289; cruel extortions; returns to England, 290; reception in London, 291, 292; impeachment voted by the Commons, 292; trial, 292, 293; acquittal, 293; death, 294; his rule in India, v. 272.
- HATTON, Sir CHRISTOPHER (1540-1591), one of commission for trial of Mary Stuart, ii. 327; chancellor of Queen Elizabeth, 348.
- HATHERLY, Lord, lord chancellor in Gladstone's cabinet, v. 384.
- HAVELOCK, General, Sir HENRY, as captain, his conduct at Jellalabad, v. 53; marches to relief of Lucknow and Cawnpore, 249, 250; letter to his wife, 255, 256; defeats the Sepoys, 256; enters Cawnpore, 257; reinforced by Outram, 258; raises siege of Lucknow, 262, 263; receives baronetcy, 267; his death, 268.
- "HAVELOCK'S SAINTS," v. 249.
- HAVRE, bombarded by Rodney, iv. 197.
- HAWKE, Admiral, EDWARD (1715-1781), cruises before Brest, iv. 197; defeats French fleet in the Vilaine, 198.
- HAWKESBURY, Lord. See Liverpool.
- HAWKINS, admiral of Queen Elizabeth, ii. 323, 339, 341.
- , engaged in the slave-trade, 360.
- HAWLEY, General, defeated by Highlanders at Falkirk, iv. 170; his cruelty to his soldiers, 170, 171; to prisoners and wounded after Culloden, 175.
- HAWSE, Sir THOMAS, beheaded at Pontefract, ii. 74.
- HAY, Lord CHARLES, at battle of Fontenoy, iv. 155.
- HAZELWOOD, Mr. his account of famine in Ireland, v. 94, 95.
- HEACO, nephew of Harold, son of Godwin, i. 88.
- HEAD, Major, governor of Upper Canada, v. 18.
- "HEALING Declaration," iii. 254.
- HEATH, Bishop of Winchester, imprisoned by Cranmer, ii. 235; Archbishop of York; made Chancellor, 257; announces to Parliament Elizabeth's accession, 266.
- HEBRIDES, the, Bruce takes refuge in, i. 269.
- HEDGELY MOOR, battle of, ii. 55.
- HEINSIUS, Grand Pensionary of Holland (1641-1720), William III.'s letter to after Beachy Head, iii. 386; sends news of peace of Ryswick to William, iv. 24; letters from William, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 31, 37, 43, 47, 401, 402, 407, iv. 14; his letter to William, 36, 44; his confidence in Marlborough, 56; faithful to policy of William III., 57; his mistaken policy toward France, 60, 62; conducts conferences at Utrecht, 65; failure of his policy, 75; no longer in power, 110.
- HELENA, Grand Duchess, v. 172.
- HELIGOLAND, naval battle of, v. 346.
- HELIE DE ST. SAEN, i. 132.
- HELIOPOLIS, battle of, iv. 353.
- HENDERSON, attempts to convert Charles I. to Presbyterianism, iii. 75.
- HENGIST and Horsa, i. 29-31.
- HENNEBON, defended by Joan of Montfort, i. 299, 300.
- HENRIETTA, Duchess of Orleans, daughter of Charles I., negotiation for her marriage, iii. 255; employed by Louis XIV. to negotiate with Charles II., 267; her death, 272.
- MARIA, sister of Louis XIII., wife of Charles I., her marriage with Charles negotiated, ii. 411; character, 417; dread of Parliament, 419; interferences between Charles and Parliament, 431; her anxiety to escape to France, 435; at request of Parliament consents to remain in England, 439; accompanies the king in his flight from London, iii. 17; prepares to escape to the continent, 18; her influence over her husband; embarks at Dover, 20; sends money to the king, 30; her independent position after her return, 30, 31; rejoins the king, 33; opposed to convocation of Oxford Parliament, 44; her flight to Exeter, 47; embarks for France, 51; her relations with the Scots, 73; approves Ashburnham's negotiations with Cromwell, 86; secures intervention of Holland in favor of the king, 111; her influence in France, 149; quoted, 155.
- MARIA, Princess, daughter of Charles I., her marriage with Prince of Orange, iii. 18; Duke of Gloucester sent to her, 160; at Breda with Charles II., 245; commended by her brother to the States-general, 248; her death, 254, 255.
- HENRY I., Beauclerc, son of William the Conqueror, quarrels with his brother, i. 115; at his father's death-bed, 118; his alliance with his brother Robert Curthose, 122; possesses himself of the royal treasure, 125; is crowned at London, 1100; his popularity among the Saxons, 126; gives charter to the English, 126, 127; marries Matilda of Scotland, 127; banishes favorites of William Rufus, 127; supported by clergy and common people against Robert Curthose, 128; his treaty with Robert, 128, 129; besieges Earl of Shrewsbury in Bridgnorth; his determination to gain Normandy, 129; invades Normandy; defeats Robert at Tinchebrai; seizes Edgar Atheling, 130; his cruelty to Robert, 131; intrusts William Cliton to Helie de St. Saen; marries his daughter to Emperor of Germany; his war and treaty with Louis VI., 132; marries his son to Matilda of Anjou; sets sail from France,

- 133; death of his son, 134; his grief; settles the crown upon his daughter; disposal of her in marriage, 135; his fears concerning her security upon the throne, 136; his clemency to partisans of William Clifton; his death; his character, 137; his charter, 211, 212.
- HENRY II., son of Empress Maud and Geoffrey Plantagenet; his birth, i. 127; sent into England, 145; knighted by David of Scotland; receives investiture of Normandy; lands in England with army, 147; is adopted by Stephen; recognized as heir to the throne, 148; becomes king, (1154) his marriage; his possessions in France; his oath to conform to his father's will, 149; his reforms; his treatment of his brother Geoffrey, 150; compels him to take refuge in Nantes; subdues the Welsh; takes possession of Nantes, 151; his arrangements for marriage of his sons; lays claim to Toulouse; his war with Louis VII., 152; his affection for Becket, 153, 154, 155; makes him archbishop of Canterbury, 156; beginning of his quarrels with Becket, 156, 157; convokes council, and draws up Constitutions of Clarendon, 157; his anger at Becket's refusal to ratify them; summons him before council at Southampton, 158; his fury at Becket's obstinacy, 160; his revenge upon him, 162, 163; his troubles with the Welsh: takes possession of Brittany; celebrates the marriage of his son Geoffrey with Constance of Brittany; demands to have Becket sent away from Pontigny, 163; comes to an understanding with Louis VII.; meets Becket at conference of Montmirail, 164; his reconciliation with him, 165, 166; his hasty speech concerning Becket, 167; convokes his barons, 168; his remorse and penance, 171, 172; his conquest of Ireland, 172, 173; his government of it, 173, 174; his quarrels with his sons, 174-177; establishes courts of justice, 177; further troubles with his sons; his forgiveness of Henry, 178; of Bertrand de Born, 179; assumes the cross; makes treaty with France, 180; his treatment of Richard, 180, 181; prepares for war with France; refuses terms of Philip Augustus, 181; sues for peace; his illness, 182; his grief at the defection of his son John, 182, 183 his death, 183; renews charters of King Stephen, 212.
- III., son of John, i. 220; crowned at Gloucester (1216), vassal of the church, 221; his character, 223; attempts to recover Brittany, 224; orders arrest of Hubert de Burgh, 225; his marriage with Eleanor of Provence; his disregard for his oaths, 226; his expedition to France, 227; his expedients to raise money; convokes Parliament, 228; his expedition to Guienne, 229; agrees to demands of the barons, 230; exiles Simon de Montfort, 231; makes further concessions to the barons, 232; relieved of his oaths by the Pope, 233; his war with the barons, 234; made prisoner by Earl of Leicester, 235; at battle of Evesham, 236; 237; regains his sceptre, 238; his death (1272), 239.
- HENRY IV., Bolingbroke, John of Gaunt, i. 343; becomes Earl of Derby, 350; intercedes for Burley, 351; his influence over Richard II., 352; made Duke of Hereford, 353; his interview with Norfolk, 354; is exiled; returns to England, 355; advances with army toward London; is joined by Duke of York, 356; takes Richard prisoner, 358; secures his abdication, 359; lays claim to the crown, 360; becomes king (1399); first acts of his reign, 361, 362; imprisons Richard, 362; conspiracy of Lords appellants against him, 363; his arrangements with France concerning Queen Isabel, 364, 365; his unsuccessful campaign in Scotland, 365; insurrection of Owen Glendower against him, 366; subdues rebellion in Scotland, 367, 368; Hotspur's conspiracy against him, 368, 369; receives challenge from the Percies; attempts to negotiate, 369; defeats insurgents at Shrewsbury, 370; his proposal to Parliament and its results, 371; his proceedings against insurgents, 372, 373; detains Prince James of Scotland in England, 374; sends aid to French factions, 375, 376; close of his reign, 376, 377; his death (1413), 378.
- V., declared Prince of Wales, i. 362; proposed alliance of, with Queen Isabel, 364; wounded at Shrewsbury, 370; at war with Glendower, 371; his victory over the Welsh, 372; puts an end to the war, 373; his character, 376, 377; his reconciliation with his father, 377, 378; accession (1413); first acts of his reign, 380; his dealings with Cobham and the Lollards, 381, 382; lays claim to crown of France, 383; his demands, 383, 384; his preparations for war, 385; conspiracy against him; lands in France and captures Harfleur, 386; marches toward Calais, 387, 388; at the battle of Agincourt, 389-392; returns to England; his good understanding with Parliament; his reception of Sigismund, 393; again invades France, 394; his military operations, 395; his negotiations with French factions, 396; captures Rouen, 397; his negotiations at Meulan, 398; makes treaty of Troyes with Philip of Burgundy, 400, 401; married to Princess Catherine; made regent of France; his capture of Sens and Montrecau, 402; besieges Melun, 403; his behavior to the French; captures Melun, 404; returns to England, 405; lands again in France and captures Meaux; birth of his son; his illness, 406; his character; his last words, 407; his death (1422), 408; his burial, ii. 13, 14.
- VI., his birth (1421), i. 406; heir to two crowns, ii. 13; his guardians, 14; crowned King of France, returns to England, 35; his character, his marriage with Margaret of Anjou, 38; builds Eton and King's College, 39; loses all his French possessions but Calais, 40; insurrection of Jack Cade in his reign, 42; Duke of York revolts against him, 43; his mental derangement, 44; recovers his reason, is wounded at St. Albans, 45; his endeavors to restore peace, is taken prisoner at Northampton, 46; public opinion aroused in his favor, 47; his adherents effect a compromise with York, 48; taken possession of by the queen, retracts his recent promises, 49; is deposed, 50, 51; conveyed to Wales, brought back by his partisans, 55; is defeated at Hexham, 55; taken prisoner and conveyed to the Tower, 56; released, 61; again imprisoned, 63, his death (1471), 64.

HENRY VII., as Earl of Richmond, proposed as heir to English crown, ii. 78; unsuccessful conspiracy in his favor, 78, 79; his oath to his partisans, 80; assisted by Charles VIII., 81; defeats Richard III. at Bosworth, 82, 83; first acts of his reign, 84; crowned (1485), 85; measures of his first Parliament, 86, 87; seizes property of Richard's partisans, causes revocation of acts of Yorkist Parliaments, 87; marries Elizabeth of York, 88; his precautions to establish his authority, 89; his progress through his kingdom, 89, 90; his treaty with Scotland, 90; insurrection of Lambert Simnel against him, 91-93; consents to coronation of his wife, 94; his policy in regard to Brittany, 94, 95; his double-dealing, 95; forms alliance against Charles VIII., 96; his measures to obtain money for the war, 97; his anger at Charles' treaty with Brittany, 98, 99; obtains fresh subsidies, concludes secret peace with Charles, 99; Perkin Warbeck lays claim to his crown, 100, 101; executes Stanley and confiscates his property, 102; his interference in affairs of Scotland, 103, 104; insurrection under Lord Audley against, 105, 106; his moderation, 106, his mild treatment of Warbeck, 108; forced to execute him, 109; his marriage arrangements for his children, 110; his avarice, 111; prosperity of England in his reign, his encouragement of discoveries, 112; his treatment of Suffolk, 113, 114; his exactions, 114; his treatment of Philip the Fair, 114, 115; his sickness and repentance, 115, 116; his death (1509), his character, 116.

VIII., as prince, betrothed to Catherine of Aragon, ii. 110; accession (1509), characteristics of his reign, his disposition, 117; marries Catherine of Aragon, repudiates Empson and Dudley, 118; joins league against Louis XII., 119; position of his army in France 120; sets sail himself for France, 121; forms league with Maximilian, 122; his reception of him at Calais, 123; his capture of Tournay, 124; under the control of Wolsey, 129; aspires to the imperial title, 130; forms alliance with Francis I., aims again at the empire unsuccessfully, 131; congratulates Charles V., 132; receives a visit from the emperor, 133; meets Francis on the Field of the Cloth of Gold, 134-136; visits the Emperor at Gravelines, 136; consents to execution of Buckingham, 137; his defence of Catholicism, 138, 139; secret of his policy, 140; concludes treaty with the pope and the emperor, 141; his anger against Francis I., 142; exacts a loan from London merchants, 143; sends army into France, 144; finds it necessary to convoke Parliament, 145; makes another unsuccessful attempt against France, 147; refuses to join Charles V., 149; his project for division of France, his demand for subsidies refused by the people, 150; his alliance with Louise of Savoy, 151, 152; his temporary coolness toward Wolsey, 152; abandons Clement VII. to his fate, 153; falls in love with Anne Boleyn, 154; his plan to annul his marriage with Catharine of Aragon, 155, 156; obtains the authorization of the pope, 156; his temporary reconciliation with Catherine, 157; orders assembling of commission, his protestations, 158; urges Wolsey to pronounce judgment, 159; influenced against Wolsey by Anne Boleyn, 160; receives news of Wolsey's death, 165; opinions concerning his divorce, 166, 167; conceives the idea of discarding the authority of Rome, 168; announces his intention to Parliament and clergy, 169; marries Anne Boleyn, 170; his excommunication, decision of Sacred College against, 172; declared Head of the Church by Parliament, 173; calls upon More and Fisher to take oath of allegiance, 174; his severity to heretics, condemns Fisher, 177; orders execution of More, 177; bull of Paul III. against, 178; his dissolution of the monasteries, 179, 180; his grief for Catherine's death, 181; in love with Jane Seymour, causes arrest of Anne Boleyn, 182; her letter to him, 183, 184; marries Jane Seymour, 185; authorized by Parliament to determine the succession, 186; popular disaffection against him, 186, 187; insurrections against, 187, 189; his severity to the insurgents, 189; birth of his heir, 190; his spoliation of the abbey, 190, 191; his attack on the memory of Becket, 191; his efforts to obtain money, 192; his judgment of Lambert, his jealousy of Pole aroused, 193; prepares articles of Faith, 194; accepts Gardiner's revision of his edict, 195; proposes to marry Anne of Cleves, 196; marries her, his resentment against Cromwell, 197; marries Catharine Howard, 197; his excuses to Duke of Cleves, his dealings with heretics, 198; his suspicion of Catharine Howard, his cruelty to her family, 199, 200; orders Catharine's condemnation, 201; his leaning toward Roman Catholic doctrines, 201, 202; his government of Wales and Ireland, 202, 203; fails to convert James of Scotland, 203; makes war on him, 204; his project to marry his son to Mary Stuart, 205; opposition of the Scots to his claims, 206; concludes a treaty, 207; restores his daughters to their civil rights, marries Catherine Parr, leads an army into France, 208; his interference with affairs of Scotland, his complicity in murder of Beaton, 209; his treaty with Francis I., decline of his health, 210; causes execution of Anne Askew, 211; his last speech to Parliament, his displeasure with Catherine Parr, 211;

- his reconciliation with her, 212; his impeachment of Norfolk and Surrey, 213; his death (1547), 214; his character, 214, 215; efferets of his reign, 215, 218.
- HENRY, Bishop of Winchester. See Winchester.
- , Kings of France. See France.
- , Emperors of Germany. See Germany.
- , son of David of Scotland, at battle of the Standard, i. 142.
- , son of Richard Cromwell, takes oath imposed by the barons, i. 332.
- , Prince, eldest son of Henry II., i. 152; crowned by his father, 165; his ambition, 174; at court of Louis VII., 175; revolts against his father, 175-177; reconciliation, 177; death, 178.
- , Prince, eldest son of James I., his character, negotiations for his marriage, ii. 394; illness and death, 395.
- , of Transmarc. See Castile.
- , PATRICK, speech against Stamp Act, iv. 225; advocates war with England, 235, 236.
- HEPBURN OF KEITH, JAMES, introduces Charles Edward into Holyrood, iv. 160.
- HEPTARCHY, or OCTARCHY, the Saxon, i. 30-33.
- HERAT, seized by Shah of Persia, v. 239.
- HERBERT, Admiral ARTHUR. See Torrington.
- , Sir EDWARD, attorney-general of Charles I., charges popular leaders with high treason, iii. 13; placed in the Tower for defence of Charles I., 22.
- , Sir EDWARD, Chief Justice, his decision in case of Compton, iii. 331.
- , Sir FULKE, gentleman of the bed-chamber to Henry III., ii. 219.
- , Lord, lays siege to Thérionenne, ii. 122.
- , Lord (Mr. Sidney), associated with Sir Robert Peel's government, v. 60; replies to Cobden, 76; persuades Miss Nightingale to go to the Crimea, 215; in Aberdeen's cabinet, resigns, 217; minister of war in Palmerston's second cabinet, 301; death (1861), 349.
- , groom of the chamber to Charles I., 105; conversations with the king, 106, 114, 116.
- , Earl of, Humphrey Bohun, constable of England, opposes commands of Edward I., i. 255; retires to his estates, 256; resists the king's exactions, 257; his death, 263.
- , Earl of, Roger Fitz-Osbern, his marriage, i. 112; conspires against the Conqueror, 112-113; imprisoned, 113.
- HEREFORD, Earl of, William Fitz-Osbern, seneschal of Normandy, at assembly at Lillebonne, i. 95, 96; his death, 112.
- , Earl of, revolts against Edward II., killed at Boroughbridge, i. 281.
- HERWARD, Lord of Born, Saxon chief, entrenched at Ely, i. 111; maintains war against the Conqueror, 111; submits to the same, 112.
- HERLUIN, pays the expenses of the Conqueror's burial, i. 119.
- HERSCHEL, Sir JOHN, v. 161.
- HERTFORD, Lord, son of Duke of Somerset, marries Lady Catherine Grey, ii. 280.
- , Lord, makes overtures to Cromwell in behalf of Charles II. iii. 176.
- , Marquis of, tutor of Charles II. iii. 20; supports cause of Charles I., 35, 64.
- HESSE, invaded by French under Contades, iv. 210.
- HESSE-CASSEL, pillaged by Duke of Richelieu, iv. 195.
- HESSIANS, mercenary troops of George II., iv. 152; in army of Duke of Cumberland in Scotland, 173.
- HETON, Sir THOMAS GREY, conspires against Henry V., is executed, i. 386.
- HEWITT, Dr., executed for conspiracy against Cromwell, iii. 189.
- HEWLING, WILLIAM and BENJAMIN, executed, iii. 322.
- HEXHAM, battle of, ii. 55.
- HEYWORTH MOOR, assemblage at, iii. 23-24.
- HICKS, Nonconformist minister, iii. 321.
- HIGH COMMISSION, Courts of, in Scotland, ii. 398; revised by James II., proceedings of, against Compton, iii. 331; against Pechel, 336; abolished, 349.
- HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE, constituted to try Charles I., iii. 106, 107; trial of the king before, 109-113; condemnation of royalist leaders, 122, 123; under Cromwell, 167.
- HIGHLANDERS, leagued against Argyle, iii. 375; under Dundee at Killiecrankie, 376, 377; enmity to Cameronians, 378; engaged in insurrection of 1715, iv. 98-106; support Charles Edward (1745), 158-179; penalties imposed upon at the end of the revolt, 179.
- HILARY, Bishop of Chichester, i. 157, 160.
- HILL, ROWLAND, his plan for reduction of letter postage, suggested by Coleridge's story, v. 23; accomplishment of his reform, 24.
- HINDOOS, Clive's relations with, iv. 206.
- HOBBES, THOMAS, English philosopher, iii. 301, 302.
- HOCHE (1768-1798), republican general, repulses Duke of York before Dunkirk, iv. 326; puts an end to the Chouan war, 325; his unsuccessful attempt on Ireland, 334.
- HOCHKIRCH, battle of, iv. 197.
- HOCHSTADT. See Blenheim.
- HODGSON, General, captures Belle-Isle, iv. 215.
- HODSON, Lieutenant, captures royal family of Delhi, puts the princes to death, v. 265; his death, 266.
- HOHENLINDEN, battle of, iv. 344.
- HOHENZOLLERN, Prince of, his claims to Spanish throne, v. 123.
- HOLBEACH, Catesby killed at, ii. 390.
- HOLDERNESS, Lord, superseded by Bute, iv. 215.
- HOLLAND, forms alliance with France, England, and other powers, against House of Austria, ii. 411; English Puritans in, 420; commerce of, iii. 154; resumes negotiations with the commonwealth, 155; at war with England, 156-158; negotiates with Cromwell for peace, 167-169; allied with Denmark, at war with Sweden, 210; at

- war with England, 260; peace with England, 261; engaged in Triple Alliance with England and Sweden, 266; Charles II. declares war against, revolution in, 269; peace concluded with England (1674), 271; alliance with England on marriage of Prince of Orange with Princess Mary, 276; English exiles in, 309; treaty of Defensive Alliance with James II., 324; its devotion to republicanism, 367; religious toleration, 367; member of Grand Alliance against Louis XIV., 394; its fleet joined with the English, wins battle of La Hague, 398, 399; declares war against Louis XIV., iv. 51; desirous of peace, 56, 57; greatness of, due to position of mediator in Europe, 68; indignation in, at Treaty of Utrecht, 68; its decline after Treaty of Utrecht, 75; concludes Triple Alliance of 1717, 111, 112; concludes Peace of Paris (1727), 134; in alliance with England against France and Bavaria in support of Austria (1741), 152; invaded by the French in 1747, 179; political revolution in, re-establishing stadtholderate, 179, 180; signs treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle with France and other powers (1748), 180; loss of ascendancy in Europe, 183; at war with England, 265, 266; possessions restored by treaty of Versailles, 280; stadtholderate supported by England, 301; disturbances in, attack on Princes of Orange, 308; alliance with England and Prussia in Pitt's administration, 309; French Convention declares war against, 323; seized by French Republic, 327; unsuccessfully attacked by English, 343; concludes Peace of Amiens with England, 354; new revolutionary movements in, 355; under control of Bonaparte, 360; under Louis Bonaparte, 381; separation from Belgium, 448, 449; separation referred to by Guizot, v. 394.
- HOLLAND, Lady, her account of Pitt in his childhood, iv. 376.
- , Lord, Henry Fox (1750-1774), his opinion of unprotected condition of England, iv. 163; in cabinet of Newcastle, 190; disagreement with Chatham, 192; desire for power, 193; in ministry of Lord Bute, 220; becomes Lord Holland, 221; paymaster of the forces, 269.
- , Lord, husband of Joan of Kent, i. 331.
- , Lord, in the army of Charles I. in Scotland, ii. 425; his suspicions in regard to the king, 439; trial by high court of justice, 122; execution, 123.
- , Lord JOHN, brother of Richard II., i. 347; assassinated servant of the king, 350; made Duke of Exeter, 353.
- , Sir THOMAS, Caen surrenders to, i. 305.
- HOLLIS, DENZIL, joins Parliamentary coalition, against Charles I., ii. 415; his position in Long Parliament, 431; his advice to the king, 435; charged with high treason, iii. 13; attempted arrest of, his escape, 14; triumphant return to Parliament, 17; receives a regiment in Parliamentary army, 25; desires to renew battle of Edgehill, 28; his quarters attacked at Brentford, 28; his accusations against Cromwell, 84; the army demands his expulsion from Parliament, 85.
- HOLMBY CASTLE, iii. 77, 78; arrest of Charles I. at, 82, 83.
- HOLSTEIN, duchy of. See Schleswig-Holstein.
- , Duke of, nephew of king of Denmark, ii. 278.
- HOLSTEIN-AUGUSTENBURG, Prince of. See Augustenburg.
- HOLY ALLIANCE (1815), Russia, Austria, and Prussia, iv. 403, 404.
- HOLY CROSS, festival of, i. 145.
- LEAGUE, ii. 119, 121, 122.
- HOME, Lord, at Flodden, ii. 125.
- "HOME RULE," v. 407.
- HOMILDON HILL, battle of, i. 367.
- HONSHOOTE, Prince of Orange defeated at, iv. 326.
- HONG-KONG, island of, ceded to England, v. 46.
- HONORIUS. See Popes.
- , Roman emperor, i. 26.
- HOOD, Admiral, unsuccessful efforts to intercept French fleet; iv. 263; gains victory with Rodney over Count de Grasse, 270.
- HOOKER, Doctor, his Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, ii. 364.
- HOOPER, Bishop, his attachment to the reformed faith, ii. 235; burned at the stake, 255.
- HOPE, Admiral, English naval commander in China, attacks Takee forts, v. 309; wounded, 310.
- HOPKINS, letter of Charles I. to, iii. 103.
- HOPTON, Sir RALPH, censured for defence of Charles I., iii. 22; supports Royalist cause, 35; devotion to Prince Charles, 71; joins him in the Scilly Isles, 72.
- HOTHAM, Sir JOHN, holds the city of Hull for Parliament, iii. 18; refuses to surrender to Charles I., 22; disposed to surrender to the queen, 31, 34; succeeded by Lord Fairfax, 36; accused of treachery, 56; executed, 57.
- HOTSPUR. See Percy.
- HOUNSLOW HEATH, camp of James II. at, iii. 331; rejoicing of the garrison at acquittal of the bishops, 343.
- HOWARD, CATHERINE, fifth wife of Henry VIII., ii. 197; the king's discoveries concerning, 198, 199; her trial, 199; Henry's severity to her relations, 199, 200; her condemnation and execution, 200.
- , Sir EDMUND, at Flodden, ii. 125.
- , Sir EDWARD, defeats John and Andrew Barton; his death before Brest, ii. 121.
- , JOHN, (1726-1790), efforts for prison reform, iv. 188.
- , Lord, favorite minister of Edward IV., ii. 66.
- , Lord, partisan of Richard III. See Norfolk.
- , Lord, Hyde's letter to, iii. 196; abandons Richard Cromwell in favor of Charles II., 203.

- HOWARD, Lord, arrested and released, iii. 283; betrays Whig conspiracy, 292, 293.
 —, Lord (of Effingham), High Admiral of Elizabeth's navy, ii. 339, 341, bombards Cadiz, 345.
 —, Lord WILLIAM, imprisoned in the Tower under Henry VIII., 199, 200.
 —, Sir ROBERT, declares divine right of the people, iii. 331.
 —, Sir THOMAS, son of Lord Surrey, in command of English fleet, ii. 121; his ferocious maxim, 123.
- HOWE, Admiral RICHARD, afterwards Lord, in America, iv. 252; re-victuals Gibraltar, 274; in cabinet of William Pitt, 1783, 299; in command of English squadron at Toulon, 323; defeats French fleet, 327; his intervention employed in mutiny in 1797, 333.
 —, General Sir WILLIAM, brother of the above, British commander in America, compelled to evacuate Boston (1776), iv. 233; operations against Philadelphia, 246; embarrassed by necessity of holding Philadelphia, 251; defeated by Washington at Monmouth, 252.
 —, JOHN, dissenting preacher, opposes abuse of royal power, iii. 334, 335.
- HOWICK, Lord. See Lord Grey.
- HUDDLESTON, Catholic priest at deathbed of Charles II., iii., 293, 297.
- HUNSON, Dr., accompanies Charles I. to Scotland, iii. 73.
- HUDSON'S BAY, Frobisher's voyage to, ii. 331.
- HUGO, Count, betrays Exeter to the Danes, i. 70.
 —, VICTOR, quoted, v. 318.
- HUGUENOTS, the, rise under Condé and Coligny, ii. 231; are subdued, 282; their conspiracies, 293; disasters, 302; assisted by Elizabeth, 303, 309; massacre on St. Bartholomew's day, 313, 314; free exercise of their religion secured by peace of St. Germain's, 316; popularity of their cause in England; liberties assured by Edict of Nantes, 344; supported by Queen Elizabeth, 358; effect of revocation of edict of Nantes upon, iii. 323, aversion of James II. to, 329; in army of William III. in Ireland, 333, 334; toleration of, not included in treaty of Ryswick, iv. 25; desire of William III. to retain them in his army, 28, 31; disregard of justice in regard to, iv. 123.
- HULL, city of, held by Hotham for Parliament, 18, 22, 31, 34; Fairfax in command at, 36, 33.
- HUMAYOUN, Emperor, tomb of, v. 234.
- HUMBERT, General, commander of French invasion of Ireland, iv. 340.
- "HUMBLE PETITION AND ADVICE," iii. 184.
- HUME, DAVID, historian of England, quoted, iv. 100.
 —, Lord, concerned in opposition to establishment of the English liturgy in Scotland, ii. 423.
 —, Sir PATRICK, connected with Argyle's insurrection, iii. 311; escapes to the continent, 312.
- HUNDRED DAYS, of Napoleon in France, iv. 364.
- "HUNDRED YEARS' WAR," i. 296, ii. 37, 53.
- HUNGERFORD, Lord, executed after battle of Hexham, ii. 55.
 —, WALTER, at Agincourt, i. 389.
- HUNGARY, claimed by Spain on death of Emperor Charles VI., iv. 148; revôts under Kossuth, v. 141; its rule by Emperor of Austria, 344.
 —, Queen of. See Maria Theresa.
- HUNTINGDON, Countess of, Selina (1707-1791), Whitfield's exhortations at her house, iv. 185.
 —, Earl of, David, younger brother of William the Lion, i. 249.
 —, Earl of, brother-in-law of Henry IV., brother of Richard II., concerned in conspiracy of lords appellants, killed at Pleshy, i. 363.
 —, Earl of, a Jacobite, arrested, iii. 400.
- HUNTLEY, Earl of, father-in-law of Perkin Warbeck, ii. 104.
 —, Earl of, at Flodden, ii. 125.
 —, Earl of, supports Mary Stuart, ii. 279; is defeated by Murray, 282; levies army for Mary, 287; his sister married to Bothwell, 290; treats for surrender of Edinburgh Castle, 315.
 —, Lord, challenges Somerset, ii. 221; made prisoner at Pinkie, 222.
- HUSKISSON, WILLIAM (1770-1830), letter from Wellington, iv. 390; resigns with Canning, 393; comes into office with Canning, 416.
- HUSS, JOHN, his partisans excommunicated, ii. 28.
- HUTCHINSON, opposed to continuance of the monarchy, iii. 100; allies himself with the army, 104; procures pardon of Sir John Owen, 123; elected to Parliament of 1660, 243; defends himself on charge of regicide, 247.
- HUY, captured by William of Orange, iii. 406.
- HYDE, ANNE, daughter of Lord Clarendon, marries Duke of York (James II.), iii. 255; her death, 273.
 —, LAWRENCE. See Rochester.
- , PARK, riot at, v. 364, 365; result of the riot, 365.
- HYDERABAD, Napier's capture of, v. 152.
- HYDER ALI, iv. 271; allied with French against English in the Carnatic; his death, iv. 272; founder of kingdom of Mysore, 289.
- HYNDFORD, Lord, conducts negotiations with Frederick II. of Prussia in behalf of Maria Theresa, iv. 149.

I.

- IBRAHIM PASHA, son of Mahomed Ali, his retreat, v. 42; ordered to evacuate Syria, 43.
- IBERVILLE, M. d', French envoy in London, iv. 87; his letters to Louis XIV., 88, 89.
- ICENI, British tribe, i. 19.
- IDA, Anglian chief, invades England, i. 32.
- IMPEY, Sir ELIJAH, president of supreme - court of Calcutta, iv. 286; condemns Nuncmar, 287; bribed to relinquish his authority, 288; recalled, 290.

- INGHAFFRAY, ABBOT MAURICE of, at Banockburn, i. 277.
- INDEPENDENCE, Declaration of, drawn up by Jefferson, iv. 232, 240; unanimously adopted, 240.
- INDEPENDENTS (Brownists), the, growing importance of, ii. 421; their rise, iii. 41; doctrines, 42; victory at Marston Moor owing to them, 50; struggle with Presbyterians, 54; convinced of necessity of the war, 55; growing ascendancy of, 56, 69; secret relations with the king, 72; endeavor to prevent his alliance with Presbyterians, 74; triumph at his determination to negotiate in London, 76, 77; uneasiness inspired by them, 79; ally themselves with the army, 88, 89; majority of, in war committee, 101; defeated by Presbyterians on question of peace with the king, 104; exclude Presbyterians from Parliament, 105; services of their ministers refused by Charles, 117; included in Declaration of Indulgence, 334.
- INDIA, attempted discovery of new passage to, ii. 360; assigned to Archduke Charles, by second Partition Treaty, iv. 34; French and English at war in, 188; French supremacy in, under Duplex, 202, 203; English successes in, under Clive, 204, 206, 207; attempt of Lally-Tollendal to retrieve the fortunes of the French in, 207, 208; war of Hyder Ali and the French against the English, 271, 272; administration of Clive, 281, 282; of Warren Hastings, 284-291.
- INDIAN MUTINY, its causes, v. 240; distribution of chupatties signal for outbreak, 242, 243; revolt of Sepoys at Meerut, 243; at Delhi, 244; Punjab saved by Montgomery, 245; spread of the mutiny, 246; revolt at Lucknow, 247; siege of Lucknow, 248, 249, 259-261; revolt at Cawnpore, 250; siege of Cawnpore, 252, 254; massacre of the garrison, 254; battle of Futtehpore, 255, 256; massacre of English prisoners, 256, 257; Havelock takes possession of Cawnpore, 257; relief of Lucknow, 262, 263; siege of Delhi, 263, 264; capture of royal family at Delhi, 264, 265; final operations against Lucknow, 266, 267; defeat of Sepoys under Tantia Topce, 268; storming of Lucknow, 269, 270; revolt of Rance of Jhansi, 270, 271; end of the mutiny, 271.
- INDIANS, American, in French army at Braddock's defeat, iv. 191; decimated by the war, 199.
- INFANTA OF SPAIN. See Spain.
- INGLIS, Brigadier, his report of siege of Lucknow, 260, 261.
- INGOLDSBY, Colonel, one of the judges who signed the warrant for execution of Charles I., iii. 116; his warning to Cromwell, 162; urges Richard Cromwell to suppress arrogance of the army, 203; his arrest of Lambert, 242, 243; defends himself on charge of regicide, 247.
- INGOLDSBY, General, at battle of Fontenoy, iv. 154.
- INKERMAN, battle of, v. 209-213.
- INNOCENT II. See Popes.
- III. See Popes.
- IV. See Popes.
- VIII. See Popes.
- INQUISITION, Council of, condemns Joan of Arc, ii. 31, 32.
- INVASIONS of Britain, Roman, i. 14-27; Saxon and Scandinavian, 25; Saxon, 29.
- of England, Danish, i. 40, 41, 42, 44, 46, 47, 51, 52, 53, 68-73; Norwegian, 97-99; Norman, 100-105; Scottish, 140.
- INVERGARY, Castle of, Charles Edward takes refuge in, iv. 176.
- INVERLOCHY, battle of, iii. 58.
- IONIAN ISLANDS, seized by Sir John Stuart, iv. 390; constitution of, their discontent under English rule, v. 294; Gladstone sent as commissioner to, 295; England renounces protectorate of, 296.
- IRELAND, invaded by Danes, i. 63; its barbarism, 172; conquest of by Henry II., 172, 173; under John Lackland, 174; insurgents in subdued by John, 208; Gavelston appointed governor of, 273; invaded by Edward Bruce, 279; insurgents in, subdued, in reign of Richard II., 352; elevated to rank of kingdom, ii. 202; its condition under Henry VIII., 202, 203; condition under Elizabeth, 342, 345, 347, 348; war in, continued under Mountjoy, 353; Strafford's administration in, 418; Catholic insurrection in, 441; abandoned to Papists by Charles I., iii. 43; Charles' alliance with Catholics of, 70; proclaims Charles II., 129, 130; Cromwell's expedition to, 131, 132; recruiting for foreign service in, 132, 133; subjugated by Ireton, 148; allotted thirty representatives under Richard Cromwell, 198; under Tyrconnel, 333; Protestant rising in, 368, 369; James II. lands in, 369; pacification of by Ginckel, 388; disturbances in under George I. on account of recoinage of money, iv. 130; threatened disturbances in, 255; grant of legislative reform, 269; insurrections of United Irish (1798), 339, 340; Pitt's bill for union with England, 341; bill passed in English Parliament, 342; union voted by Irish Parliament (1800), 343; George IV.'s visit to, 411, 412; famine in (1822), 413; condition of lower orders in, 418, 419; work by Catholic association in, 420; influence of O'Connell, 420, 421; his agitation for repeal of the union with England, 430, v. 91-93; renewed agitation of Roman Catholics in, 442, 443; Peel's intentions with regard to government of, v. 58; question concerning repression of disorders in, 86; condition of, 90, 91; potato famine in, 94, 95; measures adopted in England for relief of, 96, 97, 98; Peel's remedies for difficulties in, 99; famine breaks out again, 125; agitation of "Young Ireland" party, 127, 128; disastrous condition of, 128; Peel's propositions for relief of, 128-131; their success, 131; effect of recognition of ecclesiastical titles, 133; its condition in

- 1866, 368; Fenian movement in, 369, 370; Gladstone's measures for disestablishment of Anglican Church in, 380-382, 385; tenant-right in, 387, 388; discontent of Protestants in, 406, 407; Gladstone's plan for reorganization of universities, 407, 408.
- IRETON, HENRY, son-in-law of Cromwell, at battle of Naseby, iii. 62; Parliamentary commissioner to the army, 80; orders arrest of the king, 83; considers expediency of restoring him to authority, 86; his proposals to Charles, 87, 88; answers for the army, 89; promises of the king to him, 91; his reception of Berkeley, 97; motion to dispense with the king, 98, 99; appointed to draw up sentence against Charles, 111; subjugates Ireland, his death, 148; marriage of his widow with Fleetwood, 160.
- IRISH BRIGADE, in French army, iii. 388.
- IRISH UNIVERSITY EDUCATION BILL, causes overthrow of Gladstone's ministry, v. 389.
- "IRONSIDES," Cromwell's regiment, iii. 33, 60; at Naseby, 62; at Dunbar, 140, 141.
- ISABEL of Angoulême, wife of Count of Marche, i. 204; abandons her husband to marry King John, 204; remarried to Count of Marche, 223; sends her sons to the court of England, 226; urges her son, Henry III., to declare war with France, 227.
- of Bavaria, wife of Charles VI. of France, imprisoned at Tours by Armagnacs, i. 394; released, 392; enters Paris with Burgundians, 396; death, ii. 37.
- of France, daughter of Philip IV. (the Fair), betrothed to Edward II., i. 258; married, 272; her complaints of Gaveston, 273; left in hands of the barons, 275; refused admittance to Leeds Castle, 281; her hostility to the Despencers, 282; goes to France, 283; returns to England and is joined by barons, 283, 284; succeeds in establishing her son on the throne, 285; power intrusted to, under influence of Mortimer, 286; intercedes for Mortimer, 292; imprisoned at Rising, 293; Henry V., as her descendant, lays claim to French crown, 333.
- of France, daughter of Charles VI., marries Richard II., i. 352; refuses to marry Prince of Wales, 364; returns to France, 365; marries Duke of Orleans, 375.
- of Portugal, wife of Philip of Burgundy, ii. 37.
- of Warwick, daughter of Earl of Warwick (the king-maker), marries Duke of Clarence, ii. 58; birth of her son, 59.
- ISABELLA, grand-daughter of Godfrey of Bouillon, i. 191.
- of Castile. See Castile.
- of Hainault, wife of Philip Augustus, i. 187.
- of Portugal, first wife of Philip II. of Spain, ii. 247.
- ISLE-ADAM, Sir of, at the head of detachment of Burgundians, i. 395, 396; defends Pontoise, 398; deprived of his command by Henry V., 404; enters Paris, ii. 37.
- ISLE OF FRANCE (Mauritius), seized by English (1810), iv. 396.
- ISLEY, Bugeaud defeats Emperor of Morocco at, v. 110.
- ISOGRATES, translated by Elizabeth, i. 266.
- ITALY, possessions of Spain in, secured to the Dauphin by second Partition Treaty, iv. 33; hostilities in, against France, 41; Alberoni's expedition against, 114; hostilities break out in (1799), 343; Napoleon assumes title of king of, 369; gains Venice by Peace of Presburg (1805), 373; rises against Austria, v. 302; appoints commissioner to tribunal of arbitration at Geneva, 334.
- IVRY, attacked by Duke of Bedford, ii. 17.

J.

- JACKSON, Judge, referred to by Peel, v. 129.
- , Mr., conducts negotiations of England with Denmark, iv. 382.
- JACK STRAW, seditious priest, ringleader of insurgents in reign of Richard II., i. 344; hanged, 349.
- JACOBIANS, radical party in French Convention, their ascendancy, iv. 325; their attempts against the Directory repressed by Bonaparte, 328; their supremacy after 18th Fructidor, 338.
- JACOBITES, the, besiege Londonderry, iii. 371, 372; their different characteristics in England, Scotland, and Ireland, 374, 375; insurrection under Dundee, 374-378; army at Drogheda, 378, 382; defeated at battle of the Boyne, 384; their plots for restoration of James II., 387; finally defeated in Ireland, 388; their plots baffled, 389; William III.'s lenity toward, 394; in Scotland, take oath of allegiance to William, 394, 395; attempts to counteract the effect of James's manifesto, 398; plot the assassination of William, iv. 17-20; renew their conspiracies, 85, 86; Bolingbroke's connection with, 87, 88, 89; their impatience for death of Anne, 92; in France, Bolingbroke's sketch of, 97; their rising in Scotland in 1715, 98-106; failure of the insurrection, 106; repressive measures against, 108; French territory prohibited to, by the Triple Alliance, 111; Alberoni's intrigues in favor of, 115, 116; conspire under lead of Atterbury, 125; in French army at battle of Fontenoy, 155; their rising under Charles Edward in 1745, 157-179.
- JACQUELINE of Hainault, wife of Duke of Gloucester, ii. 18; left to defend her inheritance; escapes to Holland, 19; her marriage with Gloucester declared null, 20.
- "JACQUERIE," insurrection of, i. 328.
- JACQUES BONHOMME, name given to French serfs, i. 328.
- JAQUETTE of Luxembourg, marries Duke of Bedford, ii. 35; marries Sir Richard Woodville, 38; her children, 56.
- JAFFA, siege of, i. 193, 194.
- JAMAICA, captured by the English (1655), iii. 174; condition of, in reign of Victoria; bill for suspension of its constitution, v. 20; insubordination in; severe measures of repression against, 352, 353; condition of, after abolition of slavery, 353; outbreak of insurrection, 354; receives new constitution, 355.

JAMES I., succeeds to English throne (1603); his poverty, ii. 383; journey to London, 384; conspiracy of Raleigh and Cobham against, 384, 385; converted to Episcopacy, 385; his measures against Puritans; opposed by Parliament; dissolves it, 386; security to Catholics, 386, 387; receives petition while hunting, 387; unsuccessful plot of Catesby and Fawkes against, 387-390; examines Guy Fawkes, 390; his increased severity to Catholics, 391; receives visit from King of Denmark and Prince of Vaudemont, 391, 392; marriage with Anne of Denmark; zeal for theology; project for union of England and Scotland, 392; Parliamentary opposition to, 392, 393; his severity to Arabella Stuart, 393; his favorites; jealousy of his son, 394; conduct at death of Prince Henry, 395; pecuniary embarrassment, 395, 396; attempts to coerce Parliament, 396; his journey to Scotland, 397; establishes episcopacy there; composes Book of Sports, 398; makes Bacon Keeper of Seals, 399; sends Raleigh to Guiana, 400; arrests him to satisfy demands of Spain, 401; agrees to assist the Elector Palatine; his attempts to obtain subsidies for the purpose, 403; project to re-establish him in his possessions, 405, 406; negotiations for marriage of Prince Charles with Spanish Infanta, 406, 407; consents to Charles's journey to Spain, 407; his concessions to Spanish demands; recalls Charles, 409; disappointed at failure of his plan, 410; negotiates the marriage of Charles with Henrietta Maria, 411; his death (1625), 412. See Scotland, James VI..

— II., as Duke of York, enters Hull, iii. 22; left in command at Oxford, 48; permitted to see his father, 86; at the Hague, 153; at the battle of the Dunes, 191; joins Charles II. at Calais, 212; at Breck, 245; arrives in England with the king, 248; marriage with Anne Hyde, 255; his courage during the London fire, 262; in battle of Sole Bay, 269; declares his conversion to Catholicism, 270; marriage with Mary of Modena, 273; his disbelief in Popish plot, 278; question of his succession agitated, 280; attempt to exclude him from succession (see Exclusion Bill); demands dismissal of Monmouth, 285; his harsh rule in Scotland, 289, 290; re-established at court, 290; resumes his place in the privy council, 295; procures Catholic priest for his brother's deathbed, 296, 297; distrust of English toward him, 299, 300; opening of his reign, 300-302; literary men of the period, 301, 302; his address to the council, 302, 303; to Parliament, 303, 304; levies tonnage and poundage; requires his household to attend mass, 304; his measures in favor of Catholics, 305; permits persecution of Covenanters, 306; his conduct toward ministers of Charles, 307; his subjection to Louis XIV., 308, 309; insurrection against him in favor of Monmouth, 310-317; requests the States-general to arrest ships of Argyle, 310; examination of Ayloff, 314; Ferguson's declaration against him, 314, 315; interview with Monmouth, 318; employs services of Jeffreys, 320; refuses to pardon the Hewlings, 322; shares blame of "bloody assizes," 323; embarrassed by revocation of Edict of Nantes; dismisses Halifax, 324; proposes increase of army; violates Test Act, 325; his speech to Parliament, 325, 326; prorogues Parliament for opposition to his designs, 326; advances of Spain to, 327; refuses to make concessions to Parliament, 328; aversion for the Huguenots, 329; claim to dispensing power recognized, 330; revives Court of High Commission, 331; attempts to re-establish Catholicism, 331, 332; declaration of indulgence, 333; efforts to overcome opposition of House of Commons, 334; dissolves Parliament; receives papal nuncio, 335; attack on Magdalen College, 336; publishes new declaration of indulgence, 337; interview with seven bishops, 343; sends them to the Tower, 340; birth of his son, 341; hears of acquittal of the bishops, 343; blindness to the danger of his position, 347; receives manifesto of Prince of Orange; his concessions, 349; dismisses Sunderland, 350; interview with the bishops, 351; defection of his army, 351, 352; sends delegate to Prince of Orange; convokes Parliament, 353; his flight, 354; arrested at Sheerness, 355, 356; returns to London; sent to Rochester, 357; his escape, 358; obstinacy in his opinions, 359; Louis XIV.'s generosity; lands in Ireland, 369; condition of his forces, 370; lays siege to Londonderry, 371; returns to Dublin, 372; orders to Dundee and Balcarras, 374; insurrection in favor of under Dundee, 374-378; is joined by Lauzun, 382; ardor of French Protestants against, 383; defeated at battle of the Boyne, 384; escapes to France, 385; plots in his favor, 386, 387; final loss of Ireland, 388; his letter on Marlborough's conspiracy, 393; his Declaration to the English, 397, 398; its effect, 398; witnesses battle of La Hogue, 399; plots in his favor, 400; warned by Marlborough of projected attack on Brest, 405; Marlborough deserts his cause, iv. 14; concerned in Barclay's plot for assassination of William, 18, 19; watches in vain for signal of its success, 20; disappointment at Treaty of Ryswick, 26; illness, 41; death; promise of Louis XIV. to him, 42.

JAMES, Kings of Scotland. See Scotland.

— GEORGE P. R., his historical novels, v. 168.

JANE of Valois, contracted to Edward, son of John Balliol, i. 252.

JAPAN, English rights in, v. 341.

JARGEAU, taken by Joan of Arc, ii. 26.

- JARNAC, M. de, French chargé d'affaires at London, translates Louis Philippe's speech to corporation of London, v. 104; Guizot's letters to, 119-121, 122.
 —, battle of, ii. 302.
- JECKER, M., his claims on Mexican government, v. 337.
- JEDBURGH, captured by Edward I. i. 253; recovered by Bruce, 276.
- JEFFERSON, THOMAS (1743-1826), his letter to Randolph on separation from England, iv. 232-233.
- JEFFREYS, GEORGE, Chief Justice, arrests Duke of Monmouth, iii. 290; at trial of Algernon Sidney, 295; enjoys confidence of James II., 307; his cruelty, 319, 320; conducts trial of Lady Lisle, 321; "bloody assizes," 322, 323; receives the seals, 323; intrusted with funds for relief of Huguenots, 329; presides over High Commission for trial of Compton, 331; his treatment of Pechel, 336; advises legal process against the seven bishops, 340; his death, 355.
- JELLALABAD, captured by the English, v. 48; besieged by Akbar Khan, 53.
- JEMMAPES, battle of, iv. 322.
- JENA, battle of, iv. 378.
- JERMYN, Lord, marries Henrietta Maria, widow of Charles I., iii. 272.
- JERVIS, Sir JOHN, victory over Spanish at Cape St. Vincent, iv. 334.
- JERUSALEM, retaken by the Mussulmans, i. 180; dispute for possession of sanctuaries at, v. 171, 172, 177.
- JESUITS, statements of Titus Oates concerning, iii. 278.
- JEWS, the, driven from France by Philip Augustus, i. 185; persecution of in reign of Richard I., 186; persecuted by Edward I., 244; by Edward III., 318; protected by Cromwell, iii. 173; civil emancipation of, v. 157; Sir Erskine May's account of their disabilities, 291.
- JHANSI, Rance of, takes possession of the city, v. 270; her death, 271.
 —, annexed to British possessions in India, v. 241.
- JOAN of Acre, daughter of Edward I., i. 243.
 — of Arc, born at Domremy, believes herself called to the aid of Charles VII., ii. 22; seeks an interview with him at Chinon, her reception there, 23; raises the siege of Orleans, 24, 25; wins battles of Jargeau and Patay, 26, 27; urges the king to be crowned at Rheims, Troyes surrenders to, 27; present at the king's coronation, 28; wounded in assault on Paris, ii. 29; defends Compiègne, 29, 30; is taken prisoner, given up by Luxembourg to the Bishop of Beauvais, 30; before the Inquisition, 31; her sentence, 32; her abjuration, conducted to the stake, 33; her death, 34; her rehabilitation, 34.
 — of Belville, widow of Clisson, i. 301, 302.
 — of Castile, daughter of Isabella the Catholic, wife of Archduke Philip, ii. 114, 115; mother of Charles V., 127.
- JOAN of Flanders, besieged at Hennebon, i. 299, 300; her husband restored to her, 301.
 — of Kent, marries the Black Prince, i. 330; at Kennington with her son, in opposition to Lancaster, 338; her ransom to the insurgents, 345; escapes from the mob, 347; her death, 350.
 — of Navarre, second wife of Henry IV., i. 378.
 — of Penthièvre (the Lame), wife of Charles of Blois, claims Brittany, i. 299; maintains struggle with allies of Montfort, 313.
 —, Princess, betrothed to David Bruce, i. 291; her death, 326.
 — of Valence, queen of Robert Bruce, i. 266; sent to England, 269.
- JOANNA, sister of Cœur-de-Lion, her claims against Tancred, i. 88; goes with Richard to Palestine, 189.
- JOHN (Lackland), son of Henry II., in Ireland, i. 174; joins rebellion of his brothers, 182; receives land in Normandy, 187; his league with Philip Augustus, 195; seizes power in England, 197; his character, 198; pays homage to Philip, 199; takes refuge in Normandy, 200; is proclaimed at Rouen, 203; crowned at Westminster, 204; marries Isabel of Angoulême, 204; puts his nephew to death, 205; summoned before Philip Augustus, 206; his quarrel with the Church, 207, 208; excommunicated, 208; deposed by the pope, 209; his agreement with Pandulph, 209; swears allegiance to holy sec, 210; summons his Barons, 211; his name associated with Magna Charta, 212; English barons unite against, 213; throws himself under the protection of Church, 214; signs Magna Charta, 215; his revenge on the barons, 216, 217; makes war upon them, 217; deserted by his supporters, 218; his losses at Cross-Keys, 219; his death, 220.
 — III., Duke of Brittany. See Brittany.
 — of France, second son of Charles VI., as Dauphin, joins Burgundians, death, i. 394; his widow Jacqueline of Hainault, ii. 18.
 — of Gaunt. See Lancaster.
 —, Prince, second son of Henry IV., takes Archbishop of York prisoner, i. 372. See Bedford.
 —, Saxon Monk, i. 59.
- JOHNSON, clergyman, condemned for circulating appeal for Protestantism, iii. 382.
 —, Dr. SAMUEL, quoted, on Fox, iv. 301.
 —, REVERDY, negotiates with Lord Clarendon the convention of 1870, v. 334.
 —, Sir WILLIAM (1754-1774), English officer, his expedition against Niagara, iv. 199, 200.
- JOINVILLE, Prince de, in command of French squadron on coast of Morocco, v. 109; his victories, 110.
 —, Sire, de (1224-1317), historian of Louis IX., i. 194.
- JONES, MICHAEL, governor of Dublin, iii. 131.

- JONES, PAUL, American pirate, ravages coast of Scotland, iv. 255.
- , concerned in Babington's conspiracy, ii. 324.
- JOSEPH, blacksmith, concerned in insurrection against Henry VII., executed, 106.
- JOSEPHINE (1763-1814), wife of Napoleon I. divorced, iv. 393.
- JOURDAN (1762-1833), general of French Republic, repulses the Austrians, iv. 327; defeated at Vittoria, 1813, 398.
- JOYCE, Cornet, arrests Charles I. iii. 82, 83.
- JUAREZ, BENITO, his power in Mexico, v. 335; defeated, 337.
- JUDITH, niece of the Conqueror, wife of Walthoef, i. 112; betrays Walthoef, 112; punished by the conqueror, 113.
- , daughter of Charles the Bold, marries Ethelwulf, i. 43.
- JUGDULLUK, massacre at pass of, v. 52.
- JULIUS CÆSAR, invades Britain, i. 14-18.
- de' MEDICI, Cardinal. See Pope Clement VII.
- II. See Popes.
- JUMÉGES, ROBERT of. See Canterbury, Archbishops of.
- JUMONVILLE, M. de, sent as envoy to George Washington; killed in attack of his camp by Americans, iv. 188.
- JUNIUS, his attacks upon Bute, iv. 229, 230; letters of, probably written by Francis, 286.
- JUNOT, General, occupies Portugal, iv. 383; supports Joseph Bonaparte against the Bourbons, 385; defeated at Vimcira, 386.
- JUNTA, the Spanish, hesitation concerning the Bourbons, iv. 384, 385; convoked at Seville, swears allegiance to Ferdinand, 385; alliance with England, 388.
- , the Whig, iv. 82; goes out of power, 83.
- JUTES in England, i. 29, 31.
- JUTLAND, peninsula of, i. 41.
- JUXON, bishop of London, made high treasurer, ii. 420; his advice to Charles I. 435; last interviews with the king, 114, 115, 116; accompanies Charles I. to the scaffold, 117, 118; officiates at his burial, 119.
- K.
- KAFFIRS, the campaign against, v. 152.
- KAGOSIMA, capital of Prince Satsuma, v. 341; burned by the English, 342.
- KAISERSLAUTERN, captured by Villars, iv. 76.
- KAREKAL, taken by English, iv. 208.
- KARS, defence of, by Colonel Williams, v. 232.
- KAUNITZ, Count, his opinion in regard to second Partition Treaty, iv. 34.
- KAYE, his "History of the Afghan War," quoted, v. 50.
- KEARSARGE, the, encounter with the Alabama, v. 333.
- KEATS, JOHN (1795-1821), v. 161.
- KEITH, LORD GEORGE, hereditary Earl Marshal of Scotland, engaged in attempt for restoration of the Pretender, iv. 116, 117; enters service of King of Prussia, 117.
- KELDRUMMIE, castle of, refuge of Bruce's family, i. 269.
- KELLERMANN, (1735-1820), general of French National Convention, defeats allies at Valmy, iv. 322; in Estremadura, 390.
- KELADEEN, Sultan, retakes Acre from the Templars, i. 243.
- KEMYSS, Captain, in command of expedition up the Orinoco; his death, ii. 401.
- KEN, THOMAS, Bishop of Bath, at death-bed of Charles II., iii. 296; his letter to James II., 322.
- KENDAL, Duchess of, favorite of George I., compromised in South Sea inquiry, iv. 124; procures pardon of Bolingbroke, 129; accompanies the king to Hanover, 131; secret enemy of Walpole, 134.
- KENILWORTH CASTLE, Queen Elizabeth's visit to, ii. 366.
- , Dictum of, i. 239.
- KENMORE, town of, refuge for Irish Protestants, iii. 369.
- KENMURE, Lord, in command of the forces of the Pretender in 1715, iv. 100; accused of high treason, 107; executed, 108.
- KENNINGTON, Castle of, John of Gaunt takes refuge in, i. 338.
- COMMON, Chartist demonstration on, v. 126, 144.
- KENSINGTON PALACE, Victoria meets the Council at, v. 14, 15.
- KENT, Saxon kingdom of, founded, i. 30; invaded by Danes under Hastings, 51; added to Wessex by Alfred, 54.
- , Duchess of, mother of Queen Victoria, v. 14.
- , Duke of, Edward (1767-1820), father of Queen Victoria, iv. 405.
- , Earl of. See Odo, Bishop of Bayeux.
- , Earl of, Edward, father-in-law of the Black Prince, i. 331.
- , Earl of, brother of Richard II., beheaded by citizens of Cirencester, i. 363.
- , Earl of, his harshness to Mary Stuart, ii. 333, 334, 335.
- , JOAN of. See Joan of Kent.
- KENYON (Lloyd), Lord (1732-1802), consulted by George III., iv. 346.
- KEPPEL, Admiral, his trial and acquittal, iv. 251.
- , ARNOLD VAN. See Albemarle.
- KEPPOCH, COLIN, in command of Highlanders in favor of James II., iii. 375, 376.
- , MACDONALD of. See Macdonald.
- KER, ANDREW, concerned in murder of Rizzio, ii. 286.
- , ROBERT. See Carr.
- KERR, GENERAL MARK, his remark to General Cope when he brought the news of Prestonpans, iv. 162.
- KERRY, Fenian attempt at, v. 371.
- KERSAINT, Admiral, his expedition to Guiana, iv. 266.
- KERTCH, successful attack of allies on, v. 224.
- KET, tanner, heads insurrection against Edward VI., ii. 226; is hanged, 227.

KHAUSCREFF PASHA, v. 38.
 KHYBER PASS, v. 53.
 KIFFIN, WILLIAM, opposes Declaration of Indulgence. iii. 334, 335.
 KILDARE, Earl of, lord lieutenant of Ireland, supports Lambert Simnel, ii. 91; does not support Warbeck, 100.
 ———, Earl of, chief of the Fitzgeralds, ii. 202.
 KILLIECRANKIE, battle of, iii. 376, 377.
 KILLIGREW, agent of Queen Elizabeth, ii. 315.
 ———, Sir PETER, negotiates armistice for Parliament, iii. 23.
 KILMARNOCK, Countess of, detains English general at her house, iv. 170.
 ———, Lord, concerned in Jacobite rebellion of 1745, his trial and execution, iv. 178.
 "KILLING NO MURDER," pamphlet against Cromwell, iii. 235.
 KINGBURN, Fort, loss of by the Russians, v. 232.
 KINDERTON, Lord of, made prisoner at Shrewsbury, i. 370.
 KING, concerned in Barclay's assassination plot, iv. 19.
 ———, LOCKE, speech on property qualification in Parliament, v. 292, 293.
 KINGLAKE, his amendment to Mr. Disraeli's resolution of censure, v. 348.
 KING'S BENCH, Court of, Wolsey condemned by, ii. 163; seven bishops refuse to appear before, iii. 340; decision against City of London, 395.
 ——— BOOK, the, ii. 201.
 ——— COLLEGE, Cambridge, built by Henry VI., ii. 39.
 "KING'S FRIENDS," the, name taken by special adherents of George III., iv. 227.
 KINGSLEY, CHARLES, v. 168.
 KINGSTON, City of, exempted from martial law proclaimed in Jamaica, v. 351.
 ———, lieutenant of the Tower, ii. 164.
 KINSALE, James II. lands at, iii. 369; captured by Marlborough, 387.
 KIRBY, Captain, accomplice of Titus Oates, iii. 277, 278.
 KIRKCALDY OF GRANGE, defends Edinburgh Castle for Mary Stuart, his death, ii. 315.
 KIRKE, Colonel Percy, his "lams," his cruelty in insurgent counties, iii. 319; sent to relief of Londonderry, 372.
 KIRKMICHAEL, village of, standard of the Stuarts raised in, in 1715, iv. 98.
 KIRKPATRICK of Closeburn, kills Comyn at Dumfries, i. 263.
 KITCHEN, Bishop of Llandaff, ii. 273.
 KLÉBER, General, in command of Bonaparte's army in Egypt, iv. 343; assassinated, 353.
 "KNIGHTS OF THE LILY," i. 330.
 KNOLLYS, Sir WILLIAM, ii. 351.
 KNOWLES, Sir ROBERT, abandons Henry of Transtamare, i. 332; chief of free bands of Richard II., leads them against followers of Wat Tyler, Froissart's allusion to him, 348.
 KNOX, General, informed by Washington of Arnold's treachery, iv. 260.

KNOX, JOHN, preaches in London before Edward VI., ii. 235; real chief of Protestant insurrection in Scotland, 275; his pamphlet upon female government, 276; his confession of faith adopted by Scotch Parliament, 277; his attacks on Queen Mary, 279; effects of his preaching, 307.
 KOH-I-NOOR, famous Indian diamond, v. 242.
 KOLIN, battle of, iv. 194.
 KONIGSECK, Austrian general, at battle of Fontenoy, iv. 154, 155.
 KÖNIGSMARK, Count, his supposed connection with Electress of Hanover, assassinated, iv. 135.
 KOORD CABUL, disaster of the English in pass of, v. 51.
 KORNILOFF, Admiral, in the Crimea, v. 193; obliged to sacrifice his ships to close harbor of Sevastopol, 192; in command on north side of the city, 196; his death, 201, 202.
 KOSSUTH, LOUIS, leader of Hungarian revolt, reception in England, v. 142.
 KUNG, Prince, brother of Emperor of China, v. 312.
 KUPER, Admiral, v. 341, bombards Kagosima, 342.
 KYRIEL, THOMAS, defeated near Formigny, ii. 40.

L.

LA BOURDONNAIS, MAHÊ de, governor of Isle of France, his rivalry with Duplex; his death, iv. 202.
 LA CERDA, DON CARLOS de, Spanish pirate, i. 319.
 LA CHAISE, PÈRE, confessor to Louis XIV., 279.
 LA CHARITÈ, taken by Earl of Buchan, i. 406.
 LACORDAIRE, PÈRE, leader of liberal Catholics in France, v. 157.
 LACY, HUGH de, governor of Ireland i. 174.
 LA FARE, Marquis de, quoted, iii. 302.
 LA FAYETTE, Marquis de, arrives in America, iv. 244; defeated at Brandywine, 246; affection of Washington for him, 251; assists Washington to re-establish harmony, 252; returns to France, 253; lands again in America, 258; enthusiasm for the cause; informed of Arnold's treachery by Washington, 260; letter on sufferings of American army, 262; harasses Cornwallis, 263; attempts to escape from France, and is imprisoned at Olmutz, 322.
 ———, Seigneur de, at Baugé, i. 405; as Marshal, taken prisoner at Verneuil, ii. 17.
 LA FLÈCHE, lord of, leader of revolt in Maine, i. 123.
 LA HIRE, at battle of Verneuil, ii. 17.
 LA HOGUE, Edward III. lands at, i. 304.
 ———, battle of, iii. 399.
 LAHORE, Maharajah of, offers the Koh-i-Noor to England, v. 242.
 LAIGLE, GILBERT de, i. 134.
 LAIRD, Messrs. builders of the Alabama, v. 332.
 LALLY-TOLLENDAL, Count de (1700-1766), appointed to command in India, iv. 207;

- first successes, 207, 208; forced to raise siege of Madras, besieged in Pondicherry, 208; capitulates; his execution, 209.
- LA LUZERNE, M. de, French Minister at Philadelphia, iv. 278.
- LA MARE, Sir PETER de, arrested, i. 338.
- LA MARMORA, General, in command of Sardinian forces in Crimean war, v. 226.
- LAMBERT, JOHN (1620-1692), officer in Parliamentary army, iii. 79; marches against Royalists in the north, 100, 101; with Cromwell in Scotland, 140; in command under Cromwell against Charles II., 144, 145; Lord Deputy in Ireland, 160; urges Cromwell to refuse title of king, 178; refuses to take oath to new constitution, 186; instigator of difficulties in the army, 203; defeats royalist insurgents, 212, 213; his proceedings after his victory, 214; dismissed from his post; heads Republican insurrection, 215; marches upon Westminster, 216; breaks up Parliament, 217; placed in command of army against Monk, 220; his agreement with Morgan against Monk, 221; his proposals to Charles II., 224; his army disbanded; retires to the country, 226; escapes from the Tower, 242; excluded from amnesty of 1660, 253; his condemnation; death, 259.
- , JOHN, burned as a heretic, ii. 193.
- LAMBETH, treaty of, i. 222.
- LAMORICIERE, General, his camp attacked by soldiers of Abd-el-Rhaman, v. 108.
- LANARK, Lord, Scottish commissioner to Charles I., iii. 91, 98.
- LANCASHIRE, artisans of, devoted to Northern cause in America, v. 331, 332.
- LANCASTER, Duke of, John of Gaunt (1340-1399), sent to assistance of Black Prince, i. 334; left in command in France, 335; aspires to crown of Castile, 335; returns to England, 336; his pretensions, 337; his palace mobbed, 338; unpopularity, 340; goes to France with army, 341; goes to Spain, 350; reconciled with his brothers, 352; in retirement, 354; death, 355.
- , Duke of (Bolingbroke), i. 357. See Henry IV.
- , Earl of (THOMAS), cousin of Edward II., i. 274, 275; at head of barons opposed to Despencer, 280; demands banishment of Despencer; enters into correspondence with Scots; is made prisoner, 281; beheaded (1322), 282.
- , Earl of, Edward II. placed in his charge, i. 286; unsuccessful attempt against Mortimer, 291.
- , House of, its union with York, ii. 88.
- LANCASTRIANS, defeated at Drayton and Northampton, ii. 46; victorious at Wakefield, 48; at second battle of St. Albans, 49; defeated at Mortimer's Cross, 49; at Towton, 52; condemned by Edward IV., 53; defeated at Hedgeley Moor; at Hexham, 55; defeated by Warwick, 59; at Barnet; at Tewkesbury, 63; subdued, 64, 65; assemble in Brittany, 80; re-established in their rights, 86.
- "LAND OF THE FIVE RIVERS." See Punaub.
- LANDAIS, PIERRE, minister of the Duke of Brittany, ii. 80.
- LANDAU, retaken by the allies, iv. 53; taken by Villars, 71; M. Guizot's project for dismantling its fortifications, v. 395.
- LANDOR, WALTER SAVAGE, living in early part of reign of Victoria, v. 161.
- LANDRÉCIS, EUGÈNE, raises the siege of, iv. 74.
- LANFRANC. See Canterbury.
- LANGDALE, Sir MARMADUKE, in royalist army at Naseby, iii. 62; in command of royalist insurgents, 101; defeated by Cromwell, 102.
- LANGLEY, Sir ROBERT, foreman of jury on trial of seven bishops, iii. 343.
- LANGPORT, battle of, 364.
- LANGTON, Cardinal STEPHEN. See Canterbury.
- LANNON, Sire de, his oath at Arras, ii. 36.
- LANSDOWNE, Lord, arrested for complicity in Jacobite plot (1715), iv. 99.
- , Lord (Lord Shelburne), secretary of state in Rockingham's cabinet, iv. 269; prime minister on death of Rockingham, (1782), 274; recalls Sir Henry Clinton, 275; defeated on question of the peace, resigns, 281; opposes severe measures of Pitt, 329.
- LA POLE, JOHN DE, made prisoner at Jargeau, ii. 26.
- LARKIN, concerned in Fenian outbreak in Manchester, v. 371; hanged, 372.
- LAROCHEJACQUELIN, commander of insurgents in La Vendée, iv. 161.
- LA ROCHELLE, stronghold of Huguenots, ii. 316; Buckingham's expedition to relief of, 414.
- LASCELLES, burned as heretic, ii. 211.
- LATIMER, Bishop, attached to reformed faith, ii. 235; his condemnation, 256; his death, 257.
- , Lord, Minister of Edward III., deprived of his offices, i. 337; reinstated, 338.
- LATOCHE-TRÉVILLE, Admiral, intrusted with command of Napoleon's fleet for invasion of England, his death, iv. 363.
- LA TREMOILLE, favorite of Charles VII., ii. 20-22.
- , commander of army of Charles VIII. ii. 95.
- L'AUBESPINE, resident French ambassador in London, ii. 331, 332; his reproaches to Elizabeth, 336.
- LAUDERDALE, JOHN MAITLAND (1616-1682), Duke of, Scottish commissioner to Charles I., iii. 91-98; his tyranny in Scotland, 262; member of Cabal Ministry, 265-268; hatred of him, 271; his administration in Scotland, 282, 283.
- LAUENBURG, Duchy of. See Schleswig-Holstein.
- LANNES, Marshal, his account of siege of Saragossa, iv. 388.
- LAURENS, HENRY (1724-1792), president of Continental Congress, captured by the English on his way to Holland, iv. 262.
- , JOHN, (1756-1782), son of Henry Laurens, aid-de-camp of General Wash-

- ington, sent on mission to France, iv. 262; succeeds in his mission, returns, 263.
- LAUTREE, in command of army of Francis I. ii. 156, 157; his death, 158;
- LAUZUN, ANTOINE, Duc de, assists escape of Mary of Modena and Prince of Wales, iii. 353; arrives in Ireland with troops, 382; returns to France, 387.
- LA VENDEE, war of, iv. 326, 327; conscription in, v. 342.
- LAWRENCE, Governor-General of India, his junction with Clive, iv. 204.
- , Sir HENRY, in command at Lucknow, v. 247; death, 248.
- , Sir JOHN, governor of the Punjaub, v. 244.
- LAW, JOHN, his schemes in France, iv. 122, 123.
- LAWFELT, battle of, iv. 179.
- LAWSON, Admiral, his fleet declares in favor of Parliament, iii. 225.
- LAYARD, Mr., supports peace policy, v. 239.
- LAYER, executed for complicity in Jacobite plot, iv. 125.
- LEAGUE, the, its formation in France, ii. 316.
- LEAGUERS, supporters of Guise, ii. 344.
- LEAKE, English admiral, successor in Italy, iv. 59.
- LEBANON, the, hostility between Maronites and Druses in, v. 314; order re-established in, 314, 315.
- LECLERC, FERRINET, opens Paris to the Burgundians, i. 395.
- LE CROE, French ambassador in Scotland, ii. 291.
- LE CROTOY, taken by Edward III., i. 307.
- LECZINSKA, MARIA, marries Louis XV., iv. 131.
- LE DESPENCER, HUGH. See Despencer.
- , Lady, carries off Earl of March, i. 391.
- , Lord. See Earl of Gloucester.
- LEDE, Marquis of, commander of Spanish army in Sicily, iv. 118, 119.
- LEE, attorney-general in reign of George III., iv. 296.
- , Dr., marries Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn, ii. 170.
- , General (Charles), disobeys Washington's orders in battle of Monmouth, iv. 352.
- , General (Richard Henry), surrenders to Grant (April, 1865), v. 335.
- LEEDS, obtains third representative in 1866, v. 368.
- , Duke of, Thomas Osborne (Lord Danby), accusations against him, compelled to retire from public life, iv. 15. See Caermarthen.
- LEGGE, Chancellor of the Exchequer, refuses his signature to treaties of subsidy, iv. 189.
- LEICESTER, Earl of (Robert Dudley), partiality of Queen Elizabeth for, ii. 278; proposed by Elizabeth as husband of Mary Stuart, 283; his intrigue for Norfolk's marriage with Mary, 300, 301; his confession, 301, 302; his secret marriage, 317, 318; at head of Protestant association, 322; appointed governor of Low Countries, 323; proposes to poison Mary Stuart, ii. 326; his incompetency, 337; at review of troops at Tilbury, 340; his death, 342; his effects sold at auction, 343; festivities at Kenilworth for Queen Elizabeth, 366.
- LEICESTER, Earl of, made governor of Ireland in place of Strafford, ii. 441.
- , Prior of, reproaches Becket, i. 156.
- LEINSTER, Irish kingdom of, i. 172.
- LEIPZIG, battle of, iv. 397.
- LEITH, citadel of, held by Jacobites in 1715, iv. 100.
- LE MANS, siege of, i. 123.
- LENNOX, Countess of, sent to the tower by Elizabeth, ii. 284.
- , Duke of, favorite of James VI., ii. 319; death, 320.
- , Earl of, ii. 207; father of Lord Darnley, 283; Darnley sick at his house, 288; demands arrest of Bothwell, 289; sent to Scotland by Elizabeth, 305; his murder, 313.
- LENTHALL, speaker of House of Commons in the Long Parliament, iii. 88; leaders of the army assembled at his house, 160; opposes Cromwell's dissolution of Parliament, 162; at head of the restored Long Parliament, 206; his encounter with Lambert's soldiers, 216; council of state assembles at his house, iii. 224; interview with Monk, 230; excluded from amnesty of 1660, 253.
- LEO IV. See Popes.
- X. See Popes.
- LEOBEN, preliminaries of peace between Austria and France signed at (1797), iv. 334.
- LEOFRIC, Governor of Mercia, i. 78, 82, 83.
- LEOFWIN, son of Godwin, escapes to Ireland, i. 83; joins his father, 85; at Hastings, 104; death, 105.
- LEOPOLD, Archduke of Austria. See Austria.
- , Prince of Saxe-Coburg, husband of Princess Charlotte, iv. 405; King of Belgium, 449, v. 337.
- of Saxe-Coburg, cousin of Prince Albert, proposals for his marriage with Isabella of Spain, v. 114; supported by Palmerston, 119; opposed by Aberdeen, 120.
- LERIA, Duke of, son of Duke of Berwick, in service of Philip V. of Spain, iv. 118.
- LERIDA, capture of (1707), iv. 57.
- LESCURE, M. de, commander of insurgents in La Vendée, iv. 161.
- LESLEY, ALEXANDER. See Leven.
- , DAVID, in command of Scottish cavalry, iii. 66; defeats Montrose at Philiphaugh, 68; conduct of campaign against Cromwell, 139, 140; defeated by Cromwell at Dunbar, 141; appointed lieutenant-general of Charles II., 143; claims command at Worcester, 145; conduct of his troops, 146.
- , NORMAN, murderer of Beaton, ii. 209.
- LESTER, one of the insurgents under Wat Tyler, is hanged, i. 349.

- LETHINGTON, MAITLAND of, ii. 276; secretary of Mary Stuart, 290; his intrigues, 297; his death, 315.
- LEVELLERS, followers of Everard, iii. 126; join Cavaliers, 128; their plots against Cromwell, 172, 187.
- LEVEN, Earl of, Alexander Lesley, commander, of Scottish army, ii. 424, 441, iii. 73; his reception of Charles I., 74.
- LEVESON, Lord Granville, interview with Fox, iv. 362, 363.
- LEVIS, Duc de, François (1720-1787), attempts to recapture Quebec after death of Montcalm, iv. 201.
- LEWIS, Sir GEORGE CORNEWALL, in Palmerston's first cabinet, v. 218; home secretary in Palmerston's second cabinet, 301; sympathy for United States, 331; death, 348.
- LEXINGTON, battle of, vi. 236.
- LHUIS, DROUYN de, French ambassador at London, v. 132; French minister of foreign affairs, 199.
- LIBERALS, their policy of reform, v. 297, 298; discontented with Disraeli's bill, 298; ministry formed under Palmerston, 299, 300; indifferent to Italian independence, 304; attempt a reform bill, 306; generally in favor of Southern Confederacy, 331; Gladstone becomes leader of, 351; disappointment at Russell's Reform Bill of 1866, 361, 362; defeated on the Reform Bill, 362; come into power under Gladstone in 1868, 383; weakened by opposition of dissenters to Education Bill, 402; defeated on Irish University Bill, 408.
- LICHFIELD, Bishop of, treasurer of England, cast into prison, i. 272.
- LIGHT BRIGADE, charge of. See battle of Balaklava.
- LIGNY, battle of, iv. 401.
- LILBURNE, John, pamphleteer, ii. 422; his warning to Cromwell, iii. 90; imprisoned for exciting sedition in the army, 125; excesses of his followers, 126; his protest against their condemnation, 127; trial of, 128, 129; acquitted, 129; his second trial and acquittal, 166; death, 167.
- , ROBERT, officer in Parliamentary army, iii. 96; defeats the Earl of Derby, 144.
- LILLE, captured by Marlborough (1708), iv. 59; claimed by the Dutch, 60; ceded to Louis XIV. by treaty of Utrecht, 75.
- LILLEBOURNE, assembly convoked at, by William the Conqueror, i. 95.
- LIMERICK, defended by Irish Jacobites, iii. 387; captured by Ginckel, 388; Fenian attempt at, v. 371.
- LIMOGES, captured by Black Prince, i. 334.
- LIMOUSIN, becomes possession of English crown on accession of Henry II., i. 149; overrun by Black Prince, 321; ceded to English by treaty of Bretigny, 329; invaded by French, 334.
- LINCOLN, ABRAHAM, president of United States, v. 320; his first inaugural address, 320, 321; proclamation calling for volunteers, 321; blockade of Southern ports, 323; recognizes illegality of action of Captain Wilkes, 328; surrenders confederate envoys, 329.
- LINCOLN, Benjamin, American general, surrenders Charleston (1780), iv. 258.
- , Bishop of, nephew of Roger of Salisbury, arrested by Stephen, i. 142.
- , Bishop of, confessor of Henry VIII., ii. 158.
- , Bishop of, escapes from Gordon rioters, iv. 255; former tutor of William Pitt, 374.
- , Earl of, adopts cause of Simnel, ii. 92, 93; killed at Stoke, 93.
- , Lord, associated with government of Sir Robert Peel, v. 60; measure in regard to Irish emigration, 129.
- LINDSAY, Earl of, commander of royal forces, mortally wounded at Edgemoor, iii. 27.
- , Lady SOPHIA, daughter-in-law of Earl of Argyll, iii. 290.
- , Lord, pardoned by Mary Stuart, ii. 288; his visit to her at Lochleven, 292-293.
- , Lord, protests against establishment of Anglican liturgy in Scotland, ii. 423.
- LINGARD, DR., his history of England, v. 162.
- LINLITHGOW, surrenders to Charles Edward, iv. 159.
- LIONEL, third son of Edward III., his descendants heirs to English throne, i. 360.
- LIPRANDI, Russian general in the Crimea, v. 207.
- LISLE, Lady, her trial, iii. 320-321; execution, 321.
- , Lord, member of privy council under Edward VI., ii. 218. See Earl of Warwick.
- , Lord, son of the preceding, marries Lady Anne Seymour, daughter of Duke of Somerset, ii. 229.
- , Lord, judge of Charles I., president of court for trial of conspirators against Cromwell, iii. 188; assassinated in Switzerland, 321.
- LISSA, battle of, iv. 196.
- LITTLE CANGLAR, battle of, ii. 103.
- LIVERPOOL, regained by Long Parliament, iii. 213; improvements in, v. 153; obtains third representative in Parliament, 1866, 368.
- , Lord (Lord Hawkesbury), negotiates for peace of Amiens, iv. 354; Home Secretary in Portland's Cabinet, 381; Secretary of State in Percival's Cabinet, 393; Prime Minister at death of Percival, 397; attacked by opposition, 403; presents bill of Pains and Penalties against Queen Caroline, 407, 408; death (1827), 417.
- LANDAFF, Bishop of, convicted of abuse of privileges, ii. 403.
- LLEWELLYN, Prince of Wales, declared a rebel by Edward I., i. 245; surrenders and is married to Eleanor of Moatport, 246; again rebels, 247; is killed, 247; ancestor of Glendower, 366.
- LOBAU, island of, General Mouton besieged in, iv. 391.
- LOCKHART, ambassador of Cromwell to France, iii. 190; in command of English contingent at the battle of the Danes, 191;

- engaged with Mazarin in negotiating with Spain, 210; Royalists hope for his revolt, 211; Mazarin's consideration for, 213.
- LOCHIEL. See Cameron.
- LOCHLEVEN CASTLE, Mary Stuart imprisoned at, ii. 292-293.
- LOCH, JOHN, first English slave-trader, ii. 360.
- LOCKYER, ROBERT, shot for mutiny, iii. 127.
- LOLLARD, WALTER, German heretic, burned at Cologne, i. 381.
- LOLLARDS, the, persecution of, i. 381-382; under Henry VIII., ii. 175; laws against, revoked, 233.
- LOMBARDS, money-lenders, i. 344.
- LOMBARDY, Orsini's hopes for England's intervention in favor of, v. 281; Napoleon makes war on Austria for deliverance of, 392.
- LONDON, an important city, 59 A. D., i. 21; threatened by Picts and Scots, 26; episcopal see, 37; sacked by Danes, 42; its petition to Empress Maud, 144; under an interdict in reign of John; English barons shut up in, 217; resistance to King John, 217, 218; faithful to Prince Louis, 222; obtains confirmation of its privileges, 222; heavy taxes under Henry III., 228; loses its charter, 233; obtains fresh charter, 239; popular assembly convoked in by Edward I., 256; refuses to assist Edward II., 284; receives site for cemetery from Sir Walter Manny, 318; population of, joins insurgents under Wat Tyler, 346; treaty of, ii. 220; devoted to Earl of Essex, 350; city of, sends petition to Charles I., 428; popular agitation in, in favor of five members, iii., 16-17; Parliament addresses thanks to city of, 17; preparations for defence of, 27; alarm in, after battle of Brentford, 29; citizens demand restoration of Charles I., 87; alarm in, at invasion of Charles II., 143; hostile to military government, 225; revolts against restored Parliament, 231; merchants of, try to prevent sale of Dunkirk, 260; plague in, 261-262; devastated by fire, 262; charter withdrawn, 295; restored, 349; riot against Catholics at, 355; the corporation charged with corrupting the king's ministers, iv. 14; popular excitement in, at discovery of Barclay's plot, 19-20; rejoicings in, after treaty of Ryswick, 26; objects to commercial stipulations of peace of Utrecht, 76; alarm in, at invasion of Charles II., 168; distress in, during French revolution; mob breaks Mr. Pitt's windows, 327; illuminated on dissolution of Parliament, 1831, 436; agitation against Corn Laws in, v. 72-73; city of, presents address to Louis Philippe, 103-104; refuge for political outlaws, 284; elects Rothschild to Parliament, 291.
- LONDON, Bishop of (William), i. 85-86.
- , Bishop of, Wickliffe summoned before, i. 342.
- , University of, obtains representative in Parliament, 1866, v. 368.
- "LONDON CORRESPONDING SOCIETY," revolutionary society, iv. 325.
- "LONDON SOCIETY," the, sends missionaries to Tahiti, v. 105.
- LONDONDERRY, refuge for Irish Protestants, iii. 369; besieged by James II., 371-372.
- , Marquis of. See Castlereagh.
- LONG, Mr., his fidelity to Pitt, iv. 351; letter from Pitt on peace with France, 354.
- LONG ISLAND, Charles Edward, takes refuge in, iv. 176.
- LONGBEARD. See Fitz-Osbert.
- LONGCHAMP, WILLIAM, Chancellor of England, i. 187; seizes power in England, 196; defeated by John, 197; his adventure with fishwomen, 197-198; visits Richard in person, 199.
- LONGSWORD, WILLIAM, Earl of Salisbury, half-brother of King John, i. 212, 213.
- LONGUEVILLE, Duke of, in command of French army, ii. 123.
- LOO, William III.'s château at, iv. 26; Partition treaty signed at, 27.
- "LORDS APPELLANT," i. 361, 363.
- LORDS, House of. See Parliament.
- LORGES, Marshal, envoy of Louis XIV. to England, iii. 309.
- LORN, Lord, nephew of the Red Comyn, attacks Bruce, i. 263.
- LORNE, Lord, son of Earl of Argyle, iii. 290.
- LORRAINE, assigned to France in second Partition Treaty, iv. 34; fortified by Napoleon against Wellington, 398.
- LORRAINE, Cardinal of, uncle of Mary Stuart, ii. 277.
- , Duke of, René, campaign of Charles the Bold against, ii. 68.
- , Duke of, his duchy assigned to France by second Partition Treaty, iv. 34.
- , Duke of, Francis (1708-1765), negotiations for his marriage with Maria Theresa, iv. 132; aspires to the Empire, 150; becomes Emperor, 156. See Germany, Francis I.
- LONDON HILL, battle of, i. 270.
- LOUGHBOROUGH, Lord, Alexander Weddellburn (1733-1805), suggests to the Prince of Wales to seize the regency, iv. 310; becomes Lord Chancellor, 320-321; opposed to abolition of Test Act, 346.
- LOUIS, Kings of France. See Sovereigns of France.
- , Dauphin of France, son of Charles VI., i. 334; his death, 394.
- , Dauphin of France, son of Louis XIV., father of Philip V. of Spain, Spanish possessions in Italy assigned to him by second Partition Treaty, iv. 33; death, 69.
- , Dauphin of France (1729-1765), son of Louis XV., with his father before Tournay, iv. 154.
- LOUISA of PARMA, wife of Charles IV. of Spain, iv. 331.
- LOUISBERG, given up to France, by treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, iv. 181.
- LOUISE, Princess, daughter of Louis Philippe marries Leopold of Belgium, iv. 449.
- of Savoy, mother of Francis I., ii. 135; her hatred for the constable of Bourbon, 147; engagements with Henry VIII., 151-152; assurances of Wolsey to, 155.

- LOUISIANA, ceded to Spain, iv. 219.
- LOUTH, Fenian attempt at, v. 371.
- LOUVAIN, Duke of, his daughter marries Henry I. of England, i. 135.
- LOUVIERS, taken by Edward III., i. 305; by Henry V., 395.
- LOUVOIS, French Minister of War, his advice to Lauzun, iii. 382; death, 397.
- LOVAT, Lord, chief of Fraser clan, his double-dealings in regard to Jacobite rising in 1745, iv. 166; cold reception of Charles Edward, 175; his execution, 178.
- LOVEL, Lord, ii., 87; opposes Henry VII., 89; takes refuge in Flanders, 90; disappearance of, 93.
- LOVELACE, Lord, John, his threats to Parliament, iii. 363.
- LOW COUNTRIES, attempts on, by Francis I., ii. 140; secured to children of Mary Tudor, 248; revolt against Spain, 298; Alva's cruelty in, 312; their success, 316; protectorate offered to Elizabeth, 317; Duke of Anjou proclaimed by States-general, 318; allied with Elizabeth, 323; under government of Leicester, 323, 337; conclude peace with Spain, 346; effect of persecutions of Philip II., 361; alliance formed by France, England and other powers, to drive the Spaniards from, 1624, 411; united to France by decree of Napoleon, iv. 395; dissensions in, result in separation of Belgium and Holland, 448. See also United Provinces and Holland.
- , Spanish, engagement with Spain for protection of, renounced by James II., iii. 308; assigned to Archduke Charles by second Partition Treaty, iv. 34; frontier towns surrendered to Louis XIV., 39-40; government of, offered to Marlborough, 56; lost to Spain, 59.
- LOWDEN, Lord, Scottish commissioner to Charles I., iii. 98.
- LOWE, ROBERT, attacks budget of Disraeli, v. 147; his attack on Russell's Reform Bill, 362; refuses place in Derby's Cabinet, 363; his remark on passage of Disraeli's Reform Bill, 368.
- LOWENDALE, Count of, in service of France against Holland, iv. 179.
- LOWESTOFT, naval battle of, iii. 261.
- LOWSDEN, Lord, Chancellor of Scotland, iii. 76.
- LUCAN, Lord, commander of cavalry at Balaklava, v. 202; his misconstruction of Raglan's order at Balaklava, 204.
- LUCCA, bestowed by Napoleon upon his sister Princess Baciocchi, iv. 369.
- , Bourbon princess of, v. 113.
- LUCIUS II. See Popes.
- LUCY, sister of Edwin and Morcar, wife of Yves Taillebois, i. 111.
- LUCKNOW, siege and relief of. See Indian Mutiny.
- LUDLOW, EDMUND, iii. 80; opposed to the continuance of the monarchy, 100; allies himself with the army, 104, quoted, 138; his influence in Irish army, 161; not elected to Parliament in 1656, 174; charged with high treason, 228; his farewell to Vane, 234; elected to Parliament (1660), 243; leaves England, 253; his measures in Ireland compared to Pélissier's in Algeria, v. 223.
- LUIA FERNANDA, Doña, sister of Isabella II., negotiations for her marriage, v. 110, 118, 119; her marriage with the Duke of Montpensier announced by the Cortes, 122; celebrated at Madrid, 123.
- LUMLEY, RICHARD, Lord, signs invitation to Prince of Orange, iii. 346.
- LUNDY, ROBERT, governor of Londonderry, iii. 371.
- LUNEBURG, recovered by Ferdinand of Brunswick, iv. 196.
- LUNEVILLE, peace of (1801), between France and Austria, iv. 344.
- LUNSFORD, Sir THOMAS, made governor of the Tower, ii. 447; in command of corps of Cavaliers, 18.
- LUSHINGTON, Dr., arranges with Broglie the treaty of 1845, v. 100.
- LUSIGNAN, HUGH de, pretender to the title of King of Jerusalem, i. 191.
- LUTHER, MARTIN, his influence felt in England, ii. 138; at Diet of Worms; his controversy with Henry VIII., 139; Wolsey's measures against, 149; his premature congratulations to Henry, 152; opinion concerning his divorce, 153.
- LUTHERANS, persecuted under Henry VIII., ii. 175.
- LUTTERWORTH, living of Wycliffe, i. 342, 343.
- LUTZEN, battle of, iv. 397.
- LUXEMBOURG, restored at peace of Ryswick, iv. 23.
- , JACQUETTE of. See Jacquette of Luxembourg.
- , JAMES of, uncle of Elizabeth Woodville, ii. 56.
- , JOHN of, takes oath of peace with England, i. 401; gives up Joan of Arc to Bishop of Beauvais, ii. 30.
- , Marshal, remark in regard to James II., 385; victory at Fleurus, 386; at siege of Mons, 392; at Namur, 400, 401; defeats William III. at Steinkirk, 401; at Neerwinden, 402, 403; death, iv. 15.
- LYME, besieged by Prince Maurice, iii. 48; Monmouth's descent on, 314.
- LYNAR, Count, Danish minister, iv. 195.
- LYNDHURST, Lord, John Singleton Copley, (1772-1863), his amendment to Russell's Reform Bill, iv. 439; conducts government with Wellington in absence of Peel, 451; attacked by the opposition, v. 19; member of Sir Robert Peel's cabinet, 60; his speech on proroguing Parliament, 108; condemns violence toward the Chinese in affair of the "Arrow," 238; his speech on repeal of the paper duty, 305.
- LYNSAY, Sir DAVID, Lyon King-at-Arms, ii. 365.
- LYONS, Lord, English minister to the United States, v. 239.
- LYTTON, Sir EDWARD BULWER-, his historical romances, v. 168; succeeds Lord Stanley as Colonial Secretary, 293; his measures in regard to Ionian protectorate, 294, 295; his wise policy, 297.

M.

- MAC ANDROSSER, father and sons, i. 268.
- MACAULAY, Thomas Babington, Lord, his character of Charles II., 297, 298; essay on "Church and State," quoted, iv. 53; remark on Walpole and Chatham, 151; on Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, 184; account of Pitt's announcement of erasure of Melville's name from list of privy council, 368; quoted by Guizot, v. 29; his opinion of Sir Robert Peel quoted by Guizot, 57; his brilliancy as a historian, 162; sketch of by M. Guizot, 163-167; his essay on Lord Clive, 272; speech on civil service reform, in India, 276.
- MAC CALLUM MORE. See Argyle.
- MCCLELLAN, General, appointed to command of army of the Potomac, v. 325.
- MACCLESFIELD, Earl of, his opposition to Abjuration Bill, iii. 380; his answer to Marlborough, 380, 381.
- MACDONALD, Sir ALEXANDER, iv. 158; assists in escape of Charles Edward, 177.
- , of Boisdale, argues against undertaking of Charles Edward, iv. 158.
- , FLORA, assists escape of Charles Edward, iv. 176, 177; carried prisoner to London, 177.
- , of Glencoe (Maclean), delays taking oath to the government; order for destruction of his clan, iii. 395; killed, 396.
- , of Glengarry, takes oath to William III.'s government, iii. 395.
- , of Keppoch, takes oath to William III.'s government, iii. 395; at battle of Prestonpans, iv. 162; death at Culloden, 179.
- , Lady MARGARET, assists escape of Charles Edward, iv. 177.
- , RANALD, his devotion to Charles Edward, iv. 158.
- MACDONALDS, the, in favor of James II., iii. 375; hesitate to join Charles Edward, iv. 158; in left wing at Culloden, 174.
- MCDOWELL, United States general, defeated at Bull Run, v. 324.
- MACGREGOR, JAMES, son of Rob Roy, wounded at Prestonpans, iv. 162.
- MACGREGORS, the, in favor of James II., iii. 375.
- MACGUIRE, Lord, instigator of Irish insurrection, iii. 56; executed, 57.
- MACK, General, commander of Austrian army against Napoleon (1805), iv. 370; surrenders, 371.
- MACKAN, Admiral, meets Victoria on her visit to the Château d'Eu, v. 101.
- MACKAY, ANDREW, general of Scottish convention, iii. 376; defeated at Killiecrankie, 376, 377.
- MACKENZIE HEIGHTS, near Sevastopol, v. 196.
- MACINTOSH, Brigadier, of Borlase, concerned in insurrection of 1715, iv. 99, 100; surrenders himself as hostage, 101.
- MACLEAN, Colonel, agent of Warren Hastings in England, iv. 286; presents Hastings' resignation to the directors of the East India Company in London, 287.
- MACLEAN of Glencoe. See Macdonald.
- MACLEANS, the, in favor of James II., iii. 375.
- MACLEOD of Macleod, hesitates to join Charles Edward, iv. 158.
- , NEIL, betrays Montrose, iii. 135.
- MACMOROUGH, DERMOD, King of Leinster, i. 173.
- MACNAGHTEN, Sir W. H., British envoy and minister in Afghanistan, v. 49; his death, 50.
- MADELEINE of France, first wife of James V. of Scotland, ii. 195.
- MADOC, ringleader of insurrection in Wales, i. 251.
- MADRAS, captured by French in 1846, returned to England by peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, iv. 202; besieged by Lally-Tollendal, 203; English in, beg for help from Warren Hastings, 289.
- MADRID, in alternate possession of Philip V. and Archduke Charles, iv. 54, 55; first Pretender established at, 116; convention signed at (1738), 147; Murat takes possession of, 383; insurrection in, against Murat, 384; Joseph Bonaparte enters, 385; establishes himself in, 387; entered by the English (1812), 396.
- , treaty of, ii. 151.
- MAGDALA, capital of Abyssinia, English imprisoned at, 377; capture of, by English, 378; fortress of, razed to the ground, 379.
- MAGDALEN COLLEGE, the Fellows ejected from, iii. 336.
- MAGEE, Bishop of Peterborough, opposes disestablishment of Irish Church, v. 333.
- MAGELLAN, FERNANDO, attempts voyage around the world, ii. 361.
- MAGNA CHARTA, granted by King John, i. 215; its provisions 215, 216; revised by Earl of Pembroke, 221; confirmed, 223.
- MAGUIRE, JOHN FRANCIS, Irish member of Parliament, v. 381.
- MAHMOUD, Sultan of Turkey, his death, v. 33.
- MAHOMED ALI, son of Ahnwar-ood-Deen, besieged in Trichinopoly, iv. 204.
- MAHOMMEDANS in India, revolt against English, v. 240.
- MAHON, Lord, son-in-law of Lord Chatham, iv. 248.
- , Lord, his history of England, v. 167.
- MAHRATTAS, the, allies of the English, iv. 204; unsuccessful attempt of Hastings upon, 289.
- MAIDA, battle of, iv. 380.
- MAILLEBOIS, Marshal, at head of French army, threatens Hanover, iv. 150.
- MAILLOTINS, name of insurgent peasantry in Paris, i. 328.
- MAINE, French province of, revolts against William Rufus, i. 123; designed by Henry II. for his eldest son, 174; Cœur-de-Lion does homage for it to Philip Augustus, 181; nobility of, in favor of Prince Arthur, 203; insurrection in, 206; regained by France, 207; ravaged by English, 376; claimed by Henry V., 383; restored to

- Réné, ii. 38; claimed by Henry VIII., 119.
- MAINE, Duchess of, concerned in Cellamare's conspiracy, iv. 116.
- , Duke de, embarrasses action of Villeroi, iv. 15.
- MAITLAND, Captain, receives Napoleon on the Bellerophon, iv. 402.
- MALAKOFF TOWER, the, at Sevastopol, v. 200; demolished by the English, 201; rebuilt, 220; taken by the French, 230.
- MALCOLM, Kings of Scotland. See Sovereigns of Scotland.
- MALEK-RIK, name given to Richard I. by the Mussulmans, i. 194.
- "MALEVOLENTS," demands for repression of, iii. 19.
- MALISE, Earl of Strathern, i. 141.
- "MALLEUS SCOTORUM," i. 270.
- MALMESBURY, James Harris (1746-1820), Earl of, negotiates unsuccessfully for peace with French Republic, iv. 331, 333, 338; conversation with Duke of York, 359; account of interview with Pitt, 361; interview with Pitt after capitulation of Ulm, 371.
- , Earl of (James Howard Harris), Foreign Secretary in Derby's cabinet, 1852, apprehensions in regard to action of Chinese authorities, v. 309; proposes resolution censuring Palmerston's ministry, 347.
- MALPLAQUET, battle of, iv. 64.
- MALTA, restored to Knights of St. John at peace of Amiens, iv. 353; retained by England as guaranty for good faith of France, 356.
- MALTRAVERS, Sir JOHN, i. 286.
- "MALVOISINE," the, i. 219.
- MALWOOD KEEP, hunting-seat in the New Forest, i. 124.
- MAMELON, fortified hill near Sevastopol, v. 220.
- MANCHESTER, its opposition to Corn-Laws, v. 70; improvements in, 153; obtains third representative in 1866, 368; trades-unions at, 373, 374.
- School, Radical founders of, v. 301.
- , Earl of, Edward Montague, Lord Kimbolton (1602-1671), charged with high-treason against Charles I. iii. 13; receives command of regiment in Parliamentary army, 25; his services to Parliament, iii. 32; ordered to besiege York, 47; his army at Marston Moor, 48-50; Cromwell's advice, 50; ordered to join army of Essex, 53; reproached by Cromwell, 54; resigns his command, 59; takes refuge with the army, 88; opposes Ireton's motion in regard to the king, 99; protests against trial of the king, 107; presides over House of Lords in 1660, 243, 244.
- , Earl of (Charles Montague), ambassador of William III. at Paris, iv. 43; letter to Torcy, 43, 44.
- MANCINI, OLYMPIA, Countess of Soissons, mother of Eugene of Savoy, iv. 41.
- MANDEVILLE, Sir JOHN, his history of Presbyter John, v. 377.
- MANDUBRATIUS, king of Trinobantes, i. 17.
- MAUNY, WALTER de, comes to aid of Joan of Flanders, i. 300; defends Aiguillon, 311; remonstrates with Edward III. at Calais, 315; carries message of the king, 316; intercedes for the six citizens, 317; his gift to London, 318.
- MANSFELDT, Count of, seeks aid in England for war in the Palatinate, ii. 411.
- MANSFIELD, William Murray, Lord (1704-1793), his argument against American colonies, iv. 239; his escape from mob, 255.
- MANUFACTURES, development of, in England under Elizabeth, ii. 359.
- MAORIES, native population of New Zealand, revolt against the English, v. 340.
- MAR, Earl of, defeated at Duplin Heath, i. 293.
- , Earl of, regent of Scotland, ii. 313; death, 315.
- , Earl of (John Erskine), Secretary of State in Scotland under Queen Anne, iv. 90; raises standard of the Pretender, (1715), 98; unskilful conduct of insurrection, 99; threatens Stirling, 100; defeated at Sheriffmuir, 101, 102; escapes with Pretender, 105.
- MARCH, Earl of, cousin of Richard II., assassinated in Ireland, i. 355.
- , Earl of (George), rival of Douglas, renounces allegiance to King of Scotland, and allies himself with the Percies, i. 367; his advice to Prince Henry at Shrewsbury, 370.
- , Earl of, grandson of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, legitimate heir to English throne, i. 362; conspiracy of Hotspur in favor of, 368; attempted rescue of, 371; restored to liberty, 380; his claim to France superior to that of Henry V., 383; conspiracy to place him on the throne, 386.
- , Earl of. See Edward IV.
- MARDYCK, signed as pledge to the English, iii. 190; canal works at, iv. 112.
- MARENGO, battle of, iv. 344.
- MARGARET of Anjou, wife of Henry VI., ii. 38; her character, 39; birth of her son, 44; gives power to her favorites, 45; takes refuge in Scotland, 46; her unpopularity, 47; assembles her partisans; is victorious at Wakefield, 48; defeats Warwick at Barnet; gains possession of King Henry, 49; compelled to retreat, 50; is defeated at Towton, 52; takes refuge in Scotland; seeks help in France, 53; her adventure with bandits, 54, 55; her partisans defeated at Hexham, 55; her alliance with Warwick, 60; made prisoner, 63; her death, 64.
- ATHELING, i. 88, wife of Malcolm of Scotland, i. 110.
- , of Austria, daughter of Emperor Maximilian and Mary of Burgundy, ii. 70; consigned to Louis XI., 70; contracted to Charles VIII.; given up by him, 98.
- BEAUFORT. See Richmond.
- de CLARE, wife of Gaveston, iv. 280.
- , of France, daughter of Louis VII., sought in marriage for Prince Henry of England, i. 152.

- MARGARET of France, wife of Edward I. of England, i. 258.
- , Princess, of Norway, i. 248.
- of Provence, wife of Louis IX. of France, i. 226.
- TUDOR, daughter of Henry VII., marries James IV. of Scotland, ii. 110; appointed regent, 127; marries Earl of Angus, 130; demands divorce, 144; grandmother of Mary Stuart, 267; of Lord Darnley, 283.
- of York, Duchess of Burgundy, sister of Edward IV. negotiations for her marriage, ii. 57; her favor to enemies of Henry VII., 91; assists Earl of Lincoln, 92; receives Perkin Warbeck, 101; assists him to invade England, 104.
- MARGUERITE of Valois, her marriage with the king of Navarre, ii. 313.
- MARIA, Infanta of Spain, negotiations for her marriage with Prince Charles of England, ii. 403-407.
- ADELAIDE of Savoy, Duchess of Burgundy, iv. 41; her death, 69.
- THERESA (1717-1780), Archduchess of Austria, negotiations for her marriage with Duke of Lorraine, iv. 132; her right to the succession assured by Pragmatic sanction, 132, 148; her accession to the Empire, 1740; her title disputed, 148; supported by England; her negotiations with Frederick II., 149; forced to take refuge in Hungary; enthusiasm of the people for her, 150; refuses subscription raised by English ladies, 152; her successes, 154; her husband elected emperor, 155; alliance with France in Seven Years War, 192.
- MARIE-ANTOINETTE (1755-1793), wife of Louis XVI., intercedes for Captain Asgill, iv. 276.
- MARIE-GABRIELLE, of Savoy, wife of Philip V. of Spain, iv. 41, 55.
- MARIE-LOUISE, Archduchess of Austria, contracted to Napoleon, iv. 393.
- MARIENBURG, fortifications of, dismantled in 1831; v. 395.
- MARIGNAN, battle of, ii. 129.
- MARLBOROUGH, Duchess of (Sarah Jennings, 1660-1744), her influence with Princess Anne, iii. 345; Anne's devotion to, 392; ceases to support James II. on death of Queen Mary, iv. 14; her character, 50; obtains arrears of pension after her disgrace, 51; letter of Peterborough to, 54; decline of her favor with the queen, 58, 67; retires from court, 68; supplanted by Mrs. Masham, 80, 81, 82; her last interview with Queen Anne, 84; opposes Bolingbroke's acquittal, 95; raises subscription for Maria Theresa, 152.
- , Duke of (John Churchill, 1650-1722), as Lord Churchill, ambassador of James II. to France, iii. 308; sent against insurgents under Monmouth, 315; presents the sister of the Hewlings to the king, 322; his influence with Princess Anne, 345; letter to William of Orange, 346; joins him with troops, 352; gained over to support claims of Princess Anne, 363; answer of Macclesfield to his attack, 380-381; his successes in Ireland, 387; disgraced, 392; causes of his disgrace, 392-393; William's silence as to his motives for dismissing, 394; temporarily imprisoned in the Tower for supposed complicity in Jacobite plot, 400; warns James II. of projected attack on Brest, 405; offers his services to William and is rejected, 406; ceases to support James II. on death of Queen Mary, iv. 14; Fenwick's accusations against, 21; restored to favor on intercession of Albemarle, 30; in command of English army in Holland, 40; still a Tory on accession of Queen Anne, 50; sent as ambassador to the Hague; made Duke; generalissimo of English and Dutch armies, 51; his campaign of 1703 and 1704; his victory at Blenheim, 53; honors bestowed on him in England; his campaign of 1705, 54; his victory at Ramillies, 55; refuses governorship of Low Countries, 56; accusations against, in England, 58; defeats Vendôme at Oudenarde; his capture of Lille, 59; urges peace on humiliating terms to France, 61, 62; his victory at Malplaquet, 64; success of England due mainly to him, 66; loses favor of Queen Anne, 67; at head of allied armies, 68; accusations brought against him in Parliament; deprived of his offices, 71; his answer to Harley in Parliament, 72; protests against peace of Utrecht, 73; Harley called to office through his influence, 81; his frequent change of party, 82; accused of speculation before Parliament, 84; inclined to alliance with Oxford, 85; scheme of Bolingbroke to deprive him of influence, 87; in the Netherlands at time of Queen Anne's illness, 89; recalled to command of the army on accession of George I., 93; his perfidious course toward the government, 108; his death; immense wealth, 109.
- MARMONT, Marshal, in command of French armies in Spain; defeated at Arapiles, iv. 396.
- MARONITES, massacred by the Druses, v. 314.
- MARQUESAS ISLANDS, French protectorate established in, v. 105.
- MARSEILLES, Phœnicians established at, i. 13; conference at, between Francis I. and the Pope, ii. 172.
- MARSHAL, Earl. See Keith.
- MARSIN, Marshal, in command of division of French army, in Germany, iv. 52; defeated at Blenheim, 53; his death before Turin, 56.
- MARSTON MOOR, battle of, iii. 49-50.
- MARTIN V. See Popes.
- MARTINEAU, HARRIET, her letter on Reform Bill of 1831, iv. 436-437; anecdote of Cole-ridge, v. 23; political economy tales, 168.
- MARTINIQUE, conquered by English, iv. 218; returned to France by treaty of Paris, 219.
- MARTYN, HENRY, his attitude in Long Parliament, ii. 431; imprisoned in the Tower for suggesting execution of the king, iii. 37; answer to Cromwell, 108; appointed to draw up the king's sentence, 111; signs the death-warrant, 116; measures against

- Royalists, 143-144; introduces Dissolution Bill, 161-162.
- MARY, Queen, daughter of Henry VIII., contracted to the Dauphin, ii. 131; to Charles V., 141; only daughter of Catharine of Aragon, 154; her legitimacy provided for, 157; excluded from succession, 173; received into favor, 185; Northumberland aims to exclude her from the throne, 231; refuses to practice new form of worship, 236, 237; retires to her manor, 238; warned by Arundel of Northumberland's design, 239; her claim favored by the people, 240; movement in her favor in the country; proclaimed in London, 241; her entrance into London, 242; her conduct toward the prisoners in the Tower, 242, 243; orders trial of Northumberland, 243; detains Lady Jane Grey in the Tower, 244; her policy with regard to Catholicism, 244; is crowned; her measures towards Protestants, 245; projects for her marriage, 246; engages herself to Philip II., 247; insurrections against her, 248; her firmness, 249; sends for Elizabeth; orders execution of Lady Jane Grey, 250; orders imprisonment of Elizabeth, 252; her marriage, 253; measures of her first Parliament, 253; releases prisoners of state, 254; her persecution of heretics, 254, 255; relative position of two faiths in her reign, 256; martyrdom of Latimer and Ridley, 257; her relations with Parliament, 257, 258; her devotion to Philip, 258; number of martyrs in her reign, 260; involved in war with France, 261, 262; her illness, 263; her death (1558), 264; her character, 264, 265.
- , daughter of James II., educated in the Anglican Church, iii. 273; married William, Prince of Orange, 275; her partisans indignant at proclamation of Monmouth, 316; her assurances to her father, 341; attachment to her husband, 344; detained in Holland, 362; letter to Danby, 333; declared queen by the convention, 334; arrival at Whitehall, 365; left in charge of government, 381; anxiety for her father, 385; signs warrant for arrest of Clarendon, 387; meets William at Margate, 406; illness, 407, 408; death, 408; character, iv. 13; remarks of Guizot concerning, v. 30.
- of Anjou, wife of Charles VII. of France, ii. 22.
- of Burgundy, daughter of Charles the Bold, ii. 68; her death, 70.
- of Guise, Duchess of Longueville, betrothed to James V. of Scotland, ii. 195; married to him; her influence with him, 203; her children, 205; remains in Scotland as dowager queen, 224; regent of Scotland, 262; death, 276.
- , Countess of Perche, i. 133.
- , Princess, daughter of Henry VII., contracted to Charles V. of Germany, ii. 115; marries Louis XII. of France, 127; after his death marries Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, 128; admired by Charles V., 133; grandmother of Lady Jane Grey, 231.
- STUART. See Scotland, sovereigns of.
- "MARY JANE," famous field-piece of army of La Vendée, iv. 161.
- MASHAM, Mr., gentleman of the bed-chamber to Queen Anne, iv. 83.
- , Mrs. (Abigail Hill), supplants Duchess of Marlborough in favor of Queen Anne, iv. 80, 82, 83; her quarrel with Oxford, 87.
- MASON, Confederate envoy to England, his capture, v. 327; set free, 329.
- MASSACHUSETTS, charter of, iii. 295; general court of, declares that the colonies cannot be taxed without their own consent, iv. 223; charter of, cancelled, 234.
- MASSACRES:—
- of Armagnacs at Paris, i. 396.
- of Cawnpore (See Indian Mutiny).
- of Danes by Saxons on St. Brice's Day, i. 69-70.
- of Drogheda, iii. 132.
- of Glencoe, iii. 395-395.
- of Protestants, at Vassy, ii. 281.
- of St. Bartholomew, ii. 313, 314.
- MASSENA, Marshal (1758-1817), his reply to Napoleon at battle of Aspern, iv. 391; intrusted with chief command of the French in Spain, his campaign against Wellington in Portugal, 395; forced to evacuate Portugal, 1811; replaced by Marmont, 396.
- MASSEY, JOHN, Catholic dean of Christ Church, iii. 320.
- MATILDA (Empress Maud), daughter of Henry I. of England, marries emperor of Germany, i. 132; declared heiress to English crown, 135; marries Geoffrey Plantagenet, 135; her son called Henry Fitz-Empress, 137; agitation in her favor, 139; disembarks in England, 143; her rights acknowledged, 143; flies from London and takes refuge in Oxford, 144; besieged there, 146; returns to France, 146.
- , wife of King Stephen. See Maud.
- , of Anjou, contracted to Prince William, son of Henry I., i. 132; marriage, 133.
- , Saracen princess, wife of Gilbert à Becket, i. 153.
- , of Scotland, marries Henry I. of England, i. 127.
- MAUD, wife of King Stephen, i. 138, 144.
- , Empress. See Matilda.
- MAULAC, PETER de, murderer of Arthur of Brittany, i. 205; makes Lady of Bramber and her children prisoners, 208.
- MAULE, FOX. See Panmure.
- MAULE, SIR THOMAS, his death at Buchan Castle, i. 264.
- MAULÉON, SAUVERY of, leader of mercenaries under King John, i. 217.
- MAURICE OF NASSAU. See Nassau.
- , Prince of, son of Frederick, Elector Palatine, besieges Lyme, iii., 48; signs proposals of negotiation with Essex, 52.
- MAXIMIAN, Roman emperor, i. 25.
- MAXIMILIAN, King of the Romans. See Germany, Emperors of.
- MAXWELL, Lord, at head of Scottish army, ii. 204.
- MAY, THOMAS ERSKINE, his Constitutional History quoted on Reform Bill of 1831, iv.

- 431; account of civil disabilities of the Jews, 291.
- MAYENCE, surrender of, by French garrison, 1793, iv. 325; Guizot's project in regard to, v. 395.
- MAYNARD, Sir JOHN (1602-1690), the army demands his expulsion from Parliament, iii. 85; prosecutor of Strafford, heads deputation to Prince of Orange, 358.
- MAYNOOTH, College of, founded by Mr. Pitt, iv. 339; Peel's project for its extension, v. 93, 94.
- Grants, iv. 380.
- MAZARIN, Cardinal, iii. 121, 131; makes no attempt to save Charles I., 149; Graymond's letter to, 151; negotiations with the English, 152, 154; takes advantage of Cromwell's rupture with Spain, 175; treaty of alliance with Cromwell, 190; not disposed to support Richard Cromwell, 197-198; recognizes the Republic, 210; negotiates with Spain, 210, 212; his Spanish policy referred to by M. Guizot, v. 111.
- MAZARINADE OF FRANCE, alluded to in Chatham's attack on Bute, iv. 320.
- MEADE, Colonel, English chargé d'affaires in Japan, v. 341.
- General, defeats Confederates at Gettysburg, v. 338.
- MEAGHER, leader of agitation in Ireland; death, v. 127.
- MEAUX, taken by Charles VII., ii. 37; battle of, v. 152.
- MECKLENBURG-STRELITZ, Charlotte of. See Charlotte of Mecklenburg-Strelitz.
- MEDICI, CATHERINE DE', niece of Clement VII., her marriage with Henry II. of France arranged, ii. 172; negotiates with Elizabeth of England, 282; negotiates alliance with Walsingham, 310; responsible for the St. Bartholomew, 314.
- JULIUS de. See Popes.
- MEDINA-SIDONIA, Duke of, Spanish Admiral, ii. 341; decides to abandon invasion of England, 342.
- MEER JAFFIER, Sovereign of Bengal; his death, iv. 281; his legacy to Clive, 283.
- MEERUT, revolt of Sepoys at, v. 243, 244.
- MELBOURNE, Lord (William Lamb, 1779-1818), in Lord Grey's cabinet, 1830, iv. 429; his Irish Church Bill rejected, 447; his ministry, 455-457; directs Queen Victoria in her first meeting with the Council, v. 14, 15; premier at her accession, 16; his character; influence over the queen, 17; attempt of his cabinet to re-organize Jamaica; his resignation, 20; recalled, 21; his remarks to Guizot on the Eastern question, 38.
- MELFORD, Lord, John Drummond, with James II. in Ireland, iii. 371.
- MELUN, Viscount of, accompanies Prince Louis, afterwards Louis VIII., to England, i. 219.
- MELVIL, ANDREW, his aversion to Episcopacy, ii. 398.
- MELVILLE, emissary of Mary Stuart, ii. 283; carries news of her son's birth to England, 287; carries letter from England to Mary, 290; intercedes with Elizabeth for her, 332; his last interview with her, 334.
- MELVILLE, Lord, (George) commissioner of William III. to Scotland; replaced by Master of Stair, iii. 394.
- Lord (Henry Dundas, 1740-1811), conducts inquiry into conduct of Warren Hastings, iv. 290; in Pitt's cabinet, 292; proposes restoration of confiscated estates, 303; transmits letter of the king to Pitt, 321; conversation with George III., 345, 346; letter to Pitt on Addington's cabinet, 348; bearer of Addington's proposals to Pitt, 358; accused of misappropriation of public funds, 366; trial, 367; acquittal by Lords, 368.
- MENDOZA, Spanish ambassador, ii. 322.
- MENIN, taken by Marlborough, 1706, iv. 56; fortifications dismantled, v. 395.
- MENON, General, succeeds Kleber in command of French army in Egypt, iv. 353; compelled to surrender to English, 354.
- MENTSCHIKOFF, Prince, ambassador to Constantinople, states demands of the czar on Turkey, v. 176, 177; his demands virtually those of the Vienna Note, 178; in command of Russian army; his position at the Alma, 190; in command at Sevastopol, 193; closes harbor, 194, 195; his plan for defence of the city, 196; near Balaklava with his army, 200; plan of attack, 202; letter to Prince Paschevitch, 207, 208; receives reinforcements, 208; hears of the czar's death, 218.
- MERCER, JOHN, Scottish pirate, i. 341.
- MERCY, COUNT DE, in command of Imperialists in Sicily in the war against Philip V. of Spain, iv. 118.
- MERCHADEE, chief of the Brabantines in service of Richard I. i. 201; his treatment of Bertrand de Gourdon, 202.
- MERCIA, Anglian, kingdom of, i. 32, 40, 44; occupied by Danes, 51; attacked by Hastings, 52; under viceroy of Alfred, 54; annexed to Wessex, 63.
- MERKS, THOMAS, Bishop of Carlisle, defends Richard II. against Parliament, i. 359, 360; is arrested, 360.
- MERSEY, Charles II. forces passage of, iii. 144.
- Isle of, i. 52, 53.
- MESNAGER, deputy of Rouen in Council of Commerce; his interview with Queen Anne, iv. 68.
- MESSINA, surrendered to English, iv. 115.
- METHODISM, founded by Wesley and Whitfield, iv. 187.
- METROPOLITAN of Great Britain, Cardinal Wiseman made, v. 136.
- METTERNICH, Prince, (1773-1859), Austrian ambassador at court of Napoleon, iv. 390; prime minister of Austria, 413; scheme for marriage of Isabella of Spain, v. 118.
- MEXICO, Napoleon's projects for establishing monarchy in, v. 336-337; Maximilian of Austria proclaimed emperor, 337; end of monarchy, 339.
- city of, occupied by the French, v. 337.

- MEULAN, conferences at between Henry V. and Duke of Burgundy, i. 398.
- MEUSE, Marlborough's campaign on, iv. 51.
- MIDDLEHAM, castle of the Earl of Warwick, ii. 58.
- MIDDLESEX, Wilkes elected to Parliament as member from, iv. 223.
- MIDDLETON, Parliamentary general, ordered to join army of Essex, iii. 51.
- , Royalist general, iii. 145.
- , Sir CHARLES, successor of Lord Melville in Admiralty, iv. 368.
- , Earl of, (Charles), at death-bed of James II., iv. 41.
- MIGNET, M. quoted, iv. 35.
- MIGUEL, DON, claims Portuguese throne, iv. 450; relinquishes it, 451.
- MILAN, duchy of, claimed by Louis XII., ii. 119; ceded to Francis I., 129; under Constable of Bourbon, 131; assigned to Duke of Lorraine by second Partition Treaty, iv. 33-34, Bonaparte crowned king of Italy at, 369.
- , DECREE, issued by Napoleon, 1807, iv. 333.
- , Dowager Duchess of, declines to marry Henry VIII., ii. 195.
- , Duke of, sends aid to Charles VII., ii. 16.
- , Duke of, allied with Pope Clement VII., ii. 152.
- , VALENTINE of, grandmother of Louis XII., ii. 119.
- MILANESE, in service of France, ii. 17.
- MILE-END, meeting-place of insurgents under Wat Tyler, i. 347.
- MILL, JAMES, servant of East India Company, v. 277.
- , JOHN STUART, son of the above, his defence of East India Company, v. 277; proposes extension of suffrage to women, 367; speech in behalf of Fenians, 371; unseated, 381.
- MILLER, HUGH, his name first becomes known, v. 161.
- , Major, commands guard of General Monk, iii. 235, 236.
- MILTON, JOHN, his pamphlet justifying execution of Charles I., iii. 121; reply to Eikon Basilike, 124; death in 1674; works, 301; sells manuscript of Paradise Lost for five pounds, 407.
- MINDEN, battle of, iv. 210.
- MINORCA, island of, taken by the English, iv. 59; retained by the English at peace of Utrecht, 75; attacked by the French in 1756, 191; captured by French and Spaniards in, 1782, 266, 267; Spain confirmed in possession of, by treaty of Versailles, 280.
- MINORITES, chapel of, Comyn murdered at, i. 266.
- MIQUELON, captured by English, 1778, iv. 253.
- MIRABELLE, M. de, French engineer in service of Charles Edward, iv. 171.
- MIRZAPHA, JUNG, Indian prince, iv. 203.
- MISSISSIPPI, State of, joins Southern Confederacy, v. 320.
- MITCHELL, JOHN, leader of agitation in Ireland; death, v. 127.
- MITCHELL, Sir FRANCIS, prosecuted for abuse of monopolies, ii. 403.
- MODENA, Duke of, his daughter marries James, Duke of York, (James II.), iii. 273.
- , Mary of, her marriage to James, Duke of York, (James II.), iii. 273; birth of her son, 341; escapes to France, 353; her husband's dying charge to her, 88.
- MOGADOR, bombarded by Prince de Joinville, v. 110.
- MOGUL, the Grand, recognizes sovereignty of Dupleix, iv. 203.
- MOHAMMED ALI, Pasha of Egypt, his difficulties with the Sultan of Turkey, v. 33; Guizot's account of French policy in regard to, 34, 35; French support of his claims; removed by the Sultan, 39; his offers of compromise, 42, 43; Egyptian heredity secured to, 43.
- MOIRA, Lord, answer of Lord Clare to his speech on Irish question, iv. 339.
- MOLDAVIA, Russian army in, v. 177; privileges guaranteed, 234.
- MOLESWORTH, ROBERT, Viscount, speech against South Sea Company, iv. 123.
- , Sir WILLIAM, succeeds Lord John Russell in Palmerston's cabinet, v. 219.
- MOLE, Count, interview with Napoleon on his arrival from Elba, iv. 400.
- MÖLLER, Russian general, in command of land-forces in Sevastopol, v. 196.
- MOMPESSON, Sir GILES, prosecuted for abuse of monopolies, ii. 403.
- MONA, island of, (Anglesey), centre of Druidic worship, i. 20, 21.
- MONASTERIES, suppression of, by Henry VIII., ii. 179-181; its consequences, 186; restored by Mary, closed again by Elizabeth; 274.
- MONCONTOUR, battle of, ii. 302.
- MONK, General, with Cromwell in Scotland, iii. 141; suppresses Royalist revolt in Scotland, 148; made governor of Scotland by Cromwell, 167; in command of army of Protectorate in Scotland, 198; offer of Richard Cromwell to him, 203; supports restored Long Parliament, 209, 210; Royalists hope for his revolt, 211; remains in Scotland; his character, 217; his action at time of Royalist insurrection, 218; address to his army at Edinburgh, 219; declares his adherence to Parliament, 220; confers with his officers, 221; comes to understanding with Scotch, 222; negotiates with Committee of Safety, 223, 224; his march toward London, 226; interview with Fairfax, 226, 227; his silence in regard to his plans, 227; receives thanks of Parliament, 228; demands removal of Parliamentary army; refuses oath of abjuration, 230; ordered to suppress revolt in London, 231, 232; demands free Parliament, 233, 234; reinstates excluded members, 235; his declaration to the Republicans, 236; his precarious position, 237; interview with Grenville, 239; proposals to Charles II., 240; orders arrest of Lambert, 242; Parliament passes vote of thanks to, 243; his reception of Grenville, 244; sends letter to Charles II., 245; his reception of the king, 248; in

- ministry of Charles II., 251; remonstrates against severities to Republicans, 253; his betrayal of Argyle, 258; in London during the Plague, 262; his death, 273; buried in Westminster, 273.
- MONK, NICHOLAS, brother of General Monk, iii. 219.
- , Mistress, wife of General Monk, iii. 246.
- MONMOUTH, JAMES, Duke of, son of Charles II., in command of English and Irish auxiliaries in service of France, iii. 271; charged with affairs of Scotland, 283; defeats Covenanters at Bothwell Bridge; his marriage with daughter of Buccleugh, 284; Charles's attachment for him, 284-285; sent to the continent, 285; returns to England; his progress through the kingdom, 290; his arrest, 290, 291; absent at his father's death, 297; in exile at the Hague, 309; prepares to take lead of insurrection in England, 310; Argyle's insurrection in favor of, 309-312; his descent upon England, popular rising in his favor, 315; proclaimed king at Tannaton, 316; defeated at Sedgemoor, taken prisoner, 317; his interview with James II., 318; his execution, 318, 319; popularity in England, 319.
- , Earl of, accompanies William III. to Holland, iii. 389.
- MONS, captured by Gloucester and Jacqueline of Hainault, ii. 19; captured by Louis XIV., iii. 392; restored at Peace of Ryswick, iv. 23; surrenders to the French, 179; its fortifications dismantled in 1831, v. 395.
- MONSTRELET, quoted, i. 405.
- MONTACUTE, Lord, adviser of Edward III., arrests Mortimer, i. 292.
- , Lord, executed as a relative of Cardinal Pole, ii. 194.
- MONTAGUE, Admiral, offers of Charles II. to him, iii. 211; placed at head of Parliamentary fleet, 236; his letters to Charles II. 241-245; arrival at the Hague, 247; his death, 269.
- , CHARLES, afterward Lord Halifax, (1661-1715), moves vote of a loan in Parliament, iii. 402; his idea of the Bank of England; made Chancellor of the Exchequer, 404; draws up engagement of Parliament for defence of William III., iv. 21; decline of his influence in Parliament, 36.
- , Lord, younger brother of Earl of Warwick, ii. 55; does not oppose insurrection in Yorkshire, 58; makes no defence against Edward IV., 62; killed at Barnet, 63.
- , Judge at Raleigh's trial, ii. 401.
- , English ambassador to Louis XIV., iii. 275; recalled, 276.
- MONTALEMBERT, M. de, leader of liberal Catholics in France, v. 157; his pamphlet on Indian agitation in India, v. 275; pleads cause of Poland, 343.
- MONTAUBAN, General, in charge of land forces in China, v. 310; carries to France collection of Chinese antiquities, 312.
- MONTCALM, Madame de, sister of Duke of Richelieu, iv. 403.
- , Marquis of, conducts the war in America against the English, iv. 191; in command at Quebec, 199, 200; his death, 201; obelisk erected to him and Wolfe, 201.
- MONTAGLE, Lord, receives warning of Catesby's plot; carries it to Cecil, ii. 389.
- , Lord, his motion rejecting repeal of paper duty, v. 305.
- MONTAITH, betrayer of Wallace, i. 265.
- MONTMOLIN, Count de, son of Don Carlos, scheme for his marriage with Isabella of Spain, v. 118.
- MONTREAU, taken by Henry V. i. 402.
- MONTESQUIEU, his "Notes on England," account of debate in Parliament, iv. 141.
- MONTERRAT, CONRAD of, pretender to the throne of Jerusalem, i. 191.
- , FREDERICK of, i. 196.
- MONTFORD, Sir SIMON, executed under Henry VII., ii. 102.
- MONTFORT, GUY of, son of Earl of Leicester, i. 236-238.
- , HENRY of, son of Earl of Leicester, his greed, i. 236; death, 237.
- , JOHN de, brother of John III. of Brittany, i. 299; escapes from prison and dies, 301.
- , JOHN de, Duke of Brittany, i. 336; reduced to extremities by Du Guesclin, 341; banished to England, is recalled, 341; negotiates with council of regency 342.
- , SIMON of, Earl of Leicester, at head of English barons, i. 231, 232; raises his standard against Henry III., 233; makes the king prisoner, 235; convenes a Parliament, 235; his sons, 235; at Evesham, 237; his death and character, 238.
- , SIMON of, son of the above, i. 236, 238.
- MONTGOMERY; Earl of, his expedition to assist Huguenots, ii. 316.
- , Sir JAMES, agent in Jacobite intrigues, iii. 304.
- , ROBERT, prevents outbreak of Sepoys in the Punjab, v. 245.
- , Royalist general, iii. 145.
- MONTOIE, French King-at-arms at Agincourt, i. 392.
- MONTMIRAIL, conference at, i. 164.
- MONTPENSIER, Duc de, son of Louis Philippe, proposals for his marriage with Spanish Infanta, v. 119, his marriage announced by the Cortes, 122; celebrated at Madrid, 123.
- MONTREAL, captured by English, 1760, iv. 202.
- MONTREUIL, M. de, French ambassador to Charles I., iii. 73.
- MONTREUIL, treaty of, i. 264.
- MONTROSE, Earl of (James Grahame), attaches himself to Charles I. ii. 440; his plans to gain control of Scotland, iii. 31; defeats Argyle, 58; successes in Scotland, 61-66; defeated at Philip-Haugh, 68; execution of his followers, 75; at the Hague with Charles II., 130; in Germany, 133;

- letter of Charles II. to, 133, 134; his last enterprise in Scotland, 134, 135; taken prisoner, 135; his execution, 136.
- MONTROSE, Marquis of, presides at trial of Earl of Argyll, iii, 290.
- MOORE, Sir JOHN, Colonel under Abercrombie at capture of the Antilles, iv, 331; in command of English army in Spain; his victory at Corunna; death, iv, 387.
- , THOMAS, Irish poet, (1779-1852), efforts in behalf of Catholic emancipation, iv, 420; living in early part of reign of Victoria, v, 161; poetical allegory of, 331.
- MOORS, at battle of Alcazar, ii, 347.
- MOORSHEBAD, capital of Surajah Dowlah, iv, 204.
- MORAY, Sir ANDREW, Earl of Bothwell, faithful to Wallace, i, 259.
- MORBEQUE, DENIS DE, Knight of Artois, at battle of Poitiers, i, 325.
- MORCAR, son of Elfgar of Mercia, i, 87-93-97-106; swears fidelity to William the Conqueror, 107; in suite of William, 108; takes refuge in Isle of Ely; captured and imprisoned by Normans, 111.
- MORDAUNT, adherent of Charles II., quoted, iii, 211.
- , Lord, Charles. See Peterborough.
- MORE, Sir THOMAS, friendship of Henry VIII. for, ii, 145; his agreement with the Commons, 146; examines treatise on divorce, 156; made chancellor, 166; retires, 170; refuses oath of allegiance to children of Anne, 174; his trial, 173, 176; is beheaded, 177.
- MOREVILLE, HUGH DE, murderer of Becket, i, 168.
- MORGAN, Major-general of Monk's army; undertakes to destroy his influence, iii, 221.
- MORICE, Secretary of State to Charles II., iii, 251.
- MORLEY, Colonel in Parliamentary army, iii, 215; opposes advance of Lambert, 216.
- , DR., chaplain of Lord Capel, iii, 123.
- , Lord, at battle of Sluys, i, 297.
- MORNINGTON, Lord, conversation with William Pitt, iv, 328. See Wellesley.
- MOROCCO, French war in, v, 108, 109, 110.
- MORRIS, General, at Balaklava, v, 206.
- , WILLIAM, his poems, v, 170.
- MORTAGNE, JOHN, Count of. See John Lackland.
- MORTAIGN, Count, brother of William the Conqueror, i, 95.
- MORTIER, Marshal, at Estremadura, iv, 890.
- MORTIMER, ANNE. See Anne Mortimer.
- , Sir EDMUND, uncle of young Earl of March, made prisoner at Homildon Hill, i, 368; marries daughter of Owen Glendower, 369.
- , ROGER, joins Simon de Montfort, i, 236.
- , ROGER, ally of Earl of Hereford, imprisoned in the Tower, i, 281; escapes, 282; in service of Charles the Fair, 282; returns to England with Queen Isabel, 283; receives property of Arundel, 285; his influence over Isabel, 286-288; ravages possessions of Lancaster, 291; arrested, 292; hanged at Tyburn, 293.
- MORTIMER'S CROSS, battle of, ii, 49.
- MORTON, Archbishop of Canterbury. See Canterbury.
- , Lord, chancellor of Scotland, ii, 286; flight after murder of Rizzio, 287; pardoned by Mary, 288; discovers correspondence between Mary and Bothwell, 293; before the English Commission, 294; at head of "king's men," 305; his enmity for Mary Stuart, 313; made regent of Scotland by Queen Elizabeth, 315; his loss of power, 319; his execution, 320.
- MORVILLIERS, Comte de, intrusted with arrangements for marriage of Louis XV. with Maria Leczinska, iv, 131.
- MOSCOW, burning of, iv, 396, 397.
- MOSS, Colonel, in Parliamentary army, iii, 215, 216.
- MOTHE-FÉNÉLON, M. DE LA, French ambassador to Elizabeth, ii, 314.
- "MOTHER OF MUSKETS," the field-piece of the Highlanders, iv, 161.
- MOTTE, DE LA, French admiral, captures English convoy, iv, 265.
- MOUNTROY, Lord, compels Earl of Tyrone to surrender, ii, 353.
- MOUSEHOLD-HEATH, camp of Ket at, ii, 226.
- MOUTHON, General, at battle of Essling, v, 206.
- MOUTON, General, in command of French army in island of Loban (1809), iv, 391.
- MUCHEE BHOWUN, fort at Lucknow, v, 248.
- MUIR, his trial for political libels, iv, 325.
- MULGRAVE, Lord, Henry Phipps, (1775-1831), carries to Pitt news of capitulation of Ulm, iv, 371; his letter from Collingwood, 394.
- MUNQLUAR, battle of, v, 258.
- MUNRO, Sir HECTOR, English officer in India; his detachment destroyed by Hyder Ali, iv, 289.
- MUNSTER, Irish kingdom of, i, 172.
- MURAT, JOACHIM, lieutenant of Napoleon in Spain, iv, 383, 384; made king of Naples, 385; left in command of army in Russia, 397.
- MURRAY, Earl of, Lord James Stuart, defeats Catholics under Huntley, ii, 282; in favor of Darnley, in opposition to him, 284; his flight to England, ill received by Elizabeth, 285; presents himself at Holyrood, 286; declared regent, 293; Elizabeth refuses to recognise him, 294; before the English commission, 296; his return to Scotland, 297; proposes liberation of Mary, 301; refuses to surrender Northumberland, 304; assassinated, 305.
- , Major ADAM, his reply to Lord Strabanc, iii, 371, 372.
- , agent of Charles Edward in Scotland, iv, 157.
- , General, besieged by French in Minorca, iv, 266; reply to Crillon's offers; forced to surrender, 267.
- , Lord, son of Marquis of Athol, embraces cause of William III., iii, 376.
- , Lord GEORGE, brother of Duke of Athol, lieutenant-general of Charles Edward, iv, 159; plans expedition to Kelso, 166; maintained by the Prince in his offices, 166-167; skirmish with detachment of royal army at Clifton Moor, 169; unsuccessful attempt to surprise the English, 173; counsels Charles Edward to maintain the struggle, 176.

MUSGROVE, in command of Royalist insurgents, iii. 101.

MUSSULMANS, capture Jerusalem, i. 180; surrender Acre, 194; their assistance asked by John, 208; massacred at capture of Nazareth, Jerusalem taken by Mussulmans, i. 180.

MUTINY ACT, Fox's proposition in regard to, iv. 301.

MUTINY, (at Spithead, 1797), in squadron of Lord Bridport, iv. 335; at the Nore, 336.

MYSORE, kingdom of, founded by Hyder Ali, iv. 289.

N.

"NABOBS," class of Englishmen to whom the name was applied, iv. 281.

NAGHINOFF, Admiral in the Crimea, v. 193; in command on south side of Sevastopol, 196; his death, 227.

NAGPORE, annexed to British possessions by Lord Dalhousie, v. 241.

NAIRN, WILLIAM, Lord, accused of high treason, iv. 107; condemned and pardoned, 108.

NAMUR, surrenders to Louis XIV. iii. 400; besieged by William of Orange, iv. 15; captured, 16; taken by the French, 179.

NAMUR, Count of, ally of Edward III., i. 296; abandons him, 297.

NANA SAHIB, v. 250; claims pension from East India Company, 251; leader of Sepoy mutiny at Cawnpore, 252; offers safe conduct to the garrison, 252; his treachery, 254; assumes sovereignty of Poonah, 255; his massacre of English prisoners, 256-257; disappearance, 257.

NANCY, battle of, ii. 68.

NANTES, offers its government to Geoffrey Plantagenet the younger, i. 151; besieged by Edward III., i. 300; surrendered to the French, ii. 97.

—, Edict of, issued by Henry IV. of France, in favor of Huguenots, ii. 344; revoked by Louis XIV., iii. 323.

NAON, M. DE, Secretary of Mary Stuart, ii. 325.

NAPIER, Sir CHARLES, in command of English squadron in Egypt, v. 42; his inquiry in Parliament concerning affair in Tahiti, 106; campaign in Scinde, 151; becomes its first English governor, 152.

—, Sir ROBERT, leader of expedition to Abyssinia, v. 318; his capture of Magdala, 378, 379; made Baron Napier of Magdala, 379.

—, Sir WILLIAM, historian of the Peninsular War, v. 167.

NAPLES, Bourbon princes of, declare war against England, iv. 331; relinquished by France in peace of Amiens, 354; disturbed condition of, 416.

NAPLES, sovereigns of:—

PHILIP. See Spain, Philip II.

CHARLES, afterwards Charles III. of Spain, iv. 216.

FERDINAND IV., joins coalition against French Republic, 1799, iv. 343.

JOSEPH BONAPARTE, iv. 377.

MURAT, iv. 385.

NAPOLEON I., Emperor, his remains given up to France, v. 44; consequences of his policy toward Spain, 111; effect of his wars on rivalry of Prussia and Austria, 356, 357. See France, sovereigns of.

NARBONNE, Count of, killed at Verneuil, ii. 17.

NASEBY, battle of, iii. 61-63.

NASSAU, House of, loses power on death of Prince of Orange in 1650, iii. 153; hostility of Amsterdam to, 311; directs efforts of popular party in Holland, iv. 179.

—, MAURICE of, son of William the Silent, stadtholder of United Provinces, ii, 337; death, 411.

—, Prince of, in command of floating battery at siege of Gibraltar, ii. 273.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY of France, iv. 316.

NAVAILLES, Sire de, attempts to defend Duke of Burgundy, i. 400.

NAVARETTE, battle of, i. 332.

NAVARRÉ, kingdom of, joined to Spain, ii. 120; invaded by Francis I., 140.

—, Berengaria of. See Berengaria of Navarre.

—, Joan of. See Joan of Navarre.

—, Sovereigns of:—

CHARLES the Bad, escapes from prison, i. 327; gives up passage of Pyrenees, 322; at war with Charles V. of France; surrenders Cherbourg to the English, 341.

HENRY. See France: Henry IV.

JOHN D'ALBRET, refuses demands of Ferdinand of Aragon, ii. 120.

NAVIGATION ACT, the, iii. 154.

NAVY OF ENGLAND, founders of, ii. 339; destined to save England, 340.

NAYLOR, JOHN, condemned for blasphemy, iii. 177.

NAZARETH, dispute for possession of sanctuaries at, v. 171, 172.

NAZIR JUNG, Indian prince, iv. 203.

NECKER, JAMES, French comptroller-general of finance; negotiates loans in behalf of America, iv. 262.

NEERWINDEN, or Landen, battle of, iii. 402, 403.

NEGAPATAM, engagement of French and English fleets near, iv. 272.

NELSON, Lord (Horatio, 1758-1805), as commodore, contributes to victory off Cape St. Vincent, iv. 334; his account of the surrender, 335; his victory at Aboukir, 343; commands under Parker at Copenhagen; wins the battle, 353; pursues the French fleet, 370; his victory at Trafalgar, 371; death, national grief for him, his burial, 372.

NEMOURS, Duc de, Louis Philippe refuses the throne of Belgium for, v. 111; of Greece, 296.

- NERO, Roman emperor, invasion of Britain in time of, i. 20.
- NESSBIT MOOR, battle of, i. 367.
- NESSELRODE, Count, his memorandum on Eastern question, v. 175; reply to consuls of France and England, 181.
- NETHERBOW PORT, of Edinburgh, taken by Charles Edward, iv. 160.
- NEVERS, Count of, killed at battle of Agincourt, i. 392.
- NEVIL. See Warwick.
- , ANNE. See Anne Nevil.
- , ISABEL. See Isabel Nevil.
- , Lord, minister of Edward III., i. 337.
- NEVILLES, House of, ruined, ii. 65.
- NEVIL'S CROSS, battle of, i. 312.
- NEWBURNE, battle of, ii. 427.
- NEWBURY, battles of, iii. 39; 53, 54.
- NEWCASTLE, Charles I. at, iii. 74-78.
- , Duke of, Thomas Pelham (1693-1768), iv. 138; influence with the king, 153; opposes peace with France, 1748, 180; prime minister, 184; his incapacity, 190; reply to representations against Admiral Byng, goes out of office, 192; desire for influence, 193; member of privy council on accession of George III., Bute's opposition to, 215.
- , Duke of, Henry Pelham Clinton (1811-1864), minister of war in Aberdeen's cabinet, v. 185; letter to Lord Raglan in regard to Sevastopol, 186; resigns, 217; Colonial Secretary in Palmerston's second cabinet, 301; death, 348.
- , Earl of, supports cause of Charles I, iii. 17-34; victorious in Yorkshire, 38; shut up in York, 46, 47; defeated at Marston Moor, 48-50; retires to the continent, 50.
- "NEW CHAINS OF ENGLAND," pamphlet by Lilburne, iii. 125.
- NEW ENGLAND, its opposition to the Stamp Act, iv. 224.
- , joined with Virginia at head of national movement in America, 235.
- NEW FOREST, the, i. 123, 124.
- NEWFOUNDLAND, ceded to England at Peace of Utrecht, iv. 68; fisheries restored to original footing by Peace of Amiens, 354, 355.
- NEWMAN, Dr. his Romanizing tendencies, v. 137; joins Catholic church, 153, 159.
- NEW PLACE, Shakespeare's house at, ii. 181.
- NEW SOUTH WALES, transportation of criminals to, v. 288; protests against it, 289.
- NEWTON-BUTLER, battle of, iii. 372, 373.
- , Sir ISAAC (1642-1727), iv. 85.
- NEW ZEALAND, insurrection of Maories in, v. 340.
- NEY, Marshal, in Estremadura, iv. 390.
- NIAGARA, General Johnson's expedition against, 1759, iv. 199, 200.
- NICE, falls into the hands of Catinat, iii. 392; claimed by Victor Amadeus, iv. 60; annexed to France, v. 393.
- NICHOLSON, general in Indian army; his death at capture of Delhi, v. 264.
- NICOLAS, secretary of state to Charles II., iii. 251.
- NIEL, General, French engineer in the Crimea, v. 220, 223.
- NIENLAY, bridge of, Earl of Derby at, i. 314.
- NIGHTINGALE, FLORENCE, v. 215; takes charge of hospitals in Crimea, 216.
- NILE, battle of. See Aboukir, first battle of.
- NIMEGUEN, Congress of, iii. 274; peace signed at, 277.
- NING-PO, port of, opened to British traders, v. 46.
- NITHSDALE, Earl of, William, accused of high treason, iv. 107; condemned, his escape, 108.
- NOAILLES, Marshal (Adrien Maurice, Duc de), defeated at Dettingen, iv. 153.
- , M. de, French ambassador, ii. 247-253.
- NONCONFORMISTS, Charles II. inclined toward tolerance of, 258; in Scotland, see Covenanters; return to their parishes during the Plague, iii. 262; Declaration of Indulgence for them, 268; agree with English church in dreading inclination of James II. toward Catholicism, 305; unite with Anglican Church against Declaration of Indulgence, 335, 339, 340.
- NORE, the mutiny at, iv. 336.
- NORFOLK, Dowager Duchess of, great-aunt of Catherine Howard; placed in the Tower, ii. 199; condemned to imprisonment for life, 200.
- , Duke of, in reign of Richard II. i. 353; interview with Bolingbroke, 354; banishment and death, 355.
- , Duke of, as Lord Howard, ii. 77; fidelity to Richard III., 83; title restored to his son, Lord Surrey, 127.
- , Duke of, as Earl of Surrey, commander of army of Henry VIII. in Scotland, ii. 121; Henry's confidence in, 123; wins battle of Flodden, 124-126; title restored to him, 127; pronounces sentence of Buckingham, 137.
- , Duke of (1473-1553), son of the preceding, carries order of Henry VIII. to Wolsey, ii. 161; minister of the king after Wolsey's fall, 166; sent against insurgents, 187, 188; one of the chiefs of Catholic party, 197; abandons Catherine Howard, 199, 200; sent against Scotch, 204; is impeached, 213; his execution prevented by death of Henry VIII., 214; excepted from amnesty, 220; released by Queen Mary, presides over court which condemns Northumberland, 243; advances against Wyatt, 248; is compelled to retire, 249.
- , Duke of, Thomas (grandson of the preceding), his proposed marriage to Mary Stuart, ii. 297; Leicester's intrigue in favor of, 300, 301; sent to the Tower, 302; suspected of complicity with Mary Stuart, 310; his trial, 311; his execution, (1572), 312.
- , Duke of, grandson of Lord Arundel, iii. 285; refuses to accompany James II. to mass, 304; goes to Holland with William III., 389; imprisoned and released, iv. 125.
- , Duke of (1848), referred to in letter of M. Guizot, v. 28.
- NORFOLK ISLAND, transportation of criminals to, v. 288; frightful condition of, 289-290.

- NORHAM, BALIOL swears allegiance to Edward I. at, i. 250.
- NORMANBY, Lady, lady of the bed-chamber to Victoria, v. 20.
- , Lord, English minister at Paris, v. 144, 145.
- NORMANDY, its preparations for the Conquest, i. 95; enriched by spoils of England, 108; inherited by Robert Curthose, 118; taken possession of by William Rufus, 123; return of Curthose, 127; his weak government, 129; invaded by Henry I., becomes subject to England, 130; investiture promised to Cliton, 132; claimed by Empress Maud, 139; subjected by Geoffrey Plantagenet, 145; becomes possession of English crown under Henry II., 149; English princes do homage for, 164; designed by Henry II. for his eldest son, 174; invaded by Count of Flanders in behalf of Prince Henry, 176; Cœur-de-Lion does homage for, to Philip Augustus, 181; John (Lackland) proclaimed in, 203; invaded by Philip Augustus, 206; regained by France, 207; invaded by Edward III., 304; claimed by Henry V., 383; invaded, 394; under government of Henry V. 395; he promises to re-annex it to France, 401; expedition of Bedford into, ii. 28; authority of Bedford in, 29; regained by France, 40; claimed by Henry VIII., 119.
- , Duke of, opposed to Earl of Derby in Guienne, i. 304; recalled, 311.
- , Flower of, i. 69.
- , ROBERT of, see Robert of Normandy.
- , WILLIAM of. See William the Conqueror.
- NORMANS, swear allegiance to William the Conqueror, i. 84; a free people, 95; their independence of the French king, 99; land in England, 100; discipline of their army, 102, 103; defeat Saxons at Hastings, 104, 105; establish themselves in England, 107-119; rebel against the Conqueror, 112-13; their conquests in Italy, 114; established in Calabria and Sicily, 126; jealousy of Saxons, 127; their discontent under Henry I., 128; conquer Wales, 131; swear allegiance to Prince William of England, 132; their dominion finally established in England, 137; their animosity against Angevins, 139; join Bretons against John (Lackland), 206.
- NORRIS, Sir HENRY, quoted, 295.
- , Sir JOHN, chamberlain of Henry VIII., ii. 163.
- , Sir JOHN, his death in Ireland, ii. 348.
- NORTHAMPTON, Marquis of, formerly Earl of Essex, ii. 219; fails in attack upon insurgents under Ket, 227; member of council under Edward VI., 229; arrested for high treason, 243; minister of Elizabeth, 267.
- "NORTH BRITON," the, journal edited by Wilkes, iv. 222.
- NORTH, Lord, Frederick, (1733-1792), becomes prime minister 1770, iv. 229; his speech on tea-riot in Boston, 234; bills renouncing American taxation and appointing commissioners to treat for peace, 247; resigns, 247, 248; quoted, 252; hears of the surrender of Yorktown, 265; the surrender of Minorea a last blow to his ministry, 267; endeavors to persuade the king to make a change of ministry, 268; announces his resignation in Parliament, 269; unites with Fox in attack on treaty of Versailles; they form coalition cabinet, 1783; 281; change in government of India during first administration of, his hostility to Hastings, 287; resigns on defeat of Indian bill, 292, 298; his bill for Parliamentary reform, 304; as Lord Guildford, his death, 321.
- NORTH, Lord, imprisoned in the Tower for complicity in Jacobite plot, iv. 125.
- NORTHINGTON, Lord, letter from Charles Fox, iv. 293.
- NORTHUMBERLAND, Duke of, John Dudley (1502-1553), as Lord Lisle, made Earl of Warwick, ii. 219; at battle of Pinkie, 221; defeats insurgents under Ket, 227; secures fall of Somerset, 228; apparent reconciliation with him, 229; as Duke, causes re-arrest and execution of Somerset, 229, 230; aims to secure the succession to his own descendants, 230, 231; his anger at Edward's regulation of succession, 237; attempts to take possession of the Princess Mary, 238; his scheme to disturb the order of succession thwarted, 239; announces her accession to Lady Jane Grey, 240; marches against Mary, 241; proclaims Queen Mary, his arrest, 242; his efforts to save himself, 243; beheaded, 244.
- , Earl of, Henry Percy, joins Bolingbroke, i. 356; betrays Richard II. into his hands, 358; marches beside Bolingbroke in procession, 361; consults Parliament on disposal of Richard, 362; his discontent with Henry IV., 368; marching to join his son, hears of his death; swears fidelity to Henry, 370; at head of insurgents against Henry IV.; takes refuge in Berwick, flies to Edinburgh, i. 372; is defeated and killed at Brauham Heath, 1408, 374.
- , Earl of, Henry Percy, killed at St. Albans, 1455, ii. 45.
- , Earl of, son of the above, at battle of Wakefield, ii. 48; killed at Towton, 1460, 52.
- , Earl of, arrests Wolsey, ii. 163.
- , Earl of, revolts in favor of Mary Stuart, ii. 304; his execution, 312.
- , Earl of, favorite of James I., ii. 384.
- , Earl of, Algernon Percy, sides with Commons of Long Parliament, iii. 19; at head of Parliamentary committee to the king, 31; retires to his estates, 37.
- NORTHUMBRIA, formed by union of Bernicia and Deira, i. 32, 40; occupied by Danes, 51, 63, 64.
- NOTTINGHAM, Charles I., raises his standard at, iii. 25; outbreak on rejection of Reform Bill, 1831, iv. 438.
- , Countess of, grief of Elizabeth at her death, ii. 354, 355.
- , Earl of, revolts against Henry IV.; is taken prisoner and beheaded, i. 372.
- , Earl of (Daniel Finch), iii. 351; in favor of regency, 362; asks for modifica-

- tion of oaths of allegiance, 364; member of Privy Council, 368; secretary of state to William III.; unpopularity with the Whigs, 401-402; at head of Tories under Queen Anne; retires from council, 81; in ministry of George I., 93; dismissed for advocating indulgence to Jacobite prisoners, 108.
- NORWEGIANS, invade England, i. 97; are defeated by Harold, 99.
- NORWICH, Bishop of, defeats insurgents in reign of Richard II., i. 349; in Flanders, 350.
- , Lord, Royalist, his trial by High Court of Justice, iii. 122; pardoned, 123.
- NOYON, Bishop of, at execution of Joan of Arc, ii. 34.
- NUNCOMAR, rival of Reza Khan, his hatred for Hastings, iv. 285; charges against Hastings, 286; his execution, 287.
- O.
- OATES, TITUS, inventor of Popish Plot, his statements, iii. 278; receives vote of thanks from Parliament, 280; accuses Lord Stafford, 286; his punishment, 322.
- O'BRIEN, hanged for rescue of Fenian prisoners, v. 372.
- , SMITH, leader of agitation in Ireland; death, v. 127.
- OBSERVANTS, monks of the order of, reprimand Henry VIII., ii. 173.
- OCEANICA, offence given to England by the French in, v. 104-105.
- OCCASIONAL CONFORMITY Act, passed, 1711, iv. 81; repealed, 120.
- OCHILTREE, Lord, ii. 319.
- O'COIGLEY, Irish priest, engaged in insurrection of 1798; his death, iv. 340.
- O'CONNELL, DANIEL (1775-1847), his account of sufferings of lower classes in Ireland, iv. 418-419; efforts for Catholic emancipation, 420; elected to Parliament for county of Clare, 1828, 421; agitation for repeal of union of England and Ireland, 430; motion for repeal in Parliament, 446; promises the Whigs support of Irish Catholics in exchange for repeal, 453; speech to electors, 453-454; speech on the charter, v. 26; leads Irish agitation for repeal, 90-93; arrested; his trial and acquittal, 93; last speech; death, 95; interview with Guizot, 96.
- O'CONNOR, ARTHUR, leader of revolt in Ireland; his arrest, iv. 340.
- O'CONNOR, FERGUS, leader of the Chartists, v. 28.
- OCTARCHY, or Heptarchy, i. 33.
- ODIN, altar dedicated to by Redwald, i. 38.
- ODO, Archbishop. See Canterbury.
- , Bishop of Bayeux. See Bayeux.
- OGLETHORPE, Bishop of Carlisle, crowns Queen Elizabeth, ii. 268.
- OHIO valley, French forts established in, iv. 188; defeat of Braddock's expedition against them, 190.
- OKEY, colonel in Parliamentary army, iii. 218, 226.
- OLAF, king of Norway, invades England, is baptized, i. 69.
- , king of Northumbrian Danes, i. 63.
- OLDCASTLE, Sir JOHN, Lord Cobham, chief of the Lollards, in reign of Henry V., i. 381; abandoned by Henry and condemned to the stake; his escape and conspiracy, 382; his death, 383.
- OLDCORNE, arrested for complicity in Catesby's plot; his confession and death, ii. 391.
- OLIPHANT, Sir WILLIAM, surrenders Stirling Castle, i. 265.
- "OLIVE BRANCH," second petition of American Congress to George III., iv. 238.
- OLIVAREZ, Duke, minister of Philip IV. of Spain, ii. 407; his zeal for the marriage of the Infanta and Prince Charles, 408; differences between him and Buckingham, 409; his parting with the Duke, 410.
- OLOF, son of Hardrada, i. 99.
- OMAR PASHA, Turkish general in Crimean war, v. 179, 184, 187, 226.
- O'NEIL, Baron of Duncannon, ii. 348.
- , SHANE, at the head of insurrection in Ireland; assassinated, ii. 347.
- , OWEN ROE, leader of rebels in Ireland, iii. 130.
- ONSLow, Speaker of House of Commons, quoted, iv. 126, 128.
- OPORTO, English army under Wellesley lands at, iv. 385; captured by Marshal Soult, 389.
- ORANGE, Prince of, ambassador of Maximilian, ii. 97.
- , WILLIAM of (the Silent, 1533-1584), censured for toleration, ii. 255; at head of revolt of the Netherlands, 298; joined by English nobles, 303; his conduct of the war in the Netherlands, 316; offers the protectorate to Queen Elizabeth; to Duke of Anjou, 317; his assassination, 323; his influence on development of Holland, iv. 75.
- , Prince of (William II. of Holland), marries Henrietta Maria, daughter of Charles I., iii. 18; assists Henrietta Queen of England, 30; assists Charles II., 137; devotion to the Stuarts, 150; death, 153.
- , Prince of, William Henry. See William III. of England.
- , Prince of (William IV. of Holland), made stadtholder; at head of Dutch troops in 1747, iv. 180.
- , Prince of (William V. of Holland), dissensions with Republican party, iv. 265, 308-309; repulsed before Hondschoote, 326.
- , Princess of, wife of William II. See Henrietta Maria.
- , Princess of, sister of Frederick William II. of Prussia, iv. 308.
- OREGON. See note, v. 115.
- ORFORD, Earl of, Edward Russell. See Admiral Russell.
- , Earl of. See Walpole.
- ORKNEY ISLANDS, Montrose lands in, iii. 134.
- ORKNEY, Countess of (Elizabeth Villiers), favorite of William III., iv. 37.

- ORKNEY, Earl of, warns Lord Darnley, ii. 289.
- ORLEANS, besieged by Earl of Salisbury, ii. 21; the siege raised by Joan of Arc, 24, 25.
- ORLEANS, Bastard of. See Dunois.
- , Duke of (Louis), challenges Henry IV. of England, i. 369; assassinated (1407), 375.
- , Duke of (Charles, 1391-1465), marries Bonne of Armagnac, i. 375; reconciliation with Burgundy, 376; taken prisoner at Agincourt, 392; released, ii. 37.
- , Duke of (Philippe, 1674-1723), nephew of Louis XIV., defeated by Prince Eugene at Turin, 1706, iv. 53; capture of Lerida, 57; resigns his command, 59; English demand his renunciation of right to crown of Spain, 70-71; becomes regent at death of Louis XIV., 97, 98; refuses asylum to the Pretender, 106; inclined to alliance with England, 110; employs Dubois to negotiate Triple Alliance, 111; Cellamare's plot against; offers assistance to England against Jacobites, 116; death, 130.
- , Duke of (1810-1842), son of Louis Philippe, besieges Antwerp, iv. 449.
- , princes of, urge reparation in affair of the Trent, v. 328.
- ORLETON, ADAM, Bishop of Hereford, adviser of Queen Isabel, i. 235.
- ORMESBY, WILLIAM, chief justice of Scotland, i. 254.
- ORMOND, Duke of (James Butler, 1610-1688), commander-in-chief of Protestant army in Ireland, iii. 43; his measures on discovery of Charles I.; treaty with the Irish Papists, 70; publishes letter of the king, 75; the king's letter to him, 103; urges Charles II. to go to Ireland, 130; his successes in Ireland, 131; Cromwell's attempts to gain him, 132; left to support Charles II. in Ireland, 133; concerned in plot against Cromwell, 188; his opinion of Mazarin's policy, 213, 214; member of council of foreign affairs to Charles II., 251; refuses to accompany James II. to mass, 304; removed from his post in Ireland, 307; his respect for Parliament, 336.
- , Duke of (James Butler, 1665-1745), grandson of the preceding, accompanies William III. to Holland, iii. 389; succeeds Marlborough in command in the Low Countries, iv. 71; ordered not to engage in military operations, 72; undertakes to remodel the army, 87; his farewell to Earl of Oxford, 95; his escape; death in 1745, 95; engaged in insurrection of 1715, 97, 98, 99; becomes secretary of state to the Pretender, 106; in command of Spanish squadron sent against England, 117; concerned in Jacobite plot, 125.
- , Earl of, chief of the Butlers, ii. 202.
- , Earl of, rival of Desmond, ii. 347.
- ORSINI, Count, takes refuge in England, v. 280; his hopes of assistance for Italy, 281; attempt to assassinate Napoleon III., 282; put to death, 283.
- ORTHEZ, battle of, iv. 400.
- ORVES, Admiral d', his death at Cape of Good Hope, iv. 271.
- ORWELL, Edward III. embarks at, i. 296.
- OSBERGA, mother of Alfred the Great, i. 42.
- OSBORNE, Sir THOMAS, afterwards Lord Danby. See Caermarthen.
- OSSORY, Earl of, chief of the Butlers, ii. 202.
- , Lord, imprisoned in the Tower for complicity in Jacobite plot, iv. 125.
- OSTEND COMPANY, founded by Emperor Charles VI., iv. 132; privileges suspended by treaty of Paris, 134.
- OSTORIUS SCAPULA, Roman general in Britain, i. 18, 19.
- OSWALD, negotiates for peace with America, 1782, iv. 274; his interview with John Adams, 277.
- OTHO, king of Greece, v. 296, 297.
- , of Saxony, nephew of Cœur-de-Lion, i. 195.
- OTTEBRURN, battle of. See Chevy Chase.
- OTTOMAN EMPIRE. See Turkey.
- OTWAY, THOMAS, English dramatist, iii. 301.
- OUBRIL, M. d', Russian agent in Paris, iv. 378.
- OUDE, nabob vizier of, his war with the Rohillas, iv. 286; princesses of, cruelty of Hastings to, 290; annexed to British possessions in India, v. 241; its discontent under English rule, 242.
- OUENARDE, battle of, iv. 59.
- OUTRAM, Sir JAMES (1803-1863), as Major Outram, English resident at Hyderabad, v. 151; successful campaign in Persia, 239; joins Havelock with reinforcements; his generosity, 258; at battle of the Alumbagh, 262; decides to remain at Lucknow, 263; left in command at the Alumbagh, 267, 268; at storming of Lucknow, 269; protests against Canning's measures in regard to Oudh, 273.
- OVERBURY, Sir THOMAS, friend of Rochester, ii. 394; murder of, 397.
- “OVEREND and GURNEY,” banking-house of, v. 363.
- OVERTON, imprisoned for conspiracy against Cromwell, iii. 172.
- OWEN, Dr. chaplain of Cromwell, iii. 183.
- , Sir JOHN, adherent of Charles I., his trial by High Court of Justice, iii. 122; pardoned, 123.
- , RICHARD, v. 161.
- OXENSTIERN, Chancellor (1583-1654), signs treaty with England, iii. 169; words to his son, note, v. 124.
- OXFORD, Empress Maud takes refuge in; besieged by Stephen, i. 146; Charles I. establishes headquarters at, after battle of Edgehill, iii. 28, 29, 30; besieged by Parliamentarians, 47; Charles receives Parliamentary commission at, 54, 55; besieged by Fairfax, 60; Parliament of 1681, convened at, 286.
- , Earl of, wins battle of Stoke, ii. 94; defeats insurrection under Lord Audley, 106.
- , Earl of, reprimanded for heresy under Queen Mary, ii. 263.
- , Earl of, as Robert Harley, proposes reduction of the army, iv. 27; speaker of House of Commons (1701), 45; becomes

- Earl; chancellor of the exchequer under Queen Anne, iv. 67; secret negotiations with France, 67, 58; excuses conduct of Ormond, 72; success in bringing about peace, 73; indolence, 76; replaces Nottingham in council of Queen Anne, 81; member of the Junta, 82; chancellor of exchequer, 83, 84; rivalry with Bolingbroke, 84; inclined to alliance with Marlborough, 85; quarrels with Lady Masham, 87; resigns office, 88; impeachment, sent to the Tower, 95; his farewell to Ormond, 95, 96; projector of South Sea Company, 122.
- OXFORD, university of, Wycliffe at, i. 342; colleges founded at, ii. 363, protected by Cromwell, iii. 173; Wesley and Whitfield students at, iv. 185; its Romanizing tendencies, v. 137, 158; ceases to support Gladstone for Parliament, 351; religious test suppressed, 407.
- , attempts to assassinate Queen Victoria, v. 53.
- P.
- PACCA, Cardinal, iv. 392.
- PACE, secretary of Cardinal Wolsey, ii. 141, 142.
- PACIFICO, Don, his claims against Greek government, v. 131, 132.
- PACK, Alderman, proposes re-establishment of monarchy under Cromwell, iii. 178.
- PADUA, university of, declares in favor of divorce of Henry VIII. from Catharine of Aragon, i. 167.
- PAGEAT, M., French ambassador to England, v. 112.
- PAGET, Sir WILLIAM or Sir JOHN, secretary of state to Edward VI., ii. 219, 220.
- PAINE, THOMAS, elected to French National Convention, iv. 324.
- PAINS and PENALTIES, Bill of, iv. 407; withdrawn, 409.
- PALAFOX, Spanish general, commanding in Aragon, iv. 386; his defence of Saragossa, 388.
- PALATINATE, the, attacked by Catholic armies, ii. 403; alliance formed between France, and England and Holland to retake, 411; ravaged by army of Louis XIV., iv. 58.
- PALATINE, Elector. See Frederick.
- , Prince, accompanies Charles I. into Parliament, iii. 15.
- PALERMO, Spanish take possession of, blockaded by English, iv. 115.
- PALGRAVE, Sir FRANCIS, his researches, v. 162.
- PALM, his condemnation by French court-martial, his execution, iv. 378.
- PALMER, Mr., his protest in Parliament, ii. 444.
- , Sir THOMAS, executed, ii. 244.
- , his trial for political libels, iv. 325.
- PALMERSTON, Lord (1784-1865), member of Perceval's cabinet (1809), iv. 393; in Lord Grey's cabinet, 429; minister of foreign affairs, 1832, 449; his policy on the Eastern question, v. 35, 36; concludes convention of 15th July, 1840, 36; miscalculates its effect on France, 37; Melbourne's criticism on his policy, 38; his policy justified by events, 42; opinion on the opium question, 45; resigns, 57; accuses Peel of abandoning his party, 57; succeeds Lord Aberdeen as foreign secretary, 115; policy concerning Spanish affairs, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124; in affair of Don Pacifico, 131, 132; in domestic affairs, 141; the queen's dissatisfaction with him, 142, 143; his explanation, 143; attitude toward Louis Napoleon, 144; dismissed from foreign office, 145; his retaliation on Russell, 146; becomes home secretary under Lord Aberdeen, 147, 172; prime minister, 217; his speech in Parliament on prolongation of the war, 233; on the electors of Tiverton, 238, 239; proposition in regard to India, 276; introduces Conspiracy to Murder Bill, 285; resigns on its rejection, 286; becomes prime minister on resignation of Lord Derby, 300; interposes to prevent conflict between the Houses on repeal of paper duty, 305; his indifference to Liberal Reform Bill, 306; letter to Sir Henry Bulwer in regard to French army in Syria, 315, 316; his enmity to the United States, 328, 329; his attitude in regard to the Alabama question, 333; yields to national distrust of Napoleon III., 339; not in favor of intervention in behalf of Poland, 343; his reference to Denmark in House of Commons, 345, 346; his opinion as to intervention in the Schleswig-Holstein difficulty, 346; last victory in the House of Commons, 348; his death, 349; character, 350; change in England's position in Europe after his death, 359; his views of tenant-right, 388.
- PALRIC, earl of Northumbria, i. 70.
- PAMPALUNA, captured by Ferdinand of Aragon, ii. 120; by allied armies (1813), iv. 398.
- PANDULPH, legate of Innocent III., meets John Lackland at Dover, i. 209; receives homage of John, 210.
- PANMURE, Lord (Mr. Fox Maule), secretary of war in Palmerston's cabinet, v. 217.
- PAPAL STATES, Napoleon declares his desire for integrity of, v. 303.
- PAPISTS. See Roman Catholics.
- PARIS, riots of Maillotins at, i. 327, 328; massacre of Armagnacs at, 396; entered by Henry V., 404; massacre of St. Bartholomew at, 313, 314; September massacres in, 1792, iv. 322; revolution of 18th Brumaire, 1800, 344; Napoleon crowned at, 1804, 364; peace of (1727), iv. 134; (1763), iv. 220, 221; (1815), iv. 403; treaty of (1856), v. 234; peace congress at, v. 233; Congress of, decisions in respect to neutrals, ratified by affair of the Trent, 335.
- , Comte de, opinion as to probable effect of secession on the Southern States, v. 318, 319.
- PARKER, Admiral HYDE, his engagement with Dutch; resigns, iv. 266; in command of Baltic expedition; gives signal to cease action at Copenhagen, 353.

- PARKER, Major, his reply to Cromwell, iii. 187.
- , MATTHEW. See Archbishops of Canterbury.
- , RICHARD, leader of mutineers at the Nore, iv. 335; hanged, 337.
- , SAMUEL, Bishop of Oxford, Catholic at heart, iii. 330.
- PARKINS, Sir WILLIAM, cognizant of Barclay's plot, iv. 18.
- PARLIAMENT, under Henry III., i. 224, 228, 231, 232, 233, 239, convened by Simon of Montfort, 235.
- , under Edward I., i. 248, 352; convoked by Prince Edward, declares that taxes shall not be raised without consent of the people, 257; requires ratification of its demands, 262, 263; first divided into Lords and Commons, 271.
- , under Edward II., i. 274, 281; deposes him, 285.
- , under Edward III., i. 238, 292, 297, 298, 328, 334; the Good Parliament, 337; favorable to John of Gaunt, 338.
- , under Richard II., i. 340, 341; disapproves of concessions to insurgents under Wat Tyler, 349; devoted to Duke of Gloucester, 350; subservient to the king, 353, 355; convoked by Bolingbroke, deposes Richard, 359; acknowledges Bolingbroke as king, 360.
- , under Henry IV., i. 361, 362, 366, 368, 371; privileges of Commons confirmed, 378.
- , under Henry V., i. 381, 382, 385; good understanding with the king, 393.
- , in reign of Henry VI., ii. 14, 39, 40, 41; proposes to declare Richard of York heir to the throne, 43; nominates him Protector, 44, 45; convoked by Queen Margaret, 46; consults the king as to York's claim to the crown, 47; its decision, 48; recognizes Edward IV., 50, 51.
- , in reign of Edward IV., ii. 53; impeachment of Clarence, 69.
- , in reign of Richard III., ii. 70.
- , in reign of Henry VII., ii. 85; removal of disqualifications from members, 86; fixes accession of Henry on day before battle of Bosworth, 87; settles succession to the crown in family of Henry, 88; proclaims amnesty, 89; grants subsidies, 95, 96, 97, 99, 105, 113; its authority lowered by Henry, 116.
- , in reign of Henry VIII., ii. 119; convoked of necessity, 145; grants only half of subsidies demanded, 146; rejects indictment of Wolsey, 163; convoked to consider the king's divorce, 169; votes Statute of Appeals, withdraws title of queen from Catharine of Aragon, 171; recognizes Henry as Head of the Church, 173; assigns to him certain privileges formerly of the Pope, 175; condemns monasteries of small importance, 179, 180; authorizes Henry to dispose of the crown, 186; votes destruction of the great abbeys, 190; grants subsidies, 192; religious edict submitted to, 195; Cromwell attainted, 197; Catharine Howard condemned, 200; members from Wales admitted, 202; reinstates Princesses Elizabeth and Mary in their civil rights, 208; Henry's last discourse, 211; votes bill of attainder against Norfolk, 214; servility, 215, 216.
- PARLIAMENT, in reign of Edward VI., ii. 218, 219; votes bill of attainder against Seymour, 224; severe laws against vagrancy, 225; places at disposal of the king the property of religious communities, 233.
- , in reign of Mary, revokes Protestant acts, ii. 245; address to Mary concerning her marriage, 247; repeals act of supremacy, 253; required to authorize the restoration of the Annates to Rome, 257, 258; votes subsidies for war against France, 262.
- , in reign of Elizabeth, ii. 266; re-establishes Act of Supremacy, 269; requests the queen to marry, 270, 282; anxiety concerning succession, 282, 288; controversy of Puritan members with the queen, 307, 308; resistance to Thirty-nine Articles, 309; petitions for execution of Norfolk, 312; excludes Mary Stuart from succession, 313; votes measures against Catholics, 322; law condemning Mary Stuart by anticipation, 325, 326; efforts to assume responsibility of her death, 329; protests against monopolies, 354; its laws in respect to trade, 360.
- , in reign of James I., in opposition to him; its rigor against Catholics; dissolved, ii. 386; Catesby's plot against, 387-390; rejects James' plot for uniting England and Scotland, 392; convoked after two years, again opposes the royal prerogative, 392, 393; refuses to grant subsidies; is dissolved in consequence, 396; demands prosecution of monopolists, 403; convoked on failure of Spanish alliance; its severe measures against Catholics, 410.
- , in reign of Charles I., assemblies on his accession; dissolved for opposition to the king, ii. 413; convoked a second time, attempts to impeach Buckingham; is dissolved, 414; presents Petition of Right, 415; continued opposition to the king, 416, 417; is again dissolved, 417.
- , the Short, convoked, 1640, its character, ii. 426; dissolved, 427.
- , the Long, convoked 1640, ii. 428; its first proceedings, 429; its impeachment of Strafford, 430; its measures of reform, 430, 431; proceedings against Strafford, 432-435; increasing power of, 438; sends committee to Scotland, 439; intrusted by the king with suppression of Irish insurrection, 442; draws up remonstrance to the king, 442, 443; division of parties in, 443; debate on the remonstrance, 443, 444; passes militia-bill and bill for excluding clergy from civil offices, 445; bill for exclusion of bishops from House of Lords, 446; resolves to impeach them, 447; refuses to surrender the five members, iii. 14, 15; establishes committee in communication with the five members, 16; restoration of the five members to, 17; adopts measures of defence against the king, 17,

18; struggle between the Houses, triumph of the Commons, 19, 20; concessions of the king to, 20, 21; its measures against royalists, approves act of Hotham, 22; sends committee to supervise the king at York, 23; sends nineteen propositions of reconciliation to the king, 24; decides on civil war, 25; sends last petition to the king, 26; takes measures for defence of London, 27; its army fights battle of Edgehill, 27, 28; urges London apprentices to enlist, 29; dissensions in, and their effect on conduct of the war, 29, 30; counties around London devoted to, 30; sends committee to treat with the king, 31; declared illegal by the king, 35; division between the Houses in regard to peace, 36; triumph of popular party, 37; ascendancy of Presbyterians in, 40, 41; withdrawal of the Lords, 41; muster of the Houses, 44; their reply to the king, 46; energetic war-measures, 47; fidelity of Essex to, 51, 52; confidence of, in Essex, 53; appoints commissioners to treat with the king, 54, 55; the Houses disagree on Self-denying Ordinance, 56, 57; unsuccessful negotiations with the king, 57, 58; passes second "Self-denying Ordinance," 59; surrenders its authority to the army, 60; publishes secret correspondence of the king, 64; ascendancy of the war-party in, 69; discovery of the king's treaty with Irish Catholics, 70; presents humiliating conditions to the king, 76; negotiates with the Scots to gain possession of him, 77; Presbyterians regain their influence in, 78, 79; its difficulties with the army, 79, 80; accusations against Cromwell, 84; concessions to the army, 85; forced to vote return of the king by the people of London, 87; Independent members retire to the army, 88, 89; restoration of Independents by the army, 89, 90; becomes entirely subservient to the army, 90; passes vote of thanks to Fairfax and Cromwell, 97; sends proposals to Charles, 98; votes continuance of the monarchy, 100; concludes treaty with the king, 102; passes vote of reconciliation with him, 104; exclusion of Presbyterian members by Colonel Pride, 104, 105; votes impeachment of the king, 106; orders preparations for his trial, 107; the king's proposition for conference with, 112; abolishes monarchy and house of Lords, 120; establishes the Commonwealth, 121; attempts to suppress the Ekon Basilike, 124; agitation of Lilburne and his followers against, 125-128; measures of, against suspected persons, 129; appoints Cromwell to command expedition against Ireland, 130; confers powers on Council of State to repel Scotch invasion, 137; severity of, toward royalist prisoners, 146, 147; attitude of Europe toward, 149; indifference of, to European opinion, 150, 151; passes Navigation Act, 154; receives embassy from the Hague, 155; declares war on Holland, 156; short-sighted policy of, 158; measures after battle of Worcester, 158, 159; Cromwell's designs against, 159; Dissolution Bill introduced by Republicans, 161, 162; dissolved by Cromwell (1653), 162, 163; restored on downfall of the protectorate (1659), 206; Republican ascendancy in, 207; negotiates for retirement of Richard Cromwell, 208; supported by General Monk, 209; on good terms with the army, 210; informed of royalist conspiracy, 212; adopts measures against insurgents, 213; renewal of its struggle with the army, 214-217; dissolved, 217; Monk declares in favor of, 220; re-established, 226; dissensions in, 228; dissatisfaction with Monk, 230; London revolts against, 231, 234; Presbyterian members reinstated by Monk, 235; reactionary measures of, 236, 237; finally dissolved (1660), 238.

PARLIAMENT, under Oliver Cromwell (1654), 169; ascendancy of Republicans in, 170; dissolved, 171; convoked, 1656, 174; Republicans not admitted, 175; submissive to Cromwell, 175, 176; Cromwell's designs against, 177; offers title of king to Cromwell, 1637, 178, 179; confers with him on the subject, 180-184; votes "Humble Petition and Advice," 184; Upper House created by Cromwell, 185; dissolved, 186.

—, under Richard Cromwell (1659), debate on recognition of Richard, 199, 200; passes bill for his recognition, 200; its struggle with the army, 201-204; dissolved, 204, 205.

— of 1660, Royalist majority in, iii. 243; letters of Charles II. to, 244, 245; votes subsidy, 245; proclaims Charles II., 246; debate in, on the Amnesty, 247; adopts severe measures against Republican leaders, 253; dissolved, 255, 256.

—, in reign of Charles II., Royalist majority in, places military power in hands of the king, 256; passes Act of Uniformity (1662), 257; severe measures of, against Republicans, 258, 259; convened at Oxford during the plague, 262; impeaches Lord Clarendon, 264; opposition in, to the Cabal, 267; passes Test Act (1673), prorogued, insists on peace with Holland, 271; division of parties in, into court and country parties, 273; attempted dissolution of, 275; requires account of expenditure, 276; nicknamed "the pensioned," dissolved (1678); convoked (1679), 277; passes vote of thanks to Titus Oates, division of parties in, 280; passes Habeas Corpus Act, is dissolved, 281; debate in, on Exclusion Bill (1680), defeat of the bill, 285; dissolved on renewed attempt in favor of Exclusion Bill, 286; convened at Oxford (1681), 286; dissolved for passing Exclusion Bill, 287.

—, in reign of James II., overwhelming Tory majority (1685), iii. 303; publishes declarations against Monmouth, 315; opposition to the king, 325, 326; prorogued, 323; meeting postponed by James II. (1687), 329; opposition to Declaration of Indulgence, 334; convoked for the last time by James II., 353.

—, in reign of William III., convoked by William III. (1689), Convention Parliament, iii. 260; debate as to vacancy of the throne, 362-364; recognizes William and Mary, 364; formally offers the crown, 365; dissolved, 369: in 1690, sustains government of William and Mary, 379; discussion of Abjuration Bill, 380; prorogued, 381; grants liberal supplies, 389: in 1691, King William's opening speech, 392; Jacobite intrigues in, 393: in 1692, the king embarrassed by his action in regard to the war, 401, 403: in 1693, opposes augmentation of army, 403; Whigs regain ascendancy, 403, 404; measures of reform, 404: in 1694, the king assents to Triennial Bill, 407; brings charges of corruption against distinguished Tories, iv. 14; dissolved, 16: in 1695, convoked, iv. 16; opposes the king's grant to Duke of Portland, 17; measures on discovery of Barclay's plot, 20, 21: in 1698, insists upon reduction of the army, 27; William's address to, on disbanding of the army, 30, 31; opposition to William's disposal of forfeited estates in Ireland, 36, 37; prorogued, 38: in 1701, fixes succession to the throne in the Protestant line, charges against Whig leaders, 39; enthusiastic support of war with Louis XIV., 40; dissolved, reassembles, Harley chosen speaker, 44: in 1702, opening address of the king, 44-46; receives last message of the king, 46.

PARLIAMENT, in reign of Anne, peace of Utrecht, attacked in, accusations preferred against Marlborough, iv. 71; votes addresses in favor of peace, 73; opposition in, to peace of Rastadt, dissolved, 76; votes Union of Scotland and England, sits for the first time as Parliament of Great Britain (1707), 79; Occasional Conformity Bill presented, not passed until 1711, 81; dissolved, 83; accusations preferred in, against Marlborough (1713), 84; passes the Schism Bill, 86; attachment of the majority in, to Protestant succession, 86; takes measures against Jacobites, 87.

—, in reign of George I. (1714), offers reward for arrest of Pretender, iv. 93; Whig majority in, passes vote of censure on Peace of Utrecht, 94; impeachment of Bolingbroke and Oxford, 95: in 1715-1716, severe measures against Jacobites, 107, 108: in 1716, passes Septennial Bill, 109; repeals clause of Establishment Act forbidding British sovereigns to leave the country, 110: in 1717, act establishing transportation of criminals, v. 290: in 1718, repeals Schism Act and Act of Occasional Conformity, 120; bill for limiting number of peers defeated, 121: in 1719, grants monopoly to South Sea Company, 122; debate on South Sea Company, 123, 124: in 1722-1723, trial of Atterbury, 125-128: in 1725, grants amnesty to Bolingbroke, 129: in 1727, opening speech of the king, 133, 134.

—, in reign of George II. (1729-1730), debate on execution of Treaty of Utrecht, iv. 140, 141: in 1734, on repeal of Septennial Bill, 142-146: in 1738-1739, opposition Walpole, 147, 148: in 1741, opposition to Granville's ministry in, 151: in 1743, dissatisfaction with Treaty of Worms, 153: in 1746, trial of Jacobite leaders, 178: in 1755, requested by the ministry to send troops to America, 188: in 1757, demands Pitt as prime minister, 193; votes subsidy for the support of the war, 196: in 1759, decrees tomb to Wolfe, 201; votes enormous subsidies, 211.

PARLIAMENT, in reign of George III, speech of the king on prorogation (1763), iv. 222; Wilkes elected to, 223; Chatham's speech against Stamp Act (1765), 225, 226; repeals Stamp Act, 227; motion for inquiry into government of India, 228; passes Boston Port Bill, 234; debates on North's American policy, 235; opening speech of the king (1775), 239; passes Prohibitory Bill (1775), opening speech of the king (1776), 241; speeches of Chatham during debate on American war, 244, 245, 246; passes bills on American taxation, and for appointing commissioners to treat for peace, 247; Chatham's last speech in, 248, 249; passes law in favor of Catholics (1779), 254; Burke's attack on Lord North (1782), 267, 268; North announces resignation of his ministry, 269; the king's announcement of American independence, 280; introduction of Fox's Indian Bill (1783), 281; attack on Clive (1770), 283; acquittal of Clive, 284; passage of bill for reorganization of government of India (1773), 286; ministry defeated on Fox's Indian Bill, 292; impeachment of Hastings (1788), 292, 293; Fox's Indian Bill, further account of its introduction, 295; its passage in the Commons, 296; rejection by the Lords, 297; debate upon it, 297, 298; debate on motion of Pepper Arden, 298; contest between Fox and Pitt, 302; Pitt's ascendancy in (1784), passage of his financial measures, 303; inquiry into Westminister election, 304; passes Pitt's bill for sinking fund, 305; accepts treaty of commerce with France, 306; pays debts of Prince of Wales, 307; passes Regency Bill, 313; Pitt's ascendancy (1790), 315; presentation of bill for abolition of slave-trade (1792), 320; suspends Habeas Corpus Act (1794), 325; bills for suppression of sedition (1795), 329; Pitt presents plans for national defence (1796), his loan, 332; bills for suppression of mutiny (1797), 337; passes bill for union of England and Ireland (1799), 342; debate on peace with France (1800), 344, 345; message of the king announcing French preparations for war, 357; reception of Pitt on his reappearance, 359; rejects vote of censure on Addington's ministry, 360; debate on war with Spain (1804), 365; vote of censure of the Commons against Lord Melville, 367; his trial by the Lords, his acquittal, 368; bill forbidding slave-trade (1806), 379; debate on Catholic emancipation, 380, 381; Tory ascendancy in (1807), 381; Whigs attack conduct of Peninsular war (1809), 388; suspends Habeas Corpus Act (1817), 405.

—, in reign of George IV., Bill of Pains and Penalties against Queen Caroline, (1820), iv. 407-408; trial of the queen, 408-409; withdrawal of the bill, 409; Canning's Roman Catholic Relief Bill introduced (1822), 412; passed by Commons, 414; rejected by the Lords; rejection of Russell's first Reform Bill, 415; Test Act repealed (1823), 419; Peel's Catholic Emancipation bill introduced (1829), 422; passed, 424.

PARLIAMENT, in reign of William IV., Lord Grey's advocacy of parliamentary reform (1830), iv. 423; Wellington's reply, 423; introduction of Grey's Reform Bill (1831), 430; debate on the bill, 432-434; is dissolved; re-assembles; Grey's Reform Bill passed by Commons, 437; debate in the Lords, 437-438; rejection of the bill; introduction of Lord Russell's Reform Bill, 433; Russell's Reform Bill passed by Commons (1832), 438; amendment voted by the Lords, 439; address of Commons to the king, 440; final passage of the bill, 441; (Reformed Parliament) measures for repression of agitation in Ireland (1833), 442-443; questions arising for discussion, 445; abolition of slavery in the West Indies (1834), 445-446; rejection of the bill for repeal of union with Ireland, 446; passage of Irish Church Bill, 451.

—, in reign of Victoria, suspends constitution of Lower Canada, v. 18; attack on Lord Durham by the opposition, 19; pronounces against the Jamaica Bill, 20; supports Rowland Hill's reform in postage rates, 24; passes law for punishment of assassins, 33; assembles in 1841; Tory majority in, 60; addresses congratulations to the queen on birth of Prince of Wales, 63; adherence of, to Peel, 65; debate on revision of the tariff, 65-63; on the Corn-Laws, 75-79; Peel's bill for abolition of the Corn-Laws, 80-82; debate on the bill, 82-84; passed by the Commons, 84; by the Lords, 86; passes bill for extension of Maynooth College, 91; O'Connell's last speech in, 95; adopts measures for relief of Ireland, 97-98; Chartist petition presented to (1849), 123; dealings with Irish agitators, 127; debate on Irish question, 128-131; Palmerston's foreign policy sustained by the Commons, 132; passes Ecclesiastical Titles bill (1851), 133; dissolved, 147; passes laws for alleviation of the working classes, 154; measures for civil emancipation of the Jews, 157; moves inquiry into condition of Crimean army (1854), 217; Palmerston's speech in, on prolongation of the war (1856), 233; censures conduct of Bowring in China, 1857; dissolved, 238; result of a re-election, 239; debate on government of East Company, 274, 275, 276; passes bill establishing authority of the crown in India, 277, 278; rejects Palmerston's Conspiracy Bill, 286; establishes Court of Divorce, 287; abolishes transportation of criminals (1857), 290; abolishes Scotch marriages, 291; removes Jewish disabilities, 292; removes landed-property qualifications for members, 292, 293; introduction of Disraeli's Reform Bill (1859), 298; dissolution and re-election; Lord Hartington proposes vote of want of confidence, 299; opposition to Mr. Gladstone's bill for repeal of the paper duty (1860), 305; discussion on Liberal Reform Bill, 306; Roebuck's motion for recognition of the Southern Confederacy in America (1863), 338; resolution censuring the government for course in regard to Schleswig-Holstein difficulty (1864), 347-348; Liberal Reform Bill presented (1866), 361, 362; passes Reform Bill of 1867, 367-368; measures adopted for re-organization of Canada, 375; reforms in interior legislation, 376; Mr. Gladstone's resolution in, for disestablishment of Irish Church, 382; return of Liberal majority, 383; Irish Church Bill passed (1870), 385; Mr. Forster's Education Bill presented; also Irish Land Bill (1870), 389; Education Bill passed, 402; bill for reconstruction of the army, passed by the Commons (1871), 403; opposed by the Lords, 404; Ballot Bill passed (1872), 405; inquiry into Crown revenues, 405-406; Irish University Bill introduced (1873), 407; defeated, 408; dissolution of (1874), 409.

PARLIAMENT, Scottish, consulted by Edward I., on succession to the throne, i. 250; removes English from the court, 252; convened by Edward I., 354, 365; in treaty with Edward III. for ransom of David Bruce, 325; opposes selection of Lionel, son of Edward III., as heir to the throne, 327; refuses to dismiss Albany from power, ii. 145; adopts Calvinist confession of faith, 277; passes bill for establishment of English Church, 398; convoked by Charles I.; its pretensions, 425; the king's concessions to, 439; orders inquiring concerning Hamilton and Argyle, 440; consents to surrender Charles I. to the English, iii. 77; votes raising of army in his behalf, 100; re-opens negotiations with Charles II., 133; condemns Montrose, 136; concludes treaty with Charles II., 137; institutes oath of passive obedience, 299; submission to James II., 305; decree against covenanters, 306; convoked by James II., 332; admits royal power of dispensation, 339; recognizes William and Mary, 374; passes Act of Union, iv. 79.

— of Ireland, its subserviency to Stratford, ii. 419, 427; demands independence of Ireland, iii. 370; anxious for legislative independence, iv. 305; opposed to union with England, 341.

—, "Barebones," iii. 164-165; abdicates, 166.

—, Ecclesiastical, i. 273.

—, the Good, i. 337.

— of the king, convoked at Oxford, iii. 44; negotiations with Essex, 45; adjourns, 46.

—, the Lack-learning, i. 371.

—, the Mad, i. 232.

— of Paris, i. 401.

—, Houses of, Catesby's plan for destroying, ii. 338.

- PARLIAMENTARIANS, in the ascendent in most important sections, iii. 30.
- PARMA, city of, captured, ii. 141.
- , duchy of, succession to, assured to children of Queen of Spain by Quadruple All. ancc, iv. 114; claims of Don Carlos of Spain to, 132.
- , Duke of, Alexander Farnese, general of Philip II., ii. 317; supports Babington's conspiracy, 334; negotiates with Elizabeth, 337; reputation of his army, 340; unable to join Armada, 341; does not make descent on England, 342; enters France, 344.
- , Louisa of. See Louisa of Parma.
- PARR, Lady Catherine, sixth wife of Henry VIII., ii. 208; discusses theology with the king, 211; diverts his suspicions, 212; marries Lord Seymour; her death, 223.
- PARRY, Welsh member of Parliament, executed, ii. 322.
- PARTITION TREATY, the first, signed at Loo (1098), iv. 27; the second, signed at London and the Hague (1700), 33, 34; Louis XIV's breach of, 35.
- PATAY, battle of, ii. 26.
- "PATRIOTS," the name taken by the Whigs in opposition to Walpole, iv. 140.
- PAUL, Emperor of Russia. See Russia.
- III., IV., and V. See Popes.
- PAULINUS, missionary bishop in Britain, i. 38, 39.
- PAULINUS SUTTONIUS, prætor in Britain, i. 20.
- PAULOFF, General, v. 209; his junction with Soimonoff at Inkerman, 210.
- PAULTON, Mr., speech against the Corn-Law, v. 69-70; his tour through manufacturing districts, 70.
- PAVIA, battle of, ii. 149.
- PAVILLY, Maître, doctor of the Sorbonne, i. 397.
- PAW, ADRIAN DE, Dutch envoy to England, iii. 156.
- PAWLET, Sir AMYAS, custodian of Mary Stuart, ii. 325; his want of respect to her, 331; refuses to assume the responsibility of her death, 333.
- PAXTON, head-gardener of Duke of Devonshire, his design for the Crystal Palace, v. 139.
- PECHEL, Dr. JOHN, vice-chancellor of Cambridge University, iii. 336.
- PECQUIGNY, Edward IV. and Louis XI. meet at, ii. 66; treaty of, 67.
- PEEL, Sir ROBERT, becomes home secretary in cabinet of Lord Liverpool, 1822, iv. 412; opposes Canning's Roman Catholic Relief Bill, 414; introduces Catholic Emancipation Bill (1829), 422; speech in support of the bill, 422, 423; speech after its passage, 424; resigns, 429; his opposition to Reform Bill of 1831, 432-434; refuses to join Wellington's cabinet, 440; speech in support of government, 444; in Italy; accepts office of prime minister, 451; letter to his constituents, 452, 453; speech in Parliament on defeat in election of speaker, 452, 453; defeated on Irish Church question, 454; his resignation, 454, 455; speech in Glasgow, 456, 457; swears allegiance to Victoria, v. 15; Wellington's criticism of, 17; his attempt to form a ministry, 20; demands opposed by the queen, 20, 21; refuses to construct a Cabinet, 21; his speech on the queen's marriage, 28; remarks on the Eastern question, 38, 39; justifies Palmerston's policy, 42; his attack on the Whigs, 57; explanation of his policy, 58-59; becomes prime minister; his Cabinet, 60; position on accession to power, 61; retort to the Whigs, 62, 63; re-establishment of income tax, 64; speech in regard to it, 64, 65; speech on the tariff, 66; plan for reduction of duties on corn, 67; reply to Palmerston, 67, 68; attachment of his party to him, 68, 69; his attitude with regard to Corn-Laws, 74, 75; general accusations against him, 74; Disraeli's attack on, 76, 77; Bright's appeal to, 77, 78; his speech during debate on Corn-Laws, 79; resigns, 80; letter to the queen, 80, 81; is recalled; partial abolition of Corn Laws, 82; effect of his policy on Conservative party, 82; his resignation; farewell speech to Parliament, 86, 88; his plans for reform in Ireland, 90; last measures of his administration, 99; foreign questions during his ministry, 100; his opinion of address to Louis Philippe, 104; his position on the Tahiti question, 105, 106; on the Morocco question, 109, 110; policy in respect to Spanish affairs, 113, 1.4; succeeded by Lord John Russell, 115; supports Whig measures for relief of Ireland, 125; speech on Irish question, 128, 129; views on emigration, 129, 130; on landed property, 130, 131; his support of Whig ministry, 132; speech on foreign policy of Palmerston, 133, 134; public excitement on news of his accident, 134, 135; his death, 135; character, 135, 136; speech upon public education, 154-157; Irish measures, 384.
- PEEL, Captain, Sir WILLIAM, son of the above, his death, v. 269.
- , General, member of Derby's Cabinet of 1866, resigns, v. 366.
- , Lady, declines offer of peerage, v. 135.
- PEIHO RIVER, obstruction of, by Chinese authorities, v. 309.
- PEKIN, proposed ratification of treaty of Tientsin at, v. 308, destruction of Summer Palace at, 312.
- PELAGIUS, Irish monk, i. 33.
- PELHAM, HENRY, iv. 138; becomes First Lord of the Treasury, 153; his letter on difficulties between Cumberland and William IV.; disposed to peace with France, 180; his death; character of his administration, 184.
- , Lord, interview with George III., iv. 359.
- PELISSIER, General, becomes commander-in-chief of French army in the Crimea, v. 221, 222; his conduct in Algeria, 222, 223; measures to secure freedom of action in Crimea, 223; agreement of opinion with Lord Raglan, 224, difficulties of his position, 226.

- PELTIER, French refugee, his trial in England, iv. 337.
- PEMBROKE CASTLE, captured by Cromwell, iii. 102.
- PEMBROKE, Countess of, Mary, sister of Sir Philip Sidney, ii. 365.
- , Earl of, Richard de Clare, called Strongbow, appointed sceneschal of Ireland, i. 173.
- , Earl of, defeats Bruce at Methven, i. 267; captures Gaveston, 275; at battle of Bannockburn, 278.
- , Earl of, i. 214; chief of barons at Runnymede, 215; Protector of England, 221; his wisdom and moderation; his death, 223.
- , Earl of, defeated at Edgecote, ii. 58; made Duke of Bedford by Henry VII., 85.
- , Earl of, member of council of Edward VI., ii. 229; supports Mary's claims to the throne, 241; defeats insurgents under Wyatt, 249, 250; commands English army in France, 261; minister of Elizabeth, 267; unites with Leicester in urging Mary Stuart's marriage with Norfolk, 300; leaves Elizabeth's court, 302.
- , Lord, partisan of Margaret of Anjou, ii. 63.
- PENAL SERVITUDE, substituted for transportation in 1853, v. 290.
- PENDLETON, Doctor, preacher of Queen Mary, ii. 252.
- PENINSULAR WAR, its beginning (1808), iv. 335; ended (1814), 400; Sir Charles Napier in, v. 152.
- PENN, Admiral, his expedition against Spanish colonies, iii. 173-174.
- , WILLIAM, present at execution of Elizabeth Gaunt, iii. 321.
- , RICHARD, bearer to England of second petition of American Congress, iv. 233.
- PENNEFATHER, General, in command of division at Inkerman, v. 211.
- PENRUDDOCK, executed for conspiracy against Cromwell, iii. 172.
- PENTHÈVRE, Joan of. (See Joan of Penthèvre.)
- PERCEVAL, SPENCER, prime minister, iv. 393; opposition to the Prince Regent, 394; assassinated 1812, 397.
- PERCHE, Count of, i. 222.
- PERCY, HENRY, defeated by Bruce at Carrick Castle, i. 269; Gaveston surrenders to, 275.
- , Lord, Henry (Hotspur), made prisoner at Chevy Chase, i. 351; defeats Douglas at Homildon Hill, 367; marries sister of Sir Edmund Mortimer; conspires against Henry IV., 368; his challenge of Henry, 369; is killed at Shrewsbury, 370.
- , Lord, marshal of England, pursued by mob, i. 338.
- , Lord, signs letters to officers of royal army, iii. 52.
- , Sir RICHARD, makes submission to Edward IV., ii. 54; again revolts; is killed at Hexham, 55.
- PERCY, accomplice of Catesby, in plot against James I., ii. 388.
- PÉRIGORD becomes possession of English crown on accession of Henry II., i. 149; ceded to Edward III. by treaty of Brittany, 329.
- PÉRIGORD, Cardinal of, his negotiations before battle of Poitiers, i. 322-325.
- PERRERS, ALICE, favorite of Edward III., i. 337; deserts his deathbed, 323.
- PERROT, Sir JOHN, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, condemned to death, ii. 348.
- PERSECUTIONS of early Christians in reign of Diocletian, i. 27; of Jews under Richard I., 186; under Edward I., 244; of Lollards, in reign of Henry IV., 381; in reign of Henry V., 382; of Lollards Lutherans and Anabaptists by Henry VIII., ii. 175; of Catholics and Protestants, 198; of Protestants in Scotland, 209; of Protestants by Mary, 254-260.
- PERSIA, SHAH cf, at war with Prince of Afghanistan, v. 239.
- PERSIGNY, Duc de, French Ambassador in London, v. 283; friend of Napoleon III., 284.
- PERTH, burned by its own citizens, i. 262; castle of, recovered by Bruce, 276; headquarters of Highland insurgents in 1715, iv. 99, 101; entered by Charles Edward, 159.
- , Duke of, commands at siege of Carlisle, iv. 166.
- , Earl of (James Drummond), Lord Treasurer of Scotland, iii. 332; envoy of James II. at Rome, iv. 26.
- PERU, Anson's expedition to, iv. 147.
- PERCHIERA, Marquis of, gains victory at Pavia, ii. 149.
- PETER, Emperor of Russia. See Russia.
- , kings of Castile. See Castile.
- , the Hermit, his prediction, i. 209, 210.
- PETERBOROUGH, Bishop of (White), signs petition against Declaration of Indulgence, iii. 333.
- , Dean of, reads discourse at execution of Mary Stuart, ii. 335.
- , Earl of, Charles Mordaunt, his advice to William of Orange, iii. 343; made minister, 368; his brilliant campaign in Spain, capture of Barcelona, iv. 54; retires to England, 57.
- "PETER'S PENCE," i. 95.
- PETERS, excluded from amnesty, iii. 253.
- PETIT, Maitre JEAN, doctor of the Sorbonne, i. 375.
- PETIT-THOUARS, Admiral du, takes possession of Tahiti, v. 105.
- PETITION OF RIGHT, the, presented to Charles I., 415; his violation of, 416.
- PETRE, Father, Jesuit priest, obtains disgrace of Catharine Sedley, iii. 328; Innocent IX. refuses to make him a bishop, 335.
- PETTY, Lord HENRY, afterwards Lord Lansdowne, member of Lord Grenville's cabinet, iv. 376. See Lansdowne.
- PIACENZA, city of, captured, ii. 141.
- , duchy of, claims of Don Carlos of Spain to, iv. 132; guaranteed to Infant Don Philip by peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, 181.

PICARDY, ravaged by Edward III., i. 128; by Earl of Buckingham, 342.

PICHEGRU, CHARLES, general of French Republic, menaces Holland (1794), iv. 327. 327.

PICKERING, Sir WILLIAM, ii. 278.

PICTS, i. 26, 29, 33.

PIEDMONT, annexed to French Republic, iv. 356; sends contingent to Crimea, v. 218; sends plenipotentiaries to Congress of Paris, 234; Emperor Napoleon declares war against Austria for deliverance of, 302.

PIERCE, martyr for heresy, his wife disinterred and burned, ii. 260.

PIERRE-LE-MONTOIR, taken by Joan of Arc, ii. 29.

PIERRI, comrade of Orsini, v. 283.

PILGRIMS of GRACE, insurgents in reign of Henry VIII., ii. 187.

PILLNITZ, declaration of, iv. 319, 320.

PINKIE, battle of, ii. 222.

PITT, WILLIAM, the elder. See Chatham.

PHILADELPHIA, its opposition to the Stamp Act, iv. 225; Americans obliged to evacuate, 246.

PHILIP, youngest son of King John the Good of France, i. 323.

—, Dauphin, son of Charles VI., endeavors to seize reins of government, i. 384; death, 394.

—, Infant of Spain, son of Philip V., iv. 132.

—, kings of France. See France.

—, kings of Spain. See Spain.

—, archdukes of Austria. See Austria.

PHILIP-HAUGH, battle of, iii. 68.

PHILIPPA of FLANDERS, contracted to Prince Edward of England, i. 254; death of, 258.

— of HAINAULT, marries Edward III., i. 290; accompanies her husband on expedition to France, 297; sends army against David Bruce, 312; intercedes for the citizens of Calais, 317; quartered in house of John d' Aire, 318.

PHILPOT, JOHN, London merchant, captures Spanish ships, i. 341.

PHILIPPEVILLE, fortifications of dismantled in 1831, v. 395.

PHILIPPINES, plundered by English, iv. 218.

PHENICIANS AND GREEKS, their early commercial relations with Great Britain, i. 13.

PITT, WILLIAM (1759-1806), son of Lord Chatham, rival of Charles Fox, iv. 235; supports his father during his last speech in Parliament, 248; prime minister at resignation of Coalition Ministry, 292; his previous refusal to form a Cabinet, 295; opposition to Fox's Indian Bill, 296, 297; difficulty in forming a Cabinet, 298, 299; reply to Fox's attack, 299; defeat of his Indian Bill, 300; his disinterestedness, 300, 301; his contest with Fox, 301, 302; advises dissolution of Parliament, 302; his financial measures carried in Parliament, 303; his appearance and character, defeated on question of Westminster election, 304; liberal Irish measures, establishment of sinking fund, 305; negotiates treaty of commerce with France, 305, 306; speech in support of treaty, 306; persuades the king to recommend request of Prince of Wales to Parliament, advocates abolition of slave-trade, 308; alliance with Holland and Prussia (1789), his power firmly established, 309; letter on illness of the king, 309, 310; his position in regard to the regency, 310, 312; opposed by Fox, 311, 312; his efforts to restrict the power of the Prince of Wales as regent, 312-313; letter to his mother on convalescence of the king, 314; the king's correspondence with, 314, 315; his popularity, 315; attitude in regard to French revolution, 316, 317; Canada Bill, 317; maintains neutrality of England toward France, 319, 320; financial measures, urges abolition of slave-trade, causes dismissal of Thurlow, 320; made warden of the Cinque Ports, his anxiety in regard to state of Europe, 321; letter to Stafford on position of Holland, 322, 323; anxiety to preserve peace, 323; services to England, measures for repression of license of the press, 324; bill for suspension of the Habeas Corpus, 325; advises recall of Duke of York, his war policy unpopular, 327; plans attempt of French emigrants in Brittany, 328; measures for suppression of sedition and for relief of public distress, 329; anxiety for peace, 330; Burke's letter to, 330, 331; plans of defence against French invasion, 332; address to the House on failure of negotiations with France, 333; renews negotiations unsuccessfully, 338; introduces bill for the union of Ireland and England, 341; his speech on the bill, 341, 342; speech in support of war with France, 344, 345; advocates emancipation of Catholics, 345; opposition of the king to his project, 346, 347; his resignation (February, 1801), Rose's interview with him, 347; urges Addington to form a cabinet, letter of Dundas to him on the subject, 348; advice to Prince of Wales on regency question, 349; his promise to the king in regard to Catholic emancipation, mode of life on retirement from office, 350; attachment of his friends to him, letter from Marquis Wellesley, 351; reply to Lord Grey's attack on his administration, 353; takes part in negotiations for peace with France, letter to Love, 354; estrangement with Addington, absents himself from Parliament, 356; his reception on re-appearance in Parliament, 359; negotiations for his return to office, 358, 359; speech on accepting mediation of Russia, 359, 360; supports financial measures of the cabinet, 360; his activity in preparing for war, determination to support the government, 361; becomes premier on resignation of Addington, proposes coalition with Fox, 362; indignation at Grenville's refusal to become member of his ministry, 363; his estimate of Napoleon, 364; reconciliation with Addington, 365; friendship for Melville, defends him against charge of corruption, 366; mortification at passage

- of vote of censure, 367; speech on announcing the erasure of Melville's name from list of privy council, 368; his declining health, efforts to form new coalitions against France, 369; his illness, urges admittance of Fox to the cabinet, 371; speech at annual banquet in London, reception of news of Austerlitz, 373; his last days, 373, 374; death (1806), his debts paid by Parliament, 375; his income tax, v. 64; plan for accomplishment of union between England and Ireland, 90, 91; his measures in regard to East India Company, 276; promise to George III., 307; his Irish measures, 384.
- PITTSBURG, originally Fort Duquesne, iv. 191.
- PIUS V. and VI. See Popes.
- PIZZIGHITINE, fortress of, Francis I. imprisoned at, ii, 149.
- PLAGUE, the, ravages Europe in reign of Edward III., i. 318; in London, 281; breaks out in London in reign of Charles II., iii. 261-262.
- PLANTAGENET, GEOFFREY, Count of Anjou, marries Empress Maud, i. 135; claims Normandy, 137; enters Normandy to claim the rights of his wife, 139; sends his eldest son, Henry, into England, 145; his death, 147.
- , GEOFFREY, brother of Henry II. of England, deprived of Anjou by his brother, i. 149; refuses to acquiesce and is defeated, 150; takes refuge in Nantes; his death, 151.
- , RICHARD. See Richard Cœur-de-Lion.
- PLASSEY, battle of, iv. 207; hundredth anniversary of, v. 240.
- PLATEN, Countess of, favorite of George I., compromised in inquiry into South Sea Company, iv. 124.
- PLECMUND, Archbishop of Canterbury under Alfred, i. 59.
- PLESHEY CASTLE, Duke of Gloucester arrested at, i. 352.
- PLOMBIÈRES, proclamation of the Pretender at, iv. 93.
- PLUNKETT, Lord, advocates Catholic emancipation, iv. 414.
- PLYMOUTH, burned by Bourbon princes, i. 371.
- POISSY, insurrection at in favor of Charles VII., ii. 15.
- POITEVINS, complain to Charles V. of taxes imposed by Black Prince, i. 333.
- POITIERS, battle of, i. 322-325.
- PORTOU, part of marriage portion of wife of Henry II., i. 147, 149; revolt, 178; Cœur-de-Lion does homage for, to Philip Augustus, 181; revolts, 182; recognizes John (Lackland) as liege-lord, 203; invaded by Brétons, under Prince Arthur, 205; regained by France, 207; towns of, closed against English, 326; ceded to English by treaty of Bretigny, 329; invaded by French, 334; promised by Armagnacs to English king, 376.
- POLAND, Duke of Anjou king-elect of, ii. 314; revolts against Russia (1863), v. 342; hopes for European intervention, 343; left to her fate, 344.
- POLAND, sovereigns of:—
- STANISLAUS, marriage of his daughter to Louis XV., iv. 131.
- AUGUSTUS III., elector of Saxony, driven out by Frederick II. of Prussia, iv. 194.
- POLE, Admiral, commissioned to treat with delegates from mutineers at Spithead, iv. 335.
- , ANTHONY, nephew of Cardinal Pole, his conspiracy in favor of Mary Stuart, ii. 280.
- , ARTHUR, nephew of Cardinal Pole, his conspiracy in favor of Mary Stuart, ii. 280.
- , Sir GEOFFREY, brother of Cardinal Pole, arrested; betrays his kinsmen, ii. 194.
- , REGINALD. See Canterbury, Archbishops of.
- POLIGNAC, Abbé de, envoy of Louis XIV. to the Dutch, iv. 64, 65; quoted, 74.
- POLLOCK, General, victorious at Khyber Pass, v. 53; enters Cabul, 54.
- POLL-TAX, voted by Parliament, occasion of insurrection of Wat Tyler, i. 344.
- POLTROT, assassinated Duke of Guise, ii. 282.
- POMPADOUR, Madame de, favorite of Louis XV., iv. 196, 197.
- POMFRET, Lord, supporter of Bute in House of Lords, iv. 221.
- PONDICHERRY, town of, its defence by Duplex, iv. 203; occupied by Lally-Tolendal, 207; captured by English, 209; ruins of, restored to France, 219.
- PONSONBY, Lord, English ambassador to Constantinople, v. 43.
- PONTCHARTRAIN, minister of marine and finance to Louis XIV., iii. 398-399.
- PONT-DE-L'ARCHE, captured by Henry V., i. 395.
- PONTEFRACCT CASTLE, Richard II. imprisoned at, i. 362.
- PONTHIEU, ceded by Edward II. to his son, i. 283; ceded to English by treaty of Bretigny, 329.
- , Count of, defeats Talbot at Castillon, ii. 44.
- PONTIGNY, abbey of, refuge of Becket, i. 162-163.
- PONTIOSE, portion of wife of William Fitz-Robert, i. 136; taken by Henry V., 393; by Charles VII., ii. 37.
- POOLE, Captain, in army of Monk, iii. 218.
- , Sir NEVIL, iii. 37.
- POOR LAWS, the, v. 58; disastrous effect of, in Ireland, 128.
- POPE, ALEXANDER (1688-1744), English poet, iv. 85; quoted, iv. 129.
- POPES:—
- GREGORY THE GREAT (591-604) dispatches missionaries to Britain, i. 34; encourages them to persevere, 35; advises Augustine to consecrate Pagan temples, 36.
- LEO IV. (847-855), consecrates Alfred the Great, i. 42.
- ALEXANDER II. (1061-1073), sends permission to William of Normandy to invade England, i. 94.

POPES (continued):—

- INNOCENT II. (1130-1143), protector of Bishop of Winchester, i. 146.
 CELESTINE II. (1143-1144), i. 146.
 LUCIUS II. (1144-1145), i. 146.
 ANASTATIUS IV. (1153-1154), i. 146.
 URBAN II. (1088-1099), dies of grief for loss of Jerusalem, i. 180.
 ADRIAN IV. (1154-1159), only English Pope, i. 149.
 ALEXANDER III. (1159-1181), his reception of Becket, i. 162; returns to Rome, 165; excommunicates prelates concerned in coronation of Prince Henry, 166; pardons Henry II., 171.
 GREGORY VIII. (1187), calls for crusade, i. 180.
 CELESTINE III. (1187-1191), i. 201.
 INNOCENT III. (1198-1216), quarrels with Philip Augustus, i. 204; pronounces England under interdict, 207; excommunicates King John, 208; deposes him, 209; receives homage from him, 210; abandons cause of English liberty, 212; declares Magna Charta void, 216; death, 218.
 HONORIUS III. (1216-1227), i. 220; excommunicates Prince Louis, son of Philip Augustus, 222.
 INNOCENT IV. (1243-1254), claims Sicily as fief of the Holy See, i. 229-230.
 GREGORY X. (1271-1276), visited by Edward I., i. 243.
 BONIFACE VIII. (1294-1303), issues bull in favor of English clergy against Edward I., i. 255; endeavors to establish peace, 258; pretensions to Scotland, 264.
 BENEDICT XII. (1334-1342), advises armistice between France and England, i. 298.
 MARTIN V. (1417-1431), ii. 16; refuses to annul second marriage of Jacqueline of Hainault, 18; annuls her third marriage, 20.
 EUGENIUS IV. (1431-1447), assembles Council of Arras, ii. 36.
 INNOCENT VIII. (1484-1492), confirms authority of Henry VII., ii. 89.
 JULIUS II. (1503-1513), his bull legalizing first marriage of Henry VIII., ii. 118; persuades Henry to join league against Louis XII., 119; bull referred to commission, 156.
 LEO X. (1513-1522), title given by him to Henry VIII., ii. 139; his alliance with Charles V., 140; death, 141.
 ADRIAN VI. (1522-1523), his election, ii. 142; death, 148.
 CLEMENT VII. (1523-1534), as Cardinal Julius de Medici, ii. 142; elected, 148; besieged in Rome, 153; authorizes his legate to decide on divorce of Henry VIII., 156; signs decretal bull, 157; illness, 158; revokes mission of legate, 159; forbids marriage of Henry with Anne Boleyn, 167; persevering resistance, 168; signs brief of excommunication, 170; publishes it, 172.
 PAUL III. (1534-1550), sends Cardinal's hat to Bishop Fisher, ii. 173; bull against

POPES (continued):—

- Henry VIII., 178; efforts to bring him back to the church, 189, 190; endeavors to unite forces of Empire against him, 193.
 PAUL IV. (1555-1559), his zeal against heretics, ii. 260; assumption in regard to Elizabeth's right to the throne, 271.
 PIUS V. (1566-1572), excommunicates Elizabeth, ii. 306.
 SIXTUS V. (1585-1590), excommunicates Elizabeth, ii. 338.
 PAUL V. (1605-1621), his order to English Jesuits, ii. 391.
 GREGORY XV. (1621-1623), his claims for English Catholics, ii. 408, 409.
 INNOCENT XI. (1676-1689), instructions to his nuncio in regard to English Catholics, iii. 327; opposition to James II., 335; exclamation in regard to William of Orange, 334.
 INNOCENT XII. (1691-1700), quoted, iv. 26; in favor of Duke of Anjou's succession to Spanish throne, 35.
 CLEMENT XI. (1700-1721), iv. 114.
 PIUS VII. (1800-1823), crowns Napoleon at Paris, 1804, iv. 364; excommunicates Napoleon; imprisoned at Savona, 392.
 PIUS IX., his bull creating ecclesiastical titles in England v. 136.
 POPHAM (1762-1820), Admiral, retakes Cape of Good Hope, 1806, iv. 380.
 POKISH PLOT, iii. 278.
 PORT MAHON, taken by the English, iv. 69; abandoned by English garrison, 191.
 PORT PASSAGES, Spanish ships burned by the French at, iv. 118.
 PORT VIGO, Spanish ships burned at, by French and English, iv. 118.
 PORTE, the, regains Egypt at peace of Amiens, iv. 354; Egyptian ascendancy over, v. 34; the pasha's attempts to communicate with, 36; fails to perform its promises to Russia, 172; reply of, to demands of the Czar, 177; its distrust of the Maronites, 314.
 PORTEOUS, Captain JOHN, riot in Edinburgh against, iv. 146.
 PORTER, GEORGE, joins in Barclay's assassination plot, iv. 13.
 PORTLAND, Duke of, William Cavendish (1738-1809), supports Tory ministry, iv. 325; minister without portfolio in Pitt's second cabinet, 365; first lord of the treasury, 1707, 381.
 —, Earl of, William Bentinck, letter of William III. to, iii. 379; accompanies William III. to Holland, 390; the king's grants to him, iv. 17; Prendergrass reveals the assassination plot to him, 20; plenipotentiary of William at Ryswick, 23; his embassy to Paris, 31, 32; his jealousy of Koppel, 32; negotiates second Partition Treaty, 32, 33; charges brought against him, 39; at deathbed of William, 47, 48.
 PORTO BELLO, captured by Admiral Vernon, 1759, iv. 148.
 PORTO-CARRERO, Cardinal, at head of Spanish council, iv. 34, 35.
 PORTO-NOVO, battle of, iv. 289.

- PORTSMOUTH, Duchess of, favorite of Charles II., 285, 286.
- PORTUGAL, taken possession of by Philip II., ii. 338; Don Antonio aspires to crown of, 343; concludes peace of Utrecht, iv. 75; joins coalition against French Republic (1799), 343; occupied by French army under Junot (1808), 383, 385; evacuated by the French, 386; campaign of Masséna and Wellington in (1810), 395; the French forced to evacuate, 396; civil war in (1833), allied with Spain and England (1834), 450.
- , sovereigns of:—
- JOSEPH EMANUEL, as Prince of Brazil, marries Infanta of Spain, iv. 131.
- MARIA, her throne contested by Don Miguel, iv. 450; marries Ferdinand of Saxe-Coburg (1836), v. 114.
- PORTUGUESE, commercial interests of, threatened by clauses of treaty of Rastadt, iv. 76.
- POUSSIN, NICHOLAS, iv. 111.
- POWELL, Sir JOHN, one of the judges at the bishop's trial, his opinion, iii. 342.
- POWERS, the GREAT, their interest in the re-establishment of order in the Lebanon, v. 314; intervention of, in Syria, 315; conference of, in London, 347; effect of rise of Prussia upon, 358; pledged to maintain neutrality of Belgium, 390, 395; influence of, on balance of power in Europe, 376.
- Powis, Duke of, arrested for complicity in Jacobite conspiracy in 1715, iv. 99.
- POWYS, WILLIAM HERBERT, Earl of, admitted to privy council, iii. 330.
- POYNET, made Bishop of Winchester, ii. 235.
- POYNTZ, General, in command of Parliamentary corps, iii. 67.
- PRAGMATIC SANCTION, the, published by Charles VI., iv. 132; consented to by Great Powers, afterwards disputed, 148.
- PRATT, Sir CHARLES. See Lord Camden.
- PRENDERGRASS, concerned in Barclay's assassination plot, iv. 19; reveals the plot to Duke of Portland, 20.
- PRESBURG, Maria Theresa crowned at, iv. 150.
- , Peace of (1805), between France and Austria, iv. 373.
- PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH. See Church of Scotland.
- PRESBYTERIANS, in Long Parliament, ii. 431; plans of Montrose against, iii. 31; their religious tyranny, 40, 41; flight of their allies at Marston Moor, 50; their struggle with Independents, 54; desire for peace, 55; decline of their influence, 56; fail with, 74; refuse all religious concessions, 75; in their negotiations for peace, iii. 58; triumph over ill success of reorganization of army, 60; proposed alliance of Charles I. regain influence in Parliament, 78, 79; send commissioners to effect disbandment of the army, 80; consider reconciliation with the king, 81; their suspicions of Cromwell, 84; efforts to gain alliance of Charles, 91; refuse to unite with Cromwell, 99; obtain vote in favor of continuing the monarchy, 100; defeat Independents on question of peace with the king, 104; are excluded from Parliament, 104, 105; severities of the Republicans against, 129; in Scotland, offer conditions to Charles II., 130, 133; concessions of Charles II. to them, 137; their treatment of Charles, 138, 139; dissensions among, 142; in army of Charles, 144; protected by Cromwell, 176; excluded from restored Long Parliament, 207; their petitions to Monk, 229; reinstated in Parliament, 235; their reactionary measures, 236, 237; their proposals to Charles, 240, 241; elect speaker in Parliament of 1630, 243; their distrust of Charles II., 247; failure of attempt to incorporate them with Anglican church, 253, 254; their loss of power in Parliament of 1661, 256; not fully included in Declaration of Indulgence, 334; royalist from taste and principle, 365; regain power after revolution of 1688, 374; resume religious supremacy in Scotland, 389. See Covenanters.
- PRESTER JOHN, Abyssinian king, v. 377.
- PRESTON, battle of, iii. 102.
- , town of, occupied by Jacobite insurgents in 1715, iv. 100; captured by Royalists, 101.
- , Viscount, Richard Graham, made president of the council under James II., iii. 350; discovery of his plot, 394.
- PRESTONPANS, battle of, iv. 161, 162.
- PRICE, chaplain of General Monk, iii. 218, 227.
- PRIDE, Colonel, prevents Presbyterian members from entering Parliament, iii. 104, 105.
- PRIDEAUX, one of commission sent to treat with Charles I. iii. 57.
- , English divine, defends Anglican church, iii. 332.
- PRIE, Marquise de, favorite of Duke of Bourbon, iv. 131.
- PRIESTLEY, Dr., elected to French National Convention, iv. 324.
- "PRINCE OF PEACE." See Godoy.
- PRINCE OF WALES, title of, first applied to Edward, son of Edward I., i. 248.
- PRINCETON, battle of, iv. 242.
- PRIOR, MATTHEW (1664-1721), English poet, agent of the Tories in France, iv. 68; employed in diplomatic negotiations by Bolingbroke, 85; recalled from Paris 94.
- PRISON REFORM, in England, iv. 188.
- PRITCHARD, Mr., British agent at Tahiti, v. 102; arrested by French authorities, sent back to England, 106; action of cabinet in his case, 107.
- PROHIBITORY BILL, forbids commerce with American colonies, iv. 239.
- PROPERTY QUALIFICATION for members of Parliament abolished, v. 293.
- PROTECTORATE. See Cromwell.
- PROTESTANT SUCCESSION, in England secured by Parliament, 1701, iv. 39-77; attachment of Parliament and people to, 86.
- PROTESTANTISM, established in England under Elizabeth, ii. 232; its hold upon the clergy and the people, 256; its progress during Marian persecutions, 267; abjured by Henry IV. of France, 344; efforts to - establish it in Ireland, 347; struggle for its establishment in England, iii. 249; assured to England by William III., iv. 48.

- PROTESTANTS, in Germany, opposed to divorce of Henry VIII., ii. 167; in England, persecuted by Henry VIII., 175, 193, 198; by Cardinal Beaton, in Scotland, 208, 209; become prominent in England under Henry VIII., 216; under Edward VI., 217, 218; their interests receive a blow in Germany and Scotland by the death of Francis I., 221; persecuted under Mary, 254-260; triumphant on accession of Elizabeth, 268; opposition in Scotland to Mary Stuart, 279; their riots under George Gordon, iv. 254, 255; excitement at "papal aggression," v. 137, 138.
- , in Europe, their appeals to Queen Elizabeth, ii. 339; supported by her, 358; disown complicity in death of Charles I., iii. 149; followers of Calvin, v. 158.
- , in France. See Huguenots.
- , in Ireland, massacred, ii. 441; their army disbanded, iii. 43; under Tyrconnel, 333; their rising in Ulster, 369, 370; proscribed by James II., 371; gain supremacy over Catholics, 388; placed on equal footing with Catholics, v. 381; Scotch, in Ulster, 387, 388.
- PRUSSIA, included in treaty of Hanover, iv. 133; weakened by Seven Years' War, 220; makes Peace with Austria 1763 (Peace of Hubertsburg), 220, 221; concludes alliance with England and Holland, 309; negotiations at Basle with French Republic, 325; concludes peace, 331; declares war against Napoleon (1806); defeated at Jena, 378; assisted by Russia, 380; concludes peace of Tilsit with France, 381; evacuated by Napoleon, 387; ungracious recognition of Louis Philippe, 448; policy on Turkish question, v. 34, 35; concludes with England agreement of July 15th, 1840, 36; her concurrence in treaty of 1841, 100; supports claims of Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, 124; takes part in conference at Vienna, v. 178; issues proclamation in favor of maintaining the Ottoman Empire, 182; sends plenipotentiaries to Congress of Paris, 233; associated with Austria and Prussia in partition of Poland, v. 342; allied with Austria against Denmark, 345, 346; preponderance in Europe after war of 1866, 356; M. Guizot's estimate of her rivalry with Austria, and the consequences of war of 1866, 356-359; vigorous policy in regard to Denmark, 358; outbreak of war with France, 389.
- , Prince FREDERICK of, projected marriage with Princess Victoria, v. 280.
- , Prince WILLIAM of, v. 280.
- PRUSSIA, Sovereigns of:
- FREDERICK WILLIAM I., concludes treaty of Utrecht, iv. 75; signs treaty of Hanover, 133.
- FREDERICK II. (the Great), iv. 117, ascends the throne, 1740; takes possession of Silesia, 1741, 149; renews hostilities, 1745, 154; signs treaty with Maria Theresa, 156; Silesia secured to him by PRUSSIA, Sovereigns of (continued):—
- ty of Aix-la-Chapelle, 183; in Saxony; defeated at Colin, 194; alone against the allies; gains victories of Rosbach and Lissa; concludes fresh treaty with England, 196; victory over Russians at Zorndorf; obliged to evacuate Saxony after defeat of Hochkirch, 197; shut up in Saxony, 1760, 211; his disastrous bombardment of Dresden, 212; deprived of support of Russia by death of Peter III., 220; effect of his reign on position of Prussia in Europe, v. 356-358.
- FREDERICK WILLIAM II., marches into Holland to assist Princess of Orange, iv. 309; signs Declaration of Pillnitz, 320.
- FREDERICK WILLIAM III. (reign, 1797-1840), takes up arms against France, 1813, iv. 397; joins Holy Alliance, 404.
- PRYNNE, arrested on charge of libel, ii. 421; his sentence, 422; defence of royal cause, iii. 104; is forcibly excluded from Parliament, 105; takes his seat in the Rump Parliament, 207; declares that the king alone can convoke Parliament, 238.
- PUDSEY, HUGH, Bishop of Durham, buys county of Northumberland, i. 186; made one of the regents of England, 187.
- PUEBLO, Mexican city, taken by the French, v. 337.
- PUISAYE, M. de, in command of French emigrants in Chouan war, iv. 328.
- PULTENEY, WILLIAM. See Bath, Earl of.
- PUNCH, caricature in, v. 219.
- PUNJAB, the, its conquest by Lord Dalhousie, v. 241, 242; saved by prompt action of Montgomery, 245.
- PURITANS, the, their growth in reign of Elizabeth, ii. 307; their contest with her in Parliament, 308, 309; their influence in England, 537; severities against them under Elizabeth, 357, 358; measures of James I. against, 385, 386; persecuted by Archbishop Laud, 420; their emigrations, 421; characteristics, iii. 256; reaction from their rigid rule, 259.
- PUSEY, Dr., leader of Tractarian movement in Church of England, v. 137, 153, 159.
- PUSEYITES, Tractarian party in Church of England, v. 158, 159.
- PYM, JOHN, member of Parliamentary coalition against Charles I., ii. 415; his attempt to emigrate, 421; his motion for impeachment of Strafford, 430; his attitude in the Long Parliament, 431; makes public the plot against Parliament, 435; charged with high treason, iii. 13; attempted arrest of; his escape, 14; triumphant return to Parliament, 17; his treatment of Independents, 41; his death, 44; character, 44, 45; desecration of his tomb, 254.
- PYTHEAS, his voyage along the coast of Britain, i. 13.

Q.

- QUADRA, Bishop of, ambassador of Philip, ii. 282.
- QUADRUPLE ALLIANCE, formed, iv. 114; acceded to by Spain, 120; endangered by insolence of French government, 131.

QUAKERS, included in declaration of indulgence, iii. 334.
QUATRE BRAS, battle of, iv. 401.
QUEBEC, taken by Wolfe (1759), iv. 200; Lord Durham at, v. 18, 19.
"QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY," iv. 81.
QUEENSBERRY, Duke of, William Douglas, deprived of office by James II., iii. 332.
QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY, v. 407.
QUESNOY, besieged by Prince Eugène, iv. 72; captured, 73; retaken by Villars, 74.
QUIBERON BAY, massacre of French emigrants in, iv. 328.

R.

RACINE, his praise of William of Orange, iii. 403.
RADCOT BRIDGE, Note, i. 354.
RAGLAN, Lord (Fitzroy Somerset), commander-in-chief of English army in the Crimea, embarrassed by designs of St. Arnaud, v. 183-184; his visit to camp of Omar Pasha, 184; views on the practicability of invading the Crimea, 185; orders from home, 186; lands with his army in the Crimea, 188; his desire to pursue the enemy after the Alma, opposed, 192; arrives in Balaklava, 198; his order to Lord Lucan, 204; at battle of Inkerman, 211, 212; his letter to Newcastle, 213; in favor of prompt action against Sevastopol, 221; his death, 225.
RAINSBOROUGH, Colonel, Charles I. offers to surrender to, iii. 73.
RALEIGH, Sir Walter, ii. 323; his opinion in council of war, 339; sent to Spain, 345; destroys soldiers of the Pope in Ireland, 348; enmity to Essex, 349; at execution of Essex, 352; imprudent in not gaining favor of James VI., 353; his expeditions to America, 361-362; disgraced on accession of James, 384; accused of conspiracy against him; tried, condemned, and pardoned, 385; in Tower, 394; his expedition to Guiana; death of his son, 400; imprisoned on return to England, 401; conduct at his trial; at his execution, 402.
RAMILIES, battle of, iv. 55.
RAMSAY, Lord BOTHWELL, spy of Henry VII., ii. 105.
RANDOLPH, Earl of Moray, at the battle of Bannockburn, i. 276, 277; makes raid into England, 279; at the head of Scotch army, 288; his death, 293.
 —, emissary of Queen Elizabeth, ii. 274; at work for Protestants in Scotland, 275; agent of Queen Elizabeth in Scotland, 320.
 —, Edmund, letter from Thomas Jefferson to, iv. 232.
RASSAM, Mr., British resident at Aden, made prisoner by King Theodore, v. 377; given up to Sir Robert Napier, 378.
RASTADT, peace of (March 6, 1714), iv. 76.
 —, Congress of, dissolved (1799), iv. 343.
RATCLIFFE, Lord, in Westmoreland's insurrection, ii. 304.
RATCLIFFE, Sir RICHARD, at Pontefract, ii. 74, 75.
 —, Sir ROBERT, executed, ii. 102.
RATISBON, peace of, iii. 302.
RAUCOUX, battle of, iv. 179.
RAYMOND OF ST. GILLES, Count of Toulouse, i. 152.
RAZ DE CATTE, the, i. 134.
RÉ, island of, Buckingham's attempt upon, ii. 414.
REDAN, the, fortification at Sevastopol, v. 200; nearly destroyed by English, 201; blown up, 231.
REDCLIFFE, Lord STRATFORD DE, English ambassador to Turkey, v. 177; his regard for rights of Turkey, 178.
REDWALD, Anglian king, accepts Christianity, i. 37; Bretwalda, 37.
REFORMATION, the, due in England and Bohemia to Wycliffe's books, i. 343; through influence of Luther spreads rapidly in England, ii. 138; takes root in England under Edward VI., 217-218; its progress, 231-232; its progress in Scotland, 275-276; in France, 281; character in England, 420.
REFORMATION-TREE, the, ii. 227.
REFORM BILL, Lord Grey's (1831), iv. 432-438; Lord John Russell's (1832), 433-441; effect of, v. 13, 25-26.
REFORMERS. See Protestants.
REFORM LEAGUE, v. 364, 367.
REGENCY, Council of, formed upon the death of Queen Anne, iv. 90; governs in absence of George I., 93.
REGENCY BILL, iv. 312, 313.
RÉMI OF FÉCAMP, i. 96.
RÉMUSAT, M. de, his accession to power, v. 35.
RENARD, ambassador of Charles V., ii. 253.
RENÉ OF ANJOU, King of Sicily and Jerusalem, his character, ii. 38.
RENÉE, daughter of Louis XII., promised in marriage to Charles V. of Germany, ii. 127; Wolsey's plan to marry her to Henry VIII., 155.
RENNES, besieged by Charles VIII., ii. 96.
REPUBLIC, English, established after downfall of the Protectorate, iii. 206; its foreign policy, 210.
 —, French. See France.
REPUBLICANS, in Cromwell's army, iii. 90, 91; in Parliament, 100; their ascendancy, 105; introduce Dissolution Bill, 161, 162; protest against measures of Cromwell, 164; in Cromwell's Parliament, 170, 171; not admitted to Parliament in 1656, 174, 175; engaged in plot against Cromwell, 187, 188; present petition to Richard Cromwell, 197; oppose his recognition, 199; defeated, 200; lead opposition of the army to Parliament, ii. 201-204; exclude Presbyterians from restored Long Parliament, 207; their position in England, 211; act of General Lambert a death-blow to, 217; trifle with Monk's emissaries, 223; dissensions of, in Parliament, 228; Monk's protestations to, 238.
REQUESENS, Grand Commander, successor of Alba in the Netherlands, his death, ii. 317.

- RESTORATION, the, iii. 248, 249. See also Charles II.
- , poets of, iii. 301, 302.
- RETZ, Cardinal de, on character of Anne of Austria, iv. 224.
- REVOUX, battle of, i. 24.
- REVOLUTION of 1688, its characteristics, iii. 365, 366; successful conclusion of, iv. 23.
- REZA KHAN, MOHAMMED, minister of Prince of Bengal, removed by Hastings, iv. 285.
- RHEIMS, besieged by Edward III., i. 328; Charles VII. of France crowned at, ii. 28.
- , Archbishop of, ii. 27.
- RHINE, the, becomes frontier of French Republic by peace of Luneville, iv. 344.
- RHODE ISLAND, occupied by British troops, iv. 252; surrendered to Americans, 254.
- RIANZARES, Duc de, v. 119.
- RIBAUMONT, EUSTACE de, his combat with Edward III., i. 319; before Poitiers, 322.
- RICE, SPRING, opposed to repeal of union with Ireland, iv. 446.
- RICH, Colonel, assists Pride in excluding Presbyterian members, iii. 104.
- , EDMUND. See Archbishops of Canterbury.
- , Lady FRANCES, daughter of Oliver Cromwell, iii. 185.
- , ROBERT, son of Lord Warwick, son-in-law of Cromwell, iii. 185; his death, 192.
- RICHARD (Cœur-de-Lion), his quarrels with his father, 175-178, 180, 181; is reconciled, 182, 183; remorse after his father's death, 183, 184; liberates his mother, 185; is crowned, 186; sells royal domains, 186; concludes alliance with Philip Augustus and starts on crusade, 187; in Sicily, 188; breaks contract of marriage with Alice of France, 189; marries Berengaria of Navarre, 190; enters Acre, 191; supports claims of Lusignan, 191; his military exploits, 192; his rescue of Jaffa, 193, 194; concludes truce with Saladin and leaves Palestine, 194; his wanderings in disguise, 195, 196; imprisoned by Leopold of Austria, 196; England in absence of, 196-198; before Diet of the Empire, 199; returns to England, 200; his war with Philip Augustus, 200-202; his death, 202.
- II., son of the Black Prince, at Kennington, i. 338; his coronation, his popularity, 340; insurrection of Wat Tyler in reign of, 344-348; receives petition of insurgents, 347; his meeting with Wat Tyler, takes command of the mob, 348; marches against insurgents in Essex, 349; high-treason law voted by Parliament of, 349; proclaims amnesty, marries Anne of Bohemia, elevates his favorites, 350; assumes direction of government, 351, 352; marries Isabel of France, i. 352; his revenge on Gloucester and his friends, 352, 353; his character, 354; banishes Bolingbroke and Norfolk, disaffection against, 355; in Ireland, deserted by his troops, escapes disguised, 357; taken prisoner, 358; his abdication, 359; imprisoned in Pontefract Castle, 362; death of, 363; his burial at Westminster, 380.
- RICHARD III., as Duke of Gloucester, dissatisfied with his brother Edward's marriage, ii. 56; accused of the murder of Henry VI., 64; marries Anne of Warwick, 65; suspected of murder of Clarence, 69; conspires against James of Scotland, 70; swears fidelity to Edward V., 71; his apparent devotion to him, 72; made Protector, 73; his arrest of Hastings, 74; imprisons the young king and the Duke of York in the Tower, 75; his schemes to secure the crown, 75, 76; feigns hesitation to accept it, 76; his coronation, 77; causes murder of his nephews, 78; unsuccessful conspiracy against him, 78, 79; declared legitimate king by Parliament, 79; his agreement with Elizabeth Woodville, 80; death of his son and of his wife, 81; raises an army against Henry Tudor, 81; is defeated at Bosworth, 82; his death, 83.
- of Cornwall, brother of Henry III. of England, i. 229; prisoner at battle of Lewes, 235; his death, 239.
- I., Duke of Normandy, his death, i. 69.
- II., Duke of Normandy, i. 69, 71, 74, 75.
- RICHARDSON, British subject in Japan, assassinated, v. 341.
- RICHELIEU, Cardinal, favors marriage of Henrietta Maria with Prince Charles, ii. 411; influence of his policy declines in Europe, iv. 183; his Spanish policy, v. 111.
- , LOUIS, Duc de (1696-1788), proposes to join Charles Edward, iv. 163; as marshal, captures Fort St. Philip in Minorca, 191, 192; overruns Hanover, obtains capitulation of Closter-Severn from Duke of Cumberland, 195.
- , Duc de (1766-1822), negotiates treaty of peace with allies (1815), iv. 403.
- RICHEMONT, Count of, prisoner at Agincourt, i. 392; marries Madame de Guenne, ii. 15; returns to his allegiance to Charles VII., is made constable, 20; loses his influence over the king, 21; at Patay, 26.
- RICHMOND, capital of Southern Confederacy, taken by Grant (1865), v. 338.
- , Countess of, Margaret Beaufort, mother of Henry VII., ii. 78, 80; consulted by her grandson, Henry VIII., 118.
- , Duchess of, sister of Earl of Surrey, arrested, ii. 213.
- , Duchess of, her ball before battle of Waterloo, iv. 401.
- , Duke of, son of Henry VIII., his death, ii. 186.
- , Duke of, James Stuart (1612-1655), sent to negotiate with Parliament by Charles I., iii. 55; brings letter of Rupert to the king, 65.
- , Duke of, Charles Lennox (1735-1806), proposes recall of English forces in America, iv. 248; reply to Pitt, 249; in Rockingham's second cabinet, 209; in Pitt's cabinet (1783), 279.
- , Duke of, Charles Lennox (1791-1861), member of Lord Grey's cabinet, resigns, iv. 446.

- RICHMOND, Duke of (Charles Lennox, son of the above), proposes amendment to Gladstone's army bill, v. 403.
- , Earl of, estates confiscated by Henry II., i. 151.
- RIDLEY, Bishop of Rochester, takes place of Bonner, ii. 235; his condemnation, 256; his death, 257.
- RIDOLFI, agent sent from Italy, ii. 303.
- RIPON, Earl, member of Lord Grey's cabinet, resigns, iv. 446.
- RIVERS, Lord, brother of Elizabeth Woodville, and uncle of Edward V., ii. 71; executed at Pontefract, 74.
- RIZZIO, DAVID, favorite of Mary Stuart, ii. 235; murdered, 286.
- ROBERT, of Jumièges, Norman priest, Archbishop of Canterbury under Edward the Confessor, i. 85-94. See Canterbury.
- , of Normandy, father of William the Conqueror, i. 84.
- , of Normandy (Curthose), i. 113, 114; his wars with William Rufus, 121, 122; joins the Crusades, 123; returns to Normandy, 127; his war with Henry, 128-130; made prisoner, 130; confined at Cardiff, 131; made blind, 131; death of, 131.
- , Kings of Scotland. See Scotland.
- ROBESPIERRE, MAXIMILIAN, his fall, iv. 327.
- ROBINSON, elected to Parliament in 1656, iii. 174; delegate to General Monk, 228, 229, 233; elected to Parliament of 1660, 243.
- , bearer of offers of Maria Theresa to Frederick II., iv. 149.
- ROCHAMBEAU, Count de, in command of French troops in America, iv. 258, 259.
- ROCHDALE, flannel-weavers of, v. 374.
- ROCHE-DERRIEN, Charles of Blois made prisoner at, i. 313.
- ROCHEFORT, expected to join Tourville with squadron, iii. 398.
- ROCHESTER, fortified by Bishop Odo, i. 121; escape of James II. from, iii. 358.
- , battle of, i. 41.
- , Bishop of. See Atterbury.
- , Bishop of (Thomas Sprat), Ecclesiastical Commissioner for trial of Compton, iii. 331; suspected of complicity in Jacobite conspiracy, 400.
- , Earl of, Lawrence Hyde, son of Lord Clarendon, at head of Tory party, iii. 280; associated with Halifax and Sunderland in privy council, 282; created Lord Rochester; transferred to post of President of the Council, 295; refuses to attend mass, 304; in confidence of James II., 305; disgraced, 328; ecclesiastical commissioner, 330; again disgraced, 332, 333; advice to Duke of Northumberland, 355; in favor of regency, 362; interview with William III., 387; made President of the Council under Queen Anne, iv. 84.
- , Viscount. See Somerset.
- ROCHFORD, Lady, sister-in-law of Anne Boleyn, ii. 200; executed, 201.
- , Lord, brother of Anne Boleyn, imprisoned at the same time, ii. 182; beheaded, 184.
- , Viscount. See Wiltshire.
- ROCKINGHAM, Marquis of, Wentworth (1730-1782), at head of Whig Cabinet in 1765, iv. 227; on resignation of North in 1782, 269; his death, 274; Barré pensioned by him, 301.
- RODNEY, Admiral Sir GEORGE (1718-1792), bombards Havre, 1759, iv. 197; his victory over Zangara at Cape St. Vincent, 257; his capture of St. Eustace, 1781, 265; gains victory over De Grasse near Jamaica, 270-271; provisions Gibraltar, 272.
- ROEBUCK, Radical member, his resolution in support of Palmerston's policy, v. 132; its effect in maintaining the Whigs in power, 134; motion for inquiry into condition of Crimean army, 216, 217; motion for recognition of Southern Confederacy, 331, 338; his theory in regard to savages, 340; unseated, 383.
- ROGER, Bishop of Salisbury, i. 133; arrested by Stephen, 142; dies, 143.
- ROGERS, reformed preacher, ii. 243; his trial as a heretic, 254; his death, 255.
- ROHAN, Chevalier de, Voltaire's quarrel with, iv. 130.
- ROHILLAS reduced to slavery by Warren Hastings, iv. 286-290.
- ROKEBY, Sir THOMAS, bearer of message from Scots to Edward III., i. 289; defeats Earl of Northumberland at Brauham Heath, 374.
- ROMAN CATHOLICS, opposed to divorce of Henry VIII., ii. 167; persecuted by him, 179, 180, 198; in Scotland, opposed to alliance with English, 206; not persecuted in England under Edward VI., 237; triumphant on accession of Mary, 241, 244; persecuted by Elizabeth, 273, 302, 321; revolt against her, 304; hopes revived in Scotland, 320; their plots, 321; respond to her appeal against Spain, 339; oppressive penal laws against, 346; severities of James I. against, 386, 387; persecuted for supposed complicity in conspiracy of Guy Fawkes, 391; secret act in favor of, 411, 412; their rising in Ireland, 441; support Henrietta Maria, iii. 30; insurgents in Ireland conclude truce with Charles I., 43; efforts to harmonize them with moderate party in Ireland, 131; excluded from Parliament under Cromwell, 170; oppressed by Cromwell, 173; Charles II. inclined toward, 258; not included in Declaration of Indulgence, 268; excluded from office by Test Act, 270; popular excitement against, in time of Popish Plot, 280; threatened by Exclusion Bill, 285; measures of James II. for relief of, 305; his plans interfered with by revocation of Edict of Nantes, 324; his violation of the Test Act in their favor, 325, 326; attempts of James II. to reinstate, 330, 331; established in Magdalen College, Oxford, 336; James II. withdraws his pretensions in regard to, 349; riot against in London, 355; royalist from taste and prejudice, 366; join insurrection of 1715, iv. 100; repressive measures passed against on failure of insurrection of 1715, 108; Stanhope aims at complete enfranchisement of, 120; tax imposed upon

- by Walpole, 125; Gordon riots against, 255; Pitt's proposition for emancipation of, 345; opposed by George III., 345, 346; bill for their emancipation proposed by Grenville's cabinet, 380; its failure, 381; Canning's bill in favor of, 413, 414; agitation for their emancipation, 419-422; emancipation of, agitated, v. 60; finally accomplished, 90; their claim to possession of sanctuaries in Palestine, 171; placed on same footing with Protestants in Ireland, 381; claim establishment of Roman Catholic university in Ireland, 408.
- ROMAN CATHOLICS, in Europe, in favor of restoration of the Stuarts, iv. 111; their views of execution of Charles I., 149.
- , in Germany, tolerance secured for, in treaty of Ryswick, iv. 25.
- , in Ireland, their treaty with Charles I., iii. 70; at war with Protestants, 369, 370; efforts of Pitt to conciliate, iv. 339; claim abolition of tithes, 442.
- ROMAN CATHOLIC RELIEF BILL, Canning's, 1822, iv. 413-415.
- ROMAN STATES annexed to French Empire by Napoleon, iv. 392.
- ROMANS, invade Britain under Julius Cæsar, i. 14-18; under Claudius, 18-20; in reign of Nero, 20; under Agricola, 22-24; establish their authority in Britain, 22-26; their rule overthrown by Britons, 26.
- ROME captured by Imperialists, ii. 153; death of Charles Edward at, iv. 183.
- ROMILLY, Sir SAMUEL, his death, iv. 415.
- ROOKE, Sir GEORGE, his naval successes, iv. 54.
- ROOS, Lord de, executed after battle of Hexham, ii. 55.
- ROPER, MARGARET, daughter of Thomas More, ii. 174; her farewell to her father, 176.
- ROSBACH, battle of, iv. 196.
- ROSE, Colonel, English chargé d'affaires, notifies his government of Russian aggressions, v. 177.
- , GEORGE (1744-1818), secretary of the treasury in Pitt's cabinet, his interview with Pitt, iv. 347; fidelity to Pitt, 351; his letter from Pitt, 356.
- , Sir HUGH, takes Jhansi, v. 270; advances on Gwalior, 271.
- ROSEBEQUE, battle of, Philip van Artevelde, killed at, i. 350.
- ROSEN, Count de, accompanies James II. on expedition to Ireland, iii. 369; his cruelties, 372; in command of Jacobite army at Drogheda, 373; returned to France, 383.
- ROSES, Wars of the, their end, ii. 83.
- ROSS, Bishop of, faithful adherent of Mary Stuart, ii. 279, 301, 310; his confession, 311.
- , Bishop of, ii. 423.
- ROTHSAY, Duke of, son of Robert III. of Scotland, defends Edinburgh, i. 365; marries, 367; imprisoned by Albany in Falkland Castle; his death, 373.
- ROTHSCHILD, BARON LIONEL, v. 157, admitted to Parliament in 1858; refused admittance in 1850, 291.
- ROUEN, besieged by Louis VII. and Prince Henry, i. 177; treaty at, between Cœur-Lion and Philip Augustus, 187; besieged by Philip Augustus, 199; John (Lackland) proclaimed at, 203; murder of Prince Arthur at, 206; captured by Philip Augustus, 206; French army assembled at, 386, 387; besieged by Henry V., 395, 396; capitulates, 397; Joan of Arc executed at, ii. 34; captured by the Catholics, 281; besieged by Henry IV. of France, 344.
- , Archbishop of, assists Becket, i. 166; made Chancellor of England, 193.
- ROUHER, M., minister of Louis Napoleon, v. 304.
- ROUILLÉ, President, negotiates peace between France and Holland, iv. 60.
- ROUNDHEADS, name first used, ii. 446.
- ROUSE, Speaker of "Barebones Parliament," iii. 165.
- ROUSSEAU, JEAN JACQUES, his relations with Lord Keith, iv. 117.
- ROWAN, HAMILTON, his trial for political libels, iv. 325.
- ROWENA, Saxon princess, i. 30.
- ROXBURGH, captured by Edward I., i. 253.
- ROYALISTS, the, their plan for convoking royalist Parliament at Oxford, iii. 44; attempt negotiations with Essex, 45; obliged to adjourn assembly at Oxford, 46; besieged in Oxford and York, 47; victorious at Cropredy bridge, 48; defeated at Marston Moor, 49, 50; their successes in Cornwall, 51; capture army of Essex, 52, 53; negotiate with Parliament at Uxbridge, 57, 58; their successes in Scotland under Montrose, 58-61; temporary advantage over Fairfax, 60; defeated at Naseby, 61-63; their army commanded by the Prince of Wales, 64; successes in Scotland under Montrose, 66; reverses, 67, 68; severities of Parliamentarians toward, 69; forced to capitulate in the west, 71; defeated at Stow, 72; insurrections of, in 1648, 100; measures of Republicans against, 122-124-129; outbreak in Ireland, 130, 131; rise in Scotland under Montrose, 134, 135; disorganization of, 139; their plots in England, 142; small number of, join Charles II. in England, 144; defeated at Worcester, 145, 146; severities of Parliament against, 146, 147; at the Hague, 153; excluded from Parliament under Cromwell, 170; insurrections and conspiracies of, under Cromwell, 172; their overtures to Cromwell in regard to restoration of Charles II., 176; engaged in plot against Cromwell, 187, 188; their overtures to Richard Cromwell, 203-207; consternation at Republican success, 209; unsuccessful insurrection of, in favor of Charles II., 211-213; their joy at dissensions of Republicans, 217; rising in Yorkshire under Fairfax, 225, 226; dissatisfaction with Monk, 230; in the majority in Parliament of 1660, 243; their triumph, 244; restored to power, 250. See also Jacobites.
- RUDYARD, Sir BENJAMIN, ii. 443; his motion for negotiations with Charles I., iii. 31; separates himself from Presbyterians, 41.

RUGBY, Arnold's influence at, v. 167.

RUMBOLD, partisan of Cromwell, in exile in Holland, iii. 339; engaged in Monmouth's insurrection, 310, 311; his execution, 313; last words, 313, 314.

"RUMP PARLIAMENT," restored Long Parliament, iii. 234.

RUNNYMEDE, Magna Charta granted to barons at, i. 215.

RUPERT, Prince, at head of cavalry of Charles I., iii. 26; in the battle of Edgehill, 27; his raids, 28; defeats Parliamentarians at Chalgrove, 33; his cavalry defeated by "Ironsides" at Marston Moor, 49, 50; retires from York, 50; is joined by the king, 60; at battle of Naseby, 61-63; advises peace at any price, 65; surrenders Bristol, 67; his quarrel with the king, 68; in command of Royalist fleet, 151, 152; defeated at Lowestoff, 261.

RUSSELL, Admiral, EDWARD (Lord Orford), interview with Prince of Orange, iii. 346; correspondence with James II., 397; disgust at James' declaration, 338; defeats DeTourville at La Hogue, 399; made First Lord of the Admiralty, 403; in the Mediterranean, 406; implicated in Fenwick's confession, iv. 21; his defence, 22; made Lord Orford; his resignation, 36; charges brought against, 39.

—, Lady RACHEL, wife of Lord William Russell, at her husband's trial, iii. 293-294; letter to her chaplain, 329; letter to Tillotson, 406, 407.

—, Lord JOHN, his first attempt at Parliamentary reform, iv. 415; member of Grey's cabinet, 1830, 429; presents Reform Bill of 1831, in house of Lords, 437; presents new Reform Bill in favor of Commons, 438; his motion in regard to Irish Church, 454; his anxiety on the Eastern question, v. 33; goes out of office, 57; proposes fixed duty on corn, 67; proposes eight resolutions in House of Commons, 78; his resolutions set aside by Peel, 79; called to form new ministry, 80, 81-86; advocates measures for relief of Ireland, 97; becomes prime minister on Peel's resignation, 115; his letter on "the papal aggression," 137; presents "Ecclesiastical Titles" Bill, 138; dissatisfaction with Palmerston, 142, 143; dismisses him, 145; obliged to resign, 146; becomes foreign secretary under Lord Aberdeen, 147; his propositions for public instruction, 154, 155; measure for removal of disabilities of the Jews, 157; message of Nicholas to, 172; succeeded by Clarendon in the Foreign Office, 176; fails in attempt to form a cabinet on resignation of Lord Aberdeen, 217; in Palmerston's cabinet, 218; represents England in conference at Vienna; resigns, 219; his resolutions the base of new law for India, 277; speech on Foreign Establishment Act, 284; as Colonial Secretary checks transportation to Australia, 289; proposes admission of Jews to Parliament, 292; renounces protectorate of Ionian Islands, 297; moves amendment to Disraeli's Reform Bill, 298; his amendment passed, 299; appointed to Foreign Office under Palmerston, 301; attempt to bring in Reform Bill, 306; consents to defer it, 307; announces recognition of Southern belligerency, 323; sympathy with Southern Confederacy, 331; his attitude in regard to the Alabama question, 332, 333; scheme for pacification of Poland, 343; becomes prime minister at death of Palmerston, 351; his plan for new Reform Bill, 352; unpopularity of his Reform Bill, 361, 362; resigns, 363.

RUSSELL, Lord WILLIAM, Leader of the Whigs, iii. 280; retires from Privy Council on dismissal of Shaftesbury, 282; joins Shaftesbury in conspiracy against Charles, ii. 291; character, 291, 292; imprisoned in the Tower, 293; trial, 293, 294; execution, 294.

—, WILLIAM, correspondent of London Times, v. 193; his account of cavalry engagement at Balaklava, 203, 204; of storm in the Crimea, 214; effect of his representations, 215; his account of storming of Lucknow, 269, 270.

RUSSIA, allied with England and Holland against France; promises support in Holland in 1748, iv. 180; allied with France and Austria against Prussia in seven years war; army overruns Prussia, 196, 197; hostilities with Turkey, 319; joins coalition against French Republic (1799), 343; joins Sweden and Denmark against England, 344; proposed mediation between England and France, 359, 360; accedes to Pitt's coalition against Bonaparte, 1805, 369; Napoleon's refusal to treat with, 377; comes to assistance of Prussia, 380; concludes treaty of Tilsit with France and Prussia, 381; allied with France, 387; allied with Sweden, 1809, 395; failure of Napoleon's invasion of, 396, 397; ungracious recognition of Louis Philippe, 448; policy on Turkish question, v. 34, 35; concludes with England convention of July, 1840, 36; its influence in India feared by England, 47, 48; concurrence in treaty of 1841, 100; dispute with France concerning the Holy Places in Palestine, v. 171, 172; policy of the czar, 172-176; army invades Turkish possessions, 177; fleet destroys Turkish squadron at Sinope, 179; refuses arrangement with Turkey, 180; war declared with France and England, 182 (see Crimean War); sends plenipotentiaries to Congress of Paris, 333; Polish insurrection against, 342-344; indifference to disencumbrment of Denmark, 358.

—, Sovereigns of:—

ALEXIS, (reign 1645-1706), father of Peter the Great, breaks off connection with the Commonwealth, iii. 149.

PETER I., the Great (reign 1706-1725), son of Alexis, iii. 149; unfriendly relations with George I. iv. 112; alliance with Cardinal Alberoni, 114; refuses to accede to peace, 120.

CATHERINE I., widow of Peter the Great, makes advances to Spain, iv. 133.

ELIZABETH (reign, 1741-1762), promises to send army to assistance of English

- RUSSIA, Sovereigns of (continued): — and Dutch in 1748, iv. 180; her death, 218.
- PETER III., his brief reign (1762), iv. 218; deposed; his death, 220.
- CATHERINE II. (wife of Peter III.), excites revolt against Peter III.; her accession (1762), iv. 222; war with Gustavus of Sweden, 309; death (1796), 334.
- PAUL I. (reign, 1796–1801), ill disposed to England, iv. 334–344; assassinated, iv. iv. 353.
- ALEXANDER (reign, 1801–1825), to refuses confirm D'Oubell's treaty, iv. 378; his alliance with Napoleon, 381–387; Napoleon's unsuccessful marriage negotiations with, 393; French invasion, 1812, 396, 397; joins Holy alliance, 403.
- NICHOLAS (reign, 1825–1855), his increasing power; protectorate of Christian subjects of the Porte, v. 171; desire for alliance with England, 172; confidential interview with English ambassador in regard to Turkey, 173, 174; proposal to England, 174, 175; memorandum of 1844, 175, 176; demands on Turkey, 176, 177; England recognizes his ambitious desires, 178; reply to letter of Napoleon, 180, 181; refuses to withdraw his troops from Danubian principalities, 181; his despair at disasters in the Crimea, 218; death, 218, 219.
- ALEXANDER II. (reign, 1855–1881), his policy, v. 119; visits Crimea, 232; Polish insurrection against, 342–344.
- RUTHVEN, Lord, head of conspiracy against Rizzio, ii. 286; his flight, 287; pardoned by Mary, 288.
- RUTHYN, Lord Grey de, encroaches on Glendower, i. 366; captured by Glendower, 367.
- RUTLAND, Duke of, (Charles Manners), letters from Pitt, iv. 296–301; member of Pitt's cabinet, 299.
- , Earl of, under Henry IV. See Almarle.
- , Earl of, second son of Richard, Duke of York, killed by Lord Clifford, ii. 48, 49.
- , Lord, friend of Earl of Essex, ii. 351.
- RUVIGNY, Marquis of, ambassador of Louis XIV. to London, iii. 271–294; becomes Earl of Galway; chief of French Protestant refugees, iv. 31.
- RUYTER, Michael, Dutch admiral, iii. 157–168; ascends the Thames, 261; defeated at Sole Bay by the English, 269.
- RYE HOUSE PLOT, iii. 294.
- RYSWICK, Peace of, (1697.) iv. 23, 24.
- S.
- SABBATH, its observance in Scotland, ii. 398.
- SACHEVERELL, Dr., prosecution of, iv. 83.
- SACKVILLE, Lord GEORGE, (1716–1785) son of Duke of Dorset, in command of English cavalry at Minden, iv. 210; dismissed from the army, 210.
- SADOWA, battle of, v. 356; its effect on political condition of Germany, 357, 358, 359.
- SADLER, Sir RALPH, agent of Henry VIII., ii. 263; agent of Elizabeth in Scotland, 275; custodian of Mary Stuart, 313; in favor of proceedings against her, 326.
- ST. ALBAN'S, Abbot of, protests against submission to William the Conqueror, i. 107.
- ST. ALBAN'S, battles of, ii. 45, 49.
- ST. ALBAN'S, FRANCIS BACON, Viscount of, ii. 404.
- ST. ANDRÉ DU VERGER, M., French naval commander, iv. 198.
- ST. ANDREW'S, Cardinal Beaton murdered at, ii. 209; besieged by Arran, 221.
- , Archbishop of, ii., 294; hanged, 313.
- , Archbishop of, Chancellor of Scotland, ii. 423.
- , University of, founded, ii. 363.
- ST. ARNAUD, Marshal, French general in the Crimea, v. 182; represents to Napoleon the difficulties of his army, 182–183; embarrasses action of Lord Raglan, 183; visits camp of Omar Pasha, 184; idea of preparations necessary for the invasion of Crimea, 185; favors attack on Sevastopol, 186; lands in Crimea, 188; his hopes of speedy success, 189, at battle of the Alma, 191; opposes pursuit of the Russians, 192; prepares to march upon Balaklava, 197–198; his death, 199.
- ST. ASAPH, William Lloyd, Bishop of, signs petition against Declaration of Indulgence, iii. 338; Russell's declaration to, 398.
- SAINT-AUBIN-DU-CORMIER, battle of, ii. 95.
- ST. BARTHOLOMEW, massacre of, ii. 313–314.
- ST. BRICE'S DAY, massacre of Danes upon, i. 70.
- SAINT COLOMBA, convent of, refuge of Becket, i. 164.
- SAINTE-CROIX, M. DE, governor of Belle Isle, capitulates, iv. 215.
- ST. CUTHBERT OF DURHAM, standard of, i. 140.
- ST. DAVID, Fort, its capture by Lally-Tollendal, iv. 207.
- ST. DOMINGO, slaves sold in, ii. 360.
- ST. EUSTACE, captured by Rodney, iv. 265; recaptured by Bouillé, 265–266.
- ST. GERMAIN, missionary bishop, in Britain, i. 33.
- ST. GERMAIN'S, peace of, ii. 316.
- ST. HELENA, Napoleon exiled to, iv. 402.
- ST. JEAN D'ACRE, captured, v. 42.
- ST. JOHN, See Bolingbroke.
- ST. JOHN, one of commission sent to treat with Charles I., iii. 57; his intrigues in Parliament, 89; protests against trial of the king, 107; envoy to the Hague, 153, 154.
- ST. JOHN OF JERUSALEM, priory of, burned by the insurgents under Wat Tyler, i. 346.
- ST. JOHN, Knights of, recover Malta by Peace of Amiens, iv. 354.
- SAINT-LÔ, taken by Edward III., i. 304.
- ST. LOUP, missionary bishop in Britain, i. 33.
- ST. MICHAEL, Mount, i. 128.
- ST. NEOTS, Saxon Saint, i. 50.
- SAINTONGE, becomes possession of English crown on accession of Henry II., i. 149;

- invaded by Henry III., 227; towns of, closed against English, 326; ceded to England by Treaty of Bretigny, 329.
- ST. PAUL'S CROSS, Bonner's discourse at, ii. 234; Mary proclaimed at, 241.
- ST. PAUL'S, Dean of, attempts to convert Lady Jane Grey, ii. 251.
- ST. PHILIP, Fort, in Minorca, captured by the French, iv. 267.
- SAINT-PIERRE, EUSTACHE de, citizen of Calais, his devotion, i. 316.
- ST. PIERRE, captured by the English, iv. 253.
- ST. POL, Count of, father of Jacqueline of Luxembourg, ii. 36.
- ST. QUENTIN, capture of, ii. 261.
- SAINTRAILLES, Armagnac knight, made prisoner at Crevant, ii. 16; at Verneuil, 17; sent to Brabant, 19.
- SAINTE-RUTH, M. de, in command of French reinforcements, killed at Anghrim, iii. 388.
- ST. SEBASTIAN, falls into hands of the French, iv. 118; captured by the English (1813), 398.
- ST. SIMON, Duc de, his Mémoires quoted, iv. 32; his criticism of Louis XIV.'s policy in recognizing James III., 42, 43; quoted in regard to Cardinal Alberoni, 114.
- ST. STEPHEN, King of Hungary, i. 75.
- ST. THOMAS, captured by the English, ii. 400.
- SAINT-VALERY-EN-CAUX, fleet of William the Conqueror sails from, i. 100.
- ST. VINCENT, retained by the English by treaty of Fontainebleau, iv. 219.
- , Cape, Rodney's victory off, iv. 257; naval action off (1797), 334.
- , Lord, neglect of department of the admiralty, iv. 367.
- ST. WILFRED OF RIPON, standard of, i. 140.
- SALADIN, Sultan of the Arabs, attempts to relieve Acre, i. 190; retires into interior, 191; abandons Ascalon, 192; besieges Jaffa, 193; concludes truce with Richard, 194; his admiration for Richard, 194.
- SALAMANCA, battle of. See Arapiles.
- SALE, General, in command at Jellalabad, v. 51; disregards Elphinstone's order to evacuate the city, 52; his determination not to surrender, 53; appointed to accept deliverance of English prisoners, 54; his meeting with them, 55.
- , Lady, wounded at Koord Cabul, v. 51; her account of the disaster, 51, 52; her captivity, 54, 55.
- SALIC LAW, Philip of Valois succeeds in consequence of, i. 295; Edward's allusion to, 301; in Spain, iv. 450.
- SALISBURY, Bishop of, declares in favor of Henry VII., ii. 79.
- , Bishop of. See Burnet.
- , Bishop of, Roger. See Roger of Salisbury.
- , Countess of, mother of Cardinal Pole, her execution, ii. 194.
- , Earl of, Longsword, i. 212, 213.
- , Earl of, commands army of Richard II., i. 357; beheaded by citizens of Cirencester, 363.
- SALISBURY, Earl of, dispatched to relief of Crevant, ii. 15; besieges Orleans, his death, 21.
- , Earl of, brother of Warwick, supports cause of York, ii. 46; beheaded at Pontefract, 48.
- , Earl of. See Robert Cecil.
- , Lord, commissioner to Mary Stuart, ii. 334.
- , Marquis of. See Lord Cranbourne.
- , THOMAS, concerned in Babington's conspiracy, ii. 334.
- SALOMONS, DAVID, forced to withdraw from Parliament, v. 292.
- SALTOUN, Fletcher of, demands protection of Protestantism, iii. 289; joins insurrection in favor of Monmouth, 310; takes refuge in Hungary, 315.
- SAN ANGELO, Castle of, Clement VII. takes refuge in, 153; besieged by Imperialists, 153.
- SANCHE OF PROVENCE, wife of the Duke of Cornwall, i. 383.
- SANDLANDS, Sir JAMES, ambassador to France, ii. 277.
- SANGATTE, Mount of, French army encamped at, i. 314.
- SANG-KO-LIU-SIN, Chinese general-in-chief, v. 313.
- SAN JACINTO, the, United States sloop-of-war, under command of Captain Wilkes, v. 327.
- SANTIAGO, attacked by Admiral Vernon, iv. 148.
- SANTONA, Spanish ships destroyed at, by French, iv. 118.
- SARAGOSSA, first siege of (1808), iv. 386; second siege of, iv. 387, 388; capitulates (1809), 388.
- SARDINIA, taken possession of by English, iv. 59; falls into hands of Spain, restored to Duke of Savoy by Quadruple Alliance, 114; concludes treaty of Worms with England and Austria, 153.
- , sovereigns of: —
- VICTOR AMADEUS. See Savoy.
- CHARLES EMANUEL, son of the above, gains territory by treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, iv. 183.
- SARDINIANS. See Piedmontese.
- SARFIELD, Lord, Patrick, in command of Jacobite army in Ireland, iii. 388; of Irish regiments in Normandy, 397.
- SAS DE GAND, taken by French under Lowendall, iv. 179.
- SATSUMA, Japanese prince, refuses reparation for murder of Mr. Richardson, v. 341; obliged to pay indemnity, 342.
- SATTARA, annexed to British possessions in India, v. 241.
- SAVAGE, concerned in Babington's conspiracy, ii. 324, 325.
- SAVANNAH, captured by the English (1778), iv. 253.
- SAVARY, General, agent of Napoleon in Spain, iv. 334.
- SAVONA, imprisonment of Pius VII. at, iv. 392.
- SAVOY, forms alliance with England, France, and other powers against House of Austria

- (1624), ii. 411; claimed by Victor Amadeus, iv. 60; in possession of French Republic, 322; annexed to France, v. 303.
- SAVOY, duchess of, sister of Archduke Philip, ii. 115.
- , Duke of, proposes for Princess Elizabeth, ii. 263.
- , Duke of (Victor Amadeus, king of Sardinia), adheres to Grand Alliance, iii. 392; deserts it, iv. 21; generalissimo of French army, 41; returns to Grand Alliance, 52; repulsed at Toulon, 57; tries to recover Nice and Savoy, 60; concludes peace at Utrecht, 75; as king of Sicily, exchanges Sicily for Sardinia; joins Quadruple Alliance, 114.
- , LOUISE OF. See Louise of Savoy.
- SAVOY-CARIGNAN, Prince Eugène of, opens hostilities in Italy, against France, iv. 41.
- SAWBRIDGE, Alderman, his proposal for parliamentary reform rejected, iv. 303.
- SAWYER, Sir ROBERT, Attorney-General in 1680, his opinion as to recognition of dispensing power, iii. 330; iv. 311.
- SAXE-GOTHA, troops of disbanded on conclusion of convention of Closter-Severn, iv. 195.
- SAXE-MEININGEN, Adlaide of, wife of William IV., her influence over her husband, iv. 427.
- SAXE, Marshal (1696-1750), defeats allied army at Fontenoy (1745), iv. 154-156; gains victories at Raucoux and Lawfelt, 179; his prophecy to Louis XV.; makes overtures of peace, 180.
- SAXON CHURCH, insubordination of, i. 94.
- SAXONS, threaten Britain, i. 25; called upon by Vortigern, ravage the coasts, 29; overcome the Britons, 30; establish kingdoms in England, 31-33; receive Christian missionaries, 35-36; accept Christianity, 33-39; internal wars, 40; their characteristics, 41; wars with the Danes, 41-54; under Alfred the Great, 42-58; military customs, 55; modes of government, 55; their parliaments, 58; their dynasty in England, 63; subdue Northumbrian Danes, 64; massacre them, 69-70; overcome by Danes, 73; oppressed under Hardicanute, 80; their hatred for the Danes disappearing, 83; their warlike feats in Normandy, 89; defeat Norwegians, 99; ancient customs before battle, 103; defeated at Hastings, 104-105; under William the Conqueror, 108; their resistance to him, 108-111; their subjection, 113; extortions of Odo, 114; strength of their character, 116; retain their own laws, 117; rally around William Rufus, 121; his oppression of them, 122; popularity of Henry I. among them, 126; his favors to them, 127.
- 42.
- SAY, Lord, minister of Henry VI., put to death by insurgents under Jack Cade, ii.
- SCARBOROUGH, Lord, friend of George II., sent to consult with Walpole, iv. 142.
- SCARLETT, General, in command of heavy cavalry at Balaklava, v. 202, 204; Russian attack on his troops, 228.
- SCHISM BILL, the, iv. 86; repealed, 120.
- SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN, provinces of, their desire for independence, v. 344; dispute as to succession of, leads to war of Denmark with Austria and Prussia, 345; their delegates refused admission to conference at London, 347.
- SCHOMBERG, Count FREDERIC, marshal, embarks for Ireland, iii. 373; entrenched at Dundalk, 378; his letter to William III., 378-379; joined by William III., 382; in command of Huguenots at the battle of the Boyne, 383, 384; his death, 384.
- SCHOOL-BOARDS, establishment of, v. 401, 402.
- SCHOVALOFF, General, defeated by Russians, iv. 196.
- SCHUTZ, Baron, minister of Hanover in London, iv. 86.
- SCILLY ISLES, i. 13.
- SCINDE, Napier's conquest of, v. 151-152.
- SCINDIA, prince of, Gwalior, faithful to the English, v. 270; escapes to Agra, 271.
- SCOTLAND, early condition, i. 18; invaded for the first time, 23; invaded by Septimius Severus, 25; succession to the throne contested, 249; a dependency of England, 250; conquered by Edward I., 253, 254; rebels against him, 259, 260, 262; submits, 264; revolts under Bruce, 265-268; authority of Bruce established in, 276; independence established, 279; condition under government of Bruce, 288; invaded by Edward Baliol, 293; by Edward III., 294, 295; allied with France, 312; ravaged by Edward III., 321; agitated by English intrigues, 327; invaded by Richard II., 350; hostilities on the frontier, 351; unsuccessfully invaded by Henry IV., 365; governed by Duke of Albany, 374; good government of, by James I., ii. 16; Margaret of Anjou takes refuge in, 53; Perkin Warbeck received in, 103; allied with France, 121; arbitration of affairs of, consigned to Wolsey, 135; increasing disorder in, 144; at war with England, 145; attached to Catholicism, 293; invaded by English, 204; claimed by Henry VIII., 205-206; war in, 221, 222, 224; Protestant insurrection in, 275, 276; supremacy of Protestantism in, 277; religious and political factions in, 282; change of government, 319-320; English church established in, 398; James I.'s attempt to enforce episcopacy in, 422-423; attempt of Charles I. to enforce its acceptance there, 423; formation of the "Covenant" in, 424; Montrose's designs upon, iii. 31; concludes alliance with Long Parliament, 40; its army in service of Parliament; (see Scots) outbreak of Royalists in, under Montrose, 53; proclaims Charles II., 130; rising of Montrose in, 134-135; invaded by Cromwell, 139-142; subdued by Monk, 148; incorporated with England by Cromwell, 167; allotted thirty representatives under Richard Cromwell, 198; insurrection of Covenanters in, 262, 282, 283, 284; harsh rule of Duke of York in, 289-290; persecution of Covenanters in, under James II., 305-306; Argyle's rising in, in favor of Monmouth, 310-312;

- character of revolution of 1688 in, 373-374; convention in abolishes episcopacy, 374; Dundee's insurrection in favor of James II., 374-378; triumph of Presbyterians in, 389, 394; Highland chiefs take oath to the government, 394, 395; insurrection in favor of first Pretender in 1715, iv. 98-106; its consequences, 107; Lord Keith's (Earl Marshal), expedition to, 116-117; troubles in, on account of tax on beer, 130; difficulties in, in regard to smugglers, 146; insurrection of Jacobites in, in favor of Charles Edward, 1745, 157-179; religious schisms in, 255; desire of James I. to effect its union with England, 392; visit of James I. to, 397; his attempt to establish episcopacy there, 398; disturbances in, 410; George IV.'s progress in, 415; extension of elective franchise in, v. 368.
- SCOTLAND, sovereigns of: —
- MALCOLM II. (reign, 1003-1033), upholds rights of descendants of Ethelred to the throne of England, i. 76.
- MALCOLM III. (reign, 1057-1093), marries Margaret Atheling; espouses cause of her brother Edgar, i. 110.
- DAVID I. (reign, 1124-1158), undertakes to support claims of Empress Maud, i. 139; invades England, 1137, 140, 141; bestows knighthood upon Henry II. of England, 147.
- MALCOLM IV. (reign, 1153-1165), accompanies Henry II. of England to France, i. 152.
- WILLIAM THE LION (reign, 1165-1214), takes part with Prince Henry, son of Henry II., i. 176; taken prisoner, 177.
- ALEXANDER II. (reign, 1214-1249), comes to aid of English barons against King John; is repulsed, i. 217.
- ALEXANDER III., (reign, 1249-1286), his death, i. 248.
- JOHN BALIOL, claims Scottish crown, i. 249; crowned (1292), 250; resists pretensions of Edward III., 251; submits, 253; use of his name, 259, 260.
- ROBERT BRUCE, Earl of Carrick, grandson of rival of Baliol, joins national party in Scotland, i. 259; his conspiracy with Comyn, 265, 266; is betrayed by him, 266; crowned at Scone (1306), 266; defeated by Pembroke at Methven, 267; retires to the mountains; is attacked by Lorn, 268; is proscribed; his capture of Carrick Castle, 269; defeats Pembroke at Loudon Hill, 270; defeats English at Bannockburn, 276-278; makes war on England, 288; his death (1329), 291.
- EDWARD BALIOL, son of John Baliol, his pretensions advanced, i. 293; crowned at Scone (1332), 294; takes refuge with Edward III., victorious at Halidon Hill, 294; is reinstated, 295; driven back into England, 298; pensioned by Edward, 321.
- DAVID BRUCE, son of Robert, betrothed to Princess Joan, i. 291; takes refuge in France, 295; returns to Scotland; concludes armistice with Edward III., 299; invades England, 311-312; taken pris-
- SCOTLAND, Sovereigns of (continued): —
- oner, 312; released, 326; proposes English prince as his heir; his death (1371), 327.
- ROBERT II. succeeds his uncle, King David (1371), i. 327; his death (1390), 332.
- ROBERT III., (reign, 1390-1406), i. 353; summoned to pay homage to Henry IV., 365; attempts to send his son to France, 373; dies of grief, 374.
- JAMES I. (reign, 1424-1437), son of Robert III., i. 373; imprisoned in England, 374; negotiations for his release, 405; in France with Henry V.; besieges Dreux, 406; chief mourner for Henry V., ii. 13; marries Jane Beaufort; returns to Scotland, 16; assassinated, 69.
- JAMES II. (reign, 1437-1460), his government; death of, ii. 69.
- JAMES III. (reign, 1460-1488), succeeds to throne, ii. 69; conspiracy of Albany against, 70; killed, 103.
- JAMES IV. (reign, 1488-1513), treaty with Henry VII., ii. 90; revolt as Duke of Rothsay against his father, 103; supports Perkin Warbeck, 104, 105, 106; marries Margaret Tudor, 110; demands upon Henry VIII., 121; declares war against him, 123; defeated at Flodden, 125-126; his death, 126.
- JAMES V. (reign, 1513-1542), negotiations with Henry VIII., ii. 178; betrothed to Mary of Guise, 195; his distrust of Henry, 203; his army defeated by English, 204; death, 205.
- MARY STUART, birth of, 1542, ii. 205; promised in marriage to Prince Edward, 207; sent to France, 224; marries the Dauphin (1558), 262; her claim to English throne, 267; quarters the arms of England on her escutcheon, 272; gives up her claim; death of her husband (1560), 277; her return to Scotland; opposition of Protestants to, 279; her claim to English succession, 280; negotiations concerning her marriage, 282-284; her marriage with Darnley, 284; meets insurgents at the head of her army; joins Catholic alliance; makes a favorite of Rizzio, 285; conspiracy against Rizzio, 286; birth of her son, 287; her negotiations with Elizabeth, 287-288; murder of her husband, 289; her relations with Bothwell, 289-290; marries him; meets insurgents at Carbery, 291; taken prisoner; signs act of abdication, 292; her escape from Lochleven; defeat of her army, 293; escapes to England, 294; her reception by Elizabeth, 294, 295; her examination, 296; detained prisoner in England, 297; in custody of Earl of Shrewsbury, 298; Leicester's plot in her favor, 300-301; her attempted escape, 303; revolt of English nobles in her favor, 304; plan for her marriage with Duke of Anjou, 309; conspires with Spain, 310; her hopeless position, 313; negotiations concerning her; loses her last supporters in Scotland, 315; offers to abdicate in favor of her son, 320; plots of Catholics in her favor, 321-322;

SCOTLAND, Sovereigns of (continued):—
 her useless appeals to her son, 323;
 Babington's conspiracy in her behalf,
 324; severities of her captivity, 325;
 commission appointed for her trial, 326;
 her protest, 327; her trial, 327-329;
 her courage on receiving her sentence, 330;
 her last letter to Elizabeth, 331; her preparation for death, 333-335; her execution (1587), 335.

JAMES VI., his birth (1566), ii. 287; crowned, (1567), 293; his party supported by Elizabeth, 305; his favorites, 319; intrigues of Catholic party to gain possession of, 320-321; his treaty of alliance with Elizabeth, 322; his reply to his mother's appeals, 323; not prejudiced by sentence against his mother, 331; his indifference to his mother's fate, 332; his consolation after her death, 336; accused of plotting against Elizabeth, 346; is drawn into conspiracy of Essex, 350; succeeds to English throne (1603), 383. (See James
 I. of England).

SCOTS, i. 26, 29, 63; invade England on behalf of Empress Maud, i. 140-142; in reign of Henry II. 176; call in Edward
 I. to arbitrate on succession, 249; acknowledge him as liege lord, 250; invade Cumberland; are repulsed, 253; subjected by Edward, 254; revolt under Wallace, 259, 260; defeat Edward at Falkirk, 262; negotiate for peace, 264; their devotion to Wallace, 265; crown Bruce, 266; defeated at Methven, 267; victorious at Bannockburn, 276-278; invade Ireland under Edward Bruce, 279; make peace with England, 280; allied with Earl of Lancaster, 281; invade England, 288, 289; conclude peace, 290, 291; defeated by Edward Baliol, 293; dethrone Baliol, and invade England, 294; are defeated at Hallidon Hill, 294, 295; allied with France,
 311; invade England, 312; attack Berwick,
 320; instigated by France, take possession of Berwick Castle, 341; cross the frontier in reign of Richard II., 350; invade England, and are defeated at Homildon Hill, 367; attempt incursion into England, 395;
 assist the French against Henry V., 405;
 against Duke of Bedford, ii. 16, 17; allied with Margaret of Anjou, 53; invade England under Perkin Warbeck,
 105; invade England under James IV.,
 124; defeated at Flodden, 125; attached to Catholicism, 203; defeated at Solway Moss,
 204; opposed to pretensions of Henry
 VIII., 206; assisted by France, 207; defeated at Pinkie, 222; take up arms against England, 262; opposed to Catholic suitors of Mary Stuart, 283; hopes founded on succession of James VI. to English throne, 283; James' favor toward them, 334; in service of Long Parliament, iii. 46, 47, 48, 50, 61, 65, 66, 67, 68; dissensions break out between them and Parliament, 69; Charles gives himself up to, 73; retire to Newcastle with the king, 74; their treatment of him,

75; negotiate with Parliament for his surrender, 77; give him up with Newcastle,
 78; attempt to gain alliance of Charles,
 91; Charles concludes treaty with, 99; rise in his favor under Hamilton, 100; the commissioners excite public sympathy with Charles during his trial, 111; negotiate with Charles II., 130, 133; settle in Ulster under James I., v. 130.

SCOTT, THOMAS, instructed to draw up sentence against Charles I., iii. 111; measures against Royalist invasion, 143, 144; elected to Parliament (1656), 174; president of secret assembly of Council of State, 224,
 225; sent as delegate to General Monk,
 228, 229-233; declaration in regard to execution of the king, 238; elected to Parliament of 1660, 243; excluded from general amnesty, 253.

—, JOHN. See Lord Eldon.

—, Sir WALTER, at public meeting in Edinburgh, iv. 410; hooted by mob at Jedburgh, 436; dead before Victoria's accession, v. 161, 168.

SCROOP, Lord, of Masham, conspirator against Henry V., i. 386.

SCROPE, Lady, sister of Sir Robert Carey, ii.
 383.

SCUDAMORE, son-in-law of Glendower, invades Shropshire, i. 373.

SEAFORTH, Lord, engaged in Spanish attempt for restoration of Pretender, iv. 117.

SEA-KINGS. See Danes.

SEARCH, Right of, England's claim of, v.
 327, 328.

SEBASTIANI, Colonel, his expedition to Egypt, iv. 356.

—, Marshal, at Estremadura, iv. 390.

SEBERT, Saxon king of Essex, adopts Christianity, i. 37.

SECESSION, of Southern States, v. 320.

"SECOND EMPIRE," fall of, in 1870, v. 339.

SEDEGMOOR, battle of, iii. 317.

SEALEY, CATHERINE, favorite of James II.,
 iii. 328.

SEIGNELAY, son of Colbert, iii. 399.

"SELF-DENYING ORDINANCE," iii. 56; rejected by the Lords, 57; slightly altered; passed by both Houses, 59.

SEMMES, Captain RAPHAEL, commander of the Alabama, v. 332; popularity in England, 333.

SENEGAL, river with its dependencies, ceded to France, iv. 280; French colonies at seized by English (1809), 393.

SENS, taken by Henry V., i. 402.

—, Archbishop of, marries Henry V., i.
 402.

SEPARATISTS, in Ireland, iii. 375.

SEPOYS, native troops in India, their revolt.
 See Indian Mutiny.

SEPTENNIAL BILL, debate on its repeal
 (1734), iv. 142, 146

SEPTIMIUS SEVERUS, Roman emperor, in Britain, i. 25.

SERFAGE, under Alfred, i. 58.

SERLE, chamberlain of Henry IV., adopts cause of pretended Richard II., i. 371.

SEVASTOPOL, plans for attack upon, v. 186; confidence in its speedy surrender, 192;

- Prince Mentschikoff in command at, 193; harbor closed by sinking of Russian ships, 194, 195; its situation, 195, 196; Mentschikoff's plan for its defence, 196; description of the South side, 196, 197; attack upon, 201; fortifications strengthened, 219, 220; assault upon, 225; bombardment of, 229; final assault upon, 230, 231; evacuated by the Russians, 231.
- SEVEN ISLANDS, the. See Ionian Islands.
- SEVEN YEARS' WAR (1756-1763), iv. 192; closes, 220, 221. See also Frederick the Great, and Prussia.
- SEVILLE, Junta of, convoked in favor of Ferdinand VII., iv. 335; concludes alliance with England, 388.
- , Treaty of (1729), iv. 140.
- SEWARD, WILLIAM, Secretary of State in Lincoln's administration, his statement concerning affair of the Trent, v. 328; announces to Lord Lyons the liberation of Confederate envoys, 329.
- SEXBY, promises to raise insurrection in favor of Charles II., iii. 177; arrested for suggesting assassination of Cromwell; his death, 185.
- SEYMOUR, ANNE, daughter of Duke of Somerset, marries Lord Lisle, ii. 229.
- , Sir G. HAMILTON, English ambassador at St. Petersburg, v. 172; interviews with the czar, 173, 174, 175; orders of Lord Clarendon to, 179.
- , JANE, third wife of Henry VIII., ii. 182; married King Henry, 185; birth of her son; her death, 190.
- , Lord, brother of Somerset, made Lord High Admiral, ii. 219; his ambition, 222; marries Catherine Parr; aspires to Princess Elizabeth, 223; execution, 224.
- , WILLIAM, marries Arabella Stuart; his imprisonment and escape, ii. 393.
- SFORZA, LUDOVIC, gives up Milan to Francis I., ii. 129.
- SIAPTESBURY, Lord (Cooper, Lord Ashley), iii. 270; at head of opposition, 271; anxious for dissolution of Parliament, 275, 276; leader of Whig party, 230; President of Privy Council; Habeas Corpus Bill attributed to him, 281; dismissed by the king, 282; his scheme for securing the succession to Duke of Monmouth, 284, 285; in alliance with Essex and Sunderland to secure passage of Exclusion Bill, 285; his expedients to secure his end, 287; imprisoned in the tower as suborner of false witness; acquitted, 288; his conspiracy against Charles II., 291, 292; takes refuge in Holland, 292, 293; his death, 293.
- , Lord, his efforts in behalf of laboring classes, v. 154.
- SHAH SHOOJA, raised to the throne of Afghanistan by the English, v. 48; popular dissatisfaction with, 49; assassinated at Cabul, 53.
- SHAKESPEARE, WILLIAM, his birth; probable early education, ii. 366; marriage; first connection with London theatre, 367. Pericles, 368; remodels works of others, 368, 369; Venus and Adonis; Lucrece, 369; doubt concerning authenticity of certain plays; his first work a comedy, 370; character of his comedies, 371, 372; Merry Wives of Windsor, 373; Falstaff in Henry IV., 373; in the Merry Wives, 374, 375; the Merchant of Venice, 375, 376; classification of his plays; historical dramas, 376; his tragedies; Hamlet, 377, 378; character; social position, 380; life at Stratford; death, 381; his will, 381, 382.
- SHANGHAI, port of, opened to British traders, v. 46.
- SHARP, Archbishop of St. Andrews, effect of his tyranny in Scotland, iii. 262-282; assassinated, 283.
- , JOHN, Dr., Dean of Norwich, disobeys injunction against Anglican clergy, iii. 330.
- SHERRINGTON, director of the mint, ii. 223; betrays Lord Seymour, 224.
- SHAW, Dr., his speech at St. Paul's Cross, ii. 75, 76.
- SHEERNESS, James II., arrested at, iii. 355, 356.
- SHEFFIELD, trades union at, v. 373, 374.
- SHELburne, Lord. See Lansdowne.
- SHELL-HILL, at Inkerman, v. 210.
- SHERBOURNE, battle of, iii. 68.
- SHERIDAN, RICHARD BRINSLEY, his speech against Hastings, iv. 292; letter from Fox, 310; opposes Pitt's bill for suspension of Habeas Corpus, 325.
- SHERIFFMUIR, battle of, iv. 101, 102.
- SHERLOCK, his defence of Anglican church, iii. 332.
- SHORE, JANE, favorite of Edward IV., ii. 75.
- SHREWSBURY, battle of, i. 369, 370.
- , Abbot of, bearer of proposals of peace to Hotspur, i. 369.
- , Countess of, custodian of Mary Stuart, ii. 313.
- , Duke of, (Charles Talbot), as Earl, signs invitation to William of Orange, iii. 346; member of Privy Council, 368; Secretary of State, 403; interview with William; made Duke, 404; uses his influence in favor of Marlborough, 406; accused of treason by Fenwick, iv. 21; generosity of William to; retires from court, 22; member of Anne's privy council, 89; made Lord Treasurer, 90.
- , Earl of, intrusted with charge of Mary Stuart, ii. 298-325; arrival at Fotheringay, 333.
- , Lord, attempts to invade Scotland, ii. 145; Wolsey ill at his house, 164; sent against insurgents, 187.
- SIBYLLA, wife of Robert Curthose, i. 127.
- SICILY, Normans established in, i. 126; charity of Queen of, to friends of Becket, 163; arrival of Richard Cœur-de-Lion there, 188; its crown offered to Richard of Cornwall, 229; vessels of, confiscated for service of Philip II., ii. 333; awarded to Duke of Savoy by treaty of Utrecht, iv. 75; Alberoni's expedition against; restored to the emperor by quadruple alliance; exchanged for Sardinia by Victor Amadeus of Savoy, 114; lost by Spain, 115; misfortunes of Spanish army in, 118, 119; Napoleon's designs upon, 377.

- SICILY, Sovereigns of:—
WILLIAM THE GOOD, i. 188.
TANGRED, his negotiations with Cœur-de-Lion, i. 183, 183.
FREDERICK II., i. 229.
RENÉ, OF ANJOU. See Anjou.
VICTOR AMADEUS. See Sardinia.
 —, Joanna of. See Joanna of Sicily.
- SIDMOUTH, Lord, Henry Addington (1756–1841), Speaker of House of Commons, iv. 345; Prime Minister, (1801), 343; continues in office against the King's wishes, 350; his cabinet, 352; estrangement from Pitt, 353; proposals to Pitt, 353; accepts Pitt's modifications of his financial measures, 353; resigns, 352; opposed to Pitt, 363; their reconciliation, 355; president of the council, 355; his animosity toward Melville, 353; in cabinet of Lord Grenville, 376; succeeded by Peel as home secretary, 412.
- SIDNEY, ALGERNON, protest against continuance of the monarchy, iii. 103; against trial of Charles I., 107; introduces dissolution bill, 131, 162; his criticism of Charles II., 236; connected with Whig conspiracy against Charles II., 232; his trial, 293, 294; execution, 235.
- , HENRY, brother of the above, employed in negotiations of William of Orange with English statesmen, iii. 343, 347.
- , SIR HENRY, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, ii. 347.
- , Lord, conducts Elizabeth to the Tower, ii. 252.
- , SIR PHILIP, killed at Zutphen, ii. 345; his Arcadia; first patron of the Faery Queen, 335.
- SIKHS, Hindoo sect, v. 241; their revolt subdued, 242; under Havclock at relief of Lucknow, 232.
- SILESIA, FREDERICK II., takes possession of 174, iv. 149; secured to him by treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, 748, 183.
- SILISTRIA, besieged by the Russians, v. 184.
- SILURES, British tribe, i. 18, 19.
- SIMIER, M. DE, agent of Alençon, ii. 317, 318.
- SIMNEL, LAMBERT, pretender to English throne, ii. 91–94.
- SIMON OF MONTFORT, persecutor of Albigenses, i. 231.
- , priest, instigator of the pretender Simnel, ii. 91; made prisoner, 93.
- SIMPSON, General, succeeds Lord Raglan in command of Crimean army, v. 226; his attack upon the Redan, 230.
- SINCLAIR, OLIVER, favorite of James V. ii. 204.
- SINDERCOMBE, MILES, arrested for plot against Cromwell, iii. 78.
- SINOPE, destruction of Turkish fleet at, v. 179.
- SION HOUSE, ii. 239.
- SIWARD, earl of Northumbria, i. 82, 83, 86, 87.
- SKELTON, Colonel BEVIL, made Governor of the Tower, iii. 353.
- SKIBBEREEN, famine in, v. 94.
- SKIPPON, commander of London trainbands, iii. 7; his address to his men, 29; left in command of Parliamentary army by Essex, 54; wounded at Naseby, 62; appointed to negotiate with army, 80; member of Council of State, 120.
- SKYE, Isle of, Charles Edward takes refuge in, iv. 177.
- SKYRING, Mrs. her devotion to Charles Edward, ii. 67.
- SLAVERY, abolition of, in England, iv. 188; abolished in English colonies in the West Indies, 446; in United States, views of Southern leaders in regard to, v. 318–320; abolished, 338.
- SLAVE-TRADE, Wilberforce's bill for abolition of, (1788,) 308; again presented, (1792,) 320; France and England engage to suppress it in treaty of 1845, v. 100.
- SLIDELL, confédéré envoy to France captured by Wilkes, v. 327; set free, 329.
- SLINGSBY, Sir HENRY, accused of conspiracy against Cromwell, iii. 88; executed, 89.
- SLÜYS, battle of, i. 297.
- SMEATON, musician, hanged, i. 184.
- SMERWICK, fortress of, pontifical soldiers besieged in, i. 348.
- SMITH, Colonel, attacked by American militia, iv. 236.
- SMITHFIELD, Wallace executed at, i. 265.
- SOBIESKI, Princess CLEMENTINE, marries the first Pretender, iv. 117; his ill-treatment of her, 134.
- SOCIETY FOR CONSTITUTIONAL INFORMATION, iv. 325; proclaims universal suffrage, 327; annual parliaments, 328.
- SOIMONOFF, Russian general in the Crimea, v. 208; in command at battle of Inkerman, 209; mortally wounded, 210.
- SOISSONS, two hundred English archers hanged at, note, i. 389.
- , Count of, iv. 4.
- SOLE BAY, battle of, iii. 269.
- SOLEMN LEAGUE AND COVENANT, the, alliance concluded by Vane with the Scots, iii. 40.
- SOLWAY MOSS, battle of, ii. 204.
- SOMERS, Lord, John, frames Bill of Rights, iii. 334; made lord chancellor, 402; mediator between Princess Anne and William IV., iv. 13; opposes the king's resolution of retiring to Holland, 29, 30; his harassing position, 36, 37; deprived of the Great Seal, 38; charges brought against him, 39; draws up William's last address to Parliament, 45; at head of English commissioners to negotiate union of England and Scotland, 78; union of Scotland and England in great part due to, 80; one of the "Junta" in council of Queen Anne, 82; in Council of Regency after her death, 93.
- SOMERSET, Duchess of, set free from imprisonment by Queen Mary, ii. 242.
- , Duke of, commands in Normandy, ii. 40; head of younger branch of house of Lancaster; favorite of Queen Margaret, 43; impeached, 44; released from imprisonment, 45; killed at St. Albans, 45.
- , Duke of, Henry de Beaufort, son of the above, with Lancastrian army, 48; de- feated at Towton, 52; takes refuge in Scotland, 53; makes submission to Edward IV., 54; again revolts, is defeated at Hexham and executed, 55.

- SOMERSET, Duke of, Edward Seymour, as Lord Hertford, commands expeditions into Scotland, ii. 209; becomes member of privy council under Edward VI., 218; made Protector of the kingdom; made Duke by will of Henry VIII., 219; favorable to Protestants; absorbs executive powers, 220; leads army to Scotland, 221; is victorious at Pinkie, 222; resolves to rid himself of Seymour, 223; signs his death-warrant, 224; his influence declines, ii. 227; Lord Warwick accomplishes his disgrace, 228; is again admitted to privy council, his arrest and trial, 229; is beheaded, 1552, 230; buried in chapel of the Tower, 244.
- , Duke of, Charles Seymour, his opposition to James II., iii. 335; deprived of office, 336; in council of Queen Anne, iv. 81; at meeting of council on death of Queen Anne, 89; tries to protect his son-in-law, Wyndham, 99.
- , Earl of, father of Jane Beaufort, ii. 16.
- , Earl of, Robert Carr, as Viscount Rochester, favorite of James I., ii. 394; accused of poisoning Prince Henry, 395; as Earl joins Bacon in intrigues against Parliament, marries Countess of Essex, 396; accused of murder of Overbury, condemned to death and pardoned, 397.
- SOMERSETSHIRE, Jeffrey's cruelty in, iii. 322.
- SOMERVILLE, Mrs., v. 161.
- SOPHIA, Princess, wife of Elector of Hanover, granddaughter of James I., English crown settled upon her descendants in default of heirs to Mary or Anne, iv. 39; her death, 86; her wish to be Queen of England, 87.
- SOPHIA DOROTHEA, Princess of Zell, wife of George I., divorced and imprisoned by the king for supposed connection with Königsmark; her death, iv. 135.
- SOUBISE, Duc de, French Commissioner in Seven Years' War, iv. 195; defeated by Frederick the Great at Rosbach, 196; appointed to command of army designed to invade England, 197.
- SOULT, Marshal (1769-1851), occupies Corunna, iv. 387; invades Portugal, 389; in Estremadura, 390; refuses to come to assistance of Massena, 395; succeeds Jourdan in Spain; his disasters, 398; defeated at Orthez; fights battle of Toulouse, 400; ambassador from Louis Philippe, his reception by the English, v. 16; his letter to Guizot, 34.
- SOUTH AMERICA, Spanish colonies in, attacked by English, 1739, iv. 147; failure of English expeditions to, 381; republics of, recognized by England, 1822, 416.
- SOUTHAMPTON, Earl of, Wriothlesley, secretary of state to Henry VIII., ii. 197; chancellor, 211-214; member of privy council of Edward VI., 218; made Earl of Southampton, 219; his imprudence, 220; animosity to Somerset, 228.
- SOUTHAMPTON, Earl of, Henry Wriothlesley, friend of Earl of Essex, taken to the Tower, ii. 351; in favor with King James, 352; patron of Shakespeare, 380.
- , Earl of, sent to Uxbridge by Charles I. to negotiate with Parliament, iii. 55-58.
- , Earl of, Thomas Wriothlesley, lord treasurer in ministry of Charles II., iii. 251.
- SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY, formed February, 1861, v. 320; opens hostilities, 321; sympathy of England with, 322; recognized as belligerent power, 323; attitude of France toward, 323, 324; capture of envoys to France and England, 327; navy of, fitted out in England, 332; attempts to obtain recognition, 336; comes to an end at surrender of Lee, 338.
- SOUTHEY, ROBERT, living in early part of reign of Victoria, v. 161.
- SOUTH SEA BILL, royal assent to, iv. 121.
- SOUTH SEA COMPANY, iv. 122; its failure, 123.
- SPAIN, at war with England, ii. 337-342; with France, 344; makes peace with France and England, 345; with United Provinces, 346; visit of Charles I. to, 407-410; alliance formed by France, England, Holland and other powers against, 1624, 411; England at war with, 414; first recognizes the Commonwealth, iii. 152; rupture with England, 174; natural enemy of France, 268; engagement with James II. for protection of Low Countries, 308; it advances to James II., 327; included in Peace of Ryswick, iv. 23, 24; question of succession likely to rise, 24-27; First Partition Treaty, 27; question of succession opened by death of Bavarian prince, 31; Second Partition Treaty, 33, 34; bequeathed to Duke of Anjou by Charles II., 34; campaign of Peterborough in, 54; rallies to appeal of Philip V., 63; peace indispensable to, 66; Alberoni's administration in, 113; France and England agree to force consent to Quadruple Alliance, 114; they declare war against, 116; accedes to Quadruple Alliance, 120; gives its consent to Pragmatic Sanction, 132; England declares war upon (1739), 147; claims sovereignty of Hungary and Bohemia on death of Emperor Charles VI.; unites with France and Bavaria against Maria Theresa, 148; fails to assist Charles Edward, 163; concludes Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748), with England and other powers, 180, 181; enervated condition, 183; concludes Family Compact with France, 217; England declares war against, 218; loses Florida by peace of Paris; Louisiana ceded to, by France, 219; shares misfortunes of France in Seven Years' War, 221; assists France in American War, 254; allied with France in siege of Gibraltar, 272-274; confirmed in possession of Florida and Morocco by Treaty of Versailles, 280; difficulty with England successfully terminated, 320; concludes Treaty of Basle with French Republic (1795), alliance with French Republic (1796), 331; concludes peace of Amiens with England, (1802), 354; monthly tribute to Bonaparte, 360; declares war against England, 365; revolution in (1808), 383; Bourbon dynasty in, overthrown by Napoleon, 384; beginning of Peninsular War in, 385; Massena placed in command of French army in, 395; Bourbon dynasty re-established in, 416; Carlist insurrection in, 450, 451; its natural alliance with France, v. 110, 111; state of parties in, 112; question concerning marriage of Queen Isabella, 110-124; enters into convention with Napoleon III. concerning Mexico, 336; withdraws from the alliance, 337.

SPAIN, Infantas of:—

CLARA EUGENIA, daughter of Philip II., marries the Archduke Albert, ii. 350.

ANNE, daughter of Philip III., negotiations for her marriage with Henry, son of James I. of England, ii. 394, 395; marries Louis XIII. of France, 406. See Anne of Austria.

MARIA, daughter of Philip III., negotiations for her marriage with Charles I. of England, ii. 406, 410.

MARIA ANNE, daughter of Philip V., contract for her marriage with Louis XV. broken off, iv. 131.

—, Sovereigns of:—

PHILIP II. as Archduke of Austria, his marriage with Mary of England arranged, ii. 247; his arrival expected, 252; married under title of King of Naples, 253; becomes King of Spain (1555), involves England in war with France, 261; his disastrous campaign in France, 262; his projects for marriage of Elizabeth of England, 263; on her accession proposes to marry her himself, ii. 271; marries Elizabeth of France, 272; supports Catholics in France, 281; proposes his son as husband of Mary Stuart, 282; his oppression of the Low Countries, 298; his consent to Norfolk's marriage asked, 301; seizure of his fleet, 303; forbids publication of the Pope's bull, ii. 306; discourages project of Don John, 317; prepares for war against England, 337; 338; concludes peace with France, 345; death, 1598, 346; effect of his persecution of Dutch Protestants, 359; quoted, iv. 42; union of Spain and Low Countries in his reign, v. 111.

— III., (reign 1598-1621), demands reparation for English interference in Guiana, ii. 401; plans for marriage of his daughter, 406.

— IV., (reign 1621-1665), negotiations for marriage of his sister, ii. 406.

CHARLES II., (reign 1665-1700), his failing health, iv. 24-27; adopts son of Elector of Bavaria, 31; his death, 1700; his will, 34.

PHILIP V., succeeds to the throne (1700), iv. 34, 35; surrenders Dutch towns to Louis XIV., 39, 40; Grand Alliance formed against; married to daughter of Duke of Savoy, 41; his right to the crown disputed by Archduke Charles,

SPAIN, Sovereigns of (continued):—

54, 55; strong feeling of Spaniards in favor of, 57; his losses in Low Countries and Italy, 59; refuses to abdicate, 61, 65; attachment of the Spaniards to, 66; renounces his claim to throne of France, 70; protests against treaty of Utrecht, 75; lays claim to crown of France, 116; the French invade his territory; destruction of his navy, 118; accedes to Quadruple Alliance (1720), 120; marries his daughter to the Prince of Brazil, 131; concludes treaty of Vienna with the Emperor (1725), 132; raises siege of Gibraltar, 134; joins France and Bavaria against Maria Theresa (1741), 148; Pragmatic Sanction of, 450; marriage of Isabella II. to one of his descendants advocated by France, v. 119, 121.

FERDINAND VI. (reign 1746-1759), makes overtures for peace with England, iv. 180; his death, 216.

CHARLES III. (reign 1759-1788), King of Naples, iv. 216; signs Family Compact with France (1761), 217; consents to recognize the United States, 254; his interest in the siege of Gibraltar, 273.

CHARLES IV. (reign 1788-1808), declares war against England, iv. 331; dethroned, 383; temporary restoration; surrenders the crown to Bonaparte, 384.

FERDINAND VII. (reign 1813-1833), proclaimed upon his father's abdication (1808), iv. 383; detained as prisoner by Murat; refuses to renounce his crown, 384; his claims supported by Junta of Seville and by England, 385; re-established in power (1823), 416; his death (1833), 450; will, v. 118.

ISABELLA II. (reign, 1833-1868), recognized by England and France, iv. 450; negotiations for her marriage, v. 110; supported by the moderate party, 111; attitude of England in regard to her marriage, 112-114; propositions for her marriage, 114, 118, 119, 120, 121; her marriage with Duke of Cadiz announced, 122; celebrated 123.

SPANIARDS, the, detested in England, ii. 260; besiege Cambray, 318; their confidence of the conquest of England, 338; their terrible reputation, 340; defeat by the English, 341, 342; engaged in unsuccessful Jacobite attempt in Scotland, iv. 117; their misfortunes in Sicily, 118; their cruelty to prisoners, 389.

SPANISH ARMADA, ii. 340-342.

SPANISH COLONIES in South America, English expedition against, iv. 147, 148.

SPANISH MARRIAGE, the, v. 110-124.

SPANISH SUCCESSION, War of, begins 1702, iv. 51; ended by Treaties of Utrecht (1713), and Rastadt (1714), 75, 76.

"SPEECHES OF PRINCE ALBERT," Guizot's, v. 28.

SPENCER Lord (1758-1834), First Lord of the Admiralty, his unsuccessful attempts to conciliate the mutineers, iv. 337.

—, Lord, (Lord Althorp, 1782-1845), member of Lord Grey's cabinet (1830), iv.

- 429; his bill to amend church establishment in Ireland, 442; disagreement with Grey, 447; becomes Lord Spencer, 455.
- SPENCER, EDMUND, Euphuism in his poems, ii. 363; his birth; obtains Irish estates, 365; his Faery Queene, 365, 366; death, 366.
- SPURS, battle of the, ii. 123, 124.
- STAFFORD, son of Duke of Buckingham, prediction concerning, ii. 137.
- , HUMPHREY, friend of Lord Lovel, beheaded, ii. 90
- , Lord, son of Lord Arundel, charged with plot against the king, iii. 285; his condemnation, 286.
- , Marquis of, colleague of Pitt, iv. 322.
- , THOMAS, friend of Lord Lovel, ii. 90.
- , THOMAS, English refugee, his expedition against Scarborough, ii. 251.
- STAHREMBERG, Count, commander of Austrian army in Spain, iv. 66.
- STAINVILLE, Count de. See Choiseul.
- STAIR, Lord, ambassador of England at Court of France, iv. 96; denounces French vessels preparing for service of Pretender, 98.
- , Marquis of, demands protection of Protestantism, iii. 289.
- , Master of. See Sir John Dalrymple.
- STAMFORD BRIDGE, battle at, i. 98, 99.
- STAMP ACT, proposed by Grenville, iv. 223, 224; protest against it in New England, 224; Pitt demands its abrogation, 225, 226; Grenville's defence of, 226; repealed under Lord Rockingham, 227.
- STANHOPE, General, afterwards Lord (1673-1721), his successes against French in Italy, iv. 59; escorts the archduke to Spain, his speech in Parliament, 66; engaged in precautions against Jacobite conspiracy, 89; under-secretary of state in Townsend's cabinet, 94; accompanies George I. to the continent, 110; negotiates Triple Alliance of 1717 with Dubois, 111, 112; made first Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer, 113; sent to Spain to negotiate with Alberoni, 119; obtains repeal of Schism and Occasional Conformity Acts, desires enfranchisement of the Catholics, 120; speech on bill for limiting number of peers, 121; death, 1721, 124.
- , Lady HESTER, niece of William Pitt, her devotion to him; strange career, iv. 361.
- , Lord, quoted, iv. 350, 351.
- , Lord (of Shelford), afterwards Lord Chesterfield, his maiden speech, iv. 96. See Chesterfield.
- , WILLIAM, English minister to Spain, iv. 131.
- STANIOVITCH, Admiral, v. 194.
- STANISLAUS, King of Poland, marriage of his daughter to Louis XV., iv. 131.
- STANLEY, Lord, favorite minister of Edward IV., ii. 66; imprisoned by Gloucester, 74; taken into favor, 77; enters into conspiracy in favor of Henry Tudor, whose mother he had married, 78; does not reply to Richard's appeal, joins Henry, 82; crowns him king, 83; made Earl of Derby, 85.
- STANLEY, Lord, afterward Lord Derby (1799-1869), as colonial secretary in Grey's cabinet, his report on question of slavery in the West Indies, iv. 445; resigns, 446; refuses seat in Sir Robert Peel's cabinet, 452; supports Russell on question of Irish Church, 454; becomes member of Peel's cabinet, v. 60; resigns on Peel's adoption of liberal policy in regard to the Corn-laws, 81. See Derby.
- , Lord, son of the above, colonial secretary, becomes secretary of state for India, v. 286; his measures as colonial secretary, 289; succeeded in colonial office by Lord Lytton, 293; becomes foreign secretary in Lord Derby's cabinet of 1866, 363; his ultimatum to King of Abyssinia, 377; amendment to Gladstone's Irish resolutions, 382.
- , Sir WILLIAM, brother of Earl of Derby, executed, ii. 102.
- STAPLETON, his position in Long Parliament, ii. 431; the army demands his expulsion, iii. 85.
- STAR-CHAMBER, the, condemnation of Mary Stuart in, ii. 328; court of, 421.
- STAR-FORT, near Sevastopol, v. 196.
- STATES-GENERAL of Brittany protest against annexation of Brittany to France, i. 341.
- , of France, elect Philip of Valois, i. 195; chosen regent after battle of Poitiers, 326; resistance to Edward III., 328; discontent with treaty of Bretigny, 300.
- , of Holland, appoint Leicester governor, ii. 323; their disappointment, 324; undertake to discharge their debt to Elizabeth, 346; send embassy to England to intervene in favor of Charles I., iii. 111, 116; relations with England after the death of William II. of Holland, 153; their hospitality to Charles, ii. 248; farewell of Prince of Orange to, 348; his address on his visit to Holland, 390, 391; included in peace of Ryswick, iv. 24; appeal to England against Louis XIV., 40; sign second Grand Alliance, 41; recall their ambassador from France, 44; desirous of peace, 56, 57; excessive demands on France, 65; protest against Treaty of Utrecht, 68; send auxiliaries to English government in 1715, 104; Stanhope negotiates treaty with, 110, allied with George II., 152.
- STEELE, RICHARD, in House of Commons, iv. 85.
- STEINKIRK, battle of, iii. 401.
- STEPHEN, King of England, son of Count of Blois, grandson of the Conqueror, claims English throne, i. 138; crowned, 138; receives homage of Norman barons, 139; marries his son to sister of French king, 139; revolt of barons against, 140; makes treaty of peace with Scotland, 142; alienates the clergy, 142; his wars with Empress Maud, 143-146; adopts Henry, 148; his death, 148.
- STEPHENS, JAMES, leader of Fenian movement, v. 370; his disappearance, 371.

- STEPHENS, Mr., arrested by Colonel Pride, iii. 105.
- STEWART, MURDOCH, son of Duke of Albany, made prisoner at Homildon Hill, i. 368.
- , JAMES, Scottish lawyer, iii. 311.
- of Badenoch, confidential agent of Marquis of Athol, iii. 376.
- STIGAND. See Canterbury.
- STILLINGFLEET, his defence of Anglican church, iii. 332.
- STIRLING, captured by Edward I., i. 253; surrenders to Charles Edward, iv. 159; entered by Duke of Cumberland, 172.
- STIRLING CASTLE, surrendered to Edward I., i. 265; besieged by Bruce, 276; by Charles Edward, iv. 170, 171, 172.
- STOKE, battle of, ii. 93.
- STONEHENGE, Saxons murder British at, i. 30.
- STONY POINT, captured by Washington, iv. 254.
- STOW, battle of, iii. 72.
- STRABANE, Lord, Claude Hamilton, summons the people of Londonderry to surrender, iii. 371.
- STRACHAN, Captain, marches against Montrose, iii. 134.
- STRAFFORD, Lord, Thomas Wentworth, at head of Parliamentary coalition against Charles I., ii. 415; becomes member of the king's council, 416; his character; administration in Ireland, 418; ascendancy over Irish Parliament, 419; raises troops for Charles in Ireland, 424; summoned to England by the king; his policy, 425; obtains subsidies in Ireland; in command of royal army in Scotland, ii. 427; energy of his policy, 428; fears to appear before Long Parliament, 429; impeached and imprisoned, 430; union of Presbyterians and popular party against him, 431; conducts his own defence, 432; closing words of defence, 433; bill of attainder passed by the Lords; attempts of the king to save him, 434; condemned by the Commons, 435; his letter to the king, 436; his execution, 437-438.
- , Lord, letter from Bolingbroke, iv. 89; suspected of complicity with Bolingbroke, 94.
- STRANGE, Lord, son of Lord Stanley, ii. 82.
- STRASBURG, retained by the French at treaty of Ryswick, iv. 23; claimed by Germany, 60.
- , M. Guizot's plan in regard to, v. 393.
- STRATFORD-UPON-AVON, birthplace of Shakespeare, ii. 366; his house at, 381.
- STRATHALLAN, Lord, in command of Jacobite forces remaining in Scotland, iv. 163.
- STRATHKATHRO, cemetery of, i. 253.
- STREATER, his accusation against Cromwell, iii. 161.
- STRICKLAND, THOMAS, excluded from Parliament by Elizabeth, reinstated by the House, 308.
- STRICKLAND, WALTER, envoy of the Commonwealth to the Hague, iii. 153.
- STRODE, WILLIAM, charged with high-treason, iii. 13; attempted arrest of, 14; his escape, 15; triumphant return to Parliament, 17; brings news of battle of Edgehill to London, 27.
- STRUT, Judge, his opposition to James II., iii. 330.
- STUART, ARABELLA, cousin of James I., her claim to the English throne, ii. 383; plot in her favor, 385; her marriage, imprisonment and death, 393.
- , CHARLES EDWARD (the young Pretender, 1720-1788), his first attempt on England (1744), iv. 156; letter to his father, arrives in Scotland, 157; persuades the Macdonalds and Lochiel of Cameron to join him, 158-159; organizes his army at Perth, his proclamation, 159; takes possession of Edinburgh, 160; gains victory of Preston Pans, 161-162; receives assistance from France, 163; prepares to invade England, 164; his appeal to the people of Great Britain, 164, 165; takes Carlisle, 166; devotion of Mrs. Skyring to, advances as far as Derby, 167; is forced to retreat by his partisans, 168-169; pursued by Cumberland, 169; defeats General Hawley at Falkirk, 170; is urged to retire into the Highlands, 171; his retreat, 172; encamps at Culloden, is attacked by Cumberland, 173; his conduct during the battle, 174; his defeat, takes refuge with Lord Lovat, 175; his wanderings in the Highlands, 176; devotion of the Macdonalds to him, escapes to France, 177; his reception at court of France, 178; indignation at seeing English hostages in Paris, 181; appeal to Louis XV. for further assistance, 181-182; forced to leave France after treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, his secret visits to England, 182; death at Rome, 183.
- , JAMES (the first Pretender), son of James II., his legitimacy doubted, iii. 341; inquiry on the subject, 349; taken to France, 353; no one dares to assert his legitimacy, 361; recognized as king by Louis XIV., iv. 42, 43; his banishment insisted upon by Marlborough as condition of peace, 61; obliged to leave France on Peace of Utrecht, his obstinacy, 75; in French army at Malplaquet, 77; attempts for his conversion to Protestantism, 86; Bolingbroke's plot for his restoration, 87, 88; declares his attachment to Catholicism, 88; his proclamation on death of Queen Anne, 93; joined by Bolingbroke, 96; rising in Scotland in his favor (1715), 98; proclaimed at Warkworth in Northumberland, 99; arrives in Scotland, 103; personal appearance, 103-104; assurances to his partisans, 104; escapes to France, letter to Argyle, 105; the regent refuses him support, dismisses Bolingbroke in favor of Ormond, 106; abandoned by Bolingbroke, takes refuge at Avignon, 107; required by Triple Alliance to cross the Alps, 112; intrigues of Alberoni in his favor, 113, 114; established at Madrid, 112; obliged to leave Madrid; his marriage with Princess Sobieski, 117; birth of his son, Atterbury's plot, 125;

- alienates Spain and the empire by ill-treatment of his wife, 134; attempt of Charles Edward in his favor (1745), 156; letter from his son, 157; advises his son to leave France, 182; inscription upon his tomb, 183.
- STUART, Lord JAMES. See Earl of Murray.
- , Sir JOHN, his victory at Maida, iv. 380; seizes Ionian Islands (1809), 390.
- , House of, restored to English throne, ii. 255; rejected for the second time by the English, 358; its ill-fortune, iv. 117.
- STUARTS, inscription upon their tombs, iv. 183.
- STUCKELEY, adventurer in Ireland, ii. 347.
- SUFFOLK, Duchess of, mother of Lady Jane Grey, ii. 231-240.
- , Duke of, John de la Pole, ii. 92.
- , Duke of, Charles Brandon, in love with Princess Mary, ii. 127; marries her, 128; his campaign in France, 147, 148; his altercation with Wolsey, 159; carries order of the king to Wolsey, 161; minister of Henry VIII. after Wolsey's fall, 166; sent against insurgents, 186, 187; sent on mission to Cleves, 198.
- , Duke of, formerly Lord Dorset, ii. 229; joins in name of Lady Jane Grey, 241; abandons her, 241; incites rebellion against Mary, 243; is defeated, 249; is beheaded, 251.
- , Earl of, killed at Agincourt, i. 392.
- , Earl of, sent to relief of Crevant, ii. 15; takes command at Orleans, 21; refuses to retire at request of Joan of Arc, 24; besieged in Jargeau, is made prisoner, 26; at head of affairs in England, 39; accused before Parliament and banished, 40; executed, 41.
- , Earl of, Edmund de la Pole, suspicions of Henry VII. concerning, ii. 113, 114; his execution, 115.
- , Earl of, High Chamberlain to James I., discovers Guy Fawkes, ii. 389, 390.
- , Earl of, Michael de la Pole, favorite of Richard II., i. 350.
- , Lord, proposes employment of Indians in American War, iv. 245.
- SUFFREN, BAILLI de (1726-1788), French Naval commander, iv. 266; in command of French fleet in India, 271; brave resistance to English, 272; threatens Madras, 289.
- SULLIVAN, General, in American army, failure of his expedition against Rhode Island, iv. 252.
- SUMNER PALACE, of Chinese Emperors at Peking, destroyed by Lord Elgin, v. 312; monument raised on the spot, 313.
- SUMTER, the, privateer, v. 327.
- , FORT, surrenders, v. 321.
- SUNDERLAND, Lord (Robert Spencer), in accord with Halifax, iii. 280; member of privy council of Charles II., 281, 282; allied with Shaftesbury to secure passage of Exclusion Bill, 285; minister of James II., 307; efforts to supplant Rochester, 328; introduces seven bishops to the king, 338; sends him news of their acquittal, 343; in favor of William of Orange, 347; deprived of the seals, 350; returns to court, 403; resumes power, iv. 22; dismissal, 27.
- SUNDERLAND, Lord (Charles Spencer), comes into power, 1708; member of Whig Junta, iv. 82; secretary of state to George I., 113; in favor of retention of Test Act, 120; compromised by inquiry into South Sea Company, his death, 124.
- SUPREMACY, ACT of, adopted upon Elizabeth, ii. 273; its abuse by James II., iii. 330.
- SURAJAH DOWLAH, sovereign of Bengal, captures Calcutta, iv. 205; calls French to his aid, 206.
- SURREY, Duke of, brother of Richard II., i. 357; detained as prisoner by Bolingbroke, 358; is deprived of his title by Henry IV. and becomes Earl of Huntingdon, 361.
- , Earl of, See Duke of Norfolk.
- , Earl of (Warren), made governor of Scotland, i. 254; raises an army, 259; defeated at Stirling, 260.
- , Earl of (1516-1547), ii. 143; at head of army in France, 144; his character; execution, 213; his poetry, 365.
- , Lord, proposes vote of want of confidence in North's ministry, iv. 269.
- SUSSEX, Saxon kingdom of, founded i. 31.
- , Duke of, takes oath of allegiance to Queen Victoria, v. 15.
- , Earl of, ambassador of Queen Elizabeth to Vienna, ii. 299; sent against Catholic insurgents, 304.
- SUTHERLAND, Duchess of, her dismissal demanded by Sir Robert Peel, v. 20.
- , Lord, in command of Whig clans in opposition to the Pretender in 1715, iv. 102.
- SUTTEE, the, prohibited by Lord Dalhousie, v. 241.
- SWEDEN, at war with Denmark, iii. 210; concludes Triple Alliance with Holland and England, 266; Marlborough's negotiations in, iv. 58; war with Denmark ended through intervention of England, iv. 120; concludes treaty of Hanover, 133; allied with France and Austria in Seven Years' War; sends army into Pomerania (1757), 196; negotiates at Basle with French Republic; concludes peace, 331; joins Russia against England, 344; accedes to coalition against Napoleon (1805), 369; allied with Russia and France, 395.
- , Sovereigns of: —
- ERIC XIV., as Duke, proposes for Princess Elizabeth, ii. 263; renews his proposals after his accession, 277, 278.
- GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, ii. 424.
- CHRISTINA, her abdication (1654), iii. 169.
- CHARLES AUGUSTUS, at war with Denmark, iii. 210.
- CHARLES XII., engaged in Jacobite intrigues, iv. 114; his death (1718), 116.
- GUSTAVUS III., invades Russia, iv. 309; his assassination (1792), iv. 321.
- GUSTAVUS IV., deposed 1809, iv. 395.
- SWEYN, King of Denmark, father of Canute, invades England, i. 68, 69, 70, 73; takes title of King of England, 74; death of, 74.
- , King of Norway, son of Canute, i. 77.
- , son of Earl Godwin, i. 86.

- SWEYN, King of Denmark, sends aid to the Saxons, i. 109.
- SWIFT, JONATHAN, his friendship for Harley and Bolingbroke, iv. 85; quoted, 87; letter from Harley to, 88; letter on the Whigs, 91; letter from Bolingbroke to, 129.
- SWINTON, FORDUN, Scottish baron, at Homildon Hill, i. 367.
- SWISS, conclude treaty with France, ii. 124.
- CONFEDERATION, its position in Europe, iii. 150; sends commissioner to tribunal of arbitration at Geneva, 334.
- GUARDS, of Louis XVI. massacred, Aug. 10th (1792), iv. 322.
- SWITZERLAND, hostilities break out in (1799), iv. 343; Bonaparte's influence in, 356; its neutrality established, v. 395.
- SYBIL, grand-daughter of Godfrey of Bouillon, wife of Hugh of Lusignan, i. 191.
- SYDENHAM, Colonel, proposes abdication of "Barebones Parliament," iii. 165; justifies opposition of the army to Parliament, 216.
- SYNOD OF BISHOPS, Stephen summoned before, i. 143.
- GENERAL, in Scotland, ii. 424, 425.
- SYRIA, war between Turkey and Egypt for possession of, v. 34, 35, 36, 40; Ibrahim Pasha ordered to evacuate, 43; disturbances in, 314; peace restored, 315.
- T.
- TACITUS, Roman historian, quoted, i. 20, 22.
- TAHITI, question of its occupation, v. 100; French protectorate established in, 105; difficulties between France and England concerning, 105-107.
- TAILLEFER, minstrel of Norman army, i. 104.
- TALavera, battle of, iv. 389.
- TALBOT, Lord, before Orleans, ii. 24; commands English army, 26; made prisoner at Patay, 27; hostage in hands of the French, 40; dispatched to Guienne, 43; killed at Castillon, 44.
- TALLARD, Count of, negotiates the second Partition treaty with Duke of Portland, iv. 33; in command of Louis XIV.'s army in Germany, 52; taken prisoner at Blenheim, 53.
- TALLEYRAND, M. de (1754-1838), in London as agent of French Republic, iv. 323; warned by Fox of plot against Napoleon, 377; his disgrace, 390; ambassador of Louis Philippe in London, 449.
- TALMASH, THOMAS, commands the attack on Brest, mortally wounded, iii. 405.
- TANCARVILLE, Comte de, surrenders to Edward III. before Caen, i. 304.
- TANCRED, Count of Luce, King of Sicily, i. 188.
- TANGIER, part of dower of Catherine of Braganza, iii. 259; its importance to England, v. 109; attacked by Prince de Joinville, 110.
- TANIST, ancient Irish title, i. 172.
- TANNEGUY, DUCHÂTEL, Breton knight, carries the Dauphin, Charles, away from Paris, i. 396; his treachery to John the Fearless, 399.
- TANTIA TOPEE, lieutenant of Nana Sahib, defeated by Sir Colin Campbell, v. 268; hanged, 269; his co-operation with the Rancee of Jhansi, 270.
- TASMANIA. See Van Dieman's Land.
- TATE, American commander of expedition against Wales, iv. 334.
- ZOUCH, his proposition of Self-denying Ordinance, iii. 56.
- TAUNTON, Monmouth proclaimed king in, iii. 316.
- valet of Lord Russell, iii. 293.
- TCHERNAVA, battle of, v. 224.
- TEA, importation of resisted by American colonies, iv. 233.
- TEIGNMOUTH, burned by French sailors, iii. 386.
- TEMPLARS, the Knights, Messina given up to, i. 188; Acre taken from, 243.
- TEMPLE, the, burned by mob under Wat Tyler, i. 346.
- Lord, Richard Grenville (1710-1777), brother-in-law of Chatham, iv. 193; obtains Order of the Garter, 211; visits Wilkes in prison, 222; hostility to Bute, 227.
- Lord, charged with message from George III. to House of Commons, iv. 298; temporarily secretary of state in Pitt's cabinet, 299.
- Sir WILLIAM, ambassador to Holland, iii. 265; envoy to Congress of Nimequen, 274; proposes royal council of thirty members, 280, 281.
- TENANT-RIGHT, in Ireland, v. 386, 387.
- TENCIN, Cardinal, encourages attempt of Charles Edward, iv. 156, 157.
- TENERIFFE, battle of, iii. 186.
- TENNESSEE, joins Southern Confederacy, v. 322.
- TENNYSON, ALFRED, his influence on his time, v. 169.
- TERMES, Marshal de, made prisoner at Gravelines, ii. 263.
- TERTULLIAN, Roman historian, i. 28.
- TEST ACT, passed, iii. 270; violated by James II., 325; attempted repeal of (1713), iv. 120; Pitt's attitude in regard to, 303; George III.'s opposition to repeal of, 346; Howick's modification of, 380.
- TEWKSBURY, battle of, ii. 63.
- TEXAS, State of, joins Southern Confederacy, v. 320.
- THACKERAY, WILLIAM MAKEPEACE (1811-1863), v. 168.
- "THANES," or Saxon proprietors, i. 58.
- THANET, Isle of, Saxons established in, i. 30, 35.
- THEOBALD. See Canterbury.
- THEODORE, King of Abyssinia, v. 376; his treatment of the English, 377; gives up his prisoners to Sir Robert Napier, 378; his death, 379.
- THEODOSIUS THE GREAT, Roman emperor, i. 26.
- THÉROUENNE, Bishop of, brother of Philip of Burgundy, i. 401.
- THIERRY, Landgrave of Alsace, i. 136.

- THIERS, M., on English alarm in anticipation of Bonaparte's invasion, iv. 360; his accession to power, v. 35; his remarks to M. Guizot concerning the war with England, 39; resignation of, 42.
- THIRLWALL, Bishop, his history of Greece, v. 167; in favor of disestablishment of Irish Church, 385.
- THISTLEWOOD, ARTHUR, instigator of Cato Street Conspiracy, iv. 410.
- THOM, JOHN NICHOLLS, his insurrection under name of Sir William Courtenay, v. 24, 25; death, 25.
- THOMAS, VALENTINE, accused of project to assassinate Elizabeth, ii. 346; hanged, 347.
- THOMPSON, Captain, leader of mutineers, iii. 127.
- THONG-CASTER, camp of Hengist i. 30.
- THROGMORTON, Sir NICHOLAS, acquitted of conspiracy in favor of Elizabeth, ii. 251; sent to Scotland by her, 284; sent to command the liberty of Mary Stuart, 292.
- , FRANCIS, condemned to death for conspiracy against Elizabeth, ii. 322.
- THUGS, suppressed by Lord Dalhousie, v. 241.
- THULE (Iceland), i. 23.
- THURKILL, Danish chief, i. 72, 73.
- THURLOE, JOHN, reveals conspiracy against Cromwell, iii. 178; his letter from Lockhart, 191; letters from Henry Cromwell, 192, 193, 194; prepares Richard Cromwell's answer to petition of the army, 197; his fears in regard to the new government, 198; proposes recognition of Richard Cromwell to Parliament, 199; receives information of Royalist insurrection, 212; his letter to Charles II., 241; fails to secure his re-election to Parliament of 1660, sent to the Tower, 247.
- THURLOW, Lord (1731-1806), Lord Chancellor in North's cabinet, iv. 267; negotiates with the opposition, 268; chancellor in Rockingham's second cabinet, 269; his admiration of Burke's speech against Hastings, 292; opposes Fox's India Bill, 297; member of Pitt's cabinet (1783), 299; remarks on disinterestedness of Pitt, 301; intrigues with Prince of Wales, 310; speech in his own defence, 312; dismissed (1792), 320.
- TICONDEROGA, taken from the French by Lord Amherst, 1759, iv. 199, 200.
- "TICKET-OF-LEAVE" system, v. 288-290.
- TIEN-TSIN, treaty of, v. 308; port of, open to European commerce, 313.
- TIERNEY, GEORGE (1761-1830), in opposition against Pitt, iv. 338.
- TILBURY FORT, Elizabeth reviews her troops at, ii. 339; camp of, broken up, 342.
- TILLOTSON. See Canterbury.
- TILSIT, Peace of (1807), France, Russia, and Prussia, iv. 381; secret article of, 383.
- TIMES, The London, quoted, v. 338.
- TIMOUR, House of, death of last representative in Delhi, v. 265.
- TIPPERARY, Fenian attempt at, v. 371.
- TIPPOO SAHIB, son of Hyder Ali, iv. 272; makes treaty with England, 290.
- TITCHFIELD, Castle of, Charles I., takes refuge in, iii. 94.
- TOBAGO, Island of, retained by English in treaty of Fontainebleau, iv. 219; captured by Comte de Grasse, 263; ceded to France by peace of Versailles, 280.
- TOCQUEVILLE, M. de, prediction in regard to slavery in the United States, v. 319.
- TODLEBEN, Colonel, on staff of Mentschikoff at Sevastopol, v. 193; his defences of Sevastopol, 200; wounded, 227.
- TOMPKINS, executed for complicity in Royalist plot, iii. 33.
- TOMLINE, Bishop of London, Pitt's letter to, in regard to the king's insanity, iv. 309-310.
- TOMLINSON, Colonel, in command of the guard at execution of Charles I. 117.
- TONE, WOLFE, Irish conspirator, his death, iv. 340.
- TONGE, Dr., affirms existence of Popish Plot, iii. 278.
- TONNERRE, Comte de, killed at Verneuil, ii. 17.
- TOOKE, JOHN HORNE, prosecuted for political libels, iv. 325.
- TORCY, M. de, French Minister of Foreign Affairs, iv. 43; quoted, 44, 59, 60; bearer of concessions from Louis XIV. to the Dutch, 61, 62; his criticism of the Dutch, 65; secret negotiations with England, 67.
- TORIES, the party of the court, name first used, iii. 280; in power in council of Charles II., under presidency of Halifax, 282; origin of the name, 282 (note); in majority in first Parliament of James II., 303; unite with the Whigs in opposition to James II., 346; in favor of regency, 361, 362; bring forward claims of Anne, 363; their experience in business, 368; numerous in Parliament of 1690, 379; their objections to Abjuration Bill, 380; compose half of Mary's council, 381; superseded by the Whigs, 403; accusations against certain of their leaders, iv. 14; their opposition to the king's Irish land grants, 36, 37; their triumph, 38; unite with the Whigs in resenting French recognition of the Pretender, 44; Anne's preference for, 50; their suspicions of Marlborough, 54; come into power, 67; peace of Utrecht and of Rastadt due to, 76, 77; attached to conservative principles, 80; their Occasional Conformity Bill, passed 1711, 81; go out of power, 82; return, 84; superseded by Whigs, 91; Bolingbroke's influence with, 107; oppose foreign policy of Sir Robert Walpole, 140; come into power with Lord Bute in 1761, 218; go out on resignation of Lord North (1782), 269; allied with Whigs in coalition cabinet, 281, 294; restored to power on accession of William Pitt (1783), 298; their temporary loss of ascendancy during Grenville's administration (1806), 376; return to power (1807), 388; duration of their rule, 412; attempt coalition with the Whigs under Goderich (1827), continue in power under Wellington, 417; go out on his resignation (1850), 429; in power during ad-

- ministration of Sir Robert Peel, go out on his resignation, v. 115; restored on resignation of Palmerston, 286; dissatisfied with Disraeli's Reform Bill, 298; their lack of sympathy with Italian patriots, 304.
- TORRES VEDRAS, surrendered to English, iv. 387; Wellington's lines of, 395.
- TORRINGTON, battle of, iii. 71.
- , Lord, Sir George Byng, English admiral, iv. 98; in command of fleet sent against Spain, captures Spanish fleet, 115.
- , Lord (Admiral brother Herbert), bearer of invitation to William of Orange, iii. 346, 350; member of Privy Council, 368; accused of treason, 386; acquitted, 389.
- TORTOSA, Cardinal of. See Popes.
- TOSTIG, son of Godwin, driven from Northumbria i. 87; offers aid to the conqueror, 92; seeks aid in Norway, 93; returns with Hardrada, 97; interview with Saxon warrior, 97; death of, 99.
- TOULON, captured by French republicans, 1793, iv. 326.
- TOULOUSE, claimed by Henry II., i. 152.
- , battle of, iv. 400.
- TOURAINÉ, nobility of, in favor of Prince Arthur, i. 203; regained by France, 207.
- TOURNAY, besieged by Edward III., i. 298; captured by Henry VIII., ii. 124; claimed by Holland, iv. 60; seized by Eugene and Marlborough, 64.
- TOURS, STEPHEN OF, treasurer of Henry II. of England, i. 185.
- TOURVILLE, Admiral de, his action hastened by Louis XIV., iii. 398; defeated at La Hogue, 399; causes losses to English maritime commerce, 402.
- TOUSTAIN (Thurstan), Archbishop of York, i. 140.
- , LE BLANC, Norman cavalier, i. 103.
- TOUTAIN, Norman chief, killed in church at Beverley, i. 111.
- TOWNLEY, Colonel, forms corps of volunteers for service of Charles Edward, 167; executed, 178.
- TOWNSHEND, Lord, Charles (1676-1738), secretary of state in first cabinet of George I., iv. 94; opposed to hasty conclusion of Triple Alliance, 112; displaced from office, 113; supported by Bolingbroke in his rivalry with Carteret, 129; accompanies George I. to Hanover, 130; negotiates treaty of Hanover, 133.
- , CHARLES (1725-1727), his death loss to Chatham's cabinet, iv. 228.
- TOWTON, battle of, ii. 52.
- TRADES-UNIONS, their influence, v. 373; legislation in regard to, 374.
- TRAFALGAR, battle of, iv. 371, 372.
- TRANSPORTATION OF CRIMINALS, first introduced, v. 287; theory of, 288; colonies protest against, 288, 289.
- TRÉMOILLE, CHARLOTTE DE, Countess of Derby, iii. 144; her defence of Isle of Man, 147.
- TRENT, the, affair of, v. 327-330.
- TRENTON, battle of, iv. 242.
- TRESHAM, joins Catesby's conspiracy, ii. 388; betrays his accomplices, 389; arrested, 390; his death, 391.
- TREVOR, Sir JOHN, condemned on charge of corruption, iv. 14.
- TRICHINOPOLY, siege of raised by Clive, iv. 204.
- TRIENNIAL BILL, discussion upon, iii. 404; William gives assent to, 407.
- TRIFELS, castle of, Cœur-de-Lion imprisoned in, i. 196.
- "TRIMMERS" political party under lead of Halifax, iii. 280.
- TRINIDAD, retained by England in Peace of Amiens, iv. 354.
- TRINITY COLLEGE, founded at Dublin, ii. 363; wealthy Protestant foundation, iv. 208.
- TRIPLE ALLIANCE, the, between England, Holland and Sweden, iii. 266.
- of 1717, iv. 111-112.
- TRINOBANTES, British tribe, i. 17.
- TROCHU, General, his government of Paris, v. 392-393.
- TROYES, treaty of (1420), i. 401; peace of (1564), ii. 282.
- , surrenders to Joan of Arc, ii. 27.
- TRUE LAW OF FREE MONARCHIES, pamphlet of James I., ii. 386.
- TRUSSEL, Sir WILLIAM, judge who condemned Despencer, i. 285-286.
- TUBERVIL, accomplice of Titus Oates, iii. 286.
- TUDOR, HENRY, Earl of Richmond. See Henry VII.
- , MARGARET. See Margaret Tudor.
- , OWEN, marries widow of Henry V., ii. 38; beheaded after battle of Mortimer's Cross, 49.
- TUILERIES, the, besieged by the mob, Aug. 20, 1792, iv. 322.
- , the, Cabinet of, v. 339.
- TULLIBARDINE, Lord, with Charles Edward in his attempt of 1745, iv. 157.
- , Marquis of, joins Lord Marshal's expedition to Scotland (1719), iv. 117; his death, 117.
- TUNIS, bombarded by Blake, iii. 174; incursions of Abd-el-Kadir into, v. 108.
- TUNSTALL, Bishop of Durham, ambassador of Henry VIII. to Germany, ii. 130; opposition to Cranmer, 232; released from imprisonment, 243.
- TURENNE, Vicomte de, French general in reign of Louis XIV., iii. 190; captures Dunkirk, 191; offers assistance to Charles II., 212.
- TURGOT, M. (1727-1781), recommends neutrality of France in American Revolution, iv. 243.
- , M. DE, minister of foreign affairs to Napoleon III., v. 145.
- TURIN, Prince Eugene's victory at, iv. 56.
- TURKEY, persistent hostilities with Russia, iv. 319; joins coalition against French Republic (1799), 343; unsuccessful English expedition against (1807), 381; difficulties with Egypt, v. 33-34; accepts mediation of European powers, 34; critical position of, 172; policy of Russia in regard to, 173-176; of England, 176; demands of the czar upon, 176-177; refuses to accept Vienna note, 178; beginning of war with

- Russia, 179; France and England declare war against Russia in support of (1854), 182; sends plenipotentiaries to Congress of Paris, 283; independence recognized, 234; new conditions imposed upon by Great Powers, 316; England comes to aid of, in affair of the Lebanon, 314-315.
- TURKEY, Sultans of:—
MUSTAFIA III., at war with Catherine II. (1788), iv. 309.
MAHMOUD, his death, v. 33.
ABDUL-MEDJID, v. 34; removes Mohammed Ali, 39; Mentschikoff's efforts to wring concession from, 177; refuses Vienna note, 178; grants religious freedom in Ottoman States, 234; his death, 315.
ABDUL-AZIZ, his visit to England, v. 375, 376.
- TUSCANY, duchy of, succession to, assured to children of Elizabeth Farnese by Quadruple Alliance, iv. 114; hereditary rights of Don Carlos of Spain to, 132; negotiations at Basle with French Republic, 328; concludes peace, 331.
 —, Grand Duke of (Ferdinand III. 1769-1824), signs peace with French republic (1795), iv. 331.
- TUTBURY CASTLE, Mary Stuart imprisoned at, ii. 298.
- TWEEDDALE, Marquis of, his difficulties in administration of Scotch affairs, iv. 162.
- TYNDAL, his version of the Bible prohibited by Henry VIII., ii. 201.
- TYRCONNEL, Earl of, Richard Talbot, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, iii. 334, 369, 370; his death, 388.
- TYRE, archbishop of, preaches in favor of the crusade, i. 180.
- TYRNSTEIN, castle of, Cœur-de-Lion imprisoned at, i. 196.
- TYROL, the, surrendered to Bavaria at peace of Presburg (1805), iv. 373.
- TYRONE, Earl of, Hugh, revolts against Elizabeth, ii. 348; concludes armistice with Essex, 349; compelled to surrender, 353.
- TYRREL, Sir JOHN, murderer of the young princes, ii. 78; executed on confessing the crime, 114.
 —, WALTER, i. 124; causes the death of William Rufus, 125.
- TYTLER, PATRICK FRASER (1791-1849), his History of Scotland, v. 167.
- TZARGRAD (Constantinople), v. 172.
- U.
- ULF, Danish chieftain, anecdote of, i. 78.
ULFNORTH, father of Godwin, i. 78, 91.
ULM, surrender of, to Napoleon (1805), iv. 370, 371.
ULSTER, Irish kingdom of, i. 172; Protestant rising in, iii. 369, 370; colonization of, by English and Scotch in reign of James I., v. 130; tenant-right in, 387, 388.
UMFREVILLE, Sir INGLETRAM d', marshal of Edward II. at Bannockburn, i. 277.
UNQUA, messenger to General Havelock, v. 261.
- UNIFORMITY, Act of, adopted under Elizabeth, ii. 273; passed in reign of Charles II., iii. 257.
- UNION of England and Scotland, recommended by William III. to Parliament, iv. 46; negotiations in regard to, 78; accomplished (1707), 79.
 — of England and Ireland, iv. 343.
- "UNITED IRISHMEN," organ of Young Ireland party, v. 127.
- UNITED PROVINCES, their revolt against Philip II., ii. 398; position in Europe, iii. 150; receive envoys of the Commonwealth, 153; reject their terms, 154; join Triple Alliance, 266; conclude peace with England, 271; bear principal burden of war of Spanish succession, iv. 60; conclude Treaty of Utrecht, 75. See also Low Countries and Holland.
- UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, constituted by Declaration of Independence, iv. 240; apply to France for aid, 243; recognized by France, 247; conclude peace of Versailles with England, 277, 278; place embargo on their ports (1807), 383; declare war against England (1812), 397; invasion of Canada, 398; causes of the civil war in, v. 318-320; outbreak of war, 321, 322; England's attitude towards, 323, 324; army defeated at Bull Run, 324; enthusiasm at the North, indignation against England, 326; difficulty with England concerning the Trent, 327-330; controversy with England on the Alabama question, 332-335; protests against establishment of Mexican monarchy, 337; close of civil war, 338; Fenian movement in, 369, 370.
- UPSAL, Diet of, iii. 169.
- URBAN II. See Popes.
- URBEL, Castle of, taken by the French (1719), iv. 118.
- URSINS, JUVENAL des, quoted, i. 401.
 —, LOUIS d', at Melun, i. 403.
- USHANT, battle of, iv. 251.
- USHER, JAMES, Archbishop of Armagh, iii. 257; his project for union of Presbyterians and Anglicans, 257.
- UTRECHT, conferences at, iv. 68, v. 397; peace signed at (1713), iv. 75.
 —, Treaty of, iv. 68; unpopular in England, 69; attacked in Parliament, 71; censured by both Houses, 94; its execution opposed by the Whigs, 140.
- UXBRIDGE, conferences at, between Charles I. and Parliament, iii. 57, 58.
- UXELLES, Marshal d', envoy of Louis XIV. to the Dutch, iv. 64.
- V.
- VAGRANCY, laws against, ii. 225.
- VAILLANT, Marshal, French minister of war, Canrobert's letter to, v. 221, 222; defends Pélissier, 226.
- VALENCE, Bishop of, prime minister of England under Henry III., i. 226.
 —, JOAN of. See Joan of Valence.
 —, WILLIAM of, i. 232.
- VALENCIENNES, seized upon by Austrians, iv. 325.

- VALENTINIAN, Roman emperor, Britain in time of, i. 26.
- VALLADOLID, battle of, iv. 335.
- , camp of the Black Prince, i. 332.
- VALLEY FORGE, General Washington's camp at, iv. 246.
- VALMY, battle of, iv. 322.
- VALOIS, JANE of. See Jane of Valois.
- , MARGUERITE of. See Marguerite of Valois:
- , PHILIP of. See France.
- VAN ARTEVELDT. See Arteveldt.
- VANCOUVER'S ISLAND, annexed to British Columbia, v. 294.
- VAN DIEMEN'S LAND, transportation of criminals to, v. 288; protest of colonists, 289.
- VANE, Sir HARRY, his announcement in Parliament, ii. 426, 427; concludes alliance with the Scots, iii. 40; negotiates for Parliament with the king, 57; the king's secret relations with, 72; his intrigues in Parliament, 89; opposed to continuance of the monarchy, 100; protests against trial of the king, 107; consents to sit in council of state, 121; his measures against Royalist invasion, 143, 144; introduces Dissolution Bill, 161, 162; Cromwell's reply to his protest, 162, 163; fails to secure election to Parliament in 1656, 174; opposes Richard Cromwell, 200; his overtures to officers of the army, 201; opposition to Parliament, instigator of difficulties in the army, 203; attempts to drive Prynne from Parliament, 207; without hope for the Republic, 211; unites with the army, his character, 214, 215; suspicions of Monk, 220; sent to his residence at Raby, 223; farewell to Ludlow, 234; excluded from general amnesty, 253; trial, 258; executed, 259.
- , Sir RALPH, friend of Somerset, his execution, ii. 230.
- VAN HEEMSKIRK, envoy of States-General in France, iv. 44.
- VANNES, captured and recaptured by claimants to Brittany, i. 303.
- VAN TROMP, Dutch Admiral, his encounter with English fleet, iii. 156; resigns, 157; his victories over the English, 157, 158; is killed, 163.
- VARNA, base of operations for allied army in Crimea, v. 184.
- VASSY, Protestants massacred at, ii. 281.
- VAUDEMONT, Prince of, visits court of James I., ii. 392.
- VAUDREUIL, LOUIS DE RIGAUD, Comte de (1691-1763), French naval officer, fails in attempt to recapture Quebec, iv. 201.
- VAUDREUIL, M. de, major of guards of Louis XV., arrests Charles Edward, iv. 182.
- VAUGHN, Sir THOMAS, beheaded at Pontefract, ii. 74.
- VAULT, M. de, quoted, iv. 40.
- VAURUS, Bastard de, governor of Meaux, his death, i. 406.
- VENDÔME, Bastard de, takes Joan of Arc prisoner, ii. 30.
- , Count of, taken prisoner at Agincourt, i. 292.
- VENDÔME, Duke of, his capture of Barcelona, iv. 23; in command of French army in Flanders, 56; second in command at capture of Ghent, 58; defeated at Oudenarde, 59; sent to Spain, 65.
- VENDÉMIARE, 13th (Oct. 5, 1795), Bonaparte's suppression of attempt against the Directory, iv. 323.
- VENETIA, Orsini's hopes for English intervention in favor of, v. 281; Emperor Napoleon makes war on Austria for deliverance of, 302; remains under Austrian rule, 303; given up to Italy by France, 336.
- VENICE, surrendered to Italy by peace of Presburg (1805), iv. 373.
- VENNER, Fifth Monarchy fanatic, iii. 255.
- VENTADOUR, Count of, taken prisoner at Crevant, ii. 16; killed at Verneuil, 17.
- VERDEN, duchy of, George I. gains possession of, iv. 120.
- VERDUN, Treaty of, ii. 345.
- VERE, ROBERT de, favorite of Richard II., made Duke of Ireland, i. 350. See note, 354.
- VERGENNES, M. de, French minister of foreign affairs, in favor of secret aid to America, iv. 243; negotiates for peace with England (1782), 274; efforts for pardon of Asgill, 276; letter to La Luzerne on secrecy of American negotiations, 278.
- VERNEUIL, taken by Philip Augustus, i. 206-208; taken by Edward III., 305; surrenders to Duke of Bedford, ii. 17.
- , battle of, ii. 17.
- VERNON, taken by Edward III., i. 305.
- , Admiral, Edward, victorious at Porto Bello, iv. 147, 148; disasters at Carthage and Santiago, 148.
- , Sir RICHARD, made prisoner at Shrewsbury, i. 370.
- VERSAILLES, Peace of, preliminaries signed (1782), iv. 277; definitively signed (1783), 278; cession of territory agreed upon, 280.
- , second treaty of, iv. 197.
- VERULAM, Roman colony in Britain, i. 21.
- , Lord. See Bacon.
- VEXIN, the, given as portion to wife of William Cliton, i. 136.
- VEZELAY, plains of, crusaders meet at, i. 187.
- VIANA, Prince of, demanded as hostage by Ferdinand of Aragon, ii. 120.
- VICKSBURG, surrenders to General Grant (1863), v. 338.
- VICTOR, Anti-pope, i. 162, 165.
- VICTOR, Marshal, at Estremadura, iv. 390.
- AMADEUS. See Sardinia and Savoy.
- EMANUEL, troops recruited in England in support of, v. 284.
- VICTORIA, Queen, her birth (1819), iv. 405; accession (1837), 408, v. 13; her reign opens new era in career of England, 13, 14; her accession announced to her, 14; Greville's account of her first meeting with the council, 14, 15; popular enthusiasm in her favor, 15; her accession the signal for separation of Hanover from crown of England, her coronation, 16; affection for Lord Melbourne, 17; on resignation of Melbourne sends for Sir Robert Peel,

- 20; her opposition to his demands in regard to her household, 20, 21; recalls Lord Melbourne, 21; inventions and reforms in first part of her reign, 22-24; her marriage decided upon, 28; relations to Prince Albert referred to by M. Guizot, 30, 31; attempted assassination of, 33; birth of Prince of Wales, 63; letter from Sir Robert Peel, 80, 81; recalls Sir Robert Peel, 81; visit to Louis Philippe, 101, 102; receives visit from him, 102-104; her description of the Exposition, 140, 141; dissatisfaction with Palmerston, 142, 143, 145; sanitary and labor reforms in her reign, 153, 154; progress of public education, 154-157; emancipation of Jews, 157; religious movements, 157-161; scientific and literary men, 161-162; historians, 167; novelists and poets, 168-170; declares war against Russia, 182 (see Crimean war); sends plenipotentiaries to congress of Paris, 233; projected marriage of her daughter, 280; important reforms instituted in her reign, 287-293; her proclamation of neutrality in civil war in America, 323; death of her husband, 330; her speech on opening of Parliament of 1867, 365; takes charge of the Prince of Abyssinia, 379; calls upon Gladstone to form a cabinet, 383; consents to Irish Land Bill, 388; calls on Disraeli to form a cabinet, 408.
- VICTORIA, Princess, projected marriage with Crown-Prince of Prussia, v. 280.
- VIENNA, indignation at, in regard to second Partition Treaty, iv. 34; Marlborough's negotiations at, 58; threatened by allied armies, 150; given up to Napoleon, (1809), 391; Congress at, 1814, its decisions as to disposal of Napoleon, 402; second conference at, v. 219.
- , Congress of, v. 397.
- , peace of, 1809, iv. 392.
- , NOTE, refused by Turkey, v. 178.
- VIENNE, John of, in command at Calais, i. 313, 315, 316.
- VERZON, taken by Black Prince, i. 321.
- VILAINE, the naval engagement between French and English in, iv. 198.
- VILLA VICIOSA, battle of, iv. 65.
- VILLAFRANCA, peace of, v. 303.
- VILLARET-JOYEUSE, Admiral of French Republic, iv. 328.
- VILLARS, Marshal de, ambassador of Louis XIV., at Vienna, iv. 34; in command of French army in South of France, 52; ravages Palatinate, 58; in low countries, wounded at Malplaquet, 64; informed of instructions to Ormond, 72; Louis XIV., confides his last army to, 73; defeats Prince Eugène at Denain, 74; negotiates peace of Rastadt, 76; refuses command of army against Philip V., 118.
- VILLENEUVE, Admiral, in command of Bonapart's fleet, sent against England, iv. 370; defeated at Trafalgar, 371, 372.
- VILLEROY, Marshal de, placed in command of French armies on death of Luxembourg, iv. 15; in command of French army in Italy, 41; tries to prevent junction of Marlborough and Eugène, 52; defeated at Ramilies, 55; recalled, 56.
- VILLETTE, Marquise de, niece of Mme. de Maintenon, marries Viscount Bolingbroke, iv. 129.
- VILLIERS, CHARLES, demands abolition of duties on corn, v. 67; moves immediate abolition of corn-laws, 79; sympathizes with Northern States, 331.
- , GEORGE. See Duke of Buckingham.
- VIMEIRO, battle of, iv. 386.
- VIRGINIA, discovered by Raleigh, ii. 361; named by Queen Elizabeth, attempted colonization of 362.
- , State of, joined with New England in national movement against England, iv. 235, 236; joins Southern Confederacy in 1861, v. 321.
- VISSANT, JAMES and PETER DE, citizens of Calais, i. 316.
- VICTORIA, battle of, iv. 398.
- VOLTAIRE, his statement as to fortune of Marlborough, iv. 109; his relations with Earl Marshal, 117; friendship for Bolingbroke, 130; interview with Marshal Saxe, 154.
- VORSTEIN, CONRAD, his theological argument with James I., ii. 393.
- VORTIGERN, British King, i. 29, 30.
- VRESKY, General, aide-de camp of the Czar, v. 228.
- WADE, MARSHAL, in command of English troops against Charles Edward, iv. 166, 167, 168.
- , compromised in Whig conspiracies, in exile in Holland, iii. 309.

W.

- WAGRAM, battle of. (1809,) iv. 391, 392.
- WAHER, (GUADER) RALPH DE, Breton Knight, i. 112; his conspiracy against the Conqueror, 112, 113; banished, 113.
- WAKEFIELD, Hermit of. See Peter the Hermit.
- WALCHEREN, island of, occupied by the English, 1809, iv. 390.
- WALDEGRAVE, SIR EDWARD, sent to the Tower, ii. 273.
- , Lady, sent to the Tower, ii. 273.
- WALKER, GEORGE, Anglican priest, takes command at Londonderry, iii. 371; his death at battle of the Boyne, iv. 16.
- , his trial for political libels, iv. 325.
- WALES, (CAMBRIA), British Christians take refuge in, i. 33-36; added to Wessex, 54; annual tribute, 63-66; revolts against Henry II., 151-163; against John, 208; does not recognize authority of England, 245; subjected by Edward I., 246; revolts against him, 247; finally subdued, 248; revolts under Glendower, 366; subdued by Prince Henry, 373; annexed to England, ii. 202; attempted invasion of, by Tate, iv. 334; bill for public instruction in, v. 389-401.
- , Prince of. See Albert Edward.
- , Princess of, Alexandra of Denmark, wife of Albert Edward, her brother becomes King of Greece, v. 296, 297.

- WALE, Princess of, Augusta of Saxe Gotha, wife of Prince Frederick, ii. 177; her disputes with Duke of Cumberland, 184; opposition rallies about her, 190-211.
- WALEWSKI, Count, French ambassador at London during Russell's ministry, v. 144, 145; French Minister of Foreign affairs, 233-285; pleads cause of Poland with the Emperor, 343.
- WALLACE, Sir MALCOLM, i. 258.
- , WILLIAM, outlawed, i. 258; swears revenge on the English; raises an army against them, 259; defeats them at Bridge of Stirling, 260; defeated by Edward I, at Falkirk, 262; conceals himself in the mountains, 264; betrayed and executed, 265.
- WALLACHIA, Russian army in, v. 177; privileges guaranteed by treaty of Paris, 234.
- WALLER, EDMUND, eminent poet, engaged in royalist plot, his cowardice, iii. 33; political intrigue, 301.
- , Sir WILLIAM, his services to Parliament, iii. 32; defeated in Cornwall, 35; advances to besiege Oxford, 47; defeated at Cropredy Bridge, 48; ordered to join army of Essex, 51-53; resigns his command, 59; imprisoned by Republicans, 129.
- WALLOP, Sir JOHN, at head of expedition to France, ii. 208.
- WALLS, Roman, in Britain, i. 23, 24, 25.
- WALPOLE, Sir EDWARD, son of Sir Robert Walpole (Lord Orford), his death, iv. 299.
- , HORACE (1678-1757), brother of Sir Robert (Lord Orford), ambassador to the Hague, iv. 110; refuses to sign Triple Alliance, 112; supported by Bolingbroke in rivalry with Carteret, 129.
- , HORACE (afterwards Lord Orford, 1717-1797), son of Sir Robert Walpole, his memoirs quoted, iv. 140; letter on war with Spain and France, 153; on Chatham's speech against treaties with Prussia and Hesse, 189; criticism on administration of 1756, 190; letter on condition of England, 193.
- , Lady, her reception by Queen Caroline, iv. 140.
- (Spencer), withdraws from Derby's cabinet, v. 298; home secretary under Lord Derby in 1866, 363; resigns, 367.
- , Sir ROBERT (1676-1745), replaces Bolingbroke as secretary of state in 1706, iv. 82; accusations against him; imprisoned, 84; influential in House of Commons, 94; his report as to Tory ministry, 95; condemns indulgence to Jacobite prisoners, 108; out of favor with George I., 112; displaced from office, 113; speech on bill for limiting number of peers, 121; predicts disastrous results of South Sea speculations, 122; measures to save public credit, 123, 124; becomes Lord Treasurer; decides on trial of Atterbury, 125; obliged to defend himself against charge of forging the evidence, 126; proposes tax on Catholics, 128; coldness toward Bolingbroke, 129; statement in regard to treaty of Vienna, 132; objections to treaty of Hanover, 133; character of his administration, 134; Bolingbroke's unsuccessful attempt to ruin him, 134-135; at head of first cabinet of George II., 138; temporarily dismissed; recalled through influence of Queen Caroline, 139-140; attack on Bolingbroke in Parliament, 141; his Excise Bill, 141-142; Wyndham's attack upon him (1734), 142-143; replies, 143-146; authority shaken, 146; at death-bed of Queen Caroline; consents to war with Spain, 147; attack of the "patriots" upon him; his last triumph, 148; retires from office; made Lord Orford, 150; character of his administration, 151; England's neutrality ceases with his fall, 152; advises the king to call on Henry Pelham, 153; his reply to suggestion of taxation of American colonies, 224.
- WALSH, Sir ROBERT, sheriff of Worcester, his arrest of Catesby's accomplices, ii. 390.
- WALSINGHAM, chronicler, quoted, i. 337.
- , Sir FRANCIS, negotiates for Elizabeth's marriage with Duke of Anjou, ii. 309; concludes alliance with Catherine de' Medici, 310; convinced of necessity for Mary Stuart's execution, 513; his policy after massacre of St. Bartholomew, 314; in Scotland, 321; insists upon trial of Mary Stuart, 326; commissioner at her trial, ii. 328; his prudence after her execution, 336; his letter from Sir Francis Drake, 342; death, 343.
- WALTHAM ABBEY, i. 105.
- WALTHEOF, Saxon chief, receives Northumberland from the Conqueror, i. 112; marries Judith, 112; betrayed by his wife, 112; executed, 113.
- WALWORTH, WILLIAM, Lord Mayor of London, i. 348.
- WANDEWASH, fort of, captured by Colonel Coote, iv. 208.
- WANTAGE, birthplace of Alfred the Great, i. 42, 62.
- WARBECK, PERKIN, personates Richard of York; recognized as such by Charles VIII., ii. 100; by Margaret of Burgundy, 101; his unsuccessful insurrection, 102-103; marries Lady Catharine Gordon, 104; his second insurrection, 105; leaves Scotland, 106; again invades England; assumes title of Richard IV., 107; conduct of King Henry toward him, 108; his execution, 109.
- WARD, Mr., proposes reduction of Church establishment in Ireland, iv. 446.
- WARDLE, Colonel, iv. 367.
- WARE, assembly of the army at, iii. 95, 96, 97.
- WARHAM, Archbishop of Canterbury, quoted, ii. 150.
- WARK, Lord Grey of, in exile in Holland, iii. 309; engaged in Monmouth's insurrection, 315, 316, 317; saves himself by betraying his companions, 320.
- WARREN, Earl of, his reply to Edward I., i. 244-245.
- , Earl of Surrey. See Surrey.

- WARREN, Sir JOHN, English naval commander captures French ships, iv. 340.
- WARWICK, Earl of, under Edward I., i. 256; "black dog of the Ardennes," 275.
- , Earl of imprisoned in Isle of Man in reign of Richard II., i. 253.
- , Earl of (Richard Beauchamp, 1380-1439), custodian of Joan of Arc, ii. 31; Regent of France; his death, 37.
- , Earl of (Richard Nevil, 1420-1471, the king-maker), intrusted with Calais, ii. ii. 45; espouses cause of York, 46; his maxim to destroy the chiefs, 47; his compromise with Henry, 48; defeated at second battle of St. Alban's, 49; supports Edward IV., 50; at head of army, 54; captures Grey, 55; his dissatisfaction at Edward's marriage, 56; negotiates French alliance, 57; his breach with Edward, 58; accused of high-treason; seeks refuge with Louis XI., 59; supports the Lancastrians, 60; releases Henry VI., 61; defeated at Barnet, 62-63; his death, 63.
- , Earl of, Edward Plantagenet, son of Duke of Clarence, born 1475, ii. 59; imprisoned all his life, 84; personated by Simnel, 91; produced in public by Henry, 92; accused of plotting with Warbeck, 109; beheaded (1499), 110.
- , Earl of (John Dudley, Lord Lisle). See Northumberland.
- , Earl of (Ambrose Dudley, 1530-1589), son of Duke of Northumberland, condemned with his father for high treason, ii. 243; sentence not executed, 244; in command at Rouen, 281; reinforces Sussex, 304.
- , Earl of (Robert Rich), votes against Ireton's motion in regard to the king, iii. 99; protests against Cromwell's re-organization of Upper House, 185.
- WASHINGTON, GEORGE (1732-1799), in command of English troops in French war, iv. 188; with Braddock on expedition to Fort Duquesne, 190; his letter to his mother on the defeat, 191; letter on opposition of the colonies to England, 231; on the address to the throne, 231, 232; in favor of definite assertion of rights, 235; appointed commander-in-chief of American army, 236; his character, 237, 238; takes command of army before Boston, 238; his victories at Trenton and Princeton; invested with full powers by Congress, 242; at Valley Forge, 246; his letter on position of the armies in 1778, 252; refuses assent to expedition against Canada, 252, 253; his letter on the subject, 253; captures Stony Point, 254; his letter on state of affairs in 1777, 257, 258; encamped before New York, 258; hears of Arnold's desertion of West Point, 259; of his treachery, 260; André's letter to him, 260, 261; his severity in case of André, 261; difficulties with Pennsylvania troops, letter to Colonel Laurens, 262; advances against Cornwallis; invests Yorktown, 263; takes Yorktown, 264; decides to adopt system of reprisals, 275; his course in regard to Captain Asgill, 275-276; letter on English overtures for peace, 276, 277; to M. Luzerne on treaty of Versailles, 278; his gratification at conclusion of peace, 278; letter to Hamilton, 278, 279; averts military insurrection, 279.
- WAT TYLER, at the head of Kentish insurgents in reign of Richard II., i. 345; his conversation with the king; his death, 348.
- WELSH, persecuted for opposition to Episcopacy, ii. 398.
- WELLINGTON, Duke of, as Sir Arthur Wellesley, at city banquet, 1805, iv. 373; his successful expedition against Copenhagen, 382; his campaign in Portugal; disapproves convention of Cintra, 387; his victory at Talavera, 389; letter on condition of Spain, 390; campaign in Portugal against Massena, 395; forces him to evacuate Portugal; captures Ciudad Rodrigo and Badajos; gains battle of Arapeles in Salamanca (1812), 396; campaign of 1813 in Spain, 398; campaign of 1814, 400; takes command of allied armies against Napoleon, his victory at Waterloo (1815), 401; represents England in negotiations for peace, 402; rewarded for his services, 404; his encounter with the mob, 410; becomes Premier, on death of Liverpool, 1827, 417; convinced of necessity for Catholic Emancipation, 421; decides to attempt it, 422; speech in House of Lords (1829), 423; recognizes Louis Philippe as King of France, (1830), 427; refuses to advocate parliamentary reform; resigns, 429; fails to form cabinet (1832), 440; leaves the House on renewal of debate on Reform Bill, 440, 441; attacked by a mob, 441; his reception of popular enthusiasm, 441, 442; declines to form cabinet; conducts affairs in absence of Peel, 451; swears allegiance to Queen Victoria, v. 15; his jealousy of Melbourne's influence over the queen, v. 17; his advice to Victoria on the resignation of Melbourne, 20; his opinion concerning the war with France, 39; remark in regard to France, 43; member of Peel's cabinet, 60; his speech on repeal of Corn-Laws, 84, 86; remarks on Spanish affairs, 113; death, 148; his character, 148, 150.
- WELSH, their annual tribute, i. 63, 66; struggles for independence, 151, 163, 208; war with Edward I., 245; their patriotic spirit, 246; revolt against Edward, 247; subjection, 248; revolt under Gwendower, 366; reinforced by French, 372; subdued, 372.
- , Dr., reads protest of seceding members of Scottish Presbyterian Church, v. 160.
- WEMYSS, Lord, made prisoner at Pinkie, ii. 222.
- WENTWORTH, his examination by Archbishop Parker, ii. 309.
- WESEL, besieged by Prince of Brunswick, iv. 213.
- WESLEY, JOHN (1703-1791), religious reformer, associated with Whitfield, iv. 182; separates himself from Whitfield; his character, 186; separates from English Church, founds Methodism, 187.

- WEST INDIES, expeditions of English buccaners in, ii. 337.
- , British, slavery abolished in (1834), iv. 445, 446.
- WESTMINSTER, Archbishop of. See Wiseman.
- , trial of Charles I. at, 109-113.
- WESTMORELAND, Earl of, joins Bolingbroke, i. 356.
- , Earl of, reprimanded for heresy, ii. 263.
- , Earl of, joins Norfolk's insurrection in favor of Mary Stuart, ii. 304.
- WESTPHALIA, becomes possession of Jerome Bonaparte, iv. 331, 332.
- WESTPHALIA, Congress of, establishes peace between Catholics and Protestants in Germany, v. 397.
- , peace of, re-establishment required by Germany, iv. 60.
- WEST POINT, Arnold's arrangements for betrayal of, iv. 259.
- WESSEX, Saxon kingdom of, founded, i. 31; 40, 44, 45.
- WEXFORD, capture of, by Cromwell, iii. 132.
- , County of, in Ireland, devastated in 1798, iv. 340.
- WHALLEY, officer in Parliamentary army, iii. 82; in charge of Charles I. at Newmarket, 84; insurrection in his regiment, 127.
- WHARTON, Duke of, his quarrel with Stanhope, causes death of the latter, iv. 124.
- , Lord, arrives in London with news of battle of Edgehill, iii. 27; speech against Abjuration Bill, 380.
- , Marquis of, member of Whig Junta, iv. 82; remark in regard to Bolingbroke's presentation of Schism Bill, 86.
- WHEATSTONE, Professor, takes patent for invention in use of electricity, v. 22.
- WHEELER, Sir HUGH, in command at Cawnpore, v. 250; calls upon Nana Sahib for assistance, 252; besieged by him, 252-254; agrees to surrender, 254.
- WHEELER, Mr., appointed as Governor-General of India, iv. 288.
- WHIGS, country party; name first used, iii. 280; origin of the name, 282; note; their efforts to secure exclusion of Duke of York, 285, 286, 287, 288; re-actionary measures against, 288-289; their conspiracy, 291-292; their reliance on sincerity of James II., 304; difference of opinion as to deposition of James II., 361; assert right of the nation to choose its king, 362; jealousy of Tories toward, 368; propose Abjuration Bill, 380; recalled to power, 303-404; demand bill of attainder against Fenwick, iv. 22; powerfully organized as a party, 23; their indignation at French recognition of Pretender, 44; in power at Anne's accession; her aversion to them, 50; insist upon abandonment of Pretender by Louis XIV. as condition of peace, 61; displeased by the Tories, 67; attack peace of Rastadt, 76; party of progress; form first cabinet of Queen Anne, 80; return to power under Sunderland, 82-90; out of power, 83; their precautions against the Jacobites, 89; restored to power, 91; severe measures against Jacobites, 107, 108; temporary discouragement in consequence of Triple Alliance, 112; changes in the ministry, 113; Walpole fosters divisions in the party, 140; the members of the party in opposition to Walpole take the name of "patriots," 140, 147, 148; 97 out of power in (1761), 617; temporary return under Rockingham, (1765-1766), 227; struggle against measures of government against Armenia, 239; come into power under Shelburne (1782), 269; allied with Tories in Coalition Cabinet, 281, 295; schism among, 325; temporary return to power under Grenville in (1806), 376; go out (1807), 381; attack conduct of Peninsular War (1809), 388; opposition to Liverpool's government, 413; attempted coalition with Tories under Goderich (1827), 417; comes into power under Lord Grey (1830), 427; William IV's dislike to them, 451; in power on accession of Queen Victoria, v. 16; continue to hold the government, 21; their overthrow, 57, 60; speech from the throne on retiring, 62; propose fixed duty on corn, 67; their position in regard to Peel, 74; alliance with Bentinck and the Radicals, 86; return to power on resignation of Peel, 115; their ministry supported by Peel, 125, 132; allied with Peelites in Aberdeen's cabinet, 147; their power apparently secure, 280; opposed to Russell's Reform Bill, 306.
- WHITEHALL, Catesby's plot to destroy, ii. 388, 389; flight of Charles I. from, iii. 17; Charles I. executed at, 117, 118.
- WHITELOCKE, introduces Navigation Act, iii. 154; his conversations with Cromwell, 160, 161; predictions to Cromwell, 166; negotiates with Christiana of Sweden, 169; speaks against dissolution of Parliament, 204; suspicions of Monk, 220; compelled to retire to the country, 288; quoted, 231.
- WHITE SHIP, the, i. 133, 134.
- WHITFIELD, GEORGE, (1714-1770), associated with Wesley in religious movement; his eloquence, iv. 185; his visit to Armenia; separates from Wesley, 186; effect of his movement on Anglican Church, 187.
- WHITGIFT. See Archbishop of Canterbury.
- WHITWORTH, Lord, English Ambassador to Paris; his interviews with Bonaparte, iv. 357-358; leaves Paris, 359.
- WICKHAM, English minister in Switzerland, iv. 329.
- WIDDINGTON, Speaker of the House of Commons, iii. 180.
- WIDDINGTON, Lord WILLIAM, joins insurrection of (1715), iv. 99; accused of high treason, 107; condemned and pardoned, 108.
- WIGHT, ISLE OF, part of Saxon kingdom of Kent, i. 30.
- WIGHTMAN, General, iv. 101; his proceedings against Scottish insurgents, 117.
- WILBERFORCE, WILLIAM (1759-1833), his efforts for emancipation of slaves, iv. 187-

- 188; his bill for abolition of the slave-trade supported by Fox and Pitt (1788), 308; again presents bill (1792), 320; separates himself from Pitt's cabinet, 327; supports Pitt on question of French invasion, 332; disappointment at defeat in (1804), 366; his decision against Lord Melville, 366-367; remark on Pitt, 374; passage of his bill (1807), 379.
- WILD, General, killed in Khyber Pass, v. 53.
- WILDMAN, JOHN, imprisoned for conspiracy against Cromwell, iii. 172; concerned in Monmouth's insurrection, 310.
- WILFORD, RALPH, pretender during the reign of Henry VII., ii. 109.
- WILKES, Captain, captures Mason and Sli-dell, v. 327; views of the government in regard to his action, 328.
- WILKES, JOHN (1727-1797), editor of "The North Briton," imprisoned in the Tower for attack on the king's speech, iv. 222; his acquittal, 222-223; his subsequent career and death, 223; Bute's influence favorite theme for his attacks, 230.
- WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR, Duke of Normandy, at the Court of Edward the Confessor, i. 84, 85; entertains Harold, 89, 90; hears of the election of Harold, 92; sends messages to Harold, 93; enlists the aid of the pope, 94; prepares for conquest of England, 95; convokes assembly at Lillebonne, 95; his promises to the Normans, 96; sails from Saint-Valery-en-Caux, 100; lands in England, 100; his army, 102; his proposals to Harold, 103; defeats Harold at Hastings, 104, 105; overruns the country, 106, 107; is crowned at Westminster Abbey, 107, 108; crosses into Normandy, 108; takes Exeter, 109; enters York, 109; retakes and burns York, 110; ravages northern counties, 110; invests Isle of Ely, 111; his generosity to Hereward, 112; gives Northumberland to Waltheof, 112; kindness to Edgar Atheling, 112; represses Norman revolt in England, 112, 113; quarrels with his son Robert, 113, 114; his treatment of Bishop of Bayeux, 115; his forest laws, 115; orders the compilation of Domesday Book, 116; his division of England, 116; establishes the feudal system, 116, 117; wars with Philip I. of France, 117, 118; his disposal of his kingdom, 118; his death, 119; burial of, 119; charter of, 212.
- RUFUS, declared king, i. 120; insurrection against, 121; his passion for the chase, 122; his wars with Robert Curthose, 122; takes possession of Normandy, 123; death of, 125.
- III., as Prince of Orange, Cromwell's stipulations in regard to, iii. 168; recommended to States-General by Charles II., 248; at head of Dutch army in war against England and France, 269; marries Princess Mary of England, 275; animosity of Shaftesbury to, 284; proposition of Shaftesbury in regard to, 287; visit to England, 289; begs Monmouth to leave Holland on accession of James II., 309; anxiety to please James II., 310, 311; his pardon of Jacobite conspirators, 332; sends to congratulate James on birth of his son, 341; position in Europe, 343, 344; relations with his wife, 344; design of resistance to Louis XIV., 345; correspondence with English statesmen, 345; receives their invitation, 346; his anxiety, 347; farewell to States-General, 348; his manifesto, 349; lands in England, 350; joined by army, 351, 352; proposals to James, 354; refuses conference with James, 356; prepares to occupy London, 357; receives deputation of the bar, 358; refuses to accept the crown by right of conquest, receives address of the peers, 359; of the Commons, assembles convention, 360; declaration to the Lords, 363, 364; declared king, 364; accepts the crown, 365; unpopularity in England, 366-368; dissolves Parliament, 369; proclaimed by Scottish Parliament, 374; accepts crown of Scotland, 375; announces intention of going to Ireland, 379; causes modification of Abjuration Bill, 280; sends Act of Grace to Parliament, 381; farewell to Burnet, 381, 382; arrival in Ireland, 382; preparations for battle, 382, 383; defeats Jacobite army at the Boyne, 384; enters Dublin, 385; letter to Heinsius on defeat at Beachy Head, 386; lenity toward Clarendon, return to England, 387; ratifies Ginckel's treaty with Irish, 388, 389; voyage to Holland, 389; reception at the Hague, 390; address to States-General, 390, 391; to Congress of Grand Alliance, 391, 392; returns to England, 392; forced to remove Marlborough from office, 392, 393; indulgence to English statesmen, 394; attempts to pacify Scotland, 394, 395; signs order against MacDonald of Glencoe, 395; returns to the continent, 397; conspiracies against him, 400; defeated at Steinkirk, embarrassed by action of Parliament, 401; defeated at Neerwinden, 402, 403; recalls the Whigs, 403, 404; visits Holland, 404; rejects advances of Marlborough, returns to England, 406; gives assent to Triennial Bill, 407; grief at death of Mary, 408, iv. 13; reconciliation with Princess Anne, reply to condolences of Parliament, 14; starts for the continent, lays siege to Namur, 15; captures it, returns to England, dissolves Parliament, 16; yields to Parliament in regard to his grants to Portland, 17; conspiracy of Barclay against him, 17-20; increased popularity upon its discovery, 21; generosity to Shrewsbury, 22; sends Portland to negotiate treaty of Ryswick, 23; letter to Heinsius, 24, 25; his influence in treaty of Ryswick, 25; reception in London after the peace, 26; proposes augmentation of the army, 27; indignation at its reduction by Parliament, 28; resolution to retire to Holland, 29; speech on consenting to bill for disbanding the army, 29; attempts to retain his Dutch guards, 31; sends Portland as ambassador to Paris, 31, 32; persuades Portland to negotiate second Partition Treaty, 32, 33;

- signs the treaty, 33; hears of death of Charles II. of Spain, 34; indignation on Louis XIV.'s acceptance of Spanish throne, 35, 36; opposition of Tories to Irish land grants, 36, 37; prorogues Parliament, 38; retains accused lords in his council, 39; anger at surrender of Dutch towns to Louis XIV., 40; goes to the continent to reconstitute Grand Alliance, 40, 41; hears of Louis XIV.'s recognition of James III., 43; returns to England, dissolves Parliament, 44; speech on opening of Parliament of 1702, 44, 45; illness, fall from his horse, 46; last acts of his life, 46, 47; death, 48; always a stranger to England, 214; remarks of M. Guizot concerning, v. 28-30.
- WILLIAM IV., son of George III. (1765-1837), accession (1830), iv. 427; his opposition to Reform Bill of 1831; interview with Brougham, 434, 436; dissolves Parliament, 436; opposes creation of peers to effect passage of the Reform Bill, 439; requests Wellington to form a cabinet on resignation of Lord Grey, obliged to recall the Whigs, 440; yields in regard to the Reform Bill, 440, 441; reply to Irish bishops, 446; intention of recalling Duke of Wellington, 447; Wellington's reply to him, 451; sanction of reforms, 457; death (1837), 458, v. 13.
- I. of Holland. See Orange.
- II., Prince of Orange and Stadtholder of Holland, marries Henrietta Maria, daughter of Charles I., iii. 18; assists Henrietta, Queen of England, 30; assists Charles, ii. 137; his devotion to the Stuarts, 150; his death, 153.
- III. of Holland. See William III. of England.
- IV., Stadtholder of Holland, iv. 180.
- V., Stadtholder of Holland, dissensions with Republican party, iv. 265, 308-309.
- the Good, King of Sicily, i. 188.
- , Bishop of London, i. 85, 86.
- Cliton or Fitz-Robert, son of Robert Curthose, i. 31; at court of Louis the Fat, 132; at the head of confederation against Henry I., 133; revolts against Henry I., 135; marries a princess of Savoy, becomes Count of Flanders, and dies, 136.
- , son of Henry I. of England, marries Matilda of Anjou, i. 133; drowned, 134; character, 135.
- , nephew of David of Scotland, i. 141.
- , son of King Stephen, swears allegiance to Henry II., i. 148.
- WILLIAMS, Bishop, keeper of the seals under James I., ii. 407; his opinion on Charles' journey to Spain, 407, 408.
- , Colonel, defence of Kars, v. 232.
- , Lord, at execution of Cranmer, ii. 259.
- WILLIAMSBURG, its excitement over Stamp Act, iv. 225.
- WILLIS, Dr., physician of George III. during his insanity, iv. 311, 314; bearer of messages between the king and Mr. Pitt, 350.
- WILLIS, Sir CHARLES, informs Thurloe of Royalist movements, iii. 212.
- WILLOUGHBY, Lord, reprimanded for heresy, ii. 263.
- , Lord, unable to defend Lincolnshire against Newcastle, iii. 34.
- , Sir ROBERT, partisan of Henry VII., ii. 89.
- WILLS, General, serves against Jacobite insurgents of 1715; attacks Preston, iv. 100; takes it, 101.
- WILMINGTON, Earl of. See Sir Spencer Compton.
- WILMOT, signs letter to officers of the king's army, iii. 52; accompanies flight of Charles II., 148.
- WILSON, Sir ROBERT, cashiered, iv. 411.
- WILTON, Lord GREY of, commands English army in Scotland, ii. 276.
- WILTSHIRE, Monmouth's insurrection in, iii. 316; Jeffrey's cruelty in, 322.
- , Earl of, beheaded after battle of Towton, ii. 52.
- , Earl of, Sir Thomas Boleyn, ii. 366; employed in mission to Charles V., 167.
- WINDHAM, General, in command at Cawnpore, v. 268.
- WINDSOR CASTLE, Earl of March imprisoned at, i. 362; Charles I. at, iii. 106, 108.
- WINTER, commands English fleet, ii. 276.
- WINTER, THOMAS, accomplice of Catesby in plot against James I., ii. 338; death of, 390.
- WINTOUN, Earl of, George, his trial for high treason; his escape, iv. 108.
- WISHART, GEORGE, reformed preacher, burned, ii. 209.
- WISTBROOM, one of the insurgents under Wat Tyler, is hanged, i. 349.
- WITENAGEMOTE, i. 57, 58-75; convoked at Oxford, 79; Earl Godwin before, 83; banishes Godwin, 86; proclaims Harold, son of Godwin, king, 91; chooses Edgar Atheling king of England, 106.
- WOLFE, CHARLES (1791-1823), his Burial of Sir John Moore quoted, iv. 387.
- , General JAMES (1726-1759), in command of expedition against Quebec, iv. 198, 199; takes possession of heights of Abraham, his victory, 200; death, tomb erected to in Westminster Abbey, 200.
- WOLSELEY, General, his victory at Newton-Butler, iii. 372, 373.
- WOLSEY, Cardinal, his early relations with Henry VIII., ii. 122; his influence increasing, 124; his rapid advancement, 128; his power over the king, 129; favors Henry's alliance with Maximilian, 130; is gained over to France, 131; his secret agreement with Charles V., 132-133; concludes treaty between Francis I. and Henry, 135; causes the fall of Buckingham, 137; negotiations with Francis I. and the Emperor, 140, 141; aspires to the papal throne, 141; is disappointed, 142; his popularity declines, 143; resisted by the Commons, 145, 146; his ambition again disappointed, ii. 148; insurrections against him, 150; temporary coolness of Henry toward, 152; his opposition to Henry's marriage with Anne Boleyn,

- 155; his responsibility concerning the king's divorce, 156, 157; his anger with Suffolk, 159; his disgrace, 160; resigns the great seal, 161; attempts to regain the king's favor, 162; arrested for high treason, 163; his last words, 164; his death, 165.
- WOOD, Sir CHARLES, in Palmerston's Cabinet, v. 213; in Palmerston's second Cabinet, 301.
- WOODSTOCK, Manor of. See Blenheim.
- WOODSTOCK, THOMAS of, youngest son of Edward III., ii. 72.
- WOODVILLE, Sir EDWARD, uncle of Elizabeth of York, ii. 95.
- , ELIZABETH. See Elizabeth Woodville.
- , Sir JOHN, brother of Elizabeth Woodville, beheaded, ii. 58.
- , Sir RICHARD, marries widow of Duke of Bedford; thrown into prison, ii. 38; made Earl Rivers, 57; beheaded, 58.
- WORCESTER, battle of, iii. 145, 146.
- , Earl of, his advice to Hotspur, i. 369; made prisoner at Shrewsbury, 370.
- , Marquis of, leader of Catholic party, iii. 65, 67, 70.
- WORMS, Diet of, Luther before, ii. 139.
- , treaty of, 1743, ii. 153.
- WORONZOW, Count, Russian ambassador in London, iv. 360.
- WOTTON, Sir HENRY, quoted, ii. 341.
- WROTHESLEY, Chancellor. See Southampton.
- WULFNOTH, son of Godwin, hostage with William the Conqueror, i. 88.
- WURTEMBERG, Duke of, (Frederick I.), marries Princess Royal, daughter of George III., iv. 336.
- WYAT, Sir THOMAS, incites rebellion in favor of Elizabeth, ii. 243; price set upon his head, 249; sent to the Tower, 250; protests Elizabeth's innocence to the last, 251.
- WYCLIFFE, JOHN, first of the Reformers, i. 342; translates the Bible, his death, 343; his translation of the Bible, ii. 357.
- WYKEHAM, WILLIAM of, Bishop of Winchester divested of his revenues, excluded from amnesty, i. 338.
- WYNDHAM, Sir WILLIAM, Bolingbroke's letters to, iv. 96, 97; arrested for complicity in insurrection of 1715, 99; in opposition to Walpole, 140; defends Bolingbroke in House of Commons, 141; his attack upon Walpole (1734), 142-143; Walpole's reply, 144-146; leads opposition against Walpole, 147.
- , WILLIAM (1750-1810), one of the managers of impeachment of Warren Hastings, iv. 292; separates from Grey and Sheridan, i. 293; Addington refuses to admit him to the Cabinet, 358; member of Lord Granville's Cabinet, 376.
- Y.
- YARMOUTH, Lady, at death of George II., iv. 213.
- YEH, Chinese governor, v. 237; taken prisoner, 307; his death, 308.
- YELVERTON, Sir HENRY, attorney-general, prosecuted for abuse of monopolies, ii. 403.
- YESTER, Lord, made prisoner at Pinkie, ii. 222.
- YONGE, Charlotte M., v. 169.
- , Sir WILLIAM, Walpole's remark to, iv. 139.
- YORK, city of, Septimius Severus dies at, i. 25; taken by William the Conqueror, 109; recovered by Saxons, retaken by William and ravaged, 110; Jews besieged at, 186; deprived of its charters by Henry IV., 372; Charles I. at, iii. 18, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25; Royalists besieged in, 47; surrenders, 48, 50.
- , Archbishop of, Aldred. See Aldred.
- , Archbishop of, Scrope, conspires with Hotspur against Henry IV., i. 368; beheaded, 372.
- , Archbishop of, brother of Earl of Warwick, ii. 58.
- , Archbishop of, imprisoned, ii. 74; received into favor by Richard III., 77.
- , Cardinal of, Henry Stuart (1725-1807), as Duke, project for sending him to assistance of Charles Edward, iv. 163; second son of first Pretender, 183.
- , Duke of, Edmund (1341-1402), son of Edward III., uncle of Richard II., i. 350; his authority over the king, 352; regent in absence of Richard, 356; joins Bolingbroke, 356.
- , Duke of, son of the above, formerly Earl of Rutland, his arrest for attempt to rescue Earl of March, i. 371; brother of Earl of Cambridge, 386; in France with Henry V., 388; killed at Agincourt, 392.
- , Duke of, Richard Plantagenet, nephew of the above, father of Edward IV., temporary regent of France, ii. 37; his successful government of Ireland, 42; his revolt and arrest, 43; made Protector of England, 44; defeats King Henry at St. Alban's, resigns and retires, 45; again takes arms, 46; lays formal claim to the throne, 47; his compromise with Henry, his defeat and death (1460), 48.
- , Duke of, Richard, son of Edward IV., imprisoned with his brother in the Tower, ii. 75; murdered, 78.
- , Duke of, James. See James II.
- , Duke of, Frederick (1763-1827), son of George III., iv. 309; declaration in Parliament as to Prince of Wales, 312; commands English in allied army, repulsed before Dunkirk, 326; general order in response to French decree of no quarter, 326, 327; recalled, 327; directs unsuccessful attempt against Holland, 343; remarks on negotiations for Pitt's return to office, 359.
- , ELIZABETH of. See Elizabeth of York.
- , MARGARET of. See Margaret of York.
- YORKISTS, victorious at St. Albans, ii. 45; at Drayton and Northampton, 46; defeated at Wakefield, 48; at second battle of St.

- Albans, 49; victorious at Mortimer's Cross, 49; crown Edward IV. at London, 50; victorious at Towton, 52; at Hedgely Moor and Hexham, 55; at Barnet, at Tewksbury, 63; triumphant, 64, 65.
- YORKTOWN, Lord Cornwallis besieged in, iv. 263, 264; surrenders, 264, 265.
- "YOUNG IRELAND," party of, v. 93; agitation under Mitchel, 127; its disappearance, 128.
- YOUNG, ROBERT, his pretended discovery of a plot, iii. 400.
- YRES TAILLEBOIS, favorite of the Conqueror, i. 111.
- Z.
- ZEELANDERS, sent to the aid of Elizabeth, ii. 339.
- ZELL, recovered from the French by Ferdinand of Brunswick, iv. 196.
- ZORNDORF, battle of, iv. 197.
- ZOUTHEMANN, Admiral, his account of the battle off the Dogger-bank, iv. 266.
- ZULESTEIN, Count, envoy of William of Orange to James II., 341, 357; accompanies William to Holland, 390.
- ZUTPHEN, battle of, ii. 345.

THIS BOOK IS DUE ON THE LAST DATE STAMPED BELOW

AN INITIAL FINE OF 25 CENTS

WILL BE ASSESSED FOR FAILURE TO RETURN THIS BOOK ON THE DATE DUE. THE PENALTY WILL INCREASE TO 50 CENTS ON THE FOURTH DAY AND TO $1.00 ON THE SEVENTH DAY OVERDUE.

JUN 2 1968

MAY 24 1968 REC'D

UCD LIBRARY

DUE JAN 1 1980

JAN 7 1980 REC'D

164569

Guizot, F.P.G.
Popular history of England.

Call Number:

DA30
G8
v.5

Guizot

DA30
G8
v.5

164569

3 1175 00409 4143

