MACINTYRE.

MACINTYRE, the name of a minor sept, called, in Gaelic, the clan Mhic An T'Saoir. They are a branch of the clan Donald, and their badge is the same as theirs, the common heath. The Gaelic word Saor means a carpenter. According to tradition one of the Macdonalds being in a boat at sea, it sprung a leak, and, finding it sinking, he forced his thumb into the hole, and cut it off, so that he might be able to reach the land in safety. He was ever afterwards called An T'Saoir, and Mac An T'Saoir, in the Gaelic, is very nearly pronounced like Macintyre. Another story says that one of the clan Donald, named Paul, in Sutherland, in the end of the 13th century, built Dun Creich, a vitrified fort in that county, when he acquired the name of Saor, and as professions were hereditary among the Celts, it descended to his posterity.

The Macintyres of Rannoch were famous musicians, and after 1680, they became the pipers to Menzies of Weems, chief of the clan Menzies, for whom they composed the appropriate salute. One of them was the author of a fine piece of bagpipe music commemorative of the battle of Sheriffmuir in 1715. During the rebellion of 1745-6, the Macintyres were in the clan regiment of Stewart of Appin, on the side of the Pretender.

MACINTYRE, DUNCAN, one of the best of the modern Gaelic poets, was born of poor parents, in Druimliaghart, Glenorehy, Argyleshire, March 20, 1724. Being in his youth very handsome, he was commonly called by his countrymen, Donnacha Bàn nan òran, that is 'fair Duncan of the Songs.' On the breaking out of the rebellion of 1745, he engaged on the government side, as the substitute of a Mr. Fletcher of Glenorehy, for the sum of 300 merks Scots, to be paid on his return. He fought at the battle of Falkirk, January 17, 1746, under the command of Colonel Campbell of Carwhin, and in the retreat he either lost or threw away his sword. As it belonged to Mr. Fletcher, that gentleman refused to pay him the 300 merks, and he, in consequence, composed a song on "the battle of Falkirk," in which he has given a minute and admirable account of that engagement, and especially of everything relating to the sword, much to the annoyance of Mr. Fletcher. Macintyre likewise complained of his conduct to the earl of Breadalbane, who obliged him to pay the poet, who had risked his life for him, the stipulated reward. Being an excellent marksman, he was appointed forester to the earl of Breadalbane, and afterwards to the duke of Argyle.

On the passing of the act which proscribed the Highland dress, he composed an indignant poem, called 'The Anathema of the Breeks,' wherein he boldly attacked the government for having passed a law which was equally obnoxious to the clans friendly to the house of Hanover as to those who had engaged in the rebellion, and said it was enough to make the whole country turn Jacobite should Prince Charles Edward return to Scotland. He was, in consequence, committed to prison, but by the influence of his friends he was soon released. When the act was repealed in 1782, he commemorated the event in a congratulatory poem, which was as popular with the Gael as the former one had been.

In 1793 he became a private in the Breadalbane fencibles, and continued to serve in it till 1799, when the regiment was disbanded. His volume of poems and songs was first published at Edinburgh in 1768. He went through the Highlands for subscribers to defray the expense. Though he never received any education of any kind, he excelled in every kind of verse that he tried. A clergyman wrote down his poems from oral recitation. They were reprinted in 1790, and again in 1804, with some additional pieces. A fourth edition was printed at Glasgow in 1833. The writer of his life in Reid's 'Bibliotheca-Scoto-Celtica,' says that "all good judges of Celtic poetry agree that nothing like the purity of his Gaelic and the style of his poetry, has appeared in the Highlands since the days of Ossian." His biographer in Mackenzie's 'Beauties of Gaelic Poetry' (Glasgow, 1841), says that when delivering the third edition of his poems to his subscribers, the Rev. Mr. M'Callum of Arisaig, "saw him travelling slowly with his wife. He was dressed in the Highland garb, with a checked bonnet, over which a large bushy tail of a wild animal hung, a badger's skin fastened by a belt in front, a hanger by his side, and a soldier's wallet was strapped to his shoulders. He had not been seen by any present before then, but was immediately recognised. A forward young man asked him if it was he that made Ben-dourain? 'No,' replied the venerable old man, 'Ben-dourain was made before you or I was born, but I made a poem in praise of Ben-dourain.' He then inquired if any would buy a copy of his book. I told him to call upon me, paid him three shillings, and had some conversation with him. He spoke slowly; he seemed to have no high opinion of his own works; and said little of Gaelic poetry; but said, that officers in the army used to tell him about the Greek poets; and Pindar was chiefly admired by him." Having been appointed bard to the Highland Society, he furnished it with many stirring addresses in Gaelic at its annual meetings.

On the recommendation of the earl of Breadalbane, who befriended him through life, he was appointed in his old age one of the city guard of Edinburgh. He subsequently lived retired, and died in that city in October 1812.

MACIVOR, the name of a minor sept, a branch of the great Siol Diarmid, or race of Campbell, having the same badge, the myrtle. The founder of this branch was Ivor, son of Duncan, lord of Lochow, in the time of Malcolm IV. (1153 —1165), and his descendants, to distinguish themselves from the other branches of the family of Argyle, assumed the name of their ancestor for their surname, and are called MacIvors, and sometimes Clan-Ivor. They are also called Clan Glassary, and Clan Ivor Glassary, from a district in Argyleshire of that name, which was principally possessed by them. But the chieftain or head of the tribe is in Celtic called MacIvor, without regard to the Christian name. Their original lands were Lergachonzie, Asknish, and others in Cowal; but there were also many families of the name in Caithness, Invernesshire, and the Lewis. Those who settled in Lochaber took the name of MacGlasrich, from the district of Glassary, and became followers of Macdonald of Keppoch.

In 1564, Archibald, fifth earl of Argyle, by and with the concurrence of the tribe of MacIvor and "Clan Glassary," made a formal resignation, in presence of a notary public and several gentlemen, of the chieftainship there, in favour of his cousin Ivor MacIvor, of Lergachonzie and Asknish, and his heirs whomsoever, who, by the title-deeds of their estate, became bound to use the surname and arms of MacIvor,—the mottoes of the house of Argyle and that of MacIvor of Asknish being typical of their relative positions; the former, "ne obliviscaris;" and the latter, "nunquam obliviscar." When Archibald, ninth earl of Argyle, was employed in quelling some civil commotions, in 1679, MacIvor, true to his motto, attended him with one hundred men of his own tribe; and when the earl returned from Holland in 1685, he again joined him, and was forfeited with him.

After the Revolution, when the earl's forfeiture was rescinded, Archibald, tenth earl and afterwards first duke of Argyle, gave back MacIvor's estate to his son Duncan, and his heirs, on condition that they should bear the surname and arms of Campbell and of the family of MacIvor, (arma et cognomen de Campbell et Familiæ de MacIvor, gerentibus, &c.).

From the earls of Argyle, the MacIvors held several posts of trust and honour, such as the keeping of the castle of Inverary, &c. They were also hereditary coroners within a certain district.

In the rebellion of 1745-6, the MacIvors went out with the Macdonalds of Keppoch, and at the battle of Culloden, they were drawn up as a separate body, with officers of their own, as they were anxious to be placed in a position where there was no chance of their being opposed to the Argyle militia, having the same badge and wearing their tartan.

In 1853, the lord lyon king of arms, by interlocutor of his lordship's depute, on the application of Duncan MacIvor Campbell, Esq. of Asknish,—(formerly Duncan Campbell Paterson, eldest son of the deceased James Paterson, of Clobber Hall, county Clare, Ireland, grandson of Agnes, eldest daughter of Angus Campbell of Asknish, and nephew of Lieutenant-colonel Paterson, assistant-quarter-master-general of her majesty's forces.)—recognised him as heir of line of the family of MacIvor of Asknish, and under a deed of entail, as heir of tailzie, now in possession of said estate, and, as such, "to use, bear, and constantly retain the arms and surname of Campbell and of the family of MacIvor and designation of Asknish."

M·KAIL, HUGH, a martyr of the covenant, was born about 1640. He studied, with a view to the church, at the university of Edinburgh, under the care of his uncle, one of the ministers of that city, and was afterwards, for some time, chaplain to Sir James Stewart of Coltness, then lord provost of Edinburgh. In 1661, he was licensed to preach, being then in his twenty-first year. On the 1st September 1662, when 400 presbyterian ministers were about to be driven from their charges for non-compliance with episcopacy, he delivered a discourse in the High Church of Edinburgh, from the Song of Solomon, i. 7, in which, speaking of the many persecutions to which the cause of religion had been subjected in all ages, he said that "the church and people of God had been persecuted both by an Ahab on the throne, a Haman in the state, and a Judas in the church." In those troublous days, such an illustration was sure to find an application, whether the preacher meant it or not, parallel to the times. Accordingly the Ahab on the throne was considered to be Charles II., and Middleton and Archbishop Sharp took the Haman and Judas to themselves. A few days thereafter a party of horse was sent to apprehend him, but he escaped, and went to his father's house in the parish of Liberton. Soon after, he took refuge in Holland, where he remained four years, during which time he studied at one of the Dutch universities.

In 1666 he returned to Scotland, and immediately joined the resolute and daring band of covenanters who rose in arms in the west, previous to the defeat at Rullion Green, and continued with them from the 18th to the 27th of November, when not being able to endure the fatigue of constant marching, he left them near Cramond Water. He was on his way to Liberton, when he was taken by an officer of dragoons, and some countrymen, as he passed through a place called Braid's Craigs. He had then a sword or rapier, which of itself was a circumstance of suspicion against him. He was conveyed to Edinburgh and searched for letters, but none being found, he was committed to the tolbooth. Next day, he was brought before the privy council for examination, and on the 4th December he was subjected to the torture of the boot, with the object of extracting information from him relative to a conspiracy, which the government affected to believe extensively existed; but he declared that he knew of none, and had nothing to confess. The strokes were repeated ten or eleven times, when he swooned away, and was carried back to prison.

The torture and the close confinement brought on a fever, and as he was ordered to prepare for trial, for having joined in the insurrection, although he had left the party the day previous to the battle of Pentland, he petitioned the council for a delay of a few days, when it was remitted to two physicians and two surgeons to inquire into his case. His cousin, Mr. Matthew M'Kail, an apothecary in Edinburgh, afterwards a doctor of medicine, applied to Archbishop Sharp, to interpose in his behalf, but that treacherous and unprincipled prelate only desired him to assure the prisoner that he would befriend him, if he would reveal the mystery of the plot against the government, and as he was not able to do so, he was put to the torture. Still the cousin was determined to persevere in his efforts to save his unfortunate relative, and even followed the archbishop to St. Andrews. A note to M'Crice's edition of Veitch's Life (pp. 35—37) gives the following minute particulars of his fruitless journey to and from the primate's residence in Fife: "Upon the Thursday thereafter, the bishop went to St. Andrews, and Mr. Matthew followed him on Friday, but reached only Wemyss that night. After dinner, he arrived at the bishop's house on Saturday, and the servant told that the barber was trimming him, and when he was done, Mr. Matthew would get access. When Mr. Matthew got access, he delivered to the bishop a letter from the marchioness Douglas, in favour of Mr. Hew (the prisoner) whose brother Mr. Matthew was governor to her son, Lord James Douglas; and another from the bishop's brother, Sir William Sharp his lady: and when he had read them, he said, 'The business is now in the justiciaries' hands, and I can do nothing; but, however, I shall have answers ready against the next morning;' at which time, when Mr. Matthew came, the bishop called his family together, prayed, and desired Mr. Matthew to come and dine with him, and then he would give the answer; then he went to the church, did preach, and inveigh much against the covenant. Immediately after dinner, he gave the answers to the letters, and Mr. Matthew said, that he hoped that his travelling that day about so serious a business would give no offence; to which the bishop answered that it would give no offence. Then Mr. Matthew went to enquire for his horse, but the stabler's family were all gone to church, so that he could not travel till Monday morning early, and when he came to Buckhaven, the wind being easterly, the fish-boats were coming into the harbour, and he hired one of them immediately, and arrived at Leith in the evening, having sent his horse to Bruntisland. He went immediately to Archbishop Burnet of Glasgow, and delivered a letter to him, who did read it, and then said that the business was in the justiciaries' hands."

Next day, being the 18th December, the prisoner was brought before the court of justiciary, with other three. When placed at the bar, M'Kail addressed the court, and "spoke of the ties and engagements that were upon the land to God; and having commended the institution, dignity, and blessing of presbyterian government, he said that the last words of the national covenant had always great weight on his spirit. Whereupon the king's advocate interrupted him, and desired, he would forbear that discourse, since he was not called in question for his persuasion, but for the crime of rebellion." As a matter of course he was found guilty of high treason, and condemned to be hanged at the market cross of Edinburgh on December 22, four days after. The three others who were tried along with him were likewise sentenced to death. On his way back to the tolbooth he received the greatest sympathy from the people, and to some women who were lamenting his fate, he said: "Weep not: though I am but young, and in the budding of my hopes and labours in the ministry, I am not to be mourned; for one drop of my blood, through the grace of God, may make more hearts contrite, than many years' sermons might have done." At his request, his father was allowed to visit him in prison, and the interview between them was peculiarly affecting. He spent the short time allotted to him in acts of devotion, and in encouraging and supporting those who were to suffer with him. He even at times showed considerable cheerfulness. On a friend, who went to see him, expressing his sorrow for his mangled limb, he answered that the fear of his neck made him forget his leg. On the evening before his execution, while at supper with his fellow-prisoners, he said to them gaily, "Eat to the full, and cherish your bodies, that we may be a fat Christmas pie to the prelates." After supper he read to them the 16th Psalm, and then said, "If there were anything in the world sadly and unwillingly to be left, it were the reading of the Scriptures," but, he added, it was a source of comfort that he would soon be in that place where even Scripture is no longer necessary. He then wrote his will, bequeathing his few books to his friends. He slept soundly, and on awaking, at five o'clock in the morning, one who was to suffer with him, he said pleasantly, "Up, John, for you are too long in bed; you and I look not like men going to be hanged this day, seeing we lie so long." Before proceeding to the scaffold he bade farewell to his father, and assured him that his sufferings would do more hurt to the prelates, and be more edifying to God's people than if he were to continue in the ministry for twenty years. On his appearance on the scaffold the grief of the spectators burst forth in loud expressions of wailing, so that it is recorded "there was scarce ever seen so much sorrow in onlookers; scarce was there a dry cheek in the whole street or windows at the cross of Edinburgh." On ascending the ladder he said to his friends, "I care no more to go up this ladder than if I were going home to my father's house. Friends and fellow sufferers, be not afraid; every step of this ladder is a degree nearer heaven."

Previous to being turned off, he addressed the spectators at some length, imparting the persecution of the church to the prelates, and declaring his readiness to die for the cause of God, the covenants, and the work of reformation, which had been the glory of Scotland. He concluded with the following sublime exclamation: "And now, I leave off to speak any more to creatures, and begin my intercourse with God, which shall never be broken off. Farewell, father and mother, friends and relations, farewell the world and all delights, farewell meat and drink, farewell sun, moon, and stars! Welcome God and Father; welcome sweet Jesus Christ, the Mediator of the new covenant; welcome blessed Spirit of Grace, and God of all consolation; welcome glory, welcome eternal life, and welcome death!" Such was the fate of Hugh M'Kail, who was only twenty-six years old at the time of his death, "one of the brightest, purest, and most sanctified spirits," says Hetherington, "that ever animated a mere human form; a victim to prelate tyranny, and a rejoicing martyr for Christ's sole kingly dominion over his church. Till the records of time shall have melted into those of eternity, the name of that young Christian martyr will be held in most affectionate remembrance by every true Scottish presbyterian."

MACKAY, the name of a numerous and powerful clan in the north-west of the county of Sutherland, styled in Gaelic the Sìol Mhorgan, or race of Morgan; badge, the bulrush. The accounts of its origin are various. In the Celtic MS. of 1450, there is no reference to it, although mention is made of the Mackays of Kintyre, who were called of Ugadale. These, however, were vassals of the Isles, and had no connexion with the Mackays of Strathnaver. Pennant assigns to them a Celto-Irish descent, in the twelfth century, after King William the Lion had defeated Harald, earl of Orkney and Caithness, and taken possession of these districts. Mr. Skene (Highlands of Scotland, p. 288) supposes that they were descended from the aboriginal Gaelic inhabitants of Caithness. The Norse Sagas state that about the beginning of the 12th century, "there lived in the Döium of Katanesi (or Strathnaver) a man named Moddan, a noble and rich man," and that his sons were Magnus Orfi and Ottar, the Iarl in Thurso. The title of iarl was the same as the Gaelic maormor, and Mr. Skene is of opinion that Moddan and his son Ottar were the Gaelic maormors of Caithness.

Sir Robert Gordon, in his voluminous History of Sutherland (p. 302), from a similarity of badge and armorial bearings, accounts the clan Mackay a branch of the Forbeses, but this is by no means probable. Alexander, the first of the family, aided in driving the Danes from the north. His son Walter, chamberlain to Adam, bishop of Caithness, married that prelate's daughter, and had a son, Martin, who received from his maternal grandfather certain church lands in Strathnaver, being the first of the family who obtained possessions there. Martin had a son, Magnus or Manus, who fought at Bannockburn under Bruce, and had two sons, Morgan and Farquhar. From Morgan the clan derived their Gaelic name of Clan-wic-Worgan, or Morgan, and from Farquhar were descended the Clan-wic-Farquhar in Strathnaver.

Donald, Morgan's son, married a daughter of Macneill of Gigha, who was named Iye, and had a son of the same name, in Gaelic Aodh, pronounced like Y. The common translation of Aodh is Hugh, but amid all the fanciful conjectures that have been thrown out as to the derivation of the name, it seems to have been forgotten that the Iye was borne primarily by an insular chief, and seems not unlikely to have originated in the Gaelic word I, an island. Aodh had a son, another Donald, called Donald Macaodh, or Mackaoi, and it is from this son that the clan has acquired the patronymic of Mackay. He and his son were killed in the castle of Dingwall, by William, earl of Sutherland, in 1395. It appears from Sir Robert Gordon's History (p. 60), that the earl had a feud with him and his son, Donald Mackay, in which many lives were lost, and great depredations committed on both sides. To put an end to it, the earl proposed a meeting with them at Dingwall, in presence of the lord of the Isles, his father-in-law, and some of the neighbouring barons, the friends of both parties. This was acceded to, and in the castle of Dingwall a discussion took place between the earl and Mackay, regarding the points in dispute, when mutual reproaches passing between them, the earl became so incensed as to kill Mackay and his son with his own hands. With some difficulty he effected his escape, and, hastening home, prepared for his defence. The Mackays, however, were too weak to take revenge, and a reconciliation took place between Robert, the next earl, and Angus Mackay, the eldest of Donald's surviving sons, of whom there were other two, viz. Houcheon Dubh, and Neill.

Angus, the eldest son, married a sister of Malcolm Macleod of the Lewis, and had by her two sons, Angus Dubh, that is, dark complexioned, and Roderick Gald, that is, Lowland. On their father's death their uncle, Houcheon Dubh, became their tutor, and entered upon the management of their lands. Understanding that his sister, the widow of Angus, was ill-treated by the uncle, Malcolm Macleod, with a large following, went to visit her, and on his return homewards, he laid waste Strathnaver and a great part of the Breachat in Sutherland, carrying off a large booty along with him. As soon as Houcheon Dubh and his brother Neill were informed of this, they acquainted Robert, earl of Sutherland, who immediately despatched a large party to assist the Mackays. Overtaking Macleod upon the marches between Ross and Sutherland, at a place called Tutim-Tarwach, a desperate conflict ensued. It "was long, furious, cruel, and doubtful," says Sir Robert Gordon, and "rather desperate than resolute." Malcolm Macleod was slain with all his party, save one, and the goods and cattle were recovered.

In 1411, when Donald, lord of the Isles, in prosecution of his claim to the earldom of Ross, burst into Sutherland, he was attacked at Dingwall, by Angus Dubh, or Black Angus Mackay. The latter, however, was defeated and taken prisoner, and his brother, Roriegald, and many of his men were slain. After a short confinement, Angus was released by the lord of the Isles, who, desirous of cultivating the alliance of so powerful a chief, gave him his daughter, Elizabeth, in marriage, and with her bestowed upon him many lands by charter in 1415. He was called Enneas-en-Imprissi, or "Angus the Absolute," from his great power. At this time, we are told, Angus Dubh could bring into the field 4,000 fighting men.

In 1426, Angus invaded Caithness, with all the forces he could collect, and spoiled and laid waste that district. The inhabitants met him at Harpisdell, where a battle was fought, in which both sides suffered severely, but the result was not decisive, and Mackay continued his depredations. To put a stop to the disturbances in the Highlands, James I., early in the following year, summoned the principal chiefs to meet him and his parliament at Inverness, and among the number arrested by the king on this occasion, about forty in all, was Angus Dubh, with his four sons. After a short confinement, Angus was pardoned and released with three of them, the eldest, Neill Mackay, being kept as a hostage for his good behaviour. Being confined in the Bass at the mouth of the Frith of Forth, he was ever after called Neill Wasse (or Bass) Mackay. During his imprisonment his son, Thomas Macneill, proprietor of the lands of Creigh, Spanziedhill, and Pulrossie in Sutherland, had a quarrel with Mowat of Fresh-wick. To avoid his vengeance, Mowat took refuge, with his followers, in the chapel of St. Duffus near Tain, but they were followed thither by Thomas, who slew him and his people, and burnt the chapel to the ground. In consequence of this outrage the king issued a proclamation against Thomas Macneil, promising his lands as a reward to any one who would kill or apprehend him. Angus Murray, son of Alexander Murray of Cubin, with a view to his apprehension, offered his brothers, Morgan and Neill Macneil, for their assistance, his two daughters in marriage, besides promising to aid them in getting possession of the lands of Angus Dubh in Strathnaver. They accordingly apprehended their brother, Thomas, who was delivered up to the king, and executed at Inverness. Murray gave his daughters in marriage to Neill and Morgan Macneil, as he had promised, and thereafter made an incursion into Strathnaver, to seize the lands of Angus Dubh Mackay. The latter, being too old to lead his clan in person, gave the command of it to John Aberigh, his natural son, but to save the effusion of blood, he sent a message to his cousins, Neill and Morgan, offering to surrender to them all his lands in Strathnaver, if they would allow him to retain Kintail. This offer was rejected, and a desperate battle took place at Drumnacoub, near Tongue. Among the slain were the beginners of the strife, Angus Murray and his two sons-in-law, Neill and Morgan Macneil. John Aberigh, the victor, lost an arm in the conflict. After the battle, Angus Dubh, the chief, caused himself to be carried to the field, to search for the bodies of his slain consins, when he was killed by an arrow from a Sutherland man, who lay concealed near the spot.

In 1437 Neill Wasse Mackay was released from confinement in the Bass, and on assuming the chiefship, he bestowed on John Aberigh, for his attention to his father, the lands of Lochnaver in fee simple, which were long possessed by his posterity, that particular branch of the Mackays, called the Sliochd-ean-Aberigh, or an-Abrach. Neill Wasse, soon after his accession, ravaged Caithness, but died the same year, leaving two sons, Angus, and John Roy Mackay, the latter founder of another branch, called the Sliochd-ean-Roy.

Angus Mackay, the elder son, assisted the Keiths in invading Caithness in 1464, when they defeated the inhabitants of that district in an engagement at Blaretannie. He was burnt to death in the church of Tarbet in 1475, by the men of Ross, whom he had often molested. With a daughter, married to Sutherland of Dilred, he had three sons, viz., John Reawigh, meaning yellowish red, the colour of his hair; Y-Roy Mackay; and Neill Naverigh Mackay.

To revenge his father's death, John Reawigh Mackay, the eldest son, raised a large force, and assisted by Robert Sutherland, uncle to the earl of Sutherland, invaded Strath-oikell, and laid waste the lands of the Rosses in that district. A battle took place, 11th July 1487, at Aldy-Charrish, when the Rosses were defeated, and their chief, Alexander Ross of Balmagowan, and 17 other principal men of that clan were slain. The victims returned home with a large booty.

It was by forays such as these that the great Highland chiefs, and even some of the lowland nobles, contrived, in former times, to increase their stores and add to their possessions, and the Mackays soon obtained a large accession to their lands by the following circumstance, which strongly marks the manners of the age. The nephew of the Mackay chief, Alexander Sutherland of Dilred, having failed to repay a sum of money he had borrowed from Sir James Dunbar of Cunnock, the latter took legal measures to secure his debt by appraising part of his lands. The affront was the more galling as the Dunbars had but recently settled in Sutherland, and the lord of Dilred "grudged, as it were," (says Sir Robert Gordon) "that a stranger should brawe (brave) him at his owne doors." Whilst in this humour he happened to meet Sir James Dunbar's brother, Alexander, the husband of the countess dowager of Sutherland, and after some altercation, a combat ensued, when Alexander Dunbar was killed. Sir James immediately went to Edinburgh, and laid the matter before the king, who caused Alexander Sutherland to be proclaimed a rebel, and promised his lands to any one who should apprehend him. After some search, he was taken, with ten of his followers, by his uncle, Y-Roy Mackay, who had succeeded his brother, John Reawigh Mackay, as chief of the Mackays. Sutherland was executed, and his lands bestowed on Y-Roy Mackay. These were Armaidall, Strathy, Golspietour, Kinnald, Kilcolmkill, and Dilred, the charter of which was dated at Inverness, 4th November 1449. "Avarice," says Sir R. Gordon, "is a strange vyce, which respects neither blood nor freindship. This is the first infettment that any of the familie of Macky had from the king, so far as I can perceave by the records of this kingdom; and they wer untill this tyn possessors onlie of their lands in Strathnaver, not caring much for any charters or infettments, as most pairs of the Highlanders have alwise done." (Hist. p. 80.) In February 1512, Sir James Dunbar obtained a decree before the court of session, setting aside the right of Y-Roy Mackay to that part of the lands of Alexander Sutherland, over which his security extended, and ordaining the earl of Sutherland, as superior of the lands, to receive Sir James as his vassal. In 1516, Y-Roy Mackay gave his bond of service to Adam Gordon of Aboyne, brother of the earl of Huntly, who had become earl of Sutherland, by marriage with Elizabeth, sister and heiress of the ninth earl, but died soon after. Donald, his youngest son, slain at Morinsli, was ancestor of a branch of the Mackays called the Sliochd-Donald-Mackay.

John, the eldest son, had no sooner taken possession of his father's lands, than his uncle, Neill Naverigh Mackay and his two sons, assisted by a force furnished them by the earl of Caithness, entered Strathnaver, and dispossessed him of his inheritance. John hastened to the clan Chattan and the clan Kenzie, to crave their aid, and, in his absence, his brother, Donald, with a small force, surprised at night Neill Naverigh's party at Dalnaivigh in Strathnaver, and slew both his cousins and the greater part of their men. Their father, Neill Naverigh, threw himself upon the generosity of his nephews, but they ruthlessly ordered him to be beheaded by the hands of his own foster-brother.

In 1517, in the absence of the earl of Sutherland, who had wrested from John Mackay a portion of his lands, he and his brother Donald invaded Sutherland with a large force. They were met at a place called Torran-Dubh, near Rogart in Strathfleet, by the Sutherland men, under Alexander Sutherland, natural brother of the countess, and, after a furious battle, defeated, with great slaughter. Sir Robert Gordon says that this "was the greatest conflict that hitherto has been foughtin between the inhabitants of these countreys, or within the diocy of Catcaynes, to our knowledge." (Page 92).

After several reverses, John Mackay submitted to the earl in 1518, and granted him his bond of service. But such was his restless and turbulent disposition that he afterwards prevailed upon Alexander Sutherland, the bastard, who had married his sister and pretended a claim to the earldom, to raise the standard of insurrection against the earl. Alexander Sutherland was taken prisoner and beheaded on the spot, but John Mackay continued his hostile inroads into the earl's country. On his way home from one of these excursions, with a large quantity of cattle, he was attacked and defeated by the master of Sutherland, and made his escape with great difficulty. After this he again submitted to the earl, and a second time gave him his bond of service and 'manrent' in 1522. He died in 1529, and was succeeded by his brother, Donald.

In 1539, Donald Mackay obtained restitution of the greater part of the family estates, which had been seized by the Sutherland Gordons, and in 1542 he was present in the engagement at Solway Moss. Soon after, he committed various ravages in Sutherland. He began by burning the village of Knoekartol and plundering Strathbrora, but although obliged to retreat by a body of the Sutherland men, under Sir Hugh Kennedy, he soon returned with a larger force. He was again, however, compelled to retreat, after a skirmish at Lochbui, where he lost several of his men. Shortly thereafter he was apprehended, and committed a close prisoner to the castle of Foulis. After a considerable time he became reconciled to the earl of Sutherland, to whom he gave his bond of service and 'manrent' on 8th April 1549.

In the absence of the bishop of Caithness in England, the earl of Caithness and Donald Mackay took possession of his lands, and levied the rents, as they pretended, for his behoof. When he returned, however, they refused to deliver up any part of his property, or to account for the rents which they had received in his name. The earls of Huntly and Sutherland summoned them, in consequence, to appear before them at Hehnsdale, to answer for their intrusions with the bishop's rents. The earl at once complied with the summons, and made a satisfactory arrangement. Mackay, on his part, was forced to appear with great reluctance, when he was once more committed a prisoner to the castle of Foulis, whence, however, he escaped. He died in 1550.

In 1551, in the earl of Sutherland's absence, the Mackays again proceeded to plunder and lay waste the country Y-Mackay, the son of Donald, with the Strathnaver men, entered Sutherland, but was forced back by the earl's brother, Alexander Gordon, who, pushing into the district of the Mackays, wasted it, and carried off a large booty in goods and cattle. Y-Mackay, in his turn, retaliated, and this system of mutual aggression and spoliation continued for several years. In 1555, Y-Mackay was summoned to appear before the queen regent at Inverness, to answer for his depredations, but, disobeying the citation, a commission was granted to the earl of Sutherland, to bring him to justice. The earl accordingly entered Strathnaver with a great force, but Mackay contrived to elude him, and the earl laid siege to the castle of Borwe, the principal strength in Strathnaver, which he took and completely demolished. Mackay, on his part, entered Sutherland secretly, and burnt the church of Loth. He was, however, twice defeated by Mackenzie and his countrymen in Strathbrora, and seeing no chance of escape, he at last, in 1556, surrendered himself to the queen-regent, and was committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh.

During his imprisonment, his kinsman, John Mor Mackay, who took charge of his estates, entered Sutherland, in the earl's absence, with a large body of his clan, and spoiled and wasted that province, burning the chapel of St. Ninian. At the foot of the hill of Benmore in Berriedale, they were surprised by a Sutherland force, and, after an obstinate resistance, defeated with great slaughter. On his release from his confinement in Edinburgh castle, Y-Mackay fought for awhile, with great bravery, against the English on the borders, and on his return to Strathnaver, he submitted himself to the earl of Sutherland.

In 1562, he joined queen Mary at Inverness, and received a remission of the crime of having, in 1548, conducted an English army to Haddington. On 21st December, 1566, the queen gifted his lands to Huntly at Stirling. On the deaths, by poison, in 1567, of the earl and countess of Sutherland, Y-Mackay, instigated by the earl of Caithness, taking advantage of the minority of the young earl, their son, then only 15 years of age, invaded the county of Sutherland, wasted the barony of Skibo, entered the town of Dornoch, and under pretence of a quarrel with the Murrays, by whom it was chiefly inhabited, set fire to it. So great was his power, and so extensive his spoiliations at this time, that in the first parliament of James VI., 15th December 1567, the lords of the articles were required to report, "By what means might Mackay be danted?" In 1570, he was prevailed upon by Hugh Murray of Aberseors to accompany him to Strathbogie, where the young earl of Sutherland resided with his kinsfolk the Gordons, when he entered into an engagement with the earls of Huntly and Sutherland, to assist the latter against the earl of Caithness, in consideration of which, and on payment of £3,000 Scots, he obtained from the earl of Huntly, the heritable right and title of the lands of Strathnaver. Influenced, however, by Barbara Sinclair, the sister of the earl of Caithness and wife of the young earl of Sutherland, with whom he publicly cohabited, he broke his engagement, and continued to oppress the tenants and dependents of the latter. He died in 1571, full of remorse, it is said, for the wickedness of his life.

His son, Houcheon, or Hugh, succeeded him when only eleven years old. In 1587, he joined the earl of Caithness, when attacked by the earl of Sutherland, although the latter was his superior. He was excluded from the temporary truce agreed to by the two earls in March of that year, and in the following year they came to a resolution to attack him together. Having received secret notice of their intention from the earl of Caithness, he made his submission to the earl of Sutherland, and ever after remained faithful to him. Mr. Robert Mackay of Thurso, in his 'History of the Mackays,' (p. 157) says on this: "If Hugh Mackay was faulty in deserting and otherwise acting against Lord Caithness, who had never done him any injury, he made no profit by it, or by connecting himself with Sutherland. The Sinclairs, no doubt, had their faults, but the Gordons had theirs in no less degree. The policy and displeasure of the former were more easily discovered, and consequently more readily avoided; while those of the Gordons were more deep and abiding. Each had their wide grasp; but that of the Gordons was excessive and gigantic: to which it must be added, that the principal cause of the downfall of the Caithness family was their being forsaken by Mackay; and that he was the chief instrument in serving and exalting the sinking family of Sutherland, to the great detriment of his own, after his time."

In 1589, Sinclair of Murkle, brother of the earl of Caithness, marched into Strathbuly, with an army of 3,000 men, and having eluded the Sutherland sentinels, he passed forward to a place called Crissalligh, on the height of Strathbrora. Mackay, who was then at Dunrobin, was sent against him by the earl of Sutherland, with five or six hundred men. Finding, on coming up to them, that they were in great disorder, and that a party of them were skirmishing with some of the Sutherland retainers, he resolved, even with his inferior force, to attack them at once. Crossing, therefore, the water which was between them, he rushed, with his men, upon Sinclair's army, and after a long and hotly contested battle, defeated them. In October 1590, the earl of Caithness invaded Sutherland with all the forces he could muster. In the van of his army were about 1,500 archers, under the command of Donald Mackay of Scourie, who had, some time before, fled from Sutherland for having despoiled Assynt, and had placed himself under the protection of the earl of Caithness. A furious conflict ensued, which lasted for a considerable time, but on the approach of night the Caithness men were forced to retire from the field. Donald Mackay of Scourie being afterwards apprehended and imprisoned in Dunrobin castle, was, at the request of his brother, Hugh Mackay, released by the earl of Sutherland, to whom he ever afterwards remained faithful. While the Caithness men were engaged in their late excursion into Sutherland, Hugh Mackay entered into Caithness, and laid waste everything in his course, even to the gates of Thurso. He carried off a large quantity of booty without opposition, which he divided among his countrymen, according to custom.

Of the army raised by the earl of Sutherland in 1601, to oppose the threatened invasion of his territories by the earl of Caithness, the advanced guard was commanded by Patrick Gordon of Gartay and Donald Mackay of Scourie, and the right wing by Hugh Mackay. On its approach, however, the Caithness men took to flight. In August 1602, Hugh Mackay accompanied the earl of Sutherland, and his brother, Sir Robert Gordon, on a visit to Patrick Stuart, earl of Orkney. In 1610 he and his son, Donald Mackay, afterwards Lord Reay, were summoned before the privy council at Edinburgh, by the earl of Caithness, for giving succour and protection to John Sutherland, an outlaw, the son of Hugh Mackay's sister. He had lived in Berriedale, under the earl of Caithness, whose oppressions had driven him to acts of vengeance and spoliation, and having disregarded a citation to appear at Edinburgh, to answer certain charges against him, he had been proclaimed a rebel. In obedience to the summons Mackay hastened to the capital, where he met Sir Robert Gordon, who had arrived from England for the purpose of assisting him on the occasion. Lord Caithness, however, was easily induced to settle the matter, and, on his invitation subsequently, the Mackay chief and his brother William spent the following Christmas with him at Girnigo castle. His design in asking them was to separate the Mackays from the Sutherland interests, but in this he was unsuccessful. Hugh Mackay died at Tongue, 11th September 1614, in his 55th year. He was connected with both the rival houses by marriage; his first wife being Lady Elizabeth Sinclair, second daughter of George, fourth earl of Caithness, and relict of Alexander Sutherland of Duffus; and his second, Lady Jean Gordon, eldest daughter of Alexander, eleventh earl of Sutherland. The former lady was drowned, and left a daughter. By the latter he had two sons, Sir Donald Mackay of Far, first Lord Reay, and John, who married in 1619, a daughter of James Sinclair of Murkle, by whom he had Hugh Mackay and other children.

Sir Donald Mackay of Far, the elder son, was, by Charles I., created a peer of Scotland, by the title of Lord Reay, by patent, dated 20th June, 1628, to him and his heirs male whatever. See REAY, Lord. From him the land of the Mackays in Sutherland acquired the name of "Lord Reay's Country," which it has ever since retained. It now belongs to the duke of Sutherland.

The Mackays became very numerous in the northern counties, and the descent of their chiefs, in the male line, has continued unbroken from their first appearance in the north down to the present time. In the county of Sutherland, they multiplied greatly also, under other names, such as M'Phail, Polson, Bain, Nielson, &c. The names of Mackie and M'Ghie are also said to be derived from Mackay. The old family of M'Ghie of Balmaghie, which for about 600 years possessed estates in Galloway, used the same arms as the chief of the Mackays. They continued in possession of their lands till 1786. Balmaghie means Mackay town. The name M'Ghie is supposed to be a corruption of M'Ghie.

At the time of the rebellion of 1745, the Mackays were one of the clans that continued faithful to the government, at which time its effective force was estimated at 800 men by President Forbes. It is said that in the last Sutherland fencibles, raised in 1793 and disbanded in 1797, there were 33 John Mackays in one company alone. In 1794 the Reay fencibles, 800 strong, were raised in a few weeks, in "Lord Reay's country," the residence of the clan Mackay. The names of no fewer than 700 of them had the prefix of Mac. From 1795 to 1802, when it was disbanded, the regiment was employed in Ireland, where it soon acquired the confidence of Generals Lake and Nugent. The former was particularly attached to the Reay fencibles, and after the defeat of Castlebar, he frequently exclaimed, "If I had had my brave and honest Reays there, this would not have happened." At Tara Hall, 26th May, 1798, three companies of the Reays distinguished themselves in an attack upon a large body of rebels, whom they drove from a strong position, with the loss of about 400 killed and wounded, they themselves having only 26 men killed and wounded.

With regard to the term Siol Mhorgan applied to the clan Mackay, Mr. Robert Mackay of Thurso, the family historian, denies that as a clan they were ever known by that designation, which rests, he says, only on the affirmation of Sir Robert Gordon, without any authority. He adds: "There are, indeed, to this day, persons of the surname Morgan and Morganach, who are understood to be of the Mackays, but that the whole clan, at any period, went under that designation, is incorrect; and those of them who did so, were always few and of but small account. The name seems to be of Welsh origin; but how it obtained among the Mackays it is impossible now to say."

Of the branches of the clan Mackay, the family of Scourie is the most celebrated. They were descended from Donald Mackay of Scourie and Eriboll, elder son of Iye Mackay III., chief of the clan from 1550 to 1571, by his first wife, a daughter of Hugh Macleod of Assynt. With regard to the manner in which they became possessed of Scourie, and indeed of the whole parish of Edderachillis, an account is given by the Rev. Mr. Falconer in the Old Statistical Account of Scotland, which can only be reconciled with the family history by considering Iye Mackay and the "Sir Hugh Mackay" of his narrative as identical, and by rejecting the story about his son Donald's mother. Donald and his full brother, John Beg Mackay, were considered illegitimate, because their parents were cousins. The chief of the clan, styled "Sir Hugh Mackay," having occasion, in 1550, to remit some money to Edinburgh, was surprised to find his messenger return the following day without it, as he had been robbed on the way by a party of armed men, with blackened faces. The general suspicion of the country fell upon James Macleod of Edderachillis, who was of a turbulent and factious disposition, as the person who had employed them to commit the robbery. With the Morisons of Durness he had frequent quarrels, and Morison of Ashir, the principal man amongst them, having, at that time, in his house, Donald Mackay, a natural son of the Mackay chief, he proposed, both to the Mackays and his own friends, that he should be laird of Edderachillis, if Macleod could be made away with. A cousin of James Macleod, named Donald Macleod, undertook to put him to death, on being promised the half of Edderachillis and Donald Mackay's mother for his wife. A party of the Morisons, with Donald Mackay at their head, marched, in a dark morning, towards the residence of James Macleod, and slew several of his kinsmen, he himself being killed by a bullet from the musket of his cousin, Donald Macleod. The latter, not receiving the reward promised him, raised his friends in Assynt, and with them returned to Edderachillis, where he found the Morisons prepared to meet and fight him, at a place called Maldy. An engagement, however, was prevented by "Sir Hugh Mackay" presenting himself on the top of a neighbouring hill, with 300 men, and proposing to Donald Macleod, to resign his pretensions to Edderachillis in favour of his son Donald, and he himself, on his doing so, would grant him other lands on his own estate, called the dvach of Hope. This proposal he acceded to. It was, however, from his brother Hugh, who gave him a charter of the lands, that Donald Mackay obtained Edderachillis, which afterwards formed part of the estate of the Reay family, and that branch of the Mackays which sprung from him adopted the designation of Scourie.

Donald Mackay above mentioned, the son of Iye III., by his wife, Euphemia, daughter of Hugh Munro of Assynt in Ross, brother of the laird of Foulis, had three sons and four daughters. The sons were Hugh, Donald, and William. Hugh, the eldest, succeeded his father, and by the Scots Estates was appointed colonel of the Reay countrymen. He married a daughter of James Corbet of Rheims, by whom he had five sons, William, Hector, Hugh, the celebrated General Mackay, commander of the government forces at the battle of Killiecrankie, a memoir of whom is given at page 10, in larger type, James and Roderick. He had also three daughters, Barbara, married to John, Lord Reay; Elizabeth, to Hugh Munro of Eriboll, and Ann, to the Hon. Capt. William Mackay of Kinloch. William and Hector, the two eldest sons, both unmarried, met with untimely deaths. In February 1688, the earl of Caithness, whose wife was younger than himself, having conceived some jealousy against William, caused him to be seized at Dunnet, while on his way to Orkney, with a party of 30 persons. He was conveyed to Thurso, where he was immured in a dungeon, and after long confinement was sent home in an open boat, and died the day after. In August of the same year, his brother Hector, accompanied by a servant, having gone to Aberdeenshire, on his way to Edinburgh, was waylaid and murdered by William Sinclair of Dunbeath and John Sinclair of Murkle, and their two servants. A complaint was immediately raised before the justice, at the instance of John earl of Sutherland and the relatives of the deceased against the earl of Caithness and the two Sinclairs for these crimes. A counter complaint was brought by Caithness against the parties pursuers, for several alleged crimes from 1649 downwards, but it was fallen from, and a compromise took place between the parties.

General Mackay's only son, Hugh, major of his father's regiment, died at Cambray, in 1708, aged about 28. He left two sons, Hugh and Gabriel, and a daughter. Hugh died at Breda, a lieutenant-general in the Dutch service, and colonel of the Mackay Dutch regiment, which took its name from his father. He had an only daughter, the wife of Lieutenant-general Prevost, of the British service, who, on the death of his father-in-law, without male issue, obtained the king's license to bear the name and arms of Mackay of Scourie in addition to his own, which his descendants in Holland still bear. Gabriel, the younger son, lieutenant-colonel of the Mackay regiment, died without issue. James, the next brother of General Mackay, a lieutenant-colonel in his regiment, was killed at Killiecrankie, and Roderick, the youngest, died in the East Indies, both unmarried.

After General Hugh Mackay's death, the Mackay regiment in the Dutch service was commanded by his nephew, Brigadier-general Aeneas Mackay, who was wounded at Killiecrankie, and after him by his son, Colonel Donald Mackay, who was killed at the battle of Fontenoy, May 11, 1745.

The representative of the family of Scourie, John Mackay, Esq. of Rockville, at one period one of the clerks to the commissioners for the affairs of India, which institution he resigned from loss of sight, had two brothers, Hugh and William. Their father was the Rev. Thomas Mackay, minister of the parish of Lairg in Sutherlandshire, son of the Rev. John Mackay, minister there from 1714 to 1753, having previously been minister of his native parish of Durness on the west coast of the same county. Hugh, the second son, entered the service of the East India Company in 1784, and served in the 4th Madras native cavalry. He held the lucrative staff appointment of agent for draught and carriage cattle to the army, under General Wellesley, afterwards duke of Wellington, but though exempt from regimental duty as a staff officer, he solicited permission to lead his company in the battle of Assaye, 23d September, 1803, and was refused. Rather, however, than remain idly with the baggage in the rear, when his brother officers were engaged with the enemy, he resolved to disobey, thereby risking his commission, and was killed at the muzzle of the enemy's guns, in that desperate charge of the cavalry which decided the fate of the day. On the spot where he fell his brother officers erected a monument to his memory.

William, the youngest son, after being educated at the parish school of Lairg, went to sea at the age of 16. He made several voyages to the East and West Indies, and was esteemed one of the most skilful navigators in the Indian seas. In 1795, the ship Juno of Calcutta, of which he was second officer, was sent on a voyage to the coast of Pegu for a cargo of teakwood, and on its return was wrecked on the coast of Arracan. The ship sprang a leak, and filled so fast with water that but for the nature of her cargo, she must inevitably have gone to the bottom. When her hull was under water, she settled down, with her masts standing erect. To lighten her, the main mast was cut away, and the unfortunate crew, 72 in number, took refuge in the rigging of the two remaining masts. In this situation, without food or water to drink, save what the rain supplied, fourteen individuals, including the captain's wife and her servant maid, lived 23 days, and, when at length the wreck took the ground, were saved. The rest perished. The principal survivor was William Mackay, who published a narrative of his sufferings and the escape of himself and his companions. From this narrative, Lord Byron borrowed some of the most graphic incidents and most touching passages in the description of a shipwreck in his poem of Don Juan. In reference to these passages, Mr. Moore, his biographer, says: "It will be felt, I think, by every reader, that this is one of the instances in which poetry must be content to yield the palm to prose. There is a pathos in the last sentence of the seaman's recital (see Narrative of the Shipwreck of the Juno, page 26) which the artifices of metre and rhyme were sure to disturb, and which, indeed, no verses, however beautiful, could half so naturally and powerfully express."

In 1801, William Mackay, who had resumed his mariner's life immediately after his wonderful preservation, was sent up the Red Sea in command of a brig, with stores and provisions for General Baird's army, destined to co-operate with that of Sir Ralph Abercromby in Egypt. On the voyage he had another marvellous escape from shipwreck, and by superior seamanship not only saved his own but many other ships of the fleet, particularly, the Real Fidellissimo, with Colonel

Ford and a detachment of the 86th regiment, an account of which is given in an appendix to a subsequent edition of his Narrative of the Loss of the Juno. He died at Calcutta in 1804, from an affection of the liver, contracted during the twenty-three dreadful days he passed on the wreck of the Juno. In the churchyard of Calcutta there is a monument to his memory, and in that of their native parish of Lairg in Sutherland a square monument, with a separate tablet for each, commemorates the characters of the Rev. John Mackay, and his son, and two grandsons.

General Mackay's cousin-german, Captain William Mackay of Borley, eldest son of Donald Mackay of Borley, second son of Donald, first of Scourie, led a company of the Mackays at the battle of Worcester in 1651, on the side of Charles II. He had three sons: Captain Hugh Mackay of Scourie; Donald; and the Rev. John Mackay, minister first of Durness, and afterwards of Lairg, above mentioned. Donald, the second son, was a member of the council of the Darien company in 1698, and was sent to Britain from the colony with an address to the king, and a pressing request to the directors to send out, with all expedition, supplies of provisions, ammunition, and men. On his return to the colony, he found it abandoned. His fate was a melancholy one. Being at sea in 1702, he harpooned a shark, and having got entangled with the rope, was dragged overboard and drowned.

The eldest branch of the Mackays was that of the Clan-Abrach, descended from John Aberigh Mackay, second son of Angus Dubh, who received the lands of Achness, Breachat, and others, from his brother, Neill Wasse (see page 5). Of this family was Robert Mackay, writer, Thurso, the historian of the clan Mackay. According to this gentleman, John Aberigh, the first of this branch, gave his name to the district of Strathnaver. In the Gaelic language, he says, the inhabitants of Strathnaver are called Naverigh, and that tribe the Sliochd-nan-Aberigh. John, their founder, some say, took his appellation of Aberigh from Lochaber, where he resided in his youth with some relatives, and from Strathna-Aberich the transition is natural to Strath-n'-Averich. Neill Naverich, above mentioned, was so called from his having belonged to the Reay Country, that is, Strathnaver. The Clan-Abrach were the most numerous and powerful branch of the Mackays. They acted as wardens of their country, and never betrayed their trust.

The Bighouse branch were descendants of William Mackay of Far, younger half brother of Donald Mackay of Scourie, by his second wife, Christian Sinclair, daughter of the laird of Dun.

The Strathly branch sprung from John Mackay of Dilred and Strathly, brother of the first Lord Reay, and son of Hugh Mackay of Far, by his wife, Lady Jane Gordon, eldest daughter of Alexander, earl of Sutherland.

The Melness branch came from the Hon. Colonel Æneas Mackay, second son of the first Lord Reay, by his first wife, the Hon. Barbara Mackenzie, daughter of Lord Kintail.

The Kinloch branch descended from the Hon. Captain William Mackay, and the Sandwood branch from the Hon. Charles Mackay, sons of the first Lord Reay by his last wife, Marjory Sinclair, daughter of Francis Sinclair of Stürooke.

The founder of the Holland branch of the Mackays, General Hugh Mackay, prior to 1680, when a colonel in the Dutch service, and having no prospect of leaving Holland, wrote for some of his near relatives to go over and settle in that country. Amongst those were his brother, James, and his nephews, Æneas and Robert, sons of the first Lord Reay. The former he took into his own regiment, in which, in a few years, he became lieutenant-colonel. The latter he sent to school at Utrecht for a short time, and afterwards obtained commissions for them in his own regiment. In the beginning of 1687, several British officers in the Dutch service were recalled to England by King James, and amongst others was Æneas Mackay, then a captain. On his arrival in London, the King made him some favourable propositions to enter his service, which he declined, and, in consequence, when he reached Scotland, he was ordered to be apprehended as a spy. He had been imprisoned nearly seven months in Edinburgh castle, when the prince of Orange landed at Torbay, and he was liberated upon granting his personal bond to appear before the privy council when called upon, under a penalty of £500 sterling. The Dutch Mackays married among the nobility of Holland, and one of the families of that branch held the title of baron.

MACKAY, HUGH, a distinguished military commander, the third son of Colonel Hugh Mackay of Scourie, was born about 1640. His two elder brothers having been murdered in the manner above shown, he early succeeded to the family estate. Soon after the Restoration in 1660, he obtained an ensign's commission in the Royal Scots, then, from its commanding officer, termed Douglas' or Dumbarton's regiment, and accompanied it to France, on that corps being lent by Charles II. to the French king. It is now the first foot of the British line. Among his brother subalterns was young Churchill, afterwards the great duke of Marlborough, with whom he kept up a friendly correspondence till his death. In 1669, with several other officers, he volunteered into the service of Venice, and so greatly distinguished himself in several engagements with the Turks in the island of Candia, that he received from the Republic a medal of great value, in acknowledgment of his services.

In 1672 he had the rank conferred on him of captain in Dumbarton's regiment, and was employed with it in the unprincipled expedition of Louis against the United Provinces. His regiment formed part of the division of the army which, under Marshal Turenne, overran the province of Gueldres, and captured most of the Dutch fortresses on the Meuse and Waal. At the small town of Bommel, in Guelderland, he was quartered in the house of a Dutch lady, the widow of the Chevalier Arnold de Bie, whose eldest daughter, Clara, he married in 1673.

Previous to this event, not approving of the cause in which he was engaged, he had resigned his commission in the Royal Scots, and entered the service of the States General, being appointed captain in the Scottish Dutch brigade. In 1674 he was present at the battle of Senef, when the army under the prince of Orange was defeated by the prince of Conde. He was afterwards promoted to the rank of major-commandant in the same service; and on the lieutenant-colonelcy of one of the regiments forming the Scots brigade becoming vacant, the prince bestowed it on Mackay, in preference to Graham of Claverhouse, who, in consequence, quitted the Dutch service in disgust.

About 1680 Mackay was promoted to the command of the whole brigade, which, in 1685, was called over to England to assist in suppressing Monmouth's rebellion; on which occasion, King James, on 4th June of that year, conferred on him the rank of major-general, and appointed him a member of his privy council in Scotland. He proceeded, in consequence, to Edinburgh, where he took the oaths, but his public duties did not admit of his visiting his estate and relations in Sutherland. In the following year, disapproving of the arbitrary proceedings of James' government, and preferring the service of his son-in-law, the prince of Orange, he resigned his commission, and returned to Holland; and in 1688, having, along with most of the officers of the Scots brigade, refused to obey the order of James II. to return to England, he and five other persons were declared rebels, and specially exempted from pardon.

With the command of the English and Scots division of the invading army, General Mackay accompanied the prince of Orange to England at the Revolution. Soon after his landing he was seized with a severe illness, from which he had scarcely recovered when by a warrant, signed by William and Mary, dated from Kensington, 4th January, 1689, he was appointed major-general of all forces whatever, "within our ancient kingdom of Scotland," and on the 25th March he arrived at Leith, with part of the Scots brigade, which had served in Holland. The assumption of the sovereign authority in the above warrant, as regarded Scotland, without waiting for the determination of the convention, was guarded against by the following entry in the records of that body:

"Edinburgh, 28th March, 1689. The estates of this kingdom considering that the king of England, in pursuance of his acceptance of the administration of the public affairs of this kingdom, till the meeting of the estates, had sent down Major-general Maekay, with some Scots regiments under his command, for the security of the estates, and general peace of the kingdom; they do acknowledge the great kindness and care of the king of England; and do hereby warrant and authorise the said Major-general Mackay to command any forces, either standing or to be raised, with the militia within this kingdom," &c.

On Viscount Dundee proceeding to the north, to raise the clans for King James, Maekay was despatched from Edinburgh with a considerable body of troops in pursuit. He had previously attempted to open a correspondence with Cameron of Lochiel, with the view of inducing him to submit to King William's government, but could obtain no answer, and Macdonell of Glengary, to whom he also made a communication, advised him, in return, to imitate the conduct of General Monk, by restoring James. Appointing the town of Dundee as the rendezvous for his troops, with about 500 men, consisting of nearly an equal number of horse and foot, Mackay hastened north in quest of the viscount, and after in vain attempting to meet him, he marched first to Elgin, and afterwards to Inverness, where he was joined by 500 of the Maekays, Grants, and Rosses. Dundee having entered Badenoch with a large force, Mackay, not being joined by a detachment of Dutch troops under Colonel Ramsay, which he expected, retreated from Inverness through Strathspey. Here he at one time intended to give Dundee battle, but the latter showed no disposition to engage.

In all probability there would have been a battle if Lieutenant-colonel Livingstone and several of his officers had not stationed two dragoons near the mansion-house of Edinglassie to give Dundee warning. The dragoons were found concealed in the woods, and their information led to discoveries which completely implicated Livingstone and others. General Maekay arrested them and sent them to Edinburgh. They confessed their guilt, but it is not ascertained in what manner they were disposed of. Having thus reason to distrust the fidelity of a portion of his force, Mackay continued his retreat till he was joined by some reinforcements upon whom he could rely, when he turned upon Dundee, and pursued him into Badenoch. He subsequently marched to Inverness, whence he wrote to the duke of Hamilton, president of the convention, urging the necessity of establishing "a formidable garrison" at Inverloch, and small ones in other places in the north, without which he considered that it would be utterly impossible to subdue the Highlanders. He himself soon after repaired to Edinburgh, to hasten the preparations for carrying such a project into effect; but the plan he proposed, as he himself confesses, "considering the inability, ignorance, and little forwardness of the government to furnish the necessary ingredients for the advance of their service, was built upon a sandy foundation, and much like the building of castles in the air." (Mackay's Memoirs, p. 46.)

After completing his arrangements at Edinburgh, Mackay went to Stirling, to inspect the castle. From that place he proceeded to Perth, and on the 26th July 1689, he began his march into Athol, at the head of an army, as generally stated, of 4,500 men, but he tells us himself, in his 'Memoirs,' that he had with him only "six battalions of foot, making at the most 3,000 men, with four troops of horse and as many dragoons." Among the foot were two Scottish regiments, which, as stated in Mr. Mackay of Rockfield's Life of General Mackay, "as well as the horse, were not only new levies, but were also commanded by noblemen and gentlemen wholly destitute of military experience, and selected for their respective commands solely on account of their power of raising men; little more, therefore, than one half of the whole number could be said to be disciplined." At night the general encamped opposite to Dunkeld. Here, at midnight, he received an express from the marquis of Tullibardine, (often styled Lord Murray,) announcing that Viscount Dundee had entered Athol, and in consequence he had retreated from before the castle of Blair, which he had for some time blockaded, and informing him that at the upper end of the pass of Killiecrankie, which lay between him and Lord Dundee, he had posted a guard to secure a free passage through it to his troops.

On receipt of this alarming intelligence, Mackay despatched orders to Perth, to hasten the arrival of six troops of cavalry which he had left there, and at daybreak next day, proceeded in direction of the pass. At ten o'clock in the morning he reached its lower extremity, when he halted his troops, and allowed them two hours to rest and refresh themselves. Receiving notice that the pass was clear, he again put his men in motion, and they effected their passage through this terrific defile, with the loss only of a single horseman. In that singularly wild and stupendous locality, a handful of men, with no other ammunition than stones, stationed at intervals on the summit of the precipices, could easily impede the progress of any troops. If even at the present time, with the advantages of the excellent road, formed nearly sixty years afterwards, its passage is difficult to the traveller, it must have been much more so in General Mackay's time, when it was in a state of the most savage desolation. "When the pass of Killiecrankie," says one authority, "is traversed, the country beyond is found to open suddenly up into a plain, which is expressively called the Blair or field of Athol. Immediately beyond the pass this plain is not very spacious, but is confined to that description of territory which in Scotland is called a haugh, or a stripe of level alluvial soil by the brink of a river. The road debouches upon this narrow plain; the river runs along under the hills on the left; on the right rise other hills, but not of so bold a character. Mackay no sooner arrived at a space sufficiently wide for drawing up his army than he halted and began to intrench himself. He left his baggage at a blacksmith's house near the termination of the pass, so as to have the protection of the army in front."

As it was Viscount Dundee's object to prevent Mackay from establishing himself in Athol, he did not hesitate to meet him with an inferior force, amounting to little more than the half of that under Mackay. In making his dispositions, the latter divided every battalion into two parts, and, as he meant to fight three deep, he left a small distance between each of these sub-battalions.

In the centre of his line, however, he left a greater interval of space, behind which he placed the two troops of horse. Hastings' regiment, which arrived after he had taken up his ground, was stationed on the right, and, for greater security, a detachment of fire-locks from each battalion was added. On the extreme left, on a hillock covered with trees, Lient.-Colonel Lauder was posted, with 200 picked men. After his line had been fully formed, Mackay rode along the front, from the left wing, which he committed to the charge of Brigadier Balfour, to the right, and having ascertained that everything was in readiness to receive the enemy, he addressed the battalions nearest him in a short speech.

Whilst he was occupied on the lower platform, his gallant rival was equally busy on the eminence above, ranging his men in battle array, in one line, and neither he nor Mackay placed any body of reserve behind their lines. As the evening advanced without any appearance on the part of Dundee of a desire to commence the action, the uneasiness of Mackay increased, as he supposed that the design of the Highlanders was to wait till nightfall, when, by descending suddenly, and setting up their customary loud shout, they expected to frighten his men, and throw them into disorder. He resolved however to remain in his position, whatever were the consequences, "although with impatience," as he says in his Memoirs, till Dundee should either attack him or retire, which he had a better opportunity of doing. To provoke the Highlanders to engage, he ordered three small leather field-pieces to be discharged, but they proved of little use. Towards the close of the evening, some of Dundee's sharpshooters took possession of some houses upon the ascent which lay between the two armies, to obtain a more certain aim. This induced the general to order his brother, Colonel Mackay, to detach a captain with some musqueteers to dislodge them. The general's nephew, the Hon. Robert Mackay, performed the duty with great gallantry, killing and wounding some, and chasing the rest back to their main body.

It was nearly sunset when the Highlanders all at once began to move slowly down the hill, bare-footed and stripped to their shirts and doublets.

They advanced, according to their usual practice, with their bodies bent forward, so as to present as small a surface as possible to the fire of the enemy, the upper part of their bodies being covered by their targets. They soon rushed forward with tremendous fury, uttering a terrific yell. They commenced the attack by a discharge of their fire-arms and pistols, which made little impression on Mackay's men, who reserved their fire until within a few paces of the Highlanders, when they poured it into them. Discharging in platoons, they were enabled to take a steady aim, and their fire told with dreadful effect on the Highlanders. At that time the present plan of fixing the bayonet was not known, and before the troops had time to screw their side-arms on to the end of their muskets, the Highlanders rushed in upon them sword-in-hand. It is said that General Mackay invented the present plan of firing with the bayonet fixed, from the complete defeat which he was now destined so briefly to experience, for the whole affair lasted only a few minutes. The shock of the Highlanders was too impetuous to be long resisted by soldiers, who, according to their own general, "behaved, with the exception of Hastings' and Leven's regiments, like the vilest cowards in nature."

While the work of death was thus going on towards the right, Dundee, at the head of the horse, made a furious charge on Mackay's own battalion, and broke through it, on which the English horse, which were stationed behind, fled, without firing a single shot. When Mackay perceived that Dundee's chief point of attack was near the centre of his line, he resolved to charge the Highlanders in flank with two troops of horse which he had placed in his rear; and he ordered Lord Belhaven to proceed round the left wing with his own troop, and attack them on their right flank, ordering the other troop to proceed in the contrary direction, and assail their left. The general led Belhaven's troop in person; but scarcely had he got in front of the line when it was thrown into disorder. This disorder was soon communicated to the right wing of Lord Kenmore's battalion, which at once gave way.

At this moment the general was surrounded by a crowd of Highlanders, and he called to his cavally to follow him, that he might get them again formed, but only one person made the attempt, a servant, whose horse was shot under him. Putting spurs to his horse, he galloped through the Highlanders, and when he had got sufficiently out of immediate danger, he turned round to observe the appearance of the field. To his astonishment he saw none of his troops, but the dead, the wounded, and the dying. His army had disappeared. "In the twinkling of an eye, in a manner," he says, "our men were out of sight, being got pell mell down to the river-side, where our baggage stood." The flight of his men must have been truly rapid, for although his left wing, which had never been attacked, had taken to flight before he rode off, his right wing and centre had still kept their ground. But now the whole of his line had fled from the field, pursued by the Highlanders, till the latter were stopped by the baggage, and it was to their desire for plunder that those who escaped owed their safety, for had the Highlanders continued their pursuit, it is very probable that not an individual of Maekay's army would have been left to relate the sad disaster of their discomfiture and death.

When the general had recovered from his surprise, and the smoke had cleared away, he discovered on the right a small number of his troops. He subsequently came upon another portion of them. With these, he retired across the Garry, without molestation, and contrary to the opinion of several of his officers, who advised him to march through the pass of Killiecrankie to Perth, he proceeded several miles up Athol, with the intention of crossing over the hills to Stirling. About two miles from the field of battle, he came up with a party of about 150 fugitives, almost without arms, under the command of Colonel Ramsay, who was quite at a loss what direction to take. Continuing his march along the edge of a rivulet which falls into the Garry, he came to a little village, where he procured from the inhabitants such information as enabled him, with the assistance of his map, to decide upon his route. Early in the morning he reached Weem castle, the seat of his friend, the chief of the clan Menzies, whose son had been in the action at the head of a company of Highlanders, and here he obtained some sleep and refreshment after his fatigues and harassing march. On Sunday, the 28th July, the general continued his march with very little halting, and on Monday he arrived at Stirling with about 400 men. The viscount of Dundee fell in the battle, and thus rendered his victory a fruitless one to King James. On the side of Maekay no fewer than 2,000 men fell, and 500 were made prisoners. The loss on the side of Dundee could never be accurately ascertained. It is stated to have been considerable, and General Maekay says that "the enemy lost on the field six for our one."

Among the persons of rank and distinction slain were his brother Colonel Maekay and Brigadier Balfour. His nephew, the Hon. Captain Maekay, had been left for dead on the field of battle, and was found by Glengary and his men, who, perceiving him still alive, carried him on a barn door to the nearest hut, where he remained some days till he could be removed in safety to Dunkeld. He never completely recovered the effect of his wounds at Killiecrankie, and after serving, and being repeatedly wounded, in several of King William's battles in Flanders, he died at Tongue, the seat of his family, in December 1696, in the 30th year of his age.

After concentrating the troops at Stirling, General Maekay, within a few days after his arrival at that place, found himself again at the head of a considerable force. He then resolved to march direct to Perth, and place a garrison there. On coming within half-a-mile of the town, he observed a party of the enemy, consisting of about 300 Athol men, approaching from it. The latter, seeing from the dispositions made by General Maekay, that their retreat would be intercepted, threw themselves into the Tay, whither they were followed by Maekay's cavalry, who cut them down in the water without mercy. He subsequently followed Colonel Caman, who, on the death of Dundee, had assumed the command of James' army, to the north, and stayed a night at Aberdeen. His arrival there gave great joy, he says, (Memoirs, p. 66,) to most of the inhabitants, as they were in dread of a visit from the Highlanders that very night.

From Aberdeen Maekay proceeded up Deeside,

having received intelligence that Cannan had taken up a position on the Braes of Mar; but learning, on his march, that the Highlanders had gone north to the duke of Gordon's territory, he drew off his men towards Strathgogie. He reached Strathgogie castle before Cannan arrived at the castle of Anelindoun, where he intended to fix his head-quarters. Here the distance between the two armies was only about six miles, and both commanders made preparations for a battle, but the divisions and strifes among the officers and Highland chiefs in Cannan's army prevented one from taking place; and that leader resolved to return to Athol. Mackay followed him in the direction of Cromar, and having ascertained that he had crossed the hills and entered the Mearns, he made a rapid movement down the Dee to Aberdeen. After the battle of Dunkeld he returned to Perth, and spent ten days at the castle of Blair, during which time many of the Athol people took advantage of an indemnity which he offered them, and delivered up their arms.

From the jealousies and dissensions, and personal and selfish motives, which actuated all parties, and the indifference and neglect with which his plans for the subjugation of the Highlands had been treated by the government, General Mackay had, by this time, become heartily tired of his command. He was himself of a moderate and conciliatory disposition, and the different spirit that seemed to influence the conduct of mostly all others in power, made him, as he says himself, "look upon Scotsmen of those times in general, as void of zeal for their religion and natural affection, seeing all men hunt after their particular advantages, and none minding sincerely and self-deniedly the common good, which gave him a real distaste of the country and service; resolving from that time forward to disengage himself out of it as soon as possible he could get it done, and that the service would allow of." (Memoirs, p. 77.) He failed, however, in obtaining even a temporary leave of absence, by the intrigues of Lord Melville and Viscount Tarbet, who, as he says, suspecting an interview with King William, who was then in Holland, to be the object of his proposed visit thither, were afraid that he would induce his majesty to adopt a system different from that which had been followed in the management of Scottish affairs.

He now applied himself, with great perseverance, to accomplish his long cherished project of erecting a fort at Inverlochy, capable of containing ten or twelve hundred men, to keep the western Highlanders in check. As no notice was taken of a communication which he made to King William in reference thereto, notwithstanding its importance was urged in repeated letters from him, he grew quite impatient, and threatened to throw up his commission. At length the privy council having, at his request, written a letter to the king on the subject, his majesty ordered three frigates, which Mackay had written for, to be sent down, with some arms and ammunition and implements for commencing the work, but no money was forthcoming, without which nothing could be undertaken. In this emergency he applied to the city of Glasgow, the magistrates of which agreed to hire vessels for transporting a detachment of 600 men, which Mackay offered to take with him, and to furnish him with the necessary provisions, and such articles as he might require for completing the fort, in addition to those sent down from England.

After the skirmish of Cromdale, Mackay proceeded into Lochaber, and thence to Inverlochy, and lost no time in commencing the fort at that place. The original fort built by General Monk, during the time of Cromwell, was chiefly of earth, and of a temporary character. Mackay erected the present one with stone and lime, on a smaller scale, and gave it the name of Fort William in honour of the king. It withstood a siege of three weeks in 1745. Leaving a thousand men in garrison there, he returned to the south, but shortly afterwards marched north, in all haste, in order to disperse the forces under Major-general Buchan, before any rising should take place in the northern counties. The earl of Seaforth having surrendered himself to him, was committed prisoner to the castle of Inverness, and afterwards sent to Edinburgh. Having at length succeeded, by the most energetic operations, in pacifying the northern counties, and fully establishing the authority of William and Mary in Scotland, in November 1690, he resigned the chief command of the army and retired to his family in Holland, his adopted country. Of his services in Scotland, he left an interesting account in his "Memoirs," printed for the first time for the Bannatyne Club in 1833.

In 1691, he was appointed second in command of King William's forces, serving against the adherents of King James in Ireland. He arrived in that country in the beginning of May of that year, and signalled himself by his skill and gallantry at the capture of Athlone, having led his men on foot through a deep and rapid ford on the river Shannon, amid a continued shower of balls, bullets, and grenades. Smollett says, "Never was a more desperate service, nor was ever exploit performed with more valour and intrepidity." At the battle of Aughrim, which followed, he commanded the right wing of King William's army, and the victory, it was acknowledged, was gained chiefly by his foresight, good conduct, and courage.

After the capitulation of Limerick, on the 3d of the ensuing October, he returned to Holland, and in the succeeding year, when King William took the field against Louis XIV. of France, Mackay, with the rank of lieutenant-general, was nominated to the command of the British division of the confederate army in Flanders. He was killed at the disastrous battle of Steinkirk, July 24th, 1692. He had been ordered to a post which, he saw, could not be maintained, and sent back his opinion about it, but the former orders were confirmed, so he advanced to his death, saying only, "The will of the Lord be done." It is stated that in the course of that evening, King William frequently mentioned with regret the death of one of his generals, but said nothing of General Mackay. One of the officers present took the liberty of expressing his surprise that his majesty had made no allusion to his old and faithful servant, Mackay. "No," replied the king, "Mackay served a higher Master, but the other served me with his soul." The king attended Mackay's funeral, and when the body was laid in the grave, he said, "There he lies, and an honest man the world cannot produce." He is still termed in his native country, "Shenlar mor," the great general. He was to have been rewarded by King William, for his services, with the title of earl of Scourie, but the intrigues of his rival, Mackenzie of Coigach or Cromarty, prevented it.

The eldest of his three daughters, Margaret, became the wife of George, third Lord Reay. The two others married Dutchmen, the one a minister of Nimeguen, the other, the burgo-master of that town.

Bishop Burnet describes General Mackay as one of the most pious soldiers whom he had ever known, and highly commends him for the care which he took to enforce the observance of strict discipline, and attention to religious exercises, among both the officers and men under his command. It was commonly said of him by the Dutch soldiers, that he knew no fear but the fear of God. One of his ruling principles was never to aid what he considered a bad cause. His Life, by John Mackay, Esq. of Rockfield, the representative in the male line of the family of Scourie, was published in 1836, in one vol. 4to.

MACKAY, ROBERT, an eminent Gaelic bard, commonly called Rob Donn, that is, Brown Robert, the son of a herdsman, was born in 1714, at Durness, in Sutherlandshire. He says himself:

"I was born in the winter,
'Mongst the wild frowning mountains;
My first sight of the world
Was the snow-drift around me."

His mother, a woman of vigorous understanding, was well versed in Highland poetry and music, with which she stored his mind in his childhood. He never learnt to read. Till he was seven years old he tended calves, but at that age he was taken into the service of Mr. John Mackay, of the family of Skerray, a gentleman who carried on an extensive business as a cattle-dealer. As he grew to years he was employed as a drover, and sometimes went with herds as far as to the English markets. He was afterwards engaged by Donald Lord Reay, the chief of his clan, as his cattle-steward or cow-keeper, called in some parts of the country a boman. He now married, and in course of time became the father of thirteen children.

Unfortunately his fondness for deer-hunting, for which he was, on one occasion, summoned before the sheriff-substitute of the county, when he narrowly escaped transportation, according to the statute, and a satirical ballad which he composed on some transaction in his noble master's household, caused his dismissal from Lord Reay's service. One account, but it seems most unlikely, says that the reason of his leaving was his refusal to use the flail himself in thrashing out corn for fodder to the cattle, employing servants to perform this laborious duty. He was then taken into the employment of Colonel Mackay, son of the gentleman who had patronised him in his boyhood, when he removed, with his family, to the place of Achmore, in that part of the parish of Durness which borders upon Cape Wrath.

CAPE WRATH.

When the first regiment of Sutherland fencibles was raised in 1759, he was prevailed upon by the country gentlemen holding commissions in it to accompany them. He enlisted as a private soldier, but was never called on to take any part in troublesome duty. On the reduction of the corps in May 1763, he returned to his home, when he was recalled to his former situation in the employment of Lord Reay. Although dreaded as a satirist, such was the excellence of his private character that he was elected a ruler elder of his native parish. His witty sayings and convivial qualities made him a welcome guest every where. In the sketch of his life inserted in 'Mackenzie's Beauties of Gaelic Poetry,' (page 186,) we are told that his society was courted not only by his equals, but still more by his superiors; no social party almost was esteemed a party without him; no public meeting of the better and the best of the land was felt to be a full one without Rob Donn being there. The reason of his being thus in such universal requisition was, perhaps, that, as subsequently stated in the same sketch, if he was not invited to a feast or wedding, next day he composed a satire full of mirth and humour, on the offending party. He was proud, says his biographer, of his own powers of satire, and seemed to enjoy the dread of those who feared the exercise of his wit.

He died 5th August, 1778, aged 64. A vast concourse of his clansmen attended his funeral, and a granite monument was erected in 1829, by public subscription, over his grave, in the parish burying ground of Durness, with inscriptions in Gaelic, in English, in Greek, and Latin. His poems consist of humorous, satirical, and descriptive pieces, with elegies and love songs. Many of them are of a local nature. A collection of them was published at Inverness in 1830, by the Rev. Dr. Mackay, then of Dunoon, author of 'The Gaelic Dictionary,' with a memoir. In the Quarterly Review for July 1831, translations are given of some of them. The memoir which accompanies them was written by Sir Walter Scott.

MACKAY, JOHN, an eminent botanist, was born at Kirkcaldy, December 25, 1772. He early discovered a strong predilection for botanical pursuits, and even at the age of 14, he had formed a very considerable collection of the rarer kinds of garden and hothouse plants. In the beginning of 1791 he was placed in Dickson and Company's nurseries at Edinburgh; of which, in 1793, he received the principal charge. Every summer he made a botanical excursion to the Highlands; he likewise traversed the Western Isles, and in most of these journeys he was successful in adding some new species to the British Flora. To the elegant work entitled 'English Botany,' then in course of publication, under the care of Dr. Smith and Mr. Sowerby of London, he contributed various valuable articles and figures of indigenous plants, and in February 1796, he was elected an associate of the Linnæan Society of London. In 1800, on the death of Mr. Menzies, he succeeded him as superintendent of the Royal Botanic Garden of Edinburgh, where he died April 14, 1802.

MACKENZIE, the surname of a clan, (badge, deer grass,) which has long cherished a traditional belief in its descent from the Norman family of Fitzgerald settled in Ireland. Its pretensions to such an origin are founded upon a fragment of the records of Icolmkill, and a charter of the lands of Kintail in Wester Ross, said to have been granted by Alexander III., to Colin Fitzgerald, their supposed progenitor. According to the Icolmkill fragment, a personage described as "Peregrinus et Hibernus nobilis ex familia Geraldinorum," that is, "a noble stranger and Hibernian, of the family of the Geraldines," being driven from Ireland, with a considerable number of followers, about 1261, was received graciously by the king, and remained thenceforward at the court. Having given powerful aid to the Scots at the battle of Largs two years afterwards, he was rewarded by a grant of Kintail, erected into a free barony by charter dated 9th January, 1266. No such document, however, as this pretended fragment of Icolmkill is known to be in existence, at least, as Mr. Skene says, nobody has ever seen it, and as for King Alexander's charter, he declares (Highlanders, vol. ii. p. 235) that "it bears the most palpable marks of having been a forgery of later date, and one by no means happy in the execution." Besides, the words "Colino Hiberno," contained in it, do not prove the said Colin to have been an Irishman, as Hiberni was at that period a common appellation of the Gael of Scotland.

The ancestor of the clan Kenzie was Gilleon-og, or Colin the younger, a son of Gilleon na hair'de, that is, Colin of the Aird, progenitor of the earls of Ross, and from the MS. of 1450 their Gaelic descent may be considered established. Colin of Kintail is said to have married a daughter of Walter, lord high steward of Scotland. He died in 1278, and his son, Kenneth, being, in 1304, succeeded by his son, also called Kenneth, with the addition of Mackenneth, the latter, softened into Mackenny or Mackenzie, became the name of the whole clan. Murdoch, or Murcha, the son of Kenneth, received from David II. a charter of the lands of Kintail as early as 1362. At the beginning of the 15th century, the clan Kenzie appears to have been both numerous and powerful, for its chief, Kenneth More, when arrested, in 1427, with his son-in-law, Angus of Moray, and Macmathan, by James I. in his parliament at Inverness, was said to be able to muster 2,000 men.

In 1463, Alexander Mackenzie of Kintail received Strathgarve and many other lands from John, earl of Ross, the same who was forfeited in 1476. The Mackenzie chiefs were originally vassals of the earls of Ross, but after their forfeiture, they became independent of any superior but the crown. They strenuously opposed the Macdonalds in every attempt which they made to regain possession of the earldom. Alexander was succeeded by his son, Kenneth, who had taken for his first wife Lady Margaret Macdonald, daughter of the forfeited earl, John lord of the Isles, and having, about 1480, divorced his wife, he brought upon himself the resentment of her family. Her brother, Angus, invaded Ross, with a body of his island vassals, and encountering the Mackenzies at a place called Lagebread, defeated them with considerable loss. In 1491, Alexander of Lochalsh, called Alaster Macgillespoc, nephew of the lord of the Isles, made his appearance, at the head of a large body of the Islanders, in Wester Ross, and proceeded to Strathconnan, for the purpose of ravaging the lands of the Mackenzies. The latter, however, under the above-named Kenneth, assembled in great force, and after a fierce and obstinate battle, the Macdonalds were defeated with much slaughter, and expelled from Ross. This engagement was called the battle of Blairna-Park. The Mackenzies then proceeded to ravage the lands of Ardmach and Foulis, and committed so many excesses that the earl of Huntly, lieutenant of the north, was compelled to act against them as rebels and oppressors of the lieges. Kenneth died soon after.

Kenneth Oig, his son by the divorced wife, was chief in 1493. Two years afterwards, he and Farquhar Macintosh were imprisoned by James V. in the castle of Edinburgh. In 1497, the Macdonalds again invaded Ross, but were encountered by the Mackenzies and Munroes, at a place called Drunchatt, and after a sharp skirmish, were routed and driven out of Ross. The same year he and Macintosh made their escape from the castle of Edinburgh, but on their way to the Highlands, they were treacherously seized at the Torwood, by the laird of Buchanan. Kenneth Oig resisted and was slain, and his head presented to the king by Buchanan. His death was avenged by his foster-brother at Flodden. This was a man of the district of Kenloch, named Donald Dubh Mac Gillechrist Vic Gillercoch. In the retreat of the Scots army he heard some one near him say, "Alas! laird, thou hast fallen." On inquiry he was told that it was the laird of Buchanan, who had sunk from wounds or exhaustion. Rushing forward, he shouted out, "If he hath not fallen, he shall fall," and slew Buchanan on the spot.

Kenneth Oig, having no issue, was succeeded by his brother, John, whose mother, Agnes Fraser, was a daughter of Lord Lovat. She had other sons, from whom sprung numerous branches of this wide-spread family. As he was very young, his kinsman, Hector Roy Mackenzie, progenitor of the house of Gerloch, assumed the command of the clan, as guardian of the young chief. "Under his rule," says Mr. Gregory, (Highlands and Isles of Scotland, p. 111.) "the clan Kenzie became involved in feuds with the Munroes and other clans; and Hector Roy himself became obnoxious to government, as a disturber of the public peace. His intentions towards the young lord of Kintail were considered very dubious; and the apprehensions of the latter and his friends having been roused, Hector was compelled by law to yield up the estate and the command of the tribe to the proper heir." John, at the call of James IV., marched with his clan to the fatal field of Flodden, where he was taken prisoner by the English.

Among the measures adopted by government for the suppression of the rebellion of Sir Donald Macdonald of Lochalsh, who had got himself proclaimed lord of the Isles, was the appointment, by an act of council, of certain individuals of local influence as temporary lieutenants of particular divisions of the northern shires. Among others, the chief of the Mackenzies and Munro of Foulis were constituted guardians of Wester Ross. The following year (1515) Mackenzie, without legal warrant, seized the royal castle of Dingwall, but professed his readiness to deliver it up to any one appointed by the regent, John, Duke of Albany. It was in attempting, in the Mackenzie chief's absence, to take his castle of Elandonan, in 1539, that Donald Gorme, the claimant of the lordship of the Isles, lost his life, having been wounded in the foot by a barbed arrow. (See vol. ii. p. 548).

On King James the Fifth's expedition to the Isles in 1510, he was joined at Kintail by John, chief of the Mackenzies, who accompanied him throughout his voyage. He fought at the battle of Pinkie at the head of his clan in 1547. On his death in 1556, he was succeeded by his son, Kenneth, who, by a daughter of the earl of Athol, had Colin and Roderick, the latter ancestor of the Mackenzies of Redcastle, Kincaig, Rosend, and other branches.

Kenneth Mackenzie of Kintail, had, by accident, obtained the custody of Mary Macleod, the heiress of Harris and Dunvegan, and refusing to give her up to her lawful guardian, James Macdonald of Dunveg and the Glens, was compelled to resign her into the hands of Queen Mary, with whom she remained for some years as a maid of honour. In the Collectanea de rebus Albanicis, (p. 143) is the act of privy council which bears that he had delivered up the said heiress to the queen. It is dated "at Edinburgh, the 21st May 1562." He died in 1568.

Colin, eleventh chief, son of Kenneth, fought on the side of Queen Mary at the battle of Langside, for which he obtained a remission. In August 1569 he and Donald Gormeson Macdonald of Skye were forced, in presence of the Regent Moray and privy council at Perth, to settle the feuds in which they had been for some time involved. On this occasion Moray acted as mediator between them. Colin Mackenzie, chief of the clan Kenzie, was a privy councillor to James VI., and died 14th June 1594. He was twice married. By his first wife, Barbara, a daughter of Grant of Grant, he had, with three daughters, four sons, namely, Kenneth, his successor; Sir Roderick Mackenzie of Tarbat, ancestor of the earls of Cromarty; Colin, ancestor of the Mackenzies of Kennock and Pittludie; and Alexander, of the Mackenzies of Kilcoy, and other families of the name. By a second wife, Mary, eldest daughter of Roderick Mackenzie of Davochmalunk, he had a son, Alexander, from whom the Mackenzies of Applecross, Coul, Delvin, Assint, and other families are sprung.

Kenneth, the eldest son, twelfth chief of the Mackenzies, was also a member of the privy council of James VI. Soon after succeeding his father, he was engaged in supporting the claims of Torquil Macleod, surnamed Connanach, the disin-herited son of Macleod of Lewis, whose mother was the sister of John Mackenzie of Kintail, and whose daughter had married Roderick Mackenzie, Kenneth's brother. The barony of Lewis he conveyed by writings to the Mackenzie chief, who caused the usurper thereof and some of his followers to be beheaded in July 1597 (see MACLEOD). In the following year he joined Macleod of Harris and Macdonald of Sleat in opposing the project of James VI. for the colonization of the Lewis, by some Lowland gentlemen, chiefly belonging to Fife. As he claimed a property in that island, though, so far as he was concerned, it was but nominal, it is not surprising that he did all he could to frustrate the expedition. He incited against the colonists Neill and Murdoch, two bastard sons of Ruari Macleod, the last undisputed lord of Lewis. After some successes the two brothers quarrelled. For a reward from government Neill delivered up Murdoch, in 1600, to the colonists, and he was hanged at St. Andrews. In consequence of some confessions by him and of complaints by the colonists, Mackenzie was apprehended and committed prisoner to Edinburgh castle. Through the assistance, however, of his friend, the lord-chancellor, he escaped without a trial.

In 1601, Neill Macleod deserted the cause of the colonists, and Mackenzie, who had detained in captivity for several years Tormod, the only surviving legitimate son of Ruari Macleod of the Lewis, set him at liberty, and sent him into that island to assist Neill in opposing the settlers. In 1602, the feud between the Mackenzies and the Glengarry Macdonalds, regarding their lands in Wester Ross, was renewed with great violence (see MACDONELL of Glengarry, vol. ii. page 728). Ultimately, after much bloodshed on both sides, an agreement was entered into, by which Glengarry renounced in favour of Mackenzie the castle of Strone, with the lands of Lochalsh, Lochearron, and others, so long the subject of dispute between them. A crown charter of these lands was granted to Kenneth Mackenzie in 1607. The territories of the clan Kenzie at this time were very extensive. "All the Highlands and Isles, from Ardnarnachan to Strathnaver, were either the Mackenzies' property, or under their vassalage, some few excepted," and all about them were bound to them "by very strict bonds of friendship." The same year, Kenneth Mackenzie obtained, through the influence of the lord-chancellor, a gift, under the great seal, of the Lewis to himself, in virtue of the resignation formerly made in his favour by Torquil Macleod, but on the complaint to the king of those of the colonists who survived, he was forced to resign it. He was created a peer, by the title of Lord Mackenzie of Kintail, by patent, dated 19th November 1609. On the abandonment of the scheme for colonizing the Lewis, the remaining adventurers, Sir George Hay and Sir James Spens, were easily prevailed upon to sell their title to Lord Kintail, who likewise succeeded in obtaining from the king a grant of the share in the island forfeited by Lord Balmorino, another of the grantees. Having thus at length acquired a legal right to the Lewis, he procured from the government a commission of fire and sword against the Islanders, and landing there with a large force, he speedily reduced them to obedience, with the exception of Neil Macleod and a few others, his kinsmen and followers. The struggle for the Lewis between the Mackenzies and the Macleods, continued some time longer, but for an account of it the reader is referred to the article MACLEOD. The Mackenzies ultimately succeeded in obtaining possession of the island.

Lord Kintail died in March 1611. He had married, first, Anne, daughter of George Ross of Bahagowan, and had, with two daughters, two sons, Colin, second Lord Kintail, and first earl of Seaforth, and the Hon. John Mackenzie of Lochslin. His second wife was Isabel, daughter of Sir Alexander Ogilvie of Powrie, by whom, with a daughter, Sybilla, Mrs. Macleod of Macleod, he had four sons, viz., Alexander, George, second earl of Seaforth; Thomas, of Pluscardine, and Simon of Lochslin, whose eldest son was the celebrated Sir George Mackenzie of Rosehaugh, lord advocate in the reigns of Charles II. and James VII., of whom a memoir is subsequently given in larger type.

Colin, second Lord Kintail, was created earl of Seaforth, by patent dated at Theobald's, 3d December 1623, to him and his heirs male. (See SEAFORTH, earl of).

The great-grandson of the third earl of Seaforth, and male heir of the family, was Colonel Thomas Frederick Humberston Mackenzie, who fell at Gheriah in India in 1783, and of whom a memoir is given under the head of SEAFORTH, earl of. His brother, Francis Humberston Mackenzie, obtained the Seaforth estates, and was created Baron Seaforth in the peerage of the United Kingdom in 1796. Dying without surviving male issue his title became extinct, and his eldest daughter, the Hon. Mary Frederica Elizabeth, having taken for her second husband J. A. Stewart of Glasserton, a cadet of the house of Galloway, that gentleman assumed the name of Stewart Mackenzie of Seaforth.

The clan Kenzie from small beginnings had increased in territory and influence till they became, next to the Campbells, the greatest clan in the West Highlands. They remained loyal to the Stuarts, but the forfeiture of the earl of Seaforth in 1715, and of the earl of Cromarty in 1745, weakened their power greatly. They are still, however, one of the most numerous tribes in the Highlands. In 1745 their effective strength was calculated at 2,500. No fewer than seven families of the name possess baronetcies.

The armorial bearings of the Mackenzies are a stag's head and horns. It is said that they were assumed in consequence of Kenneth, the ancestor of the family, having rescued the king of Scotland from an infuriated stag, which he had wounded. "In gratitude for his assistance," says Stewart of Garth, "the king gave him a grant of the castle and lands of Castle Donnán, and thus laid the foundation of the family and clan Mackenneth or Mackenzie." From the stag's head in their arms the term Caberfae was applied to the chiefs.

The progenitor of the Gerloch or Gairloch branch of the Mackenzies was, as above shown, Hector, the elder of the two sons of Alexander, 7th chief, by his 2d wife, Margaret Macdowall, daughter of John, lord of Lorn. He lived in the reigns of Kings James III. and IV., and was by the Highlanders called "Eachin Roy," or Red Hector, from the colour of his hair. To the assistance of the former of these monarchs, when the confederated nobles collected in arms against him, he raised a considerable body of the clan Kenzie, and fought at their head at the battle of Sauchieburn. After the defeat of his party, he retreated to the north, and, taking possession of Redcastle, put a garrison in it. Thereafter he joined the earl of Huntly, and from James IV. he obtained in 1494 a grant of the lands and barony of Gerloch, or Gairloch, in Ross-shire. These lands originally belonged to the Siol-Vic-Gilliechallum, or Macleods of Rasay, a branch of the family of Lewis, but Hector, by means of a mortgage or wadset, had acquired a small portion of them, and in 1508 he got Brachan, the lands of Moy, the royal forest of Glassiter, and other lands, united to them. In process of time, his successors came to possess the whole district, but not till after a long and bloody feud with the Siol-Vic-Gilliechallum, which lasted till 1611, when it was brought to a sudden close by a skirmish, in which Gillechallum Oig, laird of Rasay, and Murdoch Mackenzie, a younger son of the laird of Gerloch, were slain. From that time the Mackenzies possessed Gerloch without interruption from the Macleods.

Hector, the first of the house of Gerloch, was with the clan at Flodden, where most of them were killed; and he and his nephew, John, the chief, to whom he was tutor, narrowly escaped. By a daughter of the laird of Grant, to whom he was betrothed, but who died before the marriage was celebrated, he had a son, Hector, who got the name of Came, or one-eyed. He afterwards married a daughter of Ranald Macdonald of Moydart, and, with two daughters, he had four sons.

John, the eldest of these, called by the Highlanders, John Glesich, married Agnes, only daughter of James Fraser of Foinich, brother of Hugh, Lord Lovat, and died in 1550. He had three sons: Hector, his heir; John, who succeeded Hector, and carried on the line of the family; and Alexander, from whom descended Murdoch Mackenzie, hishop of Moray and afterwards of Caithness, in the reigns of Charles I. and II. Of this branch, also, was Dr James Mackenzie, an eminent physician, author of the 'History of Health.'

Kenneth Mackenzie, eighth baron of Gerloch, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1700. He married Margaret, daughter of Sir Roderick Mackenzie of Findon, and was succeeded, in 1704, by his son, Sir Alexander, second baronet, who married Janet, daughter of Sir Roy Mackenzie of Scatwell, and with three daughters had six sons, most of whom died young. He himself died in 1766. His eldest son, Sir Alexander, 3d baronet, married, 1st, Margaret, eldest daughter of Roderick Mackenzie of Redcastle, issue one son, Hector; 2dly, Jean, only daughter of John Gorrie, Esq., commissary of Ross, issue 2 sons, John, a general officer, and Kenneth, an officer in India, and 3 daughters. He died 13th April 1770.

Sir Hector Mackenzie, his eldest son, 4th baronet of the Gerloch branch, died in April 1826. His son, Sir Francis Alexander, 5th baronet, born in 1798, died June 2, 1843. The eldest son of Sir Francis, Sir Kenneth Smith Mackenzie, 6th baronet, born 1832, married in 1860 the 2d daughter of Walter Frederick Campbell of Islay.

The Mackenzies of Portmore, county Peebles, are a branch of the Gerloch family. Colin Mackenzie of Portmore, great-grandson of Sir Alexander Mackenzie, baronet of Gerloch, married in 1803, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir William Forbes of Pitsligo, and died in September 1830. He had three brothers, William Mackenzie of Muirtown, Ross-shire; Sutherland Mackenzie of Edinburgh, and John, banker in Inverness. His son, William Forbes Mackenzie, M.P. for Peebles-shire, born in April 1807, and appointed in 1831 deputy lieutenant for that county, was the introducer of the act of parliament passed in 1854, for the regulation of public houses in Scotland, commonly called "Forbes Mackenzie's Act."

The first of the Mackenzies of Tarbet and Royston, in the county of Cromarty, was Sir Roderick Mackenzie, second son of Colin Mackenzie of Kintail, brother of the first Lord Mackenzie of Kintail. Having married Margaret, daughter and heiress of Torquil Macleod of the Lewes, he added the armorial bearings of the Macleods to his own. His son, John Mackenzie of Tarbet, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 21st May 1628. He had four sons. The third son, Roderick Mackenzie, was on 1st December 1702, appointed justice clerk, and an ordinary lord of session 12th January 1703, when he took his seat as Lord Prestonhall. He was superseded as justice clerk in October 1704, and resigned his seat as one of the judges, in favour of his nephew, Sir James Mackenzie of Royston, in June 1710. In September of the same year he was appointed sheriff of Ross-shire. He died Feb. 4, 1712. His son, Sir Alexander, married Amelia, daughter and heiress of Hugh, 10th Lord Lovat, and changing his name to Fraser, was designated of Fraserdale. Engaging in the rebellion of 1715 he was attainted as Lord Prestonhall.

The eldest son, Sir George Mackenzie, second baronet, was the first earl of Cromarty. (See vol. i., page 731).

The Hon. Kenneth Mackenzie, the second son of the first Lord Cromarty, obtained from his father the extensive estate of Cromarty, and was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 29th April 1704, with the precedence of his father's patent of baronetcy, 21st May, 1628. He was commissioner to the Scottish estates for the county of Cromarty, in the reigns of King William and Queen Anne, and sat in the first British parliament. He died in 1729. His eldest son, Sir George, third baronet, was M.P. for the county of Cromarty. Becoming a bankrupt, his estate of Cromarty was sold in 1741 to William Urquhart of Meldrum. He was succeeded by his brother, Sir Kenneth, fourth baronet, at whose death, without issue, in 1763, the baronetcy lay dormant until revived in favour of Sir Alexander Mackenzie of Tarbet, elder son of Robert Mackenzie, lieutenant-colonel in the East India Company's service, great-great-grandson of the first baronet. Colonel Mackenzie's father was Alexander Mackenzie of Ardlock, and his mother the daughter of Robert Sutherland, Esq. of Langwell, Caithness, 12th in descent from William de Sutherland, 5th earl of Sutherland, and the princess Margaret Bruce, sister and heiress of David II. Sir Alexander, 5th baronet, was in the military service of the East India Company. On his death, April 28, 1841, he was succeeded by his brother, Sir James Sutherland Mackenzie, 6th baronet, of Tarbet and Royston. The latter died Nov. 24, 1858.

The first of the family of Coul, Ross-shire, was Alexander Mackenzie, brother of Kenneth, first Lord Mackenzie of Kintail, who, before his death, made him a present of his own sword, as a testimony of his particular esteem and affection. His son, Kenneth Mackenzie of Coul, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, Oct. 16, 1673. His eldest son, Sir Alex., 2d baronet, died in 1702. His son, Sir John Mackenzie, 3d baronet, for being concerned in the rebellion of 1715, was forfeited. He died without male issue, and the attainder not extending to collateral branches of the family, the title and estates devolved upon his brother, Sir Colin, 4th baronet, clerk to the pipe in the exchequer. He died in 1740. His eldest son, Sir Alexander, 5th baronet, died in 1792. His son, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, 6th baronet, a major-general in the Bengal army, and provincial commander-in-chief in Bengal, 1790-1792, died in 1796. His son, Sir George Stewart Mackenzie, 7th baronet, F.R.S., vice-president of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, born 22d June 1780, was the author of An Agricultural and Political Survey of Ross and Cromarty shires, of a Treatise on the Diseases of Sheep, and of several scientific papers on useful branches of domestic economy. He was general in the Royal Scottish archers, the queen's body-guard in Scotland, and a deputy-lieutenant of Ross-shire. He was twice married: first, to Mary, fifth daughter of Donald Macleod, Esq. of Geanies, sheriff of Ross-shire, by whom he had 7 sons and 3 daughters. The Rev. John Mackenzie, his 5th son, married Eliza, daughter of the celebrated Dr. Chalmers. Sir George died Oct. 26, 1848. His eldest son, Sir Alexander, 8th baronet, served for 26 years in the Bengal army. He was present at the siege and capture of Bhutpore, 1825-6, for which he received a medal. He was deputy judge advocate general with the army of Gwalior, and had a horse killed under him at the battle of Maharajpore, Dec. 29, 1843. He was engaged also in the first campaign on the Sutlej, 1845. He died Jan. 3, 1856, and was succeeded by his brother, Sir William Mackenzie, 9th baronet, born in 1806, married in 1858, Agnes, 2d daughter of R. T. Smyth, Esq. of Ardmore, Ireland.

The Mackenzies of Scatwell, Ross-shire, who also possess a baronetcy, are descended from Sir Roderick Mackenzie, knight, of Tarbet and Cogeach, second son of Colin, 11th feudal baron of Kintail, father of Sir John Mackenzie, ancestor of the earls of Cromarty, and Kenneth Mackenzie of Scatwell, whose son, Kenneth, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, Feb. 22, 1703. By his marriage with Lillias, daughter and heiress of Sir Roderick Mackenzie of Findon, that branch of the Mackenzie family merged in that of Scatwell. He married a 2d time, Christian, eldest daughter of Roderick Mackenzie, Esq. of Avoch, and 3dly, Abigail, daughter of John Urquhart, Esq. of Newhall. Of the first marriage there were 3 sons and 3 daughters, and of the last, one son, Kenneth, captain East India Company's service. Sir James Wemyss Mackenzie, 5th baronet, lord-lieutenant, and some time M.P. for Ross-shire, married Henrietta, only surviving daughter of William Mackenzie of Suddy, and sister and sole heiress of Major-general John Randall Mackenzie of Suddy, who fell at the battle of Talavera, in August 1809. His only son, Sir James John Randall, 6th baronet, born in 1814, succeeded his father in 1843. He married a daughter of 5th Earl Fitzwilliam.

The Mackenzies of Kilcoy, Ross-shire, are descended from Alexander, 4th son of Colin, 11th baron of Kintail, who in 1618 acquired the lands of Kilcoy. A baronetcy of the United Kingdom was conferred in 1836 on Sir Colin Mackenzie of Kilcoy, who died in 1845. He was succeeded by his 2d son, Sir Evan Mackenzie, born in 1816; married, with issue.

The family of Mackenzie of Delvine in Perthshire, whose name originally was Muir, also possess a baronetcy, conferred in 1805 on Alexander Muir, of Delvine, who assumed the name of Mackenzie, on succeeding to the estates of his great uncle, John Mackenzie, Esq. of Delvine. On his death in 1835, he was succeeded by his son, Sir John William Pitt Muir Mackenzie, advocate (admitted 1830), born in 1806, married in 1832, 6th daughter of the late James Raymond Johnstone, Esq. of Alva, Clackmannanshire, issue 6 sons and 3 daughters. He died Feb. 1, 1855. His eldest son, Sir Alexander Muir Mackenzie, born in 1840, became 3d baronet.

A baronetcy was also held by Mackenzie of Fairburn, also in Ross-shire, conferred in 1819, on Sir Ewen Baillie, some time provisional commander-in-chief of the forces in Bengal, with remainder to the issue of his half sister, who married Roderick Mackenzie, Esq. Their eldest son, General Sir Alexander Mackenzie, G.C.H., succeeded as 2d baronet, on the death of his maternal uncle, in 1820. Entering young into the army, he served at the relief of Ostend in 1793, and was 2d in command at the capture of the Cape of Good Hope in 1795. He also commanded the army in Calabria. Sir Alexander died without issue, Oct. 17, 1853, when the title became extinct.

The other principal families of the name are Mackenzie of Allangrange, heir male of the earls of Seaforth, of Applecross, also a branch of the house of Seaforth, of Ord, of Gruinard and of Hilton, all in Ross-shire.

MACKENZIE, GEORGE, first earl of Cromarty, an eminent statesman. (See vol. i. p. 731).

MACKENZIE, SIR GEORGE, of Rosehaugh, a celebrated lawyer, was born at Dundee in 1636. He was the eldest of five sons of Simon Mackenzie of Lochslin, brother of the earl of Seaforth, by his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Peter Bruce, D.D., principal of St. Leonard's College, St. Andrews. He studied Greek and philosophy in the university of St. Andrews and Aberdeen, and civil law in that of Bourges in France, where he remained three years. On his return to Scotland he was admitted, in January 1659, an advocate before the supreme courts. In 1660 he published his 'Aretina, or Serious Romance,' in which, according to Ruddiman, he gives "a very bright specimen of his gay and exuberant genius." Having soon gained a high reputation as a pleader, he was in 1661 selected as one of the counsel of the marquis of Argyre at his trial for treason before a commission of the Estates. Soon after he was appointed a justice-depute, or judge of the criminal court. In 1669 he represented in the estates the county of Ross, and during the same year he opposed the proposition contained in a letter from the king for an incorporating union of England and Scotland. At this period he signalized himself by the support which he gave to popular measures. In 1674 he was knighted, for services rendered to the court, and August 23, 1677, on the dismissal of Sir John Nisbet, he was appointed king's advocate, when, to force submission to the government, he put the laws in execution with the utmost strictness and severity. On the trial of the earl of Argyre in December 1681, he exerted all his energies to obtain a conviction; and in June 1685, when that nobleman was apprehended after his unfortunate expedition to the Highlands, Mackenzie objected to a new trial, and he was put to death on his former iniquitous sentence. The state prosecutions, conducted by Sir George Mackenzie, in some of which he notoriously stretched the laws to answer the purposes of the government, were so numerous, that he obtained the unenviable title of "The blood-thirsty advocate," and "Bloody Mackenzie." After the Revolution, in justification of his acts, he published 'A Vindication of the Government of Charles II.' (1691.) which, to those who know anything of the scenes of persecution and oppression which were enacted in Scotland at that period, appears the very reverse of satisfactory. His portrait, taken by Sir Godfrey Kneller, was engraved by Beugo, and is subjoined:

Notwithstanding his severity, however, Sir George was the means of introducing various practical improvements into the criminal jurisprudence of his country; and in 1686, upon the abrogation of the penal laws against the Papists by James VII., he deemed it incumbent on him to retire from his post of lord advocate. In 1688, however, he was restored to that office, which he held till the Revolution, when he relinquished all his employments. In 1689 he founded the Advocates' Library at Edinburgh, and the Latin inaugural oration pronounced on the occasion is recorded in his works. In September of that year he retired to England, resolving to spend the remainder of his days in study at Oxford. In June 1690 he was admitted a student of that university, and subsequently published an Essay on Reason in 1690, and 'The Moral History of Frugality, and its Opposite Vices,' in 1691. He died at MACKENZIE, GEORGE, author of 'The Lives and Characters of the most Eminent Writers of the Scots nation,' son of the Hon. Colin Mackenzie, second son of the second earl of Seaforth, was born 10th December 1669, and practised as a physician in Edinburgh at the beginning of the 18th century. His well-known work, which is one of great research, is in 3 vols. folio. The first volume, dedicated to the earl of Seaforth, appeared in 1708; the second, inscribed to the earl of Mar, in 1711; and the third, dedicated to the celebrated financier, John Law of Lauriston, in 1722.

MACKENZIE, HENRY, author of 'The Man of Feeling,' son of Dr. Joshua Mackenzie, an eminent physician in Edinburgh, by his wife Margaret, eldest daughter of Mr. Rose of Kilravock, in Nairnshire, was born in that city, in August 1745. He was educated at the High School and university of Edinburgh, and was afterwards articled to Mr. Inglis of Redhall, in order to acquire a knowledge of the business of the Exchequer. In 1765 he went to London, to study the modes of English Exchequer practice, which, as well as the constitution of the courts, are similar in both countries. While residing there, he was advised by a friend to qualify himself for the English bar; but he preferred returning to Edinburgh, where he became, first the partner, and afterwards the successor, of Mr. Inglis, in the office of attorney for the crown.

He very early displayed a strong attachment to literary pursuits, and during his stay in London, he sketched part of his first work, 'The Man of Feeling,' which was published in 1771, without his name, and at once became a favourite with the public. A few years afterwards the great popularity of the work induced a Mr. Eccles of Bath to claim the authorship. He was at pains to transcribe the whole in his own hand, with a plentiful introduction of blottings, interlineations, and corrections, and he maintained his pretensions with so much plausibility and pertinacity, that Messrs. Cadell and Strahan, the publishers, at last found it necessary to undeceive the public by a formal contradiction. In 1773 Mr. Mackenzie published his 'Man of the World,' which displayed the same tone of exquisite moral delicacy and elegance of style as his former work. In 1777 he produced 'Julia de Ronbigné,' a beautiful and tragic tale, in a series of letters, exhibiting the refined sensibility and the delicate perception of human character and manners which distinguished all his writings.

Mr. Mackenzie was one of the principal members of the "Mirror Club," and edited the well-known periodical of that name. Most of the other gentlemen connected with it were afterwards judges in the Court of Session—namely, Lord Cullen, Lord Abercromby, Lord Craig, and Lord Bannatyne. 'The Mirror' was commenced January 23, 1779, and ended May 27, 1780, having latterly been issued twice a-week. Of the 110 papers to which it extended, forty-two were contributed by Mr. Mackenzie, including La Roche. The sale never at any time exceeded four hundred copies, but when afterwards republished in duodecimo volumes, with the names of the authors, a considerable sum was obtained for the copyright, out of which the proprietors presented £100 to the Orphan Hospital, and purchased a hogshead of claret for the use of the club. 'The Lounger,' a publication of a similar character, also conducted by Mr. Mackenzie, was commenced by the same parties, February 6, 1785, and was continued weekly till January 6, 1787. Of the 101 papers which it includes, fifty-seven were written by Mr. Mackenzie, who, in one of the latter numbers, reviewed for the first time the Poems of Burns, which were just then published.

On the institution of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, Mr. Mackenzie became one of its members; and among the papers with which he enriched its Transactions are an elegant tribute to the memory of his friend Lord Abercromby, and a Memoir on German Tragedy, in the latter of which he bestows high praise on the 'Emilia Galotti' of Lessing, and 'The Robbers' of Schiller. He took lessons in German from a Dr. Okely, at that time studying medicine in Edinburgh; and in 1791 he published a small volume, containing translations of 'The Set of Horses,' by Lessing, and of two or three other German dramatic pieces. He was also an original member of the Highland Society, and by him were published the volumes of their Transactions, to which he prefixed an account of the institution, and the principal proceedings of the Society. In these Transactions is also to be found his view of the controversy respecting Ossian's Poems, containing an interesting account of Gaelic poetry.

At the time of the French revolution he published various political pamphlets, with the view of counteracting the progress of democratic principles in this country. One of these, entitled 'An Account of the Proceedings of the Parliament of 1784,' introduced him to the notice of Mr. Pitt; and in 1804, on the recommendation of Lord Melville and Mr. George Rose, he was appointed to the lucrative office of comptroller of taxes for Scotland, which he held till his death.

In 1793 he wrote the Life of Dr. Blacklock, prefixed to a quarto edition of the blind poet's works, published for the benefit of his widow. In 1808 he brought out a complete edition of his own works, in eight volumes 8vo. In 1812 he read to the Royal Society his 'Life of John Home;' and as a sort of supplement to it, he then added some Critical Essays, chiefly on dramatic poetry, which have not been published, but the Life itself appeared in 1822. Mr. Mackenzie himself attempted dramatic writing, but without success. A tragedy, composed in his early youth, entitled 'The Spanish Father,' was rejected by Garrick, and never represented. In 1773 another tragedy of his, styled 'The Prince of Tunis,' was performed with applause for six nights at the Edinburgh theatre. A third tragedy, founded on Lilly's 'Fatal Curiosity,' called 'The Shipwreck,' and two comedies, 'The Force of Fashion,' and 'The White Hypocrite,' were produced at Covent Garden successively, but they proved complete failures. His portrait, from a painting by Sir Henry Raeburn, will be found on next page.

Mr. Mackenzie was the last of those eminent men who shed such a lustre upon the literature of their country in the latter part of the eighteenth century. In his youth he enjoyed the intimacy of Robertson and Hume, and Fergusson and Adam Smith, all of whom he long survived. He died January 14, 1831, after having been confined to his room for a considerable period by the general decay attending old age. In 1776 he married Pennel, daughter of Sir Ludovick Grant of Grant, baronet, and Lady Margaret Ogilvy, by whom he had eleven children.

His eldest son, Joshua Henry Mackenzie, an eminent judge under the title of Lord Mackenzie, was born in 1777; admitted advocate in 1799; appointed sheriff of Linlithgowshire in 1811, and a lord of session in 1822. In 1824 he was constituted a judge in the high court of judicary, and in 1825 a commissioner of the jury court. He married in 1821, the fifth daughter of the first Lord Seaforth, a title now extinct, and died 17th November 1851, aged 74 years. He was interred in the Greyfriars burying-ground, Edinburgh, where a monument is erected to his memory.

The youngest son of 'The Man of Feeling,' the Right Hon. Holt Mackenzie, fellow of the Asiatic Society, was for twenty-four years in the civil service of the East India Company. He left India in 1831, and retired on the annuity fund in October 1833. In 1832 he became one of the commissioners of the board of control, on his appointment to which office he was sworn a privy councillor.

MACKENZIE, SIR ALEXANDER, an enterprising traveller, was a native of Inverness, and when a young man, emigrated to Canada. About 1781 he obtained a situation in the counting-house of the North-West Fur Company, at Fort Chippewyan, at the head of the Athabasca Lake, in the country to the west of Hudson's Bay. On June 3, 1789, he was sent by his employers on an exploring expedition through the regions lying to the north-west of that station, conjectured to be bounded by the Arctic Ocean. Embarking on the Slave River, on the 9th he reached the Slave Lake, with which it communicates by a course of 170 miles, where the party rested for six days. On the 15th they again launched their canoes, and, skirting the margin of the lake, reached the entrance of the river, which flows from its western extremity, and is now called the Mackenzie River, on the 29th. Pursuing the north-westward course, they arrived, July 15, at the great Northern Ocean; and returning by the same route, regained Fort Chippewyan, Sept. 12. On Oct. 12, 1792, Mackenzie undertook another adventurous journey, the object of which was to penetrate to the North Pacific. In this attempt, the first made in North America, he was also successful. On his return to England, he published in 1801 his 'Voyages from Montreal on the river St. Lawrence, through the Continent of North America to the Frozen and Pacific Oceans, in 1789 and 1793,' preceded by a General History of the Fur Trade, and embellished with a portrait of the author. In 1802, he received the honour of knighthood. The year of his death has not been ascertained. He was alive in 1816.

MACKENZIE, DONALD, an enterprising merchant. See SUPPLEMENT.

M-KERLIE, the surname of an ancient family, originally of rank in Ireland, and settled for many centuries in Wigtownshire, where they held extensive estates. Their early history was in the possession of the monks of Crossraguel, Carrick, and lost when that monastery was destroyed. A Father Stewart, one of the monks in the 16th century, who, left some writings, states, "the next great family are the Kerlies of Cruggleton, who being brave warriors stood boldly up for the independence of their country under Wallace, and it was one of their forefathers who, at a place called Dunmoir in Carrick, was particularly instrumental in giving the Danes a notable overthrow. He took Eric the son of Swain prisoner, for which service the king gave him lands in Carrick." They took part in the Crusades, to which their armorial bearings, borne for centuries, specially refer, and several traditions of adventurous exploits have been handed down. The loss of their early history can never be replaced. As corroborated by Felix O'Carroll, in his Translation of the Chronicles of Tara, and History of the Sennachies, it is that the first Carroll (afterwards changed to Kerlie) who came from Ireland was a petty king or chief in that country. Fleeing to Scotland, he was hospitably received by the king, and had lands assigned to him in Galloway, where he lived in great splendour. Henry the minstrel, the biographer of Wallace about 1470, also states with reference to William Carroll or Kerlie, the compatriot of Wallace (with whom the change in the name is believed to have first occurred), that his ancestor accompanied David I. from Ireland, and having at Dunmoir in Carrick, with 700 Scots, defeated 9,000 Danes, had lands in Carrick, then a part of Galloway, now of Ayrshire, given to him for that service. Henry, however, is wrong as to the period, which is believed to have been either in the 9th of 10th century, when the Cruithne passed over to Galloway from Ireland.

Carroll was the original name, in Ireland O'Carroll, of which once powerful family more than one branch were petty kings or chiefs over different districts in the north of that country, even extending so far south as Meath, where were the hall and Court of Tara, as also Elle or Ely, now called King's County, the chief of all being the arch king of Argiall. Since then (a peculiarity common with Galloway surnames) the name has been variously spelled at different periods, as Kerlié, Kerlie, M'Carole, M'Carlie, and M'Kerlie.

The castle and lands of Carleton in Carrick, (now owned by the Cathcarts under a charter dated 1324) was the first property possessed by the family in Galloway, originally called Carolton, the residence of Carroll. It is mentioned as a tradition in Ayrshire that Carleton Castle, in remote times, previous to the arrival of the Cathcarts in Carrick, belonged to a family of the name of De Kiersly, evidently a corruption of Kerlie. They afterwards obtained the castle and lands of Cruggleton, &c. This castle (the Black Rock of Cree) was built by the Danes about 1098, on the highest summit of a range of precipices about 200 feet high, overhanging the sea, at the mouth of Wigtown Bay. It was considered impregnable, being on a small promontory which juts into the sea; and landward defended with strong battlemented walls, with a fosse between them, 42 feet wide and 16 feet deep, over which was a drawbridge with gates, portcullis, &c. The area within the walls contained an acre and a quarter. The castle was ruinous before the year 1684. It is an interesting, though very greatly dilapidated ruin. Part of an unornamented arch, and the lower parts of some walls, alone remain to attest its ancient spaciousness and strength.

Chalmers, in his Caledonia, has some extraordinary errors in regard to Cruggleton. At the time he wrote, any peasant in the neighbourhood could have told him who the ancient owners were, but apparently without troubling himself with much inquiry, he seems at once to have concluded that this castle must have belonged to the lords of Galloway, and that John Comyn the elder inherited it through his mother, from finding, in Dugdale's Baronage, mention of his name in connection with it; in the extract of which short passage he omits Galway castle (the royal castle of Wigtown) to adapt it to his ideas. As an antiquarian Chalmers ought to have known that the castles of the lords of Galloway were in Central Galloway, the Stewartry of Kirkcubright, and not in Western Galloway.

From 1282 the vicissitudes attending the possession of this castle were many, furnishing a striking example of the insecurity of property in this distracted district of Scotland, where charters were unknown until the 14th century, the ancient Celtic proprietors having held their lands under their own Celtic laws. In 1282, Wm. Kerlie had as his guest Lord Soulis, (a secret adherent of Edward I.,) who took the castle by treachery. Kerlie escaped, and in several ineffectual attempts to retake it, lost his remaining followers. In 1292, John Comyn, earl of Buchan, had temporary possession, as also of the royal castle of Wigtown. In 1296, Edward I. appointed Henry Percy, governor of it and other castles, and in 1297, Percy was succeeded by John of Hoddleston. In 1296, Wm. Kerlie, the real owner, was one of the first to join Sir Wm. Wallace at the castle of the earl of Lennox, and from that date was his constant friend and companion in arms, in the noble and desperate struggle for liberty.

In 1297, Wallace went to Galloway, and under Kerlie's guidance, Cruggleton castle, by a daring scheme, was retaken by surprise, and the garrison of 60 men slain, a priest and two women only having been spared. Kerlie was then restored to his patrimonial property. He however did not leave Wallace, and at the fatal battle of Falkirk in 1298, he is traditionally said to have appeared at the head of 500 men, most of whom were slain in an ineffectual attempt to rescue Sir John the Graeme. This patriot's career was closed at Robras-toun near Glasgow in July 1305, when he accompanied Wallace there, to await a meeting with Robert the Bruce, and were basely betrayed into the hands of their enemies. While both were asleep their arms were secretly removed, Kerlie slain, and the noble Wallace reserved for a worse fate.

Wm. Kerlie was one of the few who never swore fealty to Edward the Usurper. He left an infant son, also called William, born in 1298, and therefore 7 years of age at his father's death. This boy was treacherously dealt with by the prior and monks of the monastery of "Candida Casa," Whitburn, near Cruggleton, who in 1309 concealed from Robert the Bruce that he existed, and was owner of the castle and lands, but represented that they had belonged to Lord Soulis, all of whose property had been directed to be sequestrated, and by this means obtained a charter of them for the monastery. Again in the disturbed reign of David II., when properties were so freely disposed of to his own supporters, Gilbert Kennedy (an ancestor of the Ailsa family), who had been one of his hostages in England, obtained in 1366, a charter of the castle and lands, but it was never put in force, and in 1423 the prior and monks of "Candida Casa" got it cancelled. By the charter of 1309, the superiority was wrested by "Candida Casa" from young Kerlie and his descendants, but this was unknown to them for generations, as the family were never disturbed in their proprietary rights by the monastery. They retained possession until about the end of the 16th century, when the Reformation broke up the ancient tenures, and as the family held under the Celtic laws without a Crown charter, with the ruin of the church, they lost the castle and lands.

The last of the family, from father to son, who possessed the castle and lands, was John, who in the "Inquisitiones de Tutela," under date 20th June 1583, is called therein M'Carole.

His descendant, in direct line, was John M'Carlie or M'Kerlie, born in 1704, and died in 1796, aged 92. His mother was daughter of William Baillie of Dunragget, the first of which family, now extinct, was Cuthbert, Commendator of Glenluce Abbey, of the family of Baillie of Lanington, said to be the descendants of the patriot Wallace's only child, heiress of Lanington. He was sometime lord high treasurer of Scotland, and died in 1514.

John M'Kerlie possessed considerable property in the vicinity of Wigtown, part of which remained to his family until 1834. He was twice married, first to Nicholas M'Keand, of an old Galloway family, and had issue, all of whom are extinct. In 1694, Alexander Stewart of Tonderghie, a cadet of the Galloway family, married Janet, daughter of Hugh M'Guffock or M'Guffog of Rusco Castle, a very ancient and once powerful Galloway family, for a short account of which see the SUPPLEMENT to this work. James M'Guffock, of the same family, married Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Tonderghie, and their eldest daughter Agnes became the second wife of John M'Kerlie. She died in 1822, aged 82. By her he had a son and daughter who died in infancy; also two other sons, Robert and John Graham.

Robert, born November 11, 1778, entered the army in 1794, and served with his regiment throughout the rebellion in Ireland. In 1798 he became captain, and retired in 1804, having been appointed principal ordnance store-keeper in Scotland, an office which he retained for many years. He died Dec. 13, 1855. John Graham, born in 1781, as a young officer served in the army in the Peninsula, and was under Sir John Moore at Corunna. He died in 1816. Robert M'Kerlie, the last representative, by his marriage with Marion, daughter of Peter Handyside, Esq., Greenhall, (uncle of the eminent judge, Lord Handyside) left, with three daughters, three sons. 1. Charles William Montagu Scott, of the East India company's maritime service, author of a Narrative of the loss of the East India Company's ship, Duke of York, in which he was one of the officers. Edinb. 1834. 2. John Graham, colonel royal engineers, and a commissioner of public works, Ireland, author of the Report, dated 11th May, 1816, on musket firing, &c. from experiments carried on by him at Chatlam, and on which the new rifle was introduced, and the School of Musketry at Hythe instituted, with Sir John Burgoyne's Notes on it attached; printed by Government. 3. Peter Handyside, admiralcy, London, author of a pamphlet, entitled "Statistics of the Composition of the Scottish regiments to 1861," compiled from the regimental records. The arms of the family are, az: a chief arg: and a fret gu. Since quartered with the M'Guffog and Stewart arms.—The crest, which refers to a knight of the family engaged in the Crusades, is, the sun, or, shining on a cross crosslet fitchée, sa. placed on the dexter side of a mount, vert, with the motto, "In hoc Signo Vinces."

Although at one time the name was numerous in Galloway, in 1825 there were only three families who bore it, viz., the then representative Capt. R. M'Kerlie, Rear-admiral John M'Kerlie, and Alexander M'Kerlie, whose family is now merged into and represented by Sir John M'Taggart, bart. of Ardwell.—Rear-admiral John M'Kerlie served with Sir Edward Pellew (afterwards Lord Exmouth) in all his brilliant frigate actions, in one of which he lost an arm, and was at Trafalgar, &c. He left an only daughter by his marriage with Harriet, daughter of the late James Stewart of Cairnsmuir—also a nephew John M'Kerlie.

Originating in the Perth edition of Henry's "Wallace," published in 1790, and followed by subsequent writers, the names Ker and Kier have been confused with that of Kerlie, which are quite distinct, and so shown in all the ancient editions of the patriot's life, commencing with Lekpervik's in 1570, and also the MS. of 1488.—The names Ker and Kier were unknown in Galloway, are of a different origin entirely, and only found in other parts of Scotland, several Kers having sworn fealty to Edward I.

M'KERRELL, the surname of an old Ayrshire family which possesses the estate of Hillhouse near Irvine, and claims to be of Norman origin, as the name Kiriel occurs on the roll of Battle Abbey. It is believed, however, that the family is from Galloway, and an offshoot from the stock of the M'Kerlies (see previous article). The first of the name on Scottish record, Sir John M'Kirel, distinguished himself at the battle of Otterburn, 19th August, 1388, by wounding and taking prisoner Rouel de Percie, who held the second command in the English host. From the circumstance that the Hillhouse family carry the same armorial bearings that Sir John Mac-kirel acquired by his prowess in that battle, it is conjectured, on good grounds, that he was their ancestor.

According to tradition the M'Kerrells came from Ireland, and have possessed the estate of Hillhouse since the days of Robert the Bruce. It appears, however, that, at one period, that estate belonged to the High Steward of Scotland, and afterwards to the Cathcart family, as it was amongst the lands (Colynane, Hillhouse and Holmyss in Ayrshire) granted by the crown to John, 2d Lord Cathcart, by renewed charter in 1505, having been forfeited by Alan, Lord Cathcart, his grandfather, for the alienation of the greater part of the same, without consent of the king. It is likely, therefore, that the M'Kerrells held it from the Cathcarts as superiors.

The first of the family who is known to have been proprietor of the estate, William M'Kerrell of Hillhouse, sheriff-clerk of Ayr, died in October 1629. His great-great-grandson, John M'Kerrell of Hillhouse, married Elizabeth, daughter of William Fairlie of Fairlie, by his wife, Jane, only daughter of the last Sir William Mure of Rowallan. The fourth in descent from him, William M'Kerrell of Hillhouse, who died in 1821, raised at Paisley the first volunteer corps embodied in Scotland, during the French revolutionary war. His eldest son, John M'Kerrell, was placed when very young in the civil service of the East India Company, and for nine years was master of the mint at Madras. On his death, unmarried, in 1835, he was succeeded by his brother, Henry M'Kerrell of Hillhouse, formerly a merchant in Liverpool.

MACKIE, a surname, said to be derived from the clan name MACKAY, which see.

MACKINNON, the surname of a minor clan, (badge, the pine,) a branch of the siol Alpin, sprung from Fingon, brother of Anrias or Andrew, ancestor of the Macgregors. This Fingon, or Finguin, is mentioned in the MS. of 1450 as the founder of the clan Finguin, that is, the Mackinnons. Their seat was in the islands of Skye and Mull, and they formed one of the vassal tribes of the lords of the Isles. The first authentic notice of them is to be found in an indenture (printed in the Appendix to the second edition of Hailes' Annals of Scotland) between the lords of the Isles and the lord of Lorn. The latter stipulates, in surrendering to the lord of the Isles the island of Mull and other lands, that the keeping of the castle of Kerneburg, in the Treshnish Isles, is not to be given to any of the race of clan Finnon. "This," says Mr. Gregory, "proves that the Mackinnons were then connected with Mull. They originally possessed the district of Griban in that island, but exchanged it for the district of Mishnish, being that part of Mull immediately to the north and west of Tobermory. They, likewise, possessed the lands of Strathordell in Skye, from which the chiefs usually took their style. Lauchlan Macfingon, or Mackinnon, chief of his clan, witnessed a charter by Donald, lord of the Isles, in 1409. The name of the chief in 1493 is uncertain; but Neil Mackinnon of Mishnish was at the head of the tribe in 1515." (Highlands and Isles of Scotland, p. 80.) Two years afterwards this Neil and several others, described as "kin, men, servants, and part-takers" of Lauchlan Maclean of Dowart, were included in a remission which that chief obtained for their share in the rebellion of Sir Donald Macdonald of Lochalsh. In 1545 the chief's name was Ewin. He was one of the barons and council of the Isles who, in that year, swore allegiance to the king of England at Knockfergus in Ireland.

"In consequence," says Mr. Skene, "of their connexion with the Macdonalds, the Mackinnons have no history independent of that clan; and the internal state of these tribes during the government of the lords of the Isles is so obscure that little can be learned regarding them, until the forfeiture of the last of these lords. During their dependence upon the Macdonalds there is but one event of any importance in which we find the Mackinnons taking a share, for it would appear that on the death of John of the Isles, in the fourteenth century, Mackinnon, with what object it is impossible now to ascertain, stirred up his second son, John Mor, to rebel against his eldest brother, apparently with a view to the chiefship, and his faction was joined by the Macleans and the Macleods. But Donald, the elder brother, was supported by so great a proportion of the tribe, that he drove John Mor and his party out of the Isles, and pursued him to Galloway, and from thence to Ireland. The rebellion being thus put down, John Mor threw himself upon his brother's mercy, and received his pardon, but Mackinnon was taken and hanged, as having been the instigator of the disturbance." (Skene's Highlanders, vol. ii. p. 259.) This appears to have taken place after 1380, as John, Lord of the Isles, died that year. In the disturbances in the Isles, during the 16th century, Sir Lauchlan Mackinnon bore an active part.

As a proof of the common descent of the Mackinnons, the Macgregors, and the Macnabs, although their territories were far distant from each other, two bonds of friendship exist, which are curious specimens of the manners of the times. The one dated 12th July, 1606, was entered into between Lauchlan Mackinnon of Strathordell and Finlay Macnab of Bowaine, who, as its tenor runs, happened "to forgether together, with certain of the said Finlay's friends, in their rooms, in the laird of Glenureby's country, and the said Lauchlan and Finlay, being come of one house, and being of one surname and lineage, notwithstanding the said Lauchlan and Finlay this long time bygone oversaw their awn duties till udderis, in respect of the long distance betwixt their dwelling places," agreed, with the consent of their kin and friends, to give all assistance and service to each other. And are "content to subscribe to the same, with their hands led to the pen." Mackinnon's signature is characteristic. It is "Lauchland, mise (i. e. myself) Mac Fingon." The other bond of manrent, dated at Kilmorie in 1671, was between Lauchlan Mackinnon of Strathordell and James Macgregor of Macgregor, and it is therein stated that "for the special love and amitie between these persons, and condescending that they are descended lawfully fra tua brethren of auld descent, wherefore and for certain onerous causes moving, we witt ye we to be bound and obleisit, likeas by the tenor hereof we faithfully bind and obleise us and our successors, our kin, friends and followers, faithfully to serve one another in all causes with our men and servants, against all who live or die."

During the civil wars the Mackinnons joined the standard of the marquis of Montrose, and formed part of his force at the battle of Inverlochy, Feb. 2, 1645. In 1650, Lauchlan Mackinnon, the chief, raised a regiment of his clan for the service of Charles II., and at the battle of Worcester, in 1646, he was made a knight banneret. His son, Daniel Mohr, had 2 sons, John, whose great-grandson died in India, unmarried, in 1808, and Daniel, who emigrated to Antigua, and died in 1720. His eldest son and heir, William Mackinnon of Antigua, an eminent member of the legislature of that island died at Bath in 1767. The son of the latter, William Mackinnon of Antigua and Biufield, Berkshire, died in 1809. The youngest of his four sons, Henry, Major-general Mackinnon, a distinguished officer, was killed by the explosion of a magazine, while leading on the main storming party, at Ciudad Rodrigo, Feb. 29, 1812. A tablet was erected to his memory in St. Paul's cathedral.

The eldest son, William Mackinnon, died young, leaving with 2 daughters, 2 sons, William Alexander Mackinnon, who succeeded his grandfather, and Daniel, colonel of the Coldstream guards, of whom a memoir follows in larger type.

William Alexander Mackinnon of Mackinnon, M.P., the chief magistrate and deputy lieutenant for the counties of Middlesex, Hampshire, and Essex, and author of 'The History of Civilization,' and other publications ('Public Opinion,' 'Thoughts on the Currency Question,' &c.) born in 1789, succeeded in 1809. He married Emma, daughter of Joseph Palmer, Esq. of Rush House, County Dublin, with issue, 3 sons and 3 daughters. The eldest son, William Alexander, also M.P., born in 1813, married daughter of F. Wiles, Esq.

Lauchlan Mackinnon of Letterfean also claims to be the heir-male of the family. Although there are many gentlemen of the name still resident in Skye, there is no Mackinnon proprietor of lands now either in that island or in Mull.

The Mackinnons engaged in both rebellions in favour of the Stuarts. In 1715, 150 of them fought with the Macdonalds of Sleat at the battle of Sheriffmuir, for which the chief was forfeited, but received a pardon, 4th January, 1727. In 1745, Mackinnon, though then old and infirm, joined Prince Charles with a battalion of his clan. President Forbes estimates their effective force at that period at 200 men. After the battle of Culloden, the prince, in his wanderings, took refuge in the country of the Mackinnons, when travelling in disguise through Skye, and was concealed by the chief in a cave, where Lady Mackinnon brought him a refreshment of cold meat and wine. Afterwards the chief and one of his clansmen, John Mackinnon, residing at Ellagol, conducted the royal fugitive in his own boat to the mainland, to the country of Macdonald of Morar. Not meeting with that assistance from the latter which he expected, the prince, in great distress, turned round to Mackinnon, and said, "I hope, Mr. Mackinnon, you will not desert me too, and leave me in the lurch; but that you will do all for my preservation you can." The old chief, thinking that these words were meant for him, said, with tears in his eyes, "I never will leave your royal highness in the day of danger; but will, under God, do all I can for you, and go with you wherever you order me." "Oh, no," rejoined Charles, "that is too much for one of your advanced years, Sir; I heartily thank you for your readiness to take care of me, as I am well satisfied of your zeal for me and my cause; but one of your age cannot well hold out with the fatigues and dangers I must undergo. It was to your friend John here, a stout young man, I was addressing myself." "Well, then," said John

“with the help of God, I will go through the wide world with your royal highness, if you desire me.” The chief returned home, and was soon followed by John Mackinnon, after he had conducted the prince safely to Borrodale, and placed him under the charge of Æneas Macdonald, the laird thereof. The chief and his faithful kinsman were soon after captured by a party of militia, and carried to London, where they were kept in confinement till July 1747.

MACKINNON, DANIEL, a gallant officer, was born in 1791. He was the younger son of William Mackinnon, eldest son of the chief of the clan of that name in the western Highlands, and the nephew of General Mackinnon, who was killed at the storming of Ciudad Rodrigo. At the age of fourteen he entered the army as ensign in the Coldstream guards, and shortly after accompanied his regiment to Bremen. In 1807 the battalion to which he belonged sailed for Copenhagen, and after the capture of that place it returned to England. In 1809 the Coldstream guards embarked for the Peninsula, and was present in all the great battles, beginning with Talavera and ending with Toulouse. Young Mackinnon, who had attained the rank of lieutenant, was appointed aide-de-camp to General Stopford, and distinguished himself throughout the campaign by his cool daring, and extraordinary activity. It is related of him, that on one occasion, when the army was passing a defile, and part of our troops, on debouching from it, were exposed to a destructive fire, they found Captain Mackinnon coolly shaving himself in a spot where the danger was the greatest. Encouraged at the sight, the men rushed forward and drove the French before them.

On the conclusion of peace in 1814 he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. Early in June 1815, anxious to join his regiment, then quartered near Brussels, Colonel Mackinnon embarked at Ramsgate with a brother officer in an open boat, and next morning reached Ostend. He was present at the engagements of the 16th and 17th, and at Waterloo on the 18th of June. In the latter memorable battle he had three horses shot under him. In advancing to charge the French, leading on a portion of his regiment, he received a shot in his knee which killed his horse, and in falling he lost his sword. He fell close beside a French officer who was still more severely wounded, and in taking the latter's sword, he gently told him he hoped they might snp together that night. On recovering his legs he again mounted, and cheering on his men, advanced at their head.

In the latter part of the day Colonel Mackinnon was ordered to occupy the farm of Hougoumont, where he was placed with about 250 of the Coldstream and the first regiment of the Grenadier guards. Aware of the great importance of this position, which flanked our army, the duke of Wellington sent orders to defend it to the last extremity. On this point Napoleon directed his great efforts, ordering battalion after battalion to the assault, and the carnage was terrific. Notwithstanding the pain of his wound, and his being disabled in one leg, Colonel Mackinnon continued to defend that perilous post till the advance of the whole British line, and the subsequent rout of the French army, put an end to the struggle of the day. When the action was over he became delirious from loss of blood and fatigue, and was sent on a litter to Brussels, where he received every attention, and soon recovered his health.

After the peace he married the eldest daughter of John Dent, Esq., M.P. for Pool. In 1826 he purchased the majority in the Coldstream guards, which gave him the rank of full colonel in the army, and the command of the regiment to which he had been attached all his military life. In consequence of his majesty William IV. having expressed a desire that every officer in command of a regiment should furnish the Horse Guards with some account of it, Colonel Mackinnon wrote his well known work, ‘The Origin and Services of the Coldstream Guards,’ which was published in 1833. He died June 22, 1836, aged 46.

MACKINTOSH, SIR JAMES, an eminent lawyer, statesman, and historian, was born at Aldowrie, on the banks of Loch Ness, within seven miles of Inverness, October 24, 1765. He was the son of Captain John Mackintosh of Kellachie, who during the seven years' war in Germany, served in Campbell's Highlanders, and was severely wounded at the battle of Fellinghausen in July 1761. His mother was Marjory, daughter of Mr. Alexander Macgillivray of Carolina, by Anne Fraser, sister of Brigadier-general Fraser, who was killed in General Burgoyne's army in 1777; and of Dr. Fraser, physician in London, and of Mrs. Fraser

Tytler, wife of Lord Woodhouselee, one of the lords of session. Major Mercer, the friend of Beattie and the author of a small volume of 'Lyric Poems,' who held a lieutenant's commission in the same regiment, (and a memoir of whom is given subsequently in its place) in a letter to Lord Glenbervie, thus speaks of Sir James' father and uncle: "John Macintosh was one of the most lively, good humoured, gallant lads I ever knew; and he had an elder brother of the name of Angus, who served in the regiment (Col. afterwards Sir R. M. Keith's) that constantly encamped next to ours, who was a most intelligent man, and a most accomplished gentleman. Mr. M.'s grandfather saw his two sons return home, at the end of the seven years' war, one with a shattered leg, and the other with the loss of an eye." His father was afterwards captain in the 68th regiment, in which he served at Gibraltar, during the famous siege of that place.

He received the first part of his education at the school of Fortrose, in Ross-shire, to which he was sent in the summer of 1775, and he remained there till he went to King's College, Old Aberdeen, in October 1780. His passion for reading, in his boyhood, was so great that his father often complained that he would become "a mere pedant." He read at all times and in all places, and would frequently sit up the greater part of the night over his books. Whilst at school so great was his proficiency that he was employed by the usher, whose name was Stalker, to teach the younger boys, and "that boy, that Jamie Mackintosh," was known all over the country as a prodigy of learning. He also made some attempts at writing verses, which, for the four winters he continued at Aberdeen, gained him the name of 'the poet.' His companion at King's College was the afterwards celebrated Robert Hall of Leicester. They lived in the same house, and read and studied together. They were both fond of argument, and had almost daily discussions on most topics of enquiry, particularly in morals and metaphysics. In their joint studies, we are told in Gregory's Memoir of Robert Hall, (page 22) they read much of Xenophon and Herodotus, and more of Plato; and so well was all this known, exciting admiration in some, in others envy, that it was not unusual, as they went along, for their class-fellows to point at them, and say, 'there go Plato and Herodotus!' Under the auspices of these two highly gifted young men, a debating society was formed in King's College, which was jocularly termed 'the Hall and Mackintosh Club.'

In March 1784, Mr. Mackintosh took his degree of master of arts, and the next thing to be considered was the choice of a profession. He himself wished to become an advocate at the Scottish bar, but his friends preferred that he should be a doctor of medicine, and in October of the same year he went to Edinburgh, where for three years he attended the medical classes. While at the university of that city, he became a member of the Speculative Society, which met for the discussion of subjects in general literature and science, and at its meetings he soon distinguished himself as a keen and eloquent debater. At this time its leaders were Charles Hope, afterwards lord president of the court of session; Baron Constant de Rebecque, the subsequently celebrated Benjamin Constant; Malcolm Laing, the historian; and Thomas Addis Emmett. He attended the lectures of Dr. Brown, the founder of the Brunonian system, and for a time was one of his most enthusiastic disciples. He was also a member of the royal medical and royal physical societies. In 1787 he took his degree of M.D., his thesis on the occasion being "De motu musculari."

In the beginning of the following spring he went to London, accompanied by one of his college friends, Lewis Grant, the eldest son of Sir James Grant of Grant, then M.P. for Morayshire, and afterwards earl of Seafield and Findlater. His mind had an early bias towards politics, and as his principles were of the most liberal kind, he soon became a member of the Society for Constitutional information, one of the numerous political societies of that exciting period. He seems at this time to have contemplated settling in St. Petersburg as a physician, but the plan was not carried into effect. On the death of his father, the same year, he succeeded to the family estate of Kellachie, in Inverness-shire, worth about £900 a-year, but burdened by an annuity to the widow of a former proprietor, who still survived. In the course of a year or two he was compelled to dispose of it, from pecuniary difficulties, for £9,000. The malady which attacked George III., in the autumn of 1788, caused Mr. Mackintosh to advertise a work on insanity, but though a considerable portion of it was written, it was never published. Early in the following year he issued a pamphlet on the Regency Question, in support of the claims of the prince of Wales, which attracted little notice. Subsequently he attempted to settle himself in practice as a physician in Bath, at Salisbury, and afterwards at Weymouth, but without success. He had previously married, at the age of 24, Catherine Stewart, sister of the Messrs. Stewart, proprietors of the Morning Post, and soon after he went on a tour, with his wife, through the Low Countries, to Brussels, where he resided for some time. On his return to London, he became a contributor to the 'Oracle' newspaper, at a fixed salary, of articles on the affairs of Belgium and France. He now relinquished the medical profession, and resolved to devote himself to the study of the law.

The publication of Mr. Burke's 'Reflections on the French Revolution,' in 1790, called forth numerous replies, and among other opponents Mr. Mackintosh stepped forth, in the spring of 1791, with his 'Vindiciæ Gallicæ, or a Defence of the French Revolution against the Accusations of Edmund Burke,' which at once acquired for him a high reputation. He had sold the work, when only partly written, for £30, but its sale was so great, three editions of it having gone off within six months, that the publisher, Mr. George Robinson, liberally paid him several times the original price. The great talent displayed in it obtained for the author the acquaintance of Fox, Grey, Sheridan, Whitbread, and other leading whigs. On the formation, under their auspices, of the celebrated association of the "Friends of the People," in the following year, he was appointed its honorary secretary, and as such had a principal hand in the authorship of their 'Declaration,' which exercised so powerful an influence over the public feeling of the time. In answer to a proclamation of government against such societies, he published 'A Letter to the Right Honourable William Pitt, London,' 1792, defending the principles of the association, on which occasion he received the public thanks of the association for the ability and vigour displayed in its service.

The same year he entered himself of Lincoln's Inn, to study law, and in Michaelmas term, 1795, he was called to the bar by that society. At this time he contributed various articles to the British Critic and Monthly Review, then the only literary periodicals of any note. To the latter he sent reviews of 'Gibbon's Miscellaneous Works,' Mr. Roscoe's 'Life of Lorenzo de Medicis,' and Mr. Burke's 'Letter to the Duke of Bedford,' and also his 'Thoughts on a Regicide Peace.' His article on the latter led to a correspondence with Burke, who invited him to his residence at Beaconsfield, and he spent a few days with that celebrated statesman a short time previous to his death.

His practice as a barrister was at first extremely limited, and with the view of adding to his income, he delivered, in 1799, a course of lectures in Lincoln's Inn Hall, on 'the Law of Nature and Nations.' The use of the hall he had obtained with some difficulty, owing to a suspicion entertained by some, that politics would be introduced into his lectures. To indicate precisely his plan and the manner in which it was his intention to treat it, he published an 'Introductory Discourse,' which gained the approbation of the then lord chancellor, Lord Loughborough, as well as of both Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox, and the whole course was attended by large audiences, including some of the most distinguished men of the day. The reputation which he acquired from these lectures, 39 in all, was incidentally of much use to his general professional advancement. He was often retained as counsel in cases in committees of the House of Commons, regarding constitutional law and contested elections, and in those before the privy council. On the Norfolk circuit, which, after trying the home circuit, he had joined, he soon found himself in possession of a considerable share of the little business it supplies. In 1801, he was asked to assist in a project, then under the consideration of the emperor Alexander, of digesting the ukases which governed Russia into something of a code of law. The Russian minister in London, we are informed by his son, was instructed to apply, with that view, to "jurisconsults Anglais qui, comme Mackintosh, jouissent d'une reputation distinguée." Family ties forbade, what otherwise he confessed that he should not have been averse from—the means "of giving more effectual aid, by a personal residence for some time in Russia." It was an odd coincidence that an opportunity should now offer of going, as a jurist, to the same country for which he was once designed as a physician. He was also, about the same time, invited by a body of London publishers, to superintend a new edition of Johnson's Poets, but the project never came to anything.

Among the crowds of British subjects who hastened to Paris, on the peace of Amiens in autumn 1802, were Mr. and Mrs. Mackintosh, who remained in that capital a month, when he was presented to the First Consul. The terrible events of the reign of terror in France had long ere this modified very considerably many of the opinions he had expressed in the 'Vindiciæ Gallicæ.' On the trial, February 21, 1803, of M. Peltier, a French refugee, editor of a French journal published in London, entitled 'L'Ambigu,' for a libel on Napoleon Bonaparte, first consul of France, Mr. Mackintosh appeared as sole counsel for the defendant, while the case for the prosecution was conducted by Mr. Perceval, afterwards prime minister, then attorney general, and Mr. Abbott, afterwards Lord Tenterden. His address to the jury on the occasion was declared by Lord Ellenborough, the presiding judge, to be "the most eloquent oration he ever had heard in Westminster Hall." A translation of this speech was made by Madame de Stael, and circulated throughout Europe. No less a personage than Louis Philippe, duc d'Orleans, afterwards king of the French, had partly translated his 'Vindiciæ Gallicæ,' and a speech subsequently delivered by him in the cause of Poland received the same honour from the patriotic princess Jablonowska.

A short time thereafter he was appointed recorder, or criminal judge of Bombay, when he was knighted, December 21, 1803. He arrived at Bombay 26th May, 1804, and on the institution, in that year, of a court of vice-admiralty there, for the trial and adjudication of all prize and maritime cases, he was appointed judge of that court. He remained in India for seven years, distinguishing himself by his fearlessness in the discharge of his official duties, and his exertions in the amelioration of the criminal law. He founded the Literary Society of Bombay, and contributed various valuable communications to the Asiatic Register. He left Bombay in November 1811, retiring from the recordership with a pension of £1,200 from the East India Company. Previous to his departure the grand jury presented a complimentary address, requesting that he would sit for his portrait, to be hung in the hall of the court. The Literary Society of Bombay elected him, on his departure, their honorary president, and requested him to sit for a bust to be placed in their library; and with both requests he complied.

On his arrival in England, he received a communication from Mr. Perceval, then first lord of the Treasury, offering him a seat in parliament, but he declined it, as he could not agree with government on the subject of the Roman Catholic disabilities, being in favour of their removal. His answer, dated May 11, 1812, was ready to be sent the very day that Perceval was shot by Bellingham in the lobby of the House of Commons. Lord Liverpool, who succeeded Perceval, offered him the office of a commissioner for India, but that also he declined. He was elected M.P. for the county of Nairn in July 1813. The following year, on the restoration of the Bourbons, he again visited Paris, and on his return, while the impressions which the aspect of affairs in the French capital had created were still fresh in his memory, he communicated to the Edinburgh Review (vol. xxiv. p. 505) some Reflections on the subject.

In 1818, he became, by appointment of the court of Directors, professor of law and general politics in the East India Company's college at Haileybury. The same year, on the death of Dr. Thomas Brown, he was offered the professorship of moral philosophy in the university of Edinburgh, but declined it, a determination which he afterwards greatly regretted, as he had always been desirous of an academic career.

Through the influence of the duke of Devonshire, he was elected for Knaresborough, in the parliament which met in January 1819, and was rechosen for that place at four subsequent elections. He took a prominent part on all questions of foreign policy and international law, and was a principal speaker on most of the more important measures that came before parliament. He chiefly distinguished himself, however, by his efforts to improve the criminal code, a task which had been commenced by Sir Samuel Romilly. In 1819 he was chairman of a committee of the House of Commons on the subject, some bills relative to which he introduced into parliament. He was one of the earliest and most zealous advocates for the emancipation of the West Indian slaves. He rejoiced at the passing of the Roman Catholic emancipation bill in 1829; and he was a warm supporter of the Reform bill, though he did not live to see it passed into a law. Subjoined is his portrait, from a painting by Sir Thomas Lawrence:

In 1822, Sir James was elected lord rector of the university of Glasgow, and again in 1823. In 1828, he was sworn a member of the privy council, and in December 1830, on the formation of earl Grey's administration, he was appointed one of the commissioners for the affairs of India, the office he had refused eighteen years before. He died at London, May 30th, 1832, in the 66th year of his age, and was buried at Hampstead.

He had for some time been declining in strength, and a short time previous to his death, whilst at dinner, he swallowed a small fragment of a chicken bone, which, though removed, occasioned a slight laceration in the trachea, that subsequently extended to the vertebræ of the neck, and ultimately proved fatal.

He was twice married. His first wife, already mentioned, died in 1797. By her he had a son, who died in infancy, and three daughters. He took for his second wife, in 1798, a daughter of J. B. Allen, Esq. of Cressella, Pembrokeshire, and by her he had one son, Robert James Mackintosh, Esq. B.A., fellow of New College, Oxford, who published Memoirs of his father, in 2 vols., 8vo, London, 1835, and a daughter, Frances, married to H. Wedgwood, Staffordshire. His three eldest daughters were, Mary, the wife of Claudius James Rich, Esq., British resident at Bagdad; Maitland, Mrs. Erskine; and Catherine, married to Sir William Wiseman, baronet, but divorced in 1825, by act of parliament. Her second son, Sir William Saltonstall Wiseman, became the eighth baronet of that name.

MACKNIGHT, JAMES, D.D., a learned biblical critic, the son of the Rev. William Macknight, minister of Irvine in Ayrshire, was born September 17, 1721. He received his academical education at the university of Glasgow, and afterwards studied theology at Leyden. On his return to Scotland he was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Irvine, and after officiating for some time at the Gorbals, in Glasgow, he acted as assistant at Kilwinning. In May 1753 he was ordained minister of Maybole in his native county. In 1756 he published a 'Harmony of the Gospels,' which met with such a favourable reception, that he was induced in 1763 to bring out a second edition, with considerable improvements and additions. The same year he produced his 'Truth of the Gospel History,' which still further advanced his reputation as a theologian. From the university of Edinburgh he received the degree of D.D., and he was in 1769 chosen moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. During the same year he was translated to the parochial charge of Jedburgh, and in 1772 he became minister, first of Lady Yester's, Edinburgh, and in 1778 of the Old Church in that city, where he had for his colleague Dr. Henry the historian. For upwards of thirty years he was engaged in the preparation of his last and most important work, 'The New Literal Translation from the Greek of all the Apostolical Epistles, with Commentaries and Notes,' which was published in 1795, in 4 vols. quarto. He died January 13, 1800.—His works are:

Harmony of the Four Gospels, in which the natural order of each is preserved; with a Paraphrase and Notes. Lond. 1756, 2 vols. in one, 4to. 2d edit.; with six Discourses on Jewish Antiquities. Lond. 1763, 4to. 3d. edit. Edin. 1804, 2 vols. 8vo. This has long been regarded as a standard book among Divines. It was translated into Latin, by Professor Ruckersfelder, and published at Bremen and Deventer, 1772, 3 vols. 8vo.

The Truth of the Gospel History shewn, in three books. London, 1763, 4to.

The Translation of the First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians: with a Commentary and Notes. London, 1787, 4to.

A new Literal Translation, from the original Greek, of all the Apostolic Epistles; with a Commentary and Notes, Philological, Critical, Explanatory, and Practical. To which is added, A History of the Life of the Apostle Paul. Edin., 1795, 4 vols. 4to. 2d edit.; with the Greek Text, and an account of the Life of the Author. 1807, 6 vols. 8vo. Also without the Greek Text. 3 vols. 4to. and 4 vols. 8vo. This is a work of theological diligence, learning and piety not often paralleled.

MACLACHLAN, the surname of a clan of great antiquity in Argyleshire; badge, the mountain ash. They possessed the barony of Strathlachlan in Cowal, and other extensive possessions in the parishes of Glassrie and Kilmartin, and on Loch Awe side, which were separated from the main seat of the family by the arm of the sea called Loch Fyne.

The clan Lachlan (in Gaelic Lachuinn) was one of those great Argyleshire clans, which, during the existence of the Celtic kingdom of Argyle and the Isles, formed by Som-riod in the 12th century, composed a body of powerful tribes under his sway, and after the forfeiture of the last Lord of the Isles, occupied an independent position. They were one of those Gaelic tribes who adopted the oared galley for their special device, as indicative of their connexion, either by residence or descent, with the Isles. An ancestor of the family, Lachlan Mor, who lived in the 13th century, is described in the Gaelic MS. of 1467, (the date 1450 usually ascribed to it having been found to be wrong,) as "son of Patrick, son of Gilchrist, son of Aida Alain, called the clumsy, son of Henry or Anradan, from whom are descended also the clan Niell." From the genealogy of the clan Lachlan being given with much greater minuteness than that of any other of the clans, the author of the MS. is supposed to have been a Maclachlan, and it seems probable that it once formed a part of the well known collection of ancient MSS., so long preserved by the family of Maclachlan of Kilbride (see Collectanea de Rebus Albanicis, page 60), and eventually purchased by the Highland Society of Scotland.

By tradition the Maclachlans are said to have come from Ireland, their original stock being the O'Loughlins of Meath.

According to the Irish genealogies, the clan Lachlan, the Lamonds, and the M'Ewens of Otter, were kindred tribes, being descended from brothers who were sons of Aida Alain above referred to, and tradition relates that they took possession of the greater part of the district of Cowal, from Toward Point to Strachur at the same time; the Lamonds being separated from the M'Ewens by the river of Kilfinan, and the M'Ewens from the Maclachlans by the stream which separates the parishes of Kilfinan and Strath Lachlan. Aida Alain, the common ancestor of these families, is stated in ancient Irish genealogies to have been the grandson of Hugh Atlaman, the head of the great family of O'Neils, kings of Ireland.

About 1230, Gilchrist Maclachlan, who is mentioned in the manuscript of 1467 as chief of the family of Maclachlan at the time, is a witness to a charter of Kilfinan granted by Laumanus, ancestor of the Lamonds, (see Chartulary of Paisley.)

In 1292, Gilleskel Maclachlan got a charter of his lands in Ergadia from Baliol. (See Thomson's Scott. Acts, vol. i. p. 91.)

In a document preserved in the treasury of her Majesty's Exchequer, entitled "Les petitions de terre demandees en Escoce," there is the following entry, "Item Gillescop Macloghlan ad demande la Baronie de Molbrude juvene, apelle Strath, que fu pris contre le foi de Roi." From this it appears that Gillespie Maclachlan was in possession of the lands still retained by the family, during the occupation of Scotland by Edward I. in 1296. (See Sir Francis Palgrave's Scottish Documents, vol. i. p. 319.)

In 1308, Gillespie Maclachlan sat in the first parliament of Robert the Bruce at St. Andrews, and his signature and seal tag are attached to the roll of that parliament. (See Thomson's Scott. Acts, vol. i. p. 99.)

In 1314, Archibald Maclachlan in Ergadia, granted to the Preaching Friars of Glasgow forty shillings to be paid yearly

out of his lands of Kilbride, "juxta castrum meum quod dicitur Castellachlan." He died before 1322, and was succeeded by his brother Patrick. The latter married a daughter of James, Steward of Scotland, and had a son, Lachlan, who succeeded him. Lachlan's son, Donald, confirmed in 1456, the grant by his predecessor Archibald, to the Preaching Friars of Glasgow of forty shillings yearly out of the lands of Kilbride, with an additional annuity of six shillings and eightpence "from his lands of Kilbryde near Castellachlan." Munimenta Fratrum Predicatorum de Glasgu. (Maitland Club.)

Lachlan, the 15th chief, dating from the time that written evidence can be adduced, was served heir to his father, 23d September 1719. He married a daughter of Stewart of Appin, and was killed at Culloden, fighting on the side of Prince Charles. The 16th chief, (1862,) his great-grandson, Robert MacLachlan of MacLachlan, convener and one of the deputy-lieutenants of Argyleshire, married in 1823, Helen, daughter of William A. Carruthers of Dormont, Dumfries-shire, without issue. Next heir, his brother, George MacLachlan, Esq., married, issue 3 sons and a daughter. The family seat, Castle Lachlan, built about 1790, near the old and ruinous tower, formerly the residence of the chiefs, is situated in the centre of the family estate, which is eleven miles in length, and, on an average, a mile and a half in breadth, and stretches in one continued line along the eastern side of Loch Fyne. The effective force of the clan previous to the rebellion of 1745, was estimated at 300 men.

In Argyleshire also are the families of MacLachlan of Craig-terve, Inchconnell, &c., and in Stirlingshire, of Auchintrojg. The MacLachlans of Drumblanc in Monteith were of the Lochaber branch.

MACLACHLAN, EWEN, a Gaelic poet and scholar, was born in 1775 at Torraealltinn, in Lochaber. His forefathers came originally from Morven. He was the 2d youngest son of a weaver, and in his youth was engaged as a tutor in several families in the Highlands. Several pieces of Gaelic poetry composed by him were published about 1798, in a volume printed at Edinburgh for Allan Macdougall, or Ailean Dall, (Blind Allan,) musician at Inverlochy, afterwards family bard to Col. Ranaldson Macdonnell of Glengarry. In the following year MacLachlan was introduced by Dr. Ross of Kilmanivaig to that truly Highland chief, by whose assistance he was enabled to fulfil a long-cherished desire of going to college. After a very strict competition, he succeeded in obtaining the highest bursary at King's college, Old Aberdeen. On taking the degree of A.M., he entered the divinity hall, having been, through the good offices of his friend, Dr. Ross, presented, in 1800, to a royal bursary in the gift of the barons of exchequer. About the same time he was appointed assistant to Mr. Gray, librarian to King's college, and teacher of the Grammar school of Old Aberdeen. He was subsequently made a free burgess of that town, and for some time was custodier of the library attached to the divinity hall of Marischal college. To add to the scanty income which his various offices brought to him, he devoted several hours every day to private teaching.

Besides being an accomplished scholar, Mr. MacLachlan was well versed in oriental literature and in the languages of modern Europe. Of the Iliad of Homer he translated nearly seven books into Gaelic heroic verse, which still remain in MS. Having begun to collect materials for a Dictionary of the Gaelic language, he was, by the Highland Society of Scotland, conjoined with Dr. Macleod of Dundonald, in carrying on the national Dictionary, compiled under their patronage. The department assigned to him was the Gaelic-English, and in the Preface to the work published by Drs. Macleod and Dewar, he is thus mentioned: "Mr. MacLachlan of Aberdeen especially brought to the undertaking great talents, profound learning, habits of industry which were almost superhuman, an intimate acquaintance with the Gaelic language, and devoted attachment to the elucidation of its principles."

In 1816, Mr. MacLachlan published at Aberdeen a volume of poetry, in various languages, entitled 'Metrical Effusions.' An ode, in the Greek language, 'On the Generation of Light,' contained in it, gained the prize given by Dr. Buchanan of Bengal to King's college, for the best ode on the subject. Among the contents, also, were an elegant Latin ode addressed to Dr. Beattie the poet, on whose death, in 1810, MacLachlan had composed an elegy in the Gaelic tongue, and an English ode, entitled 'A Dream,' being an apotheosis on his deceased friend.

In 1819, Mr. MacLachlan succeeded Mr. Gray as head master of the Grammar school of Old Aberdeen, and also principal session clerk and treasurer of the parish of Old Machar. He was likewise secretary to the Highland Society of Aberdeen, and, we are told, wore the full Highland garb when officially attending the meetings of the Society, and on other particular occasions. In 1820 he became a candidate for the office of teacher of the classical department of the Inverness academy, but was unsuccessful, local politics, it seems, having ruled the appointment. He died 29th March 1822, aged 47. A Memoir of his life and some of his Gaelic pieces are inserted in Mackenzie's Beauties of Gaelic Poetry (Glasgow, 1841).

MACLAURIN, the surname of a clan, commonly spelled Maclaren (badge, the laurel,) said to have been derived from the district of Lorn in Argyshire, the Gaelic orthography of which is Labhrin, pronounced Laurin, hence the Maclaurins are called the clann Labhrin. That district took its name from Lorn, one of the three sons of Ere, who, in 503, arrived in Argyshire from Ireland, and founded there the Scoto-Irish kingdom of Dalriada, a word borne by the Maclaurins as a motto above their coat of arms.

From Argyshire the tribe of Laurin moved into Perthshire, having, it is said, acquired from Kenneth Macalpin, after his conquest of the Picts in the 9th century, the districts of Balquhider and Strathearn, and three brothers are mentioned as having got assigned to them in that territory the lands of Bruach, Auchleskin, and Stank. In the churchyard of Balquhider, celebrated as containing the grave of Rob Roy, the burial places of their different families are marked off separately, so as to correspond with the situation which these estates bear to each other, a circumstance which so far favours the tradition regarding them.

Among the followers of Malise, earl of Strathearn, at the battle of the Standard in 1138, were a tribe called "Lavernani," supposed by Lord Hailes to have been the clan Laurin. Of those Scottish barons who swore fealty to Edward I. in 1296, were Maurice of Tiree, an island in the county of Argye which formerly belonged to the Maclaurins, Conan of Balquhider, and Laurin of Ardveche in Strathearn, all of the clan Laurin. When the earldom of Strathearn became vested in the crown in 1370, the Maclaurins were reduced from the condition of proprietors to that of "kyndly" or perpetual tenants, which they continued to be till 1508, when it was deemed expedient that this Celtic holding should be changed, and the lands set in feu, "for increase of policie and augmentation of the king's rental." The Maclaurins were among the loyal clans that fought for James III. at Sauchieburn in 1488. They were also at Flodden and at Pinkie. In the well-known rolls of the clans possessing chiefs, dated in 1587 and 1594, "the clan Lauren" are mentioned.

A sanguinary encounter once took place between the Maclaurins of Auchleskin and the Buchanans of Leny, arising out of the following circumstance: At the fair of St. Kessaig held at Kilmahog, in the parish of Callander, one of the Buchanans struck a Maclaurin of weak intellect, on the cheek, with a salmon which he was carrying, and knocked off his bonnet. The latter said he would not dare to repeat the blow at next St. George's fair at Balquhider. To that fair the Buchanans went in a strong body, and on their appearance the half witted Maclaurin, who had received the insult, for the first time told what had occurred at the fair at Kilmahog. The warning cross was immediately sent through the clan, and every man able to bear arms hastened to the muster. In their impatience the Maclaurins began the battle, before all their force had collected, and were driven from the field, but one of them, seeing his son cut down, turned furiously upon the Buchanans, shouting the war-cry of his tribe, ("Craig Tuire," the rock of the boar,) and his clansmen rallying, became fired with the miri-cath, or madness of battle, and rushed after him, fighting desperately. The Buchanans were slain in great numbers, and driven over a small cascade of the Balvaig stream, which retains the name of Linan-an-Seicachan, "the cascade of the dead bodies." Two only escaped from the field, one of whom was slain at Gartnafuaran, and the other fell at the point which, from him, was ever afterwards known as Sron Lainie. Tradition variously fixes this clan battle in the reign of one of the Alexanders, that is, between 1106 and 1286, and in the 16th century.

About 1497, some of the clan Lanrin having carried off the cattle from the Braes of Lochaber, the Macdonalds followed the spoilers, and, overtaking them in Glenurchy, after a sharp fight, recovered the "lifting." The Maclaurins straightway sought the assistance of their kinsman, Dugal Stewart of Appin, who at once joined them with his followers, and a conflict took place, when both Dugal and Macdonald of Kepoch, the chiefs of their respective clans, were among the slain. This Dugal was the first of the Stewarts of Appin. He was an illegitimate son of John Stewart, third lord of Lorn, by a lady of the clan Laurin, and in 1469 when he attempted, by force of arms, to obtain possession of his father's lands, he was assisted by the Maclaurins, 130 of whom fell in a battle that took place at the foot of Bendoran, a mountain in Glenurchy.

The clan Laurin were the strongest sept in Balquhider, which was called "the country of the Maclaurins." Although there are few families of the name there now, so numerous were they at one period that none dared enter the church, until the Maclaurins had taken their seats. This invidious right claimed by them often led to unseemly brawls and fights at the church door, and lives were sometimes lost in consequence. In 1532, Sir John Maclaurin, vicar of Balquhider, was killed in one of these quarrels, and several of his kinsmen, implicated in the deed, were outlawed.

A deadly feud existed between the Maclaurins and their neighbours, the Macgregors of Rob Roy's tribe. In the 16th century, the latter slaughtered no fewer than eighteen householders of the Maclaurin name, with the whole of their families, and took possession of the farms which had belonged to them. The deed was not investigated till 1604, forty-six years afterwards, when it was thus described in their trial for the slaughter of the Colquhouns: "And siclyk, John M'Coull cheire, fior airt and part of the crewall murtbonn and burning of auchtene honshalders of the clan Lawren. thair wyves and bairns, committit fourtie sax zeir syne, or thairby." The verdict was that he was "clene, innocent, and acquit of the said crymes." The hill farm of Invernenty, on "The Braes of Balquhider," was one of the farms thus forcibly occupied by the Macgregors, although the property of a Maclaurin family, and in the days of Rob Roy, two centuries afterwards, the aid of Stewart of Appin was called in to replace the Maclaurins in their own, which he did at the head of 200 of his men. All these farms, however, are now the property of the chief of clan Gregor, having been purchased about 1798, from the commissioners of the forfeited estates.

The Maclaurins were out in the rebellion of 1745. According to President Forbes, they were followers of the Murrays of Athol, but although some of them might have been so, the majority of the clan fought for the Pretender with the Stewarts of Appin under Stewart of Ardsheil. Among them was Maclaurin of Invernenty, who was taken prisoner after the battle of Culloden, but made his escape in a very singular manner from the soldiers who were conducting him to Carlisle. The incident has been introduced by Sir Walter Scott into 'Redgumlet,' where "Pate-in-Peril" is the hero of it. On the way to England the party had reached the well-known "Devil's Beef Stand," otherwise called "Johnstone's Beef Tub," a deep and gloomy hollow near Moffat, so named from its having been employed, in the reiving times of old, as a hiding-place for stolen cattle. It was a misty morning, and Maclaurin, taking advantage of the opportunity, suddenly threw himself down the sides of the declivity, knowing that the soldiers, ignorant of the locality, would not dare to follow him. Gaining a morass, he immersed himself up to the neck in water, and covering his head with a turf, he remained there until night. In the disguise of a woman he afterwards lived undiscovered in Balquhiddier, until the act of indemnity was passed in 1747.

The chiefship was claimed by the family to which belonged Colin Maclaurin, the eminent mathematician and philosopher, and his son, John Maclaurin, Lord Dreghorn, memoirs of whom follow. In the application given in for the latter to the Lyon court, he proved his descent from a family which had long been in possession of the island of Tiree, one of the Argyleshire Hebrides. His great-grandfather, Daniel Maclaurin, author of Memoirs of his Own Times, removed from Tiree to Inverness, of which he became a very useful citizen.

MACLAURIN, COLIN, an eminent mathematician, youngest son of the Rev. John Maclaurin, minister of Glenderule, author of an Irish version of the Psalms, was born in the parish of Kilmoldan, Argyleshire, in February 1698. Having lost his father in infancy, and his mother before he was nine years old, he was educated under the care of his uncle, the Rev. Daniel Maclaurin, minister of Kilfinnan. He was sent to the university of Glasgow in 1709, and took the degree of M.A. in his fifteenth year, on which occasion he composed and defended a thesis on 'The Power of Gravity.' In 1717, after a competition which lasted for ten days, he was elected professor of mathematics in the Marischal college, Aberdeen. In the vacancies of 1719 and 1721 he went to London, where he became acquainted with Sir Isaac Newton, Dr. Hoadley, Dr. Samuel Clarke, Mr. Martin Folkes, and other eminent philosophers, and was admitted a member of the Royal Society. In 1722, having provided a competent person to attend to his class for a time at Aberdeen, he travelled on the Continent as tutor to the Hon. Mr. Hume, son of Lord Polwarth; and during their residence at Lorraine, he wrote his essay on the Percussion of Bodies, which gained the prize of the Royal Academy of Sciences in 1724. On the death of his pupil at Montpellier he returned to Aberdeen; and in 1725 he was chosen to succeed Mr. James Gregory as professor of mathematics at Edinburgh, where his lectures, commenced November 3 of that year, contributed much to raise the character of that university as a school of science. In 1733 he married Anne, daughter of Mr. Walter Stewart, at that time solicitor-general for Scotland, by whom he had seven children. A controversy with Bishop Berkeley led to the publication, in 1742, of his greatest work, the 'Treatise on Fluxions,' in 2 vols. 4to.

In 1745, having been very active in making plans, and superintending the operations necessary for the defence of the city of Edinburgh against the Highland army, Mr. Maclaurin was, upon their entering the city, obliged to withdraw to the north of England, when he was invited by the archbishop of York to reside with him. On his journey southward he had a fall from his horse, and the fatigue, anxiety, and cold to which he was exposed on this occasion, laid the foundation of a dropsy, of which he died soon after his return to Edinburgh, June 14, 1746. His portrait, from an engraving in Smith's Iconographia Scotica, is subjoined :

MACLAURIN, JOHN, LORD DREGHORN, an able lawyer, son of the preceding, was born at Edinburgh, December 15, 1734, old style. He received the rudiments of his education at the High school, and subsequently went through the usual academical course at the university of that city. On 3d August 1756 he was admitted a member of the faculty of advocates at Edinburgh, and after practising at the bar for many years with much reputation, he was, on 17th January 1788, raised to the bench, when he took the title of Lord Dreghorn. He died December 24, 1796. 'A Dissertation to prove that Troy was not taken by the Greeks,' read by him before the Royal Society of Edinburgh, of which he was one of the original members, was inserted in the Transactions of that Society in 1788. He kept a journal of the various important events that happened in Europe from 1792 to 1785, from which, shortly before his death, he made a selection, with the view of publication. His works, in a collected form, were published at Edinburgh in 2 vols. in 1798. At a very early period, as we learn from the Life prefixed, he displayed a natural turn for poetical composition, and among his school-fellows was distinguished by the name of 'the poet.' His poems, however, do not rank very high. Most of them were thrown off from a private printing press of his own for circulation among his friends. He was the author of the following works:

Observations on some Points of Law; with a System of the Judicial Law of Moses. Edin. 1759, 12mo.

A Dissertation to prove that Troy was not taken by the Greeks. Trans. Edin. Soc. i. 43. 1788.

Works. Edin. 1798, 2 vols. 8vo.

He also wrote three dramas of no great merit, entitled 'Hampden,' 'The Public,' and 'The Philosopher's Opera.' Several of his pieces will be found in Donaldson's Collection, printed at Edinburgh in 1760.

MACLEAN, the name of a clan (badge, blackberry heath) of supposed Irish descent, founded by one of the Fitzgerald family, as the clan Kenzie is said to have been by another. The Macleans are not mentioned among the native tribes in the Gaelic MS. of 1450, and the Norman or Italian origin of their chiefs is therefore the more probable, the Fitzgeralds having sprung from the Florentine Geraldi, one of whom came over with William the Conqueror. Their progenitor, according to Celtic tradition, was one Gillean or Gille-oin, a name signifying the young man, or the servant or follower of John, who lived so early as the beginning of the 5th century. He was called Gillean-ni-Tuaidh, that is, Gillean with the axe, from the dexterous manner in which he wielded that weapon in battle, and his descendants bear a battle-axe in their crest, between a laurel and a cypress branch. Macallane, the Gaelic pronunciation of the name, may mean the great stranger, from magnus, great, and alienus, a foreigner. (See vol. ii. p. 707, art. MAC.)

The Macleans have been located in Mull since the 14th century. They appear originally to have belonged to Moray. Mr. Skene says: "The two oldest genealogies of the Macleans, of which one is the production of the Beatons, who were hereditary sennachies of the family, concur in deriving the clan Gille-eon from the same race from whom the clans belonging to the great Moray tribe are brought by the MS. of 1450. Of this clan the oldest seat seems to have been the district of Lorn, as they first appear in subjection to the lords of Lorn; and their situation being thus between the Camerons and Macnachts, who were undisputed branches of the Moray tribe, there can be little doubt that the Macleans belonged to that tribe also. As their oldest seat was thus in Argyle, while they are unquestionably a part of the tribe of Moray, we may infer that they were one of those clans transplanted from North Moray by Malcolm IV., and it is not unlikely that Glen Urquhart was their original residence, as that district is said to have been in the possession of the Macleans when the Bissets came in."

The first of the name on record, Gillean, lived in the reign of Alexander III. (1249—1286), and fought against the Norsemen at the battle of Largs. In the Ragman Roll we find Gilliemore Maclean described as del Counte de Perth, among those who swore fealty to Edward I. in 1296. As the county of Perth at that period included Lorn, it is probable that he was the son of Gillean and ancestor of the Macleans. In the reign of Robert the Bruce mention is made of three brothers, John, Nigel, and Dofwall, termed Macgillean or fili Gillean, who appear to have been sons of Gilliemore, for we find John afterwards designated Macgilliemore. The latter fought under Bruce at Bannockburn. A dispute having arisen with the lord of Lorn, the brothers left him and took refuge in the Isles. Between them and the Mackinnons, upon whose lands they appear to have encroached, a bitter feud took place, which led to a most daring act on the part of the chief of the Macleans. When following, with the chief of the Mackinnons, the gully of the lord of the Isles, he attacked the former and slew him, and immediately after, afraid of his vengeance, he seized the Macdonald himself, and carried him prisoner to Icolmkill, where he was detained until he agreed to vow friendship to the Macleans, "upon certain stones where men were used to make solemn vows in those superstitious times," and granted them the lands in Mull which they have ever since possessed. John Gillicmore, surnamed Dlu from his dark complexion, appears to have settled in Mull about the year 1330. He died in the reign of Robert II., leaving two sons, Lachlan Lubanich, ancestor of the Macleans of Dowart, and Eachin or Hector Reganach, of the Macleans of Lochbuy.

Lachlan, the elder son, married in 1366, Margaret, daughter of John I., lord of the Isles, by his wife, the princess Margaret Stewart, and had a son, Hector, which became a favourite name among the Macleans, as Kenneth was among the Mackenzies, Evan among the Camerons, and Hugh among the Mackays. Both Lachlan and his son, Hector, received extensive grants of land from John, the father-in-law of the former, and his successor, Donald. Altogether, their possessions consisted of the isles of Mull, Tiree, and Coll, with Morvern on the mainland; and the clan Gillean became one of the most important and powerful of the vassal tribes of the lords of the Isles.

Lachlan's son, Hector, called Eachin Ruadh ni Cath, that is, Red Hector of the Battles, commanded as lieutenant-general under his uncle, Donald, at the battle of Harlaw in 1411, when he and Sir Alexander Irving of Drum, seeking out each other by their armorial bearings, encountered hand to hand and slew each other; in commemoration of which circumstance, we are told, the Dowart and Drum families were long accustomed to exchange swords. Near the field of battle is a tomb, built in the form of a malt steep, where, according to local tradition, Donald of the Isles lies buried, and it is commonly called Donald's tomb. But Donald was not slain in the battle, and Mr. Tytler conjectures, with much probability, that the tomb may be that of the chief of Maclean, or Macintosh, who was also slain there, and he refers, in support of this opinion, to Macfarlane's Genealogical Collections (MS. Advocates' Library, Jac. 5. 4. 16. vol. i. p. 180.) Red Hector of the Battles married a daughter of the earl of Douglas. His eldest son was taken prisoner at the battle of Harlaw, and detained in captivity a long time by the earl of Mar. His brother, John, at the head of the Macleans, was in the expedition of Donald Balloch, cousin of the lord of the Isles, in 1431, when the Islesmen ravaged Lochaber, and were encountered at Inverloch, near Fortwilliam, by the royal forces under the earls of Caithness and Mar, whom they defeated. In the dissensions which arose between John, the last lord of the Isles, and his turbulent son, Angus, who, with the island chiefs descended from the original family, complained that his father had made improvident grants of land to the Macleans and other tribes, Hector Maclean, chief of the clan, and great-grandson of Red Hector of the Battles, took part with the former, and commanded his fleet at the battle of the Bloody Bay in 1480, where he was taken prisoner. This Hector was chief of his tribe at the date of the forfeiture of the lordship of the Isles in 1493, when the clan Gillean, or Clanlean as it came to be called, was divided into four independent branches, viz., the Macleans of Dowart, the Macleans of Lochbuy, the Macleans of Coll, and the Macleans of Ardgour. When King James was on his second expedition to the Isles in 1495, Hector Maclean of Dowart was among the island chiefs who then made their submission to him, and the following year he was one of the five chiefs of rank who appeared before the lords of council and bound themselves, "by the extension of their hands," to abstain from mutual injuries and molestation, each under a penalty of £500. Lachlan Maclean was chief of Dowart in 1502, and he and his kinsman, Maclean of Lochbuy, were among the leading men of the Western Isles whom that energetic monarch, James IV., entered into correspondence with, for the purpose of breaking up the confederacy of the Islanders, "rewarding them by presents in the shape either of money or of grants of land, and securing their services in reducing to obedience such of their fellow chieftains as proved contumacious, or actually rose in rebellion." (See Tytler's Hist. of Scotland, vol. iv. p. 368). Nevertheless, on the breaking out of the insurrection under Donald Dubh, in 1503, they were both implicated in it. Lachlan Maclean was forfeited with Cameron of Lochail, while Maclean of Lochbuy and several others were summoned before the parliament, to answer for their treasonable support given to the rebels. In 1505 Maclean of Dowart abandoned the cause of Donald Dubh and submitted to the government; his example was followed by Maclean of Lochbuy and other chiefs; and this had the effect, soon after, of putting an end to the rebellion.

The lands of Lochiel had, in 1458, been bestowed by the earl of Ross on Maclean, founder of the family of Coll, and this caused a quarrel between the Macleans and the Camerons, in which, in course of time, were involved all of the former name. The feud raged, with more or less bitterness, for several years, but it, and another, between the Dowart and Lochbuy branches of the Macleans, regarding their lands in Morvern and the isle of Tiree, appear to have been checked for a time, by the prudent measures of James IV., towards the end of his reign.

Lachlan Maclean of Dowart was killed at Flodden. His successor, of the same name, was one of the principal supporters of Sir Donald Macdonald of Lochalsh, when, in November 1513, he brought forward his claims to the lordship of the Isles. He seized the royal castle of Carneburgh, near Mull, and afterwards that of Dunskeich in Sleat. By the earl of Argyle, however, he was prevailed upon, with several other island chiefs, to submit to the government, after having, in 1517, with Macleod of Dunvegan, made prisoners of Sir Donald's two brothers. In a petition which he presented to the council on this occasion he demanded a free remission of all offences to himself and certain of his "kin, men, servants, and part-takers," whom he named; that Sir Donald of Lochalsh, with his associates, should be proceeded against as traitors, and their lands forfeited; and that Sir Donald's two brothers, then in his custody, should be executed according to law. The remission he asked for was granted, upon hostages being given for future obedience, but when he claimed an heritable grant of one hundred merk lands in Tiree and Mull, free of all duties, the council would not give it for a longer term than till the king, who was then only in his fifth year, should come of age. With this arrangement he was forced to be content, and having appeared before the council, he gave his solemn oath of allegiance to the king.

From this time till 1523, there was peace in the Isles, but in that year a feud of a most implacable character broke out between the Macleans and the Campbells, arising out of an occurrence, which forms the subject of Miss Baillie's celebrated tragedy of 'The Family Legend,' and is thus related by Mr. Gregory: "Lauchlan Cattanach Maclean of Dowart married Lady Elizabeth Campbell, daughter of Archibald, second earl of Argyle; and, either from the circumstance of their union being unfruitful, or more probably owing to some domestic quarrels, he determined to get rid of his wife. Some accounts say that she had twice attempted her husband's life; but, whatever the cause may have been, Maclean, following the advice of two of his vassals, who exercised a considerable influence over him from the tie of fosterage, caused his lady to be exposed on a rock, which was only visible at low water, intending that she should be swept away by the return of the tide. This rock lies between the island of Lismore and the coast of Mull, and is still known by the name of the 'Lady's Rock.' From this perilous situation she was rescued by a boat accidentally passing, and conveyed to her brother's house. Her relations, although much exasperated against Maclean, smothered their resentment for a time, but only to break out afterwards with greater violence; for the laird of Dowart, being in Edinburgh, was surprised, when in bed, and assassinated by Sir John Campbell of Calder, the lady's brother. The Macleans instantly took arms, to revenge the death of their chief, and the Campbells were not slow in preparing to follow up the feud; but the government interfered, and, for the present, an appeal to arms was avoided." (Gregory's Highlands and Isles, pp. 127, 128.) In 1529, however, the Macleans joined the Clandonald of Isla against the earl of Argyle, and ravaged with fire and sword the lands of Roseneath, Craignish, and others belonging to the Campbells, killing many of the inhabitants. The Campbells, on their part, retaliated by laying waste great portion of the isles of Mull and Tiree and the lands of Morvern, belonging to the Macleans. In May 1530, Maclean of Dowart and Alexander of Isla made their personal submission to the sovereign at Stirling, and, with the other rebel island chiefs who followed their example, were pardoned, upon giving security for their after obedience.

In 1545, Maclean of Dowart acted a very prominent part in the intrigues with England, in furtherance of the project of Henry VIII. to force the Scottish nation to consent to a marriage between Prince Edward and the young Queen Mary. He and Maclean of Lochbuy were among the barons of the Isles who accompanied Donald Dubh to Ireland, and at the command of the earl of Lennox, claiming to be regent of Scotland, swore allegiance to the king of England. One of the two plenipotentiaries sent by Donald Dubh to the English court at this time, was Patrick Maclean, brother of Dowart, described as justiciar of the Isles and bailie of Icolmkill. Of the money sent by the English king to pay the islesmen engaged in the expedition against the regent Arran, Maclean of Dowart seems to have had the charge, but not making a proper division of it, the insular chiefs separated in discontent, and the expedition came, in consequence, to an end. Macvurich, in a note quoted by Mr. Gregory, says: "A ship came from England with a supply of money to carry on the war, which landed at Mull; and the money was given to Maclean of Dowart to be distributed among the commanders of the army; which they not receiving in proportion as it should have been distributed amongst them, caused the army to disperse."

The clan history subsequently consisted chiefly of feuds in which the Dowart family were engaged with the Coll branch of the Macleans, and the Macdonalds of Kintyre. The dispute with the former arose from Dowart, who was generally recognised as the head of the Clan-lean, insisting on being followed as chief by Maclean of Coll, and the latter, who held his lands direct from the crown, declining to acknowledge him as such, on the ground that being a free baron, he owed no service but to his sovereign as his feudal superior. In consequence of this refusal, Dowart, in the year 1561, caused Coll's lands to be ravaged, and his tenants to be imprisoned. With some difficulty, and after the lapse of several years, Coll succeeded in bringing his case before the privy council, who ordered Dowart to make reparation to him for the injury done to his property and tenants, and likewise to refrain from molesting him in future. But on a renewal of the feud some years after, the Macleans of Coll were expelled from that island by the young laird of Dowart.

The quarrel between the Macleans and the Macdonalds of Isla and Kintyre was, at the outset, merely a dispute as to the right of occupancy of the crown lands called the Rhiuns of Isla, but it soon involved these tribes in a long and bloody feud, and eventually led to the destruction nearly of them both. The Macleans, who were in possession, claimed to hold the lands in dispute as tenants of the crown, but the privy council decided that Macdonald of Isla was really the crown tenant. In 1562, the Macdonalds of Isla, assisted by those of Sleat, invaded the isles of Mull, Tiree, and Coll, and in 1565 the rival chiefs were compelled to find sureties, to the amount of £10,000, that they would abstain from mutual hostilities. But even this did not restrain a high spirited tribe like the Macleans. On the death of James Macdonald of Dunyveg, Hector Maclean of Dowart ravaged with fire and sword the isle of Gigha, being part of the jointure lands of Lady Agnes Campbell, Macdonald's widow, and in consequence Queen Mary, then at the castle of Dunbar, granted, on 28th April, 1567, a commission of lieutenandry to the earl of Argyle against him and his clan. (Analecta Scotica, p. 393.)

Lachlan Maclean of Dowart, called Lachlan Mor, was chief of the Macleans in 1578. He is said to have got the name of Mor, from his great stature, but, as we have already shown in the article on Campbell (vol. i. p. 544), this term was frequently applied to denote superior rank. Under him the feud with the Macdonalds assumed a most sanguinary and relentless character. He is described as a young man of an active and energetic spirit, and of superior talents improved by a good education, but of a cruel and fierce disposition. He had succeeded young to the chiefship, and during his minority the estates were managed by his kinsman, Hector Maclean, whose father, Allan Maclean of Gigha and Torlusk, brother of the former Maclean of Dowart, is celebrated in tradition as a warrior, by the name of Alein na'n Sop. To obtain possession of the estates for himself, Hector designed to deprive the young chief of his life, but Lachlan Mor discovered his purpose, and on attaining his majority, had him apprehended, and after imprisoning him for a considerable time in the castle of Dowart, he was removed to the isle of Coll, and heheaded by Lachlan's order. The following year, on a renewal of the feud between the Macleans and the Macdonalds of Isla, the king and council commanded the chiefs of both tribes to subscribe assurances of indemnity to each other, under the penalty of treason. But although Macdonald of Dunyveg, at this time, married Maclean's sister, hostilities were only suspended between the clans, to break out no long time after, with increased violence. It was in the year 1585 that this most destructive feud reached its height, and that under the following circumstances:

Macdonald of Sleat, on his way to visit his kinsman, Angus Macdonald, was driven by stress of weather to the island of Jura, and landed on that part which belonged to Maclean, the other part being the property of Angus Macdonald. Two of the Clendonald, who had a grudge at their chief, one of whom was named Macdonald Terreagh, happened to arrive on the island at the same time, and that same night carried off some of Maelean's cattle, with the object that the theft might be imputed to Sleat and his party. Under that impression Lachlan Mor Maclean assembled his followers, and suddenly attacking them at night, slew about sixty of them. The chief of Sleat himself only escaped by his having previously gone on board his galley to pass the night. After his return to Skye, whither he proceeded vowing vengeance against the Maeleans, he was visited by Angus Macdonald, for the purpose of concerting measures of retaliation. On his homeward voyage to Kintyre, Angus Macdonald landed in the isle of Mull, and, against the advice of his followers, went to visit his brother-in-law at his castle of Dowart, in the hope of effecting an amicable arrangement of all their disputes. His two brothers, Ranald and Coll, who were with him, refused to accompany him, fearing treachery, and their fears were realized; for, although well received at first by Maelean, Angus and all his party were the following day arrested by Lachlan Mor and thrown into prison. The only one who escaped was Reginald Macdonald, the cousin of Angus. To preserve his life and recover his freedom Angus agreed to renounce his right to the disputed lands in the Rhinns of Isla, and for the performance of this engagement he was obliged to give his eldest son, James, a young boy, and his brother, Ranald, as hostages. In a short time afterwards Lachlan Mor sailed to Isla to get the agreement completed, taking with him James Macdonald, one of the hostages, leaving the other in fetters in the castle of Dowart. On his arrival he encamped at the ruinous fort of Eilan Gorm on the Rhinns. Angus Macdonald was then residing at Mullintrea, to which place he invited Maclean, who declined the invitation. "There was," says Sir Robert Gordon, "so little trust on either syde, that they did not now meet in friendship or amitie, bot vpon ther owne guard, or rather by messengers, one from another." Angus, however, pressed his invitation, with the strongest assurances of safety and good treatment, and Lachlan Mor, throw off his guard, at length complied. With 86 of his followers he went to Mullintrea in the month of July 1586, and on his arrival was sumptuously entertained the whole day. The night, however, was signalized by treachery and blood. The event is thus related: "At the usual hour for retiring to repose, Maclean and his people were lodged in a loughouse, which stood by itself, at some distance from the other houses. During the whole day Maclean had always kept James Macdonald, the hostage, within his reach, as a sort of protection to him in case of an attack, and at going to bed he took him along with him. About an hour after Maclean and his people had retired, Angus assembled his men to the number of 3 or 400, and made them surround the house in which Maelean and his company lay. Then going himself to the door, he called upon Maclean, and told him that he had come to give him his reposeing drink, which he had forgotten to order him before going to bed. Maclean answered that he did not wish to drink at that time, but Macdonald insisted that he should rise, it being, he said, his will that he should do so. The peremptory tone of Macdonald made Maelean at once apprehensive of danger, and getting up and placing the boy between his shoulders, as a sort of shield, he prepared to defend his life as long as he could, or to sell it as dearly as possible. As soon as the door was forced open, James Macdonald, seeing his father with a naked sword in his hand, and a number of his men armed in the same manner, cried aloud for mercy to Maclean, his uncle, which being granted, Lachlan Mor was immediately removed to a secret chamber, where he remained till next morning. After Maclean had surrendered, Angus Macdonald announced to those within the house that if they would come without, their lives would be spared; but he excepted Macdonald Terreagh and another individual whom he named. The whole, with the exception of these two, having complied, the house was immediately set on fire, and consumed along with Macdonald Terreagh and his companion. The former was one of the Clendonald of the western islands, and not only had assisted the Macleans against his own tribe, but was also the originator of all these disturbances; and the latter was a near kinsman of Maelean, one of the oldest of the clan, and celebrated both for his wisdom and prowess."

But this was only the beginning of the tragedy. What followed was still more horrible. Allan Maclean, a near kinsman of Lachlan Mor, in the hope that the Macdonalds would put him to death, in which event he would have succeeded to the management of the estate, as guardian to his children, who were then very young, caused a report to be spread that the hostage left behind at Dowart castle, had been killed by the Macleans. Under the impression that it was true, Coll Macjames, the brother of the hostage and of Angus Macdonald, took a signal vengeance on the unfortunate prisoners in his hands, two of whom were executed every day, until at last Lachlan Mor alone survived. An accident that happened to Angus Macdonald, as he was mounting his horse to witness his execution, saved his life. Information of these atrocities being sent to the king (James VI.), he immediately despatched a herald to demand that Lachlan Mor should be set at liberty, but the herald was unable to procure shipping for Isla. Macdonald was at length prevailed upon to release him, on his delivering into his hands his eldest son, Hector Maelean, and seven other hostages. Soon after Angus Macdonald went on a visit to Ulster, when Maclean, regardless of the safety of his hostages, and dreaming only of vengeance, hurried to Isla and laid waste a great portion of that island.

On his return from Ireland, Angus Macdonald, at the head of a large force, invaded the isles of Mull and Tiree, which he ravaged with fire and sword, slaying many of the inhabitants, as well as the domestic animals of every description. "Finally," says Sir Robert Gordon, "he came to the very Benmore in Mull, and there killed and chased the clan Lean at his pleasure, and so revenged himself fully of the injuries done to him and his tribe." Instead of opposing him, Maelean made an inroad into Kintyre, great part of which he ravaged and plundered, and "thus for awhile they did continually vex one another with slaughters and outrages, to the destruction almost of their countries and people." (Sir Robert Gordon's Hist. of Sutherland, p. 186). An episode in this long continued and vindictive feud shows to what length the feelings of bitterness and cruelty engendered by it could be carried. To gain over to his side John Mac Ian of Ardnamurchan, who had been a suitor for the hand of his mother, the daughter of the earl of Argyle, Lachlan Mor, in 1588, invited him to Mull, with the view to the proposed alliance. Mac Ian accepted the invitation, and was accompanied by a retinue of the principal gentlemen of his tribe. No persuasion, however, could induce him to join against his own clan, the Macdonalds. Furious at his refusal, Lachlan Mor, on the marriage night, caused Mac Ian's attendants, to the number of 18, to be massacred; then, bursting into his bed chamber, would have murdered himself, had not his new-made wife interposed on his behalf, and for her sake his life was spared. With two of his followers, who had escaped the fate of their companions, he was thrown into a dungeon, and not released for a year afterwards, when he and other prisoners were exchanged for Maclean's son, and the other hostages in the hands of Angus Macdonald.

Previous to his liberation, however, with the assistance of a hundred Spanish soldiers belonging to the Florida, a ship of the Spanish Armada driven by a storm into the harbour of Tobermory in Mull, Lachlan Mor had ravaged and plundered the isles of Rum and Eig, occupied by the Clanranald, and those of Cauna and Muck, belonging to the clan Ian. In this expedition he is said to have burned the whole inhabitants of these Isles, sparing neither age nor sex. On the mainland he besieged for three days Mac Ian's castle of Mingarry in Ardnamurchan. The Macdonalds, on their side, assisted by a band of English mercenaries, wasted the lands of the Macleans with fire and sword.

The mutual ravages committed by the hostile clans, in which the kindred and vassal tribes on both sides were involved, and the effects of which were felt throughout the whole of the Hebrides, attracted, in 1589, the serious attention of the king and council, and for the purpose of putting an end to them, the rival chiefs, with Macdonald of Sleat, on receiving remissions, under the privy seal, for all the crimes committed by them, were induced to proceed to Edinburgh. On their arrival, they were committed prisoners to the castle, and, after some time, Maclean and Angus Macdonald were brought to trial, in spite of the remissions granted to them; one of the principal charges against them being their treasonable hiring of Spanish and English soldiers to fight in their private quarrels. Both chiefs submitted themselves to the king's mercy, and placed their lives and lands at his disposal. On payment each of a small fine they were allowed to return to the Isles, Macdonald of Sleat being released at the same time. Besides certain conditions being imposed upon them, they were taken bound to return to their confinement in the castle of Edinburgh, whenever they should be summoned, on twenty days' warning. Not fulfilling the conditions, they were, on 14th July 1593, cited to appear before the privy council, and as they disobeyed the summons, both Lachlan Mor and Angus Macdonald were, in 1594, forfeited by parliament.

At the battle of Glenlivet, in that year, fought between the Catholic earls of Huntly, Angus, and Errol, on the one side, and the king's forces, under the earl of Argyle, on the other, Lachlan Mor, at the head of the Macleans, particularly distinguished himself. Argyle lost the battle, but, says Mr. Gregory, (Highlands and Isles of Scotland, p. 259.) "the conduct of Lachlan Maclean of Dowart, who was one of Argyle's officers, in this action, would, if imitated by the other leaders, have converted the defeat into a victory. That chief acted the part of a brave and skilful soldier, keeping his men in their ranks, and employing, with good effect, all the advantages of his position. It was his division which inflicted the principal loss on the rebels, and, at the close of the action, he retired in good order with those under his command. It is said that, after the battle, he offered, if Argyle would give him five hundred men in addition to his own clan, to bring the earl of Huntly prisoner into Argyle's camp. This proposal was rejected, but having come to the ears of Huntly, incensed him greatly against Maclean, whose son afterwards, according to tradition, lost a large estate in Lochaber, through the animosity of that powerful nobleman."

In 1596 Lachlan Mor repaired to court, and on making his submission to the king, the act of forfeiture was removed. He also received from the crown a lease of the Rhiuns of

Isla, so long in dispute between him and Macdonald of Dunyveg. While thus at the head of favour, however, his unjust and oppressive conduct to the family of the Macleans of Coll, whose castle and island he had seized some years before, on the death of Hector Maclean, proprietor thereof, was brought before the privy council by Lachlan Maclean, then of Coll, Hector's son, and the same year he was ordered to deliver up not only the castle of Coll, but all his own castles and strongholds, to the lieutenant of the Isles, on twenty-four hours' warning, also, to restore to Coll, within thirty days, all the lands of which he had deprived him, under a penalty of 10,000 merks. In 1598, Lachlan Mor, with the view of expelling the Macdonalds from Isla, levied his vassals and proceeded to that island, and after an ineffectual attempt at an adjustment of their differences, was encountered, on 5th August, at the head of Lochgruinard, by Sir James Macdonald, son of Angus, at the head of his clan, when the Macleans were defeated, and their chief killed, with 80 of his principal men and 200 common soldiers. Lachlan Baroch Maclean, a son of Sir Lachlan, was dangerously wounded, but escaped. Sir Lachlan, according to Sir Robert Gordon, had consulted a witch before he undertook this journey into Isla; she advised him, in the first place, not to land upon the island on a Thursday; secondly, that he should not drink of the water of a well near Gruinard; and lastly, she told him that one Maclean should be slain at Gruinard. "The first he transgressed unwillingly," says Sir Robert, "being driven into the island of Isla by a tempest upon a Thursday; the second he transgressed negligentlie, having drank of that water before he was aware; and so he was killed ther at Groinard, as was foretold him, bot doubtfullie. Thus endeth all these that doe trust in such kynd of responce, or doe hunt after them." (Hist. p. 238.)

Hector Maclean, the son and successor of Sir Lachlan, at the head of a numerous force, afterwards invaded Isla, and attacked and defeated the Macdonalds at a place called Bern Bige, and then ravaged the whole island. He was one of the principal chiefs of the Isles seized by Lord Ochiltree, the king's lieutenant, on his expedition to the Isles in 1608, and carried to Edinburgh. The following year he and Macdonald of Dunyveg were selected to accompany the king's commissioner on his survey of the Isles. With two of his brothers, and Hector Maclean of Lochbuy, and almost all the principal islesmen, he was present at Iona when the celebrated "Statutes of Icolmkill" were enacted. He was also one of the six principal islanders who met at Edinburgh on 28th June 1610, to bear his majesty's pleasure declared to them, when they were compelled to give sureties to a large amount for their reappearance before the council in May 1611. In the conditions imposed upon the chiefs for the pacification of the Isles in 1616, we find that Maclean of Dowart was not to use in his house more than four tun of wine, and Coll and Lochbuy one tun each. At this time Maclean of Dowart and his brother Lachlan, having delayed to find the sureties required of them, were committed to ward in Edinburgh castle, whence the former was soon liberated, and allowed to live with Acheson of Gosfurd, his father-in-law, under his own recognisance of £40,000, and his father-in-law's for 5,000 merks, that he should remain there until permitted by the council to return to the Isles. Dowart's brother was not liberated till the following year.

Sir Lachlan Maclean of Morvern, a younger brother of Hector Maclean of Dowart, was in 1631 created a baronet of Nova Scotia by Charles I., and on the death of his elder brother he succeeded to the estate of Dowart. In the civil wars the Macleans took arms under Montrose, and fought valiantly for the royal cause. At the battle of Inverloch, 2d February 1615, Sir Laehlan commanded his clan. He was also engaged in the subsequent battles of the royalist general. Sir Hector Maclean, his son, with 800 of his followers, was at the battle of Inverkeithing, 20th July 1651, when the royalists were opposed to the troops of Oliver Cromwell. On this occasion an instance of devoted attachment to the chief was shown on the part of the Macleans. In the heat of the battle, Sir Hector was covered from the enemy's attacks by seven brothers of his clan, all of whom successively sacrificed their lives in his defence. As one fell another rushed forward to interpose betwixt his person and the enemy, crying out in Gaelic, Bas air son Eachin, "Another for Hector!" This phrase, says General Stewart, has continued ever since to be a proverb or watchword, when a man encounters any sudden danger that requires instant succour. Sir Hector, however, was left among the slain, with about 500 of his followers.

The Dowart estates had become deeply involved in debt, and the marquis of Argyle, by purchasing them up, had acquired a claim against the lands of Maclean, which ultimately led to the greater portion of them becoming the property of that grasping family. In 1674, after the execution of the marquis, payment was insisted upon by his son, the earl. The tutor of Maclean, the chief, his nephew, being a minor, evaded the demand for a considerable time, and at length showed a disposition to resist it by force. Argyle had recourse to legal proceedings, and supported by a body of 2,000 Campbells, he crossed into Mull, where he took possession of the castle of Dowart, and placed a garrison in it. The Macleans, however, refused to pay their rents to the earl, and in consequence he prepared for a second invasion of Mull. To resist it, the Macdonalds came to the aid of the Macleans, but Argyle's ships were driven back by a storm, when he applied to government, and even went to London, to ask assistance from the king. Lord Macdonald and other friends of the Macleans followed him, and laid a state of the dispute before Charles, who, in February 1676, remitted the matter to three lords of the Scottish privy council. No decision, however, was come to by them, and Argyle was allowed to take possession of the island of Mull without resistance in 1680.

After the Revolution, a party of Macleans, under their chief, Sir John Maclean, fourth baronet, on their way to join Viscount Dundee, were surprised in Strathspey, by a party of Mackay's dragoons, under Sir Thomas Livingston, when they threw away their plaid, and formed on an adjoining hill. In the skirmish that ensued, they sustained a loss of 80 or 100 men. At the battle of Killiecrankie, Sir John Maclean, with his regiment, was placed on Dundee's right, and among the troops on his left was a battalion under Sir Alexander Maclean. The Macleans were amongst the Highlanders surprised and defeated at Croudale in 1690. The following day, a party of Macleans and Camerons, who had in the flight separated from their companions in arms, crossed the Spey, but being pursued by some of Livingston's men, were overtaken and dispersed on the moor of Granish near Aviemore, where some of them were killed. Subsequently, the earl of Argyle invaded Mull, with 1,900 foot and 60 dragoons, when the inhabitants took the oath of allegiance to the government, and delivered up their arms. Sir John Maclean himself, with a few of his friends, took refuge in the fort of Carneburgh, one of the Treshnish isles, where a party of Macleans, during the civil wars, had held out, for some time, against a detachment of Cromwell's forces.

In the rebellion of 1715, the Macleans ranged themselves

under the standard of the earl of Mar, and were present at the battle of Sheriffmuir. For his share in the insurrection Sir John Maclean, the chief, was forfeited, but the estates were afterwards restored to the family. On the breaking out of the rebellion of 1745, Sir John's son, Sir Hector Maclean, the fifth baronet, was apprehended, with his servant, at Edinburgh, and conveyed to London. He was not set at liberty till the passing of the act of indemnity in June 1747. At Culloden, however, 500 of his clan fought for Prince Charles, under Maclean of Drummin, who was slain leading them on. Sir Hector died, unmarried, at Paris, in 1750, when the title devolved upon his third cousin, Sir Allan Maclean, who was great-grandson of Donald Maclean of Broiloss, eldest son, by his second marriage, of Hector Maclean of Dowart, the father of the first baronet. Sir Allan married Anne, daughter of Hector Maclean of Coll, and had three daughters, the eldest of whom, Maria, became the wife of Maclean of Kinlochaline, and the second, Sibella, of Maclean of Inverseadell. In 1773, when Dr. Johnson and Mr. Boswell visited the Hebrides, Sir Allan was chief of the clan. He resided at that time on Inch Kenneth, one of his smaller islands, in the district of Mull, where he entertained his visitors very hospitably. "This island," says Dr. Johnson, "is about a mile long, and perhaps half-a-mile broad, remarkable for pleasantness and fertility. Its only inhabitants were Sir Allan Maclean and two young ladies, his daughters, with their servants. Romance does not often exhibit a scene that strikes the imagination more than this little desert, in these depths of western obscurity, occupied not by a gross herdsman, or amphibious fisherman, but by a gentleman and two ladies, of high birth, polished manners, and elegant conversation, who, in a habitation raised not very far above the ground, but furnished with unexpected neatness and convenience, practised all the kindness of hospitality and refinement of courtesy." From the following anecdote it would appear that the feeling of devotion to the chief had survived the heritable abolition act of 1747, if indeed the passing of such an act was at all generally known in 1773 among the humbler inhabitants of the remote Hebrides. "The Macginnisses are said to be a branch of the clan of Maclean. Sir Allan had been told that one of the name had refused to send him some rum, at which the knight was in great indignation. 'You rascal!' said he, 'don't you know that I can hang you, if I please? Refuse to send rum to me, you rascal! Don't you know that if I order you to go and cut a man's throat, you are to do it?' 'Yes, an't please your honour, and my own too, and hang myself too!' The poor fellow denied that he had refused to send the rum. His making these professions was not merely a pretence in presence of his chief, for, after he and I were out of Sir Allan's hearing, he told me, 'Had he sent his dog for the rum, I would have given it: I would cut my bones for him.' Sir Allan, by way of upbraiding the fellow, said, 'I believe you are a Campbell!'"

Dying without male issue in 1783, Sir Allan was succeeded by his kinsman, Sir Hector, 7th baronet; on whose death, Nov. 2, 1818, his brother, Lieut.-general Sir Fitzroy Jeffrey Grafton Maclean, became the 8th baronet. He died July 5, 1847, leaving two sons, Sir Charles Fitzroy Maclean of Morvern, and Donald Maclean, of the chancery bar, at one period a member of parliament. Sir Charles, 9th baronet, a colonel in the army, (1846) commanded the 81st foot for some time, and was subsequently military secretary at Gibraltar. He married a daughter of the Hon. and Rev. Jacob Marsham, uncle of the earl of Romney; issue, a son, Charles Donald, capt. 13th dragoons, and 4 daughters; one, Fanny, married

Capt. Hood, R.N., and another, Louisa, became the wife of Hon. Ralph Pelham Neville, son of the earl of Abergavenny.

The first of the Lochbuy branch of the Macleans was Hector Reganach, brother of Lachlan Lubanich above mentioned. He had a son named John, or Murchard, whose great-grandson, John Oig Maclean of Lochbuy, received from King James IV., several charters of confirmation under the great seal, of the lands and baronies which had been held by his progenitors. He was killed, with his two elder sons, in a family feud with the Macleans of Dowart. His only surviving son, Murdoch, was obliged, in consequence of the same feud, to retire to Ireland, where he remained for several years, and married a daughter of the earl of Antrim. By the mediation of his father-in-law, his differences with Dowart were satisfactorily adjusted, and he returned to the isles, where he spent his latter years in peace. His son, John Moir Maclean of Lochbuy, was so expert a fencer that, according to a history of the family, he fought on a stage in Edinburgh before the king and court, and killed a famous Italian swordsman, who had challenged all Scotland. By his wife, a daughter of Macdonald of the Isles, he had two sons, Hector, who succeeded him, and Charles, progenitor of the Macleans of Tapull. From the latter family descended Sir Alexander Maclean of Ottar, mentioned in the preceding page, who attached himself to the interests of James VII. He accompanied the fallen monarch to France, and rose to the rank of colonel in the French service.

The house of Lochbuy has always maintained that of the two brothers, Lachlan Lubanich and Hector Reganach, the latter was the senior, and that, consequently, the chiefship of the Macleans is vested in its head; "but this," says Mr. Gregory, "is a point on which there is no certain evidence." The whole clan, at different periods, have followed the head of both families to the field, and fought under their command. Of this house was Hector Maclean, elected bishop of Argyle in 1680. He had in his younger years taken arms for the king in the civil wars, but being of a religious disposition he ultimately entered the church. The Lochbuy family now spells its name Maclaine.

The Coll branch of the Macleans, like that of Dowart, descended from Lachlan Lubanich, said to have been grandfather of the fourth laird of Dowart and the first laird of Coll, who were brothers. John Maclean, surnamed Garbh, son of Lachlan of Dowart, obtained the isle of Coll and the lands of Quinish in Mull from Alexander, earl of Ross and lord of the Isles, and afterwards, on the forfeiture of Cameron, the lands of Lochiel. The latter grant engendered, as we have seen, a deadly feud between the Camerons and the Macleans, which led to much contention and bloodshed between them. At one time the son and successor of John Garbh occupied Lochiel by force, but was killed in a conflict with the Camerons at Corpach, in the reign of James III. His infant son would also have been put to death, had the boy not been saved by the Macgillonics or Maclonichs, a tribe of Lochaber that generally followed the clan Cameron. This youth, subsequently known as John Abrach Maclean of Coll, was the representative of the family in 1493, and from him was adopted by his successors the patronymic appellation of Maclean Abrach, by which the lairds of Coll were ever after distinguished.

The tradition concerning this heir of Coll is thus related by Dr. Johnson, in his Tour to the Hebrides: "Very near the house of Maclean stands the castle of Coll, which was the mansion of the laird till the house was built. On the wall was, not long ago, a stone with an inscription, importing, 'That if any man of the clan of Maclonich shall appear before this castle, though he come at midnight with a man's head in his hand, he shall there find safety and protection against all but the king.' This is an old Highland treaty made upon a memorable occasion. Maclean, the son of John Garbh, who recovered Coll, and conquered Barra, had obtained, it is said, from James II., a grant of the lands of Lochiel, forfeited, I suppose, by some offence against the state. Forfeited estates were not in those days quietly resigned: Maclean, therefore, went with an armed force to seize his new possessions, and, I know not for what reason, took his wife with him. The Camerons rose in defence of their chief, and a battle was fought at the head of Lochness, near the place where Fort Augustus now stands, in which Lochiel obtained the victory, and Maclean, with his followers, was defeated and destroyed. The lady fell into the hands of the conquerors, and being found pregnant, was placed in the custody of Maclonich, one of a tribe or family branched from Cameron, with orders, if she brought a boy, to destroy him, if a girl, to spare her. Maclonich's wife, who was with child likewise, had a girl about the same time at which Lady Maclean brought a boy; and Maclonich, with more generosity to his captive than fidelity to his trust, contrived that the children should be changed. Maclean being thus preserved from death, in time recovered his original patrimony, and in gratitude to his friend, made his castle a place of refuge to any of the clan that should think himself in danger, and, as a proof of reciprocal confidence, Maclean took upon himself and his posterity the care of educating the heir of Maclonich. This story, like all other traditions of the Highlands, is variously related; but, though some circumstances are uncertain, the principal fact is true. Maclean undoubtedly owed his preservation to Maclonich; for the treaty between the two families has been strictly observed; it did not sink into disuse and oblivion, but continued in its full force while the chieftains retained their power. The power of protection subsists no longer; but what the law permits is yet continued, and Maclean of Coll now educates the heir of Maclonich."

The account of the conversion of the simple islanders of Coll from popery to protestantism is curious. The laird had imbibed the principles of the Reformation, but found his people reluctant to abandon the religion of their fathers. To compel them to do so, he did not trouble himself with argument or reasoning of any sort, but took his station one Sunday in the path which led to the Roman Catholic church, and as his clansmen approached, he drove them back with his cane. They at once made their way to the protestant place of worship, and from this persuasive mode of conversion, his vassals ever after called it the religion of the gold-headed stick. Lachlan, the seventh proprietor of Coll, went over to Holland with some of his own men, in the reign of Charles II., and obtained the command of a company in General Mackay's regiment, in the service of the prince of Orange. He afterwards returned to Scotland, and was drowned in the water of Lochy in Lochaber in 1687.

Dr. Johnson seems to have been especially gratified with his reception at Coll. "We were at Coll," he says, "under the protection of the young laird, and wherever we roved, we were pleased to see the reverence with which his subjects regarded him. He did not endeavour to dazzle them by any magnificence of dress; his only distinction was a feather in his bonnet; but, as soon as he appeared, they forsook their work and clustered about him; he took them by the hand, and they seemed mutually delighted. He has the proper disposition of a chieftain, and seems desirous to continue the customs of his house. The bagpiper played regularly when dinner was served, whose person and dress made a good appearance, and he brought no disgrace upon the family of Rankin, which has long supplied the lairds of Coll with hereditary music." As an instance of the expense which attended the funeral of persons of distinction in the western isles, he states that nineteen years before his visit, thirty cows and about fifty sheep were killed at the burial of the laird of Coll, so great was the concourse of persons present at it. From Coll the travellers were conducted by the young laird to Mull, Ulva, and Sir Allan Maclean's at Inch-Kenneth. The young laird of Coll, soon after perished in the passage between Ulva and Inch-Kenneth. Col. Hugh Maclean, London, the last laird of Coll, of that name, was the 15th in regular descent from John Garbh, son of Lauchlan Lubanieh.

The Ardgorr branch of the Macleans, which held its lands directly from the lord of the Isles, descended from Donald, another son of Lauchlan, 3d laird of Dowart. The estate of Ardgorr, which is in Argyleshire, had previously belonged to a different tribe (the Macmasters), but it was conferred upon Donald, either by Alexander, earl of Ross, or by his son and successor, John. In 1463, Ewen or Eugene, son of Donald, held the office of senechal of the household to the latter earl; and in 1493, Lachlan Macewen Maclean was laird of Ardgorr. Alexander Maclean, Esq., the present laird of Ardgorr, is the 14th from father to son. His numerous brothers are colonels in the army. Two of them are in the royal artillery.

During the 17th and 18th centuries the Macleans of Lochbuy, Coll, and Ardgorr, more fortunate than the Dowart branch of the clan, contrived to preserve their estates nearly entire, although compelled by the marquis of Argyle to renounce their holdings in capite of the crown, and to become vassals of that nobleman. They continued zealous partizans of the Stuarts, in whose cause they suffered severely.

From Lachlan Oig Maclean, a younger son of Lachlan Mor of Dowart, sprung the family of Torloisk in Mull. Among the Highland corps embodied during the latter half of the last century was a regiment raised by Captain Allan Maclean of Torloisk, which was reduced in 1763. The Highland regiments in America and Germany were supplied with recruits from this corps. The estate ultimately fell to the heiress of line, Mrs. Clephane Maclean, whose grandson, 2d son of the marquis of Northampton, came to possess the property. Another grandson was the Baron de Norman, murdered by the Chinese in Pekin.

Of the numerous flourishing cadets of the different branches, the principal were the Macleans of Kinlochaline, Ardtornish, and Drimmin, descended from the family of Dowart; of Tapul and Seallasdale, in the island of Mull, from that of Lochbuy; of Isle of Muck, from that of Coll; and of Borrera, in North Uist and Treshinish, from that of Ardgorr. The family of Borrera are represented by Donald Maclean, Esq., and General Archibald Maclean. From Isle of Muck and Treshinish is descended A. C. Maclean of Haremere Hall, Sussex.

The Macleans of Penny-cross, island of Mull, represented by Alexander Maclean, Esq., derives from John Dubh, the first Maclean of Morvern. General Allan Maclean of Penny-cross, colonel of the 13th light dragoons, charged with them at Waterloo.

General Sir Archibald Macleane, born in 1783, 2d son of Gillian Macleane, Esq. of Seallasdale, by the eldest daughter of Mac Quarie of Mae Quarie, chief of Ulva, after serving with distinction in India and the Peninsular war, was knighted for his defence of Fort Matagorda for 55 days, with only 155 men against 8,000 men under Marshal Soult.

MACLELLAN, a surname of considerable antiquity in the south of Scotland. The Maclellans of Bombie, a family at one period of great power and influence, supposed originally to have come from Ireland, were, in ancient times, sheriffs of Galloway. Duncan Maclellan is mentioned in a charter of Alexander II. in 1217. Among the faithful adherents who accompanied Sir William Wallace, when he sailed from Kirkcudbright for France, after his defeat at Falkirk in 1293, was Maclellan the then laird of Bombie. The family became so flourishing about the beginning of the 15th century that, according to Crawford (Peerage, p. 237), there were no fewer than 14 knights of the name in Galloway at the same time. The account of the murder of Sir Patrick Maclellan, tutor of Bombie, by the 8th earl of Douglas, in Thirieve castle, in 1452, has been already related. (See vol. ii. page 615, art. KIRKCUDBRIGHT, baron.) Local tradition states that when James II., in 1455, arrived with an army at Carlinwark, to besiege the castle of Thirieve, the Maclellans presented him with the celebrated piece of ordnance, called Mons Meg, wherewith to batter down the stronghold of the rebellious chieftain.

Sir William Maclellan of Bombie, knighted by James IV., fell at Flodden with a number of his followers. His son, Thomas Maclellan of Bombie, was killed in a feud with Gordon of Loehinvar at the door of St. Giles' church, Edinburgh, 11th July, 1526. His great-grandson, Sir Robert Maclellan, was created Lord Kirkcudbright, 25th May 1633. See KIRKCUDBRIGHT, baron.) There were also the Maclellans of Barclay, descended from the Maclellans of Barmagehen, of the original Bombie line.

Although the crest of the Maclellans was a Moor's head on the point of a sword, in allusion to their recovery of the estate of Bombie, after being forfeited, by the slaying of a gipsy chief who infested Galloway, as already related under the article KIRKCUDBRIGHT, they sometimes used for crest a mortar-piece, with the motto, "Superbo frango," having reference, we are inclined to suppose, to the great iron gun named Mons Meg, which is said to have been made by a local smith, one Brawny Kim or M'Kim and his sons. As a reward for constructing so noble an engine of war, M'Kim is stated to have obtained the forfeited lands of Mollance, in the neighbourhood of Thirieve castle, hence this gun was called Mollance Meg, that being the name of the smith's wife, afterwards corrupted into Mons Meg. There is, however, an impression on the cannon itself that it was cast at the town of Mons in Flanders, whence it took its name. Nisbet thinks that the Maclellans adopted a mortar-piece or bomb for their crest, in allusion to their designation of Bombie, a somewhat fanciful notion certainly.

MACLENNAN, the surname of a minor clan, called in Gaelic, the Sìol Fhinnan, or race of Finnan. There was a celebrated Highland saint of this name, and the tribe or sept of the Macleennans derive their descent from one of his devotees. According to a tradition of the Semmehies, a chief of the Logans of Drumduirfait in Ross-shire, in the beginning of the 13th century, called Gilliegorm, had been killed in a clan battle with the Frasers, and his widow being carried off, bore a son, surnamed Crotach, or humpbacked, from his crooked appearance. It is even asserted that he was, in his infancy, intentionally injured by those into whose hands his mother had fallen, to prevent his ever attempting to avenge his father's death, by leading his clan to battle, the Highlanders having a strong aversion to follow a deformed leader. He was therefore designed for the church, and with that view was placed with the monks of Beaulieu, to receive the requisite ecclesiastical upbringing. On coming of age, and duly set apart for his holy work, he set out upon a tour to the west coast, the isle of Skye, and other places adjacent, where he built the churches of Kilmuir in Sleat, in the churchyard of which parish the celebrated Flora Macdonald lies buried, and Kilchrennan in Glenelg. Disregarding the recent decree of Pope Innocent III., strictly enjoining the celibacy of the clergy, he married, and had several children. One of his sons he called Gillie-Fhinnan, in honour of the renowned St. Finnan, and as the Fh is here not pronounced in the Gaelic, Ghillie-inan became of course MacIannan.

The MacIannans inhabited with the Macraes the district of Kintail in Ross-shire, the boundary between them being a river which runs into Loch Duich. At the battle of Auldearn in 1645, they were intrusted with the standard of Lord Seaforth, and they defended it so gallantly, that great numbers of them were cut down around it. Eighteen of the widows of the MacIannans slain on this occasion married their neighbours the Macraes. Like the latter, the MacIannans were subordinate to the Seaforth branch of the Mackenzies, and in the different rebellions, fought under the renowned "Caber feidh," or Caberfae, as the Mackenzie's banner was called, from the deer's head in the centre.

The old Jacobite ballad of Sheriffmuir, to the tune of

"We ran and they ran,"

was written by a clergyman of this name, the Rev. Murdoch MacIannan of Crathie in Braemar. He became minister of that parish in 1749, and died there 22d July 1783, in the 82d year of his age. An abridged version of it is inserted in Motherwell and Hogg's edition of the Works of Burns, vol. ii. page 164.

MACLEOD, the name of one of the most considerable clans of the western isles (badge, the red whortleberry), divided into two tribes independent of each other, the Macleods of Harris and the Macleods of Lewis. To the progenitors of this clan a Norwegian origin has commonly been assigned. They are also supposed to be of the same stock as the Campbells, according to a family history referred to by Mr. Skene, which dates no farther back than the early part of the 16th century.

The genealogy claimed for them asserts (see Douglas' Baronage, page 375) that the ancestor of the chiefs of the clan, and he who gave it its clan name, was Loyd or Leod, eldest son of King Olave the Black, brother of Magnus, the last king of Man and the Isles. This Leod is said to have had two sons: Tormod, progenitor of the Macleods of Harris, hence called the Siol Tormod, or race of Tormod; and Torquil, of those of Lewis, called the Siol Torquil, or race of Torquil. Although, however, Mr. Skene and others are of opinion that there is no authority whatever for such a descent, and "The Chronicle of Man" gives no countenance to it, we think the probabilities are in its favour, from the manifestly Norwegian names borne by the founders of the clan, namely, Tormod and Torquil, and from their position in the isles, from the very commencement of their known history. The clan itself, there can be no doubt, are the descendants of the ancient Gaelic inhabitants of the western isles.

Tormod, the son of the first Tormod, sided with Bruce, in the struggle for Scottish independence, and always remained faithful and loyal to him. His son, Malcolm, got a charter from David II., of two-thirds of Glenelg, on the mainland, a portion of the forfeited lands of the Bissets, in consideration for which the reddendum was to provide a galley of 36 oars, for the king's use whenever required. This is the earliest charter in possession of the Macleods. The same Malcolm obtained the lands in Skye which were long in possession of his descendants, by marriage with a daughter of MacArailt, said to have been one of the Norwegian nobles of the Isles. From the name, however, we would be inclined to take this MacArailt for a Celt. The sennachies sometimes made sad slips.

Macleod of Harris, originally designated "de Glenelg," that being the first and principal possession of the family, seems to have been the proper chief of the clan Leod. The island or rather peninsula of Harris, which is adjacent to Lewis, belonged, at an early period, to the Macruaries of Garmoran and the North Isles, under whom the chief of the Siol Tormod appears to have possessed it. From this family, the superiority of the North Isles passed to the Macdonalds of Isla by marriage, and thus Harris came to form a part of the lordship of the Isles. In the isle of Skye the Siol Tormod possessed the districts of Dunvegan, Duirinish, Bracadale, Lyndale, Trouterness, and Minganish, being about two-thirds of the whole island. Their principal seat was Dunvegan, hence the chief was often styled of that place.

The first charter of the Macleods of Lewis, or Siol Torquil, is also one by King David II. It is historically known that in 1369, the year before his death, that monarch proceeded in person, at the head of a formidable expedition, against the rebellious lord of the Isles, and compelled him and his vassal chiefs, at Inverness, to submit to his authority. One of the means employed by him on this occasion to effect that purpose, and to keep the rude northern chiefs to the obedience of the laws, was the promise of rewards and the bestowal of lands, on some of the principal of them. It is even said, (Fordun a Goodal, vol. ii. p. 380,) that he used artifice to divide them and induce them to slay or capture one another. Certain it is, that it was in this reign that the practice of bonds of manrent or friendship among the chiefs and nobles began. The charter referred to contained a royal grant to Torquil Macleod of the barony of Assynt, on the north-western coast of Sutherlandshire. This barony, however, he is said to have obtained by marriage with the heiress, whose name was Maenicol. It was held from the crown. In that charter he has no designation, hence it is thought that he had then no other property. The Lewis Macleods held that island as vassals of the Macdonalds of Isla from 1344, and soon came to rival the Harris branch of the Macleods in power and extent of territory, and even to dispute the chiefship with them. Their armorial bearings, however, were different, the family of Harris having a castle, while that of Lewis had a burning mount. The possessions of the Siol Torquil were very extensive, comprehending the isles of Lewis and Rasay, the district of Waterness in Skye, and those of Assynt, Cogeach, and Gerloch, on the mainland.

To return to the Harris branch. The grandson of the above-mentioned Malcolm, William Macleod, surnamed Ach-le-rach, or the clerk, from being in his youth designed for the church, was one of the most daring chiefs of his time. To avenge an insult which he had received, when young, from the Frasers, he had no sooner succeeded to his patrimony, than he ravaged the estate of Lovat in the Aird. Having afterwards incurred the resentment of his superior, the lord of the Isles, that powerful chief invaded his territory with a large force, but was defeated at a place called Lochsligachan, owing to a stratagem, and the greater military skill of the Macleod chief. His son, John, accompanied Donald of the Isles to the battle of Harlaw in 1411, and died in the beginning of the reign of James II. John's eldest son, William, in 1640, with Hugh Maedonald of Sleat, and "the young gentlemen of the Isles," ravaged the Orkneys. He was one of the principal supporters of the last lord of the Isles in his disputes with his turbulent and rebellious son, Angus, and was killed, in 1481, at the battle of the Bloody Bay, where also the eldest son of Roderick Macleod of the Lewis was mortally wounded. The son of William of Harris, Alexander Macleod, called Allaster Crottach, or the Humpbacked, was the head of the Siol Tormod at the time of the forfeiture of the lordship of the Isles in 1493, when Roderick, grandson of the above-named Roderick, was chief of the Siol Torquil. This Roderick's father, Torquil, the second son of the first Roderick, was the principal supporter of Donald Dubh, when he escaped from prison and raised the banner of insurrection in 1501, for the purpose of regaining the lordship of the Isles, for which he was forfeited. He married Katherine, daughter of the first earl of Argyle, the sister of Donald Dubh's mother. The forfeited estate of Lewis was restored in 1511 to Malcolm, Torquil's brother.

Alexander the Humpback got a charter, under the great seal, of all his lands in the Isles, from James IV., dated 13th June, 1498, under the condition of keeping in readiness for the king's use one ship of 26 oars and two of 16, which explains the appearance of the lymphad or oared galley in the armorial bearings of the Macleods and other island families. The right to the eyries or nests of falcons within his bounds was also reserved to the crown. He had also a charter from James V. of the lands of Glenelg, dated 13th February, 1539. The Macleods of Harris and Lewis joined the Macleans in supporting the claims of Sir Donald Maedonald of Lochalsh to the lordship of the Isles, but disgusted with Sir Donald's proceedings, they soon submitted to the government, and endeavoured to apprehend that chief. Although he escaped from them, his two brothers fell into their hands. With Maelean of Loehbuy, Alexander Macleod of Harris received a remission for himself and his followers, upon giving hostages. This was in 1517. In the following year the Macleods of Lewis and Rassy were with Sir Donald of Lochalsh when he defeated Maeian of Ardnanurchan, at Craigan-airgid, (or the Silver Craig,) in Morvern, the latter, with two of his sons, and a great number of his followers, being slain. With the Macdonalds of Sleat, the Harris Macleods had a feud regarding the lands and office of bailiary of Trouterness, now called Trotternish, in the isle of Skye, held by them under several crown charters. The feud was embittered by Macleod having also obtained a heritable grant of the lands of Sleat and North Uist; and the Siol Torquil, who had also some claim to the Trouterness bailiary and a portion of the lands, siding with the Macdonalds, the two leading branches of the Macleods came to be in opposition to each other. Under Donald Gruamach (that is, grim-looking) aided by the uterine brother of their chief, John MacTorquil Macleod, son of Torquil Macleod of the Lewis, forfeited in 1506, the Macdonalds succeeded in expelling Macleod of Harris or Dunvegan from Trouterness, as well as in preventing him from taking possession of Sleat and North Uist. The death of his uncle, Malcolm Macleod, and the minority of his son, enabled Torquil, with the assistance of Donald Gruamach, in his turn, to seize the whole barony of Lewis which, with the leadership of the Siol Torquil, he held during his life. His daughter and heiress married Donald Gorme of Sleat, a claimant for the lordship of the Isles, and the son and successor of Donald Gruamach. An agreement was entered into between Donald Gorme and Ruari or Roderick Macleod, son of Malcolm, the last lawful possessor of the Lewis, whereby Roderick was allowed to enter into possession of that island, and in return Roderick became bound to assist in putting Donald Gorme in possession of Trouterness, against all the efforts of the chief of Harris or Dunvegan, who had again obtained possession of that district. In May 1539, accordingly, Trouterness was invaded and laid waste by Donald Gorme and his allies of the Siol Torquil; but the death soon after of Donald Gorme, by an arrow wound in his foot, under the walls of Maekenzie of Kintail's castle of Ellandonan, put an end to his rebellion and his pretensions together. When the powerful fleet of James V. arrived at the isle of Lewis the following year, Roderick Macleod and his principal kinsmen met the king, and were made to accompany him in his farther progress through the Isles. On its reaching Skye, Alexander Macleod of Dunvegan was also constrained to embark in the royal fleet. With the other captive chiefs they were sent to Edinburgh, and only liberated on giving hostages for their obedience to the laws.

Alexander the Humpback, chief of the Harris Macleods, died at an advanced age in the reign of Queen Mary. He had three sons, William, Donald, and Tormod, who all succeeded to the estates and authority of their family. He had also two daughters, the elder of whom was thrice married, and every time to a Maedonald. Her first husband was James, second son of the fourth laird of Sleat. Her second was Alan MacIan, captain of the Clanranald, whose bad usage of her was the cause of a long subsisting feud between the Macleods and the Clanranald, which led to a dreadful catastrophe in the island of Eig, as afterwards related; and her third husband was Maedonald of Keppoch. The younger daughter became the wife of Maelean of Loehbuy.

William Macleod of Harris had a daughter, Mary, who, on his death in 1554, became, under a particular destination, his sole heiress in the estates of Harris, Dunvegan, and Glenelg. His claim to the properties of Sleat, Trouterness, and North Uist, of which he was the nominal proprietor, but which were held by the Clandonald, was inherited by his next brother and successor, Donald. This state of things placed the latter in a very anomalous position, which may be explained in Mr. Gregory's words: "The Siol Tormod," he says (History of the Highlands and Isles, p. 204), "was now placed in a position, which, though quite intelligible on the principles of feudal law, was totally opposed to the Celtic customs that still prevailed, to a great extent, throughout the Highlands and Isles. A female and a minor was the legal proprietrix of the ancient possessions of the tribe, which, by her marriage, might be conveyed to another and a hostile family; whilst her uncle, the natural leader of the clan according to ancient custom, was left without any means to keep up the dignity of a chief, or to support the clan against its enemies. His claims on the estates possessed by the Clandonald were worse than nugatory, as they threatened to involve him in a feud with that powerful and warlike tribe, in case he should take any steps to enforce them. In these circumstances, Donald Macleod seized, apparently with the consent of his clan, the estates which legally belonged to his niece, the heiress; and thus, in practice, the feudal law was made to yield to ancient and inveterate custom. Donald did not enjoy these estates long, being murdered in Trouterness, by a relation of his own, John Oig Macleod, who, failing Tormod, the only remaining brother of Donald, would have become the heir male of the family. John Oig next plotted the destruction of Tormod, who was at the time a student in the university of Glasgow; but in this he was foiled by the interposition of the earl of Argyle. He continued, notwithstanding, to retain possession of the estates of the heiress, and of the command of the clan, till his death in 1559." The heiress of Harris was one of Queen Mary's maids of honour, and the earl of Argyle, having ultimately become her guardian, she was given by him in marriage to his kinsman, Duncan Campbell, younger of Auchinbreck. Through the previous efforts of the earl, Tormod Macleod, on receiving a legal title to Harris and the other estates, renounced in favour of Argyle all his claims to the lands of the Clondonald, and paid 1,000 merks towards the dowry of his niece. He also gave his bond of service to Argyle for himself and his clan. Mary Macleod, in consequence, made a complete surrender to her uncle of her title to the lands of Harris, Dunvegan, and Glenelg, and Argyle obtained for him a crown charter of these estates, dated 4th August, 1579. Tormod adhered firmly to the interests of Queen Mary, and died in 1584. He was succeeded by his eldest son, William, under whom the Harris Macleods assisted the Macleans in their feuds with the Macdonalds of Isla and Skye, while the Lewis Macleods supported the latter. On his death in 1590, his brother, Roderick, the Rory Mor of tradition, became chief of the Harris Macleods. In 1595, he went with 500 of his clan to Ulster, to assist Red Hugh O'Donnell, at that time in rebellion against the queen of England. In 1601 he had a quarrel with Macdonald of Sleat, an account of which, with its results, has been already given, (see vol. ii. p. 714).

In December 1597, an act of the Estates had been passed, by which it was made imperative upon all the chieftains and landlords in the Highlands and Isles, to produce their title-deeds before the lords of Exchequer on the 15th of the following May, under the pain of forfeiture. The heads of the two branches of the Macleods disregarded the act, and a gift of their estates was granted to a number of Fife gentlemen, for the purposes of colonization. They first began with the Lewis, in which the experiment failed, as afterwards narrated. Roderick Macleod, on his part, exerted himself to get the forfeiture of his lands of Harris, Dunvegan, and Glenelg, removed, and ultimately succeeded, having obtained a remission from the king, dated 4th May, 1610. He was knighted by King James VI., by whom he was much esteemed, and had several friendly letters from his majesty; also, a particular license, dated 16th June, 1616, to go to London, to the court, at any time he pleased. In the Denmylne MS., in the Advocates' Library, there are various letters of Sir Roderick, principally concerning the escape of Sir James Macdonald of Isla in 1615. To ensure their obedience to the laws, the privy council had ordered the chiefs to appear before them once a-year, on the 10th July, or oftener if required, on being duly cited; and on the suppression of the rebellion of Sir James Macdonald, the same year, still more stringent regulations were adopted. They were compelled to exhibit each a certain number of their principal kinsmen, and were only to maintain in household certain proportions of gentlemen, according to their rank, Macleod being allowed six; they were also to reside at certain specified places on their estates. Various other conditions were imposed on them, the most important of which was one relating to the education of their children. The chiefs were required to send all their children above nine years of age to school in the Lowlands, to be instructed in reading, writing, and speaking the English language; and none could be served heirs to their fathers, or received as tenants to the king, until they had received that education. The very quantity of wine they were to use in their houses was regulated, Macleod's allotment being four tuns, and each chief was bound to take strict order throughout his whole estates that none of his tenants or vassals should buy or drink any wine. This last obligation proceeded on the narrative that "the great and extraordinary excess in drinking of wyne, commonlie usit among the commonis and tenants of the Yllis, is not only an occasion of the beastlie and barbarous cruelties and inhumanities that fallis oute amangis thame, to the offens and displeasour of God, and contempt of law and justice; hut with that it drawis numberis of thame to miserabile necessitie and povartie, sua that they are constraynit, quhen they want from their awne, to tak from thair nichtbours." Finding that this regulation, strict as it was, was evaded, the privy council in 1622 passed an act prohibiting masters of vessels, under the penalty of confiscation of the article, from carrying more wine to the Isles than the quantity allowed to the chiefs and gentlemen. In the preamble of this act the reason of this new regulation is thus stated:—"With the insatiable desyre quhairof the saidis Islanderis ar so far possessit, that, when thair aryvis ony schip or uther veschell there with wines, thay spend both dayes and nights in their excess of drinking sa lang as thair is anie of the wyne left; sna that, being overcome with drink, thair fallis oute many inconvenientis amangis thame, to the breck of his majesteis peace," &c. Sir Roderick died in the beginning of 1626. By his wife, a daughter of Macdonald of Glengarry, he had, with six daughters, five sons, viz. John, his heir; Sir Roderick, progenitor of the Macleods of Talisker; Sir Norman, of the Macleods of Bernera and Muiravonside; William, of the Macleods of Hamer; and Donald, of those of Grisernish.

The history of the Siol Torquil, or Lewis Macleods, as it approached its close, was most disastrous. Roderick, the chief of this branch in 1569, got involved in a deadly feud with the Mackenzies, which ended only with the destruction of his whole family. He had married a daughter of John Mackenzie of Kintail, and a son whom she bore, and who was named Torquil Connanach, from his residence among his mother's relations in Strathconnan, was disowned by him, on account of the alleged adultery of his mother with the breve or Celtic judge of the Lewis. She eloped with John Mac-Gillechallum of Rasay, a cousin of Roderick, and was, in consequence, divorced. He took for his second wife, in 1541, Barbara Stewart, daughter of Andrew Lord Avandale, and by this lady had a son, likewise named Torquil, and surnamed Oighre, or the Heir, to distinguish him from the other Torquil. About 1566, the former, with 200 attendants, was drowned in a tempest, when sailing from Lewis to Skye, and Torquil Connanach immediately took up arms to vindicate what he conceived to be his rights. In his pretensions he was supported by the Mackenzies. Roderick was apprehended and detained four years a prisoner in the castle of Stornoway. In his extremity that chief had sought the assistance of Donald Gorme or Macdonald of Sleat, who, with his sanction, took steps to procure his own recognition as heir of the line of Lewis, founding his claim on an alleged confession of Hugh Macleod, the breve of the island, that Torquil Connanach was in reality his son. But the feud between the Macdonalds and Mackenzies was put an end to by the mediation of the Regent Moray. Before being released from his captivity, the old chief was brought before the Regent Mar and his privy council, and compelled to resign his estate into the hands of the crown, taking a new destination of it to himself in liferent, and after his death to Torquil Connanach, as his son and heir apparent. On regaining his liberty, however, he revoked all that he had done when a prisoner, on the ground of coercion. This led to new commotions, and in 1576 both Roderick and Torquil were summoned to Edinburgh, and reconciled in presence of the privy council, when the latter was again acknowledged as heir apparent to the Lewis, and received as such the district of Cogeach and other lands. The old chief some time afterwards took for his third wife, a sister of Lauchlan Maclean of Dowart, and had by her two sons, named Torquil Dubh and Tormod. Having again disinherited Torquil Connanach, that young chief once more took up arms, and was supported by two illegitimate sons of Roderick, named Tormod Uigach and Murdoch, while three others, Donald, Rory Oig, and Neill, joined with their father. Tormod Uigach was slain by Donald Macleod, who was taken prisoner by Torquil Connanach, but he escaped and fled to his father in the Lewis. Donald, on his part, apprehended Murdoch, and delivered him to his father, who imprisoned him in the castle of Stornoway. Torquil Connanach immediately laid siege to it, and having taken it, released Murdoch. He then apprehended the old chief, Roderick Macleod, and killed a number of his men. All the charters and title deeds of the Lewis were carried off by Torquil, and handed over to the Mackenzies. The charge of the castle of Stornoway, with the chief a prisoner in it, was committed to John Macleod, the son of Torquil Connanach, but he was attacked by Rory Oig and killed, when Roderick Macleod was released, and possessed the island in peace during the remainder of his life.

On his death he was succeeded by his son Torquil Dubh, who married a sister of Sir Roderick Macleod of Harris. As Torquil Connanach was excluded, although he possessed the mainland estates and was acknowledged by government as the heir, the Mackenzies formed a design to purchase and conquer the Lewis, and assassinate Torquil Dubh, the chief in possession of it. Torquil Connanach had married his daughter to Roderick Mackenzie, the brother of Kenneth Mackenzie, afterwards Lord Kintail, to whom he had conveyed the Lewis by writing. The lands of Cogeach and Lochbroom were ravaged by Torquil Dubh, and as he could raise 700 or 800 men, he for some time was enabled to set his rival and the Mackenzies at defiance. To effect his ruin they made a complaint against him to the privy council, styling him "the usurper of Lewis," and as he disregarded a summons sent to him to appear and answer it, he was denounced a rebel. The breve of the Lewis having agreed, on the promise of a great reward, to put him to death, he went, we are told, in a galley, accompanied by the greater part of his tribe, the clan Mhic-Gille-Moir, toward the isle of Rasay, and in his course fell in with a Dutch ship partly laden with wine, which he compelled to follow him into the Lewis. On his arrival there, he invited Torquil Dubh and a party of his people to a banquet on board the Dutch vessel, but they had scarcely seated themselves when they were all apprehended, tied with cords, and carried to the country of the Mackenzies, into the presence of Lord Kintail, who ordered Torquil Dubh and his companions to be beheaded. This took place in July 1597. At the time of their execution, it is said, an earthquake happened, which struck terror into the minds of the executioners.

Torquil Dubh left three young sons, and their uncle, Neill, a bastard brother of their father, took, in their behalf, the command of the isle of Lewis. Their cause was also supported by the Macleods of Harris and the Macleans. The dissensions in the Lewis, followed by the forfeiture of that island, in consequence of the non-production of the title-deeds, as required by the act of the Estates of 1597, already mentioned, afforded the king an opportunity of carrying into effect a project he entertained for the improvement and civilization of that remote portion of his dominions. Accordingly, that island, the largest of the Hebrides, was granted to a company of Lowland adventurers, belonging principally to Fifeshire, who were led to join in the enterprise chiefly with the view to the northern fisheries, a most valuable, though then and long after a neglected branch of Scottish industry. In October 1599, with a force of about 600 soldiers, and artificers of all sorts, they landed at Stornoway, and immediately began to build. The men of Lewis, under Neill and Murdoch Macleod, the bastard uncles of the young chief, gave them all the opposition in their power, but unable to withstand the colonists, they at last yielded to them; and they, with inconsiderate haste, proceeded to expel the Macleods from their possessions. Burning with revenge, Murdoch put to sea with a fleet of small vessels peculiar to those islands, called berlings, and succeeded in intercepting Leirmonth of Baleomy, when on his return from the Lewis to Fife in his own vessel. Macleod immediately hanged all on board, but Leirmonth himself, who for six months was subjected to a very rigorous confinement, but ultimately liberated on promise of ransom, and died in the Orkneys on his way home.

Shortly afterwards, Murdoch Macleod quarrelled with his brother Neill, who betrayed him, for a reward, to the government, and he was, in consequence, hanged at St. Andrews. In the meantime the adventurers in the Lewis were surrounded and harassed by the people of the island, under Tormod Macleod, only surviving legitimate son of Old Roderick Macleod of the Lewis, assisted by Neill Macleod, who had not long continued in alliance with the colonists. At the head of a strong force, Tormod attacked and forced the camp of the adventurers, burnt the fort, killed many of their men, and at length forced the principal gentlemen to capitulate, the latter binding themselves to obtain a remission to the Macleods for all their past offences, and never to return to the Lewis. Two of their number were left as hostages, for the fulfilment of these conditions. This took place in 1601, and the promised remission being granted, the hostages, after being detained about eight months, were liberated. In the summer of 1605, the Lewis adventurers made another attempt to possess the island. On landing, they offered to Tormod Macleod, if he would submit, to convey him to London, and obtain his pardon from the king. To these proposals he agreed, but after his arrival at court, finding he was making progress in his majesty's favour, to prevent his procuring the recall of the grant of the Lewis, they obtained an order from the king to send Tormod down to Edinburgh, where he was imprisoned in the castle for ten years. He was afterwards allowed to go into the service of Maurice, prince of Orange, and he died in Holland. Neill Macleod, however, still held out, and assisted by the Macleods of Harris, the Macneills, and the Clanranald, annoyed the colonists so greatly by his attacks that they were, at length, induced to abandon the enterprise. Two years afterwards, namely, in 1607, the king gave a new grant of the island to Lord Balmerino, who, however, was soon after forfeited, Sir George Hay of Nethercliff, and Sir James Spens of Wormestoun. The two latter invaded the Lewis with a considerable force, but were soon, from the want of provisions, and the continued opposition of Neill Macleod, compelled to quit the island and disband their forces. The title to the Lewis having been acquired by Kenneth Mackenzie, Lord Kintail, (see page 19 of this volume,) he lost no time in taking possession of the island, expelling Neill Macleod, with his nephews, Malcolm, William, and Roderick, sons of Rory Oig, who, with about thirty others, took refuge on Berrisay, an insulated rock on the west coast of Lewis. Here they maintained themselves for nearly three years, but were at length driven from it by the Mackenzies. Neill surrendered to Roderick Macleod of Harris, who, on being charged, under pain of treason, to deliver him to the privy council at Edinburgh, gave him up, with his son, Donald. Neill was brought to trial, convicted, and executed, and is said to have died "very Christianlie," in April 1613. Donald, his son, was banished from Scotland, and died in Holland. Roderick and William, two of the sons of Rory Oig, were seized by the tutor of Kintail, and executed. Malcolm, the other son, apprehended at the same time, made his escape, and continued to harass the Mackenzies for years. He was prominently engaged in Sir James Macdonald's rebellion in 1615, and afterwards went to Flanders, but in 1616 was once more in the Lewis, where he killed two gentlemen of the Mackenzies. He subsequently went to Spain, whence he returned with Sir James Macdonald in 1620. In 1622 and 1626, commissions of fire and sword were granted to Lord Kintail and his clan against "Malcolm MacRuari Macleod." Nothing more is known of him.

On the extinction of the main line of the Lewis, the representation of the family devolved on the Macleods of Rasay, afterwards referred to. The title of Lord Macleod was the second title of the Mackenzies, earls of Cromarty.

In the civil wars, Sir Roderick Macleod of Harris, son of John, commonly called John Mor, supported the royal cause, and Charles I. was so sensible of his services that he wrote him a kind and friendly letter, dated at Durham, 2d May 1639, promising him his constant favour and protection. His eldest son, also named Roderick, acquired, from his honour, the surname of Roderick the Witty. Being a minor during the usurpation, the whole clan followed his uncle, Sir Roderick Macleod of Talisker and Sir Norman Macleod of Bernera. At that time the Macleods could bring into the field 700 men. At the battle of Worcester in 1651, the Macleods fought on the side of Charles II., and so great was the slaughter amongst them that it was agreed by the other clans that they should not engage in any other conflict until they had recovered their losses. The Harris estates were sequestered by Cromwell, but the chief of the Macleods was at last, in May 1655, admitted into the protection of the Commonwealth by General Monk, on his finding security for his peaceable behaviour under the penalty of £6,000 sterling, and paying a fine of £2,500. Both his uncles, however, were expressly excepted.

At the Revolution, Macleod of Macleod, which became the designation of the laird of Harris, as chief of the clan, was favourable to the cause of James VII., and a letter written to him by Viscount Dundee, dated Moy, June 23, 1689, giving an account of the preparations of the other chiefs, and of his own proceedings, and enclosing a letter from the exiled monarch to him, is printed in Browne's History of the Highlands. In 1715, the effective force of the Macleods was 1,000 men, and in 1745, 900. The chief, by the advice of President Forbes, did not join in the rebellion of that year, and so saved his estates, but many of his clansmen, burning with zeal for the cause of Prince Charles, fought in the ranks of the rebel army.

At page 47 it is mentioned that the bad treatment which a daughter of the chief of the Macleods experienced from her husband, the captain of the Clanranald, had caused them to take the first opportunity of inflicting a signal vengeance on the Macdonalds. The merciless act of Macleod, by which the entire population of an island was cut off at once, is described by Mr. Skene (Hist. of the Highlands, vol. ii. page 277), and is shortly thus. Towards the close of the 16th century, a small number of Macleods accidentally landed on the island of Eigg, and were hospitably received by the inhabitants. Offering, however, some incivilities to the young women of the island, they were by the male relatives of the latter bound hand and foot, thrown into a boat, and sent adrift. Being met and rescued by a party of their own clansmen, they were brought to Dunvegan, the residence of their chief, to whom they told their story. Instantly manning his galleys, Macleod hastened to Eigg. On desecrating his approach the islanders, with their wives and children, to the number of 200 persons, took refuge in a large cave, situated in a retired and secret place. Here for two days they remained undiscovered, but having unfortunately sent out a scout to see if the Macleods were gone, their retreat was detected, but they refused to surrender. A stream of water fell over the entrance to the cave, and partly concealed it. This Macleod caused to be turned from its course, and then ordered all the wood and other combustibles which could be found to be piled up around its mouth, and set fire to, when all within the cave were suffocated.

The Siol Tormod continued to possess Harris, Dunvegan, and Glenelg till near the close of the 18th century. The former and the latter estates have now passed into other hands. A considerable portion of Harris is the property of the earl of Dunmore, and many of its inhabitants have emigrated to Cape Breton and Canada. The climate of the island is said to be favourable to longevity. Martin, in his account of the Western Isles, says he knew several in Harris of 90 years of age. One Lady Macleod, who passed the most of her time here, lived to 103, had then a comely head of hair and good teeth, and enjoyed a perfect understanding till the week she died. Her son, Sir Norman Macleod, died at 96; and his grandson, Donald Macleod of Bernera, at 91. Glenelg became the property first of Charles Grant, Lord Glenelg, and afterwards of Mr. Baillie. From the family of Bernera, one of the principal branches of the Harris Macleods, sprung the Macleods of Luskinder, of which Sir William Macleod Bannatyne, a lord of session, was a cadet. For a brief memoir of him, see vol. i. p. 236.

The first of the house of Rasay, the proprietor of which is the representative and heir male of the Lewis branch of the Macleods, was Malcolm Garbh Macleod, the second son of Malcolm, 8th chief of the Lewis. In the reign of James V. he obtained from his father in patrimony the island of Rasay, which lies between Skye and the Ross-shire district of Applecross. In 1569 the whole of the Rasay family, except one infant, were barbarously massacred by one of their own kinsmen, under the following circumstances. John MacGillechallum Macleod of Rasay, called Ian na Tuaidh, or John with the axe, who had, as stated on p. 48, carried off Janet Mackenzie, the first wife of his chief, Roderick Macleod of the Lewis, married her, after her divorce, and had by her several sons and one daughter. The latter became the wife of Alexander Roy Mackenzie, a grandson of Hector or Echan Roy, the first of the Mackenzies of Gerloch, a marriage which gave great offence to his clan, the Siol vic Gillechallum, as the latter had long been at feud with that particular branch of the Mackenzies. On Janet Mackenzie's death, he of the axe married a sister of a kinsman of his own, Ruari Macallan Macleod, who from his venomous disposition was surnamed Nimhneach. The latter, to obtain Rasay for his nephew, his sister's son, resolved to cut off both his brother-in-law and his sons by the first marriage. He accordingly invited him to a feast in the island of Isay in Skye, and after it was over, he left the apartment. Then, causing them to be sent for one by one, he had each of them assassinated as they came out. He was, however, balked in his object, as Rasay became the property of Malcolm or Gillechallum Garbh Macallaster Macleod, then a child, belonging to the direct line of the Rasay branch, who was with his foster-father at the time. (Gregory's Highlands and Isles of Scotland, p. 211.)

The Macleods of Assynt, one of whom betrayed the great Montrose in 1650, were also a branch of the Macleods of Lewis. That estate, towards the end of the 17th century, became the property of the Mackenzies, and the family is now represented by Macleod of Geanies. The Macleods of Cadboll are cadets of those of Assynt.

There were two Gaelic poetesses of this name, Mary Macleod, born in Harris in 1569, and Flora Macleod, a native of Skye. The former, called Mairi Nighean Alasdair Ruadh, was the daughter of Alexander Macleod, son of Alasdair Ruadh, a descendant of the chief of the clan. This woman, a nurse in the family of her chief, was totally illiterate, yet she is considered the most original of all the Gaelic poets. She is said to have nursed five lairds of the Macleods, and two of the lairds of Applecross. Her first song was composed to please the children under her charge, and most of her poems are in praise of the Macleods. The chief, however, once banished her to the island of Mull, for giving publicity to one of her songs. In her exile she composed another poem, on which the Macleod sent a boat for her, but she was only allowed to return to Skye on condition that she made no more songs. Soon after, she composed a song on the illness of a son of the chief, which nearly caused her to be sent into exile again; but she saved herself by saying that "it was not a song, it was only a 'croon.'" The poetess of the Isles, as Mary Macleod was called, died at the advanced age of 105 years, and is buried in Harris. Specimens of her poems are given in Mackenzie's 'Beauties of Gaelic Poetry.' The Gaelic name of the other poetess, Flora Macleod, was Fionaghal Nighean Alasdair Ruadh. She lived in Trotternish, and was married. Her only poems appear to be a satire on the clan Macmartin and an elegy on Macleod of Dunvegan.

Hector Macleod, the South Uist bard, lived after 1745, in the districts of Arasaig and Morar.

MACLEOD, JOHN, surgeon of the Aleeste, was born about 1782 at Bonhill in Dumbartonshire. He entered the navy as a surgeon, and after several expeditions he accompanied the embassy to China under Lord Amherst. On his return he published, in 1818, an interesting description of the 'Voyage of the Aleeste, along the Coast of the Corea to the Island of Loo Choo; with an Account of her subsequent Shipwreck.' He died November 9, 1820.

MACNAB, the name of a clan anciently located in the district of Breadalbane, Perthshire, the badge of which was the common heath. The clan Anaba or the Macnabs are erroneously held to belong to the Old Celtic race, or primitive Alibionic stock of Scotland, which were among the clans included under the general denomination of Siol Alpin, of which the clan Gregor was the principal. The chief, styled Macnab of that ilk, had his residence at Kinnell, on the banks of the Dochart, and the family possessions, which originally were considerable, lay mainly on the western shores of Loch Tay. In the reign of David I. [1124—1153], the name was, it is said Macnab-Eyre, and signified the son and heir of the abbot. According, however, to the view taken in this work of the prefix Mac, as being no more than a contraction of magnus, great, this legend cannot be admitted, although it has been stated that the founder of this clan held the dignity of abbot of Glendochart.

From the frequent use of the words "of that ilk" in the charters of the family of Macnab, it would appear, notwithstanding the received tradition as to the derivation of the name, that the origin of it is territorial or from land. There is not an instance in Scottish history where the words "of that ilk" are employed, in which this is not the case. And if the form of the name be given correctly as Macnab-Eyre, the source of the territorial designation may with great probability be conjectured. The Gaelic word for heir is not Eyre, but Oighre. It is only an adaptation of its sound to the common English word heir, which is from the Latin word heres. The word ayre or aive, a term of frequent use in early Scottish annals for the site, rather occasional than permanent, of a court of justice, is a corruption of the Norman-French Oyer, to hear. Macnab-Eyre may, therefore, be held to mean the seat of justice, or justice-place, in the territory Macnab, and is so stated in the private histories of the family. Tradition points, however, at a priory where the burial place now is placed. Whether there ever was an abbot of Glendochart may well be doubted, yet there is every reason to believe that the abbots of Dunkeld held, as abthanes,—(that is, abbot-thanes, a secular title, defined by Ducange, as abbates qui simul erant Comites, see vol. i. page 16.)—justiciary power over this portion of Perthshire. It seems, therefore, at least probable that Macbeth-Eyre was the name given to the occasional seat of justice of some kind or other. The precise site of the lands bearing this particular name is now unknown, yet as in early times lands and districts received names from conspicuous natural objects lying in or near them, as Carrick, in Ayr, from the carrick or craig of Ailsa lying in the frith opposite to that district; so Macnab, the great Nah or Nob, may not improperly be held to mean the district around or near the mountain now called Benmore, (or great head,) which is conspicuous all along the glen of the Dochart, and very near its source. The occurrence of Nab in topography to designate a round-headed height or cone is familiar in Scotland and the north of England.

The Macnabs were a considerable clan before the reign of Alexander III. When Robert the Bruce commenced his struggle for the crown, the baron of Macnab, with his clan, joined the Macdougals of Lorn, and fought against Bruce at the battle of Dalree. Afterwards, when the cause of Bruce prevailed, the lands of the Macnabs were ravaged by his victorious troops, their houses burnt, and all their family writs destroyed. Of all their possessions only the barony of Bovan or Bovain, in Glendochart, remained to them, and of it, Gilbert Macnab of that ilk, from whom the line is usually deduced, as the first undoubted laird of Macnab, received from David II., on being reconciled to that monarch, a charter, under the great seal, to him and his heirs whomsoever, dated in 1336. He died in the reign of Robert II.

His son, Finlay Macnab, styled of Bovan, as well as "of that ilk," died in the reign of James I. He is said to have been a famous bard. According to tradition he composed one of the Gaelic poems which Macpherson attributed to Ossian. He was the father of Patrick Macnab of Bovain and of that ilk, whose son was named Finlay Macnab, after his grandfather. Indeed, Finlay appears to have been, at this time, a favourite name of the chief, as the next three lairds were so designated. Upon his father's resignation, he got a charter, under the great seal, in the reign of James III., of the lands of Ardhyle, and Wester Duinish, in the barony of Glendochart and county of Perth, dated January 1, 1486. He had also a charter from James IV., of the lands of Ewir and Leiragan, in the same barony, dated January 9, 1502. He died soon thereafter, leaving a son, Finlay Macnab, fifth laird of Macnab, who is witness in a charter, under the great seal, to Duncan Campbell of Glenorchy, wherein he is designed "Finlaus Macnab, dominus de eodem," &c., Sept. 18, 1511. He died about the close of the reign of James V.

His son, Finlay Macnab of Bovain and of that ilk, 6th chief from Gilbert, alienated or mortgaged a great portion of his lands to Campbell of Glenorchy, ancestor of the marquis of Breadalbane, as appears by a charter to "Colin Campbell of Glenorchy, his heirs and assignees whatever, according to the deed granted to him by Finlay Macnab of Bovain, 24th November, 1552, of all and sundry the lands of Bovain and Ardhyle, &c., confirmed by a charter under the great seal from Mary, dated 27th June, 1553." Glenorchy's right of superiority the Macnabs always refused to acknowledge.

His son, Finlay Macnab, the seventh laird, who lived in the reign of James VI., was the chief who entered into the bond of friendship and manrent with his cousin, Lauchlan Mackinnon of Strathordell, 12th July, 1606, quoted at page 28 of this volume. This chief carried on a deadly feud with the Neishes or M'Ilduys, a tribe which possessed the upper parts of Strathearn, and inhabited an island in the lower part of Loch Earn, called from them Neish island. Many battles were fought between them, with various success. The last was at Glenboultachan, about two miles north of Loch Earn foot, in which the Macnabs were victorious, and the Neishes cut off almost to a man. A small remnant of them, however, still lived in the island referred to, the head of which was an old man, who subsisted by plundering the people in the neighbourhood. One Christmas, the chief of the Macnabs had sent his servant to Crief for provisions, but, on his return, he was waylaid, and robbed of all his purchases. He went home, therefore, empty-handed, and told his tale to the laird. Macnab had twelve sons, all men of great strength, but one in particular exceedingly athletic, who was called for a byname, Iain mion Mac an Appa, or "Smooth John Macnab." In the evening, these men were gloomily meditating some signal revenge on their old enemies, when their father entered, and said in Gaelic, "The night is the night, if the lads were but lads!" Each man instantly started to his feet, and belted on his dirk, his claymore, and his pistols. Led by their brother John, they set out, taking a fishing-boat on their shoulders from Loch Tay, carrying it over the mountains and glens till they reached Loch Earn, where they launched it, and passed over to the island. All was silent in the habitation of Neish. Having all the boats at the island secured, they had gone to sleep without fear of surprise. Smooth John, with his foot dashed open the door of Neish's house; and the party, rushing in, attacked the unfortunate family, every one of whom was put to the sword, with the exception of one man and a boy, who concealed themselves under a bed. Carrying off the heads of the Neishes, and any plunder they could secure, the youths presented themselves to their father, while the piper struck up the pibroch of victory.

The next laird, "Smooth John," the son of this Finlay, made a distinguished figure in the reign of Charles I., and suffered many hardships on account of his attachment to the royal cause. After the battle of Alford in 1645, he joined the army of Montrose, with his clan, and was of great service to him at the battle of Kilsyth. He was subsequently directed by Montrose to garrison his castle of Kincardine, and he continued there until besieged by General Leslie, when, their provisions failing, he endeavoured, with 300 men, to make his escape, during the darkness of the night. Marching out, sword in hand, they all got off, except Macnab himself and one of his men, who were sent prisoners to Edinburgh. Macnab was condemned to death, but escaped the night previous to the day on which he was ordered for execution. He was killed at the battle of Worcester in 1651. During the commonwealth, his castle of Eilan Rowan was burned, his estates ravaged and sequestrated, and the family papers again lost. Taking advantage of the troubles of the times, his powerful neighbour, Campbell of Glenorchy, in the heart of whose possessions Macnab's lands were situated, on the pretence that he had sustained considerable losses from the clan Macnab, got possession of the estates in recompense thereof.

This chief of the Macnabs married a daughter of Campbell of Glenlyon, and with one daughter, had a son, Alexander Macnab, ninth laird, who was only four years old when his father was killed on Worcester battle-field. His mother and friends applied to General Monk for some relief from the family estates for herself and children. That general made a favourable report on the application, but it had no effect. It was directed to Captain Gascoigne, governor of Finlarig, and was in the following terms: "I do hereby declare, that it was not intended by my order for repairing the laird of Glenurchy's losses by the Macnabs out of their estates, that the same should extend to the molesting or intermeddling with the estates of any of the Macnabs who live peaceably. And forasmuch as I understand that the widow of the laird of Macnab hath lived peaceably, you are hereby authorized, and I desire, in case any vexation be offered to the outing or dispossessing of the said widow and her children of the said lands, or anything that belongs to them, under colour of the said order, to preserve the rights that to them belong, as if the said order had never been made, and to enter and receive them into their lands; and this favour also is to be extended for Archibald Macnab of Acharne. Given under my hand and seal at Dalkeith, 18th January, 1654. (Signed) S. S. George Monk." After the Restoration, application was made to the Scottish Estates, by the Lady Macnab and her son, for redress, and in 1661 they received a considerable portion of their lands, which the family enjoyed till the beginning of the present century, when they were sold.

By his wife, Elizabeth, a sister of Sir Alexander Menzies, of Weem, baronet, Alexander Macnab of that ilk had a son and heir, Robert Macnab, tenth laird, who married Anne Campbell, sister of the earl of Breadalbane. Of several children only two survived, John, who succeeded his father, and Archibald. The elder son, John, held a commission in the Black Watch, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Prestonpans, and, with several others, confined in Doune Castle, under the charge of Macgregor of Glengyle, where he remained till after the battle of Culloden. The majority of the clan took the side of the house of Stuart, and were led by Allister Macnab of Inshewan and Archibald Macnab of Acharne. They were mostly incorporated in the Duke of Perth's regiment, of which Alexander Macnab of Dundrum was the standard bearer. The others joined a body of Breadalbane men under the command of Campbell of Glenlyon. The younger son, Archibald, obtained in 1740 a commission as ensign in the Black Watch (now the 42d Highlanders), on its embodiment, and served in Germany with that regiment. In June 1745 he was appointed captain of Loudoun's Highlanders, and in 1757 he distinguished himself at the battle of Fellinghausen. Under General Wolfe, he was present at the battle of Quebec. He served also throughout the American revolutionary war, and on its termination was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-general, and appointed Colonel of the 41st Welsh Regiment. He died in Edinburgh in 1791, and was buried at Killin.

John Macnab, the 11th laird, married the only sister of Francis Buchanan, Esq. of Arnprior, and had a son, Francis, twelfth laird.

Francis, 12th laird, died, unmarried, at Callander, Perthshire, May 25, 1816, in his 82d year. One of the most eccentric men of his time, many anecdotes are related of his curious sayings and doings. He was a man of gigantic height and strong originality of character, and cherished many of the manners and ideas of a Highland gentleman, having in particular a high notion of the dignity of the chieftainship. He left numerous illegitimate children. There is a fine full-length portrait of him, in the uniform of lieutenant-colonel of the Breadalbane volunteers, by Sir Henry Raeburn, in the Breadalbane collection of paintings at Taymouth-castle.

The only portion of the property of the Macnabs remaining is the small islet of Innis-Buie, formed by the parting of the water of the Dochart just before it issues into Loch Tay, in which is the most ancient burial place of the family; and outside there are numerous gravestones of other members of the clan. The lands of the town of Callander chiefly belong to a descendant of this laird, not in marriage.

Archibald Macnab of Macnab, nephew of Francis, succeeded as 13th chief. The estates being considerably encumbered, he was obliged to sell the property for behoof of his creditors.

Many of the clan having emigrated to Canada about the beginning of the nineteenth century, and being very successful, 300 of those remaining in Scotland were induced about 1817 to try their fortunes in America, and in 1821, the chief himself, with some more of the clan, took their departure for Canada. He returned in 1853, and died at Lannion, Cotes du Nord, France, Aug. 12, 1860, aged 83. Subjoined is his portrait, from a daguerreotype taken at Saratoga, United States of America, in 1848:

He left a widow, and one surviving daughter, Sophia Frances.

The next Macnabs by descent entitled to the chieftainship are believed to be Sir Allan Napier Macnab, Bart., Canada; Dr. Robert Macnab, 5th Fusiliers, and Mr. John Macnab, Glenmavis, Bathgate.

The lairds of Macnab, previous to the reign of Charles I., intermarried with the families of Lord Gray of Kinfauns, Gleneagles, Inchbraco, Robertson of Strowan, &c.

The chief cadets of the family were the Macnabs of Dundurn, Acharne, Newton, Cowie, and Inchewen. Of one of the latter family the following exploit is related. In 1745, a party of soldiers, sent from the castle of Finlarig, (which means the field or plain of Fingal,) to burn the house of Coire Chaorach, near Benmore, were watched, on their march, by Macnab of Inchewen. After setting fire to the mansion, they commenced their return to Finlarig, when it was observed that the fire had gone out. One of them was ordered back to rekindle it, but was shot by Macnab from his place of concealment. On this, the rest of the party rushed down to the river, but other three fell victims by the way. Macnab then retreated to the rocks above, whence he fired, and killed three more of the redcoats. The others then gave up the pursuit. His rifle came into the possession of Mr. Sinclair, tenant in Inverchaggerine. It is four feet long, and in the stock there is a recess for a supply of bullets. It was at one time used by the Gaelic poet, Duncan M'Intyre, when one of the foresters of Lord Breadalbane, and is praised in his classic poem of 'Beinn Dourain.' Mr. Sinclair possessed also the celebrated bottle, long in use at Kinnell, which could hold nine gallons, and was known to many of Macnab's friends as 'the Bachelor.' (See New Statistical Account of Scotland, vol. x. page 1089.)

Sir Allan Napier Macnab is descended from the Dundurn branch. His grandfather, Robert Macnab of Dundurn, Perthshire, was cousin-german of John Macnab of Macnab, capt. 42d Highlanders. He married Mary Stuart of Ardvourich, and his eldest son, Allan Macnab, lieutenant 3d dragoons and principal aide-de-camp to General Simcoe, 1st governor of Upper Canada, married Anne, youngest daughter of Capt. William Napier, commissioner of the port of Quebec, of the family of Lord Napier, and had a son, Sir Allan Macnab, baronet of Dundurn-castle, Canada West, born Feb. 19, 1789; colonel of militia in Upper Canada, member and some time speaker of the legislative assembly of Upper and Lower Canada, and prime minister of that province; knighted July 14, 1838, for his efforts in putting an end to the rebellion there; created a baronet Feb. 5, 1858. Sir Allan married in 1821, Elizabeth, daughter of Lieutenant Daniel Brooke; issue a son, (born in 1822, died in 1824.) and a daughter. His wife having died in 1825, he married, 2dly, in 1831, Mary, eldest daughter of John Stuart, sheriff of Johnstown district, Upper Canada; issue, two daughters. The elder, Sophia, born July 5, 1832, married in 1855, William Coutts, Viscount Bury, M.P., eldest son of earl of Albemarle.

A branch of the family of Macnab settled in Jamaica.

MACNAGHTON, or MACNAUGHTON, the name of a clan of great antiquity in the West of Scotland (Argyleshire), the badge of which was the trailing azalia. The MS. of 1450 deduces the descent of the heads of this clan from Nachtan Mor, who is supposed to have lived in the 10th century. The Gaelic name Neachtain is the same as the Pictish Nectan, celebrated in the Pictish Chronicle as one of the great Celtic divisions in Scotland, and the appellation is among the most ancient in the north of Ireland, the original seat of the Cruthen Picts. The parish of Dunnichen, in Forfarshire, derived its name from the Gaelic dun, a hill, and the word Nechtan, the name of a Pictish chief who is traditionally reported to have resided in the parish. According to Buchanan of Auchmar, (History of the Origin of the Clans, p. 84.) the heads of this clan were for ages thanes of Loch Tay, and possessed all the country between the south side of Loch-Fyne and Lochawe, parts of which were Glenira, Glenshira, Glenfine, and other places, while their principal seat was Dunderraw on Loch-Fyne.

In the reign of Robert III., Maurice or Morice Macnaughton had a charter from Colin Campbell of Lochow of sundry lands in Over Lochow, but their first settlement in Argyleshire, in the central parts of which their lands latterly wholly lay, took place long before this. The Macnaughtons are said to have been originally a branch of the tribes of the province of Moray, when united under its maormors. (Skene's History of the Highlands, vol. ii. p. 201.) These maormors were the most powerful chiefs in Scotland during the middle ages. When Malcolm the Maiden attempted to civilize the ancient province of Moray, by introducing Norman and Saxon families, such as the Bissets, the Comyns, &c., in the place of the rude Celtic natives whom he had expatriated to the south, he gave lands in or near Strathtay or Strathspey, to Nachtan of Moray, for those he had held in that province. He had there a residence called Dunnachtan castle. Nisbet (Heraldry, vol. i. p. 419) describes this Nachtan as "an eminent man in the time of Malcolm IV.," and says that he "was in great esteem with the family of Lochawe, to whom he was very assistant in their wars with the Macdougals, for which he was rewarded with sundry lands." The family of Lochawe here mentioned were the Campbells.

The Macnaughtons appear to have been fairly and finally settled in Argyleshire previous to the reign of Alexander III., as Gilchrist Macnaughton, styled of that ilk, was by that monarch appointed in 1287, heritable keeper of his castle and island of Frechehan (Fraoch Ellan) on Lochawe, on condition that he should be properly entertained when he should pass that way, whence, a castle embattled was assumed as the crest of the family.

This Gilchrist was father or grandfather of Donald Macnaughton of that ilk, who being nearly connected with the Macdougals of Lorn, joined that powerful chief with his clan against Robert the Bruce, and fought against the latter at the battle of Dalree in 1306, in consequence of which he lost a great part of his estates. In Aberromby's 'Martial Achievements,' (vol. i. p. 577.) it is related that the extraordinary courage shown by the king in having, in a narrow pass, slain with his own hand several of his pursuers, and amongst the rest three brothers, so greatly excited the admiration of the chief of the Macnaughtons that he became thenceforth one of his firmest adherents.

His son and successor, Duncan Macnaughton of that ilk, was a steady and loyal subject to King David II., who, as a reward for his fidelity, conferred on his son, Alexander, lands in the island of Lewis, a portion of the forfeited possessions of John of the Isles, which the chiefs of the clan Naughton held for a time. The ruins of their castle of Macnaughton are still pointed out on that island.

Donald Macnaughton, a younger son of the family, was, in 1436, elected bishop of Dunkeld, in the reign of James I.

Alexander Macnaughton of that ilk, who lived in the beginning of the 16th century, was knighted by James IV., whom he accompanied to the disastrous field of Flodden, where he was slain with nearly the whole chivalry of Scotland. His son, John, was succeeded by his second son, Malcolm Macnaughton of Glenshira, his eldest son having predeceased him. Malcolm died in the end of the reign of James VI., and was succeeded by his eldest son, Alexander.

John, the second son of Malcolm, being of a handsome appearance, attracted the notice of King James VI., who appointed him one of his pages of honour, on his accession to the English crown. He became rich, and purchased lands in Kintyre. He was also sheriff-depute of Argyleshire. His elder brother, Alexander Macnaughton of that ilk, adhered firmly to the cause of Charles I., and in his service, like all who remained loyal to him, sustained many severe losses. At the Restoration, as some sort of compensation, he was knighted by Charles II., and, unlike many others, he received from that monarch a liberal pension for life. Sir Alexander Macnaughton spent his later years in London, where he died. His son and successor, John Macnaughton of that ilk, succeeded to an estate greatly burdened with debt, but did not hesitate in his adherence to the fallen fortunes of the Stuarts. At the head of a considerable body of his own clan, he joined the viscount Dundee, and was with him at Killiecrankie. James VII. signed a deed in his favour, restoring to his family all its old lands and hereditary rights, but, as it never passed the seals in Scotland, it was of less value than the paper on which it was written. His lands were taken from him, not by forfeiture, but "the estate," says Buchanan of Auchmar, "was evicted by creditors for sums noway equivalent to its value, and, there being no diligence used for relief thereof, it went out of the hands of the family." His son, Alexander, a captain in Queen Anne's guards, was killed in the expedition to Vigo in 1702. His brother, John, at the beginning of the last century was for many years collector of customs at Anstruther in Fife, and subsequently was appointed inspector-general in the same department. The direct male line of the Macnaughton chiefs became extinct at his death.

The chiefship is now in an Irish family, descended from Shane Dhu, grandson of Sir Alexander Macnaughton, slain at Flodden, who went to Ireland in 1580, as secretary to his kinsman, the 1st earl of Antrim, and settled there. His son Daniel Macnaughton, Esq., married Catherine, niece of the celebrated primate, George Dowdall, and their great-grandson, Edmund Alexander Macnaghten, Esq. of Beardville, born August 3, 1762, was M.P. for County Antrim, and a lord of the treasury. The clan Macnaughton elected this gentleman and his heirs to the chieftainship. At his decease in 1832, it descended with his family estates to his brother, Sir Francis Workman Macnaghten, born August 2, 1763, educated for the law, and knighted on being appointed a judge of the supreme court of judicature at Madras, in 1809. In 1815 he was transferred to that of Bengal, and in 1823 he assumed the additional surname and arms of Workman. He retired from the bench in 1825, and was created a baronet, July 16, 1836. He died Nov. 22, 1843. By his wife, the eldest daughter of Sir William Dunkin of Clogher, a judge of the supreme court of judicature, Calcutta, he had 6 sons and 10 daughters. Of the eldest son, in the following paragraph. The 2d son, William Hay, of the Bengal Civil Service, was created a baronet in 1839, and was assassinated at Cabul, Dec. 25, 1841. Stuart Macnaghten, the youngest son, born June 20, 1815, educated at Edinburgh and Trinity College, Dublin, (B.A. 1835), called to the bar at the Middle Temple, 1839; married in 1848, Agnes, daughter of James Eastmout, Esq. of St. Berners, near Edinburgh, and widow of Capt. Lewis Sheddin.

The eldest son, Sir Edmund Charles Workman Macnaghten, of Dunderave, Bushmills, county Antrim, 2d baronet, born April 1, 1790, M.P. for that county, 1847-1852, married in 1827, Mary, only child of Edward Gwatkin, Esq.; issue five sons, and two daughters. The sons are 1. Francis Edmund, major, 8th Hussars, born in 1828; 2. Edward, barrister-at-law; 3. William Henry, 1st Bengal light cavalry; 4. Fergus; 5. Edmund Charles. The family spell their name Maenaghten.

MACNEILL, the name of a clan of the Western isles, which, like the Macleods, consisted of two independent branches, the Macneills of Barra and the Macneills of Gigha, said to be descended from brothers. Their badge was the seaware, but they had different armorial bearings, and from this circumstance, joined to the fact that they were often opposed to each other in the clan fights of the period, and that the Christian names of the one, with the exception of Neill, were not used by the other, Mr. Gregory thinks the tradition of their common descent erroneous. Part of their possessions were completely separated, and situated at a considerable distance from the rest.

The clan Neill were among the secondary vassal tribes of the lords of the Isles, and its heads appear to have been of Norse or Danish origin. Buchanan of Auchmar styles them Irish Celts of the O'Neil tribe, and they are classed by Skene under the Sìol Gillebray, or race of Gillebride, surnamed king of the Isles, who lived in the 12th century, and derived his descent from a brother of Suibne, the ancestor of the Macdonalds.

About the beginning of the 15th century, the Macneills were a considerable clan in Knapdale, Argyleshire. As this district was not then included in the sheriffdom of Argyle, it is probable that their ancestor had consented to hold his lands of the crown.

The first of the family on record is Nigellus Og, who obtained from Robert Bruce a charter of some lands in Kintyre. His great-grandson, Gilleonan Roderick Muebard Macneill, in 1427, received from Alexander, lord of the Isles, a charter of that island, one of the Hebrides, eight miles long and two to four in breadth. In the same charter were included the lands of Boisdale in South Uist, which lies about eight miles distant from Barra. With John Garve Maclean he disputed the possession of that island, and was killed by him in Coll. His grandson, Gilleonan, took part with John, the old lord of the Isles, against his turbulent son, Angus, and fought on his side at the battle of the Bloody Bay, where he narrowly escaped falling into the hands of the victorious Clandonald. He was chief of this sept or division of the Macneills in 1493, at the forfeiture of the lordship of the Isles.

The Gigha Macneills are supposed to have sprung from Torquil Macneill, designated in his charter, "filius Nigelli," who, in the early part of the 15th century, received from the lord of the Isles a charter of the lands of Gigha and Taynish, with the constabulary of Castle Sweyn, in Knapdale. He had two sons, Neill his heir, and Hector, ancestor of the family of Taynish. Malcolm Macneill of Gigha, the son of Neill, who is first mentioned in 1478, was chief of this sept of the Macneills in 1493. After that period the Gigha branch followed the banner of Macdonald of Isla and Kintyre, while the Barra Macneills ranged themselves under that of Maclean of Dowart.

On the insurrection of the islanders, under Donald Dubh, in the beginning of the 16th century, Gilleonan Macneill of Barra was amongst the chiefs who, in 1504, were summoned to answer for their treasonable support given to the rebels, and the following year, when the Dowart Macleans sent in their submission to the government, the Macneills of Barra, as their followers, as a matter of course, did the same.

In 1545 Gilliganan Macneill of Barra was one of the barons and council of the Isles who accompanied Donald Dubh, styling himself lord of the Isles and earl of Ross, to Ireland, to swear allegiance to the king of England. His elder son, Roderick or Ruari Macneill, was killed at the battle of Glenlivet, by a shot from a fieldpiece, on 3d Oct. 1594. He left three sons, Roderick, his heir, called Ruari the turbulent, John, and Murdo. The two latter were among the eight hostages left by Maclean of Dowart, in 1586, in the hands of his brother-in-law, Macdonald of Dunyveg. During the memorable and most disastrous feud which happened between the Macleans and the Macdonalds at this period, and which has already been described, (see pp. 49, 41 of this volume,) the Barra Macneills and the Gigha branch of the same clan fought on different sides.

The Macneills of Barra were expert seamen, and did not scruple to act as pirates upon occasion. An English ship having been seized off the island of Barra, by Ruari the turbulent, Queen Elizabeth complained of this act of piracy. The laird of Barra was in consequence summoned to appear at Edinburgh, to answer for his conduct, but as the haughty and high-spirited chiefs of the remoter isles were, in those days, sometimes very apt to do, even with the king's citations, he treated the summons with contempt. All the attempts made to apprehend him proving unsuccessful, Mackenzie, tutor of Kintail, undertook to effect his capture by a stratagem frequently put in practice against the island chiefs when suspecting no hostile design. Under the pretence of a friendly visit, he arrived at Macneill's castle of Chisamil (pronounced Kisimul), the ruins of which stand on an insulated rock in Castlebay, on the south-east end of Barra, and invited him and all his attendants on board his vessel. There they were well plied with liquor, until they were all overpowered with it. The chief's followers were then sent on shore, while he himself was carried a prisoner to Edinburgh. Being put upon his trial, he confessed his seizure of the English ship, but pleaded in excuse that he thought himself bound by his loyalty to avenge, by every means in his power, the fate of his majesty's mother, so cruelly put to death by the queen of England. This politic answer procured his pardon, but his estate was forfeited, and given to the tutor of Kintail. The latter restored it to its owner, on condition of his holding it of him, and paying him sixty merks Scots, as a yearly feu duty. It had previously been held of the crown. Some time thereafter, Sir James Macdonald of Sleat married a daughter of the tutor of Kintail, who made over the superiority to his son-in-law, and it is now possessed by Lord Macdonald, the representative of the house of Sleat.

The old chief of Barra, Ruari the turbulent, had several sons by a lady of the family of Maclean, with whom, according to an ancient practice in the Highlands, he had handfasted, instead of marrying her. He afterwards married a sister of the captain of the Clanranald, and by her also he had sons. To exclude the senior family from the succession the captain of the Clanranald took the part of his nephews, whom he declared to be the only legitimate sons of the Barra chief. Having apprehended the eldest son of the first family, for having been concerned in the piratical seizure of a ship of Bourdeaux, he conveyed him to Edinburgh for trial, but he died there soon after. His brothers-german, in revenge, assisted by Maclean of Dowart, seized Neill Macneill, the eldest son of the second family, and sent him to Edinburgh, to be tried as an actor in the piracy of the same Bourdeaux ship, and thinking that their father was too partial to their half brothers, they also seized the old chief, and placed him in irons. Neill Macneill, called Weyslache, was found innocent and liberated through the influence of his uncle. Barra's elder sons, on being charged to exhibit their father before the privy council, refused, on which they were proclaimed rebels, and commission was given to the captain of the Clanranald against them. In consequence of these proceedings, which occurred about 1613, Clanranald was enabled to secure the peaceable succession of his nephew to the estate of Barra, on the death of his father, which happened soon after. (Gregory's Highlands and Isles, p. 346.)

The island of Barra and the adjacent isles are still possessed by the descendant and representative of the family of Macneill. Their feudal castle of Chisamul has been already mentioned. It is a building of an hexagonal form, strongly built, with a wall above thirty feet high, and anchorage for small vessels on every side of it. In one of its angles is a high square tower, on the top of which, at the corner immediately above the gate, is a hole, through which the gockman, or watchman, who sat there all night, threw down stones upon any who might attempt to surprise the gate in the darkness. Martin, who visited Barra in 1703, in his 'Description of the Western Islands,' says that the Highland Chronicle or sennachies alleged that the then chief of Barra was the 34th lineal descendant from the first Macneill who had held it. He relates that the inhabitants of this and the other islands belonging to Macneill were in the custom of applying to him for wives and husbands, when he named the persons most suitable for them, and gave them a bottle of strong waters for the marriage feast.

The chief of the Macneills of Gigha, in the first half of the 16th century, was Neill Macneill, who was killed, with many gentlemen of his tribe, in 1530, in a feud with Allan Maclean of Torlusk, called Alein nan Sop, brother of Maclean of Dowart. His only daughter, Anabella, made over the lands of Gigha to her natural brother, Neill. The latter was present, on the English side, at the battle of Ancrum-Moor, in 1544, but it is uncertain whether he was there as an ambassador from the lord of the Isles, or fought in the English ranks at the head of his clansmen. He sold Gigha to James Macdonald of Isla in 1554, and died without legitimate issue in the latter part of the reign of Queen Mary.

On the extinction of the direct male line, Neill Macneill vic Eachan, who had obtained the lands of Taynish, became heir male of the family. His descendant, Hector Macneill of Taynish, purchased in 1590, the island of Gigha from John Campbell of Calder, who had acquired it from Macdonald of Isla, so that it again became the property of a Macneill. The estates of Gigha and Taynish were possessed by his descendants till 1780, when the former was sold to Macneill of Colonsay, a cadet of the family.

The representative of the male line of the Macneills of Taynish and Gigha, Roger Hamilton Macneill of Taynish, married Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Hamilton Price, Esq. of Raploch, Lanarkshire, with whom he got that estate, and assumed, in consequence, the name of Hamilton. His descendants are now designated of Raploch.

The principal cadets of the Gigha Macneills, besides the Taynish family, were those of Gallochallie, Carskeay, and Tirfergus. Torquill, a younger son of Lachlan Macneill Buy of Tirfergus, acquired the estate of Ugadale in Argyleshire, by marriage with the heiress of the Mackays in the end of the 17th century. The present proprietor spells his name Macneal. From Malcolm Beg Macneill, celebrated in Highland tradition for his extraordinary prowess and great strength, son of John Oig Macneill of Gallochallie, in the reign of James VI., sprung the Macneills of Arichonan. Malcolm's only son, Neill Oig, had two sons, John, who succeeded him, and Donald Macneill of Crerar, ancestor of the Macneills of Colonsay, now the possessors of Gigha. Many cadets of the Macneills of Gigha settled in the north of Ireland.

Both branches of the clan Neill laid claim to the chiefship. According to tradition, it has belonged, since the middle of the 16th century, to the house of Barra. Under the date of 1550, a letter appears in the register of the privy council, addressed to "Torkill Macneill, chief and principal of the clan and surname of Macnelis." Mr. Skene conjectures this Torkill to have been the hereditary keeper of Castle Sweyn, and connected with neither branch of the Macneills. He is said, however, to have been the brother of Neill Macneill of Gigha, killed in 1530, as above mentioned, and to have, on his brother's death, obtained a grant of the non-entries of Gigha as representative of the family. If this be correct, according to the above designation, the chiefship was in the Gigha line. Torquill appears to have died without leaving any direct succession.

The first of the family of Colonsay, Donald Macneill of Crerar in South Knapdale, exchanged that estate in 1700, with the duke of Argyle, for the islands of Colonsay and Oronsay. The old possessors of these two islands, which are only separated by a narrow sound, dry at low water, were the Macduffies or Macphies (see MACPHIE). Donald's great-grandson, Archibald Macneill of Colonsay, sold that island to his cousin, John Macneill, who married Hester, daughter of Duncan Macneill of Dunmore, and had six sons. His eldest son, Alexander, younger of Colonsay, became the purchaser of Gigha. Two of his other sons, Duncan and Sir John Macneill, have distinguished themselves, the one as a lawyer and judge, and the other as a diplomatist.

Duncan, the second son, born in Colonsay in 1794, after being educated at the universities of St. Andrews and Edinburgh, was admitted advocate at the Scottish bar in 1816. In 1824 he was appointed sheriff of Perthshire, and in November 1834, solicitor-general for Scotland, which office he held till the following April, and again from September 1841 to October 1842. At the latter date he was appointed lord-advocate, and continued so till July 1846. He was elected dean of the faculty of advocates, and in May 1851 was raised to the bench as a lord of session and justiciary, when he assumed the title of Lord Colonsay. In May 1852 he was appointed lord-justice-general and president of the court of session, and in the following year was sworn in a privy councillor. He was M.P. for Argyleshire from 1843 to 1851.

Sir John Macneill, G.C.B., and F.R.S.E., the third son, was born at Colonsay in 1795, and in his 19th year graduated M.D. at the university of Edinburgh. He practised for some time in the East, as a physician, and in 1831 was appointed assistant envoy at the court of Persia. In 1834 he became secretary of the embassy, and received the Persian order of the Lion and Sun, and in June 1836 was appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to that court. In 1839 he was created a civil knight grand cross of the order of the Bath. During his residence in Persia he became thoroughly acquainted with the habits, policy, and resources of the Asiatic nations; and was enabled, even at that period, to point out the aggressive designs of Russia with singular penetration and ability. In 1844 he returned home, and soon after he was placed at the head of the board appointed to superintend the working of the new Scottish Poor law act of 1845. In 1851 he conducted a special inquiry into the condition of the Western Highlands and Islands. In February 1855 he was chosen by the government of Lord Palmerston to preside over the commission of Inquiry into the administration of the supplies of the army in the Crimea. In 1857, he was sworn of the privy council, and on April 22, 1861, he received the degree of LL.D. from the University of Edinburgh. He is also Doctor of Civil Law in the University of Oxford.

MACNEIL, HECTOR, a popular poet and song-writer, descended from a respectable family in the West Highlands, was born October 22, 1746, at Rosebank, on the Esk, near Roslin, Mid Lothian, where his father, at one period an officer in the army, had taken a farm. He was educated at the grammar school of Stirling, under Dr. David Doig, to whom he dedicated his 'Will and Jean.' He subsequently attended some classes at Glasgow, in the higher branches of education. At the age of 14 he went to Bristol, to a cousin, formerly a West Indian captain, who sent him on a voyage to the island of St. Christopher's, furnished with a letter to a mercantile house there. On his arrival, he obtained a situation in the counting-house of the merchant to whom he had been recommended, but having forgot himself so far as to snatch a kiss from the wife of his employer, one day while reading in the garden with her, he was soon dismissed. He remained for many years in the West Indies, but never could rise above subordinate situations. During this period, it is said, he was employed as a negro-driver, and in 1788 he published a pamphlet in defence of the system of slavery in the West Indies, which was for ever abolished by the Emancipation act of 1830.

When upwards of forty years of age, Macneil returned to Scotland in bad health and in anything but prosperous circumstances. He had, when a boy of eleven years of age, written a species of drama, in imitation of Gay, but his poetical powers seem to have been allowed to remain almost dormant during his long and struggling career in the West Indies. He now, however, began "to give the world assurance" of his possessing "the vision and the faculty divine," by publishing, in the spring of 1789, 'The Harp, a Legendary Tale, in two parts,' which brought him into favourable notice in literary society, but added nothing to his income.

Having no prospect of employment in his native country, he again quitted it, but this time for the East Indies. Disappointed, however, in his expectations there, he soon returned to Scotland, and took up his abode in a cottage near St. Ninians, in the immediate neighbourhood of Stirling. During his sojourn in the East, he visited the celebrated caves of Elephanta, Cannara, and Ambola, of which a detailed account written by him, was published in the eighth volume of the Archæologia. He afterwards wrote a number of love songs in the Scottish language, which speedily became favourites with all classes. Of these, his 'Mary of Castlecary,' 'I loo'd ne'er a laddie but ane,' 'Come under my plaidie,' and others, nearly all of a dramatic nature and in the dialogue form, are familiar to all lovers of Scottish song.

In 1795 appeared his principal poem, 'Scotland's Skaith, or the History of Will and Jean, ower true a tale,' the object of which was to exhibit the evils attendant on an inordinate use of ardent spirits, in the story of a once industrious rustic and his wife reduced through intemperance to poverty and distress; and so great was its popularity that in less than twelve months it had passed through fourteen editions. It was followed in the ensuing year, by a sequel, entitled 'The Waes o' War.' All his pieces are in the Scottish dialect.

In consequence of continued bad health, in 1796, with the hope of deriving benefit from a tropical climate, to which he had been so long used, and also of bettering his circumstances, he was induced to go out to Jamaica, and on the eve of his departure composed his descriptive poem, entitled 'The Links of Forth, or a parting Peep at the Carse of Stirling,' which was published in 1799. At Jamaica he remained for a year and a half, residing with Mr. John Graham of Three-Mile-River, where he wrote 'The Scottish Muse,' which appeared in 1809. On the death of that gentleman he left Macneil an annuity of £100.

In 1800 Macneil returned to Scotland, and having now a competence and leisure to attend to literary pursuits, he took up his abode at Edinburgh, where he mixed in good society. The same year he published, anonymously, a novel, entitled 'The Memoirs of Charles Macpherson,' which is understood to contain an account of his own early career. Soon after, he set about preparing a complete collection of his poetical works, which appeared in two volumes, in 1801. He next published two works in verse, entitled 'Town Fashions, or Modern Manners Delincated,' and 'Bygone Times and Late-come Changes,' and in 1812, a novel in two volumes, styled 'The Scottish Adventurers, or the Way to Rise,' in all of which he eulogises the manners and habits of past times, in preference to what he deemed modern innovations and corruptions. Many minor pieces he inserted in the Scots Magazine, of which he was at one time editor. He died at Edinburgh of jaundice, 15th March 1818. The statement in Chambers' 'Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen,' that he was in such destitute circumstances at the time of his death that he did not leave "wherewithal to defray his funeral expenses," is not correct.

The portrait of Mr. Macneil is subjoined :

He is described, towards the close of his life, as having been a tall, fine-looking old man, with a very sallow complexion, and a dignified and somewhat austere expression of countenance. Like all persons who have made poetry their profession, and felt the struggles and privations attendant on the exclusive service of the muses, he invariably warned all young aspirants for poetic fame against embarking in the precarious occupation of authorship. His works are :

MACNICOL, the name of a small but 'broken' tribe or clan originally belonging to Ross-shire, but latterly located in the island of Skye. They were descended from one Mackrycul, (the letter r in the Gaelic being invariably pronounced like n,) who, as a reward for having rescued from some Scandinavians a great quantity of cattle carried off from Sutherland, received from one of the ancient thanes of that province, the district of Assynt, then a forest belonging to them. This Mackrycul held that part of the coast of Cogeach, which is called Ullapool. In the MS. of 1450, the descent of the clan Nicail is traced in a direct line from a certain Gregall, plainly the Krycul here mentioned, who is supposed to have lived in the twelfth century. This descent is corroborated by the tradition of the country, as stated in the account of the parish of Assynt in the New Statistical Account of Scotland (vol. xv. p. 109). He is said to have been the ancestor, besides the Macnicols, of the Nicols, and the Nicholsons. When Gregall lived, Sutherland was occupied by Gaelic tribes, and the Macnicols may therefore be considered of Gaelic origin.

About the beginning of the 14th century, the family of the chief ended in an heiress, who married Torquil Macleod, a younger son of Macleod of Lewis. Macleod obtained a crown charter of the district of Assynt and other lands in Wester Ross, which had been the property of the Macnicols. That sept subsequently removed to the Isle of Skye, and the residence of their head or chief was at Scoirebrac, on the margin of the loch near Portree. There were fourteen successive lairds of Assynt of the name of Macleod. The last of them was the one through whose means the great marquis of Montrose, when apprehended in Assynt, was delivered up to his enemies, then at the head of the government in Scotland. Montrose offered Macleod a large sum of money for his liberty, which he refused, and the loss of his property, with the ruin of his family, happening soon after, was deemed by the inhabitants of the district a just judgment upon him for having been the cause of that chivalrous nobleman's capture and execution.

Even after their removal to Skye the Macnicols seem to have retained their independence, for tradition relates that on one occasion when the head of this clan, called Macnicol Mor, was engaged in a warm discussion with Macleod of Rasay, carried on in the English language, the servant of the latter coming into the room, imagined they were quarrelling, and drawing his sword mortally wounded Macnicol. To prevent a feud between the two septs, a council of chiefs and elders was held to determine in what manner the Macnicols could be appeased, when, upon some old precedent, it was agreed that the meanest person in the clan Nicol should behead the laird of Rasay. The individual of least note among them was one Lomach, a maker of pannier baskets, and he accordingly cut off the head of Rasay at Snizort.

At a Highland banquet, towards the end of the last century, a call was made for the bards to be brought to the upper end of the room, on which Macnicol of Scoirebreac exclaimed, "The bards are extinct." "No," quickly replied Alastair Buy Mac Ivor, "but those who delighted to patronize them are gone."

In Argyshire there were many Macnicols, but the clan may be said to have long been extinct.

MACNISH, ROBERT, LL.D., a popular writer, known in his lifetime as "The modern Pythagorean," the son of a medical practitioner in Glasgow, was born in Henderson's Court, Jamaica Street, of that city, February 15, 1802. He received the elements of his education partly in his native town, and partly at a classical academy at Hamilton, about eleven miles from it, and afterwards studied medicine. He obtained the degree of master of surgery at the early age of eighteen, when he became assistant to Dr. Henderson of Clyth at Caithness. He remained there for about eighteen months, and then went to Paris for a year, with the view of completing his medical studies. On his return to Glasgow in 1825, he became assistant to his father, having, the same year, obtained his diploma from the faculty of physicians and surgeons of Glasgow, when he gave in, as his inaugural thesis, 'An Essay on the Anatomy of Drunkenness.' Two years afterwards, that is, in 1827, this essay, extended and improved, was published at Glasgow, when it formed a thin octavo of 56 pages. It met with a very flattering reception from the public, and was still farther enlarged in subsequent editions. Translations of it have appeared in the German and French languages.

Dr. Macnish's earliest literary attempts were contributed to the 'Inverness Journal,' when he was in the north, and afterwards to the 'Literary Melange,' and 'The Emmet,' two Glasgow periodicals of humble pretensions. In 1822 he sent two contributions to Constable's Edinburgh Magazine, the one entitled 'MacVurich the Murderer,' and the other 'The Dream Confirmed,' both founded on incidents which he had picked up in the Highlands. In 1826 he forwarded his first communication to 'Blackwood's Magazine,' being a tale, entitled 'The Metempsychosis.' It appeared with the signature of 'A Modern Pythagorean,' the name affixed to all his after productions in that and other magazines. In 1827 he became acquainted with Dr. Moir of Musselburgh, afterwards his biographer.

In 1830, Dr. Macnish published at Glasgow a treatise, entitled 'The Philosophy of Sleep,' which was equally well received with his former work, and also went through several editions. In 1834 appeared 'The Book of Aphorisms,' some of which had originally been contributed to Fraser's Magazine. The same year he visited the continent, and in the following year he made a tour in Belgium and Holland, France, Switzerland, and Germany.

His last publication was a small treatise in 1835, entitled an 'Introduction to Phrenology,' to which science he had become a convert. From Hamilton college, United States, he, at this time, received the degree of LL.D. He died of typhus fever, January 16, 1837, in his 35th year. His Tales, Essays, and Sketches, were published at Edinburgh, in two volumes, in 1838, under the title of the 'Modern Pythagorean,' with a memoir of the author, by his friend, Dr. Moir of Musselburgh, the Delta of Blackwood's Magazine.

MACONOCHE, a surname derived from the Gaelic Maconochie, the son of Duncan. The Maconochies of Meadowbank, Mid Lothian, the principal family of the name, are descendants of the Campbells of Inverawe, Argyshire, the first of whom was Duncan Campbell, eldest son of Sir Neil Campbell of Lochow, ancestor of the ducal house of Argy, by his 2d wife, a daughter of Sir John Cameron of Lochiel. The eldest son of that marriage, Duncan Campbell, obtained a grant of Inverawe and Cruachan from David II. in 1330. His eldest son was named Dougal, after his mother's family, and Dougal's eldest son Duncan was called in the Highlands Mac Douill Vic Conochie. He named his son also Duncan, who was thus Maconochie Vic Conochie, the son and grandson of Conochie, or Duncan. Maconochie, from that period, became the patronymic appellation of each succeeding Campbell of Inverawe, while the cadets of the family still bore the name of Campbell.

From the Campbells of Inverawe sprung the Campbells of Shirwan, Kilmartin, and Cruacban.

In 1660, Dougall Campbell, or, as he was called, the Maconochie of Inverraugh, engaged in the rebellion of the marquis of Argyle, in whose armament of the clan Campbell he held the rank of major. He was tried with the marquis in 1661 and attainted. He was soon afterwards executed at Carlisle.

After the Revolution of 1688, Dougall's son, James Maconochie, who, at his father's death, was little more than nine years old, applied to government for the restoration of the Argyleshire property, which had got into the possession of an uncle, but was unsuccessful. From King William III., however, he obtained a grant in compensation, which he invested in the purchase of the lands of Kirknewton, in the muir now called Meadowbank, Mid Lothian, which his descendant still possesses, and, adopting Lowland customs, all the family took the name of Maconochie. His only son, Alexander Maconochie, was a writer in Edinburgh. The son of the latter, Allan Maconochie, a celebrated lawyer, born January 26, 1748, died June 14, 1816, was a lord of session and justiciary, under the title of Lord Meadowbank, being appointed to the former in 1796, and to the latter in 1804. While attending the university of Edinburgh, he was one of the five students who originated the Speculative Society, and was afterwards for some time Professor of the Laws of Nature and Nations in that university. He was the author of a pamphlet entitled 'Considerations on the Introduction of Trial by Jury in Scotland,' and in 1815, when the Scottish jury court was instituted, he was appointed one of the lords commissioners. He is said to have been the inventor of moss manure, now extensively employed in various counties of Scotland, and printed for private distribution a tract on the subject. He married Elizabeth, third daughter of Robert Wellwood, Esq., of Garvoek, by whom he had issue.

His eldest son, Alexander Maconochie, passed advocate in 1799, and after being sheriff-depute of the county of Haddington 1810, solicitor-general 1813, and lord-advocate 1816, was appointed a lord of session and justiciary in 1819, when he also took the title of Lord Meadowbank. He resigned in 1841, and died Nov. 30, 1861. On the death of his cousin, Robert Scott Welwood, he succeeded to the entailed estates of Garvoek and Pittiver, in the county of Fife, and assumed the name of Welwood of Garvoek (see Welwood). He married Anne, eldest daughter of Lord-president Blair; issue, with 5 daughters, 4 sons, viz.—1. Allan Alexander Maconochie, LL.D., born in 1806, passed advocate in 1829, and in 1842 appointed professor of civil law and the law of Scotland in the university of Glasgow. 2. Robert Blair, writer to the signet. 3. William Maximilian George. 4. Henry Dundas.

MACPHERSON, the name of one of the two principal branches of the clan Chattan, the badge of which was the box evergreen. In the Celtic the Macphersons are called the clan Muirich or Muirich, from an ancestor of that name, who, in the Gaelic MS. of 1450, is said to have been the "son of Swen, son of Heth, son of Nachtan, son of Gillichattan, from whom came the clan Chattan." The word Gillichattan means a votary or servant of St. Kattan, a Scottish saint, as Gillichrist means a servant of Christ; hence Gilchrist.

The descent of the heads of the Macphersons from the ancient chiefs of the clan Chattan has been unbroken, and tradition is uniformly in favour of their right to the chiefship of the whole clan. The claim of the Macintoshes, the other principal branch of the clan Chattan, to the chiefship has been already disposed of (see vol. ii. p. 744 et seq.). Their own traditional story of their descent from Macduff, thane of Fife, is extremely improbable, and if it were true, it would prove that they were not a branch of the clan Chattan at all. On their own showing, they obtained the chiefship by marriage, and that from the head of the Macphersons, whom they acknowledge to have been at one period chief of the clan Chattan. The rule of clanship excludes females from the succession, and the heir male, not the heir of line, became chief of the clan Chattan.

It was from Muirich or Murdoch, who succeeded to the chiefship in 1153, that the Macphersons derive the name of the clan Muirich or Vuirich. This Muirich was parson of Kingussie, a religious establishment in the lower part of Badenoch, and the surname, properly Macphersain, was given to his descendants from his office. He was the great-grandson of Gillichattan Mor, the founder of the clan, who lived in the reign of Malcolm Canmore, and having married, on a papal dispensation, a daughter of the thane of Calder, he had five sons. The eldest, Gillichattan, the third of the name, and chief of the clan in the reign of Alexander II., was father of Dougal Dall, the chief whose daughter Eva married Angus Macintosh of Macintosh. On Dougal Dall's death, as he had no sons, the representation of the family devolved on his cousin and heir male, Kenneth, eldest son of Eoghen or Ewen Baan, second son of Muirich. Neill Chrom, so called from his stooping shoulders, Muirich's third son, was a great artificer in iron, and took the name of Smith from his trade. Ferquhard Gilliriach, or the swift, the fourth son, is said to have been the progenitor of the MacGillivrays, who followed the Macintosh branch of the clan Chattan, and from David Dubh, or the Swarthy, the youngest of Muirich's sons, were descended the clan Dhai, or Davidsons of Invernahavon.

The portion of the clan Chattan who adhered to Kenneth settled in Badenoch. Kenneth's son, Duncan Macpherson of Cluny, lived in the reign of Robert the Bruce, and fought on his side, at the head of his clan, at Bannockburn. He received a commission to expel the Comyns from Badenoch, and on their forfeiture he obtained, for his services, a grant of their lands. He was also allowed to add a hand holding a dagger to his armorial bearings. His grandson, Donald Mor Macpherson, was chief in 1386, when a battle took place at Invernahavon between the clan Chattan and the Camerons, in which a great number of the former were killed, and the latter were nearly cut off to a man. The laird of Macintosh having carried away the cattle of the Camerons, at different times, on account of the nonpayment of their rents, for the lands held of him in Lochaber, they marched into Badenoch to the number of 400, resolved upon reprisals. To oppose them Macintosh collected his followers, and called the Macphersons and Davidsons to his aid. A dispute about precedence greatly weakened his force, and gave the Camerons the advantage. The command of the right wing was claimed both by Cluny and Davidson of Invernahavon, the leader of the Davidsons, the former as chief of the clan Chattan, and the latter as the head of the eldest branch. Macintosh decided against Cluny, on which the Macphersons withdrew from the field. In the conflict that ensued, many of the Macintoshes and nearly all the Davidsons were slain. The Macphersons, seeing this, forgot their wounded pride, and next day attacking the Camerons, defeated them with great loss, their leader being among the killed. It is the opinion of some writers, and among the rest of Shaw, the historian of Moray, that this quarrel about precedence was the origin of the celebrated judicial combat on the North Inch of Perth in 1396, which has already been described under the head MACINTOSH, and that the parties were the Macphersons, properly the clan Chattan, and the Davidsons, called in the Gaelic Clann Dhaibhidh, or Dhai' (the last syllable being silent), pronounced Clan Chai. These rival tribes, we are told, for a long period bore a deadly enmity at one another, which was difficult to be restrained; but after the award by Macintosh, at the battle with the Camerons, against the Macphersons, open strife broke out between them, and for ten years the Macphersons and the Davidsons carried on a war of extermination, which was only put an end to by the victory of the Macphersons at Perth.

The Macphersons were staunch adherents of Queen Mary in her troubles. By the intrigues of the earl of Huntly, lord of Badenoch, (the crown having bestowed that district on his predecessor in 1452,) a final separation took place between the two principal branches of the clan Chattan about 1593. At their head he had maintained a fierce warfare with the western clans and his neighbours of Lochaber, but it was now his policy to divide their force and turn the one against the other. This he did by courting the Macphersons, who readily entered into his views, and by his encouragement and influence they declared themselves independent, and asserted their right to the chiefship, which the Macintoshes, as the more numerous party, had claimed for centuries. In the following year the Macphersons joined that nobleman, when the youthful earl of Argyll, at the head of the royal army, marched against him and the other two Catholic earls. Entering Badenoch, Argyll laid siege to the castle of Ruthven, which was so gallantly defended by the Macphersons that he was obliged to abandon the siege. John, chief of the Macphersons, fought under Huntly's banner at the battle of Glenlivet which followed.

In 1609 the chief of the Macphersons signed a bond, along with all the other branches of that extensive tribe, acknowledging Macintosh as captain of the clan Chattan; and in all the contentions and feuds in which the Macintoshes were subsequently involved with the Camerons and other Lochaber clans, they were obliged to accept of Macpherson's aid as allies rather than vassals.

Donald Macpherson of Cluny, who succeeded as chief in 1640, was a steady friend of King Charles I., and suffered much on account of his sincere attachment to the king's cause. His brother and successor, Andrew, was also a staunch royalist. In 1665, under this chief, when Macintosh went on an expedition against the Camerons, for the recovery of the lands of Glenluy and Locharkaig, he solicited the assistance of the Macphersons, when, to guard against anything which might seem to sanction the pretensions of Macintosh to be considered chief of the clan Chattan, a notarial deed was executed, wherein Macintosh declares that it was of their mere good will and pleasure that they did so, and on his part it is added, "I bind and oblige myself and friends and followers, to assist and fortify and join, with the said Andrew, Lachlan, and John Macpherson, all their lawful and necessary adocs, being thereunto required." In 1672, Duncan Macpherson of Cluny, Andrew's grandson, made application to the Lyon office to have his arms matriculated as laird of Cluny Maepherson, and "the only and true representative of the ancient and honourable family of the clan Chattan." This application was successful, but as soon as Macintosh heard of it, he raised a process before the privy council to have it determined as to which of them had the right to the proper armorial bearings. After a protracted inquiry, and the production of evidence on both sides, the council issued an order for the two chiefs to give security for the peaceable behaviour of their respective clans, thus deciding that they were each independent. "This process," says Logan, "excited great interest in the north, and Cluny received the hearty congratulations of many friends on his return from Edinburgh; Keith, earl Marischal, and others entertaining him by the way, and freely accepting him as their chief." The same year, Cluny entered into a contract of friendship with Æneas, Lord Macdonell, and Aros, "for himself and taking burden upon him for the hail name of Macphersons, and some others, called old Clanchattan, as cheeffe and principall man thereof." Although Macpherson received a new matriculation of his arms as those of Macpherson of Cluny, there is nothing in this, or in the designation given to the laird of Macintosh, to militate against his right to the chiefship of the clan Chattan, so long in dispute between them.

On the death, without issue, of Duncan, Andrew's grandson, in 1721 or 1722, the chiefship devolved on Lachlan Macpherson of Nuid, the next male heir, being lineally descended from John, youngest brother of Donald and Andrew, the above-named chiefs. One of the descendants of this John of Nuid was James Macpherson, the translator of Ossian's Poems, a memoir of whom is afterwards given in larger type. Lachlan married Jean, daughter of Sir Ewen Cameron of Lochiel. His eldest son, Ewen, was the chief at the time of the rebellion of 1745.

In the previous rebellion of 1715, the Macphersons, under their then chief, Duncan, had taken a very active part, on the side of the Pretender. On the arrival of Prince Charles in 1745, Ewen Macpherson of Cluny, who, the same year, had been appointed to a company in Lord Loudon's Highlanders, and had taken the oaths to government, threw up his commission, and, with 600 Macphersons, joined the rebel army after their victory at Prestonpans. The Macphersons were led to take an active part in the rebellion chiefly from a desire to revenge the fate of three of their clansmen, who were shot on account of the extraordinary mutiny of the Black Watch, now the 42d regiment, two years before. That corps, composed principally of Highlanders, had been marched to the neighbourhood of London, preparatory to being sent abroad. As it had been formed of independent companies whose duties were intended to be confined solely to the Highlands, the determination to send them on foreign service, was deemed by them an infringement of their compact with government, and they resolved upon at once returning to Scotland. Accordingly, after a review on Finchley Common on 14th May 1743, they decamped from their quarters, and had reached the vicinity of Northampton on their way home, when they were discovered and obliged to surrender. The three who were made examples of, and suffered for the rest, were Corporals Malcolm, and Samuel Macpherson of Druminnour, brother of General Kenneth Macpherson of the East India Company's service, who died in 1815, and Farquhar Shaw, a private. These men were remarkable for their great size and handsome figure. They were shot upon the parade, within the Tower of London, in presence of the other prisoners, and met their death with great courage and composure.

Ewen Macpherson, the chief, at first hesitated to join the prince, and his wife, a daughter of Lord Lovat, although a staunch Jacobite, earnestly dissuaded him from breaking his oath to government, assuring him that nothing could end well that began with perjury. Her friends reproached her for interfering, and his clan urging him, Cluny unfortunately yielded. In the memorable retreat from Derby, the Macphersons behaved with great gallantry, distinguishing themselves particularly in the moonlight skirmish with the government troops at Clifton. Lord George Murray, who commanded the Highlanders on that occasion, placed himself at the head of the Macphersons, with Cluny at his side. At the commencement of the action, the Glengary men, who were on the right, kept firing as they advanced, but the Macphersons, on the left, came sooner in contact with the dragoons, and received the whole of their fire. When the halls were whizzing about them, Cluny exclaimed, "What the devil is this?" Lord George told him that they had no remedy but to attack the dragoons, sword in hand, before they had time to charge again. Then, drawing his sword, he cried out, "Claymore," and Cluny doing the same, the Macphersons rushed down to the bottom ditch of the enclosure, and clearing the hedges as they went, fell sword in hand upon the king's troops, killing many and putting the rest to flight.

At the battle of Falkirk, the Macphersons formed a portion of the first line. They were too late for the battle of Culloden, where their assistance might have turned the fortune of the day, and they did not come up till after the retreat of Charles from that decisive field. In the subsequent devastations committed by the English army, Cluny's house was plundered and hurnt to the ground. Every exertion was made by the government troops for his apprehension, but they never could lay their hands upon him. At first he lived with Lochiel in a retreat at Benalder, a hill on his own property on the borders of Rannoch. Towards the end of Prince Charles' wanderings, for the purpose of meeting the prince, he set out for Auchnacary, where he supposed him to be, but missing him there, he retraced his steps, and found him in a miserable hovel with Lochiel, at a place called Mellenaur or Millanuir, on the side of Benalder. On entering the hut, Cluny would have kneeled before the prince, but the latter prevented him, and, giving him a kiss, said, "I am sorry, Cluny, you and your regiment were not at Culloden: I did not hear till very lately that you were so near us that day." The day following Cluny conducted the prince and his attendants to a little shieling about two miles farther into Benalder, and after passing two nights there he took him to a more secure retreat called the Cage, which he had fitted up for him, and where he lay concealed for several weeks till the arrival of the French frigate which conveyed him back to France.

For himself Cluny had several places of concealment on his estate. He lived for nine years in a cave at a short distance from where his house had stood. "This cave," says General Stewart, (Sketches of the Highlanders, vol. i. pp. 60, 61,) "was in the front of a woody precipice, the trees and shelving rocks completely concealing the entrance. It was dug out by his own people, who worked by night, and conveyed the stones and rubbish into a lake in the neighbourhood, that no vestige of their labour might betray the retreat of their master. In this sanctuary he lived secure, occasionally visiting his friends by night, or when time slackened the rigour of the search. Upwards of a hundred persons knew where he was concealed, and a reward of £1,000 was offered to any one who should give information against him; and as it was known that he was concealed on his own estate, eighty men were constantly stationed there, besides the parties continually marching into the country, to intimidate his tenantry, and induce them to disclose the place of his concealment." But neither the fear of danger nor the hope of reward could prevail on any of his people to betray him, or even to discontinue their faithful services.

For the purpose of discovering his retreat, Sir Hector Monro, at that time a lieutenant in the 34th regiment, at the head of a large party, continued two years in Badenoch, yet so true were the clan to their chief that not a trace of him could be found. On one occasion, while spending a few hours at night convivially with his friends, he escaped by a back window of the house they were in, just as the soldiery were breaking open the door. He became so cautious that, on parting with his wife, or any of his friends, he never told them to which of his places of concealment he was going, or suffered any one to accompany him, that they might have it in their power to answer, when questioned, that they knew not where he was. He escaped to France in 1755, and died at Dunkirk the following year.

Frequent mention is made in the Stuart papers of a sum of money, amounting to £27,000, which the prince had intrusted to another person, by whom it was lodged in the hands of Cluny. Before quitting Scotland the prince gave Cluny instructions that "not one farthing" was to be assigned away without an order from himself. Another note to him, dated from on board the French vessel in which he embarked for France, directs £750 to be divided among the Macgregors, the Stewarts, the Macdonalds of Glengary and Keppoch, and the "Lokel clan," as the Camerons of Lochiel are called. He likewise directs especial care to be taken of "rings, sels, (seals,) and other trifles" belonging to him, and all lying in certain "boxks," that is, boxes. The last letter that seems to have been written to him by the prince on the subject, dated "Ye 4th September, 1754," and addressed "For C. M. (that is, Cluny Macpherson) in Scotld," is as follows: "Sir, This is to desire you to come as soon as you can conveniently to Paris, bringing over with you all the effects whatsoever that I left in your hand when I was in Scotland, as also whatever money you can come at, for I happen to be at present in great straits, which makes me wish that you should delay as little as possible to meet me for that effect. You are to address yourself when arrived at Paris, to Mr. John Waters, Banker, &c. He will direct you where to find your sincere friend. C. P." This letter is copied from the original draught in Charles' own hand, among the Stuart papers, in possession of her majesty. In the perilous circumstances in which Cluny was then placed, it is not known whether he was able to comply with all the directions he received regarding the application of the money, but it is believed that when he escaped to France he was enabled to give the prince a good account of the same.

Ewen's son, Duncan, was born in 1750, in a kiln for drying corn, in which his mother had taken refuge after the destruction of their house. During his minority his uncle, Major John Macpherson of the 78th foot, acted as his guardian. He received back the estate which had been forfeited, and, entering the army, became lieutenant-colonel of the 3d foot-guards. He married, 12th June, 1798, Catherine, youngest daughter of Sir Evan Cameron of Fassfern, baronet, and on his death, 1st August 1817, was succeeded by his eldest son, Ewen Macpherson of Cluny, the 23d chief from Gillichattan Mor; a captain on halfpay, 42d Highlanders, a magistrate and a deputy-lieutenant of Inverness-shire; married 20th December 1832, the youngest daughter of Henry Davidson of Tulloch Castle, Ross-shire, with issue.

In Cluny castle are preserved various relics of the rebellion of 1745; amongst the rest the prince's target and lace wrist ruffles, and an autograph letter from Charles, promising an ample reward to his devoted friend Cluny. There is also the black pipe chanter on which the prosperity of the house of Cluny is said to be dependent, and which all true members of the clan Vuirich firmly believe fell from heaven, in place of the one lost at the conflict on the North Inch of Perth!

The war-cry of the Macphersons was "Craig Dhu," the name of a rock in the neighbourhood of Cluny Castle. The chief is called in the Highlands "Mac Mhurch Chlanaidh," but everywhere else is better known as Cluny Macpherson.

Among the principal eadets of the house of Cluny were the Macphersons of Pitmean, Invereshie, Strathmassie, Breakachie, Essie, &c. The Invereshie branch were chiefs of a large tribe called the Siol Gillies, the founder of which was Gillies or Elias Macpherson, the first of Invereshie, a younger son of Ewen Baan or Bane (so called from his fair complexion) above mentioned. Sir Eneas Macpherson of Invereshie, advocate, who lived in the reigns of Charles II. and James III., collected the materials for the history of the clan Macpherson, the MS. of which is still preserved in the family. He was appointed sheriff of Aberdeen in 1684.

George Macpherson of Invereshie married Grace, daughter of Colonel William Grant of Ballindalloeh, and his elder son, William, dying, unmarried, in 1812, was succeeded by his nephew, George, who, on the death of his maternal grand-uncle, General James Grant of Ballindalloeh, 13th April 1806, inherited that estate, and in consequence assumed the name of Grant in addition to his own. He was M.P. for the county of Sutherland for seventeen years, and was created a baronet 25th July 1838. He thus became Sir George Macpherson Grant of Invereshie, Inverness-shire, and Ballindalloeh, Elginshire. On his death in November 1846, his son, Sir John, sometime secretary of legation at Lisbon, succeeded as 2d baronet. Sir John died Dec. 2, 1850. His eldest son, Sir George Macpherson-Grant of Invereshie and Ballindalloeh, born Aug. 12, 1839, became the 3d baronet of this family. He married, July 3, 1861, Frances Elizabeth, younger daughter of the Rev. Roger Pocklington, Vicar of Walesby, Nottinghamshire.

John Macpherson, of Calcutta, younger son of the Rev. John Macpherson, D.D., a clergyman of the church of Scotland, was appointed a member of the supreme council of Bengal in 1780, and governor-general of India, on the return of Warren Hastings to England in 1784. He was created a baronet Jan. 27, 1786, but the title became extinct on his death, unmarried, Jan. 12, 1821.

The celebrated outlaw, James Macpherson, executed at Banff Nov. 16, 1790, was an illegitimate son of one of the family of Invereshie, by a gipsy woman. He was one of the best violin players of his time, and author of a Lament which passes under his name. He performed at the foot of the gallows, on his favourite instrument, the Rant and Pibroch of his own composition.

MACPHERSON, JAMES, celebrated for his translations of Gaelic poetry, was born in the parish of Kingessie, Inverness-shire, in 1738. He received the rudiments of his education at the grammar school of Inverness, and with the view of studying for the church, was sent in 1752 to King's college, Aberdeen, and afterwards to the university of Edinburgh. On leaving college he was for some time schoolmaster of his native village, and subsequently was employed as private tutor in Mr. Graham of Balgowan's family. In 1758 he printed at Edinburgh a poem in six cantos, entitled 'The Highlander,' which shows little indication of poetical talent. About the same period, he wrote an ode on the arrival of the Earl Marischal in Scotland, which he called 'An Attempt in the Manner of Pindar,' with several other poetical pieces, some of which were inserted in the 'Scots Magazine.'

He seems early to have directed his attention to the subject of Gaelic poetry, and the following are the circumstances under which his celebrated collection, called the Poems of Ossian—which led to a lengthened literary controversy as to their genuineness—originated. In the summer of 1759, John Home, the author of Douglas, met Mr. Macpherson at Moffat, when he learned from him that he was possessed of some pieces of ancient Gaelic poetry, and he expressed a wish to see an English translation of them as a specimen. Accordingly Mr. Macpherson furnished him with two fragments, which he showed to Dr. Hugh Blair and other literary friends, who all greatly admired them. Dr. Blair in particular was so much struck with them, that he requested an interview with Macpherson. From him he learned that poems in the same strain as those in his possession were to be found in the Highlands, on which Dr. Blair urged him to translate all the pieces which he had, that they might be published. Dr. Blair informs us that Macpherson was extremely reluctant to comply with his request, saying that no translation of his could do justice to the spirit and force of the original, and that they were so different from the style of modern poetry that he was afraid they would not take with the taste of the public. Macpherson, however, was at length prevailed upon to translate and bring to Dr. Blair the several poetical pieces which he had then in his possession. These were published in a small volume at Edinburgh in the year 1760, under the title of 'Fragments of Ancient Poetry collected in the Highlands of Scotland, and translated from the Gaelic or Erse language;' to which Dr. Blair prefixed an introduction. "These 'Fragments,'" says Dr. Blair in a Letter to Henry Maekenzie, the author of 'The Man of Feeling,' "drew much attention, and excited, among all persons of taste and letters, an earnest desire to recover, if possible, all those considerable remains of Gaelic poetry which were said still to exist in the Highlands."

To encourage Macpherson to undertake the collection of the ancient poetry of the Highlands, many of the first persons of rank and taste in Edinburgh met together at a dinner, to which Macpherson was invited, and Dr. Blair, from whom this account is taken, says that he had a chief hand in convoking the meeting. Among those present were Patrick, Lord Elibank, Principal Robertson, the historian, Mr. John Home, Dr. Adam Ferguson, Dr. Blair himself, and many others. After much conversation with Macpherson, it was agreed that he should, without delay, go through the Highlands for the purpose of collecting all the Gaelic poetry he could find, the expense to be defrayed by a subscription raised from the meeting, with the aid of such other friends as they might apply to with that object.

The same year (1760) Macpherson set off to the Highlands; and, during his tour, he from time to time transmitted to Dr. Blair and his other literary friends, accounts of his progress in collecting, from many different and remote parts, all the remains he could find of ancient Gaelic poetry, either in writing or preserved by oral tradition. In the course of his journey he wrote two letters to the Rev. James M'Lagan, at one period minister of Amalrie, and afterwards of Blair in Athol, in the first of which, dated from Ruthven (in Badenoch), 27th October, 1760, he says, "I have met with a number of old manuscripts in my travels; the poetical part of them I have endeavoured to secure." The second, dated from Edinburgh, 16th January, 1761, contains this passage: "I have been lucky enough to lay my hands on a pretty complete poem, and truly epic, concerning Fingal." This is the first intimation of that remarkable work which was soon to create a most extraordinary sensation in the literary world.

The districts through which Macpherson travelled, in the prosecution of his undertaking, were chiefly the north-westeru parts of Inverness-shire, the Isle of Skye, and some of the adjoining islands; "places," says the Report of the Committee of the Highland Society, afterwards published, "from their remoteness and state of manners at that period, most likely to afford, in a pure and genuine state, the ancient traditionary tales and poems, of which the recital then formed the favourite amusement of the long and idle winter evenings of the Highlanders."

On his return to Edinburgh, Macpherson immediately set about translating the Gaelic poems which he had collected into English. Soon after, he published the fruits of his mission, in 2 vols. 4to, the first in 1762, under the patronage of Lord Bute, containing 'Fingal, an ancient Epic Poem in six books, with other lesser Poems;' and the second in 1763, with the title of 'Temora, an Epic Poem, in eight books, with other poems.' Both professed to have been composed by Ossian, the son of Fingal, a Gaelic prince of the fourth century, and translated from the Gaelic language.

From the first the genuineness of these poems became a matter of dispute, and for some years a violent controversy raged upon the subject. Among those who believed in their authenticity were Dr. Blair, Dr. Gregory, Lord Kames, the Rev. Dr. Graham of Aberfoyle, and Sir John Sinclair, baronet; and amongst the most distinguished of those who denied their genuineness were Mr. Hume the historian, Dr. Samuel Johnson, Dr. Smith of Campbelltown, and Mr. Laing, author of 'Notes and Illustrations' introduced into an edition of Ossian's Poems, published in Edinburgh in 1805. The latter were replied to by Mr. Alexander Macdonald in a work entitled 'Some of Ossian's lesser Poems rendered into verse, with a preliminary discourse in answer to Mr. Laing's Critical and Historical Dissertations on the antiquity of Ossian's Poems,' Liverpool, 1805, 8vo. They were also condemned as spurious in a work entitled 'An Inquiry into the Authenticity of the Poems of Ossian.' By W. Shaw, A.M. London, 1781. So strong was Dr. Johnson's prejudice against them, that in his 'Journey to the Western Islands,' he declared that "the poems of Ossian never existed in any other form than that which we have seen," meaning in Macpherson's translation, and "that the editor or author never could show the original, nor can it be shown by any other." Sir James Macintosh, too, in his 'History of England,' expresses himself very strongly against their authenticity. At the close of a long and eloquent passage concerning them he says: "Since the keen and searching publication of Mr. Laing, these poems have fallen in reputation, as they lost the character of genuineness. They had been admired by all the nations, and by all the men of genius in Europe. The last incident in their story is perhaps the most remarkable. In an Italian version, which softened their defects, and rendered their characteristic qualities faint, they formed almost the whole poetical library of Napoleon, a man who, whatever may be finally thought of him in other respects, must be owned to be, by the transcendent vigour of his powers, entitled to a place in the first class of human minds. No other imposture in literary history approaches them in the splendour of their course."

To one of the books or divisions of Temora, Macpherson annexed the original Gaelic, but though often called upon to publish the originals of the remainder of the poems stated to be by Ossian and genuine relics of antiquity, as the only means of setting all the cavil or controversy at rest, this was the only specimen of them ever printed by himself. At his death, however, he left to John Mackenzie of Figtree court, London, £1,000, to defray the expense of the publication of the originals of the whole of his translations, with directions to his executors for carrying that purpose into effect. Various causes contributed to delay their appearance till 1807, when they were published under the sanction of the Highland Society of London.

The investigations that were set on foot by Sir John Sinclair and others sufficiently establish the fact that, long before the name of Macpherson was known to the literary world, a collection of poems in Gaelic did exist which passed as the poems of Ossian, and the publication of the Gaelic manuscripts at length settled the question of their authenticity in the minds of all unprejudiced persons. At the same time, it must be confessed that, in the present advanced state of literature, the 'Poems of Ossian' are no longer looked upon as the wonderful productions which they were esteemed to be when they first appeared, and that their popularity has long been on the wane.

That Macpherson, with the poetical fragments which he translated, took the liberty of adding to, transposing, or completing where he deemed it necessary, there can be no reason to doubt. On this point the Committee of the Highland Society reported that they were inclined to believe that he "was in use to supply elisions, and to give connexion, by inserting passages which he did not find, and to add what he conceived to be dignity and delicacy to the original composition, by striking out passages, by softening incidents, by refining the language, in short, by changing what he considered as too simple or too rude for a modern ear, and elevating what in his opinion was below the standard of good poetry. To what degree, however, he exercised these liberties it is impossible for the committee to determine." And this is all that can now be said on the subject. The following is his portrait :

In 1764 Macpherson obtained the situation of private secretary to Captain Johnstone, on the appointment of the latter as governor of Pensacola, in which capacity he went out to America, but a difference arising between him and the governor, he relinquished his post, and after visiting the West India islands he returned to England in 1766, with a pension of £200 a-year for life. Taking up his residence in London, he resumed his literary labours, and in 1771 published a dissertation on the antiquities of the Scottish Gael or Celtic race, in one volume 4to, under the title of 'An Introduction to the History of Great Britain and Ireland,' which was very bitterly attacked on its appearance, and brought neither profit nor reputation to the author.

In 1773, he issued a prose translation in two volumes, of the 'Iliad of Homer,' which was received with ridicule and abuse, and universally considered a failure. The same year he wrote a threatening letter to Dr. Johnson, in consequence of his remarks on Ossian in his celebrated 'Tour to the Hebrides.' The latter returned a most sarcastic reply, wherein he told him, with the most cutting contempt, that his "abilities since his Homer, were not so formidable." In 1775, Macpherson published 'A History of Great Britain, from the Restoration to the Accession of the House of Hanover,' in 2 vols. 4to; and, along with it, the data on which his statements were founded, in two additional volumes of 'Original Papers,' for which last work he is said to have received the sum of £3,000.

About this time he was employed by the government to write two pamphlets in vindication and support of the measures which led to the American war, and to the ultimate independence of the colonies of North America, now the United States. He was also appointed agent to the nabob of Arcot, in behalf of whom he also published two works. As it was thought requisite that he should have a seat in parliament, in order the more effectually to attend to the nabob's interests, in 1780 he was elected member for Camelford, for which place he was rechosen in 1784, and again in 1790. Declining health induced him to retire to an elegant mansion, named Belleville, which he had built in the parish of Alvie, Inverness-shire, where he died February 17, 1796.

Mr. Macpherson died wealthy. By his will, besides the £1,000 for the publication of the originals of Ossian, and the bequest of several large legacies to his friends, he left £300 for a monument to be erected to his memory at Belleville. He also directed that his body should be conveyed to Westminster abbey, and it was accordingly interred at Poet's corner.

MACPHEE, or MACPIE, a contraction of Maeduffie, the name of a clan (in the Gaelic the Clann Dhùblie, or the dark coloured tribe,) which held the island of Colonsay in Argyleshire, till the middle of the 17th century, when they were dispossessed of it by the Macdonalds. They were a branch of the ancient Albion race of Scotland, and like all the tribes that claimed to be so, adopted the pine for their badge. On the south side of the church of the monastery of St. Augustine in Colonsay, according to Martin (writing in 1763), "lie the tombs of Macduffie, and of the cadets of his family; there is a ship under sail, and a two-handed sword engraven on the principal tombstone, and this inscription: 'Hic jacet Malcolumbus Macduffie de Collonsay; his coat of arms and colour-staff is fixed in a stone, through which a hole is made to hold it. About a quarter of a mile on the south side of the church there is a cairn, in which there is a stone cross fixed, called Macduffie's cross; for when any of the heads of this family were to be interred, their corpses were laid on this cross for some moments, in their way toward the church.'"

Donald Macduffie is witness to a charter by John, earl of Ross, and lord of the Isles, dated at the earl's castle of Dingwall, 12th April 1463 (Register of the Great Seal, lib. vi. No. 17.) After the forfeiture of the lordship of the Isles in 1493, the clan Duffie followed the Macdonalds of Isla. The name of the Macduffie chief in 1531 was Murroch. In 1609 Donald Macfie in Colonsay was one of the twelve chiefs and gentlemen who met the bishop of the Isles, the king's representative, at Iona, when, with their consent, the nine celebrated "Statutes of Icolmkill" were enacted. In 1615, Malcolm Macfie of Colonsay joined Sir James Macdonald of Isla, after his escape from the castle of Edinburgh, and was one of the principal leaders in his subsequent rebellion. He and 18 others were delivered up by Coll Macgillespiek Macdonald, the celebrated Colkitto (left-handed) to the earl of Argyle, by whom he was brought before the privy council. He appears afterwards to have been slain by Colkitto, as by the Council Records for 1623 we learn that the latter was accused, with several of his followers, of being "art and pairt guilty of the felonie and cruell slaughter of unquhill Malcolm Macphie of Colonsay."

A branch of the clan Duffie, after they had lost their inheritance, followed Cameron of Lochiel, and settled in Lochaber. At the battle of Culloden several of them were slain.

Collonsay was acquired by the Argyle family after they had expelled the Macdonalds, and in 1700 it came into the possession of the Macneills, by whom it is now held.

Several gentlemen of the name of Macfie have distinguished themselves as merchants, particularly in Greenock and Liverpool. William Macfie, Esq., of Langhouse, who died in Nov. 1854, was for sometime Provost of Greenock.

MACQUARRIE (Clann Guarie), the name of a minor clan which possessed the small island of Ulva, one of the Argyleshire Hebrides, with a portion of Mull, and the badge of which was the pine. The Gaelic MS. of 1450 deduces their descent from Guaric or Godfrey, called by the Highland Sennachies, Gor or Gorbred, said to have been "a brother of Fingon, ancestor of the Mackinnons, and Anrias or Andrew, ancestor of the Macgregors." This is the belief of Mr. Skene, who adds, "The history of the Macquarries resembles that of the Mackinnons in many respects; like them they had migrated far from the head-quarters of their race; they became dependent on the lords of the Isles, and followed them as if they had become a branch of the clan."

According to a history of the family, by one of its members, in 1249 Cormac Mhor, then "chief of Ulva's isle," joined Alexander II., with his followers and three galleys of sixteen oars each, in his expedition against the western islands, and after that monarch's death in the island of Kerrera, was attacked by Haaco of Norway, defeated and slain. His two sons, Allan and Gregor, were compelled to take refuge in Ireland, where the latter, surnamed Garbh or the rough, is said to have founded the powerful tribe of the MacGuires, the chief of which at one time possessed the title of Lord Inniskillen. Allan returned to Scotland, and his descendant, Hector Macquarrie of Ulva, chief in the time of Robert the Bruce, fought with his clan at Bannockburn.

The first chief of whom there is any notice in the public records was John Macquarrie of Ulva, who died in 1473. (Reg. of Great Seal, 31, No. 159.) His son, Dunslass, was chief when the last lord of the Isles was forfeited twenty years afterwards. After that event, the Macquarries, like the other vassal tribes of the Macdonalds, became independent. In war, however, they followed the banner of their neighbour Maclean of Dowart. With the latter, Dunslass supported the claims of Donald Dubh to the lordship of the Isles, in the beginning of the 16th century, and in 1504, "MacGorry of Ullowaa" was summoned, with some other chiefs, before the Estates of the kingdom, to answer for his share in Donald Dubh's rebellion. The submission of Maclean of Dowart, in the following year, implied also that of Macquarrie, and in 1517, when the former chief obtained his own remission, he stipulated for that of the chief of Ulva and two other chiefs. Dunslass married a daughter of Maeneill of Tainish, the bride's tocher or dower consisting of a picbald horse, with two men and two women.

His son, John Macquarrie of Ulva, was one of the barons and council of the Isles who in 1545 supported the pretensions of Donald Dubh, on his second escape from his forty years' imprisonment. He was also one of the thirteen chiefs, who were denounced the same year for carrying on a traitorous correspondence with the king of England, with the view of transferring their allegiance to him. In 1609 Gillespiek Macquarrie of Ulva was one of the island chiefs present in the island of Iona when the nine "Statutes of Icolmkill" were passed. Allan Macquarrie of Ulva was slain, with most of his followers, at the battle of Inverkeithing against the English parliamentary troops, 20th July 1651, when the Scots army was defeated, and a free passage opened to Cromwell to the whole north of Scotland.

According to tradition one of the chiefs of Ulva preserved his life and estate by the exercise of a timely hospitality under the following circumstances: Maclean of Dowart had a natural son by a beautiful young woman of his own clan, and the boy having been born in a barn was named, from his birth-place, Allan-a-Sop, or Allan of the straw. The girl afterwards became the wife of Maclean of Torloisk, residing in Mull, but though he loved the mother he cared nothing for her boy, and when the latter came to see her, he was very unkind to him. One morning the lady saw from her window her son approaching and hastened to put a cake on the fire for his breakfast. Her husband noticed this, and snatching the cake hot from the girdle, thrust it into his stepson's hands, forcibly clasping them on the burning bread. The lad's hands were severely burnt, and in consequence he refrained from going again to Torloisk. As he grew up Allan became a mariner, and joined the Danish pirates who infested the western isles. From his courage he soon got the command of one galley, and subsequently of a flotilla, and made his name both feared and famous. Of him it may be said that—

"Sir Ralph the Rover sailed away,

He scoured the seas for many a day,

And now, grown rich with plunder'd store,
He steers his way for Scotland's shore."

The thought of his mother brought him back once more to the island of Mull, and one morning he anchored his galleys in front of the house of Torloisk. His mother had been long dead, but his stepfather hastened to the shore, and welcomed him with apparent kindness. The crafty old man had a feud with Macquarrie of Ulva, and thought this a favourable opportunity to execute his vengeance on that chief. With this object he suggested to Allan that it was time he should settle on land, and said that he could easily get possession of the island of Ulva, by only putting to death the laird, who was old and useless. Allan agreed to the proposal, and, setting sail next morning, appeared before Macquarrie's house. The chief of Ulva was greatly alarmed when he saw the pirate galleys, but he resolved to receive their commander hospitably, in the hope that good treatment would induce him to go away, without plundering his house or doing him any injury. He caused a splendid feast to be prepared, and welcomed Allan to Ulva with every appearance of sincerity. After feasting together the whole day, in the evening the pirate-chief, when about to retire to his ships, thanked the chief for his entertainment, remarking, at the same time, that it had cost him dear. "How so?" said Macquarrie, "when I bestowed this entertainment upon you in free good will." "It is true," said Allan, who, notwithstanding his being a pirate, seems to have been of a frank and generous disposition, "but it has disarranged all my plans, and quite altered the purpose for which I came hither, which was to put you to death, seize your castle and lands, and settle myself here in your stead." Macquarrie replied that he was sure such a suggestion was not his own, but must have originated with his stepfather, old Torloisk, who was his personal enemy. He then reminded him that he had made but an indifferent husband to his mother, and was a cruel stepfather to himself, adding, "Consider this matter better, Allan, and you will see that the estate and harbour of Torloisk lie as conveniently for you as those of Ulva, and if you must make a settlement by force, it is much better you should do so at the expense of the old churl, who never showed you kindness, than of a friend like me who always loved and honoured you."

Allan-a-Sop, remembering his scorched fingers, straightway sailed back to Torloisk, and meeting his stepfather, who came eagerly expecting to hear of Macquarrie's death, thus accosted him: "You hoary old villain, you instigated me to murder a better man than yourself. Have you forgotten how you scorched my fingers twenty years ago with a burning eake? The day has come when that breakfast must be paid for." So saying, with one stroke of his battle-axe he cut down his stepfather, took possession of his castle and property, and established there that branch of the clan Maclean afterwards represented by Mr. Clephane Maclean.

Hector, brother of Allan Macquarrie of Ulva, and second son of Donald the 12th chief of the Macquarries, by his wife, a daughter of Lauchlan Oig Maclean, founder of the Macleans of Torloisk, obtained from his father the lands of Ormaig in Ulva, and was the first of the Macquarries of Ormaig. This family frequently intermarried with the Macleans, both of Lochbuy and Dowart. Lauchlan, Donald's third son, was ancestor of the Macquarries of Laggan, and John, the fourth son, of those of Ballighartan.

Lauchlan Macquarrie of Ulva, the 16th chief in regular succession, was compelled to dispose of his lands for behoof of his creditors, and in 1778, at the age of 63, he entered the army. He served in the American war, and died in 1818, at the age of 103, without male issue. He was the last chief of the Macquarries, and the proprietor of Ulva when Dr. Samuel Johnson and Mr. Boswell visited that island in 1773.

The room where the Doctor spent the night is yet shown in the old mansion of the Macquarries. Dr. Johnson and the chief, whom he was surprised to find a person of great politeness and intelligence, had a conversation about the usage known by the name of Mercheta mulierum, which formerly existed in Ulva, and was a fine paid to the chief by his vassals on the marriage of a virgin. In answer to the Doctor's reference to Blackstone, who has expressed his disbelief that any such claim on the part of landlords ever existed, Macquarrie informed the English sage that the eldest children of marriages were not esteemed amongst the Gael as among other nations, most of whom adhered to distinct laws of primogeniture, on account of the parentage of the eldest child, from the above-mentioned custom, being rendered doubtful; hence, brothers were very commonly preferred to the proper heirs apparent. He likewise told him that he himself had been in the habit of demanding a sheep, on occasion of every marriage in Ulva, for which he had substituted a fine of five shillings in money. Dr. Johnson was very forcibly impressed with the following instance of second sight related to him by the Macquarrie chief. He said that once when he was in Edinburgh, an old female domestic of the family in Ulva foretold that he would return home on a certain day, with a new servant in a livery of red and green, which he accordingly did; but he declared that the idea of the servant and the livery occurred to him only when he was in Edinburgh, and that the woman could know nothing of his intentions at the time.

A large portion of the ancient patrimonial property was repurchased by General Macquarrie, long governor of New South Wales, and from whom Macquarrie county, Macquarrie river, and Port Macquarrie in that colony, Macquarrie's harbour, and Macquarrie island in the South Pacific, derive their name. He was the eldest cadet of his family, and was twice married, first, to Miss Baillie of Jerviswood, and secondly, to a daughter of Sir John Campbell of Airds, by whom he had an only son, Laehlan, who died without issue.

The island of Ulva is about two miles long, averaging a mile and a quarter in breadth, and contains about 600 inhabitants. The name is derived from the Scandinavian Ulfur, and means the island of wolves, these animals having anciently abounded there.

MACQUEEN, the surname of one of the subordinate tribes of the clan Chattan, the head of which is Macqueen of Corrybrough, Inverness-shire. The founder of this tribe is said to have been Roderick Dhu Revan MacSweyn or MacQueen, who, about the beginning of the 15th century, received a grant of territory in the county of Inverness. He belonged to the family of the lord of the Isles, and his descendants from him were called the clan Revan.

The Macqueens fought, under the standard of Macintosh, captain of the clan Chattan, at the battle of Harlaw in 1411. On 4th April 1609, Donald Macqueen of Corrybrough signed the bond of manrent, with the chiefs of the other tribes composing the clan Chattan, whereby they bound themselves to support Angus Macintosh of that ilk as their captain and leader. At this period, we are told, the tribe of Macqueen comprehended twelve distinct families, all landowners in the counties of Inverness and Nairne.

In 1778, Lord Maedonald of Sleat, who had been created an Irish peer by that title two years before, having raised a Highland regiment, conferred a lieutenancy in it on a son of Donald Macqueen, then of Corrybrough, and in the letter, dated 26th January of that year, in which he intimated the appointment, he says, "It does me great honour to have the sons of chieftains in the regiment, and as the Macqueens have been invariably attached to our family, to whom we believe we owe our existence, I am proud of the nomination." Thus were the Macqueens acknowledged to have been of Maedonald origin, although they ranged themselves among the tribes of the clan Chattan.

MACQUEEN, ROBERT, of Braxfield, an eminent lawyer and judge, was born May 4, 1722. He was the eldest son of John Macqueen, Esq. of Braxfield, Lanarkshire, for some time sheriff substitute of the upper ward of that county. After receiving the rudiments of education at the grammar school of Lanark, he was sent to the university of Edinburgh, and apprenticed to a writer to the signet in that city. In 1744 he was admitted advocate. The many intricate and important feudal questions arising out of the rebellion of 1745, respecting the forfeited estates, in which he had the good fortune to be appointed counsel for the crown, first brought him into notice, and for many years he had a larger practice than any other member of the bar at that period. As a feudal lawyer he was considered the first in Scotland in his time, and he has been known to plead from fifteen to twenty causes in one day.

In November 1776, he was appointed a judge of the court of session, when he assumed the title of Lord Braxfield. In February 1780 he was appointed a lord of justiciary, and in December 1787 was promoted to be lord-justice-clerk. This last office he held during a most interesting and critical period—that between 1793 and 1795. He presided at the memorable political trials of Muir, Palmer, Skirving, Margarot, &c., in 1793-4, conducting himself with great firmness and intrepidity, but is considered to have treated the prisoners with unnecessary harshness. He failed, however, in all his attempts to intimidate them. "It is altogether unavailing," said Skirving to him, "for your lordship to menace me; for I have long learned to fear not the face of man." Even on the bench he spoke the broadest Scottish dialect. "Hae ye ony counsel, man?" he said to Maurice Margarot, when placed at the bar on a charge of sedition. "No," was the answer. "Do you want to hae ony appointit?" "No," replied Margarot, "I only want an interpreter to make me understand what your lordship says!"

Lord Braxfield died May 30th, 1799, in his 78th year. He was twice married, first to Mary Agnew, niece of Sir Andrew Agnew, baronet, by whom he had two sons and two daughters; and secondly, to Elizabeth, daughter of the lord chief baron Ord, without issue. The elder son, Robert Dundas Macqueen, inherited the estate of Braxfield, and married Lady Lillas Montgomery, daughter of the earl of Eglinton. The second entered the army. The elder daughter, Mary, became the wife of William Honyman, Esq., advocate, afterwards Lord Armadale, a lord of session, created a baronet in 1804. The younger married John Maedonald of Clanronald.

MACRAE, a minor clan of Ross-shire, which has from time immemorial been subordinate to the Seaforth branch of the Mackenzies. The badge of the Macraes was the fir-club moss, and they are generally considered of the pure Gaelic stock, although they have also been stated to be of Irish origin, and to have come over to Scotland about the middle of the 13th century. They are said to have fought under Fitzgerald, the supposed founder of the clan Mackenzie at the battle of Largs in 1263. They settled first in the Aird of Lovat, but subsequently emigrated into Glensheil in the district of Kintail, Ross-shire. Dr. Johnson has inserted in his 'Tour to the Western Isles,' a story which he says he heard in the Hebrides, that the Macraes "were originally an indigent and subordinate clan, servants to the Macleennans, who, in the wars of Charles I., took arms at the call of the heroic Montrose, and were, in one of his battles, almost destroyed. The women that were left at home, being thus deprived of their husbands, like the Seythian ladies of old, married their servants, and the Macraes became a considerable race." The writer of the account of the parish of Glensheil, in the New Statistical Account of Scotland, pronounces this an unworthy invention, "destitute of all foundation, and contradicted by ample evidence, written and traditional." Some one had imposed on the credulity of the great lexicographer. At the battle of Auldearn, in May 1645, the Macraes fought under the Mackenzie chief in the ranks of Montrose, and more of their number fell than of the Macleennans. They were defeated at the battle of Glensheil, under William earl of Seaforth in 1719, when a body of 400 Spaniards attempted to make a landing in the Stuart interest. When that nobleman, for his share in the troubles of 1715 and 1719, was obliged to retire to the Continent, and his lands were forfeited, so strong was the attachment of the Macraes and Macleennans to him, that, during the time the forfeiture lasted it baffled all the efforts of government and its commissioner, Ross of Earne, to penetrate into his territory, or to collect any rents in Kintail. On one occasion Ross and his son with a party of men set off to collect the rents, and fearing some attack on the way, he sent his son forward, on his own horse, when a shot from a rifle laid him dead. The father and his party immediately abandoned their intentions, and returned home in haste. Seaforth's tenants were aided in their resistance by the advice of Donald Murehison of Auchtertyre, who regularly collected the rents, and found means to remit them to Seaforth, then in France.

The chief or head of the Clann 'Ie Rath Mholach, or "Hairy Macraes," called by Nisbet the "Macraachs," and pronounced MacCraws, was Macrae of Inverinate in Kintail. A MS. genealogical account of the Maeraes, written by the Rev. John Maerae, minister in Dingwall, who died in 1704, was in possession of the late Lieutenant-colonel Sir John Macrae of Ardintoul. This secluded and primitive tribe were remarkable for their great size and courage, and it is recorded that one Dunean Macrae, who lived in the beginning of the 18th century, had such amazing strength, that he carried for some distance a stone of immense size, and laid it down on the farm of Achmangart, where it is yet to be seen. He rendered himself famous by recovering stolen cattle from the reivers of Lochaber, either belonging to himself or his neighbours. He was the author of several poetical pieces, and was killed, with many of his clan, at Sheriffmuir in 1715. His claymore, long preserved in the Tower of London, was shown as "the great Highlander's sword."

A great number of the clan Macrae enlisted in the Seaforth Highlanders, when that regiment was raised in 1778, and their mutiny at Leith soon after their enrolment gave rise to a memorable occurrence which was called "the affair of the wild Macraes." The regiment had been raised chiefly from among his own tenantry, by the restored earl of Seaforth, grandson of the earl who had been attainted for his participation in the rebellion of 1715. It formed a corps of 1,130 men. Of these, about 900 were Highlanders, 500 of whom were Mackenzies and Macraes, from his lordship's own estate, and the remainder were obtained from the estates of Seatwell, Kilcoy, Applecross, Redcastle, and others belonging to gentlemen of the name of Mackenzie, all of whom had sons or brothers among the officers. Embodied at Elgin in May of the year mentioned, the regiment was inspected by General Skene, when it was found so effective that not one man was rejected. In the month of August the regiment proceeded to Edinburgh, and in September marched to Leith for embarkation to the East Indies; but it had not been long quartered in that town when the men showed signs of discontent, and murmurs began to be expressed amongst them that "they had been sold to the East India Company." They had enlisted to serve only for a limited period, and not out of Great Britain, and they complained of an infringement of their agreement, and that part of their pay and bounty money was in arrear, kept back from them, as they alleged, by their officers.

As they could obtain neither satisfaction nor redress, on Tuesday, 22d September, when the regiment was drawn up on Leith Links, preparatory to entering the boats which were to convey them to the transports lying in Leith roads, about 600 of the men refused to embark, and marching out of Leith, with pipes playing and two plaids fixed on poles instead of colours, took up a position on Arthur's Seat, an eminence 800 feet high, in the immediate neighbourhood of Edinburgh. There they remained for three nights, amply supplied in the meantime with provisions by the inhabitants of the capital. Two days were spent in negotiations with them, in which the earls of Dunmore and Seaforth, Lord Macdonald, Sir James Grant of Grant, and other gentlemen connected with the Highlands, took an active and prominent part, and on Friday morning a bond was signed by the duke of Buccleuch, the earl of Dunmore, Sir Adolphus Oughton, and General Skene, the latter two the officers first and second in command of the forces in Scotland, containing the following conditions: A pardon to the Highlanders for all past offences; all levy money and arrears due to them to be paid before embarkation, and that they should not be sent to the East Indies. The soldiers being satisfied, marched down the hill with pipes playing, the earls of Seaforth and Dunmore at their head, and returned to their quarters at Leith. The result of an inquiry which was afterwards made was, that there was no foundation for complaints against the officers on the ground of pay or arrear, and that "the cause of the retiring to Arthur's Seat was from an idle and ill-founded report that the regiment was sold to the East India Company, and that the officers were to leave them on their being embarked on board the transports." The regiment subsequently embarked with the greatest cheerfulness, accompanied by their colonel, the earl of Seaforth, one-half of the men being sent to Guernsey, and the other half to Jersey. In May 1781, having expressed their willingness to go to the East Indies, the regiment embarked at Portsmouth for Madras. The colonel, the earl of Seaforth, died before they reached St. Helena, when his cousin, Lieutenant-colonel Humberston Mackenzie, succeeded to the command. The regiment was first called the 78th, but the number was subsequently altered to the 72d, and in 1823 it got the name of "the duke of Albany's Highlanders."

When the second battalion of the Ross-shire Highlanders, or 78th regiment, was raised in 1804, one gentleman of this name, Christopher Macrae, brought eighteen of his own clan as part of his portion of recruits for an ensigncy. This regiment served in Egypt in 1807, and at El Hamet, a village on the Nile, nearly six miles above Rosetta, a desperate affair took place, the British being attacked by a strong body of Turks, Albanians, and Arabs, and a great number of officers and men were killed. On this occasion, says General Stewart of Garth, in his 'Sketches of the Highlanders,' "Sergeant John Macrae, a young man about twenty-two years of age, but of good size and strength of arm, showed that the broadsword, in a firm hand, is as good a weapon in close fighting as the bayonet. Macrae killed six men, cutting them down with his broadsword, (of the kind usually worn by sergeants of Highland corps.) when at last he made a dash out of the ranks on a Turk, whom he cut down; but as he was returning to the square he was killed by a blow from behind, his head being nearly split in two by the stroke of a sabre. Lieutenant Christopher Macrae, already mentioned as having brought eighteen men of his own name to the regiment as part of his quota of recruits, for an ensigncy, was killed in this affair, with six of his followers and namesakes, besides the sergeant. On the passage to Lisbon in October 1805, the same sergeant came to me one evening (General Stewart was a major in the regiment) crying like a child, and complaining that the ship's cook had called him English names, which he did not understand, and thrown some fat in his face. Thus a lad who in 1805 was so soft and so childish, displayed in 1807 a courage and vigour worthy a hero of Ossian."

Both males and females of the Macraes are said to have evinced an extraordinary taste for poetry and music. John Macrae, better known among his countrymen as Mac Uirisi, whose family are said to have possessed the gift of poetry for some generations, emigrated to America, in consequence of the innovations on the ancient habits of the Highlanders, and feelingly regretted, in Gaelic verse, his having left his native country. A poem composed by him on a heavy loss of cattle is considered by many equal to anything in the language.

One of this clan was an able governor of Madras, in commemoration of whom a monument is erected on a rising ground in the parish of Prestwick, Ayrshire.

Captain James Macrae of Holmains in April 1790 had the misfortune to shoot Sir James Ramsay of Bamff, baronet, in a duel at Musselburgh, and was obliged in consequence to leave Scotland. He was cited before the high court of justiciary upon criminal letters to take his trial for murder, in the following July, and outlawed for non-appearance. He had previously conveyed his estate to trustees, who, in conformity with his instructions, executed an entail of it. He died abroad 16th January 1820, leaving a son and a daughter.

MACRIMMON, the surname of a minor sept, (the Sìol Chruiminn), who were the hereditary pipers of Macleod of Macleod. They had a sort of seminary for the instruction of learners in bagpipe music, and were the most celebrated bagpipe players in the Highlands. The first of whom there is any notice was Ian Odhar, or dun-coloured John, who lived about 1600. About the middle of the 17th century, Patrick Mor MacRimmon, having lost seven sons, (he had eight in all,) within a year, composed for the bagpipe a touching 'Lament for the children,' called in Gaelic Cumhadh na Cloinne. In 1745 Macleod's piper, esteemed the best in Scotland, was called Donald Ban MacRimmon. When that chief, who was opposed to Prince Charles, with Munro of Culcairn, at the head of 700 men, was defeated by Lord Lewis Gordon, and the Farquharsons, at Inverury, 12 miles from Aberdeen, Donald Ban was taken prisoner. On this occasion, a striking mark of respect was paid to him by his brethren of the bagpipe, which at once obtained his release. The pipers in Lord Lewis' following did not play the next morning, as was their wont, and on inquiry as to this unusual circumstance, it was found by his lordship and his officers that the pipes were silent because MacRimmon was a prisoner, when he was immediately set at liberty. He was, however, shortly afterwards killed in the night attempt, led by the laird of Macleod, to capture the prince at Moyhall, the seat of Lady Macintosh near Inverness.

On the passing of the heritable jurisdiction abolition bill in 1747, the occupation of the hereditary bagpipers was gone. Donald Dubh MacRimmon, the last of them, died in 1822, aged 91. The affecting lament, Tha tìl, tha tìl, tha tìl, Mhàic Chruimìn, "MacRimmon shall never, shall never, shall never return," was composed on his departure for Canada.

MAC RORY, a surname derived from the name Roderick, called Ruari in the Highlands. The clan Rory were so styled from Roderick, the eldest of the three sons of Reginald, second son of Somerled of the Isles by his second marriage. This Roderick was lord of Kintyre and one of the most noted pirates of his day. His descendants became extinct in the third generation. The clan Donald and clan Dougall sprung from Roderick's brothers.

MACSORLEY, a surname derived from the Norse Somerled, which means Samuel. In the Gaelic it is Somhairle. The Camerons of Glenuis were called MacSorley, while those of Strone were MacGillonies, and those of Letterfinlay were MacMartins. These septs, says Gregory, (Highlands and Isles, p. 77.) were all ancient families in Lochaber, and seem to have adopted the surname of Cameron, although not descended of the family.

MACVUIRICH, the surname of a family which for several generations held the office of bard and genealogist to the Macdonalds of Clanranald. Niel MacVuirich, the last of the bardic race, lived to a great age in South Uist, and died in 1726. He wrote in the Gaelic language the history of the Clanranald, as well as collected some ancient poetry, and the annals of past times. All his own compositions have been lost, excepting three pieces which are given in Mackenzie's 'Beauties of Gaelic Poetry,' pp. 65—67.

The following curious and interesting declaration of Lachlan MacVuirich, son of Niel, taken by desire of the Committee of the Highland Society of Scotland, appointed to inquire into the nature and authenticity of the poems of Ossian, will throw much light on the bardic office, as well as furnish some information regarding the celebrated Red Book of Clanranald. It is a translation of the original written in Gaelic, and addressed to Henry Mackenzie, Esq., at the time he was writing the Society's report of Ossian. "In the house of Patrick Nicolson, at Torlum, near Castle Burgh, in the shire of Inverness, on the ninth day of August, appeared, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, Lachlan, son of Niel, son of Lachlan, son of Niel, son of Donald, son of Lachlan, son of Niel Mòr, son of Lachlan, son of Donald, of the surname of MacVuirich, before Roderick M'Neil, Esq. of Barra, and declared, That, according to the best of his knowledge, he is the eighteenth in descent from Muireach, whose posterity had officiated as bards to the family of Clanranald; and that they had from that time, as the salary of their office, the farm of Staolligary, and four pennies of Drimisdale, during fifteen generations; that the sixteenth descendant lost the four pennies of Drimisdale, but that the seventeenth descendant retained the farm of Staolligary for nineteen years of his life. That there was a right given them over these lands, as long as there should be any of the posterity of Muireach to preserve and continue the genealogy and history of the Macdonalds, on condition that the bard, failing of male issue, was to educate his brother's son, or representative, in order to preserve their title to the lands; and that it was in pursuance of this custom that his own father, Niel, had been taught to read and write history and poetry by Donald, son of Niel, son of Donald, his father's brother.

"He remembers well that works of Ossian written on parchment, were in the custody of his father, as received from his predecessors; that some of the parchments were made up in the form of books, and that others were loose and separate, which contained the works of other bards besides those of Ossian.

"He remembers that his father had a book, which was called the Red Book, made of paper, which he had from his predecessors, and which, as his father informed him, contained a good deal of the history of the Highland clans, together with part of the works of Ossian. That none of those books are to be found at this day, because when they (his family) were deprived of their lands, they lost their alacrity and zeal. That he is not certain what became of the parchments, but thinks that some of them were carried away by Alexander, son of the Rev. Alexander Macdonald, and others by Ronald his son; and he saw two or three of them cut down by tailors for measures. That he remembers well that Clanranald made his father give up the Red Book to James Macpherson from Badenoch: that it was near as thick as a Bible, but that it was longer and broader, though not so thick in the cover. That the parchments and the Red Book were written in the hand in which the Gaelic used to be so written of old both in Scotland and Ireland, before people began to use the English hand in writing Gaelic; and that his father knew well how to read the old hand. That he himself had some of the parchments after his father's death, but that because he had not been taught to read them, and had no reason to set any value on them, they were lost. He says that none of his forefathers had the name of Paul, but there were two of them who were called Cathal. He says that the Red Book was not written by one man, but that it was written, from age to age, by the family of Clan Mhuirich, who were preserving and continuing the history of the Macdonalds, and of other heads of Highland clans.

"After the above declaration was taken down, it was read to him, and he acknowledged it was right, in presence of Donald M'Donald of Balronald, James M'Donald of Garylich, Ewan M'Donald of Griminish, Alexander M'Lean of Hoster, Mr. Alexander Nicolson, minister of Benbecula, and Mr. Allan M'Queen, minister of North Uist, who wrote this declaration." The last Lachlan above mentioned as father of Neil Mòr and son of Donald, was called for distinction's sake, Lachlan Mòr Mac Mhuirich Albannaich, or Lachlan Mòr Mac Vuirich of Scotland. He lived in the 15th century, and was the author of a remarkable war-song, composed wholly of epithets arranged in alphabetical order, to rouse the clan Donald previous to the battle of Harlaw. (See Macckenzie's Beauties of Gaelic Poetry, p. 62, Note.)

Every great Highland family had their bard, whose business it was to recite at entertainments the immense stores of poetry which he had hoarded up in his memory, and to preserve the genealogy and commemorate the military actions of the heroes or chiefs. When Neil MacVuirich, the last of the bards, died in 1726, the bardic order became extinct in Scotland.

MADDERTY, BARON. See STRATHALLAN, Viscount of.

MAIR, or MAJOR, JOHN, a scholastic divine and historian, was born at the village of Gleghornie, parish of North Berwick, in 1469. He went to the university of Paris in 1493, and studied at the colleges of St. Barbe and Montacute. In 1496 he became M.A., and 2 years after removed to the college of Navarre. In 1508 he was created D.D. It appears from some passages in his writings that in the early part of the 16th century he was a member of Christ's college, Cambridge. He returned to Scotland in 1518, in which year he became a member of the university of Glasgow, being then styled canon of the chapel royal and vicar of Dunlop. In 1521 he was professor of theology in the university of Glasgow. He subsequently held also the office of treasurer of the royal chapel of Stirling, and about 1523 he became professor of divinity in the college of St. Salvator, St. Andrews, where he remained five years. He was certainly there in 1528, when, at the dawn of the Reformation in Scotland, a friar who had preached a sermon at Dundee against the licentious lives of the bishops, and against the abuse of enrsing from the altar and false miracles, being accused of heresy, "went," says Calderwood, "to Sanct Andrewes, and communicated the heads of his sermon with Mr. Johnne Maior, whose word was then holdin as an oracle in maters of religi-

onn. Mr. Johnne said, his doctrine might weill be defended, and conteaned no heresie." The friar ultimately was compelled to fly to England, where he was cast into prison by command of Henry the Eighth.

Mair himself, although he remained a churchman, in consequence of the religions distractions of the times, went back to Paris, when he resumed his lectures in the college of Montacute. While in France he had among his pupils several who were afterwards eminent for their learning. One of the most distinguished of them was his countryman, George Buchanan, who had studied logic under him at St. Salvator's college, and had followed him to Paris. In 1530 he returned once more to Scotland, and resumed his lectures as professor of theology in the university of St. Andrews. He was present, with the other heads of the university, in the parish church of that city, when John Knox, who had been one of his students, preached his first sermon in public in 1547. Mr. Tytler, in his History of Scotland, (vol. v. p. 211) referring to Patrick Hamilton the martyr, speaks of him as having been "educated at St. Andrews, in what was then esteemed the too liberal philosophy of John Mair, the master of Knox and Buchanan." It was no small honour to have infused into the minds of these three men, the foremost, in their respective provinces, of their age, ideas and principles far in advance of the narrow and bigoted tenets of the churchmen. He was thus, perhaps unconsciously to himself, a not unimportant instrument in helping forward the great work of the Reformation in Scotland, and in promoting the sacred cause of civil and religious liberty.

He is said to have died about 1549, at "a great age, for," says Dr. Mackenzie, in his 'Lives of Eminent Scots Writers,' "in the year 1547, at the national council of the Church of Scotland at Linlithgow, he subscribed by proxy, in quality of dean of theology of St. Andrews, not being able to come himself by reason of his age, which was then seventy-eight, and shortly after he died."

His works were all written in Latin. His Logical Treatises form one immense folio. His Commentary on the Physics of Aristotle makes another. His Theological works, among which is an Exposition of St. Matthew's Gospel, amount to several volumes of the same size. He is best known, however, by his history, 'De Gestis Scottorum,' in which he gives an account of the Scots nation from the earliest antiquity, and rejects many of the fables and fictions of previous historians, such as Wyntoun and Fordoun.

The titles of his works are as follows :

MAITLAND, a surname of Norman origin, in early times written Matulant, Mantalent, or Matalan. Nisbet, in mentioning the name, (Heraldry, vol. i. p. 292.) adds, quasi mutilatus in Bello, as if it had been first given to one maimed or mutilated in war. There can be no doubt that among the followers of William the Conqueror when he came into England, was one bearing this name, whatever may have been its derivation.

The first on record in Scotland was Thomas de Matulant, of Anglo-Norman lineage, the ancestor of the noble family of Lauderdale. He flourished in the reign of William the Lion, and died in 1228. The early history of the family, like that of most of the Anglo-Norman incochers, relates chiefly to the acquisition of lands and donations to some particular abbey or religious house, for they were all great benefactors to the church, and the 'Matulants' formed no exception. Like many Anglo-Norman and Anglo-Saxon families, they settled in Berwickshire. Thomas' son, William de Matulant, was witness to several of the charters of King Alexander II., which proves that he must have been much about the court of that monarch. He died about 1250, leaving a son, Sir Richard Matulant, who, in the reign of Alexander III., was one of the most considerable barons in Scotland, being the owner of the lands and baronies of Thirlestane, Blythe, Tollus, Hedderwick and other properties, all in the shire of Berwick. To Dryburgh abbey, which had been founded little more than a century before, he gifted several lands, "for the welfare of his soul, and the souls of Avicia his wife, his predecessors and successors." His son, William de Mantlant of Thirlestane, confirmed these gifts. He was one of the patriots who joined King Robert the Bruce as soon as he began to assert his right to the crown, and died about 1315.

The son of this baron, Sir Robert Maitland, possessed the lands of Thirlestane in his father's lifetime. Among other charters he had one of the lands of Lethington from Sir John Gifford of Yester, confirmed by King David II., 17th October, in the 17th year of his reign (1345). Just a year afterwards, on the same day of the month, he fell at the battle of Durham, with a brother of his, whose Christian name is not given. By his wife, a sister of Sir Robert Keith, great marshal of Scotland, who was killed in the same battle, he had three sons, John, William, and Robert. The latter married the heiress of Gight, Aberdeenshire, and was ancestor of the Maitlands of Pitriche.

The eldest son, John, got a safe-conduct to go to England in 1363. He obtained from William, earl of Douglas, upon his own resignation, a charter of the lands of Thirlestane and Tollus, to himself and his son, Robert, by his wife, the Lady Agnes Dunbar, daughter of Patrick, earl of March, and died about 1395. His said son, Sir Robert Maitland, got the charge of the castle of Dunbar, from his uncle, George, earl of March, when that rebellious nobleman withdrew into England, in 1398, in consequence of the contract of marriage between his daughter, Lady Elizabeth Dunbar and David, duke of Rothesay, being cancelled, through the intrigues of Archibald, earl of Douglas, surnamed the Grim. In conjunction with Hotspur and Lord Talbot, the earl soon after returned across the border, and laid waste the lands which, having been forfeited, he could no longer call his own. His nephew, Sir Robert Maitland, having surrendered the castle of Dunbar to the earl of Douglas, escaped being involved in his ruin. He and his family were afterwards designed of Lethington. He died about 1434, leaving three sons. Robert, the eldest, was one of the hostages for James I., on his liberation from England in 1424, when his annual revenue was estimated at 400 merks. As he predeceased his father, without issue, William, the second son, succeeded to the family estates. James, the third son, married Egidia, daughter of James Scrymgeour of Dudhope, constable of Dundee, and from his grandson, John, descended the Maitlands of Eccles and other families of the name.

The second but elder surviving son, William Maitland of Lethington and Thirlestane, was the first to change the spelling of his name to its present form. He had a charter from Archibald, duke of Turenne and earl of Douglas, to himself and Margaret Wardlaw, his wife, of the lands of Blythe, Hedderwick, Tollus, and Buncleugh, dated at Linlithgow, 23d March, 1432, his father being then alive. His only son, John, died before 1471. His successor, William Maitland of Lethington, was father of William Maitland of Lethington, described as a man of great bravery and resolution, who was killed at Flodden, with his sovereign, James IV., with whom he was in high favour. By his wife, Martha, daughter of George Lord Seton, he had a son, Sir Richard Maitland, the celebrated collector of the early Scottish poetry, after whom the Maitland Club has been called, and a memoir of whom is given afterwards in larger type. Sir Richard married Mary, daughter of Sir Thomas Cranstoun of Crosbie, and with four daughters, had three sons, the eldest being William, the personage so well known in the history of the reign of the unfortunate Mary, as "Secretary Lethington." Sir John, the second son, was lord high chancellor of Scotland and first lord Maitland of Thirlestane. Of both these brothers memoirs are given subsequently in larger type. Thomas, Sir Richard's third son, was prolocutor with George Buchanan, in his treatise De Jure Regni apud Scotos. The daughters, named Helen, Isabella, Mary, and Elizabeth, all married Berwickshire barons.

Secretary Lethington was twice married. By his first wife, Janet Monteith, he had no issue. By his second wife, Mary, a daughter of Malcolm Lord Fleming, he had, with a daughter, Mary, the wife of the first earl of Roxburgh, a son, James, who, being a Roman Catholic, went to the continent, and died there, without issue. He sold his estate of Lethington, which had been restored to him by a rehabilitation under the great seal, 19th February 1583-4, to his uncle, Sir John Maitland, who carried on the line of the family. A letter from this James Maitland to the learned Camden, is dated from Brussels in 1620.

Sir John, first Lord Maitland of Thirlestane, married Jean, only daughter and heiress of James, lord Fleming, lord high chamberlain of Scotland in the reign of Queen Mary, and by her had a son, John, second Lord Maitland and first earl of Lauderdale (see LAUDERDALE, earl of) and a daughter, Anne, married to Robert, Lord Seton, son of the first earl of Winton.

Connected thus, by frequent intermarriages, with the Seton and Fleming families, who were the most distinguished among the nobles of Scotland for their unswerving attachment to the beautiful and ill-fated Mary, it was no wonder that the Maitlands also signalled themselves by their faithful adherence to her interests, even when her fortunes were at the lowest, and when at last they did transfer their allegiance to her son, they served him with equal truth and loyalty.

The family of Gibson Maitland of Clifton Hall, Mid Lothian, possesses a baronetcy, first conferred, 30th November, 1818, on the Hon. General Alexander Maitland, fifth son of the sixth earl of Lauderdale. Sir Alexander died 14th February 1820. He had, with two daughters, four sons, viz., Alexander Charles, second baronet; William, a midshipman on board the Portsmouth East Indianan, drowned in the Bay of Bengal in 1781; Augustus, an officer in the army, mortally wounded at Egmont-op-Zee, 6th October, 1797; and Frederick, of Hollywich, Sussex, a general in the army, and member of the board of general officers, a commissioner of the Royal military college, and colonel of the 58th regiment. General Frederick Maitland was married and left a family.

Sir Alexander Charles Maitland, second baronet, born 21st November 1755, married Helen, daughter and heiress of Alexander Gibson Wright, Esq. of Clifton Hall, a scion of the Gibsons of Durie in Fifeshire, and with her obtained that estate, and assumed in consequence the name of Gibson. He had, by her, six sons and five daughters. Alexander Maitland Gibson Maitland, the eldest son, an advocate at the Scottish bar, died in September 1828, leaving, by his wife, Susan, eldest daughter of George Ramsay, Esq. of Barnton, four sons and two daughters.

On the death of the second baronet, 7th February 1848, his grandson, Sir Alexander Charles Maitland Gibson Maitland, born in 1820, succeeded as third baronet. He married in 1841, Thomasina Agnes, daughter of James Hunt, Esq. of Pittencreeff, Fifeshire, with issue.

The Maitlands of Dundrennan Abbey and Compstone, in the stewartry of Kirkcubright, and Hermand, in Mid Lothian, are descended from an early branch of the Lauderdale family. Their immediate ancestor was William Maitland, a distinguished Scots ecclesiastic during the latter part of the 17th century, who acquired considerable estates in the stewartry of Kirkcubright.

Thomas Maitland, a lord of session by the judicial title of Lord Dundrennan, born 9th October 1792, passed advocate in 1813, and was solicitor-general for Scotland, under the whig administration in 1840 and 1841, and again from 1846 till the beginning of 1850, when he was appointed a lord of session. In 1845 he was chosen M.P. for Kirkcubrightshire, and died 10th June, 1851. He married, in 1815, Isabella Graham, 4th daughter of James Macdowall, Esq. of Gartland, with issue. His brother, Edward Forbes Maitland, Esq., advocate, was appointed in 1855, and again in 1859, solicitor-general for Scotland. He had previously been depute advocate

Of the name of Maitland there have been many distinguished naval and military officers. Rear-admiral John Maitland, second son of Colonel the Hon. Sir Richard Maitland, third son of the sixth earl of Lauderdale and uncle of Rear-admiral Sir Frederick Lewis Maitland, first saw active service in the West Indies, when he was midshipman on board the Boyne of 98 guns, the flagship of Sir John Jervis, and distinguished himself by his gallantry at Martinique, Guadaloup, &c. He was afterwards lieutenant of the Winchelsea frigate; from which he removed into the Lively, and was in that ship when in 1795 it captured, after an action of three hours, the French ship La Tourterelle. In 1797 he was appointed to the Kingfisher, and on the 1st July succeeded in quelling a mutiny on board his ship, by, with his officers, attacking the mutineers sword in hand, and killing and wounding several of them. This spirited conduct was called "Doctor Maitland's recipe," by the earl of St. Vincent, who recommended its adoption to the fleet on similar emergencies. In command of the Boadicea, he saw much service in the Channel, and on board the Barfleur of 98 guns he served with the Mediterranean fleet until the conclusion of the war with France in 1815. In 1821 he attained the rank of rear-admiral, and died in 1836.

For a memoir of his cousin, Rear-admiral Sir Frederick Lewis Maitland, to whom the emperor Napoleon surrendered on board the Bellerophon after the battle of Waterloo in 1815, see page 637 of volume 2d of this work, under the head LAUDERDALE, Earl of.

MAITLAND, SIR RICHARD, a distinguished poet, lawyer, and statesman, the collector of the early poetry of Scotland, was the son of William Maitland of Lethington, and Martha, daughter of George, second Lord Seton, as already mentioned. He was born in 1496, and having finished the usual course of academical education at the university of St. Andrews, he went to France to study the law. After his return to Scotland, he recommended himself to the favour of James V., and was employed in various public commissions by that monarch, and afterwards by the regent Arran and Mary of Guise. In March 1551 we find him taking his seat on the bench as an extraordinary lord of session, and soon after he was knighted. He was frequently sent as commissioner to settle matters on the borders, and in 1559 concluded the treaty of Upsettlington, afterwards confirmed by Francis and Mary.

As early as October 1560, Sir Richard had the misfortune to lose his sight, but his blindness did not incapacitate him for business. In November 1561 he was admitted an ordinary lord of session, when he took the title of Lord Lethington. Shortly after he was sworn a member of the privy council, and on 20th December 1562 he was nominated lord privy seal. He continued a lord of session during the troublous times of Queen Mary and the regents, in the minority of James VI. His advice to Queen Mary was that of a judicious and faithful counsellor, that she must see her laws kept, or else she would get no obedience. (Douglas' Peerage, vol. ii. p. 67).

In 1563 he was appointed one of the commissioners to whom the rights of individuals to the act of oblivion were to be referred, and on 28th December of that year he was one of the committee chosen to frame regulations for the commissaries then about to be established for the discussion of consistorial causes. In 1567 he resigned the office of lord privy seal, in favour of his second son, John, prior of Coldingham, afterwards created Lord Maitland of Thirlestane. On the 1st July 1584, his great age compelled him to resign his seat on the bench, in favour of Sir Lewis Bellen-den of Anemoull, being allowed the privilege of naming his successor. He had been more than seventy years employed in the public service, and the letter from the king to the court of session on occasion of his retirement from the bench, recorded in the Books of Sederunt, states that he "hes dewlie and faithfully servit our grandshir, gud sir, gud dam, mnder, and ourself, being oftentimes employit in public charges, quhereof he dewtifullie and honestlie acquit himself, and being one of you ordinar number thir mony yeiris, hes diligentlie with all sineerity and integritie servit therein, and now being of werry greit age, and altho' in spreit and jugement able anew to serve as appertenis; be the great age, and being unwell, is sa dibilitat that he is not able to mak sic continual residens as he wald give, and being movit in conscience that be his absence for laik of number, justice may be retardit and parties frustrat, hes willinglie demittit," &c. Sir Richard died March 20, 1586, at the advanced age of 90. For his marriage and children see previous page.

With the single exception of a passage in Knox's History, which imputes to him the having taken bribes to assist Cardinal Bethune to escape from his imprisonment at Seton, but for which it would appear there was no good ground, Sir Richard Maitland is uniformly mentioned by contemporary writers with respect. He collected the "Decisions of the Court of Session from December 15, 1550, to the penult July, 1565," the manuscript of which is preserved in the Advocates' Library. His Collections of Early Scottish Poetry, in two volumes, a folio and a quarto, were, with other MSS., presented by the duke of Lauderdale to Samuel Pepys, Esq., secretary of the admiralty to Charles II. and James II., and the founder of the Pepysian Library at Magdalene College, Cambridge, in which they now remain. A selection from these will be found in Pinkerton's valuable collection of 'Ancient Scottish Poems,' published in 1786. Sir Richard's own Poems were for the first time printed in 1830, in a quarto volume, for the MAITLAND CLUB, which takes its name from him. The best of his poetical pieces are his 'Satyres,' 'The Blind Baron's Comfort,' and a 'Ballad of the Creationn of the World,' the latter of which was inserted in Allan Ramsay's 'Evergreen.' Sir Richard's 'Cronicle and Historie of the House and Sirname of Seaton unto the moneth of November ane thousand five hundred and fifty aught yeires,' with a continuation by Alexander, Viscount Kingston, was printed for the Maitland Club in 1829.

MAITLAND, WILLIAM, accounted the ablest statesman of his age, historically known as "Secretary Lethington," eldest son of the preceding, was one of the principal characters of his time in Scotland. He was born about 1525, and after being educated at the college of St. Andrews, he travelled on the Continent, where he studied civil law. In his youth, instead of following the usual pursuits and amusements of young men of his rank, he applied himself to politics, and became early initiated into all the craft and mystery of statesmanship. Though his political career was vacillating and unsteady, his enterprising spirit, great penetration, and subtle genius are mentioned with admiration by contemporary writers of every party.

He was one of the first to attend the private preaching of John Knox at Edinburgh, about the end of 1555, when he became a convert to the reformed doctrines. When Knox began to reason against the mass, Erskine of Dun invited the Reformer to supper, to resolve some doubts on the subject, "where were assembled," says Calderwood, (v. i. p. 305) "David Forresse, Mr. Robert Lokhart, John Willocke, and William Matlane of Lethington, younger." All their objections against giving up the mass were so fully answered by Knox that Maitland said, "I see perfytely that thir shifts will serve for nothing before God, seing they stand us in so small stead before men." So the mass, which had been attended by many from custom, and "the eschewing of slander," was disowned by the Reformed party from that time.

On 4th December 1558, during the regency of Mary of Guise, Maitland was, by that princess, appointed secretary of state. The violent proceedings of the queen regent against the Reformers, and fears for his life, from his being known to favour the reformed doctrines, induced him, in October of the following year, to join the lords of the congregation, who had taken possession of Edinburgh. The queen regent and the Romish party withdrew to Leith, but within a month the lords fled to Stirling, and the regent re-entered the capital in triumph. Calderwood says, "William Matlane of Lethington, younger, secretarie to the queen, perceiving himself to be suspected as one that favoured the congregation, and to stand in danger of his life if he should remaine at Leith, becaus he spaired not to utter his minde in controversies of religioun, conveyed himself out of Leith, a little before Allhallow Eve, and randered himself to Mr. Kirkaldie, Laird of Grange. He assured the lords there was nothing but craft and falshood in the queene." (Hist. of the Kirk of Scotland, vol. i. p. 553). He was gladly received by the lords, who marked their sense of this his open adhesion to their cause, by sending him to England to lay their position and prospects before Queen Elizabeth, and to crave her aid. She at once sent a fleet to the frith of Forth, to prevent farther assistance being sent from France to the regent, and gave secret instructions to the duke of Norfolk to meet with the Scots commissioners at Berwick, to arrange the conditions on which her assistance was to be given. The commissions appointed by the lords of the congregation to represent them at Berwick on this occasion were, lord James Stewart, afterwards the Regent Moray, Lord Ruthven, the masters of Maxwell and Lindsay, the laird of Pitarrow, Henry Balhaves of Hallhill, and the secretary Maitland. After a great deal of negotiation, a treaty was concluded between Elizabeth and the leaders of the congregation, called the treaty of Berwick, in consequence of which, on the 28th March, an English force under Lord Grey marched into Scotland, and joined the army of the congregation.

Maitland acted as speaker of the parliament in August 1560 which abolished the power and supremacy of the Pope in Scotland, Huntly the chancellor having declined to attend. It is well known that when Queen Mary in the following year was about to sail direct from France to Scotland, Elizabeth despatched a fleet into the Channel, with the avowed purpose of clearing the sea from pirates, but really with the view of intercepting Mary and carrying her prisoner to England. Secretary Maitland and the queen's brother, Lord James Stewart, are charged with recommending this measure to the English minister. On Mary's arrival, however, they were chosen her principal advisers, and on 12th November of the same year (1561) Maitland was made an extraordinary lord of session. According to Calderwood (vol. ii. p. 160), the ratification of the Book of Discipline by the queen met with strong objections from Maitland, who, when it was proposed, sneered, and asked "how many of those who had subscribed it would be subject to it." It was answered, "All the godly." "Will the duke?" (Chateleault), said Maitland. "If he will not," said Ochiltry, "I wish he were seraped out, not only out of that book, but also out of our number and company; for to what purpose shall travail be taken to set the church in order, if it be not kept, or to what end shall men subscribe, if they never mean to perform?" Maitland answered, "Many subscribed them, in fide parentum, as the bairns are baptized." "Ye think that stuff proper," said Knox, "but it is as untrue as unproper. That book was read in public audience; and the heads thereof reasoned upon diverse days, as all that sit here know very well, and yourself cannot deny. No man, therefore, was desired to subscribe that which he understood not." The ratification, however, was refused.

Soon after Maitland was sent as Mary's ambassador to the court of Elizabeth, to salute the latter in his mistress' name, and to make known her good will towards her. After his return to Scotland, he accompanied the queen, in August 1562, in her expedition to the north against the earl of Huntly and the Gordons. On their arrival at Old Aberdeen, we are told there was such a scarcity of accommodation that he and Randolph, the English ambassador, were obliged to sleep together in the same bed. He was present at the battle of Corrichie where Huntly was defeated. On this occasion he exhorted every man to call upon God, to remember his duty, and not to fear the multitude, and made the following prayer: "O Lord, thou that ruleth the heaven and the earth, look upon thy servants whose blood this day is sought, and to man's judgment is sold and betrayed. Our refuge is now unto thee, and our hope is in thee. Judge then, O Lord, this day betwixt us and the earl of Huntly. If ever we have sought unjustly his or their destruction and blood, let us fall on the edge of the sword. If we be innocent, maintain and preserve us, for thy great mercy's sake."

A short time after this Maitland was again sent ambassador to England, and in his absence the nobility blamed him for serving the queen to the prejudice of the commonwealth. On his return therefore he deemed it necessary to strengthen his hands by making friends to himself, and by endeavouring to shake the credit of the earl of Moray at court. In 1563, when Knox appeared before the queen and council to answer a charge of treason, for writing a circular letter to the principal protestant gentlemen, requesting them to meet at Edinburgh, to be present at the trial of two men for a riot at the popish chapel at Holyrood, Mr. Secretary Maitland conducted the prosecution against him. On this occasion he showed himself bitterly hostile to the reformer. When Knox was acquitted by the council, Maitland, who had assured the queen of his condemnation, was enraged at the decision. He brought her majesty, who had retired before the vote, again into the room, and proceeded to call the votes a second time in her presence. This attempt to overawe them incensed the nobility. "What!" said they, "shall the bird of Lethington have power to command us? Shall the presence of a woman cause us offend God? Shall we condemn an innocent man against our conscience, for the pleasure of any creature?" And greatly to the mortification of the queen and the discomfiture of the secretary, they indignantly repeated their former votes, absolving Knox from the charge.

He seems after this to have thought that the reformed clergy assumed too much in their public rebukes, and after a sermon of Knox's colleague, Mr. Craig, against the corruptions of the times, Lethington, says Calderwood, "in the presence of many, gave himself to the devil, if after that day he should regard what should become of ministers, but should do what he might that his companions have a skaire with him, let them bark and blow as much as they list." Knox declaimed against him from the pulpit, on which Maitland mockingly said, "We must recant, and burn our bill, for the preachers are angry."

At a conference with the leading members of the General Assembly, held in June 1564, a long debate ensued between Maitland and Knox, on those points of the reformed doctrines which gave offence to the court, but chiefly as regards the Reformer's mode of prayer for the Queen, and on obedience to her authority. In this memorable disputation, although Maitland had the worst of the argument, he is acknowledged to have acquitted himself with all the acuteness and ingenuity of a practised disputant. An account of this conference will be found at length in Calderwood's History of the Kirk of Scotland, vol. ii. pp. 252—280.

In January 1565, Maitland was appointed an ordinary lord of session, and in April the same year he was despatched to England, to intimate to Elizabeth the intention of Mary to marry the Lord Darnley. In 1566 he joined the conspiracy against Rizzio, "partly finding himself prejudged by this Savoyard in the affairs of his office as secretary, and partly for the favour he then carried to the earl of Moray, then in exile." After Rizzio's murder, he was, for his participation in it, deprived of his office of secretary, and obliged to retire into concealment in Lauderdale, while the other conspirators fled to England, but, before the end of the year, he was restored to favour and allowed to return to court.

On the night of Sunday, February 9, 1567, occurred the murder of Darnley, by the blowing up of the house of the Kirk of Field, which had been procured by Maitland for the King's accommodation, he having been won over by the earl of Bothwell to his designs. With the earl of Morton he solicited and obtained from several lords of Moray's faction, and from eight bishops a declaration in writing, avowing their belief of Bothwell's innocence of the murder, and recommending him as a proper husband for the queen. It is alleged that the queen had previously consented to this marriage; but her defenders deny this, and aver that the writings which she was said to have signed was a forgery of the secretary Maitland. He joined the confederacy of the nobles for the removal of Bothwell, and after the surrender of the queen at Carberry Hill, and her imprisonment in the castle of Lochleven, he wrote to her, offering his service, and using as an argument the apologue of the mouse delivering the lion taken in the net. He also proposed that, after providing for the safety of the young prince and the security of the protestant religion, the queen should be re-established in her authority. He, however, attended the coronation of King James VI., on 29th July 1567, and although he was one of the secret advisers of the escape of the queen from Lochleven castle, he yet fought against her on the field of Langside.

In September 1568, when the regent Moray was called to the conferences at York, Maitland was one of the nine commissioners chosen to accompany him. The regent, says Spottiswood, (Hist. p. 218,) was unwilling to take him, but more afraid to leave him in Scotland. On the other hand, Calderwood says, (vol. ii. p. 429,) Secretary Lethington was very reluctant to go, but he was induced by fair promises of lands and money, "for it was not expedient to leave behind them a factious man, that inclined secretly to the queen." While in England so great was his duplicity that, we are told, almost every night he had secret communication with Mary's chief commissioners, and forewarned them of the regent's intentions. He went out to the fields with the duke of Norfolk, under the pretence of hunting, but in reality to consult with him as to the best means of forwarding the queen's interests, and he it was who first conceived the fatal project of a marriage between Mary and the duke, as a probable means of restoring her to liberty, if not of replacing her on the throne.

He was one of the two commissioners selected by Moray, about the end of October, to proceed to London to Queen Elizabeth, Mr. James Mackgill of Rankellour being the other, and he was sent with him not so much to assist him as to watch his proceedings. After his return to Scotland, by his secret intrigues he prevailed upon Lord Home, Kirkaldy of Grange, and several of his former associates, to join the queen's faction, and retired to Perth for a time with his friend the earl of Athol. The regent, suspecting him to be the contriver of all the plots and conspiracies, in favour of Mary, in England and Scotland, sent to him to attend a council at Stirling, and while sitting in council he was arrested, on 3d September 1569, by Captain Thomas Crawford, a retainer of the earl of Lennox, on the charge of being accessory to the murder of the king's father, Lord Darnley. Security to answer the charge having been offered and refused, he was committed a prisoner to the castle of Stirling, whence he was removed to Edinburgh, and given into the custody of Alexander Hume of North Berwick. Kirkaldy of Grange, governor of the castle, went to Hume's house at night, and by pretending a warrant from the regent, induced him to deliver Maitland to him, when he was carried to the castle.

On the 21st November, the day appointed for Maitland's trial, a great number of his friends came to Edinburgh, and he not being forthcoming, the regent found himself compelled to postpone his trial. Kirkaldy offered to produce him, if there were any one present to accuse him, and, as none appeared, the secretary's brother, John, afterwards Lord Maitland of Thirlestane, protested that as there was no prosecutor he was entitled to his liberty.

After the murder of the regent Moray in January 1570, the lords assembled to consult upon the affairs of the country, when Maitland had the address to obtain from them a declaration acquitting him of all the charges against him. The Lord Ochiltree desired him to give his oath for their greater satisfaction, which he did. He and Kirkaldy now exerted themselves to effect a compromise between the rival factions, but all their endeavours were unavailing. He was the author of the letter sent by the queen's lords to Elizabeth, towards the end of March, in behalf of Mary, and among the signatures appears his as "William Matlane, Comptroller." At this time he was the life and soul of the queen's party, and there was great resort to him of all who favoured her cause. His house was, therefore, called the school, and himself the schoolmaster, and such as repaired to him his disciples.

Retiring into Athol, he attended the council of the queen's friends held there, which was called the council of Ballach. He and two of his brothers were summoned to take their trial at Edinburgh, but as they did not appear, they were denounced rebels. He was deprived of his office of secretary by the regent Lennox, who sent troops to ravage his lands as well as those of his father, Sir Richard Maitland. At this time he himself was corresponding with Mary, sending her letters to be subscribed by her and forwarded to the kings of France and Spain, the emperor of Germany and the Guises, that they might exert themselves on her behalf. He now resolved to join Kirkaldy in Edinburgh castle. He therefore arrived at Leith, the 10th April 1571, and was carried up to the castle by six workmen, says

Baumatyne in his Journal, (p. 130.) "with sting and ling, (that is, by poles like a litter,) and Mr. Robert Maitland (dean of Aberdeen and a lord of session) holding up his head; and when they had put him in at the castell yeat, ilk ane of the workmen gat iii shil: which they receivit grudginglie, hoping to have gottin mair for their labouris."

In a parliament held at the head of the Canon-gate, May 14, 1571, Maitland was proclaimed a traitor to his country, and attainted, with his two brothers, John and Thomas. He was the principal speaker on the queen's side in the discussion which, soon after, took place with certain of the king's party, who had gone to the castle with the view, if possible, of bringing the two factions to an agreement, but which came to nothing. It was by his fatal counsels that Kirkaldy of Grange resolutely held out that fortress for Queen Mary, in the hope of receiving succours from France, even after the Hamiltons, with Huntly, and the other nobles friendly to her cause, had submitted to the regent. He, also, like the deluded but chivalrous knight of Grange, brought "a railing accusation" against Knox, as a short time before the Reformer's death, he sent to the kirk session of Edinburgh, a complaint against him, for having publicly in his sermons and otherwise, slandered him as an atheist and enemy to all religion; in that he had charged him with saying in the castle that there was neither heaven nor hell, which were only devised to frighten children, "with other such language, tending to the like effect." His letter thus continues:

"Which words, before God, never at anie time proceeded from my mouth; nor yitt anie other sounding to the like purpose, nor whereof anie suche sentence might be gathered. For, praised be God, I have beene brought up from my youth, and instructed in the feare of God; and to know that he hath appointed heaven for the habitation of the elect, and hell for the everlasting dwelling place of the reprobate. Seing he hath thus ungentlie used me, and neglected his duetie, vocation, the rule of Christian charitie, and all good order, maliciouslie and untruellie leing on me, I crave redresse therof at your hands: and that yee will take suche order therewith, that he may be compelled to nominat his authors, and prove his alledgance (or allegation); to the end that, if it be found true, as I am well assured he sall not be able to verifie it in anie sort, I may worthilie be reputed the man he painteth me out to be. And if (whereof I have no doubt) the contrarie fall out, yee may use him accordingly: at least, that hereafter ye receive not everie word proceeding from his mouth as oracles; and know that he is but a man subject to vanitie, and manie times doeth utter his owne passionns and other men's inordinate affections, in place of true doctrine. It is convenient that, according to the Scriptures, yee believe not everie spirit, but that yee trie the spirits whether they are of God or not. (Signed) WILLIAM MATLANE."

In his reply, given literally from his deathbed, and verbally, Knox declared that the works of Maitland and those who acted with him testified that they denied there was any God, or heaven or hell, wherein virtue should be rewarded or vice punished. He declined to name his authors, as required by Maitland, and referring to that part of his complaint which affirmed that he was "a man subject to vanity," and that the words from his mouth should not be received as oracles, &c., he said that the words which he had spoken would be found as true as the oracles which had been uttered by any of the servants of God before; for he had said nothing but that whereof he had a warrant out of the word, namely, that the justice of God should never be satisfied till the blood of the shedders of innocent blood were shed again, or God moved them to unfeigned repentance. He added that Maitland was the chief author of all the troubles raised both in England and Scotland. When Mr. David Lindsay went to the castle, by Knox's request, to communicate the Reformer's memorable dying prediction to Kirkaldy, Maitland sent out the sneering message to him, "Go, tell Mr. Knox he is but a dirty prophet." Lindsay reported this to Knox, who said, "I have been earnest with my God auent the two men. For the one (meaning Kirkaldy) I am sorry that so shall befall him, yet God assureth me that there is mercy for his soul. For the other (meaning Maitland) I have no warrant that ever he shall be weil." Just a week thereafter, Knox died.

At length, the castle being closely besieged by the regent Morton, and an English force under Sir William Drury, marshal of Berwick, surrendered to the latter, after a month's obstinate resistance, May 29th, 1573. Kirkaldy and his brother were hanged at the cross of Edinburgh, but Maitland escaped this ignominious fate by dying in prison in Leith, June 9th, 1573. Calderwood (vol. iii. p. 285) says he "poisoned himself, as was reported," and Melville (p. 256) "that he died at Leith befor that the rest wer delyuerit to the shamles; some supposing he took a drink, and died as the auld Romans wer wont to do." He is said to have lain so long unburied that the vermin came from his corpse, creeping out under the door of the house where he was lying.

Calderwood (vol. iii. page 285) thus sums up his character: "This man was of a rare witt, but sett upon wrong courses, which were contrived and followed out with falsehood. He could conforme himself to the times, and therefore was compared by one, who was not ignorant of his courses, to the chameleon. A discourse went from hand to hand, before the siege of the castell, intituled, The Chameleon, wherein all his wyles and tricks were described." He thus concludes, after showing that he had trafficked with all parties: "At the parliament holdin after the taking of the queene, he, with some others, partakers of the murthier (of Darnley), would have had her putt to death. When that purpose wrought not, he solicited some private men to hang her in her owne bed, with her belt, that he, and his partners in the murthier, might be out of feare of suche a witness. When this counsell was not heard, then he turned himself to flatter the queene, and sent to Loehlevin the apologue of the lyon delivered by the mouse out of the snare."

Buchanan it was who portrayed the character of Secretary Lethington in his tract called 'The Chameleon.' Bannatyne calls him "the father of traitors," and designates him "Mitchell Wylie," a corruption doubtless of Macchiavelli.

MAITLAND, SIR JOHN, a distinguished statesman, the first Lord Maitland of Thirlestane, second son of Sir Richard Maitland, the poet, and younger brother of the preceding, was born in 1537. After being educated at home by his father, he was sent, as was the custom in those days, to France, where he studied the law. On his return, through the influence of his brother, the secretary, he obtained the abbaey of Kelso in commendam, which he soon exchanged with Francis Stewart, afterwards earl of Bothwell, the queen's nephew, for the priory of Coldingham. The queen's ratification of this transaction took place in February 1567. On the 20th April of the same year, he was appointed lord privy seal, on his father's resignation of that office in his favour, and he was confirmed in it by the regent Moray on the 26th of the following August. On the 2d June 1568, he was constituted one of the spiritual lords of session.

Like his brother, Secretary Lethington, the prior of Coldingham ranged himself on the regent's side, on the dethronement of Queen Mary, but after Moray's assassination he joined the lords who met on the queen's behalf at Linlithgow, and thereafter remained steady in his attachment to her cause. He was denounced rebel by the king's faction in the end of 1570, and forfeited, with his two brothers, in the parliament which met in the Canongate in the following May. He was deprived of the office of lord privy seal, which was given to George Buchanan, while the priory of Coldingham was bestowed on George Home of Manderston. He then retired to the castle of Edinburgh, then held by Kirkaldy of Grange for the queen, and continued with him till its surrender on 29th May 1573. The regent Morton sent him prisoner to Tantallan castle, on the sea-coast of Haddingtonshire, where he was confined for nine months. His ward was then enlarged, and he was allowed to reside at Lord Somerville's house of Cowthally, with the liberty of two miles around it, under a penalty of £10,000, if he went beyond these bounds. He was subsequently permitted the range of the counties of Ayr and Renfrew.

On the fall of Morton, he was set at full liberty by an act of council in 1578. He then went to court, and soon obtained the favour of the king. On 26th April, 1581, he was restored to his seat on the bench. He was shortly afterwards knighted and sworn a privy councillor, and 18th May 1584 made secretary of state. His forfeiture was rescinded in the parliament which met on the 22d of that month, and in the following year, he succeeded, greatly to the satisfaction of the king, in effecting a reconciliation with the exiled nobles, on their return to Scotland. On 31st May 1586 he was appointed vice-chancellor of the kingdom.

In 1587, Sir John Maitland was accused by Captain Stewart, some time earl of Arran, and then chancellor, to whom he had at one time adhered, but had latterly deserted, of being accessory to the execution of Queen Mary and of intending to betray the king into the hands of Elizabeth. Stewart was ordered to enter within the palace of Linlithgow, there to abide the issue of his accusation, but disobeyed the command. He was, in consequence, deprived of the office of lord high chancellor, which was immediately conferred upon Maitland.

Two years afterwards, the earls of Huntly, Crawford, and Bothwell, personal enemies of the chancellor, formed a design to march, with their followers, to Holyrood-house, make themselves masters of the king's person, and put the chancellor to death. On the night in which it was to be carried into effect, however, the king remained in the same house with the chancellor, and thus frustrated their intentions. All their subsequent plots against him were likewise defeated. On the 22d October of the same year (1589) Sir John Maitland, as chancellor, embarked with the king at Leith on his voyage to Norway, to bring home his bride, the princess Anne of Denmark, who had been driven in there by contrary winds. The royal party spent the ensuing winter at Copenhagen, where Maitland became intimately acquainted with Tycho Brahe, the celebrated Danish astronomer, to whom he addressed several complimentary verses. While in Denmark, he wrote some letters on state affairs to Mr. Robert Bruce at home, to whom had been intrusted the care of the country in the king's absence. These letters, as well as those of James to the same faithful and energetic minister, were dated from the castle of Cronenburgh, and the last of Maitland's from Elsinore.

He returned with the king and queen on the 1st of May 1590, and on the 17th of the same month, the coronation day of the latter, he was created a peer, by the title of Lord Maitland of Thirlestane. In the procession to the abbey kirk, where the ceremony took place, he carried the queen's matrimonial crown. The title was granted to him and the heirs male of his body, by letters patent, dated 18th May 1590. The following year he resigned his office of secretary of state, which was conferred on his nephew, Sir Richard Cockburn of Clerkington. In February 1592 occurred the murder at Donibristle in Fife of the "bonny earl of Moray" by the earl of Huntly. The king and the chancellor were suspected of having been previously aware of Huntly's intention, and Maitland is said to have "hounded on" that nobleman to the cruel deed. "Camden in his annals," says Calderwood, (vol. iv. p. 145,) "layeth the whole burden upon the chancellor to clear the king; but it is known that these his annals were composed at the king's direction and pleasure." So great was the murmuring of the citizens of Edinburgh on the occasion that the king and the chancellor found themselves obliged to go, for a time, to Lord Hamilton's house of Kinneil in Linlithgowshire, and it was with great difficulty that the provost and magistrates restrained the crafts of the city from taking arms to prevent their departure. The pay of the soldiers of the king's guard being in arrear, they seized the chancellor's trunks and coffers, which had been placed on horseback, and did not restore them till a solemn promise was made that they should be duly paid all that was due to them.

The turbulent earl of Bothwell, who kept the king and court in constant fear and turmoil, and whose bitter hostility had frequently been directed against the chancellor, had favourers even in the palace, and the queen herself was brought to lend her powerful influence against Maitland. On the penult day of March 1592, he was commanded to remove from court, on which he retired to Lethington, but was soon restored to favour. It was principally by his advice that the king was induced to consent to the act of parliament, passed in June of the same year, for the ratification of the liberty of the presbyterian church, in other words, for its legal establishment. His object in persuading the king to this measure is said to have been to ingratiate himself with the ministers and people, and to strengthen himself against his enemy Bothwell. With the queen he had a dispute relative to the lands of Musselburgh, which caused his retirement from court for a whole year. On her coming to Scotland, the abbey of Dunfermline, with its lands and privileges, had been conferred upon her by the king. Among these was the manor of Musselburgh, a grant of which had been made to the abbey of Dunfermline by David I., that "sair saunt to the croon." The regality of Musselburgh and the property connected with it had, some years before the queen's marriage, come into the possession of Chancellor Maitland, and as he refused to resign them to the queen, her animosity was but the more increased against him. By the king's advice he passed the following year in the country, but in May 1593, he returned to court and was restored to the exercise of his office. The vast estate, it may be stated, of the lordship of Musselburgh, or of the whole of the ancient Great Inveresk and Little Inveresk, continued in the family till 1709, when it was purchased by Anne, duchess of Buccleuch, the widow of the duke of Monmouth, from John, fifth earl of Lauderdale, who died the following year. Subjoined is the chancellor's portrait, from an engraving in Smith's Iconographia Scotica :

The keeping of the young prince Henry had been intrusted by the king to the earl of Mar, but as the queen wished to remove him from Mar's charge, the chancellor, willing to make a friend of her majesty, entered into her plans. This roused the anger of James, who reproved him very sharply for his interference in a matter with which he had nothing to do. Deeply mortified, he retired to Lauder, where, after two months' illness, he died, October 3d, 1595. He was visited on his deathbed by Andrew Melville and his nephew, Robert Bruce, and had he lived it is thought that the evils with which, soon after, the national church was assailed, would have been averted. The king regretted him much, and composed an epitaph to his memory.

Lord Thirlestane, like his father, has obtained a high character from his contemporaries, for his eminent abilities and amiable disposition. Spotswood says: "He was a man of rare parts and of a deep wit, learned, full of courage, and most faithful to his king and master. No man did ever carry himself in his place more wisely, nor sustain it more courageously against his enemies."

Besides a satire 'Against Slanderis Tongues,' and 'An Admonition to the Earl of Mar,' published by Pinkerton, and described by him as the best state poem which he had ever read, he wrote several Latin epigrams, inserted in the second volume of the 'Delitiæ Poetarum Scotorum.' The poems attributed to him have been printed with those of his father, Sir Richard Maitland, by the Maitland Club, in a volume issued in 1829.

MATTLAND, JOHN, second earl and only duke of Lauderdale, see vol. ii. page 634.

MATTLAND, WILLIAM, an historical and antiquarian writer, was born at Brechin about 1693. His original occupation was that of a hair merchant, in which character he travelled in Sweden, Denmark, and Germany, and by his business he appears to have acquired some wealth. At length, settling in London, he turned his attention to the study of antiquities, and produced several compilations, which were well received at the time, but are now of small repute. In 1733, he was elected a member of the Royal Society, and in 1735 a fellow of the Antiquarian Society, but resigned the latter honour in 1740, on his return to Scotland. He died at Montrose, July 16, 1757. His works are:

MALCOLM, a surname originally Gillicolane or Gillichal-lum, derived from two Gaelic words signifying the servant of St. Columba. Somerled, thane of Argyle, had a son of this name, who was slain with him near Renfrew in 1164.

The chief of the clan Challym or the MacCallums, an Argyleshire sept, originally styled the clan Challym of Arisked-nish, is Malcolm of Pottaloch, whose family has been settled from a very early period in that county. One of this house, called Zachary Uad Donald Mor of Pottaloch, was killed May 25, 1647, at Ederline, in South Argyle, in single combat with Sir Alexander Macdonald, called Allaster Mae Colkit-toch, or left-handed. He was in the force of the marquis of Argyle when General David Leslie advanced into Kintyre to drive out the royalists, and was renowned in his day for his great strength. It is alleged that he slew seven of his assailants before he was himself slain. He was getting the better of Colkitto, when a Maclean came behind him with a scythe and hamstrung him; he was then easily overpowered.

In 1414, Sir Duncan Campbell of Lochow granted to Reginald Malcolm of Corbarron, certain lands of Craignish, and on the banks of Loch Avich, in Nether Lorn; with the office of hereditary constable of his castles of Lochaffy and Craignish. This branch became extinct towards the end of the 17th century, as Corbarron or Corran is said to have been bequeathed by the last of the family to Zachary MacCallum of Pottaloch, who succeeded his father in 1686.

Dugald MacCallum of Pottaloch, who inherited the estate in 1779, appears to have been the first to adopt permanently the name of Malcolm as the family patronymic. Besides Pottaloch, the family possesses Kilmartin house and Dun-troon castle, in the same county.

John Malcolm, Esq., of Pottaloch, born in 1805, a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for Argyleshire and Kent, succeeded his brother, Neill, in 1857. Educated at Harrow and Oxford, he became B.A. in 1827 and M.A. in 1830. He married 2d daughter of the Hon. John Wingfield, Stratford, son of 3d Viscount Powerscourt, with issue. Heir, his son, John Wingfield.

The Malcolms of Balbeadie and Grange, Fifeshire, possess a baronetcy of Nova Scotia, conferred in 1665. In the reign of Charles I., Sir John Malcolm, eldest son of John Malcolm of Balbeadie, acquired the lands of Lochore in the same county. A branch of the Malcolms of Lochore and Innertiel settled in Dumfriesshire.

In 1746, Sir Michael Malcolm, baronet, being related to the last Lord Balmerino, was sent for to be present at his execution on Tower-hill. A daughter of Lord Chancellor Bathurst saw him on the scaffold, and fell in love with him. He subsequently married her.

Sir Michael sold the estate of Lochore, which subsequently came into the possession of Mr. Jobson, whose daughter married the 2d Sir Walter Scott, baronet.

On Sir Michael's death, the title devolved upon James Malcolm of Grange, and at the death of the latter in 1795, upon John Malcolm of Balbeadie, descended from the youngest brother of the first baronet. Sir John's son, Sir Michael Malcolm, married in 1824, Mary, youngest daughter of John Forbes, Esq., of Bridgend, Perth, and with three daughters, had one son, Sir John Malcolm, born April 1, 1828, who succeeded to the baronetcy, on the death of his father in 1833.

MALCOLM I., King of Scots, was the son of Donal IV., who reigned from 893 to 904. On the abdication of Constantine III., Malcolm succeeded to the throne in 944. In 945, Edmund, the Saxon king of England, ceded Cumberland and part of Westmoreland to him, on condition that he would defend that northern territory, and become the ally of England. Edred, the brother and successor of Edmund, accordingly applied for, and obtained the aid of Malcolm against Anlaf, king of Northumberland, which latter country he wasted, and carried off the inhabitants with their cattle.

In the time of Malcolm I., the people of the province of Moray, in the north-east of Scotland, were a mixed race, formed of Scandinavian settlers, with Scottish and Pictish Celts. Turbulent and rebellious, they were continually at war with the sovereign, and an insurrection having occurred under Cellaeh, maormor of Garmoran, Malcolm marched north to reduce them to obedience. He slew Cellaeh, but was, some time thereafter, assassinated in 953 at Ulurn, supposed by Shaw to be Auldearn, after a reign of nine years. Other accounts state his death to have taken place at Fodresach or Forres. He was succeeded by Indulph, the son of Constantine II., and Indulph had for his successor, Duff, the son of Malcolm, who mounted the throne in 961. Another son of Malcolm I., Kenneth III., succeeded in 971, after an intermediate possessor of the throne named Culen, the son of Indulph.

MALCOLM II., King of Scots, the son of Kenneth III., succeeded to the throne in 1003, and had a troublous reign of about thirty years. He defeated and slew Kenneth IV. at Monievairst in Strathearn, and in consequence became king. His first annoyance came from the Danes who, in previous reigns, had made several attempts to effect a settlement in Scotland, but had been defeated in them all. They had secured a firm footing in England, and the year after Malcolm's accession to the throne, they commenced the most formidable preparations, under their celebrated king, Sweyn, for a new expedition to the Scottish coasts. He ordered Olaus, his viceroy in Norway, and Enet in Denmark, to raise a powerful army, and to fit out a suitable fleet for the enterprise.

The coast of Moray was chosen as the scene of the menaced invasion. Effecting a descent near Speymouth, the Danes carried fire and sword through that province, and laid siege to the fortress of Nairn, then one of the strongest castles in the north of Scotland. They were forced to raise the siege for a time by Malcolm, who hastening against them with an army, encamped in a plain near Killflos or Kinlos. In this position he was attacked by the Danes, and forced to retreat, after being seriously wounded. The fortress of Nairn then capitulated to the invaders, but in violation of an express condition that their lives should be saved, the whole garrison were immediately hanged.

To expel the Danes from Moray, Malcolm mustered all his forces, and in the spring of 1010, with a powerful army he encamped at Mortlach. The Danes advanced to give him battle, and a fierce and sanguinary conflict ensued, the result of which was long doubtful. Three of the Scottish commanders fell at the very commencement of the engagement, when a panic seized their followers, and the king was borne along with them in their retreat till he was opposite the church of Mortlach, then a chapel dedicated to St. Molaeh. There, while his army were partially pent up in their flight by the contraction of the vale and the narrowness of the pass, he made a vow to endow a religious house on the field of battle should he obtain the victory. Then, rallying and rousing his troops by an animated appeal to their patriotism, and placing himself at their head, he wheeled round upon the Danes, threw Enotus, one of the Danish generals, from his horse, and killed him with his own hand. The Scots, catching his spirit, made an impetuous onset on the enemy, whom they drove from the field, thickly strewing the ground with their corpses. In gratitude to God for this signal victory, Malcolm got the church of Mortlach converted into a cathedral, and the village into the seat of a diocese, said to have been the earliest bishopric in Scotland. His endowment of it was confirmed by Pope Benedict, but in 1139

the bishopric was removed to Aberdeen. In the order of precedence, while this see lasted, it ranked next to that of St. Andrews. It was long thought that, during their occupation of Moray, the Danes had fortified Burgh Head, but the remains there found are now believed to be either of Roman or Pictish construction.

To revenge this defeat and other disasters which, at this time, the invaders experienced on the coasts of Angus and Buchan, Sweyn, the Danish king, despatched Canms, one of the ablest of his generals, to the Scottish shores. He had scarcely, however, effected a landing on the coast of Angus, in the neighbourhood of Carnoustie, than he was attacked in the plains of Barrie by Malcolm, at the head of a considerable army, and, after a bloody contest, defeated with great loss. He sought safety in flight, but was closely pursued, and killed. The place of his overthrow is indicated by a monumental stone, called the Cross of Canms, which stands on a small tumulus at Camustown, a village which has been named after him, in the parish of Monkie. The tumulus, according to tradition, contains the remains of Canms, and the story of the old chroniclers is that, after his defeat, he fled northwards, with a view to escape to Moray, where were some of his ships, but was pursued and overtaken here by Robert, the remote ancestor of the earls Marischal, who killed him by cleaving his skull with his battle-axe. About the year 1620, the tumulus was opened by order of Sir Patrick Maule, afterwards first earl of Panmure, when a skeleton of large dimensions in good preservation was discovered, with part of the skull wanting.

The Danes, however, were not to be deterred even by the repeated defeats which they had sustained, from their long cherished but often baffled scheme of the conquest of North Britain. And as for the Scots, the spirit which animated them has been well expressed in the lines of Home:

“The Danes have landed, we must beat them back,
Or live the slaves of Denmark.

In 1014, another Danish force landed on the coast of Buchan, about a mile west from Slaines castle, in the parish of Crnden. The Danes on this occasion were led by Sweyn's celebrated son, Canute, afterwards king of England and Denmark, and again they experienced a signal overthrow. The site of the field of battle has been ascertained by the discovery of human bones left exposed by the shifting or blowing of the sand. Some writers assert that a treaty was entered into with the Danes, by which it was stipulated that the field of battle should be consecrated by a bishop as a burying-place for those of their countrymen who had fallen, and that a church should be there built and priests appointed in all time coming, to say masses for the souls of the slain. It is certain that a chapel was erected in this neighbourhood, dedicated to St. Olaus, the site of which has become invisible by being covered with sand. Another and far more important stipulation, it is said, was made by which the Danes agreed to quit every part of the Scottish coasts, and this was followed by the final departure, the same year, of these ruthless invaders from Scotland.

Malcolm was next engaged in war with the Northumbrians, and having, in 1018, led his army to Carham, near Werk, on the southern bank of the Tweed, he was met there by Uchtred earl of Northumberland, when a desperate battle took place. The victory was claimed by Uchtred, who was, soon after, assassinated, when on his way to pay his obeisance to the great Canute. To prevent an invasion of his territories, Eadolph, his brother and successor, in the year 1020, ceded to Malcolm the fertile region of Lodonia, or Lothian. That extensive and beautiful district had formerly been a part of the Anglo-Saxon kingdom of Northumbria, which in the time of Edwin, from whom Edinburgh derives its name, and who began his reign in 617, had extended from the Humber to the Avon; but ever after it had thus been acquired by Malcolm II., it formed an integral portion of the Scottish dominions. On this occasion, Malcolm gave oblations to the churches and gifts to the clergy, who, in return, bestowed on him the proud designation of vir victoriosissimus.

In 1031, Canute, the Danish king of England, the most powerful monarch of his time, invaded Scotland, to compel Malcolm to do homage for Cumbria, which he had refused, on the ground that Canute was a usurper; but, after some negotiations, Duncan, Malcolm's grandson, afterwards king, agreed to fulfil the conditions on which that territory had been granted to the Scots, and Canute immediately returned to England.

Malcolm died in 1033, and was buried at Iona, the usual place of sepulchre, for many centuries, of the Scottish kings.

IONA.

Both Boece and Fordun assert that Malcolm II. was murdered in the central tower of the castle of Glamis in Forfarshire, which seems to have been his usual place of residence. Wyntoun states that the cause of the insurrection which led to his assassination was that he had ravished a virgin. His words are :

“ ——— he had rewyst a fayre May
Of the land there lyan by.”

Tradition still pretends to point out a passage in the castle, with blood-stains on the floor, where the fatal act was perpetrated. It avers also that the ground being covered with snow, the assassins, in their flight, mistook their way, and unconsciously entered on the loch of Forfar, when the ice broke, and they were drowned ; a very convenient method of getting rid of imaginary murderers. The whole story is a fiction of that fertile inventor of Scottish history, Hector Boece, and is totally incredible, even although no less than three obelisks, with symbolie characters, representative of the conspiracy and the pursuit of the fancied regicides, have for centuries stood in different parts of the parish of Glamis, to commemorate it. Pinkerton (Enquiry, vol. ii. p. 192) contends that Malcolm died a natural death, which is more likely than the fabulous account of his assassination.

The authenticity of the pretended laws of Malcolm, called the Leges Malcolmi, has been denied by Lord Hailes. He, however, introduced many improvements into the internal policy of his kingdom, and in him the church always found a guardian and benefactor.

Malcolm's daughter, Bethoc, married Crinan, abbot of Dunkeld, and this marriage gave a long line of kings to Scotland, ending with Alexander III. Their son, Duncan, succeeded his maternal grandfather on the throne, and was “ the gracious Duncan,” murdered by Macbeth. Crinan is styled by Fordun, Abthanus de Dull ac Seneschallus Insularum. The title of abthane appears to have belonged to an abbot who possessed a thanedom. It was peculiar to Scotland, and only three abthaneries are named in ancient records, namely, those of Dull in Athol, Kirkmichael in Strathardle, and Madderty in Strathearn. The title of thane, previously known in England, was not used in Scotland till the introduction of the Saxon policy into the latter kingdom by Edgar, who began his reign in 1097. The three thanedoms mentioned under the name of abthaneries appear to have been vested in the crown, and were conferred by Edgar on his younger brother, Ethelred, who was abbot of Dunkeld. On Ethelred's death they reverted to the crown.

In the time of Crinan, "there was certainly," says Mr. Skene, "no such title in Scotland, but it is equally certain that there were no charters, and although Crinan had not the name, he may have been in fact the same thing. He was certainly abbot of Dunkeld, and he may have likewise possessed that extensive territory which, from the same circumstance, was afterwards called the abthanedom of Dull. Fordun certainly inspected the records of Dunkeld, and the circumstance can only be explained by supposing that Fordun may have there seen the deed granting the abthanedom of Dull to Ethelred, abbot of Dunkeld, which would naturally state that it had been possessed by his proavus Crinan, and from which Fordun would conclude that as Crinan possessed the thing, he was also known by the name of Abthanus de Dull. From this, therefore, we learn the very singular fact that the race which gave a long line of kings to Scotland, were originally lords of that district in Athol lying between Strathtay and Rannoch, which was afterwards termed the Abthania de Dull." (Skene's Highlands of Scotland, vol. ii. pp. 137, 138.)

Departing from the generally received history of Scotland at this remote and confused period of our annals, Mr. Skene is of opinion, from the remarkable coincidence which he found between the Irish annals and the Norse Sagas, that two Malcolms of different families reigned in Scotland during the thirty years allotted to one, the second of these Malcolms being in possession of the throne the last four years of that time. From his account of the second Norwegian kingdom in the north of Scotland, which lasted only seven years, that is, from 986 to 993, (vol. i. p. 108,) we learn that Sigurd, the 14th earl of Orkney, after having defeated a Celtic army under Kenneth and Melsnechtan, maormors of Dala (Argyle) and Ross, in an attempt on their part to recover Caithness, in which Melsnechtan was slain, was obliged to retire to the Orkneys, by the approach of Malcolm, maormor of Moray, with a large Scottish force, and he was never afterwards able to regain a footing on the mainland of Scotland. He had previously made himself master of the districts of Ross, Moray, Sutherland, and Argyle, but had been driven out of them by a sudden rising of their maormors. These districts were left in possession of Malcolm, who was enabled, by his increased power and influence, and great personal talents, even to seat himself on the throne itself. In what his title to the crown consisted is not known, but whatever it was, he was supported in it by the Celtic inhabitants of the whole of the north of Scotland. His descendants, for many generations afterwards, constantly asserted their right to the throne, and as invariably received the assistance of the Celtic portion of its inhabitants. "In all probability," says Mr. Skene, "the Highlanders were attempting to oppose the hereditary succession in the family of Kenneth M'Alpin, and to introduce the more ancient Pictish law." Kenneth III. is said to have got a law passed by his chiefs, on the moot-hill of Scone, that the son, or nearest male heir of the king, should always succeed to the throne, and when not of age, that a regent should be appointed to rule the kingdom in his name until he attained his fourteenth year, when he should assume the reins of government. As the sovereignty was not transmitted by the strict line of hereditary descent, brothers, by the law of tanistry, being preferred to sons in the succession, rival contests and civil wars for the crown were frequent. Kenneth's law, if passed at all, of which there is no evidence, seems not to have been acted upon, as two princes, Constantine IV., the son of Culen, (mentioned on page 84,) and Kenneth IV. the son of Duff, succeeded to the crown before Malcolm; that is, on the hitherto received supposition that Malcolm II. was the son of Kenneth III., and grandson of Malcolm I. If such was the case, Kenneth IV., the son of Duff, was his cousin, and, during his reign, Malcolm stood in the position of heir presumptive to the crown, and was regulus or prince of Cumberland.

According to Skene, however, he was maormor of Moray, and so far as appears, not allied to the royal family at all. He seems to have made war on Kenneth IV., but by the interposition of Fothad, one of the Scottish bishops, a treaty was agreed to between them, by which it was stipulated that Kenneth should remain king for life, and that Malcolm and his heirs should succeed after him. Impatient to possess the crown, however, Malcolm again took the field, and in a bloody battle at Monivaird in Strathearn, Kenneth, after a brave resistance, was killed. According to the register of St. Andrews, Kenneth was slain "at Moieghvard," in 1001. Other accounts make it 1003.

Soon after becoming king of Scotland, to conciliate Sigurd, earl of Orkney, called the Stout, and described as "a great chieftain and wide-landed," Malcolm gave him his daughter for his second wife. The issue of this marriage was four sons. The eldest, Thorfinn, is said in the Orkneyinga Saga, to have been "a great chieftain, one of the largest men in point of stature, ugly of aspect, black haired, sharp featured, and somewhat tawny, and the most martial looking man; he was a contentious man, and covetous both of money and dignity; victorious and clever in battle, and a bold attacker. He was then five winters old when Malcolm, king of the Scots, his mother's father, gave him an earl's title, and Caithness to rule over, but he was fourteen winters when he prepared maritime expeditions from his country, and made war on the domains of other princes." He thus early began his career as a Vikingr. It was on the death of his father Sigurd, who was slain in 1014, at the battle of Clontarf in Ireland, fighting against the renowned Brian Borohime, that King Malcolm bestowed on him the district of Caithness, his eldest half-brother, Einar, having succeeded to the earldom of the Orkneys.

In the Irish annals, under the year 1029, it is recorded that "Malcolm, son of Macbrigde, son of Rory, King of Alban, died." His reign would thus appear to have lasted only twenty-six, instead of thirty years. On his death, the Scottish portion of the nation succeeded in placing upon the throne the son of Kenneth IV., also named Malcolm, for whom, according to Mr. Skene's view, he has been mistaken. In the Orkneyinga Saga he is known by the name of Kali Inndason, and in the history of Scotland, of Malcolm II.

This third Malcolm commenced his reign by attempts to reduce the power of the Norwegians in Scotland, but found them too strong for him. Thorfinn having refused to pay him tribute for the territories on the Scottish mainland, which he had received from his grandfather, Malcolm gave Caithness to Moddan, his nephew, with the title of earl. To enable him to take possession of his new territory, Moddan raised an army in Sutherland, but Thorfinn collected his followers, and having been joined by Thorkell Fostri, with a large force from the Orkneys, presented such a strong front, that Moddan found himself obliged to retire without hazarding a battle. On this Thorfinn subjected to himself Sutherland and Ross, and carried his arms far and wide in Scotland. He then returned to Caithness.

Malcolm, on his part, with a fleet of eleven ships, sailed towards the north, but was attacked and defeated in the Pentland Frith by Thorfinn, and his fleet completely dispersed. This sea-fight took place a little way east of Durness. Malcolm fled to the Moray Frith, followed by Thorfinn and Thorkell. The latter, however, was soon despatched to Thurso, to attack Moddan, who had arrived there with a large army. He reached Thurso at night, and having set fire to the house in which Moddan slept, that chieftain leapt down from the beams of an upper story, and was slain by Thorkell, who cut off his head. After a brief fight, during which a great number were killed, his army surrendered to Thorkell, who, with additional forces, then rejoined Thorfinn in Moray.

In the meantime, Malcolm had levied forces both in the east and west of Scotland, and having been joined by a number of Irish auxiliaries, he marched to give battle to Thorfinn. The opposing armies met in 1033, on the southern shore of the Beaully Frith, when Malcolm was totally defeated, and, according to some accounts, slain. Others state that he escaped by flight, and died the following year. Thorfinn thereafter conquered the whole of Scotland, all the way south to Fife. He then returned to his ships.

The only portion of the territory of the northern Picts that had not been subjected to his power was the district of Athole and the greater part of Argyle, and here the Scots, on the death of Malcolm, sought for a king; Duncan, (see vol. ii., page 82,) the son of Crinan, abbot of Dunkeld, and grandson of Malcolm II., being raised to the vacant throne.

MALCOLM III., better known in history by the name of Malcolm Cean Mor, or great head, was the elder of the two sons of Duncan, king of Scots, by his queen, a sister of Siward, earl of Northumberland. He was born about 1024, before his father was called to the throne, and, when the latter in 1039, after a reign of six years, was assassinated by Macbeth, Malcolm, then only fifteen years of age, fled to Cumberland, whilst his brother, Donald Bane, took refuge in the Hebrides.

On the accession of Edward the Confessor to the throne of England in 1043, Malcolm was placed by his father-in-law Siward, under his protection, when he became a resident at the English court. In his absence various attempts were made by his adherents in Scotland to dispossess Macbeth of the throne, in one of which Malcolm's grandfather, the aged Crinan, abbot of Dunkeld, was slain in 1045. Nine years thereafter, namely in 1054, Malcolm obtained from Edward the assistance of an Anglo-Saxon army, under the command of Earl Siward, to support his claims to the crown. This force he accompanied into Scotland, and a furious battle is said to have ensued, in which Macbeth lost 3,000 men, and the Anglo-Saxons 1,500, including Osbert, the son of Siward. Macbeth fled northwards, leaving Lothian in possession of Siward, who placed Malcolm as king over that district, where the Saxon influence prevailed. Supported, however, by the Celtic inhabitants of the north of Scotland, and by the Norwegians of the districts under the sway of Thorfinn, the powerful earl of Orkney, Macbeth was still enabled to retain possession of the throne.

In 1056, another English army was sent to the assistance of Malcolm. At this time Thorfinn, and the son of the king of Norway, had gone to the south, with the strength of the Norwegian power in Scotland, to attempt the subjugation of England, but, according to the Irish annals, "God was against them in that affair," and their fleet was dispersed in a storm. Macbeth, deprived of Thorfinn's aid, was not able to withstand this new array against him. He was driven north to Lumphanan in Aberdeenshire, where he was overtaken and slain, December 5th, 1056. The attempt of his stepson, Lulach, to succeed him on the throne, was, after a struggle of four months, put an end to by his defeat and death at Essie in Strathbogie, on the 25th of the following April.

Malcolm was soon after crowned at Scone. Except the territories possessed by Thorfinn, consisting, besides Orkney and the Hebrides, of the nine districts or earldoms of Caithness, Ness, Sutherland, Ross, Moray, Garmoran, Buchan, Mar, and Angus, he was master of all the rest of Scotland. His first care was to recompense those who had supported him in his struggle for the crown. His next, to recover those northern districts which still remained under Norwegian rule. The most remarkable reward which he bestowed was on Macduff, maormor of Fife (see art. FIFE, page 209, vol. ii. of this work.) The titles of earl and thane which Malcolm is said to have introduced, were not known in Scotland till after the Saxon colonization in Edgar's time, the Norwegian title iarl being confined to the Orkneys and to Caithness.

Shakspeare's immortal tragedy of Macbeth, founded on the fables of Boece and the traditions of the times, has thrown an interest round the character of the principal personages concerned in it, which could never have been created by the facts of sober history; but there is sufficient in the events of Malcolm's reign to render it one of the most important in our annals. Gratitude to the king of England, as well as the unsettled state of his own kingdom, led Malcolm to cultivate the alliance of Edward the Confessor, and he paid that monarch a visit in 1059. He had contracted an intimate friendship with Tostig, who had been created earl of Northumberland. He was the son of the celebrated Earl Godwin and brother of Harold, the last king of Saxon England. They were for a time esteemed "sworn brothers," but a quarrel having taken place between them in 1061, Malcolm made a hostile incursion into Northumberland, and after laying that country waste, he even violated the peace of St. Cuthbert, in Holy Island.

On the death of Thorfinn in 1064, his Norwegian kingdom in Scotland, which had lasted thirty years, fell to pieces, and the different districts he had conquered reverted to their native chiefs, "who were territorially born to rule over them," (Orkneyinga Saga). Malcolm married Thorfinn's widow, Ingioborge, and by her he had a son, Duncan II. (see vol. ii. p. 83.) This marriage, however, does not seem in the slightest to have advanced his interests in the north. The chiefs of the districts formerly in subjection to the Norwegians refused to acknowledge his sovereignty, and chose a king for themselves, Donald, the son of Malcolm, maormor of Moray, and king of Scotland (see page 87 of this volume). It took Malcolm twenty-one years to reduce the northern districts under his dominion. In 1070, he is said to have obtained a victory over his opponents, but it was not decisive. In 1077, as the Saxon Chronicle informs us, he overthrew Maolsnechtan, maormor of Moray, the son of Lulach, and in 1085 he got rid of both his rivals by death. The Irish annals say that in that year, "Malsnectai, son of Lulach, king of Moray, died peacefully. Donald, son of Malcolm, king of Alban, died a violent death."

Long previous to this, however, events in connexion with England had occurred which exercised an important influence on his reign, and which may now be briefly detailed. Edward the Confessor died 5th January 1066, and was succeeded by Harold. Tostig, the brother of the latter, had, from his extortions and his violence, so irritated the people of Northumberland, that they rose against him and drove him from his earldom. This happened a few years previous to the death of Edward the English king. Harold found it prudent to abandon his brother's cause, on which Tostig became his bitterest enemy. He first took refuge in Flanders, with Baldwin, his father-in-law, and afterwards visited William, duke of Normandy. On Harold's accession, he collected about sixty vessels in the ports of Flanders, and committed some depredations on the south and east coasts of England. He next sailed to Northumberland, and was there joined by Harold Halfager, by some called Hadrada, king of Norway, with 300 sail. Entering the Humber, they disembarked the troops, but were defeated and put to flight, when Tostig proceeded into Scotland. It is not known whether Malcolm received him at his court, or aided, or countenanced in any way, his projects against his brother, the new king of England. Lord Hailes thinks it probable that he was not received by Malcolm, but only remained at anchor in some Scottish bay, with the remains of his fleet, till joined by reinforcements from Norway. On receiving these he and Hadrada again invaded England, and were both slain at the battle of Stamford Bridge, 25th September 1066. The battle of Hastings took place on the 14th of the following October, when Harold was killed and William the Conqueror became king of England.

Two years thereafter, Edgar Atheling, grandson of Edmund Ironside, and the heir of the Saxon line, with his mother, the princess Agatha, and his two sisters, Margaret and Christina, arrived in Scotland. In their train came many Anglo-Saxons, and among them Gospatrick and other nobles of Northumberland. Some authors say that it was their intention to proceed to Hungary, the native country of Edgar and his two sisters, when they were driven by a storm into the Frith of Forth. Malcolm then resided at the tower which still bears his name, on the small peninsular mount, in the glen of Pittencrieff, near Dunfermline, in Fifeshire. On hearing of the arrival of the illustrious strangers, he hastened to invite them to his royal tower. There they were hospitably entertained, and as he was at this time a widower, there his nuptials with the princess Margaret were, soon after, celebrated with unwonted splendour.

Margaret was one of the most pious and accomplished princesses of her day, and her character and influence tended much to improve and refine the rude manners of her husband's subjects. On her husband himself her virtues and gentleness exercised a most salutary power. We learn from Turgot, her confessor and biographer, that Malcolm liked and disliked whatever she did, and that such was his veneration for her worth and piety, that being unable to read, he was in the habit of kissing her missals and prayer-books, which, in token of his devotion, he caused to be splendidly bound and adorned with gold and precious stones. She persuaded him to pass the night in fervent prayer, much to the astonishment of his courtiers. "I must acknowledge," adds Turgot, "that I often admired the works of the divine mercy, when I saw a king so religious, and such signs of deep compunction in a laic."

Into the court of Malcolm she introduced unusual splendour. She encouraged the importation of rich dresses of various colours for himself and his nobles, which led to the commencement of a trading intercourse with foreign countries, and to this reign may be assigned the introduction of the wearing of tartan, which came afterwards to distinguish the clans. In her own attire she was magnificent, and she increased the number of attendants on the person of the king. Under her guidance the public appearances of the sovereign were attended with more parade and ceremony than had ever previously been the case. She also caused the king to be served at table in gold and silver plate; "at least," says Turgot, afraid of going beyond the truth, "the dishes and vessels were gilt or silvered over."

Malcolm seems to have intrusted the care of matters respecting religion and the internal polity of the kingdom, entirely to her. Anxious for the reformation of the church, she held frequent conferences with the clergy. On one of these occasions the proper season for celebrating Lent was the subject of discussion between them. The clergy knew no language but the Gaelic, and the king, who had spent fifteen years in England, and understood the Saxon as well as his own native language, acted as interpreter. "Three days," says Turgot, "did she employ the sword of the Spirit in combating their errors. She seemed another St. Helena out of the Scriptures convincing the Jews." At last the clergy yielded to her views. She was also the means of inducing them to restore the celebration of the Lord's supper, which had fallen into disuse, and of keeping sacred the Sabbath, which was scarcely distinguishable from any other day of the week.

Malcolm espoused the cause of his brother-in-law with great ardour. In September 1069, with the assistance of the Danes, and accompanied by Edgar Atheling, the Anglo-Saxon and Northumbrian nobles, led by Gospatrick, invaded England, and having taken the castle of York by storm, they put the Norman garrison to the sword. Instead, however, of following up their success, the Northumbrians departed to their own territory, while the Danes retired to their ships. The secret of this change in their proceedings was that William had gained over Gospatrick, by conferring on him the earldom of Northumberland, and had bribed Osberne the Danish commander, to quit the English shores. Edgar Atheling and his few remaining adherents were, in consequence, obliged to retreat to Scotland.

The following year, Malcolm led a numerous army into England, by the western borders, through Cumberland. If it had been intended that he was to support the movements of Edgar, and his Danish and Northumbrian allies, he came too late. Nevertheless, his operations were energetic enough. After wasting Teesdale, he defeated an Anglo-Norman army that attempted to oppose his progress, at a place called Hinderskell, penetrated into Cleveland, and thence advanced into the eastern parts of the diocese of Durham, spreading desolation and dismay wherever he appeared. He spared neither age nor sex, and even the churches, with those who had taken refuge in them, were burnt to the ground. While thus engaged, he received intelligence that his own territory of Cumberland was laid waste by Gospatrick, who, as already stated, had gone over to King William's interest.

On his return, Malcolm led captive into Scotland such a multitude of young men and women, that, says the English historian, Simeon of Durham, "for many years they were to be found in every Scottish village, nay, even in every Scottish hovel." In 1072, William retaliated by invading Scotland both by land and sea. He penetrated as far as the Frith of Forth, but finding the conquest of Scotland not so easy a task as had been that of England, a peace was concluded at Abernethy, the old Pictish capital, when Malcolm consented, in accordance with the feudal custom of the Normans, to do homage for the lands which he held in England. Among the hostages which he gave on this occasion was his eldest son, Duncan, who thus had the benefit of living many years under the Norman monarchs of England. By this peace, Malcolm, in a manner, abandoned the cause of his weak-minded brother-in-law, Edgar Atheling, and that personage, after making his peace with the English monarch, received from him a handsome pension, and went to reside at Rouen in Normandy.

With Edgar Atheling, Malcolm had refused to give up to the English king, the exiled nobles and others who had taken refuge in Scotland. With the double view of strengthening his power by the influx of so many brave and skilful strangers, and of benefiting his subjects by the introduction among them of those who possessed a higher civilization than, in their rude and unsettled state, they had ever known, he even encouraged them to come into his kingdom. Among them were persons of Norman as well as of Anglo-Saxon lineage, who had fled from the exactions and tyranny of the Conqueror, or had been refused promised rewards for their services. Malcolm received and welcomed them all, and to these Norman knights and adventurers who thus came flocking across the border, he gave lands and heritages, to induce them to remain. They thus became the progenitors of many of our noble families. Thousands of the poorer English, too, to escape the grinding oppressions of their Norman rulers, sought a refuge in Scotland, some even selling themselves for slaves, to obtain a subsistence.

Gospatrik, having incurred the suspicions of William, was deprived of the earldom of Northumberland, and returning into Scotland, succeeded in being reconciled to Malcolm, from whom he obtained the manor of Dnubar, and other lands in the Merse and Lothian. He was the ancestor of the earls of Dnubar and March. In 1079, in the absence of William in Normandy, Malcolm again invaded Northumberland, and wasted the country as far as the river Tyne. The following year, Robert, the eldest son of William, entered Scotland, but was obliged to retreat. To check the incursions of the Scots into England, he erected a fortress near the Tyne, at a place called Moncaster or Monkchester, from its being the residence of monks, but the name of which was thereafter in consequence changed to Newcastle.

At the request of his queen, who has been canonized in the Romish Calendar as St. Margaret, and of her confessor, Turgot, Malcolm founded and endowed a monastery, in the vicinity of his residence, for thirteen Culdees, which, with its church or chapel, was dedicated to the Holy Trinity. This was the origin of the abbey of Dunfermline.

The latter portion of Malcolm's reign was occupied in a struggle with William Rufus, the son and successor of the Conqueror on the throne of England. Cumberland and his other English possessions having been withheld from him by the English king, Malcolm, assembling his forces, broke across the borders, in May 1091, when he penetrated as far as Chester, on the Wear; but on the approach of the English, with a superior force, he prudently retreated without hazarding a battle, and thus secured his booty and his captives. In the autumn of the same year, Rufus led a numerous army into Scotland. Malcolm advanced to meet him. By the intercession, however, of Edgar Atheling, who accompanied the Scottish army, and of Robert, duke of Normandy, the eldest brother of the English king, a peace was concluded, without the risk of a battle, Rufus consenting to restore to Malcolm twelve manors in England which he had held under the Conqueror, and to make an annual payment to him of twelve marks of gold, and Malcolm, on his part, agreeing to do homage for the same, under the same tenure of feudal service as before.

In 1092, William Rufus began to fortify the city of Carlisle and to build a castle there. As this was an encroachment on Malcolm's territory of Cumberland he remonstrated against it, when the English king proposed a personal interview on the subject. Malcolm, in consequence, proceeded to Gloucester, 24th August 1093. As a preliminary measure Rufus required him again to do homage to him there, in presence of the English barons. This Malcolm absolutely refused, but although he had done homage to Rufus for his English lands not much above a year before at Abernethy, he now offered to do it, as formerly had been the custom, on the frontiers of the two kingdoms, and in presence of the chief men of both. Some of his councillors advised Rufus to detain the Scottish king, now that he had him in his power, till he had complied with his request; but although he had the grace to reject this base proposal, it was with the most unkingly contumely that he dismissed him from his court. Malcolm returned home, burning with indignation and vowing revenge, and hastily assembling a tumultuous and undisciplined army, he burst into Northumberland, which he wasted, then, sweeping onwards to Alnwick, he laid siege to the castle. He had not been many days there, however, before he was surprised by Robert de Mowbray, at the head of a strong Norman and English force. A fierce engagement ensued, when Malcolm was slain, with his eldest son. This fatal fight took place 13th November 1093. Malcolm's fourth son, Edgar, who was also in the battle, escaped, and three days after reached the castle of Edinburgh, where his mother lay dying. On his appearance, she in a faint voice eagerly enquired, "How fares it with your father, and your brother, Edward?" The youth was silent. "I know all," she cried; "I adjure you by this holy cross, and by your filial affection, that you tell me the truth." He answered, "your husband and your son are both slain." Raising her eyes and hands to heaven, the dying queen said, "Praise and blessing be to thee, Almighty God, that thou hast been pleased to make me endure so bitter anguish in the hour of my departure, thereby, as I trust, to purify me, in some measure, from the corruption of my sins. And thou, Lord Jesus Christ, who, through the will of the Father, hast enlivened the world by thy death, O deliver me!" and straightway expired. So great was the benevolence of this truly excellent princess that she secretly paid the ransom of many of her Saxon countrymen in bondage in Scotland, when she found their condition too grievous to be borne.

The character of Malcolm Canmore is that of an able, wise, and energetic monarch, who, after subjecting to his sovereignty the various rude and discordant tribes that inhabited his kingdom, was successful in maintaining its independence unimpaired during a long reign of 37 years, and that against two such formidable opponents as William the Conqueror and his son, William Rufus. As an instance of his personal intrepidity the following incident is related: Having received intelligence that one of his nobles had formed a design against his life, he took an opportunity, when out hunting, of leading him into a solitary place, then, unsheathing his sword, he said, "Here we are alone, and armed alike. You seek my life. Take it." The astonished noble, overcome by this address, threw himself at the feet of the king, and implored his clemency, which was readily granted.

The removal of his court from Abernethy to Dünfermline, about the year 1063, and the encouragement which, after the Norman conquest of England and his marriage with Queen Margaret, he gave to the immigration of Anglo-Saxons and Norman adventurers into the kingdom, had the effect of causing the Gaelic population to retire inland from the plains, and to divide themselves into clans and tribes, with the institution of separate chiefs, and the preservation of all those feelings and usages which long kept them a peculiar and distinct race from the other inhabitants of Scotland. In the reign of Malcolm Canmore, the whole of the country south of the Forth was possessed by the Scots, and those who spoke the Saxon language, while the Celtic portion of the nation occupied the remaining districts. Tenacious of their native language and ancient customs, the latter viewed with equal scorn and disgust the introduction of foreign manners and races into the kingdom, and hence began that long struggle between the Scottish and Celtic communities which lasted for nearly seven hundred years, and was only terminated on the field of Culloden in 1746. "The people," says General Stewart of Garth, referring to the Gaelic inhabitants (Sketches, vol. i. p. 20), "now beyond the reach of the laws, became turbulent and fierce, revenging in person those wrongs for which the administrators of the laws were too distant and too feeble to afford redress. Thence arose the institution of chiefs, who naturally became the judges and arbiters in the quarrels of their clansmen and followers, and who were surrounded by men devoted to the defence of their rights, their property, and their power; and accordingly the chiefs established within their own territories a jurisdiction almost wholly independent of their liege lord."

Malcolm had by his queen, Margaret, six sons and two daughters. The sons were, Edward, who was slain with his father near Alnwick; Ethelred, who was bred a churchman and became Culdee abbot of Dunkeld; Edmund; Edgar, Alexander, and David. The three last were successively kings of Scotland. The elder daughter, Maud, married Henry I. of England, a marriage which united the Saxon and the Norman dynasties, and Mary, the younger, became the wife of Eustace, count of Boulogne.

MALCOLM IV., King of Scots, born in 1141, was the son of Prince Henry, son of David I., and succeeded his grandfather, May 24, 1153, a year after his father's death, being then only twelve years old. The same year he was crowned at Scone. He acquired the name of Malcolm the Maiden, either from the effeminate expression of his features, or from the softness of his disposition. In the following November Somerled, thane of Argyle, invaded the Scottish coasts, at the head of all the fierce tribes of the isles. The accession of a new king, and he a mere boy, appears to have been deemed by this formidable chief a favourable time to endeavour to advance the cause of his grandsous, the sons of the monk Wimond (see vol. ii. p. 24) otherwise Malcolm MacHeth, who claimed the earldom of Moray, and who had been imprisoned in Roxburgh castle by David I. as an impostor. In 1156, Donald, a son of Wimond, was discovered skulking at Whithorn in Galloway, and sent to share the captivity of his father. After harassing the country for some years, Somerled was at last forced back to his own territories, by Gilchrist, earl of Angus, and a treaty of peace was concluded with him in 1157, which was considered of so much importance at the time as to form an epoch in the dating of Scottish charters.

Malcolm had no sooner accommodated matters with Somerled, than a demand was made upon him by Henry I. of England, for those parts of the English territory which the Scottish kings held in that kingdom. On this account Malcolm had an interview with Henry at Chester, when he did homage to him for the same, as his predecessors had done, "reserving all his dignities." Malcolm was then only sixteen years of age, and Henry, taking advantage of his inexperience, easily prevailed upon the youthful monarch, to surrender to him Cumberland and Northumberland, at the same time bestowing upon him the earldom of Huntingdon. Fordun says that the English king had, on this occasion, corrupted his councillors.

In 1158, desirous of obtaining the honour of knighthood from the king of England, Malcolm repaired to Henry's court at Carlisle, for the purpose, but Henry refused to bestow upon him an honour, probably on account of his youth, which was highly prized in that age, and Malcolm returned home greatly disappointed. In the following year, Malcolm passed over to France, where the English monarch then was, and after serving under his banner he was at length knighted by him. The Scots, indignant at his subserviency to Henry, and apprehensive that he would become the mere vassal of England, sent a deputation to remonstrate with Malcolm on his conduct. "We will not," said they, "have Henry to rule over us." Malcolm, in consequence, hastened back to Scotland, and on his arrival assembled a parliament at Perth.

The fierce nobles who, as governors of their respective provinces, were bound to maintain the independence of the kingdom, availed themselves of this opportunity to attempt to seize the king's person. Accordingly, Ferquhard, earl of Strathern, and five other earls assaulted the tower in which Malcolm had taken refuge, but were repulsed. On the interference of the clergy, a reconciliation took place between the young king and his offended nobles.

Fortunately for Malcolm an occasion almost immediately occurred to give employment to them and their followers. Fergus, lord of Galloway, the most potent feudatory of the Scottish crown, and the son-in-law of Henry I., threw off his allegiance, and stirred up an insurrection against

Malcolm. At the head of a powerful army, the king entered Galloway, and though twice driven back, he at length succeeded, in 1160, in overpowering its rebellious lord. He then compelled Fergus to resign his lordship, and to give his son, Uchtred, as an hostage for the peace concluded between them; after which Fergus retired to the abbey of Holyrood, where he died of a broken heart.

In 1161, a still more formidable insurrection broke out among the inhabitants of the province of Moray, which comprehended all what is now Elginshire, all Nairnshire, a considerable part of Banffshire, and the half of continental Invernessshire. The pretext was the attempt on Malcolm's part to intrude the Anglo-Norman jurisdiction upon their Celtic customs, and the settling of Flemish colonists among them. The men of Moray were never wanting in an excuse for rising in arms. They were the most manly and rebellious of all the subjects of the sovereigns of Scotland. According to Fordun, "no solatiums or largesses could allure, or treaties or oaths bind them to their duty." On this occasion the insurgents laid waste the neighbouring counties, and so regardless were they of the royal authority that they actually hanged the heralds who were sent to summon them to lay down their arms. Malcolm despatched against them a strong force under that Earl Gilchrist who had been sent against Somerled, but he was routed, and forced to recross the Grampians.

This defeat roused all the energy of Malcolm's character, and with the whole array of the kingdom he marched against them. He found them assembled on the muir of Urquhart, near the Spey, ready to give him battle. After crossing that river, Malcolm's nobles, seeing their strength, advised him to negotiate with the rebels, and to promise them that if they submitted, their lives would be spared. The Moraymen accepted the offer, the king kept his word, and now occurred the extraordinary circumstance of different parts of the country exchanging their populations. To put an end, at once and for ever, to the frequent insurrections which occurred in the province, Malcolm ordained that all who had been engaged in the rebellion should remove out of Moray, and that their places should be supplied with people from other parts of the kingdom. In consequence, some transplanted themselves into the northern, but the greater number into the southern districts, as far as Galloway. The older historians say that the Moraymen were almost totally cut off in an obstinate battle, and strangers put in their place, but this statement is at variance with the register of Paisley. Among the new families brought in to replace those who were removed, the principal were the powerful earls of Fife and Strathern, with the Comyns and Bissets, and among those who remained were the Inneses, the Calders and others. After thus removing the rebels, and colonizing the province with a quieter race, Malcolm, as well as his successor, William the Lion, appear to have frequently resided in Moray, for from Inverness, Elgin, and various other of its localities, several of their charters are dated.

In July 1163, Malcolm did homage to the king of England and his infant son at Woodstock. The following year he founded and richly endowed an abbey for Cistercian monks at Coupar-Angus. He had previously, in 1156, founded the priory of Emanuel near Lullithgow, for nuns of the same order.

In 1164, Somerled, the ambitious and powerful lord of the Isles, made another and a last attempt to overthrow the king's authority. Assembling a numerous army from Argyle, Ireland, and the Isles, he sailed up the Clyde with 160 galleys, and landed his forces near Renfrew, threatening, as some of the old chroniclers inform us, to make a conquest of the whole of Scotland. Here, according to the usual accounts, he was slain, with his son, Gillecolane, after a battle, in which he was defeated by an inferior force of the Scots. Tradition, however, states that he was assassinated in his tent by an individual in whom he placed confidence, and that his followers, deprived of their leader, hastened back to the Isles, without hazarding an engagement.

Malcolm died at Jedburgh, of a lingering disease, December 9, 1165, at the early age of 24, and was succeeded by his brother William, styled William the Lion.

MALCOLM, SIR PULTENEY, a distinguished naval officer, an elder brother of Sir John Malcolm, the subject of the following notice, was born at Douglan, near Lougholm, Dumfries-shire, February 20, 1768. His father, George Malcolm, farmer, Burnfoot, had, by his wife, the daughter of James Pasley, Esq. of Craig and Burn, 17 children. Robert, the eldest son, at his death was high in the civil service of the East India Company; James, Pulteney, and John, the next three sons, were honoured with the insignia of knights commanders of the Bath at the same time, the former for his distinguished services in Spain and North America, when commanding a battalion of royal marines, and Sir John, for his military and diplomatic services in India. The younger sons were Gilbert, rector of Todenham; David, in a commercial house in India; and Admiral Sir Charles Malcolm, of whom a memoir is given at page 99.

Pulteney entered the navy, October 20, 1778, as a midshipman on board the Sybill frigate, commanded by his maternal uncle, Captain Pasley, with whom he sailed to the Cape of Good Hope; and on his return thence, removed with him into the Jupiter, of which he was appointed lieutenant in March 1783. At the commencement of the French revolutionary war, he was first lieutenant of the Penelope at Jamaica; in which ship he assisted at the capture of the Inconstante frigate, and Gaelon corvette, both of which he conducted to Port Royal in safety. He also commanded the boats of the Penelope in several severe conflicts, and succeeded in cutting out many vessels from the ports of St. Domingo. In April 1794 he was made a commander, when he joined the Jack Tar; and upon Cape Nichola Mole being taken possession of by the British, he had the direction of the seamen and marines landed to garrison that place. In October 1794 he was promoted to the rank of post captain, and the following month was appointed to the Fox frigate, with which he subsequently served in the North Sea. Having proceeded with a convoy to the East Indies, he captured on that station La Modeste, of 20 guns. In 1797 the duke of Wellington, then Colonel Wellesley, of the 33d regiment, took a passage with Captain Malcolm, in the Fox, from the Cape of Good Hope to Bengal. He afterwards served in the Suffolk, the Victorious, and the Royal Sovereign; and in March 1805 was appointed to the Donegal, in which he accompanied Lord Nelson in the memorable pursuit of the combined squadrons of France and Spain to the West Indies.

On his return to the Channel, Captain Malcolm was sent to reinforce Admiral Collingwood off Cadiz. Four days previous to the battle of Trafalgar, the Donegal, being short of water, and greatly in need of a refit, was ordered to Gibraltar. On the 20th October Captain Malcolm received information that the enemy's fleets were quitting Cadiz. His ship was then in the Mole nearly dismantled, but by the greatest exertions he succeeded in getting her out before night, and on the 23d joined Admiral Collingwood in time to capture El Rayo, a Spanish three-decker. Towards the close of 1805 the Donegal accompanied Sir John Duckworth to the West Indies, in quest of a French squadron that had sailed for that quarter; and in the battle fought off St. Domingo, February 6, 1806, Captain Malcolm greatly distinguished himself. On his return to England, he was honoured with a gold medal for his conduct in the action, and, in common with the other officers of the squadron, received the thanks of both houses of parliament.

In the summer of 1808 he escorted the army under General Wellesley from Cork to Portugal, and for his exertions in disembarking the troops, he received the thanks of Sir John Moore and Sir Arthur Wellesley. The Donegal was subsequently attached to the Channel fleet under the orders of Sir John Gambier; and after the discomfiture of the French ships in Aix Roads in April 1809, Captain Malcolm was sent with a squadron on a cruise. He next commanded the blockade of Cherbourg, on which station the ships under his orders captured a number of privateers, and on one occasion drove two frigates on shore near Cape La Hogue. In 1811 the Donegal was paid off, when Captain Malcolm was appointed to the Royal Oak, a new 74, in which he continued off Cherbourg until March 1812, when he removed into the San Josef, 110 guns, as captain of the Channel fleet under Lord Keith. In the subsequent August he was promoted to the rank of colonel of marines, and December 4, 1813, was appointed rear-admiral. In June 1814 he hoisted his flag in the Royal Oak, and proceeded to North America with a body of troops, under Brigadier-general Ross. Soon after his arrival, he accompanied Sir Alexander Cochrane on an expedition up the Chesapeake, when the duty of regulating the collection, embarkation, and re-embarkation of the troops employed against Washington, Baltimore, and New Orleans, devolving upon him, he performed it in a manner that obtained the warmest acknowledgments of the commander-in-chief. He was afterwards employed at the siege of Fort Boyer, on Mobile Point, the surrender of which, by capitulation, on February 14, terminated the war between Great Britain and the United States.

At the extension of the order of the Bath into three classes, January 2, 1815, Admiral Malcolm was nominated, with his two brothers, a knight commander. After his arrival in England, on the renewal of hostilities with France, in consequence of the return of Napoleon from Elba, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the naval force ordered to co-operate with the duke of Wellington and the allied armies, on which service he continued until after the restoration of the Bourbons. His last appointment was to the important office of commander-in-chief on the St. Helena station, where he continued from the spring of 1816 until the end of 1817. By the cordiality of his disposition and manners, he not only obtained the confidence, but won the regard of the emperor Napoleon. "Ah! there is a man," he exclaimed in reference to Sir Pulteney Malcolm, "with a countenance really pleasing: open, frank, and sincere. There is the face of an Englishman—his countenance bespeaks his heart; and I am sure he is a good man. I never yet beheld a man of whom I so immediately formed a good opinion as of that fine soldier-like old man. He carries his head erect, and speaks out openly and boldly what he thinks, without being afraid to look you in the face at the time. His physiognomy would make every person desirous of a farther acquaintance, and render the most suspicious confident in him." One day when fretting at the unjust treatment he received, he exclaimed to the admiral, "Does your government mean to detain me upon this rock until my death's day?" Sir Pulteney replied, "Such I apprehend is their purpose."

III.

"Then the term of my life will soon arrive," said Napoleon." "I hope not, Sir," answered Sir Pulteney, "I hope you will survive to record your great actions, which are so numerous, and the task will insure you a term of long life." Napoleon felt the compliment and acknowledged it by a bow, and soon recovered his good humour. On his deathbed he paid a well-merited tribute to the generosity and benevolence of Sir Pulteney, whose conduct at St. Helena is described by Sir Walter Scott in his 'Life of Napoleon,' in a manner highly honourable to him. He was advanced to the rank of vice-admiral July 19, 1821, and of admiral January 10, 1837. He died July 20, 1838. A monument has been erected to his memory. Subjoined is his portrait:

Sir Pulteney Malcolm married, January 18, 1809, Clementina, eldest daughter of the Hon. W. F. Elphinstone.

MALCOLM, SIR JOHN, a distinguished soldier and diplomatist, a younger brother of the subject of the foregoing memoir, was born May 2, 1769, on the farm of Burnfoot, near Laugholm, in Dumfriesshire. In 1782 he went out to the East Indies as a cadet in the Company's service. On his arrival he was placed under the care of his uncle,

G

Dr. Gilbert Pasley, and assiduously applied himself to the study of the manners and languages of the East. The abilities which he displayed at the siege of Seringapatam, in 1792, attracted the notice of Lord Cornwallis, who appointed him Persian interpreter to a body of British troops in the service of one of the native princes. In 1794, in consequence of bad health, he revisited his native country; but the following year he returned to India on the staff of Field-marshal Sir Alured Clarke; and for his conduct at the taking of the Cape of Good Hope, he received the public thanks of that officer. In 1797 he obtained a captain's commission. In 1799 he was ordered to join the Nizam's contingent force in the war against Tippoo Saib, with the chief command of the infantry, in which post he continued till the surrender of Seringapatam, where he highly distinguished himself. He was then appointed joint secretary, with Captain, afterwards Sir Thomas Munro, to the commissioners for settling the new government of Mysore. In the same year he was sent by Lord Wellesley on a diplomatic mission to Persia, a country which no British ambassador had visited since the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Captain Malcolm returned to Bombay in 1801, when he was appointed private secretary to the governor-general, who stated to the secret committee that "he had succeeded in establishing a connection with the actual government of the Persian empire, which promised to British natives in India political and commercial advantages of the most important description." In January 1802 he was promoted to the rank of major; and on the death of the Persian ambassador, who was accidentally shot at Bombay, he was again sent to Persia to make the necessary arrangements for the renewal of the embassy. In February 1803 he was appointed Resident with the rajah of Mysore; and in December 1804 he attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In June 1805 he was nominated chief agent of the governor-general, in which capacity he continued to act till March 1806, during which period he concluded several important treaties with native princes.

On the arrival in India, in April 1808, of the new governor-general, Lord Minto, he dispatched Colonel Malcolm on a mission to Persia, with the view of endeavouring to counteract the designs of Napoleon, who then threatened an invasion of India from that quarter. In this difficult embassy, however, he did not wholly succeed. He returned in the following August, and soon after proceeded to his residency at Mysore. Early in 1810, owing to a change in the policy of the Persian court, he was again appointed ambassador to Persia, where he remained till the nomination of Sir Gore Ouseley as minister plenipotentiary. On his departure the shah conferred upon him the order of the Sun and Lion, presented him with a valuable sword, and made him a khan and sepahdar of the empire.

In 1812 Colonel Malcolm again visited England, and soon after his arrival received the honour of knighthood. The same year he published, in one volume, 'A Sketch of the Sikhs, a singular Nation in the province of the Punjab, in India.' In 1815 appeared his 'History of Persia,' in 2 vols. 4to, which is valuable from the information it contains, taken from oriental sources, regarding the religion, government, manners, and customs of the inhabitants of that country, in ancient as well as in modern times. He returned to India in 1817, and on his arrival was attached, as political agent of the governor-general, to the force under Sir Thomas Hislop in the Deccan. With the rank of brigadier-general, he was appointed to the command of the third division of the army, and greatly distinguished himself in the decisive battle of Mehidpoor, when the army under Mulhar Rao Holkar was completely routed. For his skill and valour on this occasion he received the thanks of the house of commons, on the motion of Mr. Canning, who declared that "the name of this gallant officer will be remembered in India as long as the British flag is hoisted in that country." His conduct was also noticed by the prince regent, who expressed his regret that the circumstance of his not having attained the rank of major-general prevented his being then created a knight grand cross, which honour, however, was conferred on him in 1821.

After the termination of the war with the Mah-rattas and Pindarries, he received the military and political command of Malwa, and succeeded in establishing the Company's authority, both in that province and the other territories adjacent, which had been ceded to them.

In April 1822 he returned once more to Britain with the rank of major-general. Shortly after, he was presented by the officers who had acted under him in the late war with a superb vase, valued at £1,500. The court of directors of the East India Company likewise testified their sense of his merits by a grant to him of £1,000 a-year. In July 1827 he was appointed governor of Bombay, which important post he resigned in 1831, and finally returned to Britain. On quitting India, he received many gratifying instances of the esteem and high consideration in which he was held. The principal European gentlemen of Bombay requested him to sit for his statue, which was executed by Chantrey, and erected in that city; the members of the Asiatic Society requested a bust of him for their library; the native gentlemen of Bombay solicited his portrait, to be placed in the public room; the East India Amelioration Society voted him a service of plate; and the United Society of Missionaries, including English, Scots, and Americans, acknowledged with gratitude the assistance they had received from him in the prosecution of their pious labours.

Subjoined is Sir John Malcolm's portrait:

Soon after his arrival in England in 1831, he was elected M.P. for Lauceston, and took an active part in the proceedings in the house of commons upon several important questions, particularly the Scottish reform bill, which he warmly opposed. After the dissolution of parliament in 1832 he offered himself for Carlisle, but being unsuccessful, he retired to his seat near Windsor, and employed himself in writing a Treatise upon 'The Government of India,' with the view of elucidating the difficult questions relating to the renewal of the East India Company's charter, which was published only a few weeks previous to his death. His last address in public was at a meeting in the Thatched House Tavern, London, for the purpose of forming a subscription to buy up the mansion of Abbotsford for the family of the great novelist; and on that occasion his concluding sentiment was "that when he was gone, his son might be proud to say that his father had been among the contributors to that shrine of genius." On the day following he was struck with paralysis, and died at London, May 31, 1833. A monument has been erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey, and also an obelisk, 100 feet high, on Langholm hill, in his native parish of Westerkirk. He married, in June 1807, Charlotte, daughter of Sir Alexander Campbell, Bart., by whom he had five children.

MALCOLM, SIR CHARLES, an eminent naval officer, the tenth son of George Malcolm of Burnfoot, and youngest brother of the preceding, was born at Burnfoot, Dumfries-shire, in 1782, and entered the navy in 1791, when only nine years old. In 1798, he was master's mate of the Fox, of 32 guns, commanded by his brother, Pulteney, when, with the Sybille, of 38 guns, that ship entered the Spanish harbour of Manilla, the capital of the Philippines, under French colours, and in the face of three ships of the line and three frigates, succeeded in capturing seven boats, taking prisoner 200 men, and carrying off a large quantity of ammunition and materials of war. In 1807, he got the command of the Narcissus, 32. On board this ship he attacked a convoy of 30 sail in the Conquet Roads, on which occasion he was slightly wounded. In 1809, he assisted in the capture of Les Saintes, islands in the West Indies. In June of the same year he was appointed to the Rhine, 38, in which he actively co-operated with the patriots on the north coast of Spain.

Subsequently he served in the West Indies, and on the coast of Brazil. On July 18, 1815, he landed and stormed a fort at Corrignon near Abercavack, which was the last exploit of the kind achieved during the war. In July 1822, he was nominated to the command of the William and Mary, royal yacht, lying at Dublin, in attendance on the lord-lieutenant; and in 1826, to the Royal Charlotte, yacht, on the same service. In 1827 he was knighted by the Marquis Wellesley, then lord-lieutenant of Ireland. Soon after he was appointed superintendent of the Bombay marine.

During the ten years that he held that office, he effected a complete reform in the administration of the service, and converted its previous system into that of the Indian navy. He also instituted many extensive and important surveys, and was prominently concerned in the establishment of steam navigation in the Red Sea. In 1837 he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral, and in 1847 to that of vice-admiral. He died at Brighton, June 14, 1851, aged 69. He married first in 1808, his cousin, Magdalene, daughter of Charles Pasley, Esq., issue, one daughter; and, 2dly, in 1829, Elmira Riddell, youngest daughter of Major-general Shaw, and by her had three sons, two of whom entered the navy.

MALLET, DAVID, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was born at Crieff, in Perthshire, about 1700. His father, said to have been a descendant of the proscribed clan Gregor, was named James Malloch, and kept a small public-house in that town. It is uncertain where he got his early education, but he appears to have studied for some time under a professor Ker in Aberdeen, and during his residence in that city, he wrote a pastoral and a few other short pieces, which attracted some notice. He afterwards removed to Edinburgh, and in 1720 was employed as a tutor in the family of a Mr. Home of that city. At the same time he attended the university, and in 1723 he was recommended by the professors as tutor to the two sons of the duke of Montrose, with whom he made the tour of Europe.

On their return to London, he continued to reside in the family of the duke, through whom he got introduced to the best society of the day. He now began to cultivate his poetical talents with great assiduity. In July 1724 he published in Aaron Hill's 'Plain Dealer,' No. 36, his beautiful ballad of 'William and Margaret,' which at once procured him a high poetical reputation. On settling in London he had Anglicised his name to Mallet. Having, says Dr. Johnson, "by degrees cleared his tongue from his native pronunciation, so as to be no longer distinguished as a Scot, he seemed inclined to disencumber himself from all adherences of his original, and took upon him to change his name from Scotch Malloch to English Mallet, without any imaginable reason of preference which the eye or ear can discover." Dennis, the Critic, used in derision to call him Moloch, which was possibly one reason for the change. In 1728 he published a poem, entitled 'The Excursion,' being a series of landscape descriptions in blank verse, in the style of Thomson's Seasons, but greatly inferior to that noble poem. In 1731 he produced a tragedy, entitled 'Emrydice,' which was acted at Drury Lane theatre, but without success.

His employment as tutor in the family of the duke of Montrose having come to an end, he went to reside with a Mr. Knight at Gosfield, it is supposed, as a teacher. About this time he formed an acquaintance with Pope, and to court the favour of that eminent poet, he published his poem on 'Verbal Criticism.' Pope introduced him to Lord Bolingbroke, and he was soon after appointed under secretary to Frederick, prince of Wales, at that time at variance with his father, with a salary of £200 a-year. In 1739, his tragedy of 'Mustapha' was produced, and owed its temporary success to some political allusions in it to the king and Sir Robert Walpole. To serve and gratify his patron, the prince, he exhibited Sir Robert under the character of Rustan the vizier, and the king as Solyman the Magnificent. On the first night of its representation the heads of the opposition attended, and by their plaudits sustained the performance throughout. In the following year, in conjunction with Thomson, he wrote, by command of the prince, the masque of 'Alfred,' in honour of the birthday of his royal highness' eldest daughter. The same year (1740) he wrote a life of Bacon, prefixed to an edition of his works, which was of very little merit, and is now forgotten. In 1747 he published his 'Hermit, or Amyntor and Theodora,' a poem which has been praised by Johnson for copiousness of language and vigour of sentiment, and censured by Warton for nauseous affectation.

On the death of Pope in 1744, Mallet, who was indebted to him for his introduction to Lord Bolingbroke, was by the latter employed to defame the character of his former friend, who, in a letter to Mr. Knight had once thus kindly spoken of him: "To prove to you how little essential to friendship I hold letter-writing, I have not yet written to Mr. Mallet, whom I love and esteem greatly, nay, whom I know to have as tender a heart, and that feels a friendly remembrance as long as any man." Mallet performed his ungracious task with the utmost malignity, in his preface to the revised edition of Bolingbroke's 'Patriot King,' Pope's offence being that he had allowed the first version of that work to be surreptitiously printed. Bolingbroke rewarded him with a bequest of all his writings, published and unpublished, and Mallet immediately began to prepare them for the press. "His conduct," says Chalmers, "at the very outset of this business affords another illustration of his character. Franklin, the printer, to whom many of the political pieces written during the opposition to Walpole, had been given, as he supposed, in perpetuity, laid claim to some compensation for those. Mallet allowed his claim, and the question was referred to arbitrators, who were empowered to decide upon it, by an instrument signed by the parties; but when they decided unfavourable to Mr. Mallet, he refused to yield to the decision, and the printer was thus deprived of the benefit of the award, by not having insisted upon bonds of arbitration, to which Mallet had objection as degrading to a man of honour. He then proceeded, with the help of Millar, the bookseller, to publish all he could find; and so sanguine was he in his expectations that he rejected the offer of £3,000 which Millar offered him for the copyright, although he was, at this time, so distressed for money that he was forced to borrow some of Millar to pay the stationer and printer. The work at last appeared in 5 vols. 4to, and Mallet had soon reason to repent his refusal of the bookseller's offer, as this edition was not sold off in twenty years. As these volumes contained many bold attacks on revealed religion, they brought much obloquy on the editor, and even a presentment was made of them by the grand jury of Westminster."

In the beginning of 1757 Mallet was hired by the Newcastle administration to assist in directing the public indignation, for the disgrace brought on the British arms in the affair of Minorea, towards the unfortunate Admiral Byng; and, accordingly, while that officer was on his trial, he wrote a letter of accusation, under the character of "A Plain Man," which, printed on a large sheet, was circulated with great industry. "The price of blood," says Dr. Johnson, "was a pension which he retained till his death." Mallet was unprincipled enough to accept of a legacy of £1,000, left by Sarah duchess of Marlborough at her death in 1744, as the price of a Life of her illustrious husband, of which he never wrote a line. Besides this bequest, he received also an annual sum from the second duke, to encourage him to proceed with it, but he never even commenced the work.

On Lord Bute becoming premier, Mallet wrote his 'Truth in Rhyme.' He also wrote 'Edwin and Emma,' a ballad. His tragedy of 'Elvira,' produced at Drury Lane in 1763, was written with the design of promoting the political views of the new administration. As a recompense, he was appointed keeper of the Book of Entries for ships in the port of London. He died April 21, 1765. A collected edition of his poems was published by himself in three vols. in 1759; but most of his writings are now only known by name. He was an avowed infidel, and a venal writer of the very worst description. He was twice married. Of his first wife, by whom he had several children, nothing is known. One daughter, named Cileisia, who married an Italian of rank, and died at Genoa in 1790, wrote a tragedy called 'Almida,' which was acted at Drury Lane. His second wife was a Lucy Elstob, a freethinker like himself, the daughter of Lord Carlisle's steward, with whom he received a considerable fortune.

MAN. JAMES, an antagonist of Ruddiman, was born at Whitewreath, in Elginshire, about 1700. He studied at King's College, Aberdeen, where he obtained the degree of M.A. in 1721. Soon after leaving college he became schoolmaster of the parish of Tough in Aberdeenshire, but though licensed to preach, it never was his fortune to obtain a church. In 1742 he was appointed Master of the Poor's Hospital in Aberdeen. In 1751 he published at Aberdeen an octavo work, entitled 'A Censure and Examination of Mr. Thomas Ruddiman's Philological Notes on the Works of the Great Buchanan, more particularly on the History of Scotland; in which also most of the Chronological and Geographical, and many of the Historical and Political Notes are taken into consideration. In a Letter to a Friend. Necessary for restoring the true readings, the graces, and beauties, and for understanding the true meaning of a vast number of passages of Buchanan's writings, which have been so foully corrupted, so miserably defaced, so grossly perverted and misunderstood. Containing many curious particulars of his life, and a Vindication of his Character from many gross calumnies.' This work was answered by Ruddiman the following year, in a publication entitled 'Anticrisis, or a Discussion of the Scurrilous and Malicious Libel, published by one James Man of Aberdeen.' Among other literary projects, Mr. Man made collections for an edition of Dr. Arthur Johnston's Poems, and contemplated a 'History of the Church of Scotland,' which he was prevented from accomplishing by his death in October 1761. He had some time previous sent his edition of Buchanan's History to the press, the last sheets of which were corrected by Professor Gerard, and it was published in 1762. By frugality he had saved about £155, of which he bequeathed £60 to his relations, and settled the remainder on the Poor's Hospital for apprentice fees to the boys educated in that useful institution.

MANSFIELD, earl of, a title in the peerage of the United Kingdom possessed by the viscount Stormont, (see STORMONT, Viscount.) and first conferred, in 1776, on the celebrated lawyer and statesman, William Murray (see MURRAY, WILLIAM, first earl of Mansfield).

MAORMOR, the highest title of honour amongst the Highlanders of Scotland, in the 10th, 11th, and 12th centuries, the persons bearing it having been the patriarchal chiefs of the great tribes into which the Celtic population was then divided. They had jurisdiction and authority over extensive districts, as Athole, Moray, Ross, Garmoran, Mar, and Buchan. The word seems to have been derived from the Gaelic maor, steward, and mhòr, great, and its office and dignity appear to have been next to that of the king. So great indeed was the power of the maormors and so extensive the territories which they ruled over, that they sometimes were enabled to wage independent war even against the sovereign himself. The succession to the maordom was strictly hereditary in the male line. In proof of this, Mr. Skene (Highlanders, vol. i. p. 79) instances the succession of the maormors of Moray. In 1032, the Annals of Ulster mention the death of Gilcomgain Mac Maolbride, maormor of Mureve. In 1058, they record the death of Lulach Mac Gilcomgain, king of Scotland, and in 1085, that of Maolsnechtan Mac-Lulach, king or maormor of Mureve. Thus showing, that although Lulach had been driven from the throne, his son succeeded to the maordom of Moray in his place.

The title of maormor was peculiar to the Scottish Gael, and was altogether unknown among the Irish, although they too were a Celtic race. It was exclusively confined to the north of Scotland, and was never held by any of those Saxon or Norman barons who obtained extensive territories by grant, or succeeded, as they sometimes did, by marriage to the possessions and power of the maormors. When the line of the ancient maormors gradually sank under the ascendant influence of the feudal system, the clans forming the great tribes became independent, and their leaders or chiefs were held to represent each the common ancestor or founder of his clan, and derived all their dignity and power from the belief in such representation. The chief possessed his office by right of blood alone, as that right was understood in the Highlands; neither election nor marriage could constitute any title to this distinction; it was purely hereditary, nor could descend to any person, except to him who, according to the Highland rule of succession, was the nearest male heir to the dignity.

MAR, Earl of. See MARR.

MARCH, Earl of, a title which, with that of earl of Dunbar, was long enjoyed by the descendants of Cospatrik, earl of Northumberland, who came into Scotland in the reign of Malcolm Canmore (see art. DUNBAR, vol. ii. p. 73). On the forfeiture of George, 11th earl of Dunbar and March, in 1434, it was vested in the crown. In 1478, the earldom of March was conferred by King James III. on his brother, Alexander, duke of Albany, on whose forfeiture it was again annexed to the crown by act of the estates, 1st October, 1487. It continued in the crown till 1582, when, with the lordship of Dunbar, it was conferred on Robert Stuart, granduncle of James VI., on his relinquishing the earldom of Lennox to his nephew, Esme Stuart of Aubigny (see vol. ii. p. 651). On his death, without legitimate issue, in 1586, the title once more reverted to the crown.

Lord William Douglas, second son of the first duke of Queensberry, was created earl of March, 20th April 1697. He succeeded as second duke, and on the death, without issue, of his grandson, William, fourth duke of Queensberry and third earl of March, in December 1810 (see QUEENSBERRY, duke of), the latter title, with the great estates of the Queensberry family in the county of Peebles, devolved on the sixth earl of Wemyss, whose great-grandfather married, for his first wife, Lady Ann Douglas, eldest daughter of the first duke of Queensberry, and sister of the first earl of March (see WEMYSS, earl of).

The word March or Merse, signifying boundary or limit, anciently more particularly applied to the eastern part of the Scottish border, is now confined to Berwickshire. Chalmers, however, thinks it more probable that the frontier province got its name from the Anglo-Saxon merse, a marsh, or from mariscus, a naked plain.

MARCHMONT, earl of, a title (dormant since 1794) in the peerage of Scotland, conferred by William III. on Sir Patrick Home of Polwarth (a memoir of whom is given at page 502 of vol. ii.) He was descended from Sir Patrick Home of Polwarth, comptroller of Scotland from 1499, when he was knighted, to 1502, second son of David Home, younger of Wedderburn. The comptroller's great-grandson, Patrick Home of Polwarth, was a chief promoter of the Reformation in Scotland, and one of those who in 1560 entered into an association to protect the preachers of the gospel. The eldest son of this gentleman, Sir Patrick Home of Polwarth, was, in 1591, appointed master of the household to King James VI., one of the gentlemen of his bedchamber, and warden of the marches. He died 10th June 1609. Sir Patrick Home, his son, had a pension of £100 sterling from James VI., from whom he received several other marks of favour. By Charles I. he was created a baronet in 1625, soon after his accession to the throne. He died in April 1648. His eldest son was the first earl of Marchmont, so created 23d April 1697. He had previously, 26th December 1690, been raised to the peerage by the title of Lord Polwarth. The patent of the earldom was to him and his heirs male whatsoever, and the secondary titles were viscount of Blasonberrie and Lord Polwarth of Polwarth, Redbraes and Greenlaw. This nobleman, it is well known, when Sir Patrick Home, suffered much for his patriotism, during the persecution in Scotland in the reigns of Charles II. and James VII., and had many narrow escapes of being taken. When he had decided upon leaving his place of concealment (see vol. ii. p. 503) for the continent, he set out during night accompanied by a trustworthy servant named John Allan, who was to conduct him part of his way to London. In travelling towards the Tweed, they unconsciously separated, Sir

Patrick having somehow quitted the proper road without being aware of it till he reached the banks of the river. This mistake proved his safety; for his servant Allan was overtaken by those very soldiers who were in pursuit of him. In the assumed capacity of a surgeon Sir Patrick got safely to London. Thence he proceeded to Holland, and returned to Scotland at the Revolution. He had four sons and five daughters. His eldest daughter, Grizel, afterwards Lady Grizel Baillie (see vol. ii. p. 486) was the heroine who, when only twelve years of age, supplied her father with food and other necessaries, at the time he was under concealment in the family burial-vault, beneath the parish church of Polwarth. His eldest son, Lord Polwarth, predeceased him in 1710. His second son, the Hon. Captain Robert Home, also died young, without issue.

The third son, Alexander, was the second earl of Marchmont. Born in 1675, he was admitted advocate 25th July 1696. He married in July 1697, Margaret, daughter and heiress of Sir George Campbell of Cessnock, Ayrshire, and having been knighted, he assumed the name of Sir Alexander Campbell. He was elected member in the Scots parliament for Berwickshire, and on 16th October 1704, appointed a lord of session, taking his seat as Lord Cessnock. He was at the same time made a commissioner of the court of exchequer, and sworn a privy councillor. He supported the Union in parliament, and in November 1714 he resigned his seat in the court of session in favour of his younger brother, the Hon. Sir Andrew Home of Kinmerghame, Berwickshire. On the breaking out of the rebellion of 1715, he raised 400 of the Berwickshire militia, on the side of the government, and marched with three battalions to join the duke of Argyle at Stirling. The same year he was appointed envoy extraordinary to the courts of Denmark and Prussia. In December 1716, he became lord-clerk-register. In 1721 he was appointed first ambassador to the congress at Cambray, and in March of that year made his public entry into that city in a style of splendour and magnificence becoming the representative of the British nation. He succeeded his father as earl of Marchmont, August 1, 1724, and the following year was invested with the order of the Thistle. In 1726 he was sworn a privy councillor, and in 1727 chosen one of the sixteen representative Scots peers. In 1733 he joined the opposition against Sir Robert Walpole, and in consequence he was, in May of that year, dismissed from his office of lord-clerk-register. He died at London February 27, 1740, in his 65th year, and was buried in Canongate churchyard, Edinburgh. In the Scots Magazine for March 1740, is a high character of this nobleman. He had four sons and four daughters. The two eldest sons died young. The two youngest, Hugh, third earl, and the Hon. Alexander Home, were twins, born at Edinburgh 15th February 1708. At the general election of 1734 the latter was chosen M.P. for Berwickshire, and constantly rechosen till his death 19th July 1760. He took an active part in parliamentary business, and was an eminent barrister in London. In 1741 he was appointed solicitor to the prince of Wales, and 27th January 1756, lord-clerk-register of Scotland.

Hugh, third earl of Marchmont, became eminent for his learning and brilliant genius. At the general election of 1734, he was chosen M.P. for Berwick, and in the House of Commons he made himself so formidable to the government as one of the leaders of the opposition, that Sir Robert Walpole, then prime minister, declared that there were few things he more ardently desired than to see that young man at the head of his family; which would have had the effect of removing him from parliament altogether. On the death of his father in February 1740, he became third earl of Marchmont.

By his contemporaries his lordship was held in high estimation. He formed an intimate friendship with Lord Cobham, who gave his bust a place in the Temple of Worthies at Stow, and with Pope, who introduced his name into the well-known inscription in his grotto at Twickenham:

"There the bright flame was shot through Marchmont's soul."

He was one of the executors of Pope, and also of Sarah, duchess of Marlborough, both of whom died in 1744. The latter left him a legacy of £2,500. In 1750 he was elected one of the sixteen representative peers of Scotland, and re-chosen at every general election till 1784. During the 34 years that he sat in the house of Lords, he took an active part in the business of the house, few of their lordships possessing a greater amount of parliamentary information and experience. In 1747 he had been appointed first lord of police, a department long since abolished, and on 28th January 1764, keeper of the great seal of Scotland. He died at Hemel-Hempstead, Hertfordshire, 10th January 1794, in his 86th year, when the earldom of Marchmont became dormant. He built Marchmont House, in the parish of Polwarth, Berwickshire, and on his death Sir Hugh Purves, sixth baronet of Purves Hall, great-grandson of Lady Anne Purves, eldest sister of the third earl of Marchmont, assumed the names of Hume and Campbell on succeeding to the estates.

His lordship married, first, in May 1731, Miss Anne Western, London, by whom he had a son, Patrick, Lord Polwarth, who died young, and three daughters. The youngest daughter, Lady Diana Home, married, 18th April, 1754, Walter Scott of Harden, Berwickshire, M.P., who died at Tonbridge, 25th January, 1793, and had one son, Hugh Scott of Harden, who, in 1835, made good his claim to the title of Lord Polwarth in the Scottish peerage (see POLWARTH, lord). Lady Diana was the only one of the earl's daughters who left surviving issue, and the Polwarth peerage, when conferred on the first earl of Marchmont, was with remainder to the heirs male of his body, and failing these to the heirs general of such heirs male. His countess having died 9th May 1747, the earl married, secondly, at London, 30th January 1748, Miss Elizabeth Crompton, daughter of a linen-draper in Cheapside. By this lady he had one son, Alexander, Lord Polwarth, born in 1750, married 16th July 1772, Lady Annabella Yorke, eldest daughter of Philip, second earl of Hardwicke. He was created a peer of the United Kingdom by the title of Baron Hume of Berwick, 14th May, 1776. He died, without issue, 9th March 1781, in his 31st year, when his British title became extinct.

Lord Marchmont bequeathed his library, consisting of one of the most curious and valuable collections of books and manuscripts in Great Britain, to his sole executor, the Right Hon. George Rose, whose son, Sir George Henry Rose, published in 1831, 'A Selection from the papers of the Earls of Marchmont, illustrative of Events from 1685 to 1750,' in 3 vols. 8vo.

MARISCHAL, Earl, a title (attained in 1716) in the Scottish peerage, conferred by James II., before 4th July 1458, on Sir William Keith, great marischal of Scotland (see vol. ii. p. 587). The first earl died before 1476. His son, William, second earl, joined the confederacy against King James III., in 1488, and sat in the first parliament of King James IV., the same year. He had four sons. From John, the youngest son, descended the Keiths of Craig, to which family belonged Sir Robert Murray Keith, K.B., British ambassador to Vienna, St. Petersburg, and Copenhagen; his brother, Sir Basil Keith, governor of Jamaica; and their sister, Mrs. Murray Keith, the well-known Mrs. Bethune Baliol of Sir Walter Scott, notices of whom are given at page 587 of vol. ii. of this work.

William, the eldest son, succeeded as third earl Marischal. In 1515, when the castle of Stirling was surrendered by the queen-mother to the regent Albany, the young king, James V., and his infant brother, the duke of Ross, were committed to the keeping of the earl Marischal, with the lords Fleming and Borthwick, whose fidelity to the crown was unsuspected; and in 1517, when Albany went to France, the young king was conveyed to the castle of Edinburgh, and intrusted to the charge of Lord Marischal and Lord Erskine. The earl died about 1530. With four daughters he had four sons. Robert, Lord Keith, and his brother, William, the two eldest sons, fell at the battle of Flodden, 13th September 1513. The pennon of the earl Marischal borne in that fatal battle, having on it three stag's heads, and the motto, "Veritas Vincit," is preserved in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh. Lord Keith had, with three daughters, two sons; William, fourth earl Marischal, and Robert, commendator of Deer, whose son, Andrew Keith, was created Lord Dingwall, in 1587, but died without issue (see vol. ii. p. 38). From the earl's youngest son, Alexander Keith, descended Bishop Robert Keith, author of the Catalogue of Scottish Bishops, a memoir of whom is given at page 591 of vol. ii.

William, fourth earl, the elder of the two sons of Lord Keith, succeeded his grandfather in 1530. He accompanied King James V., on his matrimonial expedition to France in 1536, and was appointed an extraordinary lord of session, 2d July 1541. At the meeting of the Estates, 12th March 1543, he was selected, with the earl of Montrose, and the lords Erskine, Ruthven, Lindsay, Livingston, and Seton, to be keepers of the young Queen Mary's person, and nominated one of the secret council to the regent Arran. Sir Ralph Sadler, the English ambassador in Scotland, describes him at this time, in a letter to his sovereign, as "a goodly young gentleman," and as well inclined to the project of the marriage of Queen Mary with Prince Edward. He also mentions him as one "who hath ever borne a singular good affection" to Henry. In the list of the English king's pensioners in Scotland, we find the earl Marischal, John Charteris and the Lord Gray's friends in the North, set down at 300 marks. On the 18th December of the same year (1543), his place in the council, with that of the earls of Angus, Lennox, and Glencairn, was filled up, on the ground that they were absent and would not attend. He was one of the principal nobles who signed the agreement in the following June, to support the authority of the queen-mother as regent of Scotland, against the earl of Arran, declared by that instrument to be deprived of his office. (Tytler's Hist. of Scotland, vol. v. p. 369, Note.)

The earl seems early to have been well inclined towards the doctrines of the Reformation, and he was doubtless induced, with the other nobles favourable to the proposed matrimonial alliance with England, to give it his support, in the belief that it would tend to the introduction into Scotland of a purer faith and a more simple form of worship, than the Roman Catholic. In 1544, when George Wishart, the martyr, preached in Dundee, and denounced from the pulpit the judgments of heaven against that town for having been interdicted by the civic authorities from preaching there any more, lord Marischal and several other noblemen were present, and endeavoured to induce him to remain, or go with them, but he preferred proceeding to Edinburgh. Tytler mentions the earl Marischal as one of the persons associated with the earl of Cassillis in his conspiracy to assassinate Cardinal Bethune, by the hands of one Forster, an Englishman, commissioned thereto by Henry VIII. The plot, he says, he discovered during his researches in the secret correspondence of the State Paper office, and was previously unknown to any Scottish or English historian. (Hist. of Scotland, vol. v. p. 387). His lordship fought at Pinkie in 1547, when several of his followers were slain. In September 1550 he accompanied the queen dowager to France.

In May 1556, when Knox was summoned to appear before the bishops in the church of the Blackfriars at Edinburgh, "the earl of Glencairn," says Calderwood, "allured the earl Marischal, with his counsellor, Harie Drummond, to hear his exhortation in the night;" when they were so well pleased with what they heard that they induced the Reformer to write a letter to the queen regent, in the hope that she might be persuaded to listen to his preaching. He accordingly sent by Glencairn a long epistle to her majesty, which is printed in Calderwood's History, (vol. i. pages 308—316) and is the same which called from her the sneering remark, on delivering it to Bethune, bishop of Glasgow, "Please you, my lord, to read a pasquill!" Lord Marischal was one of the noblemen in the suite of the queen regent when she made her entry into Perth, 29th May 1559; and with the earls of Argyre and Glencairn, and the Lord James Stuart, afterwards the regent Moray, he was called to the deathbed of that princess in June 1560, when she expressed her sorrow for the calamities under which Scotland was at that time suffering, and earnestly exhorted them to send both the French and English armies out of the country, and to continue their allegiance to their lawful sovereign.

When the Confession of Faith was ratified by the three estates of the kingdom at Edinburgh, 17th July 1560, the earl Marischal made the following remarkable speech: "It is long since I had some favour into the truth, and was somewhat jealous of the Roman religion; but, praised be God, I am this day fully resolved; for seeing my lords the bishops who by their learning can, and for the zeal they owe to the truth, would, as I suppose, gainsay anything repugnant to the same, yet speak nothing against the doctrine proposed, I cannot but hold it the very truth of God, and the contrary of it false and deceivable doctrine. Therefore, so far as in me lyeth, I approve the one, and condemn the other, and do farther ask of God, that not only I, but also my posterity, may enjoy the comfort of the doctrine that this day our ears have heard. Farther, I protest if any persons ecclesiastical shall hereafter oppose themselves to this our confession, that they have no place nor credit, considering that time of advisement being granted to them, and they having full knowledge of this our confession, none is now found in lawful, free, and quiet parliament to oppose themselves to that which we profess. And, therefore, if any of this generation pretend to do after this, I protest he be reputeth rather one that loveth his own commodity and the glory of the world, than the glory of God, and salvation of men's souls." (Calderwood's Hist., vol. ii. p. 37). He was one of the twenty-four lords selected by the estates, from among whom the crown was to choose eight and the estates six, for the government of the country. He also subscribed the Book of Discipline.

On the return of Queen Mary from France in August, 1561, he was sworn one of the lords of her privy council. He took an active part in all questions respecting religion, and in the General Assembly which met at Edinburgh in December 1563, he was one of the committee appointed to revise the Book of Discipline. He did not, however, interfere much in political matters, and when the nation came to be divided against itself, on the death of Darnley and the imprisonment of the queen, he retired to his castle of Dunnottar, on the seacoast of Kincardineshire, whence he so seldom stirred that he acquired the name of William of the Tower. So extensive was his landed property at that time that his yearly rental amounted to 270,000 marks. It was situated in so many different counties that it is said he could travel from Berwick to the northern extremity of Scotland, eating his meals and sleeping every night on his own estates. (Douglas' Peerage, vol. ii. p. 192.) He died 7th October 1581. By his countess, Margaret, daughter and co-heiress of Sir William Keith of Invergarnie, Banffshire, he had, with seven daughters, two sons, William, Lord Keith, and Robert, Lord Altrie. (See vol. i. p. 122.)

William, Lord Keith, the elder son, was taken prisoner, in an inroad into England in 1558, and placed in the custody of the earl of Northumberland, but allowed to go home in December 1559 on bond. The exorbitant sum of £2,000 was demanded for his ransom. He died 10th August 1580, leaving four sons and four daughters.

His eldest son, George, fifth earl Marischal, the founder of Marischal College, Aberdeen, succeeded his grandfather in October 1581. Of this nobleman a memoir is given at page 583 of vol. ii. His eldest son, William, succeeded as sixth earl on his death, April 2, 1623. The latter was a member of the Scottish privy council, under Charles I., and in 1634, he fitted out a fleet which he sent to Vladislavus VII., king of Poland. He died 28th October 1635, leaving four sons and three daughters. The two eldest sons, William and George, succeeded as seventh and eighth earls. John, the fourth son, was the first earl of Kintore. (See KINTORE, earl of, vol. ii. page 611.)

William, seventh earl, was a staunch Covenanter. When the earl of Montrose, in March 1639, went to Aberdeen to force the covenant on the inhabitants of that city, the earl Marischal, according to Spalding, had one of the five colours carried by his well appointed army on that occasion. Sometime after its departure to the south, the Covenanters of the north appointed a committee meeting to be held at Turriff, a small town in Aberdeenshire, on the 24th April, consisting of the earls Marischal and Scaforth, the Lord Fraser, the Master of Forbes, and some others. The meeting was afterwards postponed till the 26th of April, and subsequently adjourned to Aberdeen, to be held on the 20th of May. A body of about 2,000 Covenanters having assembled at Turriff as early as the 13th, the Gordons resolved to attack them before they should be joined by more, and having surprised them on the morning of the 14th, they were soon dispersed, and a few taken prisoners. The loss on either side in killed and wounded was very trifling. This skirmish is called by the writers of the period, "the Trot of Turray," and is distinguished as the place where blood was first shed in the civil wars.

Marching to Aberdeen, the Gordons expelled the Covenanters from the town, and being joined there by a larger force, they sent John Leith of Hartbill and William Lumsden, advocate in Aberdeen, to Dunnottar, for the purpose of ascertaining the sentiments of the earl Marischal, in relation to their proceedings, and whether they might reckon on his friendship. The earl intimated that he would require eight days to advise with his friends. This answer was considered quite unsatisfactory, and the chiefs of the army were at a loss how to act. Robert Gordon of Straloch and James Burnet of Craigmile, a brother of the laird of Leys, proposed to enter into a negotiation with the earl, but Sir George Ogilvy of Banff would not listen to such a proceeding, and, addressing Straloch, he said, "Go, if you will go; but prythee, let it be as quartermaster, to inform the earl that we are coming." After having had an interview with the earl, Straloch and Burnet returned with the answer that his lordship had no intention to take up arms, without an order from the Tables, as the boards of representatives, chosen respectively by the nobility, country gentry, clergy, and inhabitants of the burghs, were called, that if the Gordons would disperse he would give them early notice to re-assemble, if necessary, for their own defence, but that if they should attack him, he would certainly defend himself.

On receiving this answer the Gordons disbanded their army on the 21st May. The depredations of the Highlanders upon the properties of the Covenanters were thereafter carried on to such an extent that the latter complained to the earl, who immediately assembled a body of men out of Angus and the Mearns, with which he entered Aberdeen on the 23d May. Two days afterwards he was joined by Montrose, at the head of 4,000 men, an addition which, with other accessions, made the whole force assembled at Aberdeen exceed 6,000. This army was soon after marched into the Mearns by Montrose.

On the approach to Stonehaven from Aberdeen of a royalist force under the viscount of Aboyne, on the 14th June, the earl Marischal posted himself with 1,200 men and some pieces of ordnance from Dunnottar castle, on the direct road which Aboyne had to pass. As the latter descended the Meagre hill, on the morning of the 15th, the earl opened a heavy fire upon him, which threw his men into complete disorder, and in a short time his whole army gave way. This affair was called "the Raid of Stonehaven."

The earl Marischal and Montrose now advanced towards the Dee with all their strength, and as Aboyne was anxious to prevent their passage of that river, a battle took place at the Bridge of Dee, in which the royalists were defeated and their army obliged to fly. The next day, the 20th June, 1639, the tidings arrived of the pacification of Berwick, concluded two days before, when both parties disbanded their forces.

The earl was one of the association which Montrose had formed at Cumbernauld in January 1641, for supporting the royal authority. In September 1644, however, he joined the army of the earl of Argyle, on its route to the north, to oppose the royalist forces under Montrose, after the battle of Aberdeen. In the following October he was one of the committee of the Estates sitting in that city, when Montrose entered Angus, and on hearing of his approach, they issued, on the 10th of that month, a printed order, to which the earl Marischal's name was attached, ordaining all persons, of whatever age, sex, or condition, having horses of the value of forty pounds Scots or upwards, to send them to the Bridge of Dee, the appointed place of rendezvous, on the 14th October, with riders fully equipped and armed; with certification, in case of failure, that each landed proprietor should be fined £1,000; every gentleman not a landed proprietor, £500 Scots; and each husbandman 100 merks, besides confiscation of their horses. With the exception, however, of Lord Gordon, eldest son of the marquis of Huntly, who brought three troops of horse, and Captain Alexander Keith, brother of the earl Marischal, who appeared with one troop at the appointed place, no attention was paid to the order of the committee by the people, who had no desire to expose themselves again to the vengeance of Montrose and his troops. In the battle of Fyvie which followed, the only person of note who was killed was the above-named Captain Keith.

The earl was now to find a bitter opponent in his former associate and friend, the marquis of Montrose. The latter took up his quarters at Stonehaven on 19th March 1645, and the following day he wrote a letter to Lord Marischal, who with sixteen ministers and some persons of distinction, had shut himself up in his castle of Dunnottar. The bearer of the letter, however, without being suffered to enter within the gate, was sent away without an answer. It is said that he was advised to this line of conduct by his countess and the ministers who had taken refuge in Dunnottar. Highly incensed at the earl's silence, Montrose desired Lord Gordon to write to George Keith, the earl's brother, who had an interview with Montrose at Stonehaven, when the latter informed him that all he wanted from the earl was that he should serve the king his master against his rebellious subjects, and that if he failed to do so, he would feel his vengeance. But the earl declined to comply, as he said "he would not be against the country." (Spalding, vol. ii. p. 306.)

In consequence of this refusal, Montrose at once subjected his property to military execution. On the 21st of March, he set fire to the houses adjoining the castle of Dunnottar, and burnt the grain stacked in the barn-yards. He next set fire to the town of Stonehaven. The lands and houses of Cowie shared the same fate. The woods of Fetteresso were also burnt, and the whole of the lands in the vicinity ravaged. A ship in the harbour of Stonehaven, after being plundered, was also set fire to, with all the fishing boats. The vassals and dependents of the earl crowded before the castle of Dunnottar, and with loud cries of pity, implored him to save them from ruin. No attention was paid to their supplications, and the earl witnessed from his stronghold the total destruction of the properties of his tenants without making any effort to prevent it. He is said, however, deeply to have regretted his rejection of Montrose's proposals, when he beheld the smoke ascending all around him; "but the famous Andrew Cant, who was among the number of his ghostly company, edified his resolution at once to its original pitch of firmness, by assuring him that that reek would be a sweet smelling incense in the nostrils of the Lord, rising, as it did, from property which had been sacrificed to the holy cause of the covenant."

In 1648, the earl raised a troop of horse for the "Engagement," formed by the duke of Hamilton for the release of the king from his captivity, and was present at the rout of Preston, but escaped. In 1650, he entertained King Charles II., in the castle of Dunnottar, and on 6th June 1651, his castle of Dunnottar was selected by the Scots Estates and privy council, as the fittest place for the preservation of the regalia of Scotland (see KINTORE, earl of, vol. ii. p. 611). He was one of the committee of the Estates arrested by a detachment of English horse from Dundee, on 28th August, 1651, when sitting at Alyth in Angus. Carried prisoner to the Tower of London, he remained there till the Restoration, having been excepted from Cromwell's act of grace and pardon, 12th April, 1654. He was sworn one of the privy councillors of Charles II., and appointed keeper of the privy seal of Scotland. He died in 1661.

His brother, George, succeeded as eighth earl. In his younger years this nobleman served in the French army, and rose to the rank of colonel. At the commencement of the civil wars in Scotland, he returned home, and at the battle of Preston in 1648, he commanded a regiment of foot under the duke of Hamilton. At the battle of Worcester in 1651, he had the charge of three regiments appointed to guard a parteicular post, when, being overpowered by numbers, he was made prisoner. At the Revolution he seems to have taken no part on either side. In a letter from Viscount Dundee to the earl of Melfort, dated June 27, 1689, giving an account of the position and views of several of the Scots nobility and gentry in regard to the struggle for the throne, Dundee says of him, "Earl Marshall is at Edinburgh, but does not meddle." The earl died in 1694.

His only son, William, ninth earl, took the oaths and his seat in the Estates, 19th July 1698, and always opposed the measures of King William's reign. In the parliament of 6th May 1703, he protested against the calling of any of the earls before himself. He voted against the Union on every occasion when any question regarding it was before the house, and when the treaty was agreed to, he entered a solemn protest against it. As heritable keeper of the regalia of Scotland, he ordered the same to be delivered up to the earl of Glasgow, treasurer-depute, to be lodged in the castle of Edinburgh, protesting, at the same time, that this should not invalidate his right as keeper thereof, and that if it should be found necessary, at any future time, to transport the regalia to any other place within the kingdom, this should not be done till intimation be made to him or his successors. The principal instrument, attested by seven notaries public, in the hands of Alexander Keith of Dunnottar, is printed in the second volume of Nisbet's System of Heraldry. At the general election, 10th November 1710, the earl was chosen one of the sixteen Scots representative peers. He died 27th May 1712. By his countess, Lady Mary Drummond, eldest daughter of the fourth earl of Perth, high chancellor of Scotland at the Revolution, he had two sons and two daughters. George, the elder son, succeeded as tenth earl Marischal. James Francis Edward, the younger son, was the celebrated Marshal Keith, a memoir of whom is given at page 576 of vol. ii. Lady Mary Keith, the elder daughter, married the sixth earl of Wigton, and was the mother of Lady Clemeotina Fleming, wife of the tenth Lord Elphinstone, one of whose sons, Admiral Sir George Keith Elphinstone, K.B., was created Viscount Keith. (See vol. ii. p. 139.) Lady Anne, the younger daughter, became countess of Galloway.

George, tenth earl, was born about 1693. Of the once vast property of his family all that he inherited were the estates of Dunnottar, Fetteresso, and Innergie, the remainder having been dilapidated in the time of Cromwell, or given as provision to the younger branches. From Queen Anne, his lordship received the command of a troop of horse, and on the death of lieutenant-general the earl of Crawford (see vol. i. p. 716) he was appointed, 3d February 1714, captain of the Scottish troop of horse grenadier guards. He signed the proclamation of George I., August 1, the same year; but not being acceptable to the duke of Argyle, he was deprived of his command, at the same time that his cousin the earl of Mar was dismissed from his office of secretary of state. Lord Marischal, on his way back to Scotland, met his brother James, the future Marshal Keith, at York, hastening to London, to apply for promotion in the army. They returned homo together, and instigated by their mother, who was a Jacobite and a Roman Catholic, they at once engaged in the rebellion of 1715.

The earl was one of the disaffected nobles who attended the pretended hunting match, summoned by the earl of Mar at Aboyne in Aberdeenshire, when he unfolded his plans in favour of the Chevalier to those assembled, and he afterwards proclaimed "King James VIII." at Aberdeen. At the battle of Sheriffmuir he had the command of two squadrons of horse. On his arrival in Scotland 22d December, the Chevalier passed the next night at Newburgh, a seat of the earl Marischal, and at Fetteresso, the principal seat of the earl, he remained several days, suffering from ague. Here he held a reception, when the earl of Mar, the earl Marischal, and about thirty other noblemen and gentlemen, were introduced to him, and had the honour of kissing his hand. When the Chevalier made his public entry into Dundee, on 6th January 1716, the earl of Mar rode on his right hand and the earl Marischal on his left. After the failure of the enterprize, the earl escaped to the continent, but his titles, with the hereditary office of Marischal of Scotland, which had been in the family since the days of Malcolm Canmore, were attainted, and his estates forfeited to the crown.

In 1719, the earl returned to Scotland, with the Spanish troops sent by Cardinal Alberoni, prime minister of the king of Spain, to make another attempt in the Pretender's favour. This small force landed in the western Highlands, and was joined by some Highlanders, chiefly Seaforth's men. A difference arose between the earl Marischal and the marquis of Tullibardine about the command, but this dispute was put an end to by the advance of General Wightman from Inverness, with a body of regular troops. The Highlanders and their allies had taken possession of the pass at Glenshiel; but, on the approach of the government troops, they retired to the pass at Strachell, which they resolved to defend. General Wightman attacked and drove them from one eminence to another, when, seeing no chance of making a successful resistance, the Highlanders dispersed during the night, and the Spaniards on the following day surrendered themselves prisoners of war. Marischal, Seaforth, and Tullibardine, with the other officers, retired to the western isles, and thereafter escaped to the continent.

On the rupture between Great Britain and Spain in 1740, the Chevalier despatched Lord Marischal to Madrid to induce the Spanish court to adopt measures for his restoration. Alluding to his expectations of assistance from France, the Chevalier, in a letter written to Lord Marischal on 11th January 1740, while his lordship was on his way to the Spanish capital, says, "I am betwixt hopes and fears, tho' I think there is more room for the first than the last, as you will have perceived by what Lord Sempil (so an active agent of James was called) has, I suppose, writ to you. I conclude I shall some time next month see clearer into these great affairs." The original is among the Stuart papers in her Majesty's possession. In 1743, the earl was at Boulogne, and in the following year, when the French government were meditating an invasion of Great Britain in support of the Pretender, a small force in connection with it was to be landed in Scotland under his lordship's command. In a letter, however, to the Chevalier from Lord Marischal, dated Avignon, 5th September 1744, his lordship insinuates that there existed a design, on the part of the French ministry, or of the Chevalier's agents at Paris, to exclude both the duke of Ormond and himself from any share in the expedition.

The earl took no part in the attempt of Prince Charles in 1745. Having gone to reside in Prussia, he gained the confidence of Frederiek the Great, who, in 1750, appointed him his ambassador extraordinary to France. He also invested him with the Prussian order of the Black Eagle, and bestowed on him the government of Neufchatel. In 1759, the earl was ambassador from Prussia to Spain, and discovering, while at the court of Madrid, the secret of the "Family Compact," by which the different branches of the house of Bourbon had bound themselves to assist each other, he communicated that important intelligence to Mr. Pitt, then prime minister of England, afterwards the first earl of Chatham. The latter having represented his case to George II., a pardon was granted to him 29th May 1759. The earl thereupon quitted Madrid, but had not been gone 36 hours before intelligence was received of the communication he had made to England.

Arriving in London he was introduced to George II., 15th June 1760, and most graciously received. An act of parliament passed the same year, to enable him to inherit any estate that might descend to him, notwithstanding his attainder, and he was thus enabled to possess the entailed estates of the earl of Kintore, on his death in 1761 (see KINTORE, earl of, vol. ii. p. 611). He took the oaths to the government in the court of king's bench 26th January, 1761. His own estates had been sold in 1720 to the York Building Company for £41,172, and his castle of Dunnottar dismantled, but in 1761 an act of parliament was passed to enable his majesty, George III. to grant to him out of the principal sum and interest remaining due on his forfeited estate, the sum of £3,618, with interest from Whitsunday 1721. In 1761, Lord Marischal purchased back part of the family estates, with the intention of taking up his residence in Scotland. The king of Prussia, however, was urgent for his return to Berlin. In one of his letters he said, "If I had a fleet, I would come and carry you off by force." The earl, in consequence, went back to Prussia, where he spent the remainder of his days. A traveller, who visited Berlin about 1777, thus writes: "We dined almost every day with the Lord Marischal, who was then 85 years old, and was still as vigorous as ever both in body and mind. The king had given him a house adjoining the gardens of Sans Souci, and frequently went thither to see him. He had excused himself from dining with him, having found that his health would not allow him to sit long at table, and he was of all those who had enjoyed the favour of the king the only one who could truly be called his friend, and who was sincerely attached to his person. Of course, every body paid court to him. He was called the king's friend, and was the only one who had merited that title, for he had always stood well with him without flattering him." His lordship died, unmarried, at Potsdam, 28th May 1778, in his 86th year. An 'Eloge de My lord Marischal' by D'Alembert, was published at Berlin in 1779.

MARJORIBANKS, a territorial surname, from the lands of Ratho-Marjorie, Renfrewshire. See p. 114 of this volume.

MARR, or MAR, earl of, a title in the Scots peerage, now possessed by the family of Erskine. The ancient district of Aberdeenshire of this name, lying chiefly between the Don and the Dee, was one of the old maormoraldoms into which the north of Scotland was divided, whose origin is lost in antiquity. The first mention of it is in 1065, when Martachus, maormor of Marr, was witness to a charter of Malcolm Canmore in favour of the Culdees of Lochleven. His son, Gratanach, witnessed in 1114 the foundation charter of the monastery of Scone by Alexander I. Properly, Gratanach may be considered the first earl of Marr, and not Martachus, as stated by Douglas in his Peerage, the Saxon title of earl not being known in Scotland in Malcolm Canmore's days. He had a son, Morgundus, who witnessed a grant of lands by David I., to the monks of Dunfermline, and was father of Gillocher, witness to a charter of the same monarch in 1093. Gillocher's son, Morgund, received from King William the Lion in 1171, a grant of the renewal of the investitures of the earldom of Marr. He had five sons, the three eldest of whom, Gilbert, Gilchrist, and Duncan, according to Deuglas, were successively earls of Marr, but the succession, as given in the Index to Anderson's Diplomata Scotia, runs as follows: 1. Gratanach; 2. Morgund; 3. Gilchrist; 4. Duncan, his brother; 5. William; 6. Donald; 7. Gratney; 8. Donald II.; 9. Thomas, &c. Earl Duncan died before 1234.

His son, William, fifth earl, according to the above enumeration, was, in 1258, during the minority of Alexander III., appointed one of the regents of Scotland. In 1261 he obtained the office of great chamberlain, and in 1270 he was sent on a special mission to Henry III. of England. He died the same year. By his countess, Elizabeth, daughter of William Comyn, earl of Buchan, he had two sons, Donald and Duncan.

Donald, the sixth, usually called the tenth earl of Marr, was knighted at Scone, by Alexander III., 29th September 1270, and witnessed a charter of that monarch to the fourth earl of Lennox in 1272. He was also a witness to the marriage contract of the princess Margaret of Scotland with Eric, king of Norway, in 1281, and one of the Scots nobles who, in the parliament of Scone, 5th February 1283-4, swore to acknowledge the Maiden of Norway as their sovereign in the event of the death of Alexander III. He was present in the assembly at Brigham 12th July 1290, when the treaty for the marriage of the Maiden of Norway, Alexander's grand-daughter and successor, with the prince of Wales, afterwards Edward II. of England, was concluded, but her death at Orkney, on her passage from Norway, put an end to that project for the union of the two kingdoms.

Donald, earl of Marr, was one of the nominees chosen on the part of Robert Bruce, earl of Carrick, in his competition for the Scottish crown in 1190. He died in 1294, leaving a son, Gratney, who succeeded him, and two daughters. Isabella, the elder, as the wife of Robert the Bruce, was queen of Scotland. Mary, the younger, married Kenneth, third earl of Sutherland.

Gratney, 7th, called 11th earl, married the lady Christian Bruce, sister of Robert I., the Bruce and Marr families being thus doubly united. With a son, Donald, his successor, he had a daughter, Lady Elyne Marr, the wife of Sir John Menzies, and mother of a daughter, Christian, married to Sir Edward Keith. Lady Keith's daughter, Janet, married Sir Thomas Erskine, and her son by him, Sir Robert Erskine, in her right, claimed the earldom of Marr. The Lady Christian Bruce brought to the family of Marr the magnificent castle of Kildunnie, in Aberdeenshire, which, at an early period, was royal property. In 1335, when besieged by the earl of Athole, whom the Baliol faction had made governor of the kingdom, it was under her charge. After Earl Gratney's death, the countess married Sir Christopher Seton of Seton, and afterwards Sir Andrew Moray of Bethwell.

Donald, 8th, called 12th earl, was very young at his father's death. On the defeat of his uncle, Robert the Bruce, at Methven in 1306, the earl of Mar was taken prisoner by the English. During the long and arduous struggle for Scotland's independence, he remained a captive in England. When, however, it had at last been achieved on the field of Bannockburn, he obtained his liberty, being, with the wife, sister, and daughter of Bruce, and the bishop of Glasgow, exchanged for the earl of Hereford. He was present in the parliament of Scone in 1318, but as he appears to have chiefly resided in England during the uneasy reign of Edward II., his name does not appear at the famous letter of the Scottish nobles to the Pope in 1320. He was appointed by King Edward guardian of the castle of Bristol, and in September 1326, when the English queen Isabella, with her paramour, Lord Mortimer, landed in England from France, with an army, against her husband and his favourites the Despensers, he delivered up the castle to her, and returned to Scotland. In the following year he held a subordinate command in the Scottish army which, under Randolph and Douglas, invaded England.

On the death of Randolph, July 30, 1332, the earl of Marr, on 2d August, was chosen regent in his stead, his principal recommendation being that he was the nephew of the late king, as he was every way unfitted for an office so arduous. He held the appointment, however, only for ten days. On the very day of his election he received notice that Edward Baliol, accompanied by the lords Beaumont and Wake, had appeared with a fleet in the Frith of Forth. After defeating a small force which had hastily collected to oppose his landing at Kinghorn, Baliol marched to Perth, and encamped near Forteviot, having the river Earn in his front. The earl of Marr drew up his army, of 30,000 men, upon Dupplin moor, on the opposite bank of the river. Baliol's force did not exceed 3,000 men, but he had friends in the Scottish camp. Many of the Scots nobles, whose relatives had been disinherited by Bruce, secretly favoured his pretensions, as offering a chance of their being restored to their estates. Despising so small a force as Baliol commanded, the Scots abandoned themselves to careless security, and after spending the day in drunkenness, went to rest, without taking the common precaution even of placing sentinels. During the night of the 12th of August, the English crossed the river by a ford pointed out to them by Andrew Murray of Tullibardine, one of the disaffected Scottish barons, and attacking the Scots army in their sleep, put them to complete rout. Among the killed was the earl of Marr. He left a son, Thomas, ninth earl, and a daughter, Lady Margaret, who succeeded her brother.

Thomas, ninth called thirteenth earl, was one of the ambassadors sent to treat with England, for the temporary release in 1351 of David II. from his English captivity; and in 1357, when that weak king was at length set at liberty, he was one of the seven great lords from whom three were to be selected as hostages for the payment of his ransom. In 1358, the earl of Marr was appointed great chamberlain of Scotland. In 1362, he was named an ambassador to treat with England, and in 1369 he was one of the guaranties of a truce with that nation. He appears to have favoured the English interest, as he had a pension from King Edward III. of 600 merks yearly. He died in 1377, leaving no issue. In him ended the direct male line of the old earls of Marr.

His sister, Margaret, succeeded as countess of Marr. She married, first, William, first earl of Douglas, who, in her right, became earl of Marr, and is designed earl of Douglas and Marr in several charters. Having been divorced from him, she took for her second husband Sir John Swinton of Swinton, killed at Homildon hill in 1402. By the earl of Douglas she had a son, James, Earl of Douglas and Marr, and a daughter, Isabella. The second marriage was without issue.

James, earl of Douglas and Marr, fell at Otterburn, July 31, 1388 (see vol. ii. p. 43.)

"This deed was done at Otterbourne,
About the breaking of the day;
Earl Douglas was buried at the braken bush,
And the Perey led captive away."

As he left no legitimate issue his sister, Isabella, became countess of Marr. She married, first, Sir Malcolm Drummond of Drummond, styled, in her right, earl of Marr. He died without issue, before 27th May, 1403. At this time the countess was residing tranquilly at her castle of Kildrummie, and Alexander Stewart, a natural son of the earl of Buchan, called the wolf of Badenoch, deeming her and her broad lands a prize worth the having, at the head of a formidable band of outlaws and robbers, stormed the castle, and either by violence or persuasion, obtained her in marriage. The father of this lawless young man was the fourth son of King Robert II., and as his father's brother, the duke of Albany, governor of the kingdom, for his own purposes, winked at the feuds and excesses of the nobles, he took advantage of the disturbed state of the country and the unprotected condition of the countess, to commit an act, which was attended with complete success. On 12th August, 1401, the countess made over her earldom of Marr and Garioch, with all her other lands, to the said Alexander Stewart, "and the heirs to be preerated between him and her, whom failing, to his heirs and assignees whatsoever." To give a legal aspect to the whole transaction, on the 19th September, he presented himself at the castle gate of Kildrummie, and surrendered to the countess not only the castle, but all within it, and the title deeds therein kept; in testimony of which he delivered to her the keys to dispose of as she pleased. The countess, holding them in her hand, deliberately and of her own free will, chose him for her husband, and conferred upon him the castle, pertinents, &c., as a free marriage gift, of which he took instruments. This, however, was not deemed sufficient, for, on the 9th December following, the countess, standing in the fields, outside the castle of Kildrummie, in presence of Alexander, bishop of Ross, and the whole tenants, that it might appear to have been conferred without force on his part or fear on hers, granted a charter of the same to him, duly signed and sealed. After this the said Alexander Stewart was usually styled earl of Marr and lord of Garioch.

In 1406, he was one of the ambassadors sent to England, to treat of peace. The following year he was again in England, when he engaged in a tournament with the earl of Kent at London. In 1408, he went to France and Flanders, with a splendid retinue, and, according to Wyntoun (Chronykil, vol. ii. pp. 421—440) gained great distinction in the service of the duke of Burgundy, by whom he was sent to assist in quelling a rebellion at Liege, of the inhabitants against John of Bavaria, their bishop. It is said that, on this occasion, although his wife the countess of Marr was then alive, he married the lady of Duffyl in Brabant. In a charter to his brother, Andrew Stewart, with his other acquired titles, he is styled "dominus de Duffel." This was the earl of Marr who commanded the royal army against Donald, lord of the Isles, at the battle of Harlaw in 1411. The ostensible cause of the battle was the earldom of Ross, which had been held by his father, the Wolf of Badenoch, in right of his wife, the countess of Ross, and was claimed by his uncle, the regent Albany, for his second son, the earl of Buchan, as well as by Donald of the Isles in right of his wife. (See vol. i. p. 37.) The struggle, however, was only a part of that long contest which took place betwixt the Saxon and the Celtic portions of the nation for the sovereignty of the country, which lasted till the latter were finally obliged to succumb. The lord of the Isles, with an army of 10,000 men, had advanced as far as the district of Marr, intending to plunder the city of Aberdeen, and to ravage the country to the borders of the Tay, but was stopped in his progress by the earl of Marr, as thus related in the old historical ballad called 'The Battle of Harlaw:'

"To hinder this proud enterprize,
The stout and mighty earl of Mar,
With all his men in arms did rise,
Even frae Curgarf to Craigievar.

And down the side of Don right far,
 Angus and Mearns did all convere
 To fecht, or Donald came sae near,
 The royal burgh of Aberdeen.

“And thus the martial earl of Mar
 Marcht with his men in richt array,
 Before the enemy was aware,
 His banner bauldly did display,
 For weel enech they knew the way,
 And all their semblance weel they saw,
 Without all danger or delay,
 Came hastily to the Harlaw.”

In 1416 the earl was appointed ambassador extraordinary to England, and soon after warden of the marches. His uncle, the duke of Albany, being at this time governor of the kingdom, may partly account for his being preferred to such high offices, especially after the signal service he had done him in defeating his formidable rival, Donald of the Isles.

The countess of Marr died in 1419, when the fee of the earldom should have devolved on the heir of line, Janet Keith, wife of Sir Thomas Erskine, but Earl Alexander, conscious that he had only a life-right to it, used the device of resigning it into the hands of the king, James I., on which a charter of the earldom, dated 28th May 1426, was granted by the king, to himself for life, and to his natural son, Sir Thomas Stewart, after him, and the lawful heirs male of his body, and on their failure to revert to the crown. Earl Alexander died, without legitimate issue, in August 1435, and his natural son, Sir Thomas Stewart, having predeceased him, the earldom, according to the charter, became vested in the crown.

Sir Robert Erskine, only son of Sir Thomas Erskine and Lady Janet Keith, great-granddaughter of Gratney, 7th, called the 11th earl, (see page 108) now advanced his claims to the earldom, in right of his mother, (see vol. ii. p. 144.) On 22d April 1438, he was, before the sheriff of Aberdeen, served heir to the Countess Isabel, and in the following November infefted in the estates. Assuming the title of earl of Marr, he granted various charters to vassals of the earldom. He was not, however, allowed to retain possession of it. In 1437, immediately after the assassination of James I. an act of parliament was passed that no lands or possessions belonging to the king should be given to any man without the consent of the three Estates, till the young king (James II., then only seven years old) should be twenty-one years of age, and in 1440, it was agreed “for the good and quiet of the land, that the king should deliver up to Sir Robert Erskine, calling himself earl of Marr, the castle of Kildrummie, to be kept by him till the king's majority, when the said Sir Robert should come before the king and the three Estates, and show his rights and claims, as far as law will.” At the same time Sir Robert delivered up to the king the castles of Marr and Dumbarton held by him. In 1442, Sir Robert Erskine took a protest at Stirling, in presence of the king and council, complaining against the chancellor, for refusing to return him to the lordship of Garioch, and put him in possession of the castle of Kildrummie. He afterwards besieged and took the castle, whereupon the castle of Alloa, belonging to him, was taken possession of in the king's name. In 1448, in consequence of a new indenture, Sir Robert Erskine obliged himself to deliver up the castle of Kildrummie to the king.

On Sir Robert's death, after 1449, the king, on various grounds, obtained a reduction of his service before an assize of error, held, in his presence, at Aberdeen, 15th May 1457.

The earldom, being thus unjustly withheld from the rightful owners, was never long enjoyed by any of the various personages on whom it was subsequently conferred, the fate of all of whom was singularly unfortunate. The first of these was John, 3d son of James II., a young prince of great accomplishments, and expert in all the knightly exercises and pastimes of the age. Having rendered himself obnoxious to the favourites of his brother, James III., he was in 1479 by them accused of plotting against his life by spells and incantations, and by the king's command imprisoned in Craigmillar castle. Being condemned to die by the king's domestic council, he was removed to the Canongate, Edinburgh, and bled to death by having a vein opened. The earldom was next bestowed, or rather the revenues of it, on Cochran, the principal favourite of the king, who styled himself earl of Mar, hanged at Lauder Bridge in 1482.

The next possessor was Alexander Stewart, duke of Ross, third son of James III., who had a charter of the same, 2d March, 1486. After his death, the date of which is unknown, it returned to the crown, and in February 1561-2, it was conferred by Queen Mary on her natural brother, the lord James Stewart, afterwards regent. A week previous he had been created earl of Moray, a title which he preferred to that of Marr, the latter being claimed by the Erskine family.

At length in 1565, the earldom of Marr was restored by Queen Mary to its legitimate proprietor, John, fifth Lord Erskine, after the family had been deprived of it for 130 years.

John, fifth Lord Erskine, and first acknowledged earl of Mar of that family, was elected regent of the kingdom, on the death of the regent Lennox, in 1571. A notice and portrait of him are given at page 144 of vol. ii. From Queen Mary and King Henry (Lord Darnley) he received a charter, 18th July 1568, granting to him, heritably and irredeemably, and his heirs, bearing the surname and arms of Erskine, the office of sheriff of Stirlingshire, and the captainship and custody of the castle of Stirling, with the office of bailiary and chamberlainry of the lauds and lordship of Stirling and of the water of Forth. The Erskines had been hereditary keepers of Stirling castle from the time of Sir Robert Erskine, who received the appointment from David II. (see vol. ii. p. 144.) The earl was by far too honest and patriotic for the post of regent, to which he had been elected at a time when a civil war of unexampled ferocity raged in the kingdom, and being unable to prevent the scenes of blood and disorder which were continually occurring, or to bring about any union of parties, he sank beneath the burden of anxiety and grief which the distracted state of the kingdom occasioned him, and died 29th October 1572. By his wife, Annabella, daughter of Sir William Murray of Tullibardine, he had a son, John, and a daughter, Mary, countess of Angus.

John, 2d, properly 7th earl of Mar, of the name of Erskine, born about 1558, was, though eight years older than the prince, educated with King James VI. at Stirling castle, by George Buchanan, under the eyes of the countess of Mar, his mother, and Sir Alexander Erskine of Gogar, his uncle, ancestor of the earls of Kellie. (See KELLIE, earl of.) He was only 14 years of age when he succeeded his father in 1572. In April 1578 the earl of Morton prevailed upon him to remove his uncle, Sir Alexander, from Stirling castle, and to take the keeping of the castle and of the king's person into his own hand. Morton then obtained admission to the castle, with his friends and followers in small parties, and after that the young earl durst do nothing but what he commanded

In August 1582, Mar was one of the nobles engaged in the Raid of Ruthven, the object of which was to get rid of the favourites, Lennox and Arran. The following year, Arran being recalled to court, Mar was committed to the custody of the earl of Argyle, and ordered to deliver up the castle of Stirling to the king and council, on pain of treason. On his doing so, the king gave the keeping of Stirling castle to Arran, and also appointed him provost of Stirling. Mar, in the meantime, with the others concerned in the Ruthven affair, had taken refuge in Ireland. Returning to Scotland, they, on the 17th April 1584, surprised Stirling castle, but were forced hurriedly to leave it, on the 27th, on the approach of the king with a large force, and to take shelter in England. In the parliament which met 22d August of that year, the earl was attainted, with the others. In November 1585, however, he and the other banished lords re-entered Scotland, and assembling their retainers, at the head of 8,000 men, took possession of Stirling castle and the king's person, the unprincipled Arran, stripped of all his titles and estates, being allowed to drop into his original obscurity. In the parliament which met in December of the same year, the pardons of the confederated lords were ratified, and their honours and estates restored.

On the arrival of the king with Queen Anne from Denmark 1st May 1590, they were received at the top of the stairs at the pier of Leith, by the duke of Lennox, the earls of Mar and Bothwell, and others; the countesses of Mar and Marischal standing first in order amongst the sixteen noble women and ladies selected to receive the queen. In 1592 he was appointed governor of the castle of Edinburgh. At this time he was in high credit at court, and held the office of great master of the household. In March 1594 he was one of the noblemen who subscribed the bond at Aberdeen, where the king then was, for the security of the protestant religion, against the Popish earls, Huntly, Angus, and Errol, and others. After the baptism of Prince Henry on the penult day of August that year, the king dubbed the royal infant a knight, when he was "touched with the spur by the earl of Mar." At the banquet which followed, "the king and queen, with the ambassadors, sat at table in the great hall, at eight hours at even; the office men to the king, the earl of Mar, great master household; the lord Fleming, great usher; the earl of Montrose, carver; the earl of Glencairn, cupper; the earl of Orkney, sewer; to the queen, the lord Seton, carver; the lord Hume, enpper; the lord Sempill, sewer." The table was so served that every one might see another."

In the spring of 1595, the queen insisted that the young prince should be removed from Stirling to Edinburgh castle, with Buccleuch as governor of the latter fortress, but the earl of Mar, who had charge of the infant, would not allow her to come near him, except with a small retinue, lest he should be carried off. In July of that year the king formally intrusted the keeping and education of the prince to the earl, by a warrant under his own hand, being the fifth generation of the royal family which had been put under the charge of an Erskine. At a convention held at Holyrood palace, Dec. 10, 1598, the earl of Mar was sworn one of the council appointed to meet twice a-week to assist the king with their advice.

In the mysterious business of the Gowrie conspiracy the earl of Mar was one of the king's principal attendants (see vol. ii. p. 559). In 1601 he was sent to England, as ambassador, and to his excellent management on this occasion is in part attributed the smooth accession of King James to the English throne. When in London, Robert Bruce the celebrated preacher, then in banishment for his disbelief of the guilt of the Gowrie brothers, had an interview with him, and through the earl's influence with the king, he subsequently received a license to return to Scotland. In 1603, the earl was one of the Scots nobles who accompanied the king on his departure for London to take possession of the throne of England. Before reaching York, however, he was compelled to return, as the queen had taken advantage of his absence to go to Stirling with a large retinue of noblemen and others, and demand that prince Henry should be delivered up to her. The countess of Mar, the earl's mother, refused to give him up, without an order under the earl's own hand. The queen, enraged at the refusal, took to her bed, and, says Calderwood, "parted with child the 10th of May, as was constantly reported." He refused to give to any one but herself the letters he had brought from the king to her majesty, and both the queen and the earl wrote to James express regarding this business. The duke of Lennox was, in consequence, sent from court to have the affair adjusted. He arrived at Stirling the 19th May, with the king's approval of the proceedings of the earl and his mother, and with commission to transport both the queen and prince to England. The earl of Mar then repaired to London, and on his arrival at court, he was sworn a member of the English privy council, and installed a knight of the Garter, 27th July the same year. In 1604 he was created Lord Cardross (see vol. i. p. 587), at the same time obtaining the barony of that name, with the power of assigning the barony and title to any of his male heirs. The king's reason for conferring this unusual privilege upon him, as stated in the grant, was that he "might be in a better condition to provide for his younger sons, by Lady Mary Stewart, daughter of the duke of Lennox, and a relation of his majesty." His portrait is subjoined.

In the beginning of 1606, he returned to Scotland from London, to assist at the trial of Mr. John Welch and five other ministers at Linlithgow, on a charge of treason, for having declined the jurisdiction of the privy council in a matter purely ecclesiastical. He was rather favourable than otherwise to the prisoners, for when the justice-depute, on a preliminary objection being taken to the relevancy of the indictment, declared that by the uniform votes of the whole council and lords there present, the trial should proceed, the earl of Mar and two others interposed, and said, "Say not all, for there are here that are not, nor ever will be, of that judgment." They were, however, overruled. He was a member of the court of high commission erected in 1610 for the trial of ecclesiastical offences, and also on its renewal in 1619. In December 1616, he was appointed lord-high-treasurer of Scotland, an office which he held till 1630. At the opening of the parliament at Edinburgh, 25th July 1621, he carried the sceptre, as he had often done on similar occasions before. It was at this parliament that the obnoxious five articles of Perth were ratified, the earl of Mar being among those who voted for them. As a courtier and favourite of King James he could not have done otherwise. In 1623 he was one of the noblemen named in a commission to sit at Edinburgh twice a-week for the redress of grievances, but which never took effect. He was at the proclamation of Charles I. as king at the Cross of Edinburgh, betwixt six and seven o'clock in the evening of the last day of March 1625.

The earl died at Stirling castle 14th December 1634, aged 77, and was buried at Alloa. He was twice married, first, to Anne, second daughter of David, second Lord Drummond, by whom he had a son, John, his successor; and secondly, to Lady Mary Stewart, second daughter of Esme, duke of Lennox, already mentioned. By this lady he had five sons and four daughters. The eldest of these sons, Sir James Erskine, married Mary Douglas, countess of Buchan, in her own right, and was created earl of Buchan (see BUCHAN, earl of, vol. i. p. 454, where his portrait is given). The second son, Henry, received from his father the barony of Cardross, and was known as the first Lord Cardross. The third son, Colonel the Hon. Sir Alexander Erskine, was blown up at Duglass-house, in East Lothian, with his brother-in-law, the earl of Haddington, in 1640. He was a man of elegant person, and the hero of the beautiful and pathetic Scottish song, beginning "Baloo, my boy," the heroine of which was Anna Bothwell, daughter of Lord Holyroodhouse, the victim of an unfortunate passion (see vol. i. p. 364). The Hon. Sir Charles Erskine of Alva, knight, the 4th son, was ancestor of the Erskines of Alva (see vol. ii. p. 145), a family now represented by the earls of Rosslyn; and the Hon. William Erskine, the youngest son, was cupbearer to Charles II., and master of the Charter House, London. All the lord-treasurer's four daughters were married to earls, namely, Marischal, Rothes, Kinghorn, and Haddington. The earl himself was familiarly called by his classfellow, James VI., "Jocky o' Selaitis," that is, slates; and this name he continued to give him even after he had become lord-treasurer. When a widower, the earl had fallen deeply in love with Lady Mary Stewart, the daughter of Lennox and cousin of the king. As his lordship was twice her age, and had already a son and heir, she at first positively refused to take him. The king, however, took his part, and in his own homely way, said, "I say, Jock, ye sauna die for ony lass in a' the land." He is said to have prevailed on the lady to marry him by promising to make a peer of her eldest son.

John, the eighth earl, was invested with the order of the Bath at the creation of Henry prince of Wales, 30th May 1610; sworn a privy councillor, 20th July 1615, and appointed governor of Edinburgh castle. On 1st February 1620, while still Lord Erskine, he was named one of the extraordinary lords of session, and in 1626 was superseded with the rest of the extraordinary lords. Reappointed 18th June 1628, he again sat on the bench till 1630. He succeeded his father in 1634, and in 1638 was deprived of his command of Edinburgh castle, General Ruthven, afterwards earl of Forth (see FORTH, earl of, vol. ii. p. 254), having been recalled from the Swedish service and by the king appointed governor of the castle, at the commencement of the civil commotions in Scotland, when the infatuated Charles resolved to suppress the covenant by force. He got security, however, for a compensation of £3,000. The same year, he was prevailed upon to sell to the king the sheriffship of Stirling and bailiary of the Forth, for £8,000 sterling, for which he obtained a bond, 1st November 1641. (Douglas' Peerage, vol. ii. p. 216.) He was one of the noblemen proposed by the king to the Scots Estates to be a privy councillor, and was accordingly sworn one for life on the 13th of the same month. Being a great projector, he obtained a patent for the tanning of leather, but in consequence of its having been complained of as a monopoly, it was discharged by parliament, on 16th November the same year. A remit was, however, made to the council to consider his expenses, that reparation might be made to him for the same.

The earl of Mar at first favoured the Covenanters, but soon joined the Cumbernauld association to support the king. In consequence, his property was forfeited by the Estates. He is said to have sold several lands in Scotland, and with the money received for them, purchased an estate in Ireland, which he lost by the Irish rebellion. He died in 1654. By his countess, Lady Christian Hay, daughter of Francis, ninth earl of Errol, he had three sons and two daughters.

The elder son, John, called the 9th earl of Mar of the name of Erskine, had, when still Lord Erskine, the command of the Stirlingshire regiment in the Scots army which, in 1640, marched to England. The following year, with his father, he acceded to the Cumbernauld association to support the royal cause. In 1645, on the approach of Montrose's army to Alloa, the Irish in his service plundered that town and the adjoining lordship which belonged to the earl of Mar. Notwithstanding this unprovoked outrage, however, the earl and Lord Erskine his son, gave the royalist leader and his principal officers an elegant entertainment, and for doing so, the marquis of Argyre subsequently threatened to burn his castle of Alloa. (Cutler's Memoirs, p. 153.) After the battle of Kilsyth, 15th August 1645, Lord Erskine joined Montrose, and was at the rout of Philiphaugh, on 13th September following, but escaped, and was sent by Montrose into the district of Mar, to raise forces to recruit his discomfited army. He was fined by the Estates 24,000 merks, and his houses of Erskine and Alloa were plundered by their order. On succeeding his father in 1654, his whole estates were sequestrated, and till the Restoration he lived privately in a small cottage at the gate of Alloa house. To add to his misfortunes, he was struck with blindness. In his portrait he is represented as a fair-haired, mild-looking old man. When King Charles got "his own again," the earl was restored to his estates. He died in September 1668. He was twice married. His first wife, Lady Mary Scott, eldest daughter of the first earl of Buccleuch, had surviving issue. By his second countess, Lady Mary Mackenzie, eldest daughter of the second earl of Seaforth, he had two sons and three daughters.

The elder son, Charles, tenth earl of the Erskine name, born 19th October 1650, succeeded to the earldom in his 14th year. In 1679 he raised the 21st regiment of foot, or Royal Scots Fusiliers, of which he was appointed colonel. In 1682 he was sworn a lord of the Scots privy council, and continued one in the reign of James VII., but not approving of that monarch's arbitrary measures, he had left his house to retire to the continent, when tidings of the landing of the prince of Orange arrived in Scotland. (Douglas' Peerage, vol. ii. p. 217.) He appeared in the convention of Estates held at Edinburgh, 14th March 1689, but gave the viscount Dundee a promise that he would accompany him to a proposed convention of the king's friends to be held at Stirling. After Dundee's abrupt departure, with his troopers, from Edinburgh, the earl was apprehended, not unwillingly it is supposed, in a feigned attempt to escape from the capital, but was released on giving his parole that he would not leave the city without the permission of the convention. He died on the 23d of the following month. In Douglas' Peerage, and in Swan's Views on the Clyde, p. 65, it is erroneously stated that he was obliged, from the heavy incumbrances on his estates, to sell, "shortly previous to the year 1689," his lands of Erskine in Renfrewshire, the most ancient possession of the family. They were, however, disposed of fifty years previously, having been bought, in 1638, by Sir John Hamilton of Orbiston, from John, eighth earl. In 1703, they became the property of the noble family of Blantyre.

By his countess, Lady Mary Maule, eldest daughter of the second earl of Panmure, Earl Charles had eight sons and one daughter, Lady Jean, married to Sir Hugh Paterson of Bannoekburn, baronet, a zealous Jacobite, in whose house near Stirling, Prince Charles slept in 1745, on his advance from the north to Edinburgh, with the Highland army, and who was afterwards forfeited for his share in the rebellion. Of the sons, five died young. The others were, John, eleventh earl; the Hon. James Erskine of Grange, lord-justice-clerk; and lieutenant-colonel the Hon. Henry Erskine, killed at the battle of Almanza, in 1707, aged 25, unmarried.

Of the eldest son, John, eleventh earl of the Erskine family, the leader of the rebellion of 1715, a memoir has been already given (see vol. ii. p. 155). Thomas, Lord Erskine, his only surviving son, by his countess, Lady Margaret Hay, daughter of Thomas, earl of Kinnoul, was commissary of stores at Gibraltar, and was elected M.P. for Stirlingshire, on a vacancy in 1747, and for the county of Clackmannan at the general election the same year. He died 16th March 1766. The Mar estate which, with the titles, had been forfeited, was purchased for him from government, by his uncle, the Hon. James Erskine of Grange.

This gentleman, whose name has been rendered conspicuous by the proceedings in relation to his wife, passed advocate 28th July 1705, and was appointed a lord of session fifteen months afterwards, namely, on 18th October 1706, when he assumed the title of Lord Grange. His brother, the earl of Mar, was at that time secretary of state for Scotland, which accounts for his speedy promotion. On 6th June 1707, he was constituted a lord of justiciary, and on 27th July 1710, appointed lord-justice-clerk. From a wish to join the opposition against Sir Robert Walpole, he was anxious to enter parliament, and in 1734, offered himself as a candidate for the county of Stirling. With the view to exclude him from the house of commons, Walpole got the act of that year passed, which incapacitates judges from being members of parliament. Lord Grange, thereupon, resigned his seat on the bench, both of the court of session and justiciary, and was elected M.P. for Stirlingshire. He took an active share in the debates, but, as the Walpole administration continued in office, he was disappointed in being made secretary of state for Scotland, the great object of his ambition, in the event of their overthrow. He is said to have held the office of secretary to the prince of Wales, but soon retired from political life, and again appeared in the court of session as an advocate; but in a short time relinquished his practice and left the bar. He died at London 24th January 1751, in his 75th year.

He married Rachel Chiesley, the daughter of that Chiesley of Dalry who, on 31st March 1689, shot Lord-president Lockhart in the Old Bank close, Lawnmarket, Edinburgh, in consequence of a decision given by him that he was bound to support his wife. The story of Lady Grange is one of the most romantic and extraordinary that occurred in real life in the 18th century. There can be no doubt there was madness in her family, and the unfortunate lady herself was unfortunately a confirmed drunkard. Becoming jealous of her husband, she employed spies to watch him when he was in England, and is said to have often boasted of the blood from which she had sprung, alluding to her father's murder of the president, as a significant intimation of what she might be able to accomplish, if driven to extremities. Wodrow (Lialecta, vol. iv. p. 166. Maitland Club.) thus describes her conduct, in July 1730, just before her celebrated abduction, an account of which and her confinement in the Western Isles, is given in the Edinburgh Magazine for 1817: "She intercepted her husband's letters in the post-office, and would have palmed treason upon them, and took them to the justice clerk, as is said, and alleged that some phrases in some of her lord's letters to Lord Dun, related to the Pretender, without the least shadow for the inference. Last month it seems his lady, being for her drunkenness palpable and open, and her violent unhappy temper and mismanagement, inhibited by my lord, left the family. This was pleasing to her lord, and he did not use any endeavours to have her back, since sometimes she attempted to murder him, and was innumerable ways uneasy. Upon this, my lady gave in a bill to the lords for a maintenance, and containing the grounds of her separation. But the matter was taken up, and my lord entered into a concert with her friends, allowed her £100 a-year, and she declared she would be satisfied with that: and so they live separately." On the evening of 22d January 1732, Lady Grange, as she was commonly called, who then lived in lodgings next door to the house of her husband, was seized and gagged by several Highlanders, who had been secretly admitted into the house. The celebrated Simon, Lord Lovat, one of Lord Grange's most intimate friends, was charged with being the main instrument in her abduction, and she herself declared that those who carried her off wore Lovat's livery, by which, it is supposed, she meant his tartan. She also mentions that Lovat had an interview with her principal gaoler near Stirling, to arrange as to her journey. She is said to have possessed herself of a dangerous letter by her husband, and had even taken her place in the coach to London to deliver it to the king. Lord Lovat, in the strongest language, denied all share in the transaction. "As to that story about my Lord Grange," he says, "it is a much less surprise to me, because they said ten times worse of me, when that damned woman went from Edinburgh than they can say now; for they said it was all my contrivance, and that it was my servants that took her away; but I defied them then, as I do now, and do declare to you upon honour, that I do not know what has become of that woman, where she is, or who takes care of her, but if I had contrived, and assisted, and saved my Lord Grange from that devil, who threatened every day to murder him and his children, I would not think shame of it before God or man." By this lady, Lord Grange had four sons and four daughters. He is said to have been the great lay head of the ultra-presbyterian party in Scotland, and Wodrow records that on one occasion "he complains much of preaching up of mere morality, and very little of Christ and grace." (Wodrow, Analeceta, vol. ii. p. 207.) His lordship left a diary, very full of earnest piety, which, under the name of the Diary of a Member of the College of Justice, was privately printed in 1843.

Lord Grange's two eldest sons died young. James, the third son (advocate, 1734, appointed knight marischal of Scotland, 1758) married his cousin, Lady Frances Erskine, only daughter of the eleventh earl of Mar, and died 27th February 1785, aged 75. He had two sons, John Francis Erskine of Mar, and James Francis Erskine, a colonel in the army, died 5th April, 1806, aged 63.

John Francis Erskine of Mar, the elder son, was an officer of dragoons, and in 1762 obtained a captain's commission in the first regiment of horse. He quitted the army in 1770, and succeeded to the estate of Alloa, on the death of his mother in 1776. On 17th June 1824, the attainder was reversed by act of parliament in his favour, when he became twelfth, but was styled fourteenth earl of Mar of the name of Erskine. He died 20th August 1825. By his wife, Frances, only daughter of Charles Floyer, Esq., governor of Madras, he had four sons and five daughters. John Thomas, the eldest son, succeeded his father. The second son died without issue. Henry David, the youngest son, married in 1805, Mary Anne, daughter of John Cooksey, Esq., and died 31st December, 1846. Henry David's second son, Walter Coningsby Erskine of Shaw Park, Alloa, captain in the 73d regiment Bengal Native infantry, is heir presumptive (1856) to the earldom of Kellie (see vol. ii. p. 579); married, with issue.

John Thomas Erskine, the eldest son, fifteenth, properly thirteenth earl of Mar, born in 1772, died 20th September 1828. He married 17th March 1795, Janet, daughter of Patriek Miller of Dalswinton, Dumfriesshire, the well-known steamboat projector, and, with two daughters, had a son, John Francis Miller Erskine, called the sixteenth earl, born 28th December, 1795. On the death of Methven Erskine, tenth earl of Kellie, in 1829, he claimed that title, as heir male general, with the minor titles of Viscount Fenton and Baron Dirleton, and his right was allowed by the house of lords. (See KELLIE, earl of, vol. ii. p. 581.) His lordship married, in 1827, the eldest daughter of Sir Charles Granville Stewart Menteath, baronet of Closeburn. The countess died 15th December 1853, without issue.

The earl's two sisters were, Lady Frances Diana, married William James Goodeve, Esq. of Clifton, and, besides daughters, had an only son, John Francis Erskine Goodeve, born at Clifton, 29th March 1836, heir presumptive to the earldom of Mar (1856); and Lady Janet, wife of Edward Wilmot-Chetwode, Esq. of Woodbank, Queen's county, Ireland, with issue. The sixteenth earl was many years in the army, and served at Quatre Bras and Waterloo; 33d in descent from Murtachas, maormor of Mar in 1065, and premier earl, viscount, and baron of Scotland.

MARJORIBANKS, a surname, derived from the lands of Ratho-Marjorie, in Renfrewshire, so named from their having been bestowed on the princess Marjorie, only daughter of Robert the Bruce, on her nuptials in 1316 with Walter, high steward of Scotland, ancestor of the royal line of Stuart. These lands, subsequently called "Terre de Ratho-Marjoriebanks," came into the possession of a family of the name of Johnston, who, from them, assumed the name of Marjoriebanks, though they continue to bear in part the Johnston arms. Several of this family were members of the Scottish Estates. On the institution of the court of session in 1532, by James V., Thomas Marjoriebanks was one of the ten advocates selected to "procure" or plead before the lords. On March 2, 1535, he was appointed advocate for the poor, jointly with Dr. Gladstones, the salary of £10 a-year, with his consent, being given to the latter. He acquired the lands of Ratho in September 1540. The same year he was provost of Edinburgh and commissioner for that city in the Estates, and again represented it in parliament in 1546. He was admitted a lord of session and appointed clerk-register 8th February 1549, but was deprived of the latter office in 1554, on an accusation of having falsified a warrant of the court.

In 1539, Thomas Marjoriebanks had a charter as follows: "Magister Thomæ Marjoriebanks, 36 Bovatas terrarum de Ratho."

In 1544, there appears a crown charter in favour of "Thomas Marjoriebanks dividistat. terrarum de Mains of Spotts et terrarum de Handarewood."

In 1552, there is an entry in the records, "Unam terram in Edinburgh, Jacobi Marjoriebanks."

Christian Marjoriebanks, believed to be the grand-daughter of the above-named Thomas Marjoriebanks, married in 1586, George Heriot, the founder of the magnificent Hospital at Edinburgh. She was his first wife, and is described as "the daughter of a respectable burghess."

In 1604, Thomas Marjoriebanks of Ratho, held these lands, as appears from the following:—"Thomas Marjoriebanks de Ratho et Mariæ Douglas, ejus conjugi villa et terrarum de Ratho extendendam ad triginta sexta bovatas cum mansione laeu et pratu."

In 1610, John Marjoriebanks of Ratho got a charter as follows:—"Johannis Marjoriebanks de Ratho, triginta sex bovatas terrarum de Ratho."

In 1645, Andrew Marjoriebanks possessed certain property at Salt Prestons, now Preston Pans, thus described:—"Magister Andræ Marjoriebanks, quorundam tenementarium et acrum in Salt Prestons."

James Marjoriebanks of Marjoriebanks and Bowbardie or Balbardie, had two sons, Andrew, and George, surgeon, Edinburgh. The latter went to Waterford, in Ireland, and married the daughter of the Bishop of Waterford, by whom he had several daughters. The eldest married Mr. Moneypenny of Pitmilly, Fifeshire, and was grandmother of Lord Pitmilly, a judge of the court of session, who retired from the bench in 1831.

The elder son, Andrew Marjoriebanks of Marjoriebanks, married in 1744, Mary Chalmers, and had 3 sons and 2 daughters. Christian, one of his daughters, married Mr. Wardrop of Torbanehill, and was mother of James Wardrop, Esq., the celebrated oculist and surgeon in ordinary to George IV.

The eldest son, Alexander Marjoriebanks of Marjoriebanks, born in 1750, was convener of Linlithgowshire for more than 30 years. He was proprietor and superior of the barony of Bathgate, which was part of the extensive possessions given by King Robert the Bruce, to his daughter Marjorie, on her marriage with Walter, the high steward of Scotland, but in 1824 he voluntarily relinquished the superiority, that Bathgate might be created a burgh of barony, of which he was chosen the first provost. He sold the estate of Marjoriebanks. He died Sept. 3, 1830. He married in 1790, Katherine, daughter of Gilbert Laurie of Polmont, lord provost of Edinburgh, and had, besides other children, who died in infancy, 8 sons and 4 daughters.

Sons: 1. Alexander. 2. Andrew, born in 1797, died in 1824. 3. William, born in 1800, lieutenant, R.N., lost in the ship Confiance, off the coast of Cork, April 21, 1822. 4.

James, born in 1801, lieutenant, East India Company's service, died Nov. 28, 1825. 5. Gilbert, born in 1802, went to Sidney, New South Wales, and died there. 6. George, born in 1806, surgeon, died in 1828. 7. Thomas, born in 1809, ordained in 1834, minister of Leolnaben, Danfries-shire, and in 1819 translated to Stenton, Haddingtonshire, married in 1835, Mary, only daughter of Rev. Dr. Cook, Professor of Moral Philosophy in the university of St. Andrews; issue, 3 sons and a daughter. 8. Erskine.

Daughters: 1. Katherine Erskine, wife of William Balfour, merchant, of the family of Balfour of Pilrig, who died in 1859 without issue. 2. Mary, married Robert Horsburgh, Esq., factor at Tongue in the Duke of Sutherland. 3. Christian, wife of John Scott Moneriff, Esq., Accountant, Edinburgh. 4. Sarah, wife of William Turnbull, Esq., died without issue.

The eldest son, Alexander Marjoribanks, born Oct. 31, 1792, is a magistrate for Linlithgowshire. The estates of Balbardie and Bathgate, which had been for several centuries in the family, were at Whitsunday 1861 sold to the Trustees of Stewart's Hospital, Edinburgh, for £48,000.

The descendant of a younger branch of this family, Edward Marjoribanks, a native of Linlithgowshire and proprietor of the estate of Hallyards, Mid Lothian, married a daughter of Archibald Stewart, Esq., lord provost of Edinburgh when Prince Charles had possession of that city in 1745, and was for many years a wine merchant at Bordeaux in France. On succeeding to the estate of Lees in Berwickshire, in 1770, as heir of entail, he returned with his family to Scotland. His eldest son, John, born at Bordeaux in 1762, at one period a captain in the Coldstream guards, became a partner in a banking house at Edinburgh. In 1814, he was elected lord provost of that city, and the following year created a baronet. In 1811, he was chosen M.P. for Buteshire, and in 1818 for Berwickshire. While chief magistrate of Edinburgh he distinguished himself by carrying forward the improvements of the city, and was the chief promoter of the erection of the new gaol and the Regent's bridge. In 1825, he was again lord provost of Edinburgh. Sir John died Feb. 5, 1833, in his 71st year. He had married in 1790 Alison, eldest daughter of William Ramsay, Esq., of Barnton. His eldest surviving son, Sir William Marjoribanks, 2d baronet, born Dec. 15, 1792, died Sept. 22, 1834. Sir William's son, John, born in 1830, became 3d baronet.

MARSHALL, a surname derived from the ancient and honourable office of marshal, and not confined to Scotland.

There was a painter of this name, George Marshall, a scholar of the younger Seougal (see SCOUHAL, GEORGE) and thereafter of Sir Godfrey Kneller, whose paintings are remarkable for good colouring, although there is a flatness in them which is displeasing to the eye. After a long practice in Scotland, he went to Italy, but this produced no visible improvement on his works. He died about 1732.

MARSHALL, WILLIAM, a celebrated composer of Scottish airs and melodies, was born at Fochabers, Morayshire, Dec. 27, 1748, old style. In his 12th year he became employed under the house steward at Gordon castle, Banffshire, the seat of the Duke of Gordon, but was soon appointed butler and house steward, a situation which he held for nearly 30 years. "The correctness of Marshall's ear," says a MS. memoir of him quoted in Steinhouse's Johnson's Scots Musical Museum, (vol. iv. p. 413,) to which we are indebted for this notice, "was unrivalled, and his style of playing strathspeys and reels lively and inspiring, while his fine taste and peculiarly touching manner of executing the slow and more plaintive Scottish airs and melodies, delighted all who heard him." He is styled by Burns "the first composer of strathspeys of the age."

About the beginning of 1790, the delicate state of his health obliged him to relinquish his situation at Gordon castle, when he retired for a short time to a small farm in the neighbourhood of Fochabers. The same year he removed to the larger farm of Keithmore, belonging to the duke of Gordon, in the lordship of Auchendown and parish of Mortlach, where he became a keen agriculturist. Shortly thereafter he was appointed factor or land steward to the duke, over a very extensive range of his estates in the counties of Banff and Aberdeen, comprehending the districts of Cabrach, Auchendown, Glenlivet, Strathlaven, Strathdown, &c. This situation he filled with fidelity and honour till 1817. He died at Newfield cottage, 29th May 1833, aged 85. He had married, at the age of 25, Jane Giles, who predeceased him, on 12th December 1825, and by whom he had five sons and a daughter.

A collection of Marshall's 'Airs and Melodies' was published, by subscription, in May 1822, containing 176 tunes. It was followed by a supplement of about 74 additional tunes. Many of them had appeared separately, before the close of the 18th century, and were well known.

MARTIN, DAVID, an eminent artist, the principal portrait painter in Edinburgh of his day, was born in Scotland, and studied under Allan Ramsay, the celebrated painter, the son of the poet, whom he accompanied to Rome, but at a time when he was too young to receive much advantage from the visit. On his return to England, he attended the drawing academy in St. Martin's Lane, London, and obtained some premiums for drawings after life. He subsequently practised both as a painter and an engraver, and also scraped some portraits in mezzotinto. In the latter department he finished a very good print of Roubilliac the sculptor. Among his engraved portraits there is a whole length of Lord Bath, from the original picture which he painted of his lordship; also, a whole length of Lord Mansfield, from another of his own pictures. His best portrait is a half length of Dr. Franklin, said to be the truest likeness of that remarkable person, from which a mezzotinto print was published in 1775. Mr. Martin married a lady of some fortune, and lived for some years in Dean Street, Soho, but after her death, which was very sudden, he went to reside at Edinburgh. (Edwards' Anecdotes of Painting).

The Surgeon's Hall, Advocates' Library, and Heriot's Hospital, of that city, possess many fine portraits by Martin, of the most eminent men of his time, in the several departments of physic, law, and philosophy. After succeeding his brother, a General Martin, he lived principally at No. 4, St. James' Square, Edinburgh, where he died 13th December 1797. Some time previous to his death he had been appointed limner to his royal highness the prince of Wales. According to his obituary notice in the local papers, he was "very extensively known, not only in his own but in other countries, for his eminence in his profession, his knowledge of, and exquisite taste in, the fine arts, in general. He will long be remembered and much regretted by his numerous acquaintances, but more particularly by his friends, not more for his genius and taste than for his generosity and spirit, warmth of heart and other amiable qualities." So little was this flattering notice realized that, within sixty years of his death, he was so absolutely forgotten in the city in which he lived and died, that, with the exception of an old artist or two, who had known him in their youth, and his own descendants, few had ever heard of his existence, and scarcely any knew that he was a Scotsman. His reputation was completely eclipsed by the more brilliant talent of Sir Henry Raeburn (see RAEBURN, Sir Henry), who had his attention first directed by David Martin from miniature to the more powerful and facile process of oil painting, in which he gave him some instructions and advice in a friendly way, although, not being a pupil of his, he refused to show him how to prepare his colours. The identity of style of the early works of Raeburn with those of Martin, is very remarkable, and the difference of the two masters only begins as Raeburn became more confirmed in that style in which he ultimately distinguished himself, and which became so peculiarly his own.

The following is a list of most of the plates which Martin engraved: La Muchela Gabriela, after P. Bottoni; Lady Frances Manners; Earl of Mansfield; David Hume; Rousseau; The Earl of Bath; Roubilliac; a portrait of Rembrandt; Professor Fergusson; Summer Evening, after Cuypp; and the Ruins of ancient Bath, after Gasper Poussin.

MARTINE, GEORGE, a physician, was born in Scotland in 1702. After studying at Edinburgh, he went to Leyden, where he took the degree of M.D. in 1725, and on his return home commenced practice at St. Andrews. In 1740 he accompanied Lord Cathcart on his expedition to America, as physician of the forces under his command; and died there of a bilious fever in 1743.—His works are:

MARY STUART, QUEEN OF SCOTS, celebrated for her beauty, her accomplishments, her errors, and her misfortunes, was born at the palace of Linlithgow, December 8, 1542. She was the daughter of James V., by his queen, Mary of Lorraine, of the family of Guise. Her father dying when she was only eight days old, she became queen, and was crowned at Stirling, September 9, 1543. After an ineffectual attempt on the part of Cardinal Bethune to obtain the regency, the government of the kingdom was, during her infancy, vested in the earl of Arrau. The two first years of her childhood were spent at Linlithgow, under the care of her mother; and the following three years at Stirling, under the charge of the Lords Erskine and Livingstone. Owing to the distracted state of the country, she was subsequently removed, for a few months, to the priory of Inchmahome, a small island in the beautiful lake of Menteith, Perthshire, where she had for her attendants and companions four young ladies of noble rank, all named like herself, Mary; namely, Mary Bethune, niece of the cardinal; Mary Fleming, daughter of Lord Fleming; Mary Livingstone, daughter of one of her guardians; and Mary Seton, daughter of the lord of that name. At the age of six she embarked at Dumbarton for France, where she was instructed in every branch of learning and polite accomplishment. Besides making herself mistress of the dead languages, she spoke the French, Italian, and Spanish tongues fluently, and devoted much of her time to the study of history. Through the influence of the French king and her ucles, the Guises, she was married, April 20, 1558, to the dauphin, afterwards Francis II. of France, who died in 1560, about sixteen months after his accession to the throne. On her marriage she had been induced, by the persuasion of the French court, to assume, with her own, the style and arms of queen of England and Ireland, an offence which Elizabeth never forgave, although, as soon as Mary became her own mistress, she discontinued the title.

The widowed queen soon found it necessary to return to Scotland, whither she was invited by her own subjects, and arriving at Leith, August 19, 1561, she was received by all ranks with every demonstration of welcome and regard. At first she committed the administration of affairs to Protestants, her principal advisers being her natural brother, the Lord James Stuart, prior of St. Andrews, and Maitland of Lethington, and so long as she abided by their counsels her reign was mild, prudent, and satisfactory to her people. In August 1562 she made a progress into the north, where, by the aid of her brother, afterwards created earl of Moray, she crushed the formidable rebellion of the earl of Huntly. In February 1563 occurred at St. Andrews the execution of the young and accomplished French poet Chate-lard, who, having fallen deeply in love with his beautiful mistress, had twice intruded himself into her bed-chamber, for the purpose of urging his passion. It was the wish of her subjects that the queen should marry, that the crown might descend in the right line from their ancient monarchs, and she had already received matrimonial overtures from various foreign princes. The ardour of youthful inclination, however, rather than the dictates of prudence, led her to prefer her cousin, Henry Lord Darnley, to all her suitors. This young man, whose only recommendation was the elegance of his person and manners, was the eldest son of the earl of Lennox, who had been forced to seek refuge in England, in the reign of James V., and Lady Margaret Douglas, daughter of the earl of Angus and the queen dowager Margaret, sister of Henry VIII.; and after Mary herself, he was the nearest heir to the crown of England, and next to the earl of Arrau in succession to the crown of Scotland. The royal nuptials were celebrated July 29, 1565, in conformity to the rites of the church of Rome, of which Mary was a zealous adherent, while the majority of her subjects were Protestants.

With this ill-fated marriage began the long series of her misfortunes, which were terminated only by her melancholy death upon the scaffold. The marriage had been disapproved of by the earl of Moray and the leaders of the protestant party, who, having taken up arms, were opposed by the queen in person, with remarkable energy and promptitude. At the head of a superior force, she pursued the insurgents from place to place, and compelled them at last to quit the kingdom. Mary now not only joined the league of the popish princes of Europe, but evinced her full determination to re-establish the Romish religion in Scotland. But all her plans were frustrated by an unexpected event which took place on the evening of March 9, 1566. Darnley, upon whom she had conferred the title of king, and whose weak and licentious conduct very soon changed the extravagant love she had entertained for him into equally violent hatred, excited by jealousy of David Rizzio, her foreign secretary, and favourite, had organized a conspiracy for his destruction; and on the evening mentioned, while the queen was at supper with Rizzio and the countess of Argyle, he suddenly entered her chamber, followed by Lord Ruthven and some other factions nobles, and caused the unfortunate secretary to be dragged from her presence and murdered. This atrocious deed, aggravated as it was by the situation of his wife, then six months advanced in pregnancy, could not fail to increase the queen's aversion for her husband. Dissembling her feelings, however, she prevailed upon Darnley to withdraw from his new associates, to dismiss the guards which had been placed on her person, and to accompany her in her flight to Dunbar. In the course of a few days, at the head of a powerful army, she returned to Edinburgh, when Ruthven, Morton, Maitland, and Lindsay, the chief of the conspirators, were forced to take refuge in Newcastle, and Moray and his friends, who had in the meantime arrived from England, were again received into favour, and intrusted with the chief management of affairs.

The birth of a son, afterwards James VI., on June 19, 1566, had no effect in producing a reconciliation between Mary and the king, and, enraged at his exclusion from power, the latter sullenly retired from court, declared his intention to quit the kingdom, and refused to be present at the baptism of the infant prince. He took up his residence with his father at Glasgow, where, in the beginning of 1567, he was seized with the small-pox, or some other dangerous disease. On hearing of his illness, Mary sent her own physician to attend him, and, after the lapse of a fortnight, she visited him herself. When he was able to be removed, she accompanied him to Edinburgh, and lodged him in a house in the southern suburbs, called Kirk-of-Field, near to where the university of that city now stands. Here she attended him with the most assiduous care, and slept for two nights in the chamber under his apartment. On the evening of the 9th of February she took leave of him with many embraces, to be present at the marriage of one of her servants at Holyrood. During the same night the house in which Darnley slept was blown up with gunpowder, and his dead body and that of his page were next morning found lying in the adjoining garden.

Of this atrocious deed, the earl of Bothwell, the new favourite of the queen, was openly accused of being the perpetrator, and Mary herself did not escape the suspicion of being accessory to the crime. At the instigation of the earl of Lennox, the father of Darnley, Bothwell was brought to trial, but he was attended to the court by a formidable array of armed followers, and neither accuser nor witness appearing against him, he was formally acquitted by the jury. On the 20th of April, Bothwell prevailed upon a number of the nobles to subscribe a bond, in which they not only declared him innocent of Darnley's murder, but recommended him as a fit husband for the queen. Four days afterwards, at the head of a thousand horse, he intercepted Mary on her return from Stirling to Edinburgh, and dispersing her slender suite, conducted her to the castle of Dunbar, of which he was governor. Having proposed marriage, on the queen's refusal, he produced the bond signed by the nobles, and, as is affirmed by Mary's partizans, compelled her by force to yield to his desires, when the unhappy princess consented to become his wife. Mary's accusers, on the other hand, say that, in the whole of this transaction, the queen was a willing actor. Her marriage to Bothwell took place May 15, 1567, only three months after the death of Darnley, and it is a prominent point in her history, for which it is impossible to find any justification. That act of folly virtually disrowned her. A confederacy of the nobles was immediately formed for the protection of the infant prince, and for bringing to punishment the murderers of the late king. As the people generally shared their indignation, they soon collected an army, at the head of which they advanced to Edinburgh, Bothwell and the queen retiring before them to Dunbar, where they assembled a force of about 2,000 men. At Carberry Hill, near Musselburgh, the two hostile armies confronted each other, June 15; but, to avoid a battle, Mary, after a brief communication with Kirkaldy of Grange, agreed to dismiss Bothwell, and to join the confederates, by whose councils she declared herself willing to be guided in future, on condition of their respecting her "as their born princess and queen." Taking a hurried farewell of Bothwell, who, with a few followers, slowly rode off the field, and whom she never saw again, she gave her hand to Grange, and surrendered to the associated lords, by whom she was conducted in triumph to the capital. As she passed along, she was assailed by the insults and reproaches of the populace, and a banner was displayed before her, on which was painted the dead body of Darnley, with the infant prince kneeling beside it, saying—"Judge and revenge my cause, O Lord!" Next day, she was conveyed a prisoner to Lochleven castle in Kinross-shire, situated in the middle of a lake, and committed to the charge of Lady Douglas, mother of the Regent Moray by James V., and widow of Sir Robert Douglas, who fell at the battle of Pinkie. On July 24, 1567, she was compelled to sign a formal renunciation of the crown in favour of her son, and to appoint as regent, during the king's minority, her brother, the earl of Moray, commonly called the Regent Murray, who soon after arrived from France, and entered upon the government.

Mary now employed all her art to recover her liberty, and having gained over George Douglas, youngest son of the lady of Lochleven, on March 25, 1568, she attempted to escape in the disguise of a laundress, but the whiteness of her hands betrayed her to the boatmen, by whom she was conducted back to the castle. Her beauty and misfortunes, however, had made a deep impression on William Douglas, an orphan youth of sixteen, a relative of the family, and he was easily prevailed upon to assist in a project for her escape. Accordingly, on Sunday, May 2, 1568, at the hour of supper, he found means to steal the keys, and opening the gates to the queen and one of her maids, locked them behind her, and then threw the keys into the lake. Mary entered a boat which had been prepared for her, and, on reaching the opposite shore, she was received by Lord Seton, Sir James Hamilton, and others of her friends. Instantly mounting on horseback, she rode first to Niddrie, Lord Seton's house in West Lothian, and next day to Hamilton, where she was joined by a number of the nobility, and in a few days found herself at the head of about 6,000 men. On May 13 her forces were defeated by the regent at the battle of Langside, and the unhappy queen, who had anxiously beheld the en-agement from a hill at a short distance, to avoid falling again into the hands of her enemies, fled from the field of battle, accompanied by Lord Herries and a few other attached friends, and rode, without stopping, to the abbey of Dundrennan, in Galloway, full sixty miles distant. After resting there for two days, with about twenty attendants, she embarked in a fisher boat at Kirkcudbright on the 16th, and crossing the Solway, landed at Workington, in Cumberland, where she claimed the protection of her kinswoman, the queen of England. "As well might the hunted deer have sought refuge in the den of the tiger." By Elizabeth's orders, she was conducted to Carlisle, from whence, on the 16th of June, she was removed to Bolton castle. But though treated on all occasions with the honours due to her rank, Elizabeth refused to admit her to a personal interview. To adjust the differences between Mary and her subjects, a conference was held at York in October 1568, and afterwards removed to Westminster, but without leading to any decisive result. Under various pretences, and in direct violation of public faith and hospitality, Elizabeth detained her a prisoner for nineteen years; and after having encouraged the Scots commissioners to accuse her publicly of the murder of her husband, denied her an opportunity of vindicating herself from the revolting charge.

In the beginning of 1569, Mary was transferred to Tutbury castle, in Staffordshire, and placed under the care of the earl of Shrewsbury, who discharged the important trust committed to him with great fidelity for fifteen years. She was subsequently removed from castle to castle, and at last consigned to the custody of Sir Amias Pawlet and Sir Drue Drury, by whom she was finally conveyed to Fotheringay, in Northamptonshire. Throughout all the sufferings and persecutions to which she was subjected by the jealousy and perfidy of Elizabeth, she preserved, till the closing scene of all, the magnanimity of a queen of Scotland. She made many attempts to procure her liberty, and, for this purpose, carried on a constant correspondence with foreign powers. Being the object of successive plots, on the part of the English Roman Catholics, who made use of her name to justify their insurrections and conspiracies, Elizabeth at length resolved upon her death, and caused her to be arraigned on a charge of being accessory to the conspiracy of Anthony Babington. A commission was appointed to conduct her trial, and though no certain proof appeared of her connection with the conspirators, she was found guilty of having compassed divers matters tending to the death of the queen of England. Although Elizabeth affected great reluctance to put Mary to death, she disregarded the entreaties of the ambassadors from Scotland and France on her behalf, and signed the warrant for a mandate to be made out under the great seal for her execution. A commission was given to the earls of Shrewsbury, Kent, Cumberland, Derby, and others, to see it carried into effect, and the two former lost no time in proceeding to Fotheringay. The sentence was read to Mary in presence of her own domestics, and she was desired to prepare herself for death the next day. She crossed her breast, in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and said she was ready to die in the Catholic faith, which her forefathers professed. She forgave them that were the procurers of her death, yet, she said, she doubted not but God would execute vengeance upon them. Mary then prepared for her fate with the utmost serenity, fortitude, and resignation. She was attended to the hall of Fotheringay castle, where her head was to be struck off, by Robert Melville, her master of the household, her physician, chirurgion, and apothecary. At the foot of the stairs leading into the hall, she desired Mr. Melville to commend her to her son. To the executioners she said that she pardoned them, and she desired Jane Kennedy, one of her attendants, to bind her eyes with a handkerchief. She was beheaded Feb. 8, 1587, in the 45th year of her age. "The admirable and saintly fortitude with which she suffered," it has been well remarked, "formed a striking contrast to the despair and agony which not long afterwards darkened the deathbed of the English queen." Mary's body was embalmed and interred, August 1, with royal pomp, in the cathedral of Peterborough. Her funeral was also celebrated with great pomp at Paris at the charge of the Guises. Twenty years afterwards, her son, James I., ordered her remains to be removed to Westminster, and deposited among those of the kings of England, in Henry the Seventh's chapel, where a magnificent monument was erected to her memory.

The portraits of Mary are numerous, but many of them are fictitious. In some of them, says Pinkerton, she is confounded with Mary of Guise, her mother, with Mary queen of France, sister of Henry VIII., and even with Mary de Medicis.

While the conduct and character of Queen Mary have been the subject of much controversy with historians, her learning and accomplishments are universally acknowledged. She wrote with elegance and force in the Latin and French, as well as in the English language. Among her compositions are :

Royal Advice to her Son; in two books: the Consolation of her long Imprisonment.

Eleven Letters to James Earl of Bothwell. Translated from the French originals, by Edward Simmonds, of Oxford. Westminster, 1726, 8vo.

Ten Letters, with her Answer to the Articles exhibited against her were published in Haynes' State Papers.

Six Letters; printed in Anderson's Collections.

A Letter, published in the Appendix to her Life, by Dr. Jebb.

Many of her letters to Queen Elizabeth, Cecil, and others, are preserved in the Cottonian and Ashmolean libraries, and in the library of the king of France.

Besides the above, she wrote "Poems on Various Occasions," in the Latin, Italian, French, and Scotch languages.

MASTERTON, a local surname of great antiquity in Scotland, derived from lands of that name in Fifeshire. According to tradition, one of the principal architects at the building of the abbey of Dunfermline, obtained from Malcolm Canmore the estate of Masterton, in that neighbourhood, and was the founder of a family of the name. Among the barons recorded in the Ragman Roll as having sworn a compulsory fealty to Edward I. of England in 1296, appears William de Masterton. A female descendant of this family, Margaret, daughter of Alexander Masterton of the lands of Bad in Perthshire and Parkmill in Fifeshire, and wife of Mr. James Primrose, was nurse to Henry, prince of Scotland, eldest son of James VI., for which she and her husband had a pension during their lives.

Mr. Allan Masterton, teacher of writing and arithmetic in Edinburgh, is known to all the admirers of Burns the poet, as one of his most intimate companions and the composer of the airs to many of his songs. He is said to have possessed a good ear and a fine taste for music, and, as an amateur, played the violin remarkably well. Among the tunes composed by him for Burns' pieces were those to 'Strathallan's Lament,' 'Beware of Bonnie Ann,' 'The Braes of Ballochmyle,' 'The Bonnie Banks of Ayr,' 'O Willie brewed a peck o' Maut,' and 'On hearing a Young Lady Sing.' On Aug. 26, 1795, Dugald and Allan Masterton, and Dugald Masterton, jun., were elected writing masters in the High School of Edinburgh. The verses beginning, "Ye gallants bright, I rede you right," were written, in 1788, by Burns, in compliment to Miss Ann Masterton, the daughter of the composer.

MATHESON, the name of a clan (Clann Mhathain), from the Gaelic Mathaineach, heroes, or rather, from Mathan, pronounced Mahan, a bear. The name is not the same as the English Mathison, which is a corruption of Matthewson. The MacMathans were settled in Lochalsh, a district of Wester Ross, from an early period. They are derived by ancient genealogies from the same stock as the Earls of Ross. Kenneth MacMathan, who was constable of the castle of Ellen Donan, is mentioned both in the Norse account of the expedition of the king of Norway against Scotland in 1263, and in the Chamberlain's Rolls for that year, in connection with that expedition. He is said to have married a sister of the Earl of Ross. The chief of the clan was engaged in the rebellion of Donald, lord of the Isles, in 1411 (see vol. ii. p. 546), and was one of the chiefs arrested at Inverness by James I., in 1427, when he is said to have been able to muster 2,000 men. The possessions of the Mathesons, at one time very extensive, were greatly reduced, in the course of the 16th century, by feuds with their turbulent neighbours, the Macdonalds of Glengarry.

The clan Matheson was divided into two great branches, namely of Lochalsh, from which descended the Mathesons of Attadale, now Ardross, and of Shinness, Sutherlandshire. The former is descended from John Matheson of Lochalsh, constable under Mackenzie, the 9th laird of Kintail, of the castle of Ellen Donan, who was killed in defending that fortress against the Macdonalds of Sleat in 1517. His son, Dugald Roy, was succeeded by his son, Murdoch. The latter had 2 sons, Roderick, ancestor of the Mathesons of Bennetsfield, and Dugald, who inherited Balmacarra, and had 3 sons.

John Matheson of Attadale, the 6th from this last Dugald, married Margaret, eldest daughter of Donald Matheson, Esq. of Shinness, and died in 1826. He had 5 sons and 2 daughters. The sons were, 1. Alexander of Ardross. 2. Hugh, merchant, Liverpool. 3. Farquhar, minister of Lairg. 4. Donald, settled in America. 5. John, deceased.

The eldest son, Alexander Matheson, Esq. of Ardross and Attadale, born in 1805, is a merchant in London, (formerly of Canton, in China,) a Director of the Bank of England, a magistrate and deputy lieutenant of the counties of Ross, Cromarty, and Inverness; has been M. P. for the Inverness burghs since 1847. In 1851, he purchased the estate of Lochalsh, forfeited by his ancestors in 1427. He married, first, in 1840, Mary, only daughter of J. C. MacLeod, Esq. of Geanies. 2dly, in 1853, Lavinia Mary, sister of Lord Beaumont; issue, a son and a daughter. 3dly, in 1860, Eleanor, daughter of Spencer Percival, Esq., by whom he has two sons.

The representative of the family of Shinness is Donald Matheson, Esq. of Grandon Lodge, Surrey, eldest son of Duncan Matheson, Esq., Advocate, Edinburgh. His uncle, Sir James Matheson of Aehany and the Lews, Bart., 2d son of Capt. Donald Matheson of Shinness, was born in 1796, at Lairg, Sutherlandshire. He was at one period a partner in the house of Jardine, Matheson, and Co., and resided many years in India and China. On his return to England, he received from the merchants of Bombay a service of plate, with an address, recording their sense of his conduct during the opium disputes with China. Owner of the estate of Aehany in Sutherlandshire, and, jointly with Lord Clinton, lord of the borough and manor of Ashburton, Devonshire, he purchased the island of Lewis, which is about 40 miles long by about 20 broad, and, with his other property, he has an extent of territory as great as that possessed by the ancient chiefs of Lochalsh; a deputy lieutenant of the counties of Ross and Sutherland; member of the board of trustees for manufactures and of the fishery board in Scotland; a vice-president of the Caledonian Asylum, London; F.R.S.; was M.P. for Ashburton from 1843 to 1847, and in the latter year was elected for the counties of Ross and Cromarty. He was created a baronet in 1850, on account of his benevolent and untiring efforts in alleviating the sufferings of the inhabitants of the Lewis at the period of the famine; author of a pamphlet on the China trade. He married, in 1843, Mary Jane, 4th daughter of M. H. Percival, Esq. of Quebec, without issue. See SUPPLEMENT

MAULE, a surname of Norman origin, assumed from the town and lordship of Maule in France, which, for four centuries, belonged to the lords of that name. In the army of William the Conqueror, on his invasion of England in 1066, was Guarin de Maule, a younger son of Arnold, lord of Maule. From the Conqueror, besides other lands, he obtained the lordship of Hatton, in Cleveland, Yorkshire. One of his sons, Robert de Maule, attached himself to David, earl of Cumberland, afterwards David I., who was educated at the English court, and accompanying him into Scotland, received a grant of lands in Mid Lothian. He died about 1130. The eldest of his three sons, William de Maule of Fowlis in Perthshire, was at the battle of the Standard in 1138, but died without male issue. The second son, Roger de Maule, was the progenitor of the Maules of Panmure. The marriage of his daughter Cecilia to Walter de Ruthven brought the barony of Fowlis into the Gowrie family, of which her husband was the ancestor.

Roger de Maule's grandson, Sir Peter de Maule, married, about 1224, Christian, only daughter and heiress of William de Valoniis of Pannomor, or Panmure, and got with her the baronies of that name and Benvie, in Forfarshire, as well as other lands both in England and Scotland. He had two sons, Sir William and Sir Thomas. The latter was governor of the castle of Brechin in 1303, when it sustained a siege for twenty days by the English, under Edward I.; and it was not till the governor, Sir Thomas Maule, was killed, by a stone thrown from an engine, that the garrison surrendered.

The elder son, Sir William de Maule of Panmure, was sheriff of Forfar at the death of Alexander III., and was among the barons who swore fealty to Edward I. at St. Andrews, 10th July 1292.

His son, Sir Henry de Maule of Panmure, was knighted by King Robert the Bruce, on account of his services. Sir Henry's eldest son, Sir Walter de Maule of Panmure, was governor of the castle of Kildrumny, Aberdeenshire, in the reign of David II. He had two sons, Sir William and Henry, the latter the first of the Maules of Glaster.

Sir William's son, Sir Thomas de Maule of Panmure, led a strong body of his name to the assistance of the earl of Mar at the battle of Harlaw, against Donald, lord of the Isles, in August 1411. As the old ballad says:

“Panmure with all his men did eum.”

The Forfarshire clans mustered strong on the occasion; besides the Maules, the Lyons, Oglivies, Carnegies, Lindsays, and others belonging to Angus, hastened to range themselves under the banner of Mar. Sir Thomas Maule was among the slain,

“The knight of Panmure, as was sene,
A mortal man in armour bright.”

His posthumous son, afterwards Sir Thomas de Maule of Panmure, was, notwithstanding his infancy, served heir to his father in 1412, an act of parliament having been passed to allow this in all cases of heirs in nonage, where the fathers had fallen in the king's service. The lordship of Brechin held by the earl of Athol by courtesy since the death of his wife, Elizabeth Barclay, belonged by right to Sir Thomas Maule, the grandson of her aunt, Jean Barclay, but although that nobleman, previous to his execution for being concerned in the conspiracy which led to the assassination of James I., in 1437, declared this to be the case, Sir Thomas received but a small portion of it, as it was annexed to the crown by act of parliament. His great-grandson, Sir Thomas Maule of Panmure, fell at the battle of Flodden. With a daughter, married to Ramsay of Panbride, he had two sons, Robert and William, the latter ancestor of the Maules of Both.

The elder son, Robert Maule of Panmure, joined the earl of Lennox in his unsuccessful attempt to rescue James V. out of the hands of the Douglasses in 1526, for which he got a remission. Two years afterwards, the king granted him a dispensation for life, from all public duties and attendance, on account of the true, good, and faithful services done by him to his majesty. He was one of those who opposed the projected marriage between the young Queen Mary and Edward prince of Wales in 1543. In 1547 he bravely defended his house of Panmure against the English till he was severely wounded, when he was taken prisoner, and sent to London. He remained in the Tower till 1549, when, at the solicitation of the marquis d'Elbeuf, French ambassador to Scotland, he was released. One of his sons, Henry Maule of Melgum, a learned antiquarian, was author of a history of the Picts, published after his death.

Thomas Maule of Panmure, his eldest son, in his father's lifetime accompanied David Bethune, abbot of Aberbrothwick, afterwards archbishop of St. Andrews, when he went to France as ambassador in 1538. He was taken prisoner in the engagement with the English at Hadden Rig, 25th August 1542, when the Scots were commanded by the earl of Huntly, and sent to Morpeth, where he remained till after the death of James V., when he was released by order of Henry VIII. He fought also at the battle of Pinkie in 1547, and in 1567, he joined the association for the safety of the infant Prince James, on the marriage of his mother, Queen Mary, to Bothwell. He died 17th March 1600. With three daughters, he had seven sons. Robert Maule, the fourth son, commissary of St. Andrews, a learned and judicious antiquary, was the author of several treatises, particularly Periodi Gentis Scotorum, a history of his own family, and a tract on the Antiquity of the Scots nation. A branch of the Maules, descended from Thomas Maule, lieutenant-colonel of the marquis of Ormond's regiment, son of Thomas, the fifth son, settled in Ireland. One of this family, Henry Maule, dean of Cloyne, was consecrated bishop of Cloyne in 1720, translated to Dromore in 1731, and to Meath in 1744.

Patrick Maule of Panmure, the eldest son, married Margaret, daughter of John Erskine of Dun, superintendent of Angus and Mearns, and died 21st May 1605. With two daughters he had a son, Patrick Maule of Panmure, who was one of the select few that accompanied James VI. to England in April 1603, when he went to take possession of the English throne. On 3d August 1616, he was by Charles I. created Baron Maule of Brechin and Navar and earl of Panmure, in the Scottish peerage (see PANMURE, earl of).

MAXTONE, a surname derived from the lands of Maxton in Roxburghshire. A family of this name has for centuries owned the estate of Cultoquay, Perthshire, which, during the time that it has been in their possession, has never, it is said, been larger or smaller than when they got it. They had the same common ancestor as the Maxwells, the one name being derived from Maccus-tun, a Saxon termination, and the other from Maccus-well, (in course of time shortened into Maxton and Maxwell.) to denote the manor and well of Maccus, a Saxon baron who came into Scotland at an early period, (see next article,) and received a grant of lands upon the Tweed.

Robert de Maxtone had a charter of the lands of Cultoquay dated 1410, but that the family possessed the estate previous to that time is proved by mention being made of them in charters of other houses of older date. His descendant, Robert Maxtone of Cultoquay, who had a charter of the lands of Ardoch in 1487, was slain at Flodden in 1513. Anthony Maxtone of the same family, was, in the reign of Charles I., prebendary of Durham. The succession in the male line has been uninterrupted from father to son from the first. The 13th proprietor, James Maxtone Graham, Esq. of Cultoquay, born June 20, 1819, succeeded his father in 1846.

One of the proprietors of this house is celebrated for having repeated the following curious addition to his litany every morning at a well near his residence:

"From the greed of the Campbells,
From the pride of the Grahams,
From the ire of the Drummonds,
And the wind of the Murrays,
Good Lord deliver us."

His estate was surrounded by the Breadalbane, Montrose, Perth, and Athol families, and he thus showed his apprehensions of his more powerful neighbours.

James Maxtone Graham of Cultoquay, married in 1851, the daughter of George E. Russell, Esq., East India Company's Service. In 1859 he succeeded to the estate of Redgorton, Perthshire, on the death of his uncle, Robert Graham, Esq., cousin of the celebrated Lord Lynedoch, and in consequence assumed the name and arms of Graham under letters patent of the Lord Lyon.

MAXWELL, a surname of ancient standing in Scotland, originally Maccus-well, so called from the territory of that name on the Tweed, near Kelso. In the history of the Anglo-Saxons mention is made of Maccus, the son of Anlaf, king of Northumbria, (949—952.) Anlaf was surnamed Cwiran, and appears to be identical with the Anlaf Cnarran whose name occurs in the Annals of Ulster, (944—946.) On the expulsion of Anlaf by the treachery of his people, King Eric, a son of the Danish king, Harald Blatand, was set on the Northumbrian throne, but, with his son Henry and his brother Regnald, was slain in the wilds of Stannore, by the hand of Maccus, the son of Anlaf. (Lappenberg's History of England under the Anglo-Saxon Kings. Thorpe's Translation, vol. i. p. 125, London, 1845.) A potentate of the same name, "Maccus of Man and the Hebrides," is also mentioned somewhat later in the same century. The following is from Lappenberg (Ibid. vol. ii. p. 143), "On making his annual sea-voyage round the island, King Edgar found, on his arrival at Chester, eight sub-kings awaiting him, in obedience to the commands they had received, who swore to be faithful to him, and to be his fellow-workers by sea and land." These were Kenneth of Scotland, Malcolm of Cumbria, Maccus of Man and the Hebrides, Dyfnwall or Dunwallon of Strat Clyde, Siferth, Iago, (Jacob) and Howell of Wales, and Inchill of Westmoreland. All these vassals rowed the proud Basileus on the river Dee in a barge, of which Edgar was the steersman, to the monastery of St. John the Baptist, where they offered up their orisons, and then returned in the same order to the palace."

The same in substance is mentioned in the Chronica de Melros, which styles Maccus the "King of many Isles." Roger of Wendover and William of Malinesbury also relate the same, the latter of whom calls Maccus "that Prince of pirates," thus identifying him with Mascusius Archipirata, who about the same time (973) was a witness to a charter by King Edgar of England, and who signs immediately after "Kinadius rex Albanie" and the royal family, and before all the bishops, "Ego Mascusius Archipirata confortavi." (Dugdale Monast. vol. i. p. 17.) This Maccus would therefore appear to have been a friend or ally of Kenneth king of the Scots, and may have held lands under him.

The name of Maks or Max, in mediæval Latin Mæcus, is found in Domesday Book as being that of a baron holding several manors in England before the conquest; and Mexborough in Yorkshire, and Maxstoke in Warwickshire, still preserve the memorial of his residence and possessions. The latter, Maxstoke, is said to have belonged to Almundus, or Ailwynd, the same name, no doubt, as Undewyn, as the father of Mæcus, hereafter mentioned, was called. The saltire cognizance of the Maxwells appears on the ceiling of the ancient priory of Maxstoke, along with many others of Norman descent, but without name.

At an early period extensive possessions on the Tweed had been held by a person of the name of Maccus, from whom Mæcinston (Maxton) and Mæcus-well (Maxwell) were designated. Mæcus-well has been supposed originally to have been called Mæcus-ville, but the old chartularies give no countenance to this supposition. Mæcuswel or Mæcuswell means evidently the pool, wel, or well of Mæcus, (Saxon, wylle, see charters in Saxon in Dugdale, where the word is translated fons, a well), probably from his having a right of fishing there; in the same way as other fishings on the Tweed, as the fishings of Schipwell or Sipwell (Lib. de Melros, Tom. i. pp. 16, 17), and of Blackwell, (Reg. Cart. de Kelso, pp. 33, 44, &c.) Probably long before the time of David I., the name came to be given to the adjoining territory and church, in the same way that it was afterwards called Maxwell-leugh, from another natural characteristic, probably coincident with the well or pool of former times.

The origin of the family who held the lands of Mæcus-well, in or before the time of David I., is doubtful. The opinion generally entertained at the present time is that they were directly descended from Mæcus, from whom the lands got their name, but this opinion is far from certain.

A Mæcus was witness to a charter of foundation of the monastery of Selkirk in 1113, afterwards transferred to Kelso, (Reg. Cart. de Kelso, p. 4.)

Mæcus filius Unwein is a witness to the Inquisition by Earl David, afterwards David I., into the possessions of the Church of Glasgow, about 1117.

Mæcus filius Undwain is also witness to charter by David I. in the life of Prince Henry; which charter mentions a Perambulation of the lands which took place "Anno scilicet secundo, quo Stephanus Rex Anglie captus est." Stephen was taken prisoner in 1141, so that the charter must have been between 1143 and 1152, when Prince Henry died, and therefore the Mæcus here mentioned is evidently not the ancestor of the Maxwells, (Liber de Melros, Tom. i. p. 4.)

Old writers say that the family came from England. The history of the Maxwell family, printed in the Herries Peerage Case, (page 294) gives the same account. The manuscript was got in a monastery in Flanders, probably Douay, and sent to Terregles in 1769. It seems to have been written chiefly before 1660, and although inaccurate in many particulars, shows that the writer must have had means of information which probably do not now exist.

Other copies of this manuscript are extant, but all, as well as the printed one, seem to have been carelessly copied from an older and not very legible manuscript, and added to in the transcription. A more correct copy is in the possession of the Kirkeconnel family, but only brought down to 1580, about which time it seems to have been originally compiled.—The chronicles and chartularies of the monasteries in Dunfriesshire and Galloway may have at that time been extant, and furnished materials for family history which do not now exist. Captain Grose must have seen a copy of this genealogical history as authority for the facts he relates. He mentions that there was a tradition that the first of the Maxwell name in Scotland was a Norwegian in the suite of Edgar Atheling and his sisters, on their arrival in the Frith of Forth two years after the Norman conquest.

Ewin Mæcuswel of Carlaveroek was at the siege of Alwick with Malcolm Canmore in 1093. (Hist. Family of Maxwell, printed as mentioned above.) This seems the same name as Eugene or Hugh.

Herbert de Mæcuswel made a grant of the church of Mæcuswel to the monastery of Kelso, probably in the time of David I., as it is among the earlier grants to that monastery. (Reg. Cart. de Kelso, pp. 7 and 14.) He is said to have died in 1143. (Family Tree at Terregles.)

Edmund de Mæcheswel, probably a brother of Herbert, was witness to a charter before 1152, (Cart. de Kelso, p. 145.) Other witnesses to the same charter are Hugo de Morvile, William de Sumerville, and William de Morvile, whose surnames have all the Norman termination vile—differing in a marked manner in this from Edmund de Mæcheswel.

Eugene de Maxwell was taken prisoner with King William in 1174. He assisted Roland, lord of Galloway, and married his daughter, (Hist. Family of Maxwell.)

Herbert de Mæcuswel makes a grant to a chapel in the church of St. Michael of Mæcuswel, in honour of St. Thomas the Martyr, circa 1180, (Reg. Cart. de Kelso, p. 325.) He was sheriff of Tevidale, and witness to various charters from 1180 to 1198. (See Lib. de Kelso, and Chartulary of Paisley.)

Sir John de Mæcuswel was sheriff of Roxburgh and Tevidale in 1207, and in 1215 was ambassador to King John. (Rymer's Fœdera, v. i. part i. p. 135.) In 1220, he was one of the guaranties of the marriage of King Alexander II. with the princess Joan, sister of Henry III. of England, and he was one of the witnesses to the grant of dowry to her on June 18, 1221. He was chamberlain of Scotland from 1231 to 1233, and died in 1241.

His son Eumerus or Aymer de Maxwell, under the designation of Homer Maxwell, is witness in the reign of Alexander II., in a donation of the kirks of Dundonald and Sanquhar to Paisley, by Walter the Great Steward. By his marriage with Mary, daughter and heiress of Roland de Mearns, he obtained the lands and baronies of Mearns and Nether Pollock, in Renfrewshire, and Dryps and Calderwood in Lanarkshire. He was one of the councillors or in the household of the young king, and in 1255, he and Mary his wife, with the Comyns, John de Baliol, Robert de Ros, and others, were removed by Henry, king of England, to make way for Neill, earl of Carriek, Robert de Brus, William de Duneglas, and others of the English party. He was sheriff of Dunfriesshire, and great-chamberlain of Scotland. In 1258, with other barons he engaged that the Scots should not make peace with the English without the consent of the Welsh. In 1265, he was justiciary of Galloway, (Lib. de Melrose, Tom. i. p. 271.) He had three sons: Sir Herbert, his successor; Sir John, to whom he gave the lands of Nether Pollock in Renfrewshire, and who was the founder of the family of that designation, baronets of 1682; and Alexander, of whom nothing is known.

Sir Herbert, the eldest son, sat in the parliament at Scone, 5th February, 1283-4, when the nobles agreed to acknowledge the Maiden of Norway as queen of Scotland, on the death of her grandfather, Alexander III. He is witness to an agreement between the Convent of Passelet and John de Aldhus, in 1284, (Chartulary of Paisley, p. 66.) In 1289, he was one of the barons who subscribed the letter to Edward I., from Brigham, as to the marriage of the Maiden of Norway with his son Edward. On June 6, 1292, he was one of those named on the part of John Baliol to discuss before Edward the right to the throne of Scotland, and in the same year he swore fealty to Edward. He died before 1300. Of three sons which he had, the eldest predeceased him.

Sir Herbert, the second son, succeeded him, and soon after his castle of Carlaverock sustained a siege from the English, a singularly curious and minute description of which has been preserved in a poem, in Norman-French, supposed to have been written by Walter of Exeter, a celebrated Franciscan friar, who is also said to have been the author of the romantic history of Guy, earl of Warwick. This description of the siege of Carlaverock castle suggested to Sir Walter Scott the idea of the siege of the castle of Front de Bœuf in "Ivanhoe." About the 1st of July, 1300, the English army left Carlisle commanded by Edward I. in person, attended by the prince of Wales, afterwards Edward II., and the whole chivalry of England. At this time Edward was in possession of almost every stronghold in Scotland between Berwick and the Moray firth. The strong castle of Carlaverock alone held out. The assaults of the English were made by every description of engine then in use, while the besieged slowered upon their assailants such "huge stones, quarrels, and arrows, and with wounds and bruises they were so hurt and exhausted, that it was with very great difficulty they were able to retire." Indeed, the courage of the garrison, which amounted only to sixty men, was most conspicuous. We are told that as one of them became fatigued another supplied his place, and they defended the fortress gallantly the whole of one day and night, but the numerous stones thrown by the besiegers, and the erection of three large battering engines of great power, caused them to surrender. To obtain a cessation of hostilities, they hung out a pennon, but the soldier who exhibited it, was shot through the hand to his face by an arrow. The rest demanded quarter, surrendered the castle, and submitted to the mercy of the king of England.

Sir Herbert's son, Sir Eustace Maxwell, succeeded his father before 1312. Entertaining the hereditary feelings of his family in favour of the Baliols and Comyns, in opposition to Robert the Bruce, he regained possession of the castle of Carlaverock, and on April 30, 1312, he received from Edward II., an allowance of £20 for its more secure keeping. He afterwards joined the party of Robert the Bruce. His castle of Carlaverock was again in consequence besieged by the English, and defended for several weeks, when the assailants were compelled to retire. Fearing that it might again fall into the hands of the English, Sir Eustace demolished a part of the fortifications, for which he was rewarded by King Robert Bruce. Sir Eustace was one of the barons who signed the letter to the Pope, asserting the independence of Scotland, in 1320, and in the same year was tried for being accessory to a conspiracy against the king, but was acquitted.

In 1332, Edward Baliol landed in Scotland, and was crowned at Scone. He was afterwards besieged in Perth, when the men of Galloway, under Sir Eustace de Maxwell, invaded the lands of the besiegers, and caused them to raise the siege, (Chron. de Lanercost, p. 269.) On Dec. 13, 1333, Sir Eustace, with others, was chosen by Edward III., to ascertain the value of the castle, county, and city of Berwick upon Tweed, (Rotuli Scotiae, vol. i. p. 260.) January 26, 1335-6, he was appointed one of the conservators of the truce with the Scots, on the part of Edward, and on August 23, following, a letter was sent to him as sheriff of Dumfries, as well as to the other sheriffs of Scotland, rebuking them for their tardiness in giving in their accounts, (Ibid. vol. i. p. 441.) In 1337, he made a temporary defection from Baliol, and caused the men of Galloway on his own side of the Cree, to rise against the English, although he had only immediately before received from Edward III., money and provisions for the more secure keeping of Carlaverock castle, (Chronicon de Lanercost, p. 290.) The castles of Dumbarton and Carlaverock are said to have been the only strong castles then in possession of the Scots. The latter had therefore been repaired after its demolition. On August 20, 1339, Sir Eustace de Maxwell, Duncan Makkuel, and Michael Mageth, of Scotland, received from Edward III. letters of pardon, and admitting them to the king's peace, for having joined with his enemies, (Rotuli Scotiae, vol. i. p. 571.) Sir Eustace was a witness to a charter of confirmation by Edward III., in 1340. He died at Carlaverock, March 3, 1342-3.

Sir John de Maxwell, knight, "son of the deceased Sir John Maxwell of Pencateland, and heir of Sir Eustace de Maxwell, his brother;" succeeded, as appears by charter granted by him to the Abbey of Dryburgh, confirmed by William, Prior of St. Andrews in 1343, being "the patronage of the church of Pencateland, which John de Maxwell of Pencateland, and Sir John Maxwell, knight, dominus de Maxwell, granted to the abbot and convent of Dryburgh" Sir John Maxwell was taken prisoner, with David II., at the battle of Durlam, in 1346, and died shortly after.

Sir John Maxwell, Lord (dominus) of Maxwell, his son, probably did not for a time regain possession of Carlaverock. Roger de Kirkpatrick had in the end of 1356 taken the castle of Carlaverock and levelled it with the ground, and when residing in the neighbourhood, was, in June following, assassinated by Sir James Lindsay. Sir John Maxwell sat in the meeting of the Estates at Edinburgh, 26th September 1357, when the terms proposed by Edward III. relative to the release of David II. were agreed to, and he was engaged in the negotiations relating thereto. A charter was granted by Robert II. to Robert de Maxwell, son and heir of John Maxwell of Carlaverock, knight, on the resignation by his father of the lands he held of the king, under reservation of his liferent, and of the terce, to Christian his spouse, in case she survived him, dated Sept. 19, 1371. He is supposed to have died in 1373.

His son, Sir Robert Maxwell of Carlaverock, succeeded. In the charter of resignation mentioned above, he is called by King Robert II., dilectus consanguineus noster, which would infer that his mother Christian was related to the king. He is supposed to have erected the castle of Carlaverock on its present site, the former one having been in a lower situation more to the east. He made a grant to the monastery of Dryburgh, for the welfare of his soul and of the soul of Sir Herbert de Maxwell, his son and heir, before 1400, (Liber de Dryburgh, p. 273.) He seems to have been alive in 1407, but was dead before Nov. 23, 1413. The Sir Robert Maxwell who was then sent as ambassador to the English court must have been Sir Robert Maxwell of Caldervood.

Sir Herbert Maxwell of Carlaverock, his son, succeeded. He married in 1385 or 1386, Katherine, daughter of Sir John Stuart of Dalswinton, under a dispensation from the pope. From his kinsman, Archibald, earl of Douglas, he had received a charter of the stewardship of Annandale, dated 8th February 1409-10. He was probably dead before Oct. 20, 1420, but certainly so before March 16, 1421. Besides Herbert, his successor, he left another son, Aymer, who married the heiress of Kirkconnel of that ilk (see MAXWELL of KIRKCONNEL).

The elder son, Sir Herbert Maxwell of Carlaverock, succeeded. In his father's lifetime he had a safe conduct, Nov. 3, 1413, with others, to go to England as hostages. On March 16, 1421, he was retoured heir to his father in the lands of Mekill Dripps. He was knighted at the coronation of James I., May 21, 1424, and some years afterwards was created a lord of parliament, a dignity established by King James under the Aet, March 1, 1427. His ancestors, from an early period, ranked among the magnates or proceres regni; and in several charters in the vernacular yet extant are styled lords of Carlaverock, in the same way as the lords of Galloway and others. In 1425 he was arrested with Murdoch, duke of Albany, but soon liberated. Albany was at first sent to Carlaverock castle, but soon taken back to Stirling, where he was executed. The tower at Carlaverock, in which he was confined, was from him called Murdoch's tower. In the parliament held at Perth, March 10, 1429, Maxwell is entered as one of the lords of parliament who adjudicated on the plea between Margaret, lady of Craigy, and Philip de Mowbray. (Acts of Scots Parl., vol. ii., p. 28). In 1430 and 1438 he was warden of the west marches, and on 20th March of the latter year he was one of the conservators of the truce with England. He was one of the lords of parliament present in parliament, June 28, 1445. He is again named a conservator of the truce, April 29, 1450, April 16, 1451, and May 30, 1453. (Rotuli Scotiæ.) On Aug. 8, 1440, he had a charter under the great seal authorising him to build a tower on the crag of the Mearns, and on May 15, 1444, he had a letter from the king empowering him to build the castle of the Mearns. He died before Feb. 14, 1453. He was twice married: first, to a daughter of Sir Herbert Herries of Terregles, by whom he had two sons, Robert his successor, and Sir Edward Maxwell, of whom descended the Maxwells of Tinwald and Monreith; and secondly, to Katherine, daughter of Sir William Seton of Seton, widow of Sir Allan Stewart of Dernelly, and mother of the first earl of Lennox. By this lady, he had, with other issue, George, ancestor of the Maxwells of Cornsalloeh, and Adam, of the Maxwells of Southbar.

The eldest son, Robert, 2d Lord Maxwell, was retoured heir to his father February 14, 1453-4. On the forfeiture of the Douglasses in 1455, the extensive lordship of Eskdale was acquired by him, and remained with the Maxwell family throughout the 16th and 17th centuries. He was a guarantee to a treaty with the English in 1457, and again in 1459. He had, before January 20, 1424, married Janet, daughter of Sir John Forstar (Forrester) of Corstorphine. On March 6, 1457, he was appointed one of the visitors of hospitals in Galloway. On Feb. 10, 1477, he executed a resignation of the baronies of Maxwell, Carlaverock, and Mearns, in favour of John Maxwell, his eldest son, on which the latter had charter from the king on the 11th of the same month. He died before May 8, 1485. He had three sons, John, his successor, Thomas, who married the heiress of Maxwell of Kirkconnel, and David. An illegitimate son, also named John, was killed in a quarrel with the Murrays.

The eldest son, John, 3d Lord Maxwell, as he was called in his latter years, although he predeceased his father in 1454, married Katherine Crichton, daughter of George Earl of Caithness. He was appointed steward of Annandale. That he was called Lord Maxwell in his father's lifetime, after the resignation of the baronies of Maxwell, Carlaverock, and Mearns, to him as already mentioned, appears from the Acta Auditorum. On March 27, 1482, "John Lord Maxwell" is mentioned. On December 12, 1482, John Maxwell, son and apparent heir of "Robert Lord Maxwell;" and in a mutual grant of certain lands to endow a chapel in Carlaverock, "Robert Lord Maxwell," and "John Lord Maxwell," his son, are mentioned by these titles, and as then alive, June 5, 1483. John Lord Maxwell, or the Master of Maxwell was treacherously slain by one of his own countrymen at the close of a battle in Annandale with a party of English and some rebel Scots, July 22, 1484. Besides John, his successor, he left numerous sons, from whom descended the Maxwells of Cowhill and Killylung, of Cavens, of Portrack, of Hills, and Drumcoltran, &c.

John, 4th Lord Maxwell, his eldest son, was one of the commissioners nominated to settle border differences by the treaty of Nottingham, Sept. 23, 1484. He fell at Flodden, 9th September 1513. By his wife, Agnes, daughter of Sir Alexander Stewart of Garlies, ancestor of the earls of Galloway, he had, with three daughters, three sons, viz., Robert, fourth Lord Maxwell; Herbert, ancestor of the Maxwells of Clowden; and Edward, taken prisoner with his brother at the rout of Solway in 1543, but released the following year, on payment of a ransom of £100 sterling.

Robert, fifth Lord Maxwell, the eldest son, was a conspicuous character in Scottish history in the first half of the 16th century. On the 10th June, preceeding the battle of Flodden Field, he had been knighted by James IV., and, at the same time, on the resignation of his father, he was appointed steward of Annandale. In 1516 he acquired part of the lands forfeited by Lord Home, and in the following year he was appointed warden of the western marches. In 1524 he was lord provost of Edinburgh, and in that capacity chosen one of the lords of the articles for the commissioners of burghs. On 21st June 1526, on James V. being declared of age to assume the government of the realm, Lord Maxwell was sworn a member of the secret council, formed to assist the earl of Angus with their advice and support as guardian of the king's person. Soon after, he was with the young monarch, on his return from his expedition against the Armstrongs, when, at Melrose bridge, Angus' party was attacked by Walter Scott of Buccleuch, with the design of reseuing his majesty from the hands of the Douglasses. In 1526 he was infest as steward of Kirkcudbright and keeper of Threave castle, offices afterwards made hereditary. On the escape of James from Falkland castle to Stirling in 1528, Lord Maxwell was one of the first of the lords who attended the council summoned by the king. In the distribution of offices which took place when the king soon after proceeded to Edinburgh, a free monarch, to his lordship was intrusted the command of the capital with the provostship of the city. Angus' brother, Sir George Douglas, the late master of the king's household, and his uncle, Archibald Douglas of Kilspinky, the late treasurer, having made an attempt to raise the inhabitants, were attacked by Lord Maxwell, and driven from the capital. He was rewarded with a portion of the lands of the forfeited Angus. (Douglas' Peerage, vol. ii. p. 317).

The same year, his lordship and other principal border-chiefs were arrested and placed in Edinburgh castle, preparatory to the king's celebrated journey into Eusdale and Teviotdale for the punishment of the border thieves, whose disorders they had overlooked, if not encouraged, during the time that Angus had usurped the government. In a few months, however, they were released, after delivering pledges for their allegiance. On 17th November 1533, his lordship was appointed an extraordinary lord of session. In 1536 he made a hostile incursion into England, and burnt Penrith. In August of the same year he was appointed one of the members of the regency, to whom the government of the kingdom was intrusted during the absence of James V., on his matrimonial expedition to France; and in the following December he was one of the ambassadors sent to that country to negotiate the marriage of James with Mary of Guise, widow of the duke of Longueville, whom he espoused as proxy for the king.

In 1542, after the discontented nobles had refused to invade England, and James was obliged to disband his army encamped on Fala muir, Lord Maxwell offered his services for a new expedition. A force of 10,000 men having been speedily collected, it advanced, under his command, into England, by the western marches, and reached the Solway Moss, whilst the king awaited at Carlaverock castle the result of the invasion. The appointment of the king's favourite, Oliver Sinclair, to the chief command, gave so much offence to the nobles in the Scots army, that they refused to serve under him, and on the approach of Sir Thomas Dacre and Sir John Musgrave, two English leaders, with 300 horse, they yielded themselves prisoners. Lord Maxwell on foot was endeavouring to restore some degree of order, and being urged to mount his horse and fly, he replied, "Nay, I will rather abide here the chance that it shall please God to send me than to go home and there be hanged."

On the death of James V., which happened soon after, his lordship, with the other captive lords, was allowed to return to Scotland, his ransom being 1,000 marks. They were previously compelled, however, to enter into a bond or obligation to promote the designs of the English monarch on their native country. He zealously promoted the fruitless projects of Henry VIII., relative to a marriage betwixt the infant Queen Mary and his son, Prince Edward.

While in England he is supposed to have become a convert to the doctrines of the Reformation, and in the first parliament of the young queen, which met March 13, 1543, he presented an act that all should have liberty to read the Bible in the Scottish or English tongue, but under the proviso, not very consistent with his reformed views, that "na man dispute or hold opinions under the pains containit in the actis of parliament." This act was passed into a law, and publicly ratified by the regent Arran, notwithstanding the protest of the lord-chancellor and the prelates. Towards the end of the same year he was apprehended at Edinburgh, with Lord Somerville, on a charge of entering into a treasonable agreement with England, but on the arrival of an English fleet in Leith Roads on 3d May following, he was set at liberty. On 16th September, 1545, with the lairds of Lochinvar and Johnston, aided by some French troops, he invaded England by the western borders, but was taken prisoner. As his conduct towards King Henry had been suspicious and vacillating, he was threatened to be sent to the Tower by that imperious monarch, when he offered to serve under the earl of Hertford, on his invasion of Scotland, with a red cross on his armour, to show that he was true to the English interests. By delivering up Carlaverock to the English, he was allowed to return to Scotland, but early in November of the same year, the regent and Cardinal Beilune attacked and stormed that fortress, whilst Lochmaben and Threave, held by his sons, experienced a similar fate. Maxwell himself, being taken with his English confederates, was imprisoned in Dumfries. He died 9th July 1546. He was twice married, but had only issue by his first wife, Janet, daughter of Sir William Douglas of Drumlanrig, namely, a daughter, Margaret, countess of Angus, and afterwards Lady Baillie of Lamington, and two sons, Robert, 6th Lord Maxwell, and Sir John Maxwell of Terregles, who married Agnes, daughter of the third Lord Herries, and as the 4th Lord Herries, but first of the Maxwell family, distinguished himself by his faithful adherence to Queen Mary. (See vol. ii. p. 473.)

Robert, sixth Lord Maxwell, was one of the commissioners to treat with the English, 8th May, 1551, and died 14th September, 1552. By his wife, Lady Beatrix Douglas, the 2d of 3 daughters of James, 3d earl of Morton, he had Robert, who died young, and a posthumous son, John, 7th Lord Maxwell.

John, seventh lord, was not born till the spring following his father's decease. His uncle, the Master of Maxwell, was his tutor and governor; afterwards William Douglas of Whittingham, John Mure of Rowallan, and Robert Maxwell of Cowhill, were appointed his curators, until he attained his majority in 1574. He was a zealous supporter of Queen Mary, and in 1570, when the earl of Sussex was sent by Queen Elizabeth into Scotland, with an army of 15,000 men, to support King James VI., after the assassination of the regent Moray, the English commander "took and east down the castles of Carlaverock, Hoddan, Dumfries, Tinwald, Cowhill, and sundry other gentlemen's houses, dependers on the house of Maxwell, and having burnt the town of Dumfries, returned with great spoil to England." Lord Maxwell and Lord Herries attended the parliament held in Queen Mary's name at Edinburgh, 12th June, 1571. In right of his mother he was heir of one-third of the earldom of Morton; he had acquired right to another third from Margaret, her elder sister, with consent of her husband, the duke of Chatelleraut, and he was heir apparent of the youngest sister, who died childless. He, therefore, considered that the earldom of Morton was his by right, and that all the entails executed by James, 3d earl, were illegal. The earl of Morton, appointed regent of the kingdom Nov. 24, 1572, seemed himself to doubt their legality, for he "pressed by all means that the Lord Maxwell should renounce his title thereto, quilk he refusing he commanded him to prison in the castle of Edinburgh, where lykways refusing to renounce, he was sent to Blackness, and from thence to St. Andrews, where he and the Lord Ogilvie abode till the March thereafter." (Hist. Family of Maxwell.) In 1579, Morton caused Lords John and Claud Hamilton to fly the country, and delivered the Duchess of Chatelleraut, their mother and Lord Maxwell's aunt, and the earl of Arran, then insane, into the charge of the notorious Captain Lammie, and in order to injure, as much as in his power, every descendant of the 3d earl of Morton, to whom he was indebted for his honours and estates, he deprived Lord Maxwell of the wardenship, and conferred the office on the laird of Johnston, the hereditary enemy of the house of Maxwell. On the execution and attainder of the regent Morton, Lord Maxwell obtained, as representative of his mother, a charter of the earldom of Morton, erected of new in his favour, June 5, 1581, and ratified with consent of the Estates, Nov. 19 thereafter. He seems to have been, about the same time, reponed as warden of the west marches, which office he held till the conspiracy of the earl of Gowrie in 1582, when the duke of Lennox was driven from the government. He adhered to the duke, and accompanied him to Glasgow on his way to Dumbarton castle. On Nov. 30 of that year, when Lennox meditated the seizure of the capital, Lord Maxwell and others of his supporters arrived in that city, with their followers, to assist him, but departed without carrying their design into effect.

The attainder of the earldom of Morton was rescinded by the king's letters under the great seal, in January 1585, in favour of Archibald earl of Angus, the heir of entail, (ratified by act of parliament of 29th July 1587,) who thereby succeeded to the old title of earl of Morton, but not affecting Lord Maxwell's title of earl of Morton created in 1581 (see MORROX, earl of). Having incurred Arran's displeasure for refusing to exchange his lands of Pollok and Maxwellhaugh, which lay contiguous to Arran's estate, for others of equal value, Lord Maxwell proceeded to collect a force in his own defence, when he was denounced rebel, and put to the horn, through the malice of the earl of Arran, on which the lieges were commanded by proclamation to meet the king on Crawfordmuir, on Oct. 24, to proceed against him. He joined the banished nobles in their conspiracy for the removal of Arran, whom they considered the cause of all the evils that afflicted the country, and was with them when, on Nov. 1, they took the castle of Stirling. On this occasion his followers availed themselves of the opportunity to do a little bit of business on their own account, while in effect assisting in the overthrow of the court favourite, for, we are told, they carried off by force all the horses they could find, "not respecting friend or foe." A general act of indemnity was passed in favour of the lords who had driven Arran from court, and on December 10, 1585, a special Act of Parliament granted Lord Maxwell, his friends and servants, entire indemnity for all their unlawful doings within the realm, from April 1569 to the date thereof. Of the men named in the act, there were about 600 from Lord Maxwell's own estates in Nithsdale and Galloway, 600 from Eskdale, Ewesdale, and Wauchopedale, mostly Beatties, Littles, and Armstrongs, 340 from Lower Annandale, chiefly Carruthers, Bells, and Irvings, and about 450 better organized soldiers, in three companies of infantry, and two troops of cavalry, one troop being from Galloway and Nithsdale, commanded by John Maxwell of Newlaw and Alexander Maxwell of Logan; and the other from Annandale, commanded by George Carruthers of Holmends, and Charles Carruthers, his son.

Having, contrary to law, caused mass to be celebrated openly in the college of Linluden, near Dumfries, on 24th, 25th, and 26th Dec. of the same year, his lordship, and the rest of the hearers, were charged to appear before the secret council. On his appearance he offered himself to trial, but was committed to the castle of Edinburgh. It does not appear how long he remained a prisoner. Tytler says (Hist. of Scotland, vol. ix., p. 4), that when the king received the news of his mother's execution, he sent for Lord Maxwell, and others of the more warlike of the border leaders, to consult as to what should be done. He was not, however, employed in the matter, for on April 12, 1587, he gave bond, with John, Lord Hamilton, William, Lord Herries, and Sir John Gordon of Lochinvar, as cautioners, that he would leave the realm and go beyond sea in a month, and in the meantime should not trouble the country, nor, when abroad, do anything to injure the religion then professed, or the peace of the realm, and should not return without his Majesty's special license. Lord Herries, also, on May 29 following, gave bond that Sir Robert Maxwell of Dinwiddie, John Maxwell of Conheth, and Edward Maxwell of the Hills—probably imprisoned at the same time as Lord Maxwell—should not do or attempt anything to the prejudice of the religion then professed. Soon after, Lord Maxwell went to Spain, and when there he did what he could to promote the success of the invasion of England by the Armada, and, with that view, to produce a diversion in Scotland, where a powerful body of the nobility was ready to assist (Ibid. vol. ix., p. 17.) In the month of April 1588, he returned to Scotland without the king's license. He at once began to assemble his followers, that he might be ready to assist the Spaniards on the arrival of their much-vaunted Armada. He fortified the castle of Lochnaben, the command of which he gave to Mr. David Maxwell, brother of the laird of Cowhill, while he himself took refuge on board a ship. With a large force James marched to Dumfries, and summoned Lord Maxwell's various castles to surrender. They all obeyed, except Lochnaben, but after two days' firing it also was given up, when the governor and five of his officers were hanged before the castle gate. In the meantime, Sir William Stewart, brother of Captain Stewart, the quondam earl of Arran, was sent after Lord Maxwell. Finding himself pursued, his lordship, quitting the ship, took to the boat, and had no sooner landed than he was apprehended. He was at first conveyed to Dumfries, but afterwards removed to the castle of Edinburgh, and deprived of his office of warden of the western marches, which was conferred on the laird of Johnston.

With other imprisoned nobles, Lord Maxwell was released from his confinement on 12th September, 1589, to do honour, by their attendance, to the queen of James VI. on her arrival in Scotland from Denmark. He had become, from policy or otherwise, a convert to Protestantism, and on 26th January, 1593, subscribed the Confession of Faith before the presbytery of Edinburgh, under the name of Morton. On the 2d February following he and the new earl of Morton, striving for precedence in the church at Edinburgh, were parted by the provost before they had time to draw their swords, and conveyed under a guard to their lodging, as was also Lord Hamilton, for having assisted Maxwell.

He had been restored to the wardenship of the western marches, but in consequence of its having been held for a time by the laird of Johnston, the old feud was renewed between the two families. On the 7th December, 1593, at the head of about 2,000 men, Lord Maxwell, having a commission of lieutenantcy, went to demolish some houses belonging to the Johnstons, when he was resisted by the chief of that name, with his allies, the Scotts, Elliots, and other border clans, to the number of 500 men, and "being a tall man and heavy in armour," was slain. This affair was called the battle of Dryfe sands. The Maxwells, though much superior in numbers, were routed and pursued; and lost, on the field and in the retreat, about 700 men, besides their commander. Many of those who were killed or wounded in the retreat were cut down in the streets of Lockerby, and hence the phrase, currently used in Annandale to denote a severe wound, "A Lockerby Lick." By his wife, Lady Elizabeth Douglas, second daughter of the 7th earl of Angus, Lord Maxwell had, with three daughters, three sons, John and Robert, 8th and 9th Lord Maxwell, and James Maxwell of Kirkeconnel and Springkell, who left no issue.

John, 8th Lord Maxwell, the eldest son, was put to the horn for various acts of disobedience to the king's authority, and by the laws then in force as to religion, before the year 1600. The old feud between the Maxwells and the Johnstons was kept up by the appointment of Sir James Johnston to the wardenship, June 17, 1600. Lord Maxwell was in March 1602 imprisoned in the castle of Edinburgh on account of his favouring popery. He afterwards broke out of ward, and was proclaimed a traitor. A sort of reconciliation had taken place between the Maxwells and the Johnstons, in testimony whereof Lord Maxwell executed "Letters of Slayns," June 11, 1605.

In 1607, Lord Maxwell, asserting still his rights as earl of Morton, got into disputes with the other earl of Morton about holding courts in Eskdalemuir, in consequence whereof he was committed to the castle of Edinburgh. He escaped from the castle Dec. 4 of that year, along with Robert Maxwell of Dinwiddie. He was then put to the horn, and diligent search made for him. On Feb. 2, 1608, King James wrote to the privy council, complaining that, in contempt of his authority, Lord Maxwell travelled openly through the country with 20 horse, and even appeared at Dumfries, and directed that he be sought for, and either taken or put out of the bounds. In answer, the privy council informed the king that they had used all diligence in searching for Lord Maxwell, and punishing his rescoters, and asked to have designed a certain cave to which he used to resort. The cave inquired about was probably what is now called "Lord Maxwell's cave," in Clawbely Hill, parish of Kirkgunzion. Tired of this uncomfortable life, Lord Maxwell desired to be restored to the king's favour, and for that purpose, in April, 1608, sent a message by his cousin, Sir Robert Maxwell of Orchardton, to Sir James Johnston of Johnston, the brother-in-law of the latter, who had expressed a wish for a reconciliation, that a friendly meeting might take place between them. Accordingly, they met on horseback on the 6th of that month, Lord Maxwell attended by Charles Maxwell of Kirkhouse, and Sir James Johnston by William Johnston of Lockerby, Sir Robert Maxwell being also present. With Sir Robert Maxwell, the two chiefs rode apart to confer together, but, a quarrel taking place between the attendants, Johnston's friend was shot at by a pistol fired by the other. The hind of Johnston, crying out "treason," rode forward to see what was the matter. Lord Maxwell, at that moment, shot him in the back, and he fell off his horse dead. His lordship immediately fled to the continent. His title and estates were forfeited, and all his offices vested in the crown. In March 1612 he ventured to return to Scotland, and being closely pursued, retired to Caitliness, intending to take shipping there for Sweden, but was betrayed by his kinsman, George, 5th earl of Caitliness, conveyed by sea to Leith, and imprisoned in the jail of Edinburgh. For the "treasonable murder," as slaughter under trust was then termed, of Sir James Johnston, (who had married Sarah Maxwell, sister of John, 7th Lord Herries, and was ancestor of the marquises of Annandale,) he was, on 21st May following, beheaded at the cross of Edinburgh. He married Lady Margaret Hamilton, only daughter of John, first marquis of Hamilton, without issue.

His brother, Robert, 9th Lord Maxwell, was restored to the title and estates of the family, 13th Oct., 1618, and on 29th August, 1620, the title of earl of Morton, at one time held by this family, was changed to earl of Nithsdale, with the precedence of the former title. (See NITHSDALE, earl of.)

There are five baronetcies held by families of the name of Maxwell—namely, of Pollok, Renfrewshire; of Calderwood, Lanarkshire; of Cardoness, Kirkeudbrightshire; of Monreith, Wigtonshire; and of Springkell, Dumfries-shire.

The baronetcy of Orchardton, extinct or dormant, was about to be claimed by the heir in 1805, but the estates having been sold the idea was given up.

The Pollok branch was allied by marriage to royalty. This family, descended from Sir John Maxwell, 2d son of Eumerus or Aynne de Maxwell (see page 126), were usually styled "Domini de Pollok," or "Nether Pollok." Besides the lands of that name in Renfrewshire, which he received from his father, Sir John got a grant of the lands of Lyoncroce, in the same county, from Robert the Bruce. Towards the close of the reign of that monarch he was governor of the castle of Dumbarton. He was succeeded by Sir Robert Maxwell of Pollok.

The next possessor of Pollok was Sir John Maxwell, who married, 1st, Isabel de Lindsay, daughter of Sir James Lindsay of Crawford, by Lady Egidia Stewart, sister-in-law of Robert II., and daughter of Walter the high steward, and by her he had 2 sons, John, his successor, and Robert, ancestor of the Maxwells of Calderwood; 2dly, Elizabeth de St. Michel, heiress of Whitecheston, Roxburghshire, supposed without issue.

His elder son, Sir John Maxwell, knight, early distinguished himself in arms, especially at the battle of Otterburn in 1388. According to Froissart, he there made prisoner Sir Ralph Percy, brother of Hotspur, an exploit that drew from John Dunbar, earl of Moray, under whom he served and graduated in chivalry, the encomiastic exclamation of "Well, Maxwell, hast thou earned thy spurs to-day!" With his relatives the Lindsays, Montgomeries, and others, all emulous of military glory, he readily joined the renowned and gallant James, earl of Douglas, in that enterprize. He married a daughter of the Sieur de Montgomery, who also fought at Otterbourne. Thomas Maxwell of Pollok, succeeded. He was alive in 1440. His son, John Maxwell of Pollok, was living in 1452.

His male heir, before and after 1500, Sir John Maxwell of Pollok, married Lady Elizabeth Stewart, daughter of John, earl of Lennox, and had by her four sons. 1. Sir John, his heir. 2. Robert, bishop of Orkney, a distinguished prelate. 3. George, of Cowglen, whose son, Sir John Maxwell, acquired the estates by marriage. 4. Thomas, whose descendants carried on the line of the family.

The eldest son, Sir John Maxwell of Pollok, had a son, John Maxwell, who predeceased him in 1536. The latter married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Patrick Houston of Houston, and had a daughter, Elizabeth, sole heiress of Pollok.

This Elizabeth succeeded her grandfather, and married Sir John Maxwell, son of the above-mentioned George Maxwell of Cowglen, the collateral heir male. He was knighted by Queen Mary, and fought at Langside.

Their son, Sir John Maxwell of Pollok, succeeded. He fell at the battle of Lockerby, in 1593. He married, 1st, Margaret, daughter of William Cunningham of Caprington, by whom he had a son, John, and a daughter, Agnes, wife of John Boyle of Kelburn, ancestor of the earls of Glasgow; 2dly, Marjory, daughter of Sir William Edmonston of Duntreath, and widow of Mungo Graham of Urchill, a cadet of the house of Montrose.

The son, Sir John Maxwell of Pollok, who figured after 1593 and in the reign of Charles I., married, 1st, Isabel Campbell, daughter of Hugh, Lord Loudoun, by whom he had a daughter; and, 2dly, Grizel, daughter of John Blair of Blair, without issue. To fix and secure the inheritance in the male line, Sir John settled his whole estates, heritable and moveable, upon his cousin, George, afterwards Sir George Maxwell of Auldhouse, descended from Thomas, youngest son of Sir John Maxwell, his great-great-grandfather. Sir John died in 1647.

George Maxwell of Auldhouse, afterwards Sir George, succeeded, according to the settlement made in his favour, and his descendants continued to enjoy the estates, notwithstanding of two attempts made by the Calderwood branch to disturb the succession. He was knighted by Charles II., and is described as having been a gentleman of singular accomplishments, and justly esteemed for his piety, learning, and other good qualifications. He married in 1646, Annabella, daughter of Sir Archibald Stewart of Blackhall and Ardgowan, descended from Robert III., and had a son and 3 daughters. He died in 1677.

Sir George Maxwell's name is associated with one of the most extraordinary causes célèbres in witchcraft which occurred in Renfrewshire. Having been taken suddenly ill, while in Glasgow, on the night of Oct. 14, 1677, he was, on his return home, confined to bed with severe bodily pains. A vagrant girl, named Janet Douglas, who pretended to be dumb, and was considered a clever witch-finder, and who owed some of his tenants a grudge, accused several of them of bewitching Sir George, and, to confirm her assertions, she contrived, in one or two instances, to secrete small wax figures of the suffering knight, stuck with pins, in the dwellings of the accused persons. A special commission was issued for the trial of the case on the spot, and after a long investigation, at which were present, besides some of the lords of justiciary, most of the leading men of Renfrewshire, the following unfortunate creatures, namely, Janet Mathie, widow of John Stewart, under miller in Shaw mill, John Stewart, her son, and three old women, the parties accused, were condemned to be strangled and burned, and Annabill Stewart, a girl 14 years old, the daughter of Mathie, ordered to be imprisoned! The case is recorded in Crawford's 'History of Renfrewshire.' A ballad has also been written on the subject. The accused confessed their guilt!

The son, Sir John Maxwell of Pollok, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia by Charles II., April 12, 1682, with extension of the title, in virtue of another patent, March 27, 1707, to his heirs male whatsoever. In July 1683, Sir John Maxwell was imprisoned for refusing to take the test, and December 2, 1684, he was fined £8,000 by the privy council, for allowing recusants to live on his lands, and refusing the bond and test. The council, however, declared that if paid before the end of the month, the fine would be reduced to £2,000. In 1689, Sir John was sworn a privy councillor to King William. The same year he represented the county of Renfrew at the convention of estates. He was afterwards commissioner for the same county in the Scots parliament. In 1696 he was appointed one of the lords of the treasury and exchequer. On the 6th February 1699 he was admitted an ordinary lord of session, and on the 14th of the same month nominated lord-justice-clerk. In the latter office he was superseded in 1702. He died July 4, 1732, in his 90th year, without issue.

His cousin, Sir John Maxwell, previously styled of Blawerthill, succeeded as 2d baronet of Pollok. He was the son of Zecharias Maxwell of Blawerthill, younger brother of Sir George Maxwell of Auldhouse and Pollok. He married, 1st, Lady Ann Carmichael, daughter of John, earl of Hyndford, and had a son, John, and 2 daughters; 2dly, Barbara, daughter of Walter Stewart of Blairhall, issue, 3 sons; 1, George, of Blawerthill, who died unmarried; 2, Walter; 3, James; and 2 daughters; 3dly, Margaret, of the family of Caldwell of Caldwell, without issue. He died in 1753.

His eldest son, Sir John Maxwell, became 3d baronet. On his death, his half brother, Sir Walter, succeeded as 4th baronet, and died in 1761.

Sir Walter's only son, Sir John, became 5th baronet, but died nine weeks after his father.

The title and estates reverted to his father's youngest brother, Sir James, 6th baronet. This gentleman married Frances, 2d daughter of Robert Colquhoun, Esq. of St. Christopher's, of the family of Kenmure; issue, 2 sons; 1, John, his successor; 2, Robert, a captain in the army, died without issue; and 2 daughters, 1, Frances, wife of John Cunningham of Craigends; 2, Barbara, married Rev. Greville Ewing. Sir James died in 1785.

III.

His elder son, Sir John, 7th baronet, was M.P. for the Paisley Burghs. He married Hannah Anne, daughter of Richard Gardiner of Aldborough, Suffolk; issue, a son, Sir John, and 2 daughters, Harriet, who died in 1812, and Elizabeth, wife of Archibald Stirling, Esq. of Keir.

The son, Sir John Maxwell of Pollok, 8th baronet, succeeded July 30, 1844; F.R.S.; was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford; M.P. for the county of Renfrew from 1826 to 1831, and for Lanarkshire from 1832 to 1837; deputy lieutenant for counties of Lanark and Renfrew. He married in 1839 Lady Matilda Harriet Bruce, daughter of Thomas, earl of Elgin and Kincardine. This lady died Aug. 31, 1827.

The family of Maxwell of Pollok are in possession of several original writings of considerable interest. One of these is the letter written by Queen Mary, after her escape from Lochleven, to Sir John Maxwell, whom she had knighted, requiring him to hasten to her aid with all his people, "bod- in in fear of weir," that is, equipped for war. He obeyed the call, and as stated above, fought at the battle of Langside, on the very border of his own domains.

The Maxwells of Calderwood are descended from Sir John Maxwell of Pollok, knight (see page 128). He got from his father the lands and baronies of Nether Pollok, Renfrewshire, and of Dryps and Calderwood, Lanarkshire. By his first wife, Isabel de Lindsay, Sir John had 2 sons, Sir John, his successor, and Sir Robert, ancestor of the Maxwells of Calderwood. He died in the beginning of the reign of David II.

The younger son, Sir Robert Maxwell, who inherited Pollok and Calderwood, died in 1363.

Sir Robert's eldest son and successor, Sir John Maxwell of Pollok and Calderwood, had 2 sons, John, to whom he gave the lands of Nether Pollok, and Robert.

The latter, Sir Robert Maxwell, got the barony of Calderwood and other lands. A mutual indenture was entered into by the two brothers, dated at Dumbarton, Dec. 18, 1400, in which all their lands were enumerated, and under the authority of their father—the principal party—this deed allocated or partitioned certain lands to the sons and their respective heirs at law. Sir Robert married in 1402, Elizabeth, daughter and co-heir of Sir Robert Denniston of Denniston, by whom he obtained the barony of Newark, in Renfrewshire. From this marriage lineally descended Sir James Maxwell of Calderwood, who died in 1622. He was thrice married, and had issue by all his wives. His third wife, Lady Margaret Cunningham, daughter of James, 7th earl of Glencairn, and widow of Sir James Hamilton of Evandale, was sister of Ann, marchioness of Hamilton. By her he had 4 daughters and 2 sons; 1, John, lineal ancestor of the present baronet, and 2, Alexander.

His son, Sir James Maxwell of Calderwood, who succeeded him, was by his 2d wife, Isabel, daughter of Sir Alexander Hamilton of Innerwick. He was created a baronet of Scotland and Nova Scotia, with remainder to his heirs male whatsoever, March 28, 1627. On the death of Sir John Maxwell of Pollok without surviving issue, in 1647, Sir James attempted to set aside a disposition of the Pollok estates, made some time before his death, by Sir John Maxwell in favour of George Maxwell of Auldhouse, but without effect. His son, Sir William, also prosecuted his claim to the Pollok estates, founding, like his father, on the deed of indenture of 1400, above mentioned, but he was equally unsuccessful. Sir James died in 1667. His half brother, Colonel John Maxwell, has an historical name as having attended his cousin, the duke of Hamilton, on his unfortunate expedition into England in 1648 for the rescue of Charles I. On his return he was obliged to do penance for his share in the "engagement," as it was called, before the congregation in the parish church of Carluke, in which parish the family at that time resided. He served as colonel in the Scots army which opposed Cromwell on his entering Scotland in 1650, and was killed at the battle of Dunbar that year.

Sir James' eldest son, Sir William, 2d baronet, married Jean, daughter of Sir Alexander Maxwell of Saughton Hall, and had two sons, and one daughter, who predeceased him.

His first cousin, Sir John, son of Colonel Maxwell, half brother of the first baronet, succeeded as 3d baronet. He was first designed of Abington, but afterwards of Calderwood.

His only surviving son, Sir William, 4th baronet, died in 1750. He married Christian, daughter of Alexander Stewart, Esq. of Torrence, and had, with 4 daughters, 3 sons. 1. William. 2. John, a colonel in the army, who had the command of a regiment of grenadiers, and served with great reputation in the German war, under Prince Ferdinand. 3. Alexander, a merchant in Leith, who married Mary, daughter of Hugh Clerk, Esq. of the family of Penicuik. Their son, Captain Sir Murray Maxwell, distinguished himself as a naval officer. A memoir of him is given at page 134.

Sir William's eldest son, Sir William, 5th baronet, died January 2, 1789.

The only surviving son of the latter, Sir William, 6th baronet, born in 1748, died without issue, August 12, 1829, and was succeeded by his cousin.

Sir William Maxwell, 7th baronet, a distinguished general in the army, died March 16, 1837. He had four sons.

The eldest son, Sir William Alexander Maxwell, 8th baronet, born in 1793, became a colonel in the army in 1851, and retired in 1853; married, without issue. Two younger brothers died unmarried. Hugh Bates, his younger brother, was born in 1797; married, issue, a son, William, born in 1828.

The Maxwells of Cardoness, Kirkcudbrightshire, descend from William Maxwell of Newlands, younger son of Gavin Maxwell, Esq., whose eldest son, Sir Robert Maxwell, knight, was grandfather of the first baronet of Calderwood.

David Maxwell of Cardoness, son of Major John Maxwell, by his wife, a daughter of Irving of Bouslaw, was created a baronet, June 9, 1804. He married in 1770, his cousin, Henrietta, daughter of David Maxwell, Esq. of Cairnsmore, Kirkcudbrightshire, and had 4 sons and 4 daughters. He died in 1825.

His 2d son, David, succeeded; his eldest son, William, having been drowned on his passage to Minorca, Feb. 17, 1801. Sir David, 2d baronet, born in 1773, vice-lieutenant of Kirkcudbrightshire, and honorary colonel of Galloway Rifles, married Georgina, eldest daughter of Samuel Martin, Esq. of Antigua, and had 3 sons and 3 daughters. Sir David died Nov. 13, 1860, and was succeeded by his eldest surviving son.

Sir William, 3d baronet, born 1809, married 1st, 1841, Mary, daughter of J. Sprot, Esq., by whom (who died 1846) he had 2 sons and 1 daughter. Sir William married, 2dly, 1851, Louisa Maria, eldest daughter of Geoffrey J. Shakerley, Esq., and by her also (who died 1856) has issue 4 daughters.

The Maxwells of Monreith, Wigtownshire, are descended from Herbert of Carlarock, first Lord Maxwell. His 2d son, Sir Edward Maxwell, obtained a charter of the barony of Mureith, now Monreith, Jan. 15, 1481. He was lineal ancestor of William Maxwell of Monreith, created a baronet of Nova Scotia, January 8, 1681. He died in 1709. His eldest son, William, was drowned in the Nith, in 1707.

His 2d son, Sir Alexander, succeeded as 2d baronet, and Sir William, the eldest son of Sir Alexander, became 3d baronet. Sir William died Aug. 22, 1771. By his wife, Magdalene, daughter of William Blair, Esq. of Blair, Ayrshire, he had, with 3 daughters, 3 sons. 1. William; 2. Hamilton, lieutenant-colonel, 74th regiment, who commanded the grenadiers of the army under Lord Cornwallis, in the war against Tippoo Sulthan. He died in India, unmarried, in 1800; 3. Dunbar, R. N., died young in 1775.

Sir William, the eldest son, succeeded as 4th baronet. He married his cousin, Katherine, daughter and heiress of David Blair, Esq. of Adamton, and had 3 sons and 6 daughters. He died in 1812.

The eldest son, Sir William, 5th baronet, served as lieutenant-colonel in the 26th foot under Sir John Moore in Spain, and lost an arm at Coruña. He died Aug. 22, 1838.

His eldest son, Sir William Maxwell, 6th baronet, born in 1805, succeeded. He was a captain in the army, but retired from the service in 1844; lieutenant-colonel of militia; married Helenora, youngest daughter of Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, bart., of Greenock and Blackhall; issue, Herbert Eustace, born Jan. 8, 1845, another son and 4 daughters.

The Maxwells of Springkell, in Annandale, baronets, are a branch of the family of Auldhouse, of which Maxwell of Pollok is the senior representative. They are second in succession from Pollok. George Maxwell, Esq. of Auldhouse, married, 1st, Janet, daughter of John Miller, Esq. of Newton, and had one son, John, whose son, George, succeeded to the Pollok estates; 2dly, Jean, daughter of William Muir, Esq. of Glanderstone, issue, a son, William; 3dly, Janet, daughter of Douglas of Waterside, issue, a son, Hugh.

William Maxwell, the 2d son, acquired in 1609, the barony of Kirkconnel and Springkell, in Annandale.

His son, Patrick Maxwell of Springkell, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1683. He died in 1720, leaving a son, and 4 daughters.

His son, Sir William, 2d baronet, died in 1760, and was succeeded by his only son, Sir William, 3d baronet, who died March 4, 1804. The latter had, with 3 daughters, 4 sons, namely, 1. William, a lieutenant 36th regiment, who died, unmarried, in 1784. 2. Michael-Stewart, colonel of Dumfries-shire light dragoons, who died, unmarried, in 1830. 3. Patrick, an officer in the army, drowned by the upsetting of a boat in a river in Nova Scotia, in 1790. 4. John. The youngest son succeeded his father.

Lieutenant-general Sir John Maxwell, 4th baronet, who succeeded March 4, 1804, married Mary, only surviving child and heiress of Patrick Heron, Esq. of Heron, in the stewardry of Galloway, M.P., and on the death of his father-in-law, assumed the surname and arms of Heron, in addition to his own. He died January 29, 1830.

His eldest son, Sir Patrick Heron Maxwell, died, unmarried, August 27, 1844.

His next brother, Sir John Heron Maxwell, became 6th baronet; born in 1808; an officer R.N.; married, issue, 4 sons.

The Maxwells of Parkhill; and other families of the name, sprung from the same common ancestor as the Calderwood family. The Rev. Robert Maxwell, 2d son of Sir John Maxwell of Calderwood, knight, in the end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth was sent over to Ireland, by James VI., to secure an interest for his majesty in that kingdom. He was appointed dean of Armagh, and was ancestor of the earls of Farnham peerage of Ireland, and of the Waring-Maxwells of Finnbrogue, county Down.

The Maxwells of Dargavel are an old family in Renfrewshire. John Hall Maxwell, Esq., present proprietor of Dargavel, is also the representative of another ancient family in the same county, the Halls of Fulbar, the reputed chiefs of the name, which in the charters of the time is given in the Latin form of de Aula. The ancestor of the latter obtained a charter of the lands of Fulbar from James, high steward of Scotland, grandfather of King Robert II., confirmed by that monarch in 1370. One of the descendants of this family fell at Flodden.

The Dargavel branch of the family of Maxwell was a cadet of the house of Newark, an offshoot of the family of Calderwood (see page 129). Of the Maxwells of Newark, Mr. Hall Maxwell is now also the representative.

John, eldest son, by his 2d wife, of Patriek Maxwell of Newark, obtained from his father in 1516, a charter of the lands of Dargavel, in the parish of Erskine, with those of Rashielee and Haltonridge, in the adjacent parishes of Inchinnan and Kilmaleohn. One of his descendants was slain in the desperate conflict at Lockerby in 1593, between the rival clans of Maxwell and Johnston.

John Maxwell, the proprietor of Dargavel in 1710, entailed that estate, and died without issue. He was succeeded by his brother, William Maxwell of Freeland, who also died childless.

Their sister, Margaret Maxwell, had married Robert Hall of Fulbar, and the 2d son of this marriage, John Hall, succeeded to Dargavel, as next heir of entail, when he took the name of Maxwell. By the death of his elder brother, he became proprietor of Fulbar and male representative of the family of Hall.

His grandson, John Maxwell of Dargavel, died in 1830.

His brother, William Maxwell, succeeded. He married Mary, daughter of John Campbell, Esq. of Possil, Dumbar-toushire, and had by her a numerous family. He died in 1816.

His eldest son, John Hall Maxwell, Esq. of Dargavel, C.B., born in 1812, passed advocate at the Scottish bar in 1835, and in 1816 was appointed secretary to the Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland. In 1856 he was made a companion of the Bath; a magistrate and deputy lieutenant of Renfrewshire. He married in 1843, Anne, daughter of Thomas Williams, Esq. of Burwood House, with issue. His son and heir, William Hall, was born in 1847.

The Maxwells of Kirkeconnel descend from one of the older cadets of the Maxwell family. Representing the family of Kirkeconnel of Kirkeconnel, it is one of the oldest families in Galloway, and has been settled in the parish of Troqueer for centuries. The Maxwells spell the name Kirkeconnel.

The first of the house of Kirkeconnel of that ilk is supposed to have been a person of Saxon origin, who had come from the north of England and settled at Kirkeconnel, near the mouth of the Nith, in the time of Earl David, afterwards David I., or in that of King Malcolm his father. The names, John, William, and Thomas, which the Kirkeconnel family used, indicate their north of England extraction; while the surname of the family being the same as the name of their lands, gives right to infer that they held these lands from the time of Malcolm Canmore (1057—1093) when family surnames derived from territorial possessions began to be used in Scotland.

The arms of the Kirkeconnels, azure, two croziers, or, placed in saltire ardoressés, with a mitre of the last placed in chief (Nisbet's Heraldry, Part 2, ch. 10) being the same as those of the bishops of Argyre or Lismore in the 12th century, might be thought to show that the one was derived from the other, but was probably assumed from the name of the territory and its connexion with the church.

The first of the name on record is John, "dominus de Kirkeconnel, fundavit Saerun Bosenn." (Dugdale's Monasticon (1661) Cenobia Scotiae, vol. ii. p. 1057.) He founded the abbey of Holywood some time in the 12th century, in the place of a former religious house. He was probably the father of Michael de Kirkeconnel, whose son, William Fitz-Michael de Kirkeconnel, about the year 1200 made a grant of lands in Kirkeconnel, in favour of the abbey of Holmeultram in Cumberland (Hutcheson's Cumberland, vol. ii. p. 331).

Gilechrist, the son of Gilcunil, is witness to a charter of lands in Dunseore near Dereogall or Holywood, granted by Aftriea, daughter of Edgar, to the monks of Melrose, in the reign of William the Lion or of Alexander II. (Liber de Melrose, vol. i. p. 182).

There is no farther account of any one of the name until the contest arose for the throne of Scotland between John Baliol, lord of Galloway, and Robert Bruce, lord of Annandale. Among those who swore fealty to Edward I. in 1296, we find Thomas de Kirkeconnel of the county of Dumfries, which then included both sides of the Nith. There can be little doubt that Thomas de Kirkeconnel and his immediate successors, like the rest of the men of Nithsdale and Galloway, supported the cause of Baliol. In 1324 mention is made of "Domnus de Kirkeconnell in valle de Nith," (Chalmers' Caledonia).

Owing to the wars and confusion of the times little is known of the Kirkeconnels for two or three generations, but it is probable that they generally supported and shared the fortunes of their greater neighbors on the other side of the Nith, the Maxwells of Carlaverock. The connexion between the families of Maxwell of Carlaverock and the Kirkeconnels was drawn closer by the marriage of Aymer de Maxwell, 2d son of Sir Herbert de Maxwell of Carlaverock and brother of Sir Herbert de Maxwell of Carlaverock, 1st Lord Maxwell, with Janet de Kirkeconnel, the heiress of the ancient family of Kirkeconnel, when the name de Kirkeconnel was merged in that of Maxwell, and the property went to their descendants of that name. The date of the marriage is unknown, but it may have taken place before the year 1410.

On 11th July 1448, there was a perambulation of the marches of Little Airds, belonging to the abbey of Sweetheart, and Meikle Airds, belonging to Kirkeconnel, to which Aymer de Maxwell was a party. (Original Papers and Deeds at Kirkeconnel.) On 20th March 1456, Aymer de Maxwell and Janet de Kirkeconnel, his spouse, had a charter of resignation and confirmation of their lands of Kirkeconnel, in the stewartry of Kirkeudbright. On 13th November 1461, Aymer de Maxwell of Kirkeconnel, superior of the estate of Kelton, which probably was his own, and not acquired by his wife, granted a feu to George Neilson of part thereof.

Aymer's son, Herbert Maxwell of Kirkeconnel, succeeded him. He left two sons, and probably others.

The elder son, whose Christian name is not known, is supposed to have predeceased his father. His brother's name was John. The former had a daughter, Elizabeth, who succeeded her grandfather, and another daughter, probably named Agnes Maxwell.

Elizabeth Maxwell of Kirkeconnel had precept from the Crown directing sasine to be given to her as heir of the late Herbert Maxwell of Kirkeconnel and Kelton, her grandfather, in virtue whereof she was infeft in the lands of Kelton in the sheriffdom of Dumfries on 5th November 1492. Among the witnesses of the infeftment were "John Maxwell, uncle of the said Elizabeth, Harbert Maxwell, son of the said John," &c. Dying without issue, Elizabeth was succeeded by her nephew, Herbert.

Herbert Maxwell of Kirkconnel, under precept from the crown, had sasine given to him, as "heir of the late Elizabeth Maxwell, his aunt," (avuncula—mother's sister,) of the lands of Kirkconnel and Kelton, on 12th April 1495. All accounts of the Kirkconnel and Maxwell families, and genealogists generally, concur in stating that Thomas Maxwell, 2d son of Robert, 2d Lord Maxwell, married Agnes Maxwell, the heiress of Maxwell of Kirkconnel, and that from them the present Kirkconnel family are descended. It is more than probable that Elizabeth's married sister, whose son Herbert succeeded his aunt, was the Agnes who became the wife of the said Thomas Maxwell, probably between 1450 and 1470, and that it was their son Herbert who was heir to his aunt Elizabeth. This might be inferred from the seal of Herbert attached to a charter granted by him on July 4, 1517, being a saltire, between two small chevrons. The chevron being often used as a mark of cadency, (Nisbet's Heraldry, vol. i. p. 151,) it would seem that the two chevrons were intended to show his descent from two cadets of the Maxwell family; Aymer, who married Janet de Kirkconnel, and Thomas, thought to have been the father of Herbert. As a follower of the chief of his name, Herbert Maxwell of Kirkconnel was present at the affray, on July 30, 1508, on the sands of Dumfries, between John Lord Maxwell, and Lord Crichton of Sanquhar, and their respective followers, when the latter nobleman was driven from the town, and many of his friends slain. (Balfour's Annals, 1508.) For this and other lawless doings Herbert Maxwell received a general remission from the crown on 17th October the same year. He was twice married. By his first wife, whose name is not ascertained, he had four sons: Robert, John, William, and Edward. His 2d wife was Euphemia Lindsay, issue unknown. William, the third son, was in the household of Mary of Guise, and afterwards for a time in a regiment of Scots men at arms in the service of the king of France (MS. on Scottish Guard History). On the 16th February, 1557, he had a grant of the lands of Little Airds. His son, William, succeeded him in Little Airds. The latter had a son, James, who wrote his Autobiography, and was author also of several polemical works.

Herbert died before 28th Dec. 1548. His eldest son, Robert, on July 4, 1517, had a charter from his father of the lands of Kelton. He married Janet Crichton, and on August 16, 1519, had a grant of Auchenfad. He predeceased his father, leaving 2 sons, Herbert and John.

The elder son, Herbert Maxwell of Kirkconnel, had sasine in the lands of Kirkconnel and Kelton as heir to his grandfather, Dec. 28, 1548, and had charter of Auchenfad, January 22, 1548-9. He married a Janet Maxwell, and had a son, Bernard, and three daughters, Agnes, Catherine, and Margaret. He died before 1560.

Bernard Maxwell of Kirkconnel succeeded his father in his minority. On May 6, 1571, with consent of his curators, he executed a disposition of the lands of Kirkconnel and Kelton, in favour of his uncle, John Maxwell, and his heirs male, whom failing, to his own heirs general, and reserving his liferent, with power of redemption, in the event of having heirs male himself, and the lands to be held of himself, for £1,000 Scots, on which deed sasine was taken on the following day; also, another deed of the same date, in nearly the same terms, the lands to be held of the crown, on which sasine was taken. He was alive and collecting the feu duties of Airds in 1574 and 1577.

John Maxwell, tutor of Kirkconnel, during the minority of Bernard, his nephew, was infeft, as above stated, in the property, May 7, 1571. He died before his nephew, and before August 1573.

His son, John Maxwell of Kirkconnel, succeeded him, and to his right to the estate in his minority, his tutors or curators being James Crichton of Carco and William Somerville, vicar of Kirkbean. On July 8, 1574, he was retoured heir male to John Maxwell of Kirkconnel, his father, in the lands of Kirkconnel, reserving the liferent therein of Bernard Maxwell and of Janet Maxwell, relict of Herbert Maxwell, in a part thereof; in virtue whereof John Maxwell was infeft therein, Oct. 8, 1574, Bernard Maxwell, the liferenter, being a witness to the infeftment. In April and May, 1593, he took part in the slaughterings and feud between the Maxwells and Johnstons. On Nov. 26, 1601, John Maxwell of Kirkconnel and several others were summoned before the privy council, for contravening the Acts of Parliament against saying and hearing of mass, and entertaining priests, especially Dr. John Hamilton and Abbot Gilbert Brown, and having children baptized by them (Chambers' Domestic Annals, vol. i., pp. 358, 359). John Spottiswoode, archbishop of Glasgow, having, with a party of soldiers, invaded New Abbey, in search of priests, broke into the house of the exiled abbot, Gilbert Brown, and plundered it of whatever savoured of popery. The books found there were given into the care of John Maxwell of Kirkconnel, who afterwards, being unwilling to part with them, was served with letters of horning on ten days' charge, ordering him to deliver the same over to Spottiswoode (Original Letters as to Ecclesiastical Affairs, Bannatyne Club, pp. 409-411). John Maxwell of Kirkconnel died after June 29, 1614. He had five sons—1. Herbert, his successor. 2. John, of Whitehill and Millhill, supposed to have been the father of John Maxwell of Barneleugh, town-clerk of Dumfries. 3. James. 4. Thomas. 5. George.

The eldest son, Herbert Maxwell of Kirkconnel, was esquire in ordinary to the body in the household of James VI., when he succeeded to Kirkconnel. Preferring to continue his attendance on royalty, the king granted him a pension for life of £200 out of the escheats of Scotland. He received charter of confirmation of the lands of Kirkconnel and others, Aug. 28, 1616, and was infeft therein 25th Sept. following. He got into some dispute with James Maxwell of Innerwick, a lord of the bedchamber, afterwards earl of Dirlton, the son of John Maxwell of Kirkhouse. The dispute came before the Court of Session, and four days after the hearing of the case (March 11, 1628), and as if at the instigation of his opponent, Herbert Maxwell of Kirkconnel, Charles Brown in New Abbey, Barbara Maxwell, Lady Mabie, and others, were charged by the privy council with contemning "excommunication and horning," persisting in "obdured and papish opinions and errors," and visiting all parts of the country, "as if they were free and lawful subjects." Sir William Grierson of Lag, and Sir John Charteris of Amisfield, were commissioned to apprehend those thus denounced, as well as their "resetters," or harbourers. How it fared with Herbert Maxwell does not appear, but the commissioners were successful in capturing in New Abbey Charles Brown of Clachan, and Gilbert Brown of Shambellie (Domestic Annals, vol. ii. pp. 18 and 19); whereupon Janet Johnstons of Newbie, Lady Lochhill, spouse of John Brown, assembling the women of the parish, attacked the minister and schoolmaster, their wives and servants, with sticks and stones. For this energetic defence of her faith Lady Lochhill was banished the realm, under a penalty of 1,000 merks if she dared to return. Herbert Maxwell of Kirkconnel died in Oct. 1637, leaving issue—1. John, his successor. 2. Edward. 3. George. 4. Robert. 5. Barbara (Lady Mabie, March 1623). 6. Marion, and an illegitimate son, Herbert.

The eldest son, John Maxwell of Kirkeconnel, was returned heir to his father, Dec. 19, 1638, in the lands of Kirkeconnel, with salmon fishings in the water of Nith, &c., and had sasine therein, Jan. 31, 1639. James Maxwell of Innerwick had received from Charles I. a gift of the non-entry of the lands. In 1642, John Maxwell of Kirkeconnel married Agnes, daughter of Stephen Laurie of Maxwellton, and Marion Corsone, his spouse. John Maxwell of Kirkeconnel got into difficulties soon after his marriage, but the estate was preserved by the prudent management of his lady, liberally assisted by Lady Maxwellton, her mother. He died in or before the year 1679, his wife surviving him. They had 4 sons and 3 daughters. 1. James. 2. William. 3. Herbert, a Jesuit priest. 4. Stephen, a Jesuit priest. 5. Euphemia, m. the laird of Corbeath. 6. Marion. 7. Agnes, m. Edmund, eldest son of William Brown of Nunton.

The eldest son, James Maxwell of Kirkeconnel, married, in 1672, Elizabeth, only daughter of Alexander Durham of Berwick, son of Sir John Durham of Duntarvie and Lady Margaret Abererony, probably of Birkenbog. Herbert Maxwell, Jesuit priest, was, in Oct. 1686, appointed chaplain to the earl of Melfort, secretary of James VII., and about the same time, his brother, James Maxwell of Kirkeconnel, was appointed one of the receivers-general of the Customs, &c. (commission dated at Whitehall, Oct. 22, 1686). When, on Dec. 10, 1687, King James, by his royal writ, reduced the number of the receivers-general from four to two, he granted to Kirkeconnel the office of superintendent of the customs, foreign excise, rents, casualties of royal property, and funds allocated for the payment of fees and pensions. The salary was at first £200 but afterwards £300 yearly. The Revolution soon deprived him of all place and pension. He died in or before the year 1699. He had 4 sons and 2 daughters, viz.—1. James, his successor. 2. William, who succeeded James. 3. Alexander. 4. Stephen, Jesuit priest. 5. Agnes. 6. Elizabeth.

The eldest son, James Maxwell of Kirkeconnel, was educated at Douay, and served heir general to his father Dec. 21, 1699, but never otherwise made up his titles. The Lord Advocate cited him and the earl of Nithsdale to appear before the Justice Court in Edinburgh, Feb. 2, 1704, to answer for contravening the acts of parliament against hearing mass and harbouring and concealing Jesuits and priests, and of which "shaking off all fear of God," it was alleged, they were guilty. This did not prevent him from petitioning the government, in that very year, for payment of a balance due to his father as receiver-general. The books of the kirk session of New Abbey in 1705 stigmatised the Maxwells of Kirkeconnel as "a popish family," and warned Protestants not to take domestic service with them. James Maxwell died, without issue, about 1705.

His next brother, William Maxwell, succeeded to Kirkeconnel. Like James, he was educated at Douay, whence he returned to Scotland in 1696. In the inquest by the presbytery into the number of papists in each parish in 1704, William is mentioned as brother of the laird of Kirkeconnel. He was served heir general to his brother James, Feb. 14, 1706, in which year he was called on as an heir to pay his proportion of £137 6s. Scots money for building of the manse of Troqueer. He married, April 29, 1706, Janet, eldest daughter of George Maxwell of Carnsalloch, widow of Colonel John Douglas of Steilhouse, and eventually heiress of Carnsalloch, under the disposition and deed of entail executed by James Maxwell of Carnsalloch, her brother, March 11, 1745. On May 6, 1708, William Maxwell executed a disposition, settling the succession to his estates. On June 15, 1733, he agreed to dispose heritably to William and Robert Birnie 3 merklands of the 12 merklands of Kelton, James Maxwell of Barneleugh, as next Protestant heir to Kirkeconnel, giving his assent thereto, which was probably considered necessary by the purchasers, owing to the penal laws then in force against Roman Catholics. John Maxwell of Barneleugh, and Margaret Young, his spouse, the father and mother of the James Maxwell here mentioned, are both entered as "papists" in the lists made out for the privy council in 1704. William Maxwell of Kirkeconnel died April 13, 1746. John Rigg, sometime tenant in Meikle Knox, and formerly in Townhead, near Kirkeconnel, used to relate that when James Maxwell, his son and heir, went off in 1745 to join Prince Charles, the old man, his father, rejoiced, saying that his son was going in a good cause, and that if he lost his life it would be well spent. He had issue—1. Elizabeth, married, before 1730, to William Maxwell of Mnehes. 2. James, his successor. 3. Agnes. 4. Janet. 5. Mary. 6. George, Jesuit priest. 7. Margaret. 8. William, Jesuit priest. 9. Marion, married John Menzies of Pitfodds. 10. Halbert.

The eldest son, James Maxwell of Kirkeconnel, commenced grammar at Douay college, August 21, 1721, and was distinguished as a student of great genius and persevering diligence. After concluding his course of philosophy, he returned to Scotland in 1728. In 1745, James Maxwell, then younger of Kirkeconnel, took part in the insurrection, and became an officer in the Pretender's service, and of such rank as to have had access to know the most material things that were transacted in the council, though not a member of it." He was, moreover, an "eyewitness of the greatest part of what happened in the field." After the battle of Culloden he escaped to France, and while residing at St. Germain for several years, drew up a "Narrative of Charles, Prince of Wales' Expedition to Scotland in the year 1745" (printed by the Maitland Club, 1811), which he evidently intended for publication. While he thus resided abroad, his mother, Janet Maxwell of Carnsalloch, managed the Kirkeconnel estate to the best advantage, and protected her son's interests as far as in her power. In June 1746, the whole troop horses of St. George's regiment of dragoons were put into the Kirkeconnel policies, besides 40 or 50 galloways belonging to the officers or soldiers; and the tacksmen petitioned Lieutenant-General Bland, commander-in-chief in Scotland, for compensation in consequence. In 1750, James Maxwell of Kirkeconnel ventured to return to Scotland, and built, with bricks made on the property, the modern portion of the front of Kirkeconnel-house. He sold the estate of Carnsalloch, derived from his mother (who died in 1755), to Mr. Alexander Johnston, merchant in London, ancestor of Major-General Johnston of Carnsalloch (1862), and purchased the estate of Mabie. He was a witness in 1755 to the marriage of his sister Marion with John Menzies of Pitfodds. In 1758 he married Mary, youngest daughter of Thomas Riddell of Swinburne Castle. He died July 23, 1762, aged 54 years. "His Narrative," the Maitland Club editor says, "is composed with a remarkable degree of precision and taste, inasmuch as rather to appear the production of a practised litterateur than the work of a private gentleman who merely aimed at giving memoranda of a series of remarkable events which he had chanced to witness." He left 3 sons—1. James. 2. William. 3. Thomas, who died June 1, 1792. The two younger sons were educated at the New College of the Jesuits at Dinant, in France, arriving there Sept. 3, 1771. During his attendance at the medical schools in France, William, the 2d son, imbibed the French revolutionary ideas of the time, and was one of the national guards present at the execution of Louis XVI., Jan. 21, 1793. He afterwards settled as a physician in Dumfries, and was for many years one of the most eminent in Scotland of his profession. He died at Edinburgh, at the house of his relative, John Menzies of Pitfodds, Oct. 13, 1834.

The eldest son, James Maxwell of Kirkeconnel, when very young, was, Nov. 16, 1764, served heir in special to his father, and infest, under a precept from the crown, April 19, 1765, in the lands and barony of Kirkeconnel. He was twice married, 1st, to Clementina Elizabeth Frances, daughter of Simon Seroope of Danby, Yorkshire, without issue; and, 2dly, to Dorothy, daughter of William Witham, Esq., solicitor of Gray's Inn, London, grandson of William Witham of Cliffe, Yorkshire, the marriage contract signed Aug. 29, 1817. He died Feb. 5, 1827, leaving an only daughter, Dorothy Mary Maxwell.

This lady, heiress of Kirkeconnel, was on July 27, 1827, served as nearest and lawful heir of tailzie and provision of the deceased James Maxwell of Kirkeconnel, her father. She married at Southampton, April 17, 1844, her cousin, Robert Shawe James Witham, eldest surviving son of William Witham, solicitor, Gray's Inn, London, and great-grandson of William Witham, Esq. of Cliffe, Yorkshire. The Witham pedigree is given in Burke's Commoners of England, vol. ii. p. 5. This gentleman, as Robert Maxwell Witham, was, with his spouse, duly infest, under a precept of sasine, dated Oct. 29, 1846, contained in a charter of Resignation granted by the crown, in the lands, barony, and fishings of Kirkeconnel, to be holden by them of the crown, in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the heirs of the marriage. The sasine was registered at Edinburgh, Nov. 16, 1846. They had also sasine of the lands of Gillfoot, recorded Feb. 11, 1852. They had 6 sons and 3 daughters. 1. James Robert, died, an infant, May 5, 1845. 2. Frances Mary. 3. and 4. James and Thomas, twins. 5. William Herbert. 6. Janet, died, an infant, May 15, 1853. 7. Maud. 8. Robert Bernard. 9. Aynor Richard.

The Maxwells of Brediland are a branch of the ancient family of the Maxwells of Carlawerock. Crawford, in his History of Renfrewshire, says, "A little towards the north of the castle of Stainley lie the house and lands of Brediland, which have been possessed by the Maxwells of this race for upwards of two hundred years. Their original charter, which I have seen, is granted by Robert, abbot of Paisley, to Thomas Maxwell, designed son of Arthour Maxwell, anno 1488, in the reign of James IV., of whom John Maxwell, now of Brediland, is the lineal heir." This family has furnished some considerable cadets, as the Maxwells of Castlehead, the Maxwells of Merksworth, and the Maxwells of Dalswinton.

Gavin Maxwell of Castlehead, the son of Hugh Maxwell of Brediland, married Janet, a daughter of Cochran of Clippens, a cadet of the family of Dundonald. Of this family the second son (on the failure of the eldest) succeeded to Brediland, which estate is now in that line.

The third son was James Maxwell of Merksworth. He married Janet Leekie, of Croy Leekie, who (through William Campbell of Glenfalloch) was lineally descended from Archibald, 2d earl of Argyll, and from John, 4th earl of Athole. He had a son, Charles, and a daughter, Ann. The son married Anna Maxwell, the heiress of Williamwood. She was lineally descended from James Maxwell of Williamwood, whose sufferings in the cause of the Reformation are so fully and graphically described by Wodrow in his History of the Church. She sold the estate of Williamwood in 1812, and, on her death in 1815, she was succeeded in the representation of both the families of Williamwood and Merksworth by her next sister, Janet, who married James Graham, Esq., merchant, Glasgow, and the two families came thus to be represented by her eldest son, James Maxwell-Graham, Esq. On his death the estate of Merksworth was inherited by his eldest sister, Agnes, whose daughter (by her marriage with James Smith, Esq. of Craigend) married David Stuart, 8th, properly 13th, earl of Buchan.

Ann, the daughter of James Maxwell of Merksworth, married James Black, Esq. of Paisley, the father of the late Mr. Black of Clairmont, near Glasgow, and of others of that name in Glasgow. (See LECKIE, surname.)

MAXWELL, SIR MURRAY, a gallant and distinguished naval officer, was the son of Alexander Maxwell, Esq., merchant in Leith, and grandson of Sir William Maxwell, baronet, of Calderwood. He commenced his career at sea under the auspices of Admiral Sir Samuel Hood, and in 1796 was appointed a lieutenant. He obtained his commission as post-captain in 1803, when he became commander of the Centaur, a third-rate. After serving with distinction in the West Indies, and in the expedition against Surinam, he exchanged, in the summer of 1805, to the Galatea frigate; and was next nominated to the Alceste, 46, in which, with two other ships under his orders, he greatly signalized himself in an attack on a Spanish fleet near Cadiz. In the spring of 1811, when cruising on the coast of Istria, he assisted in the destruction of a French 18-gun brig, in the harbour of Parenza; and towards the close of the same year, after an engagement of two hours and twenty minutes, he captured the French frigate La Pomone, of 44 guns and 322 men. In October 1815, Captain Maxwell, at the particular request of Lord Amherst, who was then about to proceed on his celebrated embassy to China, was appointed to convey him in the Alceste; which sailed from Spithead February 9, 1816, and landed his lordship at the mouth of the Peiho river, on the 9th of August. During Lord Amherst's absence at Peking, the Alceste, accompanied by the Lyra brig and General Hewitt, East Indianman, was employed in a survey of the coasts, in the course of which cruise considerable accessions were made to the knowledge of the hydrographer. Captain Basil Hall, who commanded the Lyra, published, on his return to England, a very interesting narrative of the 'Voyage to Corea and the Island of Loo Choo,' dedicating the volume to Sir Murray Maxwell, "to whose ability in conducting the voyage, zeal in giving encouragement to every inquiry, sagacity in discovering the disposition of the natives, and address in gaining their confidence and good-will," he attributes whatever may be found interesting in his pages.

From this survey Captain Maxwell returned at the beginning of November, and immediately applied to the Chinese authorities for a pass for the Alceste to proceed up the Tigris, to undergo some needful repairs. His request was treated with evasion and delay, and on his attempt to sail without the requisite permission, an inferior mandarin went on board, and desired the ship to be brought to anchor, or the batteries would fire and sink her. Instead of complying with this insolent demand, Captain Maxwell at once detained the mandarin as his prisoner, and issued orders that the Alceste should be steered under the principal fort of the Boeca. On her approach, the batteries, and about eighteen war-junks, opened upon her a heavy, though ill-directed fire; but the return of a single shot silenced the flotilla, and one determined broadside put an end to the ineffectual attack from the batteries. The Alceste proceeded without farther molestation to Whampoa, where she remained until the return of Lord Amherst in January 1817. In consequence of Captain Maxwell's spirited conduct, it was publicly announced by the Chinese, with their usual dissimulation, that the affair at the Boeca Tigris was nothing more than a friendly salute!

On her homeward bound voyage, the Alceste had proceeded as far as the Straits of Gaspar, when, on the 18th February, she struck on a sunken and unknown rock, three miles distant from Pulo Leat. A landing having been effected on that barren island, Lord Amherst and his suite proceeded in the barge and cutter to Batavia, a distance of 200 miles; and after a passage of four nights and three days, in which they suffered much from the scarcity of water and provisions, they happily arrived at their destination. The Company's cruiser Ternate was immediately dispatched to Captain Maxwell, and those who remained with him; but in consequence of contrary currents, she did not arrive for a fortnight. Their situation in the meantime had attracted the notice of the Malay proas, or pirate boats, who had obliged Lieutenant Hinckman and his detachment to quit the wreck, which they had burnt to the water's edge. These boats having increased to about sixty in number, each containing from eight to twelve men, completely blockaded the shipwrecked crew; but on the approach of the Ternate they speedily disappeared. For some days Captain Maxwell had been actively employed in fortifying a hill, and providing his party with ammunition; and so well prepared were they for an attack, that at length they rather wished than dreaded it. Mr. Ellis, the third commissioner of the embassy, who had returned from Batavia in the Ternate, in his published 'Journal,' says, "My expectations of the security of the position were more than realized when I ascended the hill; and many an assailant must have fallen before an entrance could have been effected. Participation of privation, and equal distribution of comfort, had lightened the weight of suffering to all; and I found the universal sentiment to be, an enthusiastic admiration of the temper, energy, and arrangements of Captain Maxwell."

On his return to England he was tried by a court-martial at Portsmouth in August 1817, for the loss of the Alceste, but was most honourably acquitted, the court at the same time declaring that "his coolness, self-collection, and exertions, were highly conspicuous." He received the honour of knighthood May 27, 1818; and May 20, 1819, he was presented by the East India Company with the sum of £1,500 for the services rendered by him to the embassy, and as a remuneration for the loss he had sustained on his return from China. He was appointed to the Bulwark, a third-rate, in June 1821, was removed to the Briton frigate, November 28, 1822, and was afterwards employed on the South American station. In May 1831 he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Prince Edward's Island, and was preparing for his departure, when he died, after a short illness, June 26 of that year.

His portrait, which formed the frontispiece to one of the volumes of the once celebrated Perey Anecdotes, is given on the following page:

MAYNE, JOHN, author of 'The Siller Gun,' and other poems, was born in Dumfries, 26th March 1759, and received his education at the Grammar school of that town, under the learned Dr. Chapman, whose memory he has enlogised in the third canto of his principal poem. On leaving school, he was sent at an early age to learn the business of a printer, and was for some time in the office of the Dumfries Journal. He afterwards removed to Glasgow, with his father's family, who went to reside on a property they had acquired at the head of the Green, near that city. While yet a mere youth, "ere care was born," he began to court the muses, and he had earned a poetical reputation before the publication of the poems of Burns, who, to a little piece of Mayne's, entitled 'Hallow-een,' is understood to have been indebted for the subject of his inimitable poem under the same name.

In 1777 the original of 'The Siller Gun' was written, with the object of describing the celebration of an ancient custom, revived in that year, of shooting for a small silver gun at Dumfries on the king's birth-day. The poem consisted at first of only twelve stanzas, printed at Dumfries on a small quarto page. It was shortly after extended to two cantos, and then to three, and became so popular that it was several times reprinted. In 1808 it was published in four cantos, with notes and a glossary. Another elegant edition, enlarged to five cantos, was published by subscription in 1836. It exhibits many exquisitely painted scenes and sketches of character, drawn from life, and described with the ease and vigour of a true poet. For some time after its first publication, Mr. Mayne contributed various pieces to Ruddiman's Weekly Magazine, among the chief of which was his 'Hallow-een.' He also exchanged verses in print with Telford, the celebrated engineer, like himself a native of Dumfries, who, in his youth, was much attached to the rustic muse.

While he resided at Glasgow, he passed through a regular term of service with the Messrs. Foulis, the printers, of the Glasgow University press, with whom he remained from 1782 to 1787; on the expiry of which he proceeded to London, where he was for many years the printer, editor, and joint proprietor of the Star evening paper, in which not a few of his beautiful ballads were first published. He also contributed lyrical pieces to various of the Magazines, particularly to the Gentleman's Magazine, from 1807 to 1817. His only other poem of any length is one of considerable merit, entitled 'Glasgow,' illustrated with notes, which appeared in 1803, and has gone through several editions. In the same year he printed 'English, Scots, and Irishmen,' a patriotic address to the inhabitants of the united kingdom. He excelled principally in ballad poetry, and his 'Logan Braes,' and 'Helen of Kirkeconnell Lea,' are inferior to no poems of their kind in the language. In private life Mr. Mayne was very unassuming. Allan Cunningham says of him, that "a better or warmer-hearted man never existed." He died at London, at an advanced age, March 14, 1836. He left a son, W. H. Mayne, who held an official situation in the India house.

MELFORT, earl of, a title in the Scottish peerage, conferred in 1686, on the Hon. John Drummond, second son of the third earl of Perth. In 1680 he had been appointed general of the ordnance, and deputy governor of Edinburgh castle, in 1682 treasurer depute, and in September 1684 one of the principal secretaries of state for Scotland, an office which he held during the last persecuting years of the Stuarts. On the accession of James VII., he was, 14th April 1685, created viscount of Melfort in Argyleshire, part of the forfeited estate of the earl of Argyle, with the secondary title of Lord Drummond of Gilstoun. He had married, first, 30th April, 1670, Sophia, daughter and heiress of Margaret Lundin of Lundin, Fifeshire, by the Hon. Robert Maitland, brother of the duke of Lauderdale, and by her had three sons and three daughters. He married, secondly, Euphemia, daughter of Sir Thomas Wallace of Cragie, a lord of session and lord-justice-clerk, and by her had six sons and five daughters. He was created earl of Melfort, viscount of Forth, Lord Drummond of Riebertoun, Castlemains, and Gilstoun, 12th August 1686, the patents of his honours being taken to him and the heirs male of his body of his second marriage, which failing, to the heirs male whatever of his body. The reason of the issue of his first marriage being thus passed over was that he was frustrated by the Lundin family, who were zealous protestants, in his attempt to educate his sons by that marriage in the Romish faith, to which he had become a convert.

On the revival of the order of the Thistle in 1687, Lord Melfort was constituted one of the knights companions thereof. At the Revolution he repaired to the abdicated king in France, and in 1690 attended him to Ireland. By the fallen monarch he was invested with the order of the Garter. Not returning to Scotland within the time limited by law, he was outlawed by the high court of justiciary, 23d July, 1694, and attainted by act of parliament, 2d July 1695. A special clause, however, provided that his forfeiture should in no ways affect or taint the blood of the children of his first marriage with Sophia Lundin. He was created duke de Melfort and count de Lussan in France in 1701, and had the chief administration at St. Germain for several years. He died there in January 1714. His second wife lived to be above 90 years of age, and supported herself in her latter years by keeping one of the two faro tables authorized by Louis XIV.

The eldest son of the second marriage, John, second duke of Melfort, died in 1752. Thomas, the second son, an officer in the service of Charles VI., emperor of Germany, died unmarried, in 1715; William, the third son, abbe-prior of Liege, died in Spain in 1742; Andrew, the fourth son, a colonel of horse in the French service, married a lady named Magdalene Silvia de St. Hermione, described as a lieutenant-general in the French army. (Douglas's Peerage, vol. i. p. 221, Wood's edition.) By her he had a son, designed Count de Melfort, a major-general in the same service. The sixth son, Philip, also an officer in the French army, died of wounds received in the wars of Louis XIV.

The second duke of Melfort married the widow of Henry Fitzjames, duke of Albemarle, natural son of James VII., and had three sons: Thomas, his heir; Lewis, major-general in the French service and colonel of the regiment of royal Scots, on the reduction of which corps he got a pension from the court of France; and John, lieutenant of the guards of the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, with the rank of major-general.

Thomas, the eldest son, third duke of Melfort, had a considerable estate in Lower Languedoc. By a lady of the name of Mary de Berenger, he had four sons and two daughters, but he seems not to have married her till after some of them were born. In 1805, Charles Edward Drummond, styling himself duke of Melfort, the second but eldest surviving son, entered a claim for the estate of Perth. He stated himself to have been born 1st January 1752, although his father was not married to Mary de Berenger till 26th July 1755. His youngest brother, Leon Maurice Drummond, residing in London, fourth son of the third duke, took a protest that he was great-grandson and lawful heir of John duke of Melfort. He married Luce Elizabeth de Longuemarre, and with two daughters had a son, George, born in London, 6th May 1807. This George, duke of Melfort, succeeded his uncle in the French honours in 1840, and in 1841 petitioned the queen for the restoration of the Scottish attainted titles of Perth. In 1848 he proved his descent before the committee of privileges of the house of lords, and was restored in blood by act of parliament in 1853. The same year he was re-invested in the earldom of Perth. (See PERTH, earl of.)

MELGUM, viscount of, a title, now extinct, in the peerage of Scotland, conferred on Lord John Gordon, second son of the first marquis of Huntly, by Charles I. in 1627, with the secondary title of Lord Aboync. He was burnt to death in the castle of Frenedraught, 18th October, 1630 (see vol. ii. p. 271). He had married Lady Sophia Hay, fifth daughter of Francis, ninth earl of Errol, and had an only daughter. The ballad called 'The Burning of Frenedraught,' thus describes her anguish on receiving, by his servant, the intelligence of her lord's fate:

"O wae be to you, George Gordon;
An ill death may you dee,
Sae safe and sound as ye stand there,
And my lord bereaved from me.

'I bade him loup, I bade him come,
I bade him loup to me;
I'd catch him in my arms two,
A foot I should not flee.

He threw me rings from his white fingers,
Which were so long and small,
To give to you his lady fair,
Where you sat in your hall.'

Sophia Hay, Sophia Hay,
O bonnie Sophie was her name;
Her waiting maid put on her clothes,
But I wat she tore them off again."

The courtesy title of Viscount Melgum is held by the eldest son of the earl of Minto, a peerage of the united kingdom, of the creation of 1813, (see vol. ii. p. 132).

MELROSE, earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred, 20th March 1619, on Sir Thomas Hamilton of Drumcairn, an eminent advocate and lord of session. After holding it for eight years he exchanged it for that of earl of Haddington, (see vol. ii. p. 394). Baron Melros, in the peerage of the united kingdom, is the title by which the earls of Haddington have sat in the house of lords since 1827.

MELVILLE, a surname of ancient standing in Scotland, derived from lands of that name in Mid Lothian. Before the middle of the 12th century, a baron of Anglo-Norman lineage, named Male, settled, under David I., on the lands referred to, and called his manor, after himself, Maleville, whence the surname of Melville. Galfrid de Maleville, the first of the family, was vicecomes of Edinburgh castle under Malcolm IV., and justiciary under William the Lion. The family remained in possession of their ancient manor till the reign of Robert II. The original stock then terminating in an heiress, Agnes, she married Sir John Ross of Halkhead, and their descendant was, by James IV., created Lord Ross, in whose family the barony of Melville remained till 1705.

MELVILLE, earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conjoined since 1704 with that of earl of Leven, and conferred, in 1690, on George, fourth Lord Melville, descended from Sir John de Melville of Raith, in Fife, who swore fealty to Edward I. in 1296. Sir John Melville of Raith, the ninth in descent from this baron, was a favourite with James V., by whom he was appointed master-general of the ordnance and captain of the castle of Dunbar. In 1536, and again in 1542, he obtained charters to himself and Helen Napier his wife, of the king's lands of Murdocairnie in Fife. He early joined the party of the Reformation in Scotland, and after suffering from the animosity of Cardinal Bethune, at length fell a victim to his successor in the primacy, Archbishop Hamilton. In 1550 he was tried for high treason, and executed. Calderwood (Hist. of Kirk of Scotland, p. 262) says, "John Melville, laird of Raith in Fife, an aged man, and of great account with King James the Fifth, was beheaded for writing a letter to an Englishman, in favour of a captive, his friend, with whom he was kept as prisoner. Although there was not the least suspicion of anie fault, yitt lost he his head, becaus he was knowne to be one that unfainedlie favoured the truthie, and was a great friend to those that were in the castle of Sanct Andrews, (the conspirators against Cardinal Bethune). The letter, as was alledged, was found in the house of Ormiston. Howsoever it was, the cruel beasts, the bishop of Sanct Andrews and the abbot of Dunfermline, ceased not till his head was strickin from him. They were not content of his death, till he was faulted also, and his patrimonie bestowed upon Hamiltoun, the governor's youngest son." With a daughter, Janet, married to Sir James Kirkaldy of Grange, knight, he had six sons, five of whom were eminent during the reign of Queen Mary and the regencies which followed her resignation of the crown.

The eldest son, John Melville of Raith, was restored to his father's estate by the queen regent about 1553, at the special request of Henry II. of France. He was one of the barons who, in July 1567, subscribed the articles passed in the General Assembly for the support of the Reformed religion and the putting down of popery. The second son, Sir Robert Melville of Murdocairnie, was the first Lord Melville, of whom afterwards. Of Sir James Melville of Hallhill, the third son, an eminent courtier and statesman, a memoir is subsequently given in larger type. William Melville, the fourth son, commendator of Tongland and Kilwinning, was appointed an ordinary lord of session, 14th August, 1587, when he took the title of Lord Tongland. Soon after, he was sent by James VI. to the court of Navarre, to see and report upon the princess, as a wife for the king, and returned with a portrait of the lady, and "a good report of her rare qualities." The marriage, however, did not take place. He was frequently employed as one of the lords commissioners for opening the Scots parliament, and is supposed to have died in the autumn of 1613. He is said, by his brother, in his Memoirs (p. 365), to have been a good scholar, and to have been able to speak perfectly "the Latin, the Dutche, the Flemyn, and the Freneche tongue." Sir Andrew Melville of Garvoek, the fifth son, was master of the household to Queen Mary, and attended her in her last moments at Fotheringay. He was also master of the household to James VI. David Melville of Newmill, the sixth son, was a captain in the army.

To return to the second son, Sir Robert Melville, first Lord Melville,—he was a very eminent character during the reigns of Mary and James. Having gone abroad in his youth, he was much noticed at the court of France, and obtained an honourable employment under Henry II. In 1559 he returned to Scotland, and was sent to England with Maitland of Lethington, to solicit the assistance of Queen Elizabeth for the lords of the congregation. In 1562 he was sworn a privy councillor. After the "Chase-about Raid," in 1665, he was employed by the earl of Moray, one of the principal nobles who opposed Mary's marriage to Darnley, to intercede for his pardon with the queen. Shortly after he was sent to England as ambassador, and on his return he skilfully unravelled to his mistress the crooked policy of Elizabeth and her ministers. (Melville's Memoirs.) After the assassination of Darnley he was reappointed ambassador to England, and again after the marriage of Mary to Bothwell.

When Mary was confined in Lochleven castle, he was sent to her by the earl of Athole and the lairds of Tullibardin and Lethington, her principal councillors, with a ring which she knew to be theirs, advising her to subscribe the resignation of the crown, as it would be held null, being extorted from her by fears of her life. He also conveyed to her a writing from Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, the English ambassador, desiring her to subscribe whatever they required, as what she signed in her captivity could not be held valid, and assuring her of Queen Elizabeth's protection. This afterwards formed the chief ground of Mary's ill-founded reliance on her cousin's promises. On Mary's escape from Lochleven he joined her at Hamilton, and publicly avowed the restraint under which she had acted in resigning the crown.

In the civil war which followed the assassination of the regent Moray, he adhered to the queen's party, and with Kirkaldy of Grange and Maitland of Lethington held out the castle of Edinburgh till its surrender in 1573. He would have shared the fate of Kirkaldy but for the intercession of Killigrew, the English ambassador. During the remainder of the earl of Morton's regency, he appears to have lived in retirement, and in 1579 the benefit of the pacification of Perth was extended to him.

In August 1582, he was appointed treasurer-depute, and in October of the same year knighted. In December 1586, he was sent by James VI., with the master of Gray, to England to entreat Queen Elizabeth for his mother's life. This duty he performed with fidelity and zeal. According to his brother's account, "he spak brave and stout language to the consaill of England, sa that the quen herself boisted him of his lyf;" and he would have been afterwards detained prisoner, but for the interest of the master of Gray. (Melville's Memoirs, p. 357.) In 1589, when James sailed for Norway, to bring over his queen, Sir Robert Melville was made vice-chancellor of the kingdom, and he received the grateful thanks of his majesty, on his return, for the way in which he had managed matters in his absence. On 7th June 1593, he was again sent ambassador to England. On 11th June 1594, he was admitted an extraordinary lord of session, and took his seat on the bench as Lord Murdocairnie. The king's letter of nomination states that his majesty had "experience of the faithful servie done to us at all tymes" by Sir Robert, "and how willing he is to discharge his dewtie therein to our honour and well of our realm and lieges thereof." (Books of Sederunt.) He resigned his office of treasurer-depute in January 1596, in consequence of the appointment of the Octavians, as the eight commissioners of the treasury were called, at which time the king was largely in his debt. In 1597, an act was passed by which his majesty, with advice of the Estates, promised to pay the balance due, and prohibited any diligence being executed at the instance of his creditors against him, until he should be so paid. (Act. Parl. vol. iv.

p. 147.) On 26th February 1601, he resigned his seat on the bench in favour of his son, and in 1604 he was appointed one of the commissioners for the projected union between the two kingdoms. He was raised to the peerage by the title of Lord Melville of Monimail, 30th April 1616, and died in 1621, at the advanced age of 94.

His only son, Robert, second Lord Melville, was a privy councillor to King James, by whom he was knighted, and in February 1601, on the resignation of his father, he was appointed an extraordinary lord of session, by the title of Lord Burntisland. He was removed in February 1626, when an entire change of the extraordinary lords took place. He was also a privy councillor to Charles I., and one of the royal commissioners to open the parliament of Scotland, 18th June 1633. In that assembly he energetically, though unsuccessfully, opposed the act for conferring on the king the power of regulating ecclesiastical habits, and addressing the king, then present, he exclaimed aloud, "I have sworn with your father and the whole kingdom to the Confession of Faith, in which the innovations intended by these articles were solemnly abjured." He died at Edinburgh, without issue, 9th March 1635, and was succeeded by his cousin, John Melville of Raith, third Lord Melville, whose brother, Thomas Melville, acquired from him the lands of Murdoearnie, and was ancestor of the Melvilles of Murdoearnie.

The third Lord Melville died in 1643. His elder son George, fourth lord, and first earl of Melville, in consequence of his known liberal principles, found it necessary to retire to the continent on the detection of the Rye-house plot in 1683, although he had no connexion with that conspiracy. In June 1685, he accompanied the duke of Monmouth when he landed at Lyme from Holland, and on the failure of his attempt to overturn the government of his uncle James VII., Lord Melville again escaped to the continent. His estates were forfeited by act of attainder the same year.

In 1688 he came over to England with William, prince of Orange, and, immediately after, his forfeiture was rescinded. On 8th April 1690, he was created earl of Melville, viscount of Kirkealdy, Lord Raith, Monimail, and Balwearie. The same year he was appointed sole secretary of state for Scotland, and constituted high commissioner to the Scots parliament. As high commissioner also to the parliament which met in September following, he gave the royal assent to the act for abolishing patronage. In 1691 he resigned the office of secretary of state, and was appointed keeper of the privy seal, an office which he held till 1696, when he became president of the council. He died in 1707. By his countess, Catherine, daughter of Alexander, Lord Balgonie, son of the renowned military commander, Alexander Leslie, first earl of Leven, he had three sons and one daughter. His eldest son, Alexander, Lord Raith, a nobleman of considerable talent, was appointed treasurer depute of Scotland in 1689, and died, without issue, before his father in 1698.

The second son, David, second earl of Melville, succeeded, on the death of his mother in 1713, to the earldom of Leven. (See LEVEN, earl of.) The titles were thenceforth conjoined.

MELVILLE, viscount of, a title in the peerage of the united kingdom, conferred, with the secondary title of baron Dunira, in the county of Perth, December 21st, 1802, on the Right Hon. Henry Dundas, a distinguished statesman, a memoir of whom is given at vol. ii. page 97. By his first wife, Elizabeth, daughter of David Rennie, Esq., who had purchased Melville Castle, Mid Lothian, which he bestowed, with his daughter, on his son-in-law, he had one son and three daughters. A second marriage was without issue.

His son, Robert, second Viscount Melville, was born in 1771. He was educated at the High school of Edinburgh, and Emmanuel College, Cambridge. One of his school companions at the former was Sir Walter Scott, neither of them being then titled, his friendship with whom was strengthened by their subsequent service together in the Mid Lothian yeomanry. In 1802 he was chosen M.P. for Mid Lothian, for which he was subsequently five times re-elected. The question of his father's impeachment caused him to take a frequent part in the debates in parliament in 1805 and 1806. On the change of ministry in March 1807, when the duke of Portland became premier, Mr. Dundas entered office as president of the board of control, and was sworn a member of the privy council. In 1809, when Sir Arthur Wellesley, afterwards the duke of Wellington, was called from the Irish chief secretaryship to take the command of the British armies in Spain, Mr. Dundas was appointed his successor, and was enrolled in the privy council of Ireland. In January 1810, soon after the formation of Mr. Spencer Percival's administration, he returned to the presidency of the board of control.

The sudden death of his father, on 29th May 1811, gave him a place in the house of peers. The same year he was appointed keeper of the privy seal of Scotland, a sinecure office which expired with him. On the formation of a new ministry, having the earl of Liverpool at its head, in the summer of 1812, the office of first lord of the admiralty, with a seat in the cabinet, was assigned to Viscount Melville, and he continued at the head of that department for fifteen years. In 1814 he was elected chancellor of the university of St. Andrews. Nominated in 1821 one of the four extra knights of the Thistle, on the enlargement of the order in 1827 he was enrolled one of the ordinary knights. On the accession of Mr. Canning to power in the latter year, his lordship retired from office, declining a seat in the cabinet. When the duke of Wellington formed his administration in January 1828, Viscount Melville resumed his place at the head of the admiralty. With the dissolution of the Wellington ministry in November 1830, his lordship's official career terminated. He was a member of the royal commission of 1826-30 for the visitation of the Scottish universities; in 1815-4, of the royal commission for inquiry into the operation of the poor-law in Scotland, and in 1817, of the prison board for Scotland. He was also keeper of the signet, a deputy-lieutenant of the counties of Edinburgh and Linlithgow, one of the commissioners of the board of trustees for manufactures in Scotland, one of the commissioners for the custody of the Scottish regalia, a lieutenant-general of the royal company of archers in Scotland, an elder brother of the Trinity house, governor of the Bank of Scotland, &c. He died at Melville castle, Mid Lothian, 10th June, 1851, in his 80th year.

His lordship married, in August 1796, Anne, daughter and co-heiress of Richard Huck Saunders, M.D., grand-niece of Admiral Sir Charles Saunders, K.B. On his marriage he assumed the name of Saunders before his own. He had four sons and two daughters.

The eldest son, Henry, third Viscount Melville, born in 1801, entered the army in 1819, and became a major-general in 1854. He commanded the 83d foot during the insurrection in Upper Canada in 1837-8, and was for a short time aide-de-camp to the queen. At the battle of Gujerat in India, he commanded a brigade, and for his services he received the order of the Bath and the thanks of parliament and of the East India Company. In 1853 he was appointed to command the Sirhind division of the Indian army, and from 1854 to 1860 was commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland; colonel of 100th regiment of foot; unmarried.

The 2d son, Vice-admiral the Hon. Richard Saunders Dundas, C.B., succeeded Admiral Sir Charles Napier in the command of the Baltic fleet, in the war with Russia, in 1855; and commanded at the bombardment of Sweaborg, Aug. 9 of that year. Born June 11, 1802, he entered the navy June 15, 1817, as a volunteer on board the Ganymede, 26 guns, and remained midshipman of that ship and of the Owen Glendower until Dec. 1820, on the Mediterranean and South American stations. He became lieutenant 18th June, 1821, and post-captain 17th July, 1824. In the Melville, 72, he took part in the campaign in China. During this service he received the warm thanks of Sir Gordon Bremer for his conduct at the capture of Ty-cock-tow, as well as at that of the forts of the Bocca Tigris. In 1828-29-30 he was private secretary to his father, then first lord of the admiralty. In 1845 he held the same office under the earl of Haddington, the first lord of that period. In 1841 the military companionship of the Bath was conferred upon him for his services in China. In 1851 he was appointed superintendent of Deptford dockyard. Rear-admiral of the blue 1853; rear-admiral of the white 1855; in 1858 he became vice-admiral of the blue; one of the lords of the admiralty from 1852 to 1855. He died suddenly, June 3, 1861. The 3d son, the Hon. Robert Dundas, born in 1803, storekeeper-general of the navy. The 4th son, the Hon. and Rev. Charles Dundas, rector of Epworth, born Sept. 10, 1806, married, in 1833, Louisa Maria, daughter of Sir William Boothby, issue, 3 sons and 7 daughters.

MELVILLE, SIR JAMES, an eminent courtier, son of Sir John Melville of Raith, was born in Fifeshire about 1535. At the age of 14 he was sent to Paris by the queen-mother, under the protection of the French ambassador, to be a page of honour to the youthful Mary, queen of Scots, then the consort of the dauphin of France. In May 1553, by the permission of his royal mistress, he entered the service of the constable of France, and was present at the siege of St. Quentin, where the constable was wounded and taken prisoner, and he seems to have attended him in his captivity. After the peace he visited his native country in 1559, on a sort of secret mission, to ascertain the state of parties in Scotland. He afterwards travelled on the continent, and remained three years at the court of the elector palatine, who employed him in various negotiations with the German princes. In May 1564 he returned to Scotland, having been recalled by Mary, by whom he was appointed gentleman of the bedchamber, and nominated one of her privy councillors. Soon after he was sent on an embassy to Elizabeth, relative to Mary's proposed marriage with Darnley, and in June 1566 he was again dispatched to the English court with the intelligence of the birth of the prince, afterwards James VI. He maintained a correspondence in England in favour of Mary's succession to the crown of that kingdom; but venturing to remonstrate with her on her unhappy partiality for Bothwell, the queen communicated his admonitions to the latter, and the faithful Melville was, in consequence, obliged for some time to retire from court. He was, however, present at the ill-starred nuptials of Mary to that nobleman, and he continued her confidential servant as long as she remained in Scotland. He appears to have had a high idea of his own importance, and occasionally in his Memoirs blames himself for the unfortunate propensity, which he says he possessed, of finding fault with the proceedings of the great.

By James VI., to whom he was recommended by his unfortunate mother, and who continued him in his offices of privy councillor and gentleman of the bedchamber to his queen, Anne of Denmark, he was intrusted with various honourable employments. On the accession of King James to the English throne, he declined to accompany him to England, but afterwards paid his majesty a visit of duty, when he was graciously received. On account of his age he retired from the public service, and occupied his remaining years in writing the 'Memoirs' of his life for the use of his son. He died November 1, 1607. His manuscript, accidentally found in the castle of Edinburgh in 1660, and which affords minute and curious descriptions of the manners of the times, was published in 1683, by Mr. George Scott, under the title of 'Memoirs of Sir James Melvil of Hallhill, containing an impartial Account of the most remarkable Affairs of State during the last Age, not mentioned by other Historians;' republished in 1735. He had acquired the estate of Hallhill, in the parish of Collessie, Fifeshire, from the celebrated Henry Balnaves, (see vol. i. page 229). It remained the property of his descendants till the reign of Charles II., when it was purchased by Lord Melville.

MELVILLE, ANDREW, one of the most illustrious of the Scottish Reformers, whose name is second only to that of John Knox, was the youngest of nine sons of Richard Melville of Baldovoy, near Montrose, where he was born August 1, 1545. His father lost his life in the battle of Pinkie, when Andrew was only two years old, and his mother dying soon after, he was brought up under the care of his eldest brother, afterwards minister of Maryton, who, at a proper age, sent him to the grammar school of Montrose. Having acquired there a thorough knowledge of the classics, he was, in 1559, removed to the university of St. Andrews, where his great proficiency, especially in the Greek language, excited the astonishment of his teachers. On completing the usual academical course he left college with the character of being "the best philosopher, poet, and Grecian, of any young master in the land." In 1564 he went to France, and remained for two years at the university of Paris. He next proceeded to Poitiers, for the purpose of studying the civil law, and was elected regent or professor in the college of St. Marceon. After continuing there for three years, he repaired to Geneva on foot, carrying only a Hebrew Bible at his belt, and the fame of his great attainments having preceded him, by the influence of Beza he obtained the humanity chair in the academy, at that time vacant.

In July 1574 he returned to Scotland, after an absence of ten years. Beza, in his letter to the General Assembly, wrote that the greatest token of affection the kirk of Geneva could show to Scotland was that they had suffered themselves to be spoiled of Mr. Andrew Melville, that thereby the kirk of Scotland might be enriched. On his arrival in Edinburgh, he was invited by the Regent Morton to enter his family as a domestic tutor, but he preferred an academic life to a residence at court, and declined the invitation. Shortly afterwards he was appointed by the General Assembly principal of the university of Glasgow, which, under his charge, from the improved plan of study and discipline introduced by him, speedily acquired a high reputation as a seat of learning. Besides his duties in the university, he officiated as minister of the church of Govan, in the vicinity. As a member of the General Assembly, he took a prominent part in all the measures of that body against episcopacy; and as he was unflinching in his opposition to that form of church government, he received the name of "Episcopomastix," or 'The Scourge of Bishops.' A remarkable instance of his intrepidity occurred at an interview, which took place in October 1577, between him and the Regent Morton, when the latter, irritated at the proceedings of the Assembly, exclaimed, "There will never be quietness in this country till half a dozen of you be hanged or banished!" "Hark! Sir," said Melville, "threaten your courtiers after that manner! It is the same to me whether I rot in the air, or in the ground. The earth is the Lord's. Patria est ubicunque est bene. I have been ready to give up my life where it would not have been half so well wared, at the pleasure of my God. I have lived out of your country ten years, as well as in it. Let God be glorified, it will not be in your power to hang or exile his truth." This bold language Morton did not venture to resent.

Melville was moderator of the General Assembly which met at Edinburgh 24th April 1578, in which the second Book of Discipline was approved of. The attention of the Assembly was about this time directed to the reformation and improvement of the universities, and Melville was, in December 1580, removed from Glasgow, and installed principal of St. Mary's college, St. Andrews. Here, besides giving lectures in divinity, he taught the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, and Rabbinical languages, and his prelections were attended, not only by young students in unusual numbers, but also by some of the masters of the other colleges. He was moderator of the Assembly which met at St. Andrews 24th April 1582, and also of an extraordinary meeting of the Assembly, convened at Edinburgh 27th June thereafter, in consequence of the arbitrary measures of the court, in relation particularly to the case of Robert Montgomery, the excommunicated archbishop of Glasgow. He opened the proceedings with a sermon, in which he boldly inveighed against the absolute authority claimed by the government in ecclesiastical matters. A spirited remonstrance being agreed to by the Assembly, Melville and others were appointed to present it to the king, then with the court at Perth. When the remonstrance was read before his majesty in council, the king's unworthy favourite, the earl of Arran, menacingly exclaimed, "Who dare subscribe these treasonable articles?" "We dare," said the undaunted Melville, and taking a pen, immediately signed his name. His example was followed by the other commissioners, and so much were Lennox and Arran overawed by their intrepidity, that they dismissed them peaceably.

For about three years Melville had preached, assisted by his nephew, in the parish church of St. Andrews. In February 1584 he was cited before the privy council, to answer a charge of treason, founded on some seditious expressions, which it was alleged he had made use of in a sermon on the 4th chapter of Daniel, on the occasion of a fast kept during the preceding month; particularly that he had compared the king's mother to Nebuchadrezzar, who was banished from the kingdom, and would be restored again. At his appearance, he denied using these words, entered into a full defence of those he had actually used, and presented a protest and declination, claiming to be tried by the ecclesiastical court. When brought before the king and council, he boldly told them that they had exceeded their jurisdiction in judging of the doctrine, or calling to account any of the ambassadors or messengers of a king and council greater than they, and far above them. Then loosing a little Hebrew bible from his belt, and throwing it on the table before them, he said, "That you may see your weakness, oversight, and rashness, in taking upon you that which neither you ought nor can do, there are my instructions and warrant. Let me see which of you can judge of them or control me therein, that I have passed by my injunctions." Arran, finding the book in Hebrew, put it into the king's hands, saying, "Sir, he scorns your majesty and council." "No, my lord," replied Melville, "I scorn not, but with all earnestness, zeal, and gravity, I stand for the cause of Jesus Christ and his church." Not being able to prove the charge against him, and unwilling to let him go, the council declared him guilty of declining their jurisdiction, and of behaving irreverently before them, and sentenced him to be imprisoned in the castle of Edinburgh, and to be further punished in his person and goods at the pleasure of the king. Before, however, being charged to enter himself in ward, his place of confinement was ordered to be changed to Blackness castle, which was kept by a dependant of Arran. While at dinner the king's mace was admitted and gave him the charge to enter within 24 hours; but he avoided being sent there by secretly withdrawing from Edinburgh. After staying some time at Berwick, he proceeded to London, and in the ensuing July visited the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, at both of which he was received in a manner becoming his learning and reputation.

On the disgrace of the earl of Arran, Melville returned to Scotland with the banished lords, in November 1585. Having assisted in re-organizing the college of Glasgow, he resumed, in the following March, his duties at St. Andrews. The synod of Fife, which met in April, proceeded to excommunicate Adamson, archbishop of St. Andrews, for his attempts to overturn the presbyterian form of government in the church; and, in return, that prelate issued a sentence of excommunication against Melville, and his nephew, James Melville, with others of their brethren. In consequence of this difference with the archbishop, Melville received a written mandate from the king to confine his residence to the north of the Tay, and he was not restored to his office in the university till the following August. Some time after, when Adamson had been deprived of his archbishopric, and was reduced to great poverty, finding himself deserted by the king, he addressed a letter to his former antagonist, Melville, expressing regret for his past conduct, and soliciting his assistance. Melville hastened to visit him, and not only procured contributions for his relief among his friends, but continued for several months to support him from his own resources.

In June 1587, Melville was again elected moderator of the Assembly, and nominated one of the commissioners for attending to the proceedings in parliament. He was present at the coronation of the queen, May 17, 1590, and recited a Latin poem composed for the occasion, which was immediately published at the desire of the king. In the same year he was elected rector of the university of St. Andrews, an office which, for a series of years, he continued to hold by re-election. In May 1594 he was again elected moderator of the Assembly. Shortly after, he appeared on behalf of the church before the lords of the articles, and urged the forfeiture of the popish lords, and along with his nephew and two other ministers, he accompanied the king, at his express request, on his expedition against them. In the following year, when it was proposed to recall the popish nobles from exile, he went with some other ministers to the convention of estates at St. Andrews, to remonstrate against the design, but was ordered by the king to withdraw, which he did, after a most resolute reply. The commission of the Assembly having met at Cupar in Fife, they sent Melville and some other members to expostulate with the king. Being admitted to a private audience, James Melville began to address his majesty with great mildness and respect; but the king becoming impatient, charged them with sedition, on which Andrew took him by the sleeve, and calling him "God's silly vassal," said, "This is not a time to flatter, but to speak plainly, for our commission is from the living God, to whom the king is subject. We will always humbly reverence your majesty in public, but having opportunity of being with your majesty in private, we must discharge our duty, or else be enemies to Christ: And now, Sire, I must tell you that there are two kingdoms—the kingdom of Christ, which is the church, whose subject King James VI. is, and of whose kingdom he is not a head, nor a lord, but a member; and they whom Christ hath called, and commanded to watch over his church, and govern his spiritual kingdom, have sufficient power and authority from him so to do, which no Christian king nor prince should control or discharge, but assist and support, otherwise they are not faithful subjects to Christ." The king listened patiently to this bold admonition, and dismissed them with many fair promises which he never intended to fulfil. For several years following King James made repeated attempts to control the church, according to his own arbitrary notions, but he invariably encountered a strenuous opponent in Andrew Melville; and he had recourse at last to one of those stratagems which he thought the very essence of "king-craft," to secure the removal of this champion of presbyterianism from Scotland altogether. In May 1606, Melville, with his nephew, and six of their brethren, were called to London by a letter from the king, on the specious pretext that his majesty wished to consult them as to the affairs of the church. Soon after their arrival they attended the famous conference held September 23, in presence of the king at Hampton Court, at which Melville spoke at great length, and with a boldness which astonished the English nobility and clergy. On St. Michael's day, Melville and his brethren were commanded to attend the royal chapel, when, scandalized at the popish character of the service, on his return to his lodging he vented his indignation in a Latin epigram,* for which, a copy having been conveyed to the king, he was brought before the council at Whitehall. Being by them found guilty of "scandalum magnatum," he was committed first to the custody of the dean of St. Paul's, and afterwards to the charge of the bishop of Winchester; but was ultimately sent to the Tower, where he remained a prisoner for four years.

At first he was treated with the utmost rigour, and denied even the use of pen, ink, and paper; but his spirit remained unsubdued, and he beguiled his solitary hours by composing Latin verses, which, with the tongue of his shoe buckle, he engraved on his prison walls. By the interference of some friends at court, his confinement was, after the lapse of nearly ten months, rendered less severe. About the end of 1607 the protestants of Rochelle endeavoured to obtain his services as professor of divinity in their college, but the king would not consent to his liberation. At length, in February 1611, at the intercession of the duke of Bouillon, he was released from confinement, on condition of his becoming professor of theology in the protestant university of Sedan, in France, where he spent the remainder of his life, and died there in 1622, at the advanced age of 77.

Cur stant clausi Anglii libri duo regia in ara, Lumina cæca duo, pollubra siccæ duo?
Nun sensum euitumque Dei tenet Anglia clausum, Lumine cæca suo, sorde sepulta sua?
Romano an ritu, dum regalem instruit aram,
Purpuream pingit religiosa lupam?

Thus rendered in an old translation:

Why stand there on the altar high
Two closed books, blind lights, two basins dry?
Doth England hold God's mind and worship close,
Blind of her sight, and buried in her dross?
Doth she, with chapel put in Romish dress,
The purple whore religiously express?

And for this Melville was sent to the Tower!

His biographer, Dr. M'Crie, says that Andrew Melville "was the first Scotsman who added a taste for elegant literature to an extensive acquaintance with theology." Although he sustained a conspicuous part in all the important public transactions of his time, he neither was nor affected to be the leader of a party. In private he was an agreeable companion, remarkable for his cheerfulness and kindness of disposition. He was never married. Beyond the statement that he was of low stature there is no description of his personal appearance extant, nor is there any known portrait of him.

The greater part of his writings consists of Latin poems. Dr. M'Crie, whose Life of Andrew Melville was published in 1824, in 2 vols. 8vo, has given the names of all his works, printed and left in manuscript, and there is none of any great extent among them. The subjoined list has been made up from his account.

Carmin Mosis,—Andrea Melvino Scoto Avctore. Basilæ. 1573, 8vo. This, his earliest publication, consisted of a poetical paraphrase of the Song of Moses, and a chapter of the Book of Job, with several small poems, all in Latin.

Pro supplicii Evangelicorum Ministrorum in Angliâ—Apologia, sive Anti-Tami-Cami-Categoria. 1604. A petition had been presented to the king by the English Puritans, commonly called, from the number of names attached to it, the millenary petition, for redress of their grievances, which was opposed by the universities of Cambridge and Oxford. This satirical poem, attacking the resolutions of the universities, was written by Melville, in defence of the petitioners, and circulated extensively in England.

Select Psalms turned into Latin verse, and printed (probably at London while he was in the Tower) in 1609.

Nescimus Quid Vesper Servs Vehat. Satyra Menippæa Vincentii Liberii Hollandii. 1619. 4to. Another edition 1620. Ascribed to Melville.

67. John Adamson, afterwards principal of the college of Edinburgh, was employed in collecting Melville's fugitive poems, but it is uncertain whether he or Calderwood was the publisher of the Muse. Melville himself was not consulted in the publication of them, nor was he, says Dr. M'Crie, the author, as has often been inaccurately stated, of the tracts added to them.

Andrea Melvini Scotiæ Topographia. This poem is prefixed to the Theatrum Scotiæ in Beau's Atlas.

Melville contributed largely to a collection of poems, by Scotchmen and Zealanders, 'In Obitum Johannis Wallasi Scoto Belgæ. Ludg. Batav. 1603.' 4to. There are two poems by him in John Johnston's 'Sidera Veteris Ævi,' p. 33. Salmurii, 1611. He has also verses prefixed to 'Comment. in Apost. Acta M. Joannis Malcolmi Scoti.—Middleb.' 1615.

Among his works in MS. Dr. M'Crie enumerates the following:

D. Andrea Melvini epistolæ Londino e turri carceris ad Jacobum Melvinum Nouocastri exulante scriptæ, cum eisdem Jacobi nonnullis ad eundem. Annis supra inillesimū sexcentesimo octavo, nono, decimo, undecimo. Item Ecclesiæ Scoticanæ Oratio Apologetica ad Regem An. 1610, mense Aprilis. This volume is in the library of the university of Edinburgh. It brings down the correspondence between Melville and his nephew, Mr. James Melville, till the end of the year 1613.

Six Letters from Andrew Melville to Robert Dury at Leyden. In Bibl. Jurid. Edin. M. 6. 9. num. 42.

Floretum Archiepiscopale; id est, errores Pontificii, assertiones temerariæ, et hyperbolice interpretationes. Ibid. num. 47. They are extracted from Archbishop Adamson's academical prelections at St. Andrews, in Melville's handwriting, and subscribed by him.

Paraphrasis Epistolæ ad Hebræos Andrea Melvini (Harl. MSS. num. 6947-9); a metrical paraphrase of the epistle to the Hebrews.

A. Melvinus in cap. 4 Danielis. In Bibl. Col. S. Trinit. Dublin.

There are verses by him, in his own handwriting, among the Sempill papers, and in a collection of Letters from Learned Men to James VI. His biographer says that copies of Melville's large 'Answer to Downham's Sermon' were at one time not uncommon. Four letters from Melville to David Hume of Godscroft are prefixed to the 'Lusus Poetici' of the latter.

The manuscript of 'Commentarius in Divinam Pauli Epistolam ad Romanos, auctore Andrea Melvino Scoto,' in possession of Mr. David Laing, Librarian to the Writers to the Signet, was published for the first time, with an English translation, in one of the volumes issued by the Wodrow Society, under the editorial care of the Rev. David Dickson, D.D., minister of St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh.

MELVILLE, JAMES, an eminent divine and scholar, nephew of the preceding, was the son of Richard Melville of Baldovy, minister of Maryton, Forfarshire, by his spouse, Isabel Scrimgeour, and was born July 25, 1556. After receiving his school education at Logic and Montrose, he was, in November 1571, sent to St. Leonard's college, St. Andrews, where he studied for four years. It is recorded of him that, first when he attended the lectures, which were delivered in Latin, he was so mortified at not being able to understand them, that he burst into tears before the whole class; which induced his regent, or professor, William Collace, to give him private instructions in the Latin language. His father intended him for the law, but James had a strong predilection for the church, and as a practical intimation of his desires, he composed a sermon, and placed it carefully in one of the Commentaries which his father was in the habit of consulting. The stratagem succeeded; and on the arrival of his uncle, Mr. Andrew Melville, from the continent, he was put under his charge, when he revised, under his directions, both his classical and philosophical education. He accompanied his uncle to Glasgow, in October 1574, on his becoming principal of that university, and in the following year James Melville was elected one of the regents, as the professors were then called. He was the first regent in Scotland who read the Greek authors to his class in the original language. In 1577 he was appointed teacher of mathematics, logic, and moral philosophy, at Glasgow; and while he continued in this capacity, having strictly admonished the afterwards celebrated Mark Alexander Boyd for his irregularities, he was assaulted by him and his cousin, Alexander Cunninghame, a relation of the earl of Glencairn, for which Cunninghame was obliged, bareheaded and barefooted, to crave pardon publicly.

When Andrew Melville was translated to the New College of St. Andrews in December 1580, he took along with him his nephew, who was admitted professor of the oriental languages there. He also divided with his uncle the duty of preaching in the town during the vacancy in the parish church. Amid all the difficulties which Andrew Melville had to encounter, he found an able and useful coadjutor in his nephew, upon whom, when the former, in 1584, fled to England, the management of the affairs of the college chiefly devolved. He taught theology from his uncle's chair, besides continuing his own lectures, and undertaking the management of the revenues of the college and the board of the students. In May of that year, after the parliament had decreed the overthrow of the presbyterian form of church government, Archbishop Adamson of St. Andrews obtained a warrant for James Melville's apprehension, for corresponding with his uncle, of which being apprised in time, he escaped to Dundee, whence he proceeded, in the disguise of a shipwrecked seaman, in an open boat to Berwick. He was soon after joined by his wife, who was a daughter of John Dury, minister of Edinburgh. Being invited by the earls of Angus and Mar, then in exile at Newcastle, to go and preach to them, he at first refused, because, as he says himself, he was not entered in the ministry, neither was he of any experience of knowledge in their matters, being but a young man brought up in the schools, and therefore had resolved to keep his own calling. The truth was, however, that he was afraid to have anything to do with them, being the king's rebels, and not knowing their cause well and disposition of heart. (Diary, p. 120). On reaching Newcastle, on his way to London, he was persuaded to remain, and accordingly entered on his ministerial labours. While with the banished lords he drew up a letter and order of discipline for their guidance, and at their request an account of the abuses and corruption of the kirk and commonweal of Scotland; also a letter to the ministers in Scotland who had subscribed to the supremacy of the king and the bishops, all of which will be found in Calderwood (vol. iv.) In February 1585, on the exiled lords proceeding to London, he returned to Berwick, where he had left his wife, who had there borne a son, and soon after followed the former to the capital. After the taking of the castle of Stirling, he returned, in the ensuing November, to Scotland, and in March 1586, resumed the duties of his professorship at St. Andrews, when he occupied himself in setting the college affairs in order.

James Melville's zeal in behalf of the church, though less impetuous than that of his uncle, was equally uniform and consistent; and he could, when occasion required, evince similar intrepidity. In the beginning of April 1586, he preached the opening sermon at the meeting of the synod of Fife, in the course of which, turning towards Archbishop Adamson, who was present, he charged him with attempting the overthrow of the presbyterian church, and exhorted the brethren to cut off so corrupt a member from among them. The archbishop was in consequence excommunicated, but he retaliated by excommunicating both Andrew and James Melville, and other obnoxious ministers, in return. For their share in this transaction, uncle and nephew were summoned before the king, who commanded the former to confine himself beyond the Tay, and the latter to remain within his college.

In July 1586, James Melville became, at the solicitation of the people, minister of Anstruther, to which were conjoined the adjoining parishes of Pittenweem, Aberrombie, and Kilrenny. Having some time after succeeded in procuring a disjunction of these parishes, and provided a minister for each of them, he undertook the charge of Kilrenny alone, where, besides building a manse, he purchased the right to the vicarage and tithe-fish, for the support of himself and his successors, and paid the salary of a schoolmaster. He likewise maintained an assistant to perform the duties of the parish, as he was frequently engaged in the public affairs of the church. Some years afterwards he printed for the use of his people a catechism, which cost him five hundred merks.

In 1588 he was the means of affording shelter and relief to a number of distressed Spaniards who had belonged to the Armada destined for the invasion of England, but whose division of the squadron, after being driven to the northward, had been wrecked on the Fair Isle, where they had suffered the extremities of hunger and fatigue, and had at last taken refuge off the harbour of Anstruther.

At the opening of the General Assembly at Edinburgh, in August 1590, he preached a sermon from 1 Thess. v. 12, 13, in which, after insisting on the necessity of maintaining the strictest discipline, he exhorted his hearers to a more zealous support of the presbyterian establishment, and recommended a supplication to the king for a full and free assembly.

In the spring of 1594 he was unjustly suspected at court of having furnished the turbulent earl of Bothwell with money collected for the protestants of Geneva, and at the meeting of the Assembly in May of that year, some of the brethren thought that as he was a suspected person he should not be sent as one of the commissioners from the church to the king as usual; on which he stood up and said that he had often been employed on commissions against his will, but now, even for the reason alleged, he would request it as a benefit from the brethren that his name should be on the list, that he might have an opportunity of clearing himself, and if they declined sending him, he was determined to go to court himself, to see if any one had aught to say against him. He was accordingly included among the commissioners. On their arrival at Stirling, where the king was, they were most graciously received. After they had executed their business with the king, James Melville stepped forward and requested to be informed if his majesty had anything to lay to his charge? The king replied that he had nothing to say against him more than against the rest, except that he found his name on every commission. He answered that he thanked God that this was the case, for therein he was serving God, his kirk, and the king publicly, and as for any private, unlawful, or undutiful practice, if there were any that had traduced him to his majesty as being guilty of such, he requested that they should be made to show their faces when he was there to answer for himself. But no reply was made. After this the king took him into his cabinet, and having dismissed his attendants, conversed with him alone on a variety of topics with the greatest affability and familiarity. He sent his special commendations to his uncle, Mr. Andrew Melville, and declared that he looked upon both of them as faithful and trusty subjects. "So," says James Melville, "of the strange working of God, I that came to Stirling the traitor, returned to Edinburgh a great courtier, yea, a cabinet councillor." (Diary, p. 212.)

With his uncle and two other ministers he accompanied the king, in October 1594, in his expedition to the north, against the popish lords, and when the royal forces were about to disperse, for want of pay, James Melville was sent to Edinburgh and other principal towns, with letters from the king and the ministers, to raise contributions for their aid. In this service he was successful. For ten years subsequently, the life of James Melville was principally distinguished by his zealous and unwearied opposition to the designs of the court for the re-establishment of episcopacy, which he early had the discernment to detect.

He went with his uncle to London in September 1606, when, with six other ministers, they were invited thither to confer with the king, as was the pretext, as to the measures best calculated to promote the tranquillity of the church. After the committal of Andrew Melville to the tower, (see page 125,) James was ordered to leave London in six days and confine himself to Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and ten miles round it. Previous to his departure he made an unsuccessful attempt to obtain some relaxation of his uncle's confinement. He left London 2d July 1607, and went by sea to Newcastle, and during his residence in that town several attempts were made to gain him over to the support of the king's views; but neither promises nor threats could shake his attachment to presbyterianism. He even rejected a bishopric, which was offered to him by Sir William, or, as Dr. M'Crie calls him, Sir John Anstruther, in the name of the king. Having been a widower for about two years, he took for his second wife, while in exile at Newcastle, the daughter of the vicar of Berwick. He was afterwards ordered to remove to Carlisle, and subsequently to Berwick, where he wrote his 'Apology for the Church of Scotland,' which was not published till thirty-one years after his death, under the title of 'Ecclesie Scotice libellus supplex Apologeticus.'

Although many efforts were made for his release, it was not till 1614 that he obtained leave to return to Scotland, but he had not proceeded far on his way home when he was taken suddenly ill, and he was with difficulty conveyed back to Berwick, where he died the same year.

His works, a list of which is given in one of the notes to Dr. M'Crie's Life of Andrew Melville, may be mentioned as follows:

In 1592, as he says himself, he "first put in print sum of his poesie; to wit, the Description of the Spainyarts Naturall, out of Julius Scaliger, with sum Exhortationes for warning of kirk and countrey."

His Catechism was published under the title of "A Spiritvall Propine of a Pastour to his People. Heb. 5. 12." Edinburgh, 1598, 4to. Pp. 127.

A Poem, called 'The Black Bastill, or a Lamentation of the Kirk of Scotland, compiled by Mr. James Melville, sometime minister at Anstruther, and now confyned in England,' was printed in 1611.

Ecclesie Scotice libellus supplex ἀπολογητικὸς καὶ ὀλοφθηρτικὸς Auctore Jacobo Melvino Verbi Dei Ministro, Domini Andree Melvini τοῦ πατρὸς nepote. Londini, 1615, 8vo.

His 'Diary,' printed for the Bannatyne Club in 1829, one vol. 4to, contains much curious information relative to the ecclesiastical and literary history of Scotland between the years 1555 and 1600. The MS. is preserved in the Advocates' Library. New and improved edition, published by the Wodrow Society, with Supplement, &c.

A MS. volume in the Advocates' Library, deposited by the Rev. William Blackie, minister of Yetholm, contains poems in the Scottish language by James Melville, in the handwriting of the author. They appear, says Dr. M'Crie, to have been all written during his banishment. The greater part of them are expressive of his feelings on the overthrow of the liberties of the church of Scotland, and the imprisonment and banishment of his uncle.

Dr. M'Crie thinks that another MS. in the same library, entitled 'History of the Declining Age of the Church of Scotland,' bringing down the history of that period till 1610, was also composed by James Melville.

The letters which passed between Andrew Melville and his nephew, from 1608 to 1613, as stated in the account of the MSS. of the former, are preserved in the Library of the College of Edinburgh.

MELVILLE, ROBERT, an eminent military officer and antiquarian, was the son of the minister of the parish of Monimail, Fifeshire, where he was born October 12, 1723. In 1744 he entered the army, and served in Flanders till the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748. In 1756 he obtained the rank of major in the 38th regiment, then in Antigua, and soon after he was employed in active service, particularly in the invasion of Guadaloupe, for which he was created lieutenant-colonel; and in 1760 was appointed governor of that island. Shortly after, he proceeded as second in command with Lord Rollo to the capture of Dominica. In 1762 he contributed much to the taking of Martinico, which was followed by the surrender of the other French islands; and Colonel Melville, now promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, was made governor-in-chief of all the captured possessions in the West Indies. After the general peace he travelled over Europe, and made numerous observations to ascertain the passage of Hannibal over the Alps. He also traced the sites of many Roman camps in Britain, and applied his antiquarian knowledge to the improvement of the modern art of war in several inventions. He was a fellow of the royal and antiquarian societies, and had the degree of LL.D. conferred on him by the university of Edinburgh.

A treatise of his, 'On an Ancient Sword,' is inserted in the 7th volume of the Archæologia. In 1798 he was appointed a full general, and died, unmarried, in 1809.

MENTEITH, the proper spelling of which is MENTETH, a local surname, derived from the district of Monteith, in the south-west of Perthshire, through which the River Teith runs, and is compounded of mcne, a valley, and Teith.

MENTEITH, earl of, a title of very ancient date in Scotland. Murdoch, the first recorded earl of Monteith, is mentioned in the chartulary of Dunfermline, in the beginning of the reign of David I., who ascended the throne in 1124. Gilechrist, second earl of Monteith, mentioned in a charter of donation to the monastery of Scone by Malcolm IV., was witness to several charters of William the Lion. His successor, Manrius, third earl, vicecomes of Stirling, lived in the end of the reign of the latter monarch and beginning of the reign of Alexander II. He had two daughters, but their names have not been transmitted. The elder married, before 3d February, 1231, Walter Comyn, second son of William, earl of Buchan (see vol. i. p. 453). In his wife's right, he became fourth earl of Monteith. He first appeared, with his father and other nobles, at the marriage of the princess Joan of England to Alexander II. at York in 1221, and in 1230 he acquired from that monarch a grant of the extensive district of Badenoch, in Inverness-shire, then in the crown (see vol. i. p. 223). He was one of the Scots nobles who swore to maintain the agreement betwixt his own sovereign and Henry III. at York in September 1237. On the death of his father he became the most influential man in Scotland, and acted a conspicuous part in the early part of the reign of Alexander III. (see vol. i. p. 79), being at the head of the national party, in opposition to the English faction. He was one of the regents of the kingdom at the time of his death in 1258. His only child, a daughter, married his grand-nephew, William Comyn. His widow married Sir John Russell, an English knight, and they were both imprisoned on suspicion of having poisoned her first husband (see vol. i. p. 86), but afterwards allowed to leave the kingdom.

Walter Stewart, called Bailloch, or the freckled, third son of the third high steward of Scotland, having married the countess' younger sister, laid claim to the earldom in right of his wife, and by favour of the Estates of the realm, obtained it in 1258, and kept it. He distinguished himself at the battle of Largs in 1263, under his brother Alexander, the high steward. He witnessed the marriage contract of the princess Margaret with Eric, king of Norway, in 1281, and, with his countess, accompanied her to her husband's kingdom. He was one of the nobles who, in the parliament of Scone, Feb. 5, 1283-4, swore to acknowledge Margaret, the Maiden of Norway, as their sovereign, in the event of the death of Alexander III. He was also one of the assembly at Brigham in March 1260, where the marriage of Queen Margaret to Prince Edward of England was agreed upon. In 1292 he was one of the nominees on the part of Bruce, the competitor for the Scottish crown. He swore fealty to Edward I., 13th June that year, and was present when Baliol did homage to Edward, 20th Nov. following. He was summoned to attend the English king into France, Sept. 1, 1294, and died soon after. He had 2 sons, who assumed the name of Monteith, although they retained the Stewart arms; Alexander, 6th earl, and Sir John de Monteith of Ruskie, whose name appears in history as the betrayor of Sir William Wallace. He altered the Stewart fesse into a bend, and the colours to sable and argent.

On 9th August, 1297, Sir John Monteith was released from an English prison, on condition of serving with the English against the French. In 1305 he was, by King Edward, appointed keeper of Dumbarton castle, and, the same year, according to tradition, he treacherously delivered over the heroic Wallace into the hands of the English. From this charge, however, he has been vindicated by Lord Hailes. He held the castle of Dumbarton for the English till 1309, and is said, but upon very doubtful authority, to have fought valiantly at the battle of Bannockburn on the side of Bruce, notwithstanding that Edward II. had caused his banner to be displayed in the English army. (Fordun, b. ii. p. 243.) He was custos comitatus of Monteith in 1320, when he signed the famous letter of the Scots nobles to the Pope, asserting the independence of Scotland. In June 1323, he was one of the commissioners and conservators of the treaty of Berwick, and died soon after. He had three sons and three daughters, one of whom, Joanna, married Malise, earl of Strathearn; another became the wife of Sir Archibald Campbell of Lochow, and a third was the wife of Maurice Buchanan of Buchanan. His eldest son, Sir Walter Monteith, was killed in one of the feuds of the period, by John and Maurice Drummond, and his eldest son, Sir Alexander Monteith of Ruskie, was father of Sir Robert Monteith of Ruskie, who married, in 1392, Lady Margaret Lennox, a younger daughter of Duncan, eighth earl of Lennox (see vol. ii. pp. 630, 631).

Sir John Monteith of Arran, 2d son of Sir John Monteith, the supposed betrayer of Wallace, married the Lady Elyne, daughter of Gratney, seventh earl of Mar (see p. 108 of this volume), and through his granddaughter, the wife of Sir Thomas Erskine, the earldom of Mar ultimately came into the Erskine family (see p. 110).

Alexander, 6th earl of Monteith, elder son of Walter Stewart, Bailloch, was one of the magnates Scotiæ who, in the parliament of Scone, Feb. 5, 1283-84, engaged to support the succession of Margaret of Norway to the throne of Scotland. He swore fealty to Edward I. at Norham, June 12, 1292, and appears to have succeeded his father in 1295. He was one of the leaders of the Scottish army which invaded Cumberland in March 1296. Taken prisoner by the English at the battle of Dunbar, 28th April following, he was released on engaging to serve Edward in his foreign wars. He died before 1320, in which year the earldom of Monteith was under the charge of his brother, Sir John, during the minority of his son, Alan, 7th earl.

The latter joined Robert the Bruce when he asserted his title to the throne of Scotland in 1306. Taken prisoner the same year, he was forfeited, and died in England, leaving a son, who died without issue, and a daughter, Mary, countess of Monteith in her own right. The eighth earl of Monteith, Murdoch by name, is supposed to have been the brother of Earl Alan, but this is uncertain. It would seem that, in 1330, he made an agreement with Mary, daughter of Earl Alan, for the possession of the earldom. He was killed 19th July, 1333, at the battle of Halidonhill, where he was one of the commanders of the second division of the Scots army.

Mary, countess of Monteith, married Sir John Graham, who, in her right, became 9th earl of Monteith. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Durham, 17th October, 1346, and having renounced the fealty which he had formerly sworn to Edward III., he was put to death as a traitor in February 1347. By his countess he had one daughter, Margaret, countess of Monteith, who married Robert Stewart, third son of Robert II., earl of Monteith in his wife's right, duke of

William, 7th earl of Menteth, per favour of Charles I., obtained, in 1631, patent of "EARL OF STRATHERN and MENTETH" as heir female of David, earl palatine of Strathern. But (as was then supposed to be the case), he claimed to be nearer in blood to	the crown than the king, and in consequence his patent was cancelled in 1632. Instead he was created EARL of AIRTH, 1633, but with precedence of Menteth, which latter was thereby virtually extinguished as an ancient Scottish title.	William, grand son of 1st earl. Died about 1694. Titles dormant.	Titles claimed by the late Robert Barclay Allardice of Urie, Esq.

Albany and regent of Scotland. In 1371 he became earl of Fife, by resignation of Isabella, countess of Fife, widow of his brother, Walter Stewart, second son of Robert II. (See vol. i. p. 33). On the execution and forfeiture in 1425, of Murdae, duke of Albany, their son, the earldom of Menteith became vested in the crown, and was granted, 6th September 1427, to Malise Graham, earl of Strathern. (See STRATHERN, earl of.)

Malise Graham, under the designation of earl of Menteith, went to England, 9th December, 1427, three months after obtaining the earldom, as a supplementary hostage for James I., in room of Robert Erskine. He was not released till 17th June 1453, when Alexander, master of Menteith, his son, surrendered himself as a hostage in his stead. He was dead before May 17, 1491. He had three sons. 1. Alexander, who predeceased him, leaving a son of his own name, the successor of his grandfather. 2. Sir John Graham of Kilbride, called Sir John with the bright sword, from whom descended the Grahams of Gartmore, the Grahams of West Preston, the Grahams of Netherby, near Carlisle, baronets, the Grahams of Norton Conyers, Yorkshire, baronets, and other families of the name. 3. Walter.

Alexander, 13th earl of Menteith, had two sons, William, 14th earl, who died in 1537, and Walter, ancestor of the Grahams of Gartur. The eldest son of the 14th earl, John, 15th earl of Menteith, was one of the prisoners taken at the rout of Solway in 1452. He was ransomed for 200 marks, being designed in Rymer's Fœdera, Lord Monkereth. He was killed in a scuffle with the tutor of Appin in October 1517.

His son, William, 16th earl, had a son, John, 17th earl, who was one of the lords of the congregation, and took a prominent part in their proceedings against the queen regent in 1559 and 1560. His name appears in the letters of demission and constitution of procurators forced from Queen Mary in 1567 at Lochleven castle, as one of the noblemen authorized to transfer the crown to her son, Prince James. With the Regent Moray he fought against the queen at the battle of Laingside. He died in 1598. His son William, 18th earl, born in 1589, was served heir of his father in the earldom of Menteith, 7th August, 1610. He voted against the five articles of Perth in 1621, and on 18th November, 1628, he was appointed an extraordinary lord of session, being at that time president of the privy council and justice general. On 25th August 1630, he was served heir to David, earl of Strathern, eldest son of Robert II. by Euphemia Ross, and was allowed by Charles I. to assume the style of earl of Strathern and Menteith. This service, however, was objected to by Drummond of Hawthornden, who informed his majesty that "the restoring the earl Menteith in blood, and allowing his descent and title to the earldom of Strathern, is thought to be disadvantageous to the king's majesty." The earl on his part is said to have renounced his claim to the crown, with a reservation of the rights of his blood, and to have boasted that he had "the reddest blood in Scotland." The power of Robert II. to legitimize his children by Elizabeth Mure being disputed, David, earl of Strathern, was considered the eldest legitimate son. His return and patent were set aside March 22, 1633, but on 28th of same month he was created earl of Airth, with the precedence of Menteith. In 1611 he was one of the noblemen proposed by King Charles I. to be chosen privy councillors, but was rejected by the Estates. He did not appear in the parliament of that year, but was present on 17th January, 1644, when he "did swear and subscribe solemnly the covenant, bande, and othe of pail." The same year he was nominated one of the committee of war for the county of Perth. His portrait, from an engraving in Pinkerton's Gallery, is subjoined:

His eldest son, John, Lord Kilpont, joined the marquis of Montrose in 1644, with a body of 500 men, and at the battle of Tippermuir commanded the left wing of the royal army. He was assassinated on the morning of the 5th September in Montrose's camp, by one of his own vassals, James Stewart of Ardvonlich, who had long enjoyed his confidence. His lordship's father, the earl of Airth, had frequently warned him against continuing his intimacy with Stewart, whom he always suspected, but, disregarding his father's injunctions, he put himself entirely under his guidance. It is asserted that it was by his advice that Lord Kilpont joined the royal army, and that wishing to ingratiate himself with the Covenanters, he formed a design to assassinate Montrose, or his major-general, Maedonald; but as he thought that he could not carry his design into execution without the assistance of his lordship, he endeavoured to prevail upon him to assist in the execution of his wicked project. On the night in question they slept together, and having prevailed upon Lord Kilpont to rise and take a walk in the fields before daylight, he there disclosed his horrid purpose, and entreated his lordship to concur therein. On Lord Kilpont rejecting the base proposal with indignation, Stewart, alarmed lest he might discover the matter, suddenly drew his dirk, and mortally wounded him in several places. He then fled, and killed, in passing, a sentinel who stood in his way. Aided by the darkness of the morning, he escaped, and thereafter joined the forces of the earl of Argyle.

Lord Kilpont left a son, William, who succeeded his grandfather as second earl of Airth and Menteith, and two daughters, Mary and Elizabeth. The second earl, after disposing of his whole landed property to the marquis of Montrose and Sir John Graham of Gartmore, died without issue, 12th September, 1694, when his titles became dormant, (see vol. i. p.

32). The parish of Aberfoyle in Perthshire, Rob Roy's country, formerly the property of the earls of Menteith, came thus into the possession of the Montrose family. The earl's elder sister, Mary, styled Lady Mary Graham, married, 8th October, 1662, Sir John Allardice of Allardice, baronet. Their descendant, James Allardice of Allardice, born 29th January 1727, married in 1756, Anne, daughter of James Barclay, banker, London, and by her had an only child, Sarah Anne Allardice, his sole heiress, who married in 1776, Robert Barclay of Urie, Kincairdineshire, and their son, Robert Barclay Allardice of Urie, well known in his day as Captain Barclay, the pedestrian, claimed the titles of Airth, Menteith, and Strathern, but died in 1853, when his claim was before the House of Lords. He left a daughter, who married a person of the name of Ritchie, and had a son. (See vol. i. p. 241.)

The second earl's younger sister, Elizabeth, wife of Sir William Graham of Gartmore, Perthshire, baronet, had a son, Sir John Graham, and a daughter. The former died 12th July 1708, without issue. The latter, by her husband, James Hodge of Gladmuir, advocate, had one daughter, Mary Hodge, married, in her 14th year, to William Graham, son of John Graham of Callingad. They had a son, William Graham, born in 1720, who assumed the title of earl of Menteith, and voted as such at the general election of the sixteen Scots representative peers, 5th May 1761, but his vote was disallowed by the house of peers, 2d March, 1762. He died without issue in 1787.

The family of Stuart Menteth of Closeburn, Dumfriesshire, an estate which they purchased from its old possessors, the Kirkpatricks, descend from Sir John Menteth, first of the Menteths of Kars, living in the reign of David II., second son of Sir Walter Menteth of Rusky, slain by the Drummonds, (see p. 118 of this volume). A baronetcy of Nova Scotia was conferred in 1838 on Sir Charles Granville Stuart Menteth of Closeburn, who died in December 1847. His eldest son, Sir James Stuart Menteth, born in 1792, was educated at Rugby, and is author of a work on the geology of the Snowdon range. His presumptive, his nephew, Menteth of Closeburn claims to be chief of the ancient house of Menteth, but his right to that distinction is disputed by Dalryell of Binns, as descended from Magdalen, elder daughter of Sir Thomas Dalryell, the second baronet of that family. This lady married, in 1688, James Menteith of Auldcaithy, heir-male and representative of the earls of Menteith. Their eldest son, James Menteith, succeeding as the third baronet of Binns, assumed the name of Dalryell, (see vol. ii. p. 15).

MENZIES, a surname originally Mengues, or Mingies (pronounced Meenies,) was one of the first adopted in Scotland, about the time of Malcolm Canmore. From the armorial bearings of the Menzieses it has been conjectured that the first who settled in Scotland of this surname was a branch of the Anglo-Norman family of Meyners, by corruption Manners. But this supposition does not seem to be well-founded.

The family of Menzies obtained a footing in Athol at a very early period, as appears from a charter granted by Robert de Meyners in the reign of Alexander II. This Robert de Meyners, knight, on the accession of Alexander III. (1249) was appointed lord high chamberlain of Scotland. His son, Alexander de Meyners, possessed the lands of Weem and Aberfeldy in Athol, and Glendochart in Breadalbane, besides his original seat of Durrissdeer in Nithsdale, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Robert, in the estates of Weem, Aberfeldy, and Durrissdeer, whilst his second son, Thomas, obtained the lauds of Fortingal.

From the former of these is descended the family of Menzies of Castle Menzies, but that of Menzies of Fortingal terminated in an heiress, by whose marriage with James Stewart, a natural son of the Wolf of Badenoch, the property was transferred to the Stewarts.

In 1487, Sir Robert de Mengues, knight, obtained from the crown, in consequence of the destruction of his mansion-house by fire, a grant of the whole lands and estate erected into a free barony, under the title of the barony of Menzies. From this Sir Robert lineally descended Sir Alexander Menzies of Castle Menzies, who was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 2d September 1665.

Sir Robert Menzies, the seventh baronet, who succeeded his father 20th August 1844, is the 27th of the family in regular descent; married, with issue. Seats: Castle Menzies, Rannoch Lodge, and Foss House, Perthshire. The ancient designation of the family was Menzies of Weem, their common style in old writings. In 1423 "David Menzies of Weem (de Wino)" was appointed governor of Orkney and Shetland, "under the most eminent lord and lady, Eric and Philippa, king and queen of Denmark, Swedland, and Norway."

The clan Menzies, the badge of which is a species of heath called the Menzies heath, like the Frasers, the Stewarts, and the Chisholms, is not originally Celtic, though long established in the Highlands. The Gaelic appellation of the clan is Meinnarich, a term, by way of distinction, also applied to the chief. Of the eighteen clans who fought under Robert Bruce at Bannockburn, the Menzieses were one.

The "Menyesses" of Athol and Appin Dull are named in the parliamentary rolls of 1587, as among "the clans that have captains, chiefs, and chieftains." Castle Menzies, the principal modern seat of the chief, stands to the east of Loch Tay, in the parish and near to the church of Weem, in Perthshire. Weem castle, the old mansion, is picturesquely situated, under a rock called Craig Uamh, hence its name. In 1502, it was burnt by Niel Stuart of Fortingal, in consequence of a dispute respecting the lauds of Rannoch.

In 1644, when the marquis of Montrose appeared in arms for Charles I., and had commenced his march from Athol towards Strathern, he sent forward a trumpeter, with a friendly notice, to the Menzieses, that it was his intention to pass through their country. His messenger, unhappily, was maltreated, and as some writers say, slain by them. They also harassed the rear of his army, which so exasperated Montrose that he ordered his men to plunder and lay waste their lands and burn their houses.

During the rebellion of 1715, several gentlemen of the clan Menzies were taken prisoners at the battle of Dnnblane. One of them, Menzies of Culldares, having been pardoned for his share in the rebellion, felt himself bound not to join in that of 1745. He sent, however, a valuable horse as a present to Prince Charles, but his servant who had it in charge, was seized and executed, nobly refusing to divulge his master's name, though offered his life if he would do so. In the latter rebellion, Menzies of Shian took out the clan, and held the rank of colonel, though the chief remained at home. The effective force of the clan in 1745 was 300.

The old family of Menzies of Pitfoddels in Aberdeenshire, is now extinct. Gilbert Menzies of this family, carrying the royal standard at the last battle of Montrose, in 1650, repeatedly refused quarter, and fell rather than give up his charge. The last laird, John Menzies of Pitfoddels, never married, and devoted the greater part of his large estate to the endowment of a Roman Catholic college. He died in 1843.

MERCER, HUGH,<sup>b</sup> brigadier-general in the American Revolutionary army, was born in Scotland in 1721. Having studied medicine, he acted as a surgeon's assistant in the memorable battle of Culloden, but on which side he served is not mentioned. Not long after he emigrated to Pennsylvania, but removed to Virginia, where he settled and married. He was engaged with Washington in the Indian wars of 1755 and following years, and for his good conduct in an expedition against an Indian settlement, conducted by Colonel Armstrong, in September 1756, he was presented with a medal by the corporation of the city of Philadelphia. In one of the engagements with the Indians he was wounded in the right wrist, and being separated from his party, on the approach of some hostile Indians, he took refuge in the hollow trunk of a large tree, where he remained till they disappeared. He then pursued his course through a trackless wild of about one hundred miles, until he reached Fort Cumberland, subsisting by the way on the body of a rattlesnake which he met and killed. When the war broke out between the colonists and the mother country, he relinquished an extensive medical practice, and immediately joined the standard of Independence. Under Washington he soon reached the rank of brigadier-general, and particularly distinguished himself in the battles of Trenton and Princeton, in the winter of 1776-7. In the latter engagement he commanded the van of the American army, and after exerting the utmost valour and activity, had his horse killed under him. Being thus dismounted, he was surrounded by some British soldiers, with whom, on being refused quarter, he fought desperately, until he was completely overpowered, and after being severely wounded, was left for dead on the field of battle. He died about a week after in the arms of Major George Lewis, the nephew of General Washington, whom his uncle had commissioned to attend him. Another American officer, General Wilkinson, in his 'Memoirs,' observes, "In General Mereer we lost, at Princeton, a chief who, for education, talents, disposition, integrity, and patriotism, was second to no man but the commander-in-chief, and was qualified to fill the highest trusts in the country."

MERCER, JAMES, the friend of Beattie, and himself a poet of some consideration, was born at Aberdeen, February 27, 1734, and received his education at the grammar school and Marischal college of that city. He was the eldest of two sons of Thomas Mereer, a gentleman of fortune in Aberdeenshire, who, in 1745, took arms for the Pretender, and for his share in the rebellion was obliged to retire to France. At the commencement of the Seven Years' war, James Mereer, who had resided with his father for several years in Paris, came to England, and joined the expedition against Cherbourg as a volunteer. He afterwards proceeded to Germany, and in a short time was promoted to an ensigny in one of the English regiments serving with the allied army. He subsequently received a lieutenant's commission in a battalion of Highlanders, then newly raised by Lieutenant-colonel Campbell. During several years arduous service in the field, he distinguished himself by his bravery and skill, and at the battle of Minden in 1759, his regiment was one of the six whose gallantry on that occasion saved the reputation of the allied arms.

Shortly before the peace of 1763, General Graeme, a relation of Mr. Mereer, presented him with a company in a regiment which he had undertaken to raise, and which was afterwards called the Queen's. On his return to Britain he took up his residence at Aberdeen, where he enjoyed the society of Dr. Beattie, Dr. Reid, Dr. Campbell, and other eminent men, and where, in the summer of 1763, he married a daughter of Mr. Douglas of Fochil, the sister of Lord Glenbervie. The "Queen's," with other new corps, being reduced at the peace, Captain Mereer purchased a company in the 49th regiment, and removed with it to Ireland, where he served for nearly ten years. The majority of his regiment becoming vacant, he succeeded to it by purchase. In 1772 he concluded a treaty with the lieutenant-colonel for becoming his successor; but the commission being given to another, induced him to sell out of the army, when he retired with his family to a small cottage in the vicinity of Aberdeen. In 1776-7 the duke of Gordon raised a regiment of Fencibles, the ma-majority of which he conferred on Mercer, who held it during the American war. On the return of peace, the major again settled with his family in the neighbourhood of Aberdeen, where he died November 18, 1803. In 1797 a small volume of his 'Lyric Poems' was published anonymously. A second edition, with seven new pieces, appeared early in 1804 with his name. To a third edition an account of his life was prefixed, by Lord Glenbervie. Major Mercer was not only an elegant and accomplished scholar, but possessed much original genius as a poet, conjoined with a high feeling of refined modesty, which led him to conceal, even from his intimate friends, the poems which he wrote for his own amusement. There are some interesting notices of him in Sir William Forbes' Life of Dr. Beattie.

His daughter, Miss Mercer of Aldie, in Perthshire, an ancient barony at one time possessed by the Mercers of Meiklour, in the same county, became the wife of Admiral Lord Viscount Keith, and the mother of Baroness Keith, Countess Flahant. (See vol. ii. p. 140).

MESTON, WILLIAM, a burlesque poet, the son of a blacksmith, was born in the parish of Midmar, in Aberdeenshire, in 1688. After completing his studies at the Marischal college of Aberdeen, he became one of the teachers in the grammar school of that city. He was subsequently for some time tutor to the young Earl Marischal and his brother, afterwards Marshal Keith; and in 1714, by the interest of the countess, was appointed professor of philosophy in the Marischal college. On the breaking out of the rebellion in 1715, he espoused the cause of the Pretender, and was by the Earl Marischal made governor of Dunottar castle. After the defeat of the rebels at Sheriffmuir, he was forced to flee for refuge to the mountains, where, till the passing of the act of indemnity, he lurked with a few fugitives like himself, for whose amusement he composed several pieces in rhyme, which he styled 'Mother Grim's Tales.' He subsequently chiefly resided in the family of the countess of Marischal, till the death of that lady; and some years afterwards, in conjunction with his brother Samuel, he commenced an academy in Elgin, which, however, did not ultimately succeed. He then successively settled at Turriff, Montrose, and Perth, and finally became preceptor in the family of Mr. Oliphant of Gask. His health beginning to decline, for the benefit of the mineral waters, he removed to Peterhead, where he was principally supported by the bounty of the countess of Errol. Subsequently he removed to Aberdeen, where he died in the spring of 1745. He is said to have been a superior classical scholar, and by no means a contemptible philosopher and mathematician. He was much addicted to conviviality, and is stated to have had a lively wit, and no small share of humour. His poems, however, are very coarse productions. The first of them printed, called 'The Knight,' appeared in 1723. It is a scurrilous description of Presbyterianism, after the manner of Butler, of whom he was a professed imitator. Afterwards was published the first decade of 'Mother Grim's Tales;' and next the second decade, by Iodocus, her grandson; and some years after, the piece called 'Mob contra Mob.' The whole, collected into a small volume, appeared at Edinburgh in 1767, with a short account of his life prefixed. Some Latin poems are included in the second decade, but these are of inferior merit.

METHVEN, Lord, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1528, by James V., on Henry Stewart, second son of Andrew, Lord Evandale, afterwards Lord Ochiltree, a descendant of Robert, duke of Albany, son of King Robert II. He owed his peerage and success in life to the favour of the queen-mother, Margaret, sister of Henry VIII. of England, and widow of James IV. In 1524, previous to her divorce from the earl of Angus, her second husband, she raised Stewart first to the office of treasurer, and afterwards to that of chancellor, intrusting to his inexperienced hands the chief guidance of public affairs. In the following year, on the divorce being granted, she married him. The lordship of Methven, in Perthshire, was part of the dowry lands usually appropriated for the maintenance of the queen-dowager of Scotland, together with the lordship and castle of Stirling and the lands of Balquhiddie, &c., and when Margaret procured the peerage for her third husband, the barony of Methven was dissolved from the crown, and erected into a lordship, in favour of Henry Stewart, and his heirs male, on the queen's resigning her jointure of the lordship of Stirling.

Subsequently, when Angus held the supreme power, an attempt on his part to obtain forcible possession of the queen's dowry lands, so alarmed Margaret and Methven, that, in their terror, they took refuge in the castle of Edinburgh. That fortress, however, was soon delivered up to Angus, when he ordered Methven to a temporary imprisonment. The queen afterwards endeavoured to obtain a divorce from Methven, but her son, the young king, put a stop to the proceedings. By Lord Methven the queen had a daughter, who died in infancy. Her own death took place at the castle of Methven in 1540. Lord Methven afterwards married Janet Stewart, daughter of the earl of Athol, by whom he had a son, Henry, second Lord Methven.

The second Lord Methven married Jean, daughter of Patrick Lord Ruthven, and was killed at Broughton, in the vicinity of Edinburgh, by a cannon-ball shot from the castle of that city during the siege thereof, 3d March 1572. He left a son, Henry, third Lord Methven, who died without heirs male in 1584, when the title became extinct.

The lordship of Methven was purchased in 1661, by Patrick Smythe of Braeco, whose great-grandson, David Smythe of Methven, was a lord of session from 1793 to 1806, under the title of Lord Methven.

MICKLE, WILLIAM JULIUS, translator of 'The Lusiad,' was born at Langholm, Dumfries-shire, September 29, 1731. He was the third son of the Rev. Alexander Mickle or Meikle, minister of Langholm, who, during his residence in London, previous to his obtaining that living, superintended the translation of Bayle's Dictionary, to which he is said to have contributed the greater part of the additional notes. His son William received the early part of his education at the grammar school of his native parish, and on the removal of his father, in his old age, to Edinburgh, was sent to the High school of that city, where he acquired a competent knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages. His father having, on the death of Mr. Myrtle, his brother-in-law, a brewer in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, purchased the business for his eldest son, the poet was, in his sixteenth year, taken from school to be employed as a clerk in the counting-house, and five years afterwards the brewery was transferred to him. Before he was eighteen he had written several pieces, and some of his poems appeared in the 'Scots Magazine;' two of which, one 'On passing through the Parliament Close at Midnight;' and the other, entitled 'Knowledge, an Ode,' were reprinted in Donaldson's Collection. In 1762 he sent to London an ethnic poem, entitled 'Providence,' which was published anonymously, but did not meet with much success. Having sustained considerable losses in business, which led to his bankruptcy, he quitted Edinburgh hastily, in April 1763, and on the 8th of May arrived in London. He had previously written a letter to Lord Lyttleton, to whom he submitted some of his pieces, but without producing any other result than a complimentary correspondence. He had hoped to have obtained through his lordship's interest some civil or commercial appointment, either in the West Indies or at home; but in this he was disappointed, and hearing that the humble situation of corrector to the Clarendon press, at Oxford, was vacant, he offered himself as a candidate, and being successful in his application, he entered upon his duties in 1765. During the same year he published 'Pollio, an Elegiac Ode,' and in 1767 appeared 'The Couchbine,' a poem, in two cantos, in the manner of Spenser. The former did not attract much notice, but the latter was most favourably received, and after it had gone through three editions, the title, to prevent misapprehension, was changed to 'Sir Martyn.'

In 1771 Mickle issued proposals for printing by subscription a translation of the 'Lusiad,' by Camoens, to qualify himself for which he learnt the Portuguese language. He published the first book as a specimen, and from the encouragement he received, he was induced to resign his situation at the Clarendon press, with the view of devoting his whole time to the work, when he took up his residence at a farm-house at Forest-hill, about five miles from Oxford. During the progress of the translation he edited Pearch's Collection of Poems, in which he inserted several of his own, particularly 'Hengist and Mey,' a ballad, an 'Elegy on Mary Queen of Scots.' To Evans' Collection he also contributed his beautiful ballad of 'Cannor Hall,' founded on the tragic story of the lady of the earl of Leicester, the favourite of Queen Elizabeth. His translation was finished in 1775, and published in a quarto volume, under the title of 'The Lusiad, or the Discovery of India,' to which he prefixed an Introduction, containing a defence of commerce and civilization, in reply to the misrepresentations of Rousseau, and other visionary philosophers; a History of the Portuguese conquests in India; a Life of Camoens; and a Dissertation on the Lusiad, and Observations on Epic Poetry. The work obtained for him a high reputation, and so rapid was its sale, that a second edition was called for in June 1778. By the two editions he is said to have realized about £1,000. Previously to its publication he had written a Tragedy, entitled the 'Siege of Marsilles,' which was rejected by Garrick, and afterwards by Mr. Harris, and was never acted.

In May 1779 he was, by Commodore Johnstone, a distant relation of his own, appointed his secretary, and he sailed on board of the Romney, man-of-war, with a small squadron, destined for the Tagus. In the ensuing November he arrived at Lisbon, where, as the translator of the national poet of Portugal, he received many flattering marks of attention from the nobility, gentry, and literati of that country, and was admitted a member of the Royal Academy, at its opening. While in that capital he wrote his poem of 'Almada Hill, an Epistle from Lisbon,' published in 1781, but without adding to his reputation. In 1780 the squadron returned to England, and Mickle remained for a time at London, as joint agent for the disposal of some valuable prizes taken during the expedition. He had acquired considerable wealth, and in 1783 he married Miss Mary Tomkins, the daughter of the farmer with whom he had resided at Foresthill, and with this lady he received a handsome dower. He now went to reside at Wheatley, near Oxford, where he employed his leisure in writing some occasional pieces, in revising his published poems, and in contributing a series of Essays, entitled 'The Fragments of Leo,' and some other articles, to the European Magazine. He died, after a short illness, October 28, 1788. He left one son, for whose benefit a volume of his collected poems was published by subscription in 1795.—His works are:

MIDDLETON, earl of, a title, now extinct, in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1660, on John Middleton, the elder son of John Middleton of Caldham, Kincardineshire, who was killed sitting in his chair, by Montrose's soldiers in 1645. He was a descendant of Malcolm the son of Kenneth, who got a charter from William the Lion of the lands of Middleton in that county, confirming a donation of King Duncan of the same, and in consequence assumed the name.

The first earl was from his youth bred to arms. He at first "trailed a pike" in Hepburn's regiment in France, but in the civil wars of 1642, he entered into the service of the parliament of England as commander of a troop of horse, and lieutenant-general under Sir William Waller. He afterwards returned to Scotland, and got a command in General Leslie's army. At the battle of Philiphaugh, 13th September 1645, he contributed so much to the defeat of Montrose, that the Estates voted him a gift of 25,000 marks. When Montrose, soon after, sat down before Inverness, General Middleton, with a small brigade, was detached from General Leslie's army and sent north to watch his motions. In the beginning of May 1646, he left Aberdeen, with a force of 600 horse and 800 foot, and arrived in the neighbourhood of Inverness, on the 9th of that month. Montrose immediately withdrew to a position at some distance from the town, but soon quitted it. Two regiments of cavalry, despatched by Middleton after him, attacked his rear, cut off some of his men, and captured two pieces of cannon, and part of his baggage. Retreating into Ross-shire, he was pursued by Middleton, who, as Montrose avoided an engagement, laid siege to the castle of the earl of Seaforth in the chanonry of Ross. After a siege of four days he took it, but immediately restored it to the countess of Seaforth, who was within the castle at the time.

Learning that the marquis of Huntly had seized upon Aberdeen, Middleton retraced his steps, and re-crossing the Spey, made him retire into Mar. He then returned to Aberdeen. When Montrose received orders from the king to disband his forces, Middleton was intrusted by the committee of Estates with ample powers to negotiate with him, and in order to discuss the conditions offered to the former, a conference was held between them on 22d July 1646, on a meadow, near the river Ilay in Angus, where they "conferred for the space of two hours, there being none near them but one man for each of them to hold his horse." (Guthry's Memoirs, p. 179). The conditions were that his followers, on making their submission, should be pardoned, and that Montrose and a few others of the principal leaders should leave the kingdom.

The following year, Middleton was occupied in pursuing the marquis of Huntly, who had appeared in arms for the king, through Glenmoriston, Badenoch, and other places in the north, till he was captured by Lieutenant-colonel Menzies in Strathdon. Some Irish taken at the same time were shot by Middleton's orders in Strathbogie. In 1648, when the "Engagement" was formed for the rescue of the king, he was appointed lieutenant-general of the cavalry in the army ordered to be levied by the Scots Estates for that purpose. The levy being opposed by a large body of Covenanters and others at Mauchline in Ayrshire, on the 12th June, Middleton charged them, and put the whole to the rout, with the loss of eighty killed and a great many taken prisoners, among whom were some ministers. He also dispersed some gatherings of the western Covenanters at Carsphairn and other places. He behaved with great gallantry at the battle of Preston in England, 17th August the same year, but his horse being shot under him, he was taken prisoner and sent to Newcastle. He soon made his escape, however, and with Lord Ogilvy attempted a rising in Athol in favour of the king. The party being dispersed by a force under the orders of General David Leslie, Middleton was allowed, on giving security to keep the peace, to return to his home.

When Charles II., in 1650, arrived in Scotland, General Middleton immediately repaired to him. Many small bodies of men were raised for the defence of the king in the north, and it was at one time proposed to have placed General Middleton, who commanded a small division of the army, at the head of all the loyal forces that could be collected for the purpose of opposing Cromwell, but this was never carried into effect. For his conduct in support of the king the commission of the church summarily excommunicated him on the motion of James Guthrie, who pronounced the sentence from his pulpit at Stirling.

To compel the northern royalists to lay down their arms, General Leslie, by order of the committee of Estates, crossed the Tay on the 24th October with a force of 3,000 cavalry, with the intention of proceeding to Dundee and scouring Angus. At this time Middleton was lying at Forfar, and, on hearing of Leslie's advance, he sent him a letter, enclosing a copy of a "bond and oath of engagement" which had been entered into by Huntly, Athol, Seaforth, and himself, with others, by which they pledged themselves not to lay down their arms without a general consent, and promised and swore that they would maintain the true religion as then established in Scotland, the national covenant, and the solemn league and covenant; and defend the person of the king, his prerogative, greatness and authority, the privileges of parliament, and the freedom of the subject. Middleton stated that Leslie would perceive, from the terms of the document sent, that the only aim of himself and friends was to unite Scotsmen in defence of their common rights, and he proposed to join Leslie, and put himself under his command, as their objects appeared to be precisely the same. The negotiation was finally concluded on 4th November at Strathbogie, when a treaty was agreed to between Leslie and the chief royalists, by which the latter accepted an indemnity and laid down their arms.

On the 12th January 1651, Middleton was relaxed from his excommunication, and did penance in sackcloth in the parish church of Dundee. He commanded the horse in the royal army that marched into England on the 31st July; and at the battle of Worcester, 3d September, the chief resistance was made by him. He charged the enemy so vigorously that he forced them to recoil, but being severely wounded, he was taken prisoner after the battle, and sent to the Tower of London. Cromwell was so incensed against him that he designed to get him tried for his life, as having formerly served in the parliamentary army, but he contrived to make his escape. After remaining for some time concealed in London he retired to France, and joined Charles II. at Paris. In 1653 he was sent home with a commission from the king, appointing him generalissimo of all the royal forces in Scotland, and took the command of the troops at Dornoch. Middleton soon found himself sorely pressed by General Monk, who had advanced into the Highlands with a large army. In an attempt to elude his pursuers he was surprised in a defile near Lochgarry, 26th July 1654, when his men were either slain or dispersed, and he himself escaped with great difficulty. After lurking for some months in the country, Middleton again got over to the king, who was then at Cologne, and was excepted by Cromwell from pardon in his act of grace and indemnity the same year.

At the Restoration, he accompanied King Charles II. to England, and was created earl of Middleton and Lord Clermont and Fetterearns, by patent, dated 1st October 1660, to him and his heirs male, having the name and arms of Middleton. He was also appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland, governor of Edinburgh castle, and lord high commissioner to the Scots parliament. On the 31st December he arrived at Holyrood-house, having been escorted from Musselburgh by the nobility and gentry then in the capital, attended by a thousand horse. He was allowed 900 merks per day for his table, and he lived in a style of great magnificence. He opened parliament 1st January 1661, with a splendour to which the Scots people had long been unaccustomed. In this "terrible parliament," as it is well named by Kirkton, the king's prerogative was restored in its fullest extent, and a general act rescissory of the parliaments from 1633 was passed. Various other acts of a most unconstitutional nature also became law. On the rising of parliament in the following July, Middleton hastened to London, to lay an account of its proceedings before the king. On his arrival at court, he assured his majesty and the Scottish privy council in London, that the majority of the Scottish nation desired the establishment of episcopacy, and it was accordingly agreed that "as the government of the state was monarchy, so that of the church should be prelacy." Middleton's object in thus recommending the establishment of the episcopal church in Scotland was that he might strengthen his own authority by that of the bishops, and thwart Lauderdale whom he hated, and who at that time was favourable to presbyterianism.

He was again appointed lord high commissioner to the Scots parliament, which met 6th May 1662, and on 15th July following, he was nominated an extraordinary lord of session. In September of the same year, Middleton and the privy council made a progress through the west of Scotland, and when at Glasgow, under the influence of drink, as Burnet says, passed the act for depriving the covenanting ministers of their benefices, by which more than 200 were thrown out. After proceeding through Ayrshire to Dumfries, they returned to Edinburgh. Having procured the passing of the famous act of billeting, by which Lauderdale and his friends were incapacitated, that unprincipled nobleman resolved upon his overthrow. He misrepresented all his actions to the king, and so prejudiced the royal mind against him that Middleton in 1663 was ordered up to London to give an account of his administration in Scotland. When the council met, Lauderdale accused him of many miscarriages in his great office, and particularly of having accepted bribes from many of the presbyterians, to exclude them from the list of fines. Middleton was defended by Clarendon, Archbishop Sheldon, and Monk, duke of Albemarle. The Scottish prelates also wrote in his favour, and in vindication of his general policy. Their interposition, however, was in vain. He was declared guilty of arbitrary conduct as commissioner, and deprived of all his offices, to the great joy of the Scottish people, whom he had disgusted by the oppressive character of his measures, as well as by his open debauchery and intemperance, being, according to Burnet and Wodrow, most ostentatious in his vices. The former says that he was "perpetually drunk."

After his disgrace he retired to the friary near Guildford, to the house of a Scotsman named Dalnahoy, who had been gentleman of the horse to William duke of Hamilton, killed at the battle of Worcester, and who had married that nobleman's widow. There he built a bridge over the river which ran through Dalmahoy's estate, and was called Middleton's Bridge after him. He afterwards, as a kind of decent exile, received the appointment of governor of Tangier, a seaport town of Fez in Africa, which made part of the dowry of the princess Catherine of Portugal, whom Charles II. married soon after the Restoration. He died there in 1673, having fallen in going down stairs, which in that hot climate produced inflammation.

His only son, Charles, second and last earl of Middleton, was M.P. for Winchelsea, in the long parliament. He was bred in the court of Charles II., by whom he was appointed envoy extraordinary to the court of Vienna. On his return home he was constituted one of the principal secretaries of state for Scotland, 26th September 1682. On 11th July 1684 he was sworn a privy councillor of England, on the 15th of the same month was admitted an extraordinary lord of session in Scotland, and on 25th August same year appointed one of the principal secretaries of state for England. His seat on the bench, however, he resigned in February 1686, in favour of his brother-in-law, the earl of Strathmore.

At the Revolution, though he had opposed the violent measures of King James, he adhered to him steadily. He refused all the offers made to him by King William, and after being frequently imprisoned in England, he followed James to France, and was, in consequence, outlawed by the high court of justiciary, 23d July 1694, and forfeited by act of parliament, 2d July 1695. Before the Revolution, we are told, he firmly stood in the gap, to stop the torrent of some priests who were driving King James to his ruin, and had so mean an opinion of converts that he used to say a new light never came into the house but by a crack in the tilting. Yet this man, who had withstood all the temptations of James' reign, and all the endeavours of that prince to bring him over, to the surprise of all who knew him declared himself a Roman Catholic on the king's death, and obtained the entire management of the exiled court at St. Germain's. (Mackay's Memoirs, p. 238.) He is described as having been a black man, of middle stature, with a sanguine complexion. He had two sons and three daughters. Lady Elizabeth, the eldest daughter, was the wife of Edward Drummond, son of James, earl of Perth, high-chancellor of Scotland. She was styled duchess of Perth, and died at Paris after 1773. The sons, Lord Clermont and the Hon. Charles Middleton, were taken at sea by Admiral Byng, coming with French troops to invade Scotland, in 1708, and committed to the Tower of London. They were soon released, when they returned to France.

MILL, JAMES, the historian of British India, was born in the parish of Logie-Pert, Forfarshire, April 6, 1773. The early part of his education he received at the grammar school of Montrose, on leaving which, through the patronage of Sir John Stuart, baronet, of Fetterairn, one of the barons of the exchequer in Scotland, on whose estate his father occupied a small farm, he was sent to the university of Edinburgh to study for the church. In 1800, after being licensed as a preacher, he went to London as tutor in Sir John Stuart's family, and, settling in the metropolis, he devoted himself to literary and philosophical pursuits. By his powerful and original productions, as well as by the force of his personal character, he soon earned for himself a high reputation as a writer. During the first years of the Edinburgh Review, he contributed to it many articles on Jurisprudence and Education, and he was also the author of a number of masterly papers in the Westminster, the London, the British, the Eclectic, and Monthly Reviews. In politics he belonged to the Radical party, and among other articles which he wrote for the Westminster Review were the celebrated ones 'On the Formation of Opinions,' in No. 11, and 'On the Ballot,' in No. 25.

About 1806 he commenced his 'History of British India,' which occupied a considerable portion of his time for more than ten years, and was published about the end of 1817, in three volumes 4to. The information contained in this valuable work, with the author's enlarged views on all matters connected with India, tended greatly to the improvement of the administration of our empire in the East, and induced the East India Company to appoint him in 1819 to the second situation in the examiner's office, or land revenue branch of the administration, at the India House. On the retirement of Mr. William McCulloch, he became head of the department of correspondence with India. In 1821 Mr. Mill published his 'Elements of Political Economy,' containing a clear summary of the leading principles of that science. In 1829 appeared, in two vols. 8vo, his 'Analysis of the Phenomena of the Human Mind,' a work on which he bestowed extraordinary labour, and which displayed much philosophical acuteness. Besides these works he contributed various valuable articles to the Supplement of the Encyclopædia Britannica, principally on Government, Legislation, Education, Jurisprudence, Law of Nations, Liberty of the Press, Colonies, and Prison Discipline, which were also published as separate treatises. In 1835 he produced, without his name, his 'Fragment on Mackintosh,' in which he severely criticises Sir James Mackintosh's 'Dissertation on the History of Ethical Philosophy.' Mr. Mill died of consumption, June 23, 1836, and was buried at Kensington, where he had resided for the last five years of his life. He left a widow and nine children.

MILLAR, JAMES, M.D., a learned and industrious compiler, was educated chiefly at the university of Glasgow, where he acquired an extensive and accurate knowledge of the classics, and early evinced a taste for the varied departments of natural history. He took his medical degree at Edinburgh, where he settled. In 1807 he published, in connection with William Vazie, Esq., an 8vo pamphlet, entitled 'Observations on the Advantages and Practicability of making Tunnels under Navigable Rivers, particularly applicable to the proposed Tunnel under the Forth.' He was the original projector and editor of the 'Encyclopædia Edinensis, or Dictionary of Arts, Sciences, and Miscellaneous Literature.' He was also chosen to superintend the fourth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, to the improvement and interests of which he devoted a large portion of his time. Some of his essays and larger treatises written for these works, when published separately, were very favourably received by the public. He likewise contributed largely to several of the periodical journals both of London and Edinburgh. In 1819 he published, in 12mo, with coloured engravings, 'A Guide to Botany, or a Familiar Illustration of the Linnæan Classification of Plants.' Dr. Millar was one of the physicians to the Dispensary at Edinburgh, and in that capacity, while attending to the usual duties, he caught a fever, of which he died in July 1827.

MILLAR, JOHN, an eminent lecturer on law, was born June 22, 1735, at the manse of Shotts, Lanarkshire, of which parish his father, who was afterwards translated to Hamilton, was minister. He studied at the university of Glasgow, and was at first intended for the church, but subsequently preferred the bar. On leaving college he was for two years tutor to the eldest son of Lord Kames, during which time he became acquainted with David Hume, whose metaphysical opinions he adopted. He was admitted advocate in 1760, and, in the following year, was appointed to the chair of civil law in the university of Glasgow, which he filled for nearly forty years with signal success. His lectures on the different branches of jurisprudence, and on the general principles of government, excited much interest at the period; they were attended by many who afterwards distinguished themselves in public life, and from him Lord Brougham, Lord Jeffrey, Lord Chief Commissioner Adam, the earl of Lauderdale, and some other eminent Whigs, received their first lessons in political science. In 1771 he published 'Observations concerning the Distinction of Ranks in Society,' which passed through several editions, and was translated into French. In 1787 he published 'Elements of the Law relating to Insurances.' The same year appeared his more elaborate work, entitled, 'An Historical View of the English Government, from the Settlement of the Saxons in Britain to the Accession of the House of Stuart,' in which he follows the path of philosophical speculation, as to the origin of the laws and institutions of nations, which had been previously traced out by Lord Kames and Dr. Adam Smith. He afterwards brought down the History of the Constitution to the Revolution, and the work, with this addition, was published in 4 vols. 8vo in 1803. Professor Millar died May 30, 1801, leaving four sons and six daughters. A fourth edition of his 'Origin of the Distinction of Ranks' appeared in 1808, with a memoir of his life, by his nephew, Mr. John Craig.

MILLER, the name of a family possessing a baronetcy of Great Britain, conferred in 1788 on Sir Thomas Miller of Barskimming in Ayrshire, and Glenelc in Galloway, a distinguished lawyer and judge, second son of Mr. William Miller, writer to the signet. He was born 3d November 1717, and admitted advocate at the Scottish bar, 21st February 1742. In 1748 he was nominated sheriff of the stewartry of Kircudbright, and the same year was elected joint principal clerk of the city of Glasgow. These offices he resigned in 1755 on being appointed solicitor to the excise in Scotland. On 17th March 1759 he became solicitor-general, and on 30th April 1760, he was constituted lord-advocate. The following year he was chosen M.P. for Dumfries. In November 1762 he was elected rector of the university of Glasgow, and on 14th June 1766, on the death of Sir Gilbert Elliot of Minto, appointed lord-justice-clerk. On 15th January 1788, he succeeded Robert Dundas of Arniston as president of the court of session, and on February 19 of the same year was created a baronet. He died at his seat of Barskimming September 27, 1789. He was twice married, and by his first wife, a daughter of John Murdoch, Esq. of Rosebank, lord provost of Glasgow, he had a son and a daughter. Burns, in his 'Vision,' alludes to Sir Thomas Miller as "An aged judge dispensing good."

The son, Sir William Miller, second baronet, also an eminent judge, was admitted advocate, 9th August 1777. At the keenly contested election in 1780, he was returned M.P. for the city of Edinburgh, in opposition to Sir Lawrence Dundas, and took his seat in parliament; but was unseated upon a petition, and his opponent declared duly elected. On 23d May, 1795, he was appointed a lord of session, when he took the title of Lord Glenlee. He resigned his seat in 1840, having been a judge for above forty-five years. Besides being an accomplished scholar, he was esteemed one of the best lawyers of his time on the Scottish bench. He died in 1846. He was the senior vice-president of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and was frequently vice-president of the Society of Scottish Antiquaries, of which he was the first admitted fellow (of date 1781), and oldest member. He married Grizel, daughter of George Chalmers, Esq., by whom he had 6 sons and 3 daughters.

His eldest son, Thomas Miller, Esq., predeceased his father in 1827. By his wife, the youngest daughter of Sir Alexander Penrose-Gordon-Cumming, baronet, he had five sons. The eldest son, Sir William Miller, third baronet, born in Edinburgh in 1815, married in 1839 the eldest daughter of Lieutenant-General Sir Thomas McMahon, baronet, K.C.B., issue, 2 sons and 2 daughters. He was educated at Eton, and was for some years an officer in the 12th Lancers; appointed a magistrate for Ayrshire in 1838, succeeded his grandfather as 3d baronet, May 9, 1846, made a knight commander of the order of the Temple in January the same year.

The second son of the second baronet, Lieutenant-Colonel William Miller, 1st Foot Guards, was mortally wounded at Quatre Bras, June 16, 1815, and died at Brussels the following day. "In his last mortal scene," says a letter dated Brussels, June 23, 1815, published at the time, "he displayed the soul and the spirit of a hero. On finding himself wounded, he sent for Colonel Thomas (who was killed two days afterwards, at Waterloo)—'Thomas,' said he, 'I feel I am mortally wounded; I am pleased to think that it is my fate rather than yours, whose life is involved in that of your young wife.' After a pause, he said faintly, 'I should like to see the colours of the regiment once more before I quit them for ever.' They were brought to him, and waved round his wounded body. His countenance brightened, he smiled; and declaring himself satisfied, he was carried from the field. In all this you will see the falling of a hero—a delicacy of sentiment, a self-devotion, and a resignation, which have never been surpassed." His remains were interred at Brussels, in a cemetery where lie many of the more distinguished of the heroes who fell at Quatre Bras and Waterloo. On a monumental stone erected to his memory, with a suitable inscription, it is stated that he was thirty-one years old at the time of his death.

MILLER, HUGH, the first of Scottish geologists, was born in Cromarty, in the north of Scotland, October 10th, 1802. His father, the owner and commander of a sloop in the coasting trade, who had served in the British navy, perished in a storm in November 1807, when Hugh was just five years of age. He was descended from a long line of seafaring men, and he mentions two uncles of his father, sailors, one of whom had sailed round the world with Anson, and the other, like himself, perished at sea. The paternal grandfather of Hugh, when entering the frith of Cromarty, was struck overboard during a sudden gust, by the boom of his vessel, and never rose again. His great-grandfather, whose name was John Feddes, was one of the last of the buccaneers.

Previous to his father's death Hugh had been sent to a dame's school, where he remained a year, and was taught to pronounce his letters in the old Scottish mode, a peculiarity which he could never get quit of. He was subsequently transferred to the parish grammar school, where he made some progress in the rudiments of the Latin language. He was a great reader, and as he read every book that came in his way, he thus came to acquire, in course of time, a vast fund of information.

Even at this early period his turn for geological enquiries began to develop itself. "The shores of Cromarty," he says, in his 'Schools and Schoolmasters,' "are strewed over with water-rolled fragments of the primary rocks, derived chiefly from the west during the ages of the boulder clay; and I soon learned to take a deep interest in sauntering over the various pebble-beds when shaken up by recent storms, and in learning to distinguish their numerous components." From his uncle Sandy, whom he used frequently to accompany in his evening walks along the seashore, he derived some insight into natural history, and especially conchology. He subsequently extended his researches to the Hill of Cromarty and the caves in the Cromarty Sutors, and began to make collections. Even in his school days he set about writing poetry, so that he soon came to be looked upon as a sort of village prodigy. He was afterwards sent to a subscription school which had been opened in his native place, where he only remained a few months. On quitting it, which he did abruptly, in consequence of a severe drubbing which he had received from the schoolmaster, he revenged himself by writing a satirical poem, which he styled 'The Pedagogue.'

At the age of 17 he was bound apprentice to an uncle-in-law, a stone mason, to serve for the space of three years. He was set to work in the quarries of Cromarty. "The quarry," he says, "in which I commenced my life of labour was a sandstone one, and exhibited in the section of the furze-covered bank which it presented, a bar of deep red stone beneath, and a bar of pale red clay above. Both deposits belonged to formations equally unknown at the time to the geologist.

Save for the wholesome restraint that confined me for day after day to this spot, I should perhaps have paid little attention to either. It was the necessity which made me a quarrier that taught me to be a geologist." Though both a skilful and vigorous workman, he never seems to have taken kindly to his trade; nor did he either associate or sympathize with his fellow-masons. He was seldom with his fellow-masons, except when at work, and he spent the hours, which they devoted to jollity and drinking, in a close and enthusiastic reading of poetry and science.

After working for some years as a country mason, storing his mind all the time, by reading and observation, with a knowledge of the facts and processes of nature, Mr. Miller, on reaching the age of twenty-one, resolved upon going to Edinburgh, and making his way as a mechanic among the stone-cutters of the Scottish capital, perhaps, as he says, the most skilful in their profession in the world. He soon got employment from a master-builder, and was engaged to work at a manor house near the village of Niddry Mill, a few miles to the south of Edinburgh, at twenty-four shillings a-week wages. On a reduction of the wages of the men to fifteen shillings, a strike took place, in which, however, he took no part.

In 1824 occurred the memorable fires in the parliament close and High Street of Edinburgh, and a building mania having thereafter set in, which ended disastrously in a year or two, mason-work was for a time exceedingly plentiful in that city. Mr. Miller, however, finding his lungs affected, from the dust of the stone which he had been hewing for the previous two years lodging in them, instead of taking employment in Edinburgh, returned to Cromarty to recruit his health. "I was," he says, "too palpably sinking in flesh and strength to render it safe for me to encounter the consequences of another season of hard work as a stone-cutter. From the stage of the malady at which I had already arrived, poor workmen, unable to do what I did, throw themselves loose from their employment, and sink in six or eight months into the grave—some at an earlier, some at a later period of life; but so general is the affection, that few of our Edinburgh stone-cutters pass their fortieth year unscathed, and not one out of every fifty of their number ever reaches his forty-fifth year."

On recovering from a long and depressing illness, he resolved upon following a higher branch of the art than ordinary stone-cutting. This was the hewing of ornate dial stones, sculptured tablets and tombstone inscriptions. It was an advantage to him that his new branch of employment brought him sometimes for a few days into country districts, and among solitary churchyards, which presented new fields of observation, and opened up new tracts of inquiry. But of this sort of work there was not a superabundance, at least in that locality, and about the end of June 1828, Mr. Miller found that he had nothing to do, and acting on the advice of a friend, who believed that his style of cutting inscriptions could not fail to secure for him a good many little jobs in the churchyards of Inverness, he visited that place, and inserted a brief advertisement in one of the newspapers, soliciting employment. While waiting for it, he was accosted one day in the street by the recruiting sergeant of a Highland regiment, who asked him if he did not belong to the Aird. "No, not to the Aird, to Cromarty," he replied. "Ah! to Cromarty—very fine place! But would you not better bid adieu to Cromarty, and come along with me? We have a capital grenadier company; and in our regiment a stout steady man is always sure to get on." Mr. Miller thanked him, but of course declined the invitation.

While at Inverness he first "rushed into print." Selecting some of his best pieces in verse, he got them printed in a volume in the office of the Inverness Courier, the editor of that paper, Mr. Robert Carruthers, inserting from time to time some of them in his "poet's corner." The volume was published without his name. On the title-page it was simply intimated that the poems had been "written in the leisure hours of a journeyman mason," and, thus modestly announced, the book, for a first effort, was very favorably received. On his return to Cromarty he began to contribute a series of letters, on the herring fishery, to the newspaper above mentioned. These letters attracted attention, and were republished, on his behalf, by the proprietors of the paper, "in consequence of the interest they had excited in the northern counties." His Verses and his Letters soon enlarged the circle of his friends, and amongst others, Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, baronet, author of the 'Wolf of Badenoch,' and other works, Miss Dunbar of Boath, and Principal Baird of Edinburgh, showed him much kindness. The latter urged him to quit the north and proceed to Edinburgh, as the proper field for a literary man in Scotland, but as he did not think that he could enjoy equal opportunities of acquainting himself with the occult and the new in natural science, as when plying his labours in the provinces as a mechanic, he determined to continue for some years more in the country. At the principal's desire, however, he wrote for him an autobiographic sketch of his life, to his return from Edinburgh to Cromarty in 1825.

Mr. Miller next set himself to record, in his leisure hours, the traditions of his native place and the surrounding district, and a bulky manuscript volume soon grew up under his hands. All this time he lost no opportunity of continuing his geological researches, and, gradually advancing in discoveries, in course of time he came to have a thorough knowledge of the extinct organisms of the primitive world. Many of his friends wished to fix him down to literature as his proper walk, but he himself thought that his special vocation was science, and he accordingly devoted his mind to it with an ardour that soon enabled him to attain to surpassing excellence even as a literary man. After the passing of the Reform Bill, he was elected a member of the town council of Cromarty, but he never attended but one meeting of the council.

It was in his working attire that he first met the lady who was destined to become his wife. He had been hewing, he tells us, in the upper part of his uncle's garden, and had just closed his work for the evening, when three ladies made their appearance to see a curious old dial stone which he had dug out of the earth long before. With the youngest of the three he afterwards had many opportunities of meeting, and at length they came to a mutual understanding. It was agreed between them that if in the course of three years no suitable field of exertion should open for him at home, they should marry and emigrate to the United States. Two years of the time agreed upon had passed, and he was still an operative mason, when in 1834 a branch of the Commercial Bank of Scotland being established in Cromarty, the office of accountant was offered to him by Mr. Ross the agent. He was at this time thirty-two years of age, and although afraid that he would make but an indifferent accountant, never having had any experience in figures, he was yet induced to accept the appointment. He was accordingly sent to the parent bank at Edinburgh, to acquire the necessary instructions to fit him for his new situation.

On his arrival, he was ordered to the Commercial Bank branch at Linnithgow, to be initiated into the proper system of book-keeping. Being, as he says himself, "altogether deficient in the cleverness that can promptly master isolated details, when in ignorance of their bearing on the general scheme to which they belong," he was at first rather at a loss, and was looked upon by the local agent as particularly stupid. But as soon as he came to comprehend the central principle by which the system was governed, he at once showed his competence to manage the business of the bank. In the arena of science this law ruled his genius with a necessity not less inexorable than in the commercial field. From the centre of any science, when once he was able to master it, he could proceed with the utmost ease, but he invariably found that when he attempted to approach as if from the outside, the details baffled and repulsed him.

After two months' probation in the branch bank at Linnithgow, he returned to Cromarty, and straightway commenced his new course as an accountant, at a salary of £80 a-year. When fairly seated at the desk he felt, he says, as if his latter days were destined to differ from his earlier ones, well nigh as much as those of Peter of old, who, when he was "young, girded himself, and walked whither he would, but who, when old, was girded by others, and carried whither he would not." A sedentary life had at first a depressing effect on his intellectual pursuits, and for a time he intermitted them almost entirely, but as he became inured to it, his mind recovered its spring, and, as before, he began to occupy his leisure hours in literary and scientific exertions. The publication, in 1835, of his 'Scenes and Legends of the North of Scotland,' made his name known in literary circles. With a few exceptions, the book was highly commended by the critics. He relates, with a very natural feeling of satisfaction, that "Leigh Hunt gave it a kind and genial notice in his Journal; it was characterized by Robert Chambers not less favourably in his; and Dr. Hetherington, the future historian of the Church of Scotland and of the Westminster Assembly of Divines—at that time a licentiate of the church—made it the subject of an elaborate and very friendly critique in the 'Presbyterian Review.' Nor was I less gratified," he continues, "by the terms in which it was spoken of by the late Baron Hume, the nephew and residuary legatee of the historian—himself very much a critic of the old school—in a note to a north country friend. He described it as a work 'written in an English style which' he 'had begun to regard as one of the lost arts.'" The work, however, from the local nature of the subjects, attained to no great popularity, but as the author's reputation increased, its later editions have sold better than the first.

After a courtship of five years, he married the young lady formerly mentioned, Lydia Fraser, who was then residing with her mother in Cromarty, engaged in teaching. After their marriage, his wife continued to take a few pupils, and at this time, he tells us, the united earnings of the household did not much exceed a hundred pounds a-year. He, therefore, began to add to his income by writing for the periodicals. To Wilson's 'Border Tales,' commenced in 1835, he contributed, after the death of Mr. John Mackay Wilson of Berwick-upon-Tweed, their originator, several stories, for which he got £25 in all, being at the rate of three guineas a-piece, the stipulated wages for filling a weekly number. For supplying the same space with a tale weekly, which he did for three or four weeks, the writer of this got five pounds each story from the proprietors of the new 'Tales of the Borders,' published in Glasgow in 1848.

Finding that some of his stories were rejected by the editor, Mr. Miller ceased to write for the 'Border Tales.' He then made an offer of his services to Mr. Robert Chambers, by whom they were accepted, and for the two following years he occasionally contributed papers to Chambers' Journal, with his name attached to his several articles.

He still continued his researches among the rocks in the neighbourhood of Cromarty, in determining the true relations of their various beds and the character of their organisms. To enable him to examine the best sections of the Sutors and the adjacent hills, with their associated deposits, which cannot be reached without a boat, he purchased a light little yawl, furnished with mast and sail, and that rowed four oars, to enable him to carry out his explorations. At this time a letter of his on a local subject, inserted in one of the district papers, procured him the offer of a newspaper editorship, which, not deeming himself qualified for it, he at once declined.

Amongst his other occupations at this busy period of his life was writing the memoir of a deceased townsman, Mr. William Forsyth of Cromarty, at the request of his relative and son-in-law, Mr. Isaac Forsyth, bookseller, Elgin. This little work was not intended for publication, being printed for private circulation among Mr. Forsyth's friends. His career hitherto had been prosperous for a person in his condition in life. From the humble and obscure position of a journeyman stone-mason he had attained to that of an accountant in a bank. He was known as an author and respected as an explorer in geological science. In private he had made "troops of friends," and altogether he had "got on" in the world better than in his early days he could have had any reason to expect. He was now to be removed to a higher sphere, and to be placed in circumstances more favourable for the full development of his genius, and the complete display of his extraordinary attainments, than any that even his wildest ambition could have hoped for a few years before.

He had taken very little interest in the Voluntary controversy, but when the Non-intrusion question came to be agitated, he deemed it time to buckle on his armour, in other words, to take up his pen manfully in behalf of the rights of the church when assailed by the civil courts. The famous Auchterarder case was the occasion of his first appearance as a writer in the field of ecclesiastical controversy, in which he was destined to take such a prominent and influential part. The campaign was a prolonged one, and ended, as every body knows, in the disruption of the Established Church of Scotland. At no time of his life did he exhibit greater energy of intellect than as the champion of the non-intrusion and Free church party in the church, although it must be confessed that, sometimes led away alike by prejudice and zeal, he proved himself less the judicious and discriminating advocate than the bitter and uncompromising ecclesiastical partizan.

The struggle began in 1834, with the passing of the celebrated "Veto Act," founded on the early principle of the church, that ministers should not be intruded on parishes contrary to the consent of the parishioners. As the church thus considered the acceptability of a presentee a necessary qualification, the object of the act was to instruct all presbyteries to reject presentees to whom a majority of male heads of families, communicants, objected. In the case of the Auchterarder presentation, when this was acted upon, the presentee brought an action in the court of session, to declare it an undue interference with his civil rights. The church, in reply, contended that the matter was purely ecclesiastical, and altogether beyond the jurisdiction of the civil courts. The court of session thought otherwise, and, in March 1838, decided that as patronage had been constituted property by act of parliament, the obnoxious presentee, Mr. Young, was entitled to be "intruded upon" the reclaiming parish, as the rights of the patron must be maintained. The church appealed to the House of Lords, who, in May 1839, confirmed the judgment of the court of session. The General Assembly declined to implement the decision of the civil tribunals, holding itself irresponsible to any civil court for its obedience to the laws of Christ.

On reading Lord Brougham's speech, and the decision of the House of Lords, in the Auchterarder case, Mr. Miller felt deeply the peril of the church. That night, he tells us, he slept none, and in the morning, determined upon taking the popular view of the question, he commenced his famous 'Letter from one of the Scottish People to the Right Hon. Lord Brougham and Vaux, on the opinions expressed by his Lordship in the Auchterarder case.' That letter had an important and decisive effect on his after life. On finishing it, he despatched the manuscript to the manager of the Commercial Bank at Edinburgh, Mr. Robert Paul, from whom he had already experienced some kindness, and who, in the great ecclesiastical struggle, took a decided part with the church. That gentleman, after reading it, hastened with it to his minister, the Rev. Mr. afterwards Dr. Candlish of St. George's, who, recognising the ability it displayed and its popular character, urged its immediate publication. It was accordingly put into the hands of Mr. John Johnstone, the then well-known Church bookseller. The evangelical party in the church had been for some time anxious to establish an ecclesiastical newspaper in Edinburgh for the support of their principles, and a meeting of ministers and elders had been held in that city, shortly before, to take measures for the purpose. A properly qualified editor was wanted, and on reading the manuscript of Mr. Miller's 'Letter to Lord Brougham,' Dr. Candlish instantly fixed upon its writer as the very person they had been looking for to fill that office.

Meanwhile the 'Letter' was published in the form of a pamphlet, and was at once successful. It ran rapidly through four editions of a thousand copies each, and was read pretty extensively by men who were not Non-intrusionists. "Among these," says its author, "there were several members of the ministry of the time, including Lord Melbourne, who at first regarded it, as I have been informed, as the composition, under a popular form and a nom-de-guerre, of some of the Non-intrusionist leaders in Edinburgh; and by Mr. Daniel O'Connell, who had no such suspicions, and who, though he lacked sympathy, as he said, with the ecclesiastical views which it advocated, enjoyed what he termed its 'racy English,' and the position in which it placed the noble lord to whom it was addressed." Mr. W. E. Gladstone, too, in his elaborate work on 'Church Principles Considered in their Results,' noticed it very favourably. His words are: "Over and above the judicial arguments in the reports of the Auchterarder and Lethendy cases, the Church question has been discussed in a great variety of pamphlets, some of them very long and very able, others of them very long without being particularly able, and one of them particularly able without being long; I mean the elegant and masculine production of Hugh Miller, entitled 'A Letter to Lord Brougham.'

Almost immediately after its publication, Mr. Miller received a letter from Edinburgh, requesting him to meet there with the leading non-intrusionists. He accordingly proceeded to the capital, and agreed to undertake the editorship of their projected newspaper, the Witness. He then returned to Cromarty to make arrangements for finally quitting that place. He closed his connexion with the bank, and devoted a few weeks very sedulously to geology, and was fortunate enough to find specimens on which Agassiz founded two of his fossil species. On leaving his native town he was presented with an elegant breakfast service of plate from a numerous circle of friends, of all shades of politics and both sides of the church, and was entertained at a public dinner. After being fifteen years a journeyman stone-mason, and five years a bank accountant, he was now at last placed in his true position, and was enabled to give those wonderful works to the press which have procured for him a world-wide reputation.

The Witness commenced at the beginning of 1840. During the first twelvemonth, he wrote for its columns a series of geological chapters, which attracted the notice of the geologists of the British Association, assembled that year at Glasgow. In the collected form they were afterwards published, under the title of 'The Old Red Sandstone; or, New Walks in an Old field.' Of this work the Westminster Review said: "The geological formation known as the Old Red Sandstone was long supposed to be peculiarly barren of fossils. The researches of geologists, especially those of Mr. Miller, have, however, shown that formation to be as rich in organic remains as any that has been explored. Mr. Miller's exceedingly interesting book on this formation is just the sort of work to render any subject popular. It is written in a remarkably pleasing style, and contains a wonderful amount of information." The Witness, in the meantime, under his editorship rose rapidly in circulation. That paper, indeed, owed its success to his able articles, literary, ecclesiastical, and geological, and during the course of the first three years his employers raised his salary to £400. He had published another pamphlet on the church question, entitled 'The Whiggism of the Old School, as exemplified by the past history and present condition of the Church of Scotland,' which soon reached a second edition.

As the crisis of the church's fate approached, Mr. Miller's consummately able articles in the Witness greatly aided in enlightening the public mind on those principles on which the Free church was formed, and he may be said to have exercised an influence among the supporters of the spiritual independence of the church as great as that even of Dr. Chalmers himself. His mastery of the English language was complete, and to this he added a singular felicity of reasoning and a wonderful vividness of imagination not usually combined. In originality and appropriateness of illustration, and graphic force and telling significance of diction, no contemporary could compete with him. In the early years of the Witness, a twice-a-week paper, his was indeed a life of strife and toil. In the circumstances of the time, when polemical feeling was carried beyond due bounds on both sides, as the editor of the principal, and for a while the only, non-intrusion paper in the kingdom, it was impossible but that his combative spirit would be exerted to the utmost. He had to contend with many fierce and unscrupulous enemies, as almost the entire newspaper press was against him and the principles for which he so ably and fearlessly contended. "For full twenty years," he says, "I had never been engaged in a quarrel on my own account: all my quarrels, either directly or indirectly, were ecclesiastical ones;—I had fought for my minister, or for my brother parishioners: and fain now would I have lived at peace with all men; but the editorship of a non-intrusion paper involved, as a portion of its duties, war with all the world." This truth he experienced to its fullest extent, but he was a match for all opponents, and at length few indeed were the antagonists willing to cope with him. From Dr. Chalmers, himself "the greatest living Scotsman" of his day, he obtained that proud title, and while in public this self-educated and self-reliant working-man showed no mercy to those who entered the lists against him, or assailed the principles of the Free church, in private he was a singularly manly, modest, and sensitive being, whose demeanour, in itself invariably respectful, was at all times calculated to win the respect of those who came personally in contact with him. With his retiring and unassuming manners, his life was, for his position, as editor of such a paper as the Witness, a remarkably secluded one. Besides furnishing those splendid articles to its columns which were the admiration of all who read them, and most of which have been republished in some one or other of his works, he continued to devote himself, with characteristic ardour, to the prosecution of scientific inquiries, and made frequent pedestrian excursions, for geological purposes, to different parts of the country. Being now in circumstances to follow the natural bent of his genius and inclination, and develop that power of observation and research which he had cultivated from his early boyhood, whenever opportunity enabled him to put it in practice, he became known over the empire as a discoverer in science, and as one of the best and most effective writers of his time.

His celebrated work on the 'Old Red Sandstone' was published in 1841. While it placed him in the very front rank of geologists, it charmed non-scientific readers by its marvellous powers of description and the fascinating graces of its style. A succeeding work, 'First Impressions of England and its People,' was written after a visit to England, which he made in 1847. The principal characteristic of this small book was earnest and vigorous thought. In 1849 he produced another geological work of even a more profound character than his former publications, entitled 'Footprints of the Creator, or the Asterolepis of Stromness,' which Dr. Buckland, who said that he "would give his left hand to possess such powers of description as this man had," made one of the textbooks for his geological lectures at Oxford. Other teachers of geology in our universities followed his example. It was written chiefly with the view of exposing the flimsy sophistries and atheistical tendency of a work published anonymously shortly before, with the specious title of 'Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation,' and was well described as a contribution to natural theology of inestimable importance.

In 1845, on the retirement of Mr. Johnstone from the joint proprietorship of the Witness, Mr. Miller purchased his share of that prosperous and influential journal. Subsequently he and his co-partner, Mr. Fairley, were enabled to pay up the sum of one thousand pounds which had been advanced at its starting, by a committee of Non-intrusion ministers and elders, and which gave them a certain control over its management. This being at last satisfactorily got quit of, thenceforward, in the eyes of the public, who were ignorant of what took place behind the scenes, the paper assumed a more independent and commanding tone than formerly.

Mr. Miller's habits of composition were peculiar. His mind, with all its weight and force, and in spite of the rich intellectual stores which he possessed, wanted elasticity, and he was in general a slow and cautious writer. Before putting pen to paper on any subject, he spent a long time in deep thought, arranging, as it were, all its details within himself, meanwhile balancing the poker or the tongs in his hands, or gazing musingly into the fire. The author of this work was associated with him for some time as sub-editor of the Witness, and had many opportunities of observing his characteristics. He was fond of athletic exercises, and took delight in such acts as leaping upon the table, poising a chair by one of its hind legs in his right hand, and doing other feats of strength, in which no one present could compete with him. He also took a pride in snuffing a candle by the mere wave of his arm, when no other arm, though half-a-yard nearer, could do it.

In 1855, he published an autobiographical work, entitled 'My Schools and Schoolmasters,' giving an account of his own self-education and the means by which he overcame the difficulties of his position. Although necessarily somewhat egotistical, it furnishes a very interesting as well as most instructive history of his youth and early manhood, and describes, in his own characteristically attractive style, the progress of his unassisted intellectual training.

Recognised as the most eloquent living expositor of the profoundest truths of geology, in the latter years of his life he was induced to give a series of lectures on his favourite science. As a lecturer, however, he did not make the same distinguished appearance as a writer. His accent was against him, being that of the Cromarty Scottish, which, with his natural bashfulness and not very graceful address, rendered his delivery bad as a lecturer. His lectures were, therefore, not unfrequently read for him by others. Nevertheless, his high reputation as a geologist and the peculiar prestige of his name, rendered them highly popular. Whenever he made his appearance as a lecturer, the lecture-room was crowded. He began, we think, in Portobello, where, at a place called Shrub Mount, he latterly resided. He subsequently lectured in the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution, and of the eminent men whom that association has engaged to deliver lectures, no one commanded such audiences as assembled in their hall to listen to his prelections. His lectures were also most acceptably and even enthusiastically received by crowded audiences when he appeared before the Christian Institutes of London and Glasgow. But, as we have said, from the uncouthness of his pronunciation, and his want of fluency, his carefully written and elaborately prepared lectures were, in these cities, read by others, he himself sitting by. His services were always cheerfully and readily given, as far as time and strength would allow, often, indeed, beyond his strength, solely from the desire to do good. With characteristic generosity his lectures were given gratuitously, as he invariably refused payment for them, being only anxious to be serviceable to the cause of popular education.

His latest work, 'The Testimony of the Rocks,' embodies his lectures, twelve in number, on geological science. A prefatory note informs the reader that four of them were delivered before the members of the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution, one in Exeter Hall, London, and two in Glasgow; while two others were read before the Geological Section of the British Association in 1855. Of the five others, written mainly to complete, and impart a character of unity to the volume into which they have been introduced, three were addressed, viva voce, to popular audiences. The third was published both in this country and in America, and translated into some of the continental languages. The rest appeared in the volume for the first time.

This, the greatest effort of his genius, proved fatal to him. In the preparation of it for the press, his intellect exhausted itself. So great was the intensity with which he wrote upon it that his brain gave way, and he fell a victim to mental overwork. The circumstances of his death are mournful in the extreme. The statement published by his friends in the Witness, when that event took place, relates them so minutely, and describes the state of his mind for some time previously so fully, that it cannot fail to be adopted, in its main points, by every one who narrates the story of his life. For months his overtaken intellect had given evidence of disorder. He became the prey of false or exaggerated alarms, and fancied that, occasionally, for brief intervals, his faculties quite failed him. He laboured too closely on his treatise on the 'Testimony of the Rocks,' devoting to it all the day, and often half the night. This overtoiling of the brain told so fearfully on his mental powers that there can be no doubt that, latterly, his understanding was completely shattered. To guard against the apprehended attacks of robbers he was accustomed, when out of doors after nightfall, to carry a loaded pistol with him. He also followed the same practice when travelling, or when on his pedestrian excursions. It was mentioned in one of the local newspapers that, once being touched on the shoulder by one of his oldest friends from the country in a well-frequented street in Edinburgh, that gentleman was amazed by his suddenly turning round and presenting a pistol at him. This dangerous habit of carrying loaded fire-arms he is supposed to have acquired when he was accountant in the Cromarty branch of the Commercial bank, and employed occasionally to convey specie to the other branches.

In July, 1855, when residing at Portobello, about three miles from Edinburgh, he had furnished himself with a revolver. An impression took possession of his mind that his house would some night be broken into, and robbed. His museum, situated in a separate outer building, was especially, he thought, exposed to the depredations of burglars. Connected with this morbid fear of thieves was the strange fascination which descriptions of house robberies in the newspapers had for him, and he was haunted with the idea that robbers and other desperate characters were continually prowling about his premises. To guard against their assaults, he nightly placed his revolver within his reach on going to bed, beside it lay a broad-bladed dagger, whilst behind him, at his bedhead, stood a ready claymore.

A week or two before his death, the most alarming indication of his mental malady presented itself, in sudden and singular sensations in his head. It was only, however, in lengthened intervals that they came, and mostly at night, but during the short time that they lasted, they were extremely violent. Up to Monday, the 22d December, 1856, two days before his death, he had spoken of them to no one, but about ten o'clock of that day he called on Dr. Balfour in Portobello, to consult him in regard to them. That gentleman, in a communication which he afterwards drew up, thus describes what took place:—"On my asking him what was the matter with him, he replied, 'My brain is giving way. I cannot put two thoughts together to-day: I have had a dreadful night of it. I cannot face another such. I was impressed with the idea that my museum was attacked by robbers, and that I had got up, put on my clothes, and gone out with a loaded pistol to shoot them. Immediately after that I became unconscious. How long that continued I cannot say; but when I awoke in the morning I was trembling all over, and quite confused in my brain. On rising, I felt as if a stiletto was suddenly, and as quickly as an electric shock, passed through my brain from front to back, and left a burning sensation on the top of the brain, just below the bone. So thoroughly convinced was I that I must have been out through the night, that I examined my trousers to see if they were wet or covered with mud, but could find none.' He further said, 'I may state that I was somewhat similarly affected through the night twice last week, and I examined my trousers in the morning, to see if I had been out. Still, the terrible sensations were not nearly so bad as they were last night; and I may further inform you that, towards the end of last week, while passing through the Exchange in Edinburgh, I was seized with such a giddiness that I staggered, and would, I think, have fallen, had I not got into an entry, where I leaned against the wall, and became quite unconscious for some seconds." Dr. Balfour told him that he was overworking his brain, and agreed to call on him on the following day, to make a fuller examination. Mrs. Miller, that same forenoon, went to Edinburgh to consult Professor Miller, one of the most eminent surgeons of that city, as to her husband's health. What follows may be given almost in the words of the narrative of his melancholy fate which appeared in the Witness newspaper:—"I arranged," says that gentleman, "to meet Dr. Balfour at Shrub Mount, (Mr. Hugh Miller's house,) on the afternoon of next day. We met accordingly at half-past three on Tuesday. He was a little annoyed at Mrs. Miller's having given me the trouble, as he called it, but received me quite in his ordinary kind, friendly manner. We examined his chest, and found that unusually well; but soon we discovered that it was head symptoms that made him uneasy. He acknowledged having been night after night up till very late in the morning, working hard and continuously at his new book, 'which,' with much satisfaction, he said, 'I have finished this day.' He was sensible that his head had suffered in consequence, as evidenced in two ways: first, occasionally, he felt as if a very fine poignard had been suddenly passed through and through his brain. The pain was intense, and momentarily followed by confusion and giddiness, and the sense of being 'very drunk'—unable to stand or walk. He thought that a period of unconsciousness must have followed this—a kind of swoon, but he had never fallen. Second, what annoyed him most, however, was a kind of nightmare, which for some nights past had rendered sleep most miserable. It was no dream, he said; he saw no distinct vision, and could remember nothing of what had passed accurately. It was a sense of vague and yet intense horror, with a conviction of being abroad in the night wind, and dragged through places as if by some invisible power. 'Last night,' he said, 'I felt as if I had been ridden by a witch for fifty miles, and rose far more wearied in mind and body than when I lay down.' So strong was his conviction of having been out, that he had difficulty in persuading himself to the contrary, by carefully examining his clothes in the morning, to see if they were not wet or dirty; and he looked inquiringly and anxiously to his wife, asking if she was sure he had not been out last night, and walking in this disturbed trance or dream. His pulse was quiet, but tongue foul. The head was not hot, but he could not say it was free from pain. But I need not enter into professional details. Suffice it to say, that we came to the conclusion that he was suffering from an overworked mind disordering his digestive organs, enervating his whole frame, and threatening serious head affection. We told him this, and enjoined absolute discontinuance of work—bed at eleven, light supper (he had all his life made that a principal meal), thinning the hair of the head, a warm sponging-bath at bed-time, &c. To all our commands he readily promised obedience, not forgetting the discontinuance of neck-rubbing, to which he had unfortunately been prevailed to submit some days before. For fully an hour we talked together on these and other subjects, and I left him with no apprehension of impending evil, and little doubting but that a short time of rest and regimen would restore him to his wonted vigour."

After the professor's departure, as it was near the dinner hour, the servant entered the room to lay the cloth. She found Mr. Miller in the room alone. Another of the paroxysms was on him. His face was such a picture of horror, that she shrunk in terror from the sight. He flung himself on the sofa, and buried his head, as if in agony, upon the cushion. Again, however, the vision flitted by, and left him in perfect health. The evening was spent quietly with his family. During tea he employed himself in reading aloud Cowper's 'Castaway,' the 'Sonnet on Mary Unwin,' and one of his more playful pieces, for the special pleasure of his children. Having corrected some proofs of the forthcoming volume, he went up stairs to his study. At the appointed hour he had taken the bath, but unfortunately, his natural and peculiar repugnance to physic had induced him to leave untaken the medicine that had been prescribed. He had retired into a sleeping-room—a small apartment opening out of his study, and which for some time past, in consideration of the delicate state of his wife's health, and the irregularity of his own hours of study, he occupied at night alone—and lain sometime upon the bed. The horrible trance, more horrible than ever, must have returned. All that can now be known of what followed is to be gathered from the facts, that next morning his body, half-dressed, was found lying lifeless on the floor—the feet upon the study rug, the chest pierced with the ball of the revolver pistol, which was found lying in the bath that stood close by. The deadly bullet had perforated the left lung, grazed the heart, cut through the pulmonary artery at its root, and lodged in the rib in the right side. Death must have been instantaneous.

On looking round the room in which the body had been discovered, a folio sheet of paper was seen lying on the table. On the centre of the page the following lines were written—the last which that pen was ever to trace: -

"DEAREST LYDIA,

"My brain burns. I must have walked; and a fearful dream rises upon me. I cannot bear the horrible thought. God and Father of the Lord Jesus Christ have mercy upon me. Dearest Lydia, dear children, farewell. My brain burns as the recollection grows. My dear dear wife, farewell.

"HUGH MILLER."

A post-mortem examination of the body was made by Professor Miller, and Drs. A. H. Balfour, W. T. Gairdner, and A. M. Edwards. The following is the conclusion to which they came:—

"EDINBURGH, December 26, 1856.

"We hereby certify on soul and conscience, that we have this day examined the body of Mr. Hugh Miller, at Shrub Mount, Portobello.

"The cause of death we found to be a pistol-shot through the left side of the chest; and this, we are satisfied, was inflicted by his own hand.

"From the diseased appearances found in the brain, taken in connection with the history of the case, we have no doubt that the act was suicidal, under the impulse of insanity."

It is impossible to convey any adequate idea of the gloom which pervaded Edinburgh on the particulars of Hugh Miller's lamentable death being known. And this gloom was deepened by the occurrence of another sad tragedy in connexion with the fatal revolver with which he had terminated his life. After the medical inquiry into the cause of his death had been completed, Professor Miller took the revolver to the gunsmith in Edinburgh from whom it had been purchased by Mr. Miller, to ascertain how many shots had been fired, and how many still remained in the chamber. In the master's absence, the foreman, Thomas Leslie, received the weapon from the professor, and looked into the muzzle, holding the hammer with his fingers, while he turned the chamber round to count the charges. The hammer slipped from his fingers, struck the cap, and the charge in the barrel exploded. The charge entered his right eye and penetrated the brain, and he fell dead on the floor.—Subjoined is Mr. Miller's portrait :

Mr. Miller was buried in the Grange cemetery, on the south side of Edinburgh, his grave being on the same line, and a few paces distant, from that of Dr. Chalmers. The attendance of mourners at the funeral was very great, and the concourse of spectators equally so. At one part of the route the procession was joined by the kirk session of Free St. John's church, of which Mr. Miller was a deacon, by the members of the Royal Physical Society, by the compositors in the Witness office, and by several hundreds of gentlemen. Along all the streets through which the procession passed, the shops were shut at the request of the magistrates.

In person Mr. Miller was large and muscular. He had a stalwart form, and a broad and massy forehead, with a singular conformation of head. No one could see him without being convinced that there was something remarkable about him, and the individuality of his appearance was rendered the more striking by the homely dress, including the plaid thrown across the shoulder, in which he was accustomed to attire himself. It was emphatically said of him by the duke of Argyll, that "Hugh Miller was not a learned man. He knew no language but his own. He could read nothing but English; and yet, by careful and industrious habits, by spending his spare hours on the writings of the greatest authors to whom he could get access, he was enabled to write books which have attained a classical rank in the literature of the English language."

His townsmen have erected a statue of him at Cromarty. His much-cherished geological collection was, in 1858, purchased by government for £500, to be preserved in the Museum of the university of Edinburgh. An additional sum of £600, subscribed by various persons, with a view to its private purchase, was paid over to his widow, making in all £1,100, which the family received for this memento of her husband's scientific labours.

The 'Testimony of the Rocks' was published soon after his death, and from the peculiar circumstances in which it appeared, as well as from its own extraordinary merits, it attracted an unusual share of public attention. Its object is to demonstrate the bearing which geology has on both natural and revealed religion, and whatever may be the opinions entertained of the author's peculiar and thoroughly original views as to the creation and deluge, the work must certainly be considered one of the most remarkable contributions to science of the present century. He had long projected a great work on 'The Geology of Scotland,' as the completion of his scientific labours, and one on which his reputation was permanently to rest, but his strong intellect had run its course, and it never shone clearer, as appears conspicuous on every page of his final volume, than just before it suddenly sunk in darkness, to be relumed no more in this world.

Mr. Miller left a family of two sons and a daughter. The eldest son was fourteen years old at the time of his father's death. He himself was 54 years of age when that event took place.

MILNE, COLIN, LL.D., a writer on botany, born at Aberdeen in 1744. He became tutor to Lord Algernon Percy, younger son of the duke of Northumberland, and entered into holy orders. He was afterwards rector of North Chapel, in Essex, and also obtained the lectureship of Deptford. He received the degree of LL.D. from Marischal college, Aberdeen, and was likewise D.D. and F.L.S. He died in 1815. His works are:

MILNE, WILLIAM, D.D., a distinguished missionary to the Chinese, was born of poor parents, in the parish of Kinnethmont, Aberdeenshire, in April 1785. He received his education at the parish school, and afterwards resided in one or two families in the capacity of a servant. He early began to entertain religious impressions, and having read the Transactions of the London Missionary Society, and the Life of David Brainerd and of Samuel Pearce, he was induced to offer himself to that society as a missionary. In consequence he was called up to England, and put under the care of the Rev. David Bogue at Gosport, with whom, having gone through a regular course of study, and made great progress both in classical and theological knowledge, he was ordained at Portsea, July 16, 1812.

Soon after he was appointed colleague to Mr. Morrison in China, and having married a young lady in his native county, he sailed with his wife from Portsmouth, September 4, 1812, and arrived at Macao, July 4, 1813. He immediately commenced the study of the Chinese language, but was soon compelled by the Portuguese authorities to proceed to Canton. After remaining there a short time, he made a tour through the chief settlements of the Malay Archipelago for the purpose of distributing tracts and New Testaments, and afterwards returned to China. In April 1815 he embarked with his family for Malacca to take charge of the missionary establishment at that place, where he also preached once a-week to the Dutch protestants. On application to the governor at Penang, a grant was made of ground for the erection of missionary buildings, and a free press was allowed at Malacca. Having established a school for the instruction of the children of the poor, he composed for his Chinese scholars the Youth's Catechism, and printed various tracts for their use. He also translated into the Chinese language a part of the Old Testament, of which the Book of Deuteronomy, after being revised by Mr. Morrison, was printed in 1816. In May 1817 Mr. Milne commenced 'The Chinese Gleaner,' a periodical work containing extracts from the correspondence of the Eastern missionaries, with miscellaneous notices relative to the philosophy and mythology of the Indo-Chinese nations. In September 1818 Malacca was by treaty restored to the Dutch government, and on November 10 of the same year the foundation stone was laid of the Anglo-Chinese college, on which occasion both the English and Dutch authorities attended.

Previous to this period, Mr. Milne, along with Mr. Morrison, had received from the university of Glasgow the degree of D.D., which had been granted them December 24, 1817. In March 1819 he had to mourn the loss of his wife. In November of the same year the whole of the Old Testament, translated by him and his colleague, was completed, Dr. Milne having undertaken the historical portions, and Dr. Morrison the books of Solomon and the Prophets. In 1820 Dr. Milne published 'A Retrospect of the First Ten Years of the Protestant Mission to China,' in which he gives an interesting account of the history of that country, its manners, its morals, and its religion, and of the various attempts to introduce the knowledge of the gospel into that benighted land. After suffering much from the effects of the climate, Dr. Milne died at Malacca, 1822, at the age of 37, leaving four children.

MINTO, earl of, a title in the peerage of Great Britain connected with Scotland, see vol. ii. p. 132, article ELLIOT.

MITCHELL, a surname from the Anglo-Saxon Michel, signifying great; or it may be from the German Mit schuler, a disciple, literally "with a school." The Danish Mod-schiold, means courage-shield. The crest of the Mitchells is a hand holding a pen; motto, L'aveute deo supero.

MITCHELL, SIR DAVID, an eminent naval commander, in the reign of William III., was descended from a respectable family in Scotland, where he was born about the middle of the seventeenth century. He early entered the navy, and after the intermediate steps he was promoted to the command of the Elizabeth, of 70 guns. At the battle of Beachy-head he behaved with great gallantry; and in 1693 he was appointed rear-admiral of the blue. In 1694 he was knighted, and about the same time attained the rank of rear-admiral of the red. In 1698, when Peter the Great was invited by King William to visit London, Admiral Mitchell was commissioned to bring him over to England, and after a stay of three months he conveyed him back to the Continent. He was subsequently sent to Holland, on a diplomatic commission. He died soon after his return to England, June 1, 1710.

MITCHELL, SIR ANDREW, an able diplomatist, was the only son of the Rev. William Mitchell, originally of Aberdeen, and latterly one of the ministers of the High Church of Edinburgh. The date of his birth is not specified, but he is said to have been married in 1715, when very young, to a lady, who died four years after in childbirth, and whose loss he felt so deeply as to be obliged to discontinue the study of the law, for which his father had designed him, and divert his grief by travelling. In 1741 he was appointed secretary to the marquis of Tweeddale, minister for the affairs of Scotland, and in 1747 was elected M.P. for the Banff district of burghs. On the death of Thomson the poet in 1748, he and Lord Lyttleton were named his executors.

In 1751 he was nominated his majesty's representative at Brussels, where he resided for two years. Soon after his return to London in 1753 he was created a knight of the Bath, and appointed ambassador extraordinary to the court of Prussia, where, by his abilities and address, he succeeded in detaching his Prussian majesty from the French interest. At Berlin he was much celebrated for the liveliness of his conversation and the readiness of his repartees, and he became so much a favourite with the Great Frederick that he usually accompanied him in his campaigns. In consequence of bad health he returned to England in 1765, and spent some time at Tunbridge Wells. In the following year he resumed the duties of his office at Berlin, where he died, January 28, 1771. The court of Prussia honoured his funeral with their presence, and the king himself, from a balcony, is said to have beheld the procession with tears.

MITCHELL, JOSEPH, a dramatist and third-rate poet, was the son of a stone-cutter, and was born about 1684. He received a university education, and is described as "one of a club of small wits who, about 1719, published at Edinburgh, a very poor miscellany, to which Dr. Young, the well-known author of the 'Night Thoughts,' prefixed a Copy of Verses." He afterwards repaired to London, where he was fortunate enough to obtain the patronage of the earl of Stair and Sir Robert Walpole: on the latter of whom he was for a great part of his life almost entirely dependent, and was styled "Sir Robert Walpole's Poet." His dissipation and extravagance, however, kept him constantly in a state of distress; and having on one occasion applied to Aaron Hill for some pecuniary assistance, that gentleman made him a present of his tragedy of 'The Fatal Extravagance,' which was acted and published in Mitchell's name, and produced him a considerable sum. He was candid enough, however, to inform the public who was the real author of the piece, and ever after gratefully acknowledged his obligations to Mr. Hill. A collection of Mitchell's Miscellaneous Poems, in two volumes 8vo, was published in 1729; and in 1731 he brought out 'The Highland Fair, a Ballad Opera,' which was his own composition. He died 6th February, 1738.

He was the author of several popular Scottish songs, inserted in Johnson's Musical Museum, particularly 'Leave Kindred and Friends, sweet Betty,' adapted to the tune of 'Blink over the Burn, sweet Betty,' and 'By Pinkie House oft let me walk,' also 'As Sylvia in a Forest lay.' To the air of Pinkie House he also wrote another song, beginning 'As lovesick Croydon beside a murmuring rivulet lay,' which is printed in Watt's Musical Miscellany, vol. v. London, 1731. The ballad called the 'Duke of Argyle's Levee,' usually ascribed to Lord Binning, was written by Mitchell.

MITCHELL, SIR ANDREW, a gallant admiral, was born in Scotland about 1757, and received his education at Edinburgh. In 1776 he accompanied Admiral Sir Edward Vernon to India as a midshipman, and during his services in the East, he was rapidly advanced to the rank of post-captain. At the conclusion of the war, he returned to England with a convoy, and on the breaking out of hostilities with the French republic, he was appointed to the command, first of the Asia, 61, and then of the Impregnable, 90. In 1795 he became a rear-admiral; and in 1799, on being promoted to the rank of vice-admiral of the White, he hoisted his flag on board the Zealand, 64, from which ship he removed to the Isis, 50, in which he joined Lord Duncan off the coast of Holland. At the end of August he entered the Texel, where the Dutch fleet surrendered to him without firing a shot. For this service he was made a knight of the Bath. In 1802 he was appointed commander-in-chief on the coast of America. He died at Bermuda, February 26, 1806.

MITCHELL, SIR THOMAS LIVINGSTONE, D.C.L., a distinguished Australian explorer, was born in 1792. He was the eldest son of John Mitchell, Esq., of Grangemouth, descended from the Mitchells of Craigend, one of the oldest families in Stirlingshire, which took the additional name of Livingstone. Entering the army as lieutenant of the 95th Rifles, now the Rifle Brigade, at an early age, he passed through the most active period of the Peninsular War. After 1815 he was sent into Spain and Portugal to survey the different fields of battle in those countries. This service he successfully accomplished, and several of his models may be seen in the United Service Institution, London. About 1827 he was, by George IV., appointed surveyor-general of New South Wales. To this arduous service he devoted the remaining twenty-eight years of his life. He cut all the passes which lead through the mountains to the interior of the Australian continent; laid out upwards of 200 towns and villages; and conducted four expeditions of discovery, during one of which he conquered from the aborigines, and surveyed, at the same time, Australia Felix, afterwards celebrated for its gold fields. He has been deservedly called "the Cook of the Australian continent." In 1839 he was knighted by Queen Victoria, on presenting her Majesty with a map of his surveys and discoveries.

In 1838 he published, in 2 vols. 8vo, his admirable work, entitled 'Three Expeditions into the Interior of Eastern Australia,' and in 1848 he brought out a second work on his Australian discoveries, being 'A Journal of an Expedition into the Interior of Tropical Australia, in search of a route from Sydney to the Gulf of Carpentaria.' Sir Thomas was the author of several other works. His 'Manual' and 'Platoon Exercises' long formed part of the requisite equipment of young officers joining the army, as his plans of battles, drawn at the royal military college, have been for many years the only studies for military students of the senior department at Sandhurst. He prepared and published several maps of Australia, a beautiful Trigonometrical survey of Port Jackson on a large scale, and a translation of the 'Lusiad of Camoens.' He also invented the boomerang propeller, which was patented in Great Britain and America, and was adopted in many vessels as superior to every other. In 1853 he published a pamphlet entitled 'The Origin, History, and Description of the Boomerang Propeller.'

Sir Thomas represented Melbourne for some years in the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, and died at Sydney on Oct. 5, 1855. He was doctor of civil law of the university of Oxford, and a fellow of the Royal Geographical and Geological Societies, and other learned bodies. He was much beloved and respected in the colony of New South Wales, and was honoured with a public funeral. He married in 1818, Mary, eldest daughter of General Richard Blunt, colonel of the 66th regiment, by whom he had a numerous issue. His younger brothers are: J. M. Mitchell, of Mayville, merchant and Belgian consul in Leith, knight of the order of Leopold of Belgium, and Houston Mitchell of Polmood and Meadowbank.

On 16th April 1857 Sir Thomas' second daughter, Emily, married at Sydney the Right Hon. George Edward Thicknesse Touchet, 20th Lord Audley, descended from a family who were barons by tenure before the reign of Henry III., but the existing peerage, created in 1313, dates from the earliest writ of summons. Camilla Victoria, Sir Thomas' third daughter, was married the same day to J. F. Mann, Esq., son of General Mann. Lady Audley died April 1, 1860.

Sir Thomas was chief of the family of Mitchell of Craighend, which, as above mentioned, assumed the name of Livingstone, on a marriage with the heiress of a brother of Lord Viscount Kilsyth, attainted in 1716. He was chiefly remarkable for energy and perseverance in whatever he undertook, and a determination to do his duty in all circumstances. When sent to the Peninsula, after the battle of Waterloo, in 1815, to survey the different fields of battle in which our troops had been engaged, although he was there under the direct auspices of the Duke of Wellington, and although he had been introduced by Mr. Canning, then British ambassador at Lisbon, to the immediate protection of General Ballasteros, the Spanish prime minister, his surveys excited a good deal of jealousy amongst the Spaniards, and he was exposed to so much danger that he had frequently to work with the theodolite in one hand and the rifle in the other. On his return to Britain he was employed, under Sir Henry Torrens, in drawing plans for the manœuvres of the army, according to a design of his own invention, by which their accuracy could be tested on mathematical principles, and under which test many old errors of movement in echelon and wheeling were exploded, and new methods of forming squares were introduced from his drawings.

The publication of his work, "Plans of the Fields of Battle in the Peninsula," which, connected as they were with the days of his early service in the army, naturally had stronger claims on him, was delayed to allow him to publish his "Three Expeditions into the Interior of Eastern Australia," undertaken, as these expeditions were, by order of government. The most attractive of his duties, as he himself tells us in his preface to his "Tropical Australia," ever was to explore the interior of that country. Australia was then very little known to the world, and Sir Thomas Mitchell's works on the subject have been of vast use to all subsequent explorers.

MOIR, DAVID MACBETH, an accomplished poet and miscellaneous writer, the Delta of Blackwood's Magazine, was born at Musselburgh, 5th January 1798, being the second of four children which his parents had. He got the rudiments of his education at a school of minor note in his native place, and was then entered at the grammar school, where he learned the Latin, Greek, and French languages, and the elements of geometry and algebra. When thirteen years old, he was placed as an apprentice for four years with Dr. Stewart, a medical practitioner of Musselburgh. In the last year of his apprenticeship he began to attend the medical classes in the university of Edinburgh, and after pursuing the usual course of study, he received his diploma as surgeon in the spring of 1816, when he was only eighteen years of age. Soon after he joined Dr. Brown of Musselburgh, as junior partner, in his medical practice, which was extensive.

His first poetical attempt bears date 1812, being then in his fifteenth year. He soon after sent two short prose essays to 'The Cheap Magazine,' a small Haddington publication. He subsequently contributed to the Scots Magazine, and having in 1817 instituted a debating society in his native place, called "The Musselburgh Forum," he became its secretary, and took an active part in its proceedings. So pleased were the members with his services that at the end of their session they unanimously voted him a silver medal with a suitable inscription. Towards the close of the same year he ventured to print anonymously a small volume entitled 'The Bombardment of Algiers and other Poems,' which he distributed almost entirely among his friends. Having become acquainted with Mr. Thomas Pringle, the poet, one of the editors of Constable's Edinburgh Magazine, he contributed various articles, both in prose and verse, to that periodical.

His first contribution to Blackwood's Magazine was some verses, shortly after the starting of that periodical, when he was only nineteen years of age. They were sent without any signature, but, to distinguish his pieces, he adopted the subscription of Delta, by which nom-de-plume he was ever afterwards known. His earliest poem with that subscription, first entitled 'Emma,' but subsequently altered to Sir Ethelred, appeared in January 1820. For more than thirty years he continued to enrich its pages with the productions of his pen. His poems, in particular, were remarkable for their smoothness and facility of style, and evinced a delicate and graceful fancy, with a sweet pure vein of tenderness and pathos.

Towards the close of 1824, he published in a separate volume, 'The Legend of Genevieve, with other Tales and Poems,' consisting chiefly of selections from his contributions to the Magazines, with some new pieces. This work was well received, and greatly increased his poetical reputation. In October of the same year he began to contribute also to Blackwood's Magazine, one of the most laughable as well as lifelike embodiments of Scottish humour known to literature, entitled 'The Autobiography of Mansie Waugh.' It was not concluded till 1828, when it was published in a volume by itself, with additions, and in a short time ran through several editions. It was also reprinted in America and France. That the author of the touching 'Legend of Genevieve,' and the writer of the facetious history of 'Mansie Waugh,' the Dalkeith tailor, was one and the same person, could scarcely be believed at the time. In the literary world the authorship was universally assigned to John Galt, then in the zenith of his fame. But this was not the only humorous piece which the Magazine received from his pen. Among his other jocose papers furnished to that periodical were 'The Eve of St. Jerry,' 'The Auncient Waggonere,' 'Billy Ronting,' &c. some of which were ascribed to Maginn, then also a frequent contributor to its pages.

Mr. Moir wrote likewise for the Edinburgh Literary Gazette, and his contributions were prized so highly that in the end of July 1829, he was presented by the proprietors with a handsome silver jug, in token of their gratitude. On 8th June of the same year, he had married Miss Charlotte E. Bell of Leith, by whom he had eleven children, eight of whom survived him.

In 1830 he edited the collection called 'Weeds and Wildflowers,' a posthumous volume of prose and poetry, by Alexander Balfour, published for the benefit of his family, and wrote the memoir prefixed of Balfour's life.

Meantime his professional career as a medical man had kept pace with his literary success. During the terrible visitation of the cholera in 1832, Musselburgh was one of its first points of attack, and Mr. Moir was night and day in attendance on the sufferers. "Being," says his biographer, Mr. Aird, "medical secretary of the Board of Health at Musselburgh, the inquiries which he had to answer from all parts of the country, as to the prevention and treatment of the malady, were innumerable, and, almost in self-defence, in order to answer if possible once for all, he hurriedly threw together his 'Practical Observations on Malignant Cholera.' A second edition was called for in a few days after the publication of the first. He followed it up with 'Proofs of the Contagion of Malignant Cholera.' The second visitation of cholera in 1848-9 only confirmed him in his doctrine of contagion."

In 1831 he published his 'Outlines of the Ancient History of Medicine, being a view of the Progress of the Healing Art among the Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, and Arabians,' a work of great research and diversified erudition. He had been the same year presented with the freedom of his native place, and being also elected a member of the town council, he took an active part in the public affairs of the burgh. It may also be mentioned here that in 1844, he was chosen a member of the kirk session of Inveresk, and discharged the duties of the eldership with exemplary fidelity, and that in 1846 he was appointed to represent the burgh of Annan in the General Assembly of the church of Scotland, an office which was conferred upon him every succeeding year, during the remainder of his life.

In the beginning of 1833, Dr. Brown having retired from business, Mr. Moir became senior in the practice, having admitted a junior partner. On the death of Mr. Blackwood, the publisher, in 1834, Mr. Moir was named one of the executors for his family, the only one who was not a relative, a proof of the confidence which was placed in his judgment and integrity.

In 1837, on the death of Dr. McNish of Glasgow, Mr. Moir, with whom he had been in habits of intimacy and constant correspondence for years, collected his fugitive pieces, and published them with a life of the author. He also contributed memoirs of Mr. Rennie of Phantassie, the eminent agriculturist, and Sir John Sinclair, to the 'Journal of Agriculture,' and wrote a biographical sketch of Admiral Sir David Milne; besides editing a collected edition of the works of Mrs. Hemans, with notes. A memoir of Galt, written by Mr. Moir, was published in 1841. In the end of 1843 Mr. Moir published his 'Domestic Verses.' His last contribution to Blackwood's Magazine, 'The Lament of Selim,' was sent in only about a fortnight before his death. From first to last he contributed in all to its pages 370 articles in prose and verse. He was a zealous member of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, and in 1850, at a meeting of the Society, he read a paper on the Roman antiquities of Musselburgh.

For the benefit of his health Mr. Moir, on the 1st of July 1851, set out with Mrs. Moir, and their little boy, John Wilson, to Ayrshire and Dumfries, to see if a short release from professional care and change of scene would do him any good. At the latter place he was seized with a severe attack of spasms, to which he had been for some time subject, and died at the King's Arms inn, Dumfries, on the 6th of the same month, in the 53d year of his age. He was buried in the churchyard of Inveresk. A full length statue of him has been erected to his memory in his native place.

His poems, with a well-written life of him by his friend, Mr. Thomas Aird, were published at Edinburgh, in 2 vols. small 8vo, in 1852.

MOLYSON, DAVID, a poet of considerable local reputation in Fifeshire, was the eldest son of a small shopkeeper, who had been originally a tailor, and was born in the village of Moumail, May 4, 1789. After receiving the rudiments of his education at the parish school, he was removed to the school of Collesie, where he studied Latin and Greek. He was then sent to learn the trade of a printer with Mr. Robert Tullis, in Cupar-Fife. His leisure hours he devoted to the classics, and without the assistance of a teacher he obtained a knowledge of the Italian language. By an arrangement with his employer he was enabled, during his apprenticeship, to attend the university of St. Andrews, where he distinguished himself by his acquirements, and obtained prizes in the mathematical, natural philosophy, and Latin classes. Soon after his return to Monimail, he was appointed editor of a daily newspaper in Dublin, called 'Saunders' News-Letter,' where he remained for about two years, when an unfortunate disagreement with the proprietor caused him to resign his situation. During his residence in the Irish capital, he acquired a knowledge of the Spanish and German languages, and became so far master of architecture and drawing, that he once had the intention of going to London and following the profession of an architect.

On leaving Dublin, he returned to Monimail on a visit to his parents, and soon after accepted the situation of conductor of a private academy in Kirkealdy, of which the Rev. John Martin was one of the chief managers. This office, however, he only held during a few months. Owing to some misunderstanding with one of the managers, he resigned the appointment, in July 1814, and enlisting as a private soldier in the service of the East India Company, immediately embarked for Bombay. In this capacity he soon attracted the notice of his superiors. Having drawn up a memorial for one of his comrades, the officers were struck with the superior style in which it was written, and made inquiry as to the author. Soon after, the following circumstance occurred. The officers of the regiment had been unsuccessfully endeavouring to work some difficult problem in engineering, relative to the throwing of shells, which they left unsolved on the table of their room. Molyson had occasion to see it lying there, when he solved it at once. The officers found it next morning, and on inquiry were informed that private Molyson was the name of the person who had solved the problem which had so much puzzled them, on which they promoted him at once to the rank of sub-conductor of the ordnance. He had also some connection with the post-office, and all the letters which came to soldiers who were dead fell into his possession. Of some of these he made an interesting use afterwards, in a series of articles which he wrote for Chambers' Edinburgh Journal, entitled 'The Dead-Letter Box.'

After a residence of twenty-two months in Bombay, his health began to fail under an eastern climate; and, having obtained his discharge, he returned to Scotland with a broken constitution and a small pension of about two shillings a-day. He now took up his residence at Monimail, where he devoted himself to study, and particularly to poetry. During his stay in India, he had made himself thoroughly acquainted with Hindostanee, and in his retirement he translated a long poem from that language, which, on his death, was found among his manuscripts. He wrote a great many poems for Blackwood's Magazine, the principal of which, entitled 'Hubert; an Indian Tale,' in blank verse, extended over six or eight pages of that periodical. He also contributed largely to the Caledonian Magazine, a Dundee publication. About 1829 he was appointed editor of the Fife Herald, which he conducted with talent and spirit during the peculiarly arduous period which followed Earl Grey's installation into office. Having paid some attention to the Gaelic language, he wrote several papers for the Herald, showing that many places in Fifeshire derive their names from the Gaelic. In July 1831 bad health obliged him to resign his situation, when he returned to his native village, where he commenced the business of a land-surveyor. In this profession he obtained so much employment as enabled him, with the assistance of his pension, not only to support himself, but also to provide for those who remained of his father's family. His father died July 30, 1832; and to recruit his own health he went with his brother, for a short time, to the fishing village of Buckhaven, an interesting description of which he afterwards contributed to Chambers' Journal. He died, unmarried, at Monimail, after a lingering illness, March 4, 1834. He was of a modest and retiring disposition, and much esteemed by all who knew him. To him his native village is indebted for a library, of which he was the first suggester and president, and a tribute of esteem and gratitude is recorded in its minutes to his memory.

MONBODDO, LORD. See BURNETT, JAMES.

MONCREIFF, the surname of an old family, originally of Perthshire, the progenitor of which in Scotland is stated to have been a Mortimer, of Anglo-Norman lineage, who assumed the name of Moncreiff on obtaining the lands of Moncreiff in that county. Ramerus de Moncreiff, who lived in the beginning of the 12th century, was keeper of the wardrobe to Alexander I. In the Ragman Roll, among those who swore fealty to Edward I. in 1296, is mentioned Johannes de Moncrief, chevalier. A charter of the barony of Moncreiff was granted in 1495 to Sir John Moncreiff, whose great-grandson, Sir John Moncreiff of Moncreiff, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, with remainder to his heirs-male whatsoever, 22d April 1626. This baronetcy is thus one of the oldest in Scotland, the order of knight baronet projected by James VI. in 1621, being instituted by Charles I. on 28th May 1625.

The first baronet died in 1630. The second baronet, the eldest son of this gentleman, being embarrassed in his affairs, was compelled, in 1633, to sell the estate of Moncreiff to a younger cadet of the family, Thomas Moncreiffe, Esq., one of the clerks of the Exchequer, who was created a baronet in 1685. Sir John died, unmarried, in 1675, when the title devolved upon his brother, Sir David, third baronet, on whose death, also unmarried, his younger brother, Sir James Moncreiff, became fourth baronet. With him the direct line of the first baronet expired, and the baronetcy reverted to his heir-at-law, Sir John Moncreiff of Tippermalloch, fifth baronet, an eminent physician, descended directly from Hugh Moncreiff, a brother of the first baronet. Sir John married Nicholas, daughter of Moncreiff of Easter Moncreiff, and died about 1710.

His only son, Sir Hugh, sixth baronet, died, unmarried, in 1644, when he bequeathed the estate of Tippermalloch to his nephew, Mr. George Moncreiff, the son of his sister. The title devolved on his kinsman, the Rev. Sir William Moncreiff, minister of Blackford, in Perthshire, seventh baronet, descended from Archibald Moncreiff, uncle of the first baronet. Sir William was eldest son of the Rev. Archibald Moncreiff, by Catherine, eldest daughter of John Halliday, Esq. of Tulliebole, Kinross-shire. By his wife, Catherine, eldest daughter of Robert Wellwood, Esq. of Garvock, he had six sons and one daughter, and died 9th December 1767.

His eldest son, the Rev. Sir Henry Wellwood Moncreiff, D.D., eighth baronet, a distinguished divine of the Church of Scotland, was born at Blackford manse in February 1750. He received his early education at the parish school of his native place, and being destined for the ministry, he was sent to the university of Glasgow, where, after the usual course of preliminary study, he entered the divinity hall. On his father's death, which took place during his attendance at college, he was fixed upon as his successor in the parish of Blackford, but as he was then too young to be ordained, an assistant was appointed in the meantime, and the young baronet removed to the university of Edinburgh, to complete his theological studies. In 1771 he was licensed to preach the gospel, and August 15th that year, was ordained minister of the church and parish of Blackford. In October 1775 he was translated to St. Cuthbert's parish, Edinburgh, one of the most populous and important charges in the metropolis. Here he soon became distinguished for his devoted zeal and fidelity in the discharge of his ministerial duties, for the mildness and benevolence of his disposition, and for his great personal worth, as well as for his genius and eloquence as a preacher. Taking from the first an active share in the business of the church courts, in opposition to the moderate, then the dominant party, he soon became the leader of the evangelical section of the church; and in 1785 he was unanimously elected moderator of the General Assembly.

In 1784, he had been appointed collector of the fund for the widows and children of the clergy, and filled that important situation till his death, receiving annually, for the long period of forty-three years, the thanks of the Assembly, for the able, faithful, and affectionate manner in which he discharged the duties of the office. He was also one of the original members of the society of the sons of the clergy, and by his influence and exertions contributed greatly to its success. He died, after a lingering illness, August 9, 1827, in the 78th year of his age and 56th of his ministry.

His funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Andrew Thomson, minister of St. George's, Edinburgh, and afterwards published. In the following eloquent passages, Dr. Thomson has faithfully described his public and private character:—"It was in early life that he began to take an active part in the government of our national church. The principles of ecclesiastical polity which he adopted, as soon as he entered on his public career, he adopted from full and firm conviction, and he maintained and cherished, and avowed them to the very last. They were the very same principles for which our forefathers had contended so nobly, which they at length succeeded in establishing, and which they bequeathed as a sacred and blood-bought legacy to their descendants. But though that circumstance gave a deep and solemn interest to them in his regard, he was attached to them on more rational and enlightened grounds. He viewed them as founded on the word of God, as essential to the rights and liberties of the Christian people, as identified with the prosperity of genuine religion, and with the real welfare and efficiency of the Establishment; and, therefore, he embraced every opportunity of inculcating and upholding them; resisted all the attempts that were made to discredit them in theory, or to violate them in practice, rejoiced when they obtained even a partial triumph over the opposition they had to encounter, and clung to them, and struggled for them, long after they were borne down by a system of force and oppression, and when, instead of the numerous and determined host that fought by his side in happier times, few and feeble, comparatively, were those who seconded his manly efforts, and held fast their own confidence; but he lived to see a better spirit returning. This revival cheered and consoled him. Fervently did he long and pray for its continuance and its spread. Nor did he neglect to employ his influence, in order to introduce pastors who would give themselves conscientiously to their Master's work, preaching to their flocks the truth as it is in Jesus, watching for souls as those that must give an account, and faithfully and fearlessly performing all the duties incumbent on them, both as ministers and as rulers in the Church.

"He stood forth from among his contemporaries, confessedly pre-eminent in strength of personal and social character. There was a magnanimity in his modes of thinking and of acting, which was as evident to the eye of observation as were the lineaments of his face and the dignity of his gait. His great and primary distinction was a clear, profound, and powerful understanding, which spurned from it all trifles, and advanced to the decision it was to give with unhesitating promptitude and determined firmness. Those who knew him best can best give witness how faithfully and habitually he embodied his knowledge, and his principles, and his hopes, as a Christian, into his life and deportment, his daily walk and conversation; how tenderly he cared for the fatherless and the widow that were so often committed to his charge; how active and assiduous he was in helping forward deserving youth, in giving counsel and aid to the many who had recourse to him in their difficulties, and in doing good to all his brethren, with unaffected kindness, as he had opportunity; how patient and resigned amidst the severest bereavements (and of these he experienced not a few) with which Providence can visit the children of mortality; how fervent in his devotions and prayers; how diligent in his study of the sacred volume, from which he drew all his religious opinions; how correct and dignified in the whole of his personal demeanour; how engaging in the lighter play, as well as in the graver exercise of his social affections; and how ready, amidst all the attainments he had made, and all the honour he had received from men, to acknowledge the inadequacy of his services, and the sinfulness and imperfection that mingled in all his doings, and still to betake himself to the blood of sprinkling and the finished work of the Messiah, as all his refuge and as all his hope."—Sir Henry was the author of—

Sermons. Edinburgh, 1806, 8vo.

A Sermon preached at the funeral of the Rev. Andrew Hunter, D.D. Edinburgh, 1809, 8vo.

Discourses on the Evidences of the Jewish and Christian Revelations, with notes and illustrations. Edin. 1815.

Account of the Life and writings of John Erskine, D.D., one of the ministers of Edinburgh. Edin. 1818.

He also wrote a small work on the Constitution of the Church of Scotland.

His Sermons were collectively published in 3 vols., 8vo, with a short Memoir of the Author by his son, Lord Moncreiff. Edin. 1829-31.

Sir Henry married in 1773, his cousin, Susan, daughter of Mr. James Robertson Barelay of Keavil, Fifeshire, writer to the signet, by whom he had five sons and two daughters. The eldest son, William Wellwood Moncreiff, LL.D., became king's advocate in the admiralty court of Malta, where the husband of his eldest sister, Sir John Stoddart, presided as chief justice, and died, unmarried, September 5th, 1813.

His second son, James Wellwood Moncreiff, afterwards a lord of session, under the title of Lord Moncreiff, succeeded as the ninth baronet. Born 13th September 1776, he completed his education at Oxford, and was admitted an advocate at the Scottish bar, 26th January 1799. On 7th February 1807 he was appointed sheriff of Clackmannan and Kinross. He rapidly attained to great distinction in his profession, though some of the greatest jurists that Scotland has produced, were then members of the bar, taking rank with Clerk and Cranstoun, with Cockburn and Jeffrey. In 1826, he was chosen dean of faculty, as successor to Cranstoun. In the following year, when the murderer Burke and his associate Hare were tried for that series of murders which has made the name of the former a synonyme in our language for sudden and violent death, he and the leading advocates of the Scotch bar generously undertook their defence, from the fear lest their poverty and the instinctive horror felt for the criminals might leave them without the assistance of counsel.

He was elevated to the bench, and took his seat as Lord Moncreiff, 24th June 1829. He was, at the same time, appointed a lord of justiciary. As a judge he fully sustained his reputation as an advocate. In the court of session his judgments were distinguished for learning and sagacity, and in the justiciary court he was most remarkable for his dispassionate weighing of evidence, his sound appreciation of the rules of law, and the impressive solemnity of his charges on great occasions.

In 1832 he was called to give evidence before a select committee of the house of commons appointed to inquire into the origin and exercise of church patronage in Scotland. The questions he had to answer reached to the very foundations of the ecclesiastical polity of the Presbyterian church, and his evidence was remarkable for its fulness, clearness, and knowledge of the subjects under inquiry. For extensive and sound legal knowledge, for acuteness, combined with an ever healthy and reliable judgment, and for indefatigable industry, few of his contemporaries at the bar or on the bench, and there were many able men among them, were superior to him.

Sir James Moncreiff died 30th April 1851, aged 75. He had married in 1808, Ann, daughter of Captain George Robertson, R.N., and by this lady, who died in 1843, he had five sons and three daughters, Elizabeth, Louisa Ann, and Catherine Mary.

The eldest son, the Rev. Sir Henry Wellwood Moncreiff, B.A., tenth baronet, born in 1809, was ordained minister of the parish of East Kilbride, Lanarkshire, in 1836, and at the disruption, in 1843, he joined the Free Church. He was afterwards translated to St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh. He married in 1838, Alexina-Mary, daughter of George Bell, Esq., of that city. He is one of the two principal clerks of the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, the Rev. Patrick Clason, D.D., Buccleuch church, being the other; and on the death, in 1861, of Dr. James Robertson, professor of divinity and church history in the university of Edinburgh, he was appointed his successor as secretary to her majesty's sole and only master printers in Scotland.

It is a remarkable circumstance in the history of this branch of the family of Moncreiff that the present baronet is the 7th in lineal succession who have been ministers in the Church of Scotland.

The 2d son, James Moncreiff, born in 1811, educated at High School and university of Edinburgh, passed advocate in 1833; became solicitor-general of Scotland in February 1850, and lord-advocate in April 1851; continued in the latter office till March 1852; and from December 1852 till February 1858; elected M.P. for Leith in 1851, and several times rechosen; elected dean of faculty of advocates in 1858; LL.D. (Edin.) 1858; re-appointed lord advocate in June 1859; M.P. for Edinburgh in 1839; a deputy lieutenant for Mid Lothian, and lieutenant-colonel of Edinburgh Volunteers; married in 1834, Isabella, only daughter of Robert Bell, Esq.; with issue.

The 3d son, William, born in 1813, married in 1860, Susan Ballantyne, youngest daughter of J. Dykes-Ballantyne Dykes, Esq. of Dwenby Hall, Cumberland.

The 4th son, the Rev. George Robertson Moncreiff, A.B., born in 1817, of Balliol college, Oxford.

The 5th son, Thomas, was born Oct. 5, 1821.

The family of Moncreiffe of Moncreiffe, a younger branch of the original family of the name, also possesses a baronetcy of Nova Scotia, created 30th November 1685, with remainder to the heirs-male whatsoever of the first baronet, Sir Thomas Moncreiffe, clerk of the exchequer and treasury. This gentleman, having acquired great wealth, purchased, as already stated, the estate of Moncreiffe, the ancient inheritance of his ancestors, from his cousin, Sir John Moncreiff, the second baronet of the older branch. He married a lady of the house of Hamilton, who bequeathed to the parish of Dunbarny, Perthshire, in which the estate of Moncreiffe is situated, two silver communion cups, bearing the inscription: "Dam. Betha, Hamilton, spouse to Sir Thomas Moncreiffe of that ilk, left in legacy those two cups to the church of Dunbarny. Anno Domini, 1703." She also bequeathed to the same parish a large silver baptismal plate or font. Sir David died without issue, when the title and estate devolved upon his nephew, Sir Thomas Moncreiffe, the second baronet, who, by his wife, Margaret, daughter of David Smythe, Esq. of Methven, had two sons and three daughters. David Stuart Moncreiffe of Moredun, the second son, having passed advocate, was early promoted to the office of king's remembrancer in the Scottish exchequer court, and was afterwards appointed one of the barons of the exchequer in Scotland.

Sir Thomas Moncreiffe, the fifth baronet, the nephew of this gentleman, married Lady Elizabeth Ramsay, daughter of the earl of Dalhousie, and by her had one son, the sixth baronet. The match is said not to have been a happy one, and as it was mainly brought about by Baron Moncreiffe, he deemed himself bound to take the lady's part, and at his death he left her the estate of Moredun in the parish of Liberton, near Edinburgh. It afterwards became the property of David Anderson, Esq. She died 3d June, 1848, from injuries sustained by her dress accidentally catching fire.

Sir Thomas, 7th baronet of this branch, born Jan. 9, 1822, succeeded on the death of his father, Nov. 20, 1830. He married, May 2, 1843, Lady Louisa Hay, eldest daughter of the earl of Kinnoull; issue, 3 sons and 8 drs. Robert Drummond Moncreiffe, his eldest surviving son, born Nov. 3, 1855.

The Moncreiffe family possesses the patronage of two bur-saries in the university of St. Andrews. The view from the beautiful hill of Moncreiff, within two miles of Perth, whence they derive their name, was called by Pennant "the glory of Scotland." In Scott's 'Fair Maid of Perth' there is a most graphic description of it.

MONCUR, a surname derived from the French words mon cœur, my heart. There was an old family, Moncur of that ilk, in Perthshire. In the charters of Robert I. and David II. this name of Moncur is mentioned, and in the reign of Robert III., Andreas Moncur de eodem is witness in a charter of Rait of Hallgreen. The ruins of the ancient castle of Moncur are still to be seen in the parish of Inchture, in the care of Gowrie.

MONRO, the name of the clan Roich. See MUNRO.

MONRO, ALEXANDER, M.D., an eminent anatomist, the founder of the medical school at Edinburgh, styled Primus, to distinguish him from his son and successor, was descended, by his father, from the family of Munro of Milntoun, in Ross-shire, and by his mother, from that of Forbes of Culloden, though he himself was born in London, September 8, 1697. His father John, youngest son of Sir Alexander Monro of Bearcrofts, who was a colonel in the army of Charles II. at the battle of Worcester, served for some years as a surgeon in the army of King William in Flanders; and, on his retirement, settled at Edinburgh, where he soon acquired an extensive practice. He gave his son Alexander the best education which that city afforded, and then sent him to London, where he attended the anatomical lectures of Cheselden. Young Monro afterwards pursued his studies at Paris and Leyden, at the latter place under the celebrated Boerhaave. On his return to Edinburgh in the autumn of 1719, Messrs. Drummond and M'Gill, who were then conjunct nominal professors and demonstrators of anatomy to the Company of Surgeons, resigned in his favour. In 1720 by the advice of his father, he began to give public lectures on anatomy; and at the same time Dr. Alston, (see vol. i. p. 121,) then a young man, also at the suggestion of the elder Monro, commenced delivering lectures on the materia medica and botany. His father likewise communicated to the physicians and surgeons of Edinburgh a plan for having the different branches of physic and surgery regularly taught at Edinburgh; and by their interest, professorships of anatomy and medicine were instituted in the university. To complete the plan, subscriptions were set on foot for the establishment of an hospital, and considerable sums raised, chiefly by the exertions of Mr. George Drummond, lord provost, and Dr. Alexander Monro, who wrote a pamphlet, strongly pointing out the advantages of such an institution. The Royal Infirmary was in consequence founded, Provost Drummond and Dr. Monro being appointed a committee to superintend its building; and on its being opened, he delivered clinical lectures there for the benefit of the students. Thus was commenced at Edinburgh that regular course of instruction which obtained for the medical school of that city the reputation of being the best in the world.

Dr. Monro had been elected, in 1721, the first professor of anatomy in the college of Edinburgh, but he was not received into the university till 1725, when he was inducted along with the celebrated mathematician, Mr. Colin Maclaurin. In 1726 appeared his 'Osteology, or Treatise on the Anatomy of the Bones,' which passed through eight editions during his life, and was translated into various foreign languages. In the later editions he added a concise description of the Nerves, and of the Lacteal Sac and Thoracic Duct. A society having been established at Edinburgh by the professors, and other practitioners of the town, for the purpose of collecting and publishing papers on professional subjects, Dr. Monro was appointed secretary, and under his active superintendence, six volumes of 'Medical Essays' were published, the first of which appeared in 1732. Of this collection many of the most valuable papers were written by Dr. Monro, on anatomical, physiological, and practical subjects. When the society was afterwards extended to the admission of members eminent in literature, and philosophical as well as medical papers were received, Dr. Monro became one of its vice-presidents, and furnished several useful contributions to the two volumes which were published of its Memoirs, entitled 'Essays, Physical and Literary.' In 1759 he resigned the anatomical chair to his youngest son, Dr. Alexander Monro, Secundus, but still continued his clinical lectures at the Infirmary. He died July 10, 1767, at the advanced age of 70. By his wife Isabella, daughter of Sir Donald Macdonald of Sleat, baronet, he had several children.

His works are :

Osteology; or a Treatise on the Anatomy of the Bones. To which are added, A Treatise of the Nerves, an Account of the Reciprocal Motions of the Heart, and a Description of the Human Lacteal Sae and Duet. Edin. 1726, 1732, 8vo. 6th edit. corrected and enlarged. 1758, 8vo. Also, 1763, 8vo. And frequently since. He also wrote the life of his father, prefixed to the edition of his works of 1781, as above stated.

MONRO, ALEXANDER, M.D., styled Secundus, also a distinguished physician and professor, youngest son of Dr. Alexander Monro, Primus, was born at Edinburgh March 21, 1733. He received the rudiments of his education under Mr. Mundell, an eminent teacher of languages, and went through the usual academical course at the university of his native city. About the eighteenth year of his age, he entered on his medical studies under his father, and soon became a useful assistant to him in the dissecting room. In October 1755 he obtained the degree of M.D., on which occasion he published and defended an inaugural dissertation, 'De Testibus et Semine in variis Animalibus.' In July 1756 he was admitted joint-professor of anatomy and surgery with his father; but previous to entering upon the duties, with the view of further prosecuting his studies, he visited both London and Paris, and afterwards attended for some time the anatomical lectures of the celebrated Professor Meckell at the university of Berlin. He returned to Edinburgh in the summer of 1758, when he was admitted a licentiate of the Royal College of Physicians, of which he was afterwards president. He was soon chosen a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians; and on the resignation of Dr. Monro, Primus, in 1759, he became full professor of anatomy. He also succeeded his father as secretary of the Philosophical Society of Edinburgh, in whose 'Essays and Observations, Physical and Literary,' appeared several able articles from his pen, on important subjects in medical science.

Having early adopted the idea that the valvular lymphatics over the whole of the animal body were one general system of absorbents, he published at Berlin, in 1758, a short treatise, 'De Venis Lymphaticis Valvulosis.' This idea was afterwards claimed by Dr. William Hunter of London, which led to a controversy between these two distinguished physicians, and produced from Dr. Monro his 'Observations, Anatomical and Physiological, wherein Dr. Hunter's claim to some discoveries is examined,' and his 'Answer to the Notes in the Postscript to Observations, Anatomical and Physiological.' In 1782 the Philosophical Society was incorporated by royal charter, when it took the name of the Royal Society of Edinburgh. Dr. Monro was elected one of its first fellows, and enriched its Transactions with various valuable contributions. In 1783 he published a large folio volume 'On the Structure and Functions of the Nervous System,' illustrated by numerous engravings, which was translated into the German and other languages. In 1785 he produced another folio volume 'On the Structure and Physiology of Fishes,' illustrated with figures, which also was honoured with various foreign translations. In 1788 appeared his 'Description of all the Bursæ Mucosæ of the Human Body,' which at once became a standard work. His last publication was a quarto volume, consisting of three treatises, on the Brain, the Eye, and the Ear, published at Edinburgh in 1797. His reputation, both as a lecturer and author, extended throughout Europe, and he was elected a member of the Royal Academies of Paris, Madrid, Berlin, Moscow, and other learned institutions.

In 1798, increasing years caused him to receive at his class the assistance of his son, Dr. Alexander Monro, Tertius, then appointed conjunct professor of anatomy with him. He continued, however, to deliver lectures till the session of 1808-9, when he finally retired from the anatomical chair. At the same time he relinquished his practice, which was very extensive. He died October 2, 1817, in his 85th year.—His works are :

Dr. Alexander Monro, Tertius, the successor of his father in the anatomical chair, born Nov. 5, 1773, was educated at the High school and university of Edinburgh. He studied medicine, anatomy, and surgery in London, and subsequently repaired for a short time to Paris. In 1799 he took his degree of M.D. In 1803 the class of practical anatomy in the university of Edinburgh was instituted by him, and in 1808 he succeeded his father as professor of anatomy. His works are:

In 1828 he was president of the Royal College of Physicians of Scotland. He retired from his chair in 1847, with the title of Emeritus Professor of Anatomy; and thus ended the connection between the college of Edinburgh and the family of Monro, which had occupied professorial chairs within her walls for upwards of one hundred years.

He died at his seat of Craigmackhart, near Edinburgh, March 10, 1859. At the time of his death he was actively engaged in the execution of a work upon 'Craniology and Idiocy.' He was the father of the Royal Society of Scotland, and contributed valuable and instructive papers both to that Society and the Royal College of Physicians.

MONTEATH, or MONTETH, a surname, see MENTEITH, p. 148 of this volume.

MONTEITH, or MONTETH, ROBERT, an eminent historian, was born at Salmonet, near Grange, in Stirlingshire, and flourished about the middle of the seventeenth century. The particulars of his life are involved in much obscurity. According to tradition, he was obliged to leave Scotland, being suspected of adultery with the wife of Sir James Hamilton of Prestonfield. He appears to have been a chaplain of Cardinal de Retz, who also made him a canon of Notre Dame. Another account states that having, in consequence of his loyalty, taken refuge in France, he ingratiated himself with Cardinal Richelieu, and was offered a situation under government, provided he could show a pedigree. He said he was of the family of Salmonet in Stirlingshire, and was promoted accordingly. According to tradition his father had been a salmon fisher in the Borough meadow of Stirling; and the son had taken his title from the net in which the salmon were caught. But this is not correct. He was the son of an old and respectable family, and there was once a place in Stirlingshire called Salmonet.

He wrote a work in French, embracing the period of Scottish history from the coronation of Charles I. to the conclusion of the rebellion; a translation of which, by James Ogilvie, appeared at London in 1735, under the title of 'History of the Troubles of Great Britain, containing an Account of the most remarkable Passages, from 1633 to 1650.' The date of his death is unknown. It must have been previous to the publication of the original work, as in the privilege for printing it, granted September 13, 1660, to Jacques St. Clair de Roselin, the author is styled "Le defunct St. Montet." He must not be confounded with another Robert Monteith, the compiler of a scarce and valuable collection of all the epitaphs in Scotland, published under the name of 'An Theater of Morality,' in 1704.

MONTGOMERY, the surname of the noble family of Eglinton, which traces its descent from Roger de Mundegumbrie, Viscount de Hiesmes, son of Hugh de Mundegumbrie and Joceline de Beaumont, niece of Gonnora, wife of Richard, duke of Normandy, great-grandmother of William the Conqueror. Roger de Mundegumbrie, thus nearly allied to the ruling house of Normandy, after having obtained great distinction under the Norman banner in France, accompanied his kinsman, William the Conqueror, into England, and commanded the van of the invading army at the decisive battle of Hastings in 1066. In reward of his bravery he was, by the Conqueror, created earl of Chichester and Arundel, and soon after of Shrewsbury. He also received from him large grants of land, becoming, in a short time, lord of no fewer than fifty-seven lordships throughout England, with extensive possessions in Salop. Having made a hostile incursion into Wales, he took the castle of Baldwin, and gave it his own name of Montgomery, a name which both the town in its vicinity and the entire county in which it stands have permanently retained.

It is not known whence the name was derived. Enstace, in his 'Classical Tour,' vol. i. p. 298, mentions a lofty hill, called Monte Gomero, not far from Loretto; and in the old ballad of 'Chevy Chase,' the name is given as Mongon-byrry.

The first of the name in Scotland was Robert de Montgomery, supposed to have been a grandson of Earl Roger. When Walter, the son of Alan, the first high steward of Scotland, whose castle of Oswestry was in the vicinity of Shrewsbury, came to Scotland to take possession of several grants of land which had been conferred upon him by David I., Robert de Montgomery was one of the barons who accompanied him from Wales, and received from him the manor of Eglisliam, in the county of Renfrew. This was for two centuries the chief possession of the Scottish section of the Montgomeries, and still remains their property undiminished as at first. Robert de Montgomery is a witness to the foundation charter of Walter, the high steward, to the monastery of Paisley in 1160, and to other charters between that year and 1175. He died about 1177.

In the Ragman Roll appear the names of John de Montgomery, and his brother Murthaw, as among the barons who swore fealty to Edward I. in 1296. The former is designated of the county of Lanark, which then comprehended the county of Renfrew. The latter was the reputed ancestor of the Montgomeries of Thornton.

Sir John Montgomery, the seventh baron of Eaglesham, one of the heroes of the battle of Otterburn, married Elizabeth, only daughter and sole heiress of Sir Hugh de Eglinton, justiciary of Lothian, and niece of Robert II., and obtained with her the baronies of Eglinton and Ardrossan. He was the ancestor of the earls of Eglinton, as mentioned under that title, where the lineage of that noble family has been already given, (see vol. ii. page 119).

A baronetcy of the United Kingdom was possessed by the family of Montgomery of Macbeth Hill, or Magbie Hill, Peebles-shire, descended from Troilus Montgomery, son of Adam Montgomery of Giffen, a cadet of the Eglinton family, living in the reigns of James V., and Mary queen of Scots. It was conferred, 28th May, 1774, on William Montgomery of Magbie Hill, but expired on the death of his son, Sir George Montgomery, second baronet, 9th July 1831.

Sir William's brother, Sir James Montgomery, of Stanhope, Peebles-shire, an eminent lawyer, was also created a baronet. Born at Magbie Hill, in 1721, he was educated for the Scottish bar, and attained to considerable distinction as an advocate. On the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions in Scotland in 1748, he was one of the first sheriffs then named by the crown, and he was the last survivor of those of this first nomination. He rose gradually to the offices of solicitor-general, and lord-advocate, and in 1775 was appointed lord-chief-baron of the court of exchequer in Scotland. Upon his retirement from the bench in 1801, he was created a baronet of the United Kingdom. His exertions in introducing the most improved modes of agriculture into Peebles-shire gained for him the title of 'Father of the county.' He died April 2, 1803, at the age of 82. His eldest son, William, lieutenant-col. 43d foot, having predeceased him, he was succeeded by his 2d son, Sir James, 2d baronet, born Oct. 9, 1766; appointed lord-advocate in 1804, resigned in 1806; at one time M.P. for Peebles-shire. He died May 27, 1839.

His sons by a first wife having predeceased him, he was succeeded by his eldest son by his 2d wife, daughter of Thomas Graham, Esq. of Kinross. This son, Sir Graham Graham Montgomery, 3d baronet, born July 9, 1823, graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, B.A.; m. in 1845, Alice, daughter of John James Hope-Johnston, Esq. of Annandale, M.P. Issue 4 sons and 4 drs. Sons: James Gordon Henry, born Feb. 6, 1850, Basil-Templer, Charles Percy, and Arthur Cecil. M.P. for Peebles-shire, 1852; lord-lieut. of Kinross-shire, 1854.

The first of the family of Montgomerie of Annick Lodge, Ayrshire, was Alexander, second son of Hugh Montgomerie of Coilsfield, brother of Hugh, twelfth earl of Eglinton. His son, William Eglinton Montgomerie, succeeded him in 1802. The eldest sister of the latter, Elizabeth, was the first wife of the Right Hon. David Boyle, lord-justice-general of Scotland, and died in 1822.

The Irish family of Montgomery of Grey Abbey, county Down, is descended from Sir Hugh Montgomery, sixth laird of Braidstone, in the parish of Beith, Ayrshire, a cadet of the noble house of Eglinton, and the principal leader in the colonization of Ulster in 1606. The insurrectionary disturbances in Ireland before the death of Queen Elizabeth, had placed a large extent of confiscated property at the disposal of the crown. The laird of Braidstone, with a view of obtaining some portion of it, effected the escape of Con O'Neil, the chief of Ulster, from the castle of Carrickfergus, where he had long been imprisoned. O'Neil, in consequence "granted and assigned one half of all his land estate in Ireland" to him "his heirs and assigns." Thereafter, O'Neil and Braidstone went to Westminster, when, through the influence of Braidstone's brother, George, who was chaplain to his majesty, O'Neil received pardon of the king; Braidstone was knighted, and orders were given that the agreement betwixt them should be confirmed by letters patent, under the great seal of Ireland, "at such rents as therein might be expressed, and under condition that the lands should be planted with British protestants, and that no grant of fee farm should be made to any person of mere Irish extraction."

In the winter of 1605, Sir Hugh Montgomery obtained from O'Neil a deed of feoffment of all his lands. In the following May, the plantation of Ulster had begun. Amongst the gentlemen who joined Sir Hugh in the enterprize were, John Shaw of Greenock, Patrick Montgomerie of Blackhouse, Colonel David Boyd, Patrick Shaw of Kersland, Hugh Montgomerie, junior, Thomas Nevin of Monkreddin, Patrick Mure of Dugh, Sir William Edmiston of Duntreath, and Messrs. Neill and Calderwood; besides a great many retainers. In 1610, only four years after the first planting, Sir Hugh brought before the king's muster-master 1,000 able fighting men.

The success of this Scotch enterprize led to the formation of the London companies in 1612, and thus was founded the protestant province of Ulster, which, says Hume, from being "the most wild and disorderly province of all Ireland, soon became the best cultivated and most civilized."

In 1622, Sir Hugh Montgomery was raised to the peerage of Ireland as Viscount Montgomery of Ardes, county Down. He was grandfather of Hugh, third Viscount Montgomery of Ardes, created in 1661, earl of Mount Alexander. These titles expired with Thomas, seventh earl, in 1758.

The Montgomeries of the Hall, county Donegal, possessing a baronetcy of the united kingdom, of the creation of 1808, and the Montgomeries of Convoy House, in the same county, are also descended from the Eglinton family, their progenitors in Ireland being among the settlers in Ulster in the reign of James VI. and I.

MONTGOMERY, ALEXANDER, a celebrated poet of the reign of James VI., supposed to have been a younger son of Montgomery of Hazlehead Castle, in Ayrshire, a branch of the noble family of Eglintoun, was born probably about the middle of the 16th century. Of his personal history there are no authentic memorials. In his poem, entitled 'The Navigatioun,' he calls himself "ane German born." Dempster describes him as "Equus Montanus, vulgo vocatus;" but it is certain that he was never knighted. In the titles to his works he is styled "Captain," and it is conjectured that he was at one time a commander in the body guard of the Regent Morton. Melvil, in his 'Diary,' mentions him about 1577, as "Captain Montgomery, a good honest man, and the regent's domestic." His poetical talents procured him the patronage of James VI., from whom he enjoyed a pension. In his majesty's 'Reulis and Cautelis to be observit and eschewit in Scottish Poesie,' published in 1584, the royal critic quotes some of Montgomery's poems, as examples of the different styles of verse.

In his latter years, he seems to have fallen into misfortunes. His pension was withheld from him. He was also involved in a tedious law-suit before the court of session, and he was for some time the tenant of a gaol. One of his minor pieces is entitled 'The Poet's Complaynte against the Unkindnes of his Companions, when he wes in Prissonc.' His best known production is his allegorical poem of 'The Cherrie and the Slae,' on which Ramsay formed the model of his 'Vision,' and to one particular passage in which he was indebted for his description of the Genius of Caledonia. It was first published in 1595, and reprinted in 1597, by Robert Waldegrave, "according to a copie corrected by the author himselfe." Another of his compositions is styled 'The Flyting betwixt Montgomrie and Polwart.' He also wrote 'The Minde's Melodie,' consisting of Paraphrases of the Psalms, two of which were printed by Ramsay in his Evergreen. Foulis of Glasgow published, in 1751, an edition of his poetry, and Urie of the same place brought out another in 1754. He composed a great variety of Sonnets in the Scottish language; and among the books presented by Drummond to the university of Edinburgh is a manuscript collection of the poems of Montgomery, consisting of Odes, Sonnets, Psalms, and Epitaphs. His death appears to have taken place between 1597 and 1615, in which latter year an edition of his 'Cherrie and Slae' was printed by Andrew

Hart. In 1822 a complete edition of his poems was published at Edinburgh, under the superintendence of Mr. David Laing, with a biographical preface by Dr. Irving.

MONTGOMERY, JAMES, an eminent religious poet, was born in Irvine, in Ayrshire, November 4, 1771. His father, the Rev. John Montgomery, of Irish birth though of Scottish extraction, was a preacher in the church of the United or Moravian brethren. When the poet was about four years and a half old, his parents returned to their native parish in the county of Antrim, in the north of Ireland. About two years afterwards he was sent to the seminary of the United Brethren at Fulneck, near Leeds, for his education, and he remained there for ten years. In 1783, his parents went to preach the gospel among the slaves in the West Indies, where they both died, his mother at Tobago in 1790, and his father at Barbadoes in 1791.

He was early inspired with a desire to write poetry by hearing a portion of Blair's 'Grave' read. When only ten years old, the bent of his mind was shown by his composition of various little hymns. About 15 he began to write a heroic poem on the subject of 'Alfred.' He was first placed as an assistant in a general dealer's shop, at Mirfield near Fulneck, but anxious for a higher occupation, he one day set off, with three shillings and sixpence in his pocket, to walk to London. He was at a little public house at Wentworth, when a youth of the name of Hunt entered, and getting into conversation with him, informed him that his father, who kept a general store at Wath, in a neighbouring village, required an assistant. He accordingly applied, and was successful. The following year (1790) he obtained an introduction to Mr. Harrison, a London publisher, and having offered him a manuscript volume of his verses, the latter took him into his shop as an assistant, although he declined to publish his poems. In two years more, namely in 1792, he was fortunate enough to obtain a situation in the establishment of Mr. Gales, a bookseller of Sheffield, who had set up a newspaper called the Sheffield Register. In a short time his employer had to leave England, to avoid imprisonment for printing articles too liberal for the then government, and Montgomery, at the age of twenty-two, became the editor and publisher of the paper, the name of which, on its becoming his part property, he changed to the more poetical one of The Sheffield Iris.

At that period, the government, apprehensive of the diffusion in England of the democratic and republican principles of the first French revolution, watched with a jealous eye the freedom of the press. In January 1794, amidst the keen political excitement that prevailed, Montgomery was prosecuted by the Attorney General on a charge of having reprinted and sold to a street hawker, six quires of a ballad, written by a clergyman of Belfast, commemorating 'The fall of the Bastille' in 1789, which by the crown was interpreted into a seditious libel. Being found guilty, notwithstanding the innocence of his intentions, he was sentenced to three months imprisonment, in the castle of York, and to pay a fine of £20. In the following January he was again tried, for a second imputed political offence, the publication in his paper of a paragraph which reflected on the conduct of a magistrate in quelling a riot at Sheffield. He was again convicted, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment in York castle, to pay a fine of £30, and to give security to keep the peace for two years. "All the persons," said Montgomery, writing in 1825, "who were actively concerned in the prosecutions against me in 1794 and 1795, are dead, and, without exception, they died in peace with me. I believe I am quite correct in saying that from each of them distinctly, in the sequel, I received tokens of good will, and from several of them substantial proofs of kindness. I mention not this as a plea in extenuation of offences for which I bore the penalty of the law; I rest my justification, in these cases, now on the same grounds, and no other, on which I rested my justification then. I mention the circumstance to the honour of the deceased, and as an evidence that, amidst all the violence of that distracted time, a better spirit was not extinct, but finally prevailed, and by its healing influence did indeed comfort those who had been conscientious sufferers."

After his release, his health having been affected by the confinement, he went for a few weeks to Scarborough, and then resumed his duties as editor of the Iris. The proprietorship of that paper up to July 3d, 1795, had been a co-partnership between the poet, and Benjamin Naylor, but at that date the partnership was dissolved. Montgomery, who thence became sole proprietor, giving an engagement for the payment of £1,600. the sum originally paid for the property; and although he considered the terms somewhat hard, a few years of industry and prosperity enabled him to liquidate the bond. To the columns of his paper he had contributed occasional pieces of poetry, as well as written for it a series of Essays, of an entertaining or satirical nature, entitled 'The Enthusiast.' Between 1790 and 1796 he had written a novel in four volumes, which was never printed, and was ultimately committed to the flames. He had also composed various hymns, both political and religious, and written four addresses, which were spoken at the theatre at Sheffield. At the beginning of 1797, he published his first work, entitled 'Prison Amusements, by Paul Positive,' a name which he early adopted for his juvenile pieces, and the initials of which were often mistaken for those of Peter Pindar, the celebrated satirist of the day. The volume contained twenty-four poems, many of which, as the Preface states, were composed in bitter moments, amid the horrors of a gaol, under the pressure of sickness. One of the most conspicuous pieces in the volume was entitled the 'Pleasures of Imprisonment.' It was afterwards corrected and greatly abridged by the author. The largest and most elaborate piece, however, was 'The Bramin,' in two cantos, and in heroic verse. The same year he commenced a new series of Essays, in the columns of the Iris, under the designation of 'The Whisperer, or Hints and Speculations by Gabriel Silvertongue, Gent.' These lucubrations were, the following year, collected by the author, and published in a volume at London. He afterwards got ashamed of the work, and did all he could to suppress it.

In 1801, with the view of extending his poetical claims, he transcribed three of his poems, from the columns of the Iris, and with the signature of Alexus, sent them to the editor of the 'Poetical Register.' These were the 'Remonstrance to Winter,' 'The Lyre,' in blank verse, and 'The Battle of Alexandria.' In the following year he also contributed some pieces to the same publication, and on both occasions his poems were highly eulogised by Dr. Aikin, in noticing that work in the 'Annual Review,' and quotations given. From this period till 1806, he wrote and inserted in the columns of the Iris many of the best of his minor pieces, such as 'The Pillow;' 'The Thunder Storm;' 'The Joy of Grief;' 'The Snowdrop;' 'The Ocean;' 'The Grave;' 'The Common Lot,' &c. In that year appeared 'The Wanderer of Switzerland, and other Poems,' among which were the pieces named and others. On its publication, it was at once acknowledged that a new poet had arisen whose claims to have his name inscribed on the bard-roll of his country could not be disputed. The work was most favourably received, and in the course of a few weeks every copy of the first edition was sold. A second edition was also speedily exhausted. A third edition of a thousand copies was issued by Messrs. Longman and Co., the eminent London publishers, who had entered into an arrangement with the author for the purpose. Among other periodicals which welcomed Mr. Montgomery's work with high and discriminating praise, was the 'Eclectic Review,' then conducted by Mr. David Parken, a barrister. This gentleman soon entered into a correspondence with the poet, which led to his becoming one of the regular contributors to that publication, when he had for his associates such men as Robert Hall, Adam Clarke, Olinthus Gregory, and John Foster.

On the appearance in 1807, of the third edition of 'The Wanderer of Switzerland,' the Edinburgh Review opened its batteries upon it, and in a most abusive critique predicted "that in less than three years nobody would know the name of the 'Wanderer of Switzerland,' or any of the other poems in the collection." As in the memorable case of Lord Byron, however, the judgment of the public reversed the decision of the critic. Within eighteen months, a fourth edition of 1,500 copies of the condemned volume was passing through the press where the Edinburgh Review itself was printed, and fifteen years afterwards, namely in January 1822, it had reached its ninth edition. At that period Montgomery acknowledged that so great had been the success of the work that it had produced him upwards of £800, and more than twelve thousand copies had been sold, besides about a score of editions printed in America.

In Byron's 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers,' published in 1809, Montgomery found himself noticed in this strain :

"With broken lyre and cheek serenely pale,
Lo! sad Alceus wanders down the vale!
Though fair they rose, and might have bloomed at last,
His hopes have perished by the northern blast:
Nipped in the bud by Caledonian gales,
His blossoms wither as the blast prevails!
O'er his lost works let classic Sheffield weep;
May no rude hand disturb their early sleep!"

And in a note he adds, "Poor Montgomery, though praised by every English Review, has been bitterly reviled by the Edinburgh! After all, the Bard of Sheffield is a man of considerable genius; his 'Wanderer of Switzerland' is worth a thousand 'Lyrical Ballads,' and at least fifty 'Degraded Epics.'"

Mr. Montgomery's next work was 'The West Indies,' a poem in four parts and in the heroic couplet, written in honour of the abolition of the African slave-trade by the British legislature in 1807. It was produced at the request of Mr. Bowyer, the London publisher, to accompany a series of engravings representing the past sufferings and the anticipated blessings of the long-wronged Africans, both in their own land and in the West Indies, and appeared in 1809 in connection with poems on the same subject, by James Grahame, author of 'The Sabbath,' and Miss Beniger. When Montgomery's poem was republished by itself, accompanied by about twenty occasional poems, upwards of ten thousand copies were sold in ten years. His parents had laid down their lives in behalf of the enslaved and perishing negro, and in this poem, their son, with a vigour and freedom of description and a power of pathetic painting entirely his own, raised his generous appeal to public justice in the negro's behalf, which, no doubt, had its effect when, twenty years after, slavery itself was abolished in all the colonies belonging to Britain.

In the spring of 1813, Mr. Montgomery published 'The World before the Flood,' a poem in ten cantos in the heroic couplet, suggested to the poet by a passage in the eleventh book of Paradise Lost referring to the translation of Enoch. He had now begun to take an active and prominent part in the religious and benevolent meetings of Sheffield and its neighbourhood, particularly in connexion with missionary movements, the Bible Society, and the Sabbath School Union, and in 1814 he was regularly admitted a member of the Moravian church, of which his brother, the Rev. Ignatius Montgomery, was a minister. He himself had been intended for the ministry in connexion with the United Brethren, had not his early tendency to poetry prevented his entering upon the studies necessary for it. Another of his brothers, Robert Montgomery, was a grocer at Woolwich. They were all three educated at the Moravian seminary at Fulneck. While the poet was there, the institution was on one occasion visited by no less a personage than Lord Monboddo, the celebrated Scottish judge. None of the boys had ever seen a lord before, and Monboddo was a very strange-looking lord indeed. He wore a large, stiff, bushy periwig, surmounted by a huge, odd-looking hat; his very plain coat was studded with broad brass buttons, and his breeches were of leather. He stood in the schoolroom, with his grave absent face bent downwards, drawing and redrawing his whip along the floor, as the Moravian teacher pointed out to his notice boy after boy. "And this," said the Moravian, coming at length to young Montgomery, "is a countryman of your lordship's." His lordship raised himself up, looked hard at the little fellow, and then shaking his huge whip over his head, "Ah," he exclaimed, "I hope his country will have no reason to be ashamed of him." "The circumstance," said the poet, "made a deep impression on my mind, and I determined,—I trust the resolution was not made in vain,—I determined in that moment that my country should not have reason to be ashamed of me."

In January 1817 a volume was published, entitled 'The State Lottery, a Dream,' by Samuel Roberts, a friend of Montgomery, directed against that species of national gambling, which, too long authorized by government, was some years after put an end to by act of parliament. The book contained 'Thoughts on Wheels, a poem in five parts,' by James Montgomery, in which he introduced an 'Ode to Britain,' written in a lofty strain of patriotism, which was included in the first edition of the poet's collected poems in 1836, and a quarter of a century after its first publication he recited it at a public breakfast given to him at Glasgow, when he visited Scotland in 1841.

In 1819 he produced 'Greenland and other Poems.' The principal piece is in five cantos, and contains a sketch of the ancient Moravian church, its revival in the 18th century, and the origin of the missions by that people to Greenland in 1733. The poem as published is only a part of the author's original plan. It consists of a series of episodes, some of which are very beautiful, while the glowing descriptions of the peculiar natural phenomena of the arctic regions are striking and original. In 1822 appeared his little volume of 'Songs of Zion,' being imitations or paraphrases of the Psalms of David. In the following year he was elected vice-president of the Sheffield Literary and Philosophical Society, then newly formed, when he delivered the opening lecture; "thus," says his biographers, "presenting himself for the first time in that interesting character which he was destined so often afterwards to sustain, not only before his own townspeople, but in various other places." In this address, speaking of the literature of some of the celebrated nations of antiquity, whose political vicissitudes fill so large a space in the page of history, he made this striking remark: "There is not in existence a line of verse by Chaldean, Babylonian, Assyrian, Egyptian, or Phœnician bard."

"They had no poet, and they died."

In December of the same year, he delivered a 'Lecture on Modern English Literature' before the same Society. It is comprised in the series afterwards published.

In 1824, a request having been made to him by his publishers, Messrs. Longman and Co., to supply them with as much matter in prose as would make two volumes, appeared anonymously his 'Prose by a Poet.' Some of the most interesting portions of this work had been reconstructed out of the best written of his newspaper articles, and for a time it sold well, but did not long retain its popularity. Montgomery himself remarked that 'Prose by a Poet' would probably fail to please either of two large classes of readers, namely, persons of taste merely, who would be disgusted with the introduction of religious sentiments; and individuals of a decidedly religious character, who would consider much of the matter too light or sentimental; and he was not mistaken. The same year was published a volume entitled 'The Chimney Sweeper's Friend, and Climbing Boys' Album,' containing pieces by different authors, 'arranged by James Montgomery,' and dedicated to the king, George IV. The work was got up, mainly by Montgomery's exertions, to aid in effecting the abolition, at length happily accomplished, of the cruel and unnatural practice of employing boys in sweeping chimneys.

In 1825 his connexion with the Iris terminated, as he that year disposed of the newspaper and his printing business and materials to Mr. John Blackwell, who had been at one time a Methodist preacher, but afterwards became a dealer in old books, and was then a printer and stationer. On his retirement from the paper, which he had conducted for thirty years, every class of politicians in the town of Sheffield united in giving him a public dinner, Lord Milton, afterwards Earl Fitzwilliam, in the chair, as a testimony that there was among them but one feeling of goodwill towards him, and but one opinion as to the integrity with which he had for so long a time discharged his duties as an editor. The dinner took place on the poet's birthday, November 4th, 1825, when 116 gentlemen sat down to the table. In returning thanks, the poet entered into some details relative to his early life, as well before as after his residence in Sheffield; alluding also to his varied labours and ultimate success as a poet, in which character his name will be known to all time. He spoke with pardonable pride of the success which had crowned his labours as an author, "Not indeed," he said, "with fame and fortune, as these were lavished on my greater contemporaries, in comparison with whose magnificent possessions on the British Parnassus my small plot of ground is no more than Naboth's vineyard to Ahab's kingdom; but it is my own; it is no copyhold; I borrowed it, I leased it from none. Every foot of it I enclosed from the common myself; and I can say that not an inch which I had once gained have I ever lost." Some of his friends who could not attend, including many ladies, afterwards presented him with 200 guineas, to be applied to the revival of a mission which his father, the Rev. John Montgomery, had begun in Tobago, but which had been suspended since his death in 1791. The proprietor of the estate on which it was situated, Mr. Hamilton, a Scotchman, had in his will bequeathed £1,000, contingent on the renewal of the mission. To this sum, the two hundred guineas were to be added, and the gift was accompanied by the delicate request that the renewed mission should be distinguished by the name of Montgomery, in honour both of himself and his father.

At the close of 1825 appeared 'The Christian Psalmist; or Hymns, Selected and Original.' These compositions, 562 in number, are from a great variety of authors, including one hundred from his own pen, which form part fifth of the collection. The compilation was made for Mr. Collins, the Glasgow publisher (who died January 2, 1853) and for it he received one hundred guineas. The prefatory essay contains some judicious remarks on the writing of hymns, as one branch of the poetic art, and on the works of Bishop Kenn, Dr. Isaac Watts, Addison, Toplady, Charles Wesley, and others who have excelled in it. Montgomery also wrote an Introductory essay to an edition of Cowper's poems, then about to be issued by Messrs. Chalmers and Collins.

In 1827, appeared 'The Pelican Island,' by Mr. Montgomery, a poem in blank verse, suggested by a passage in Captain Flinders' 'Voyage to Terra Australis,' describing the existence of the ancient haunts of the pelican in the small islands on the coast of New Holland. The narrative is supposed to be delivered by an imaginary being who witnesses the series of events related after the whole has happened. To the 'Pelican Island' was added, as usual, some of his smaller poems. Previous to its publication a work called 'The Christian Poet' was issued by Mr. Collins of Glasgow, with an admirable introductory essay by Mr.

Montgomery, a species of writing in which he excelled. He also wrote the Introductory Essays to new editions of 'The Pilgrim's Progress,' 'The Olney Hymns,' the 'Life of the Rev. David Brainerd,' and other works published by the same firm. In 1830 he contributed to the Cabinet Cyclopedia the brief memoirs of Dante, Ariosto, and Tasso, which appeared in the series of 'Literary and Scientific Men of Italy.' The same year he compiled for the London Missionary Society, 'The Missionary Journal,' from a vast mass of valuable materials which had been placed in his hands; for which he received £200. He also delivered a course of lectures on the History of English Literature before the members of the Royal Institution of Great Britain at London. The following year he lectured on Poetry at the same Institution. Both courses he prepared for the press and published in 1833.

In 1841 he visited Scotland, for the first and only time since his childhood. On this occasion he accompanied the Rev. Mr. Latrobe. Their main object was the promotion of the missions of the United Brethren, but Montgomery had also a great desire to see the land of his birth. "Scotland," he said, in a letter, written in July 1844, to the committee of the Burns' Festival, "took such early and effectual root in the soil of my heart that to this hour it appears as green and flourishing, in the only eyes with which I can now behold it, as when, after an absence of more than threescore years, I was favoured to see it with the eyes that are looking on this paper. Though scarcely four and a half years old when removed, I have yet more lively, distinct, and delightful recollections of little Irvine, its bridges, its river, its street aspect, and its rural landscape, with sea-glimpses between, than I have equal reminiscences of any subsequent period of the same length of time, spent since then in fairer, wealthier, and more familiar, and therefore less romantic, England. Yet those fond recollections of my birth-place, and renewals of infant experience had become, through the vista of retrospect, so ideal, that when, in the autumn of 1841, for the first time, I returned to the scenes of my golden age, the humble realities, though as beautiful as heaven's daylight could make them in the first week of a serene October, I could hardly reconcile with the ideal of themselves, into which they had been transmuted by frequent repetition and retouching—every time with a mellowing stroke—in the process of preserving the identity of things, ‘that were to me more dear and precious,’ which had been so soon and so long removed out of sight, but never out of mind. I can, however, say that with the brief acquaintance which on that occasion I made with my country and my birthplace, and especially with what is the glory and the blessing of both, the frank, and kind, and gracious inhabitants,—my brief acquaintance, I was going to say, with these had more than ever endeared to my better feelings the land that gave me birth and the blood kindred with whom I felt myself humbly but honestly allied.” In a postscript he explained that by “blood kindred,” he meant his kinship to all the blood of Scotland, neither less nor more, pretending to no affinity with the noble house of Eglinton.

He was received with great enthusiasm by the magistrates and inhabitants of Irvine. That town is distinguished as “the only spot in Scotland where the United Brethren first found a footing.” The house in which the poet was born is still (1856) standing in Halfway Street. In his father’s time the dwelling-house was under the same roof with the little chapel in which he ministered. The latter was afterwards converted into a weaver’s shop. A tablet has been placed on the wall to remind visitors that that humble dwelling was the birthplace of the author of ‘The World before the Flood.’ His reception in Edinburgh and Glasgow was also most gratifying to his feelings. In the latter city a public breakfast was given to him.

A collected edition of his works with autobiographical and illustrative notes, had been published in 1841, and in 1851 the whole of his works appeared in one volume 8vo. In 1853 he issued a collection of ‘Original Hymns, for Public, Private, and Social Devotion.’ In his latter years he enjoyed a pension of £150.

One of his last public appearances was at the meeting of the Wesleyan Conference at Sheffield in October 1852. He entered leaning heavily on the arm of Dr. Hannah, and was by him conducted to a seat in front of the platform. A few appropriate words from Dr. Hannah introduced him to the Conference. The president addressed him in simple and graceful terms. Then the aged and hoary poet, somewhat bent and very feeble in body, with the silver hair shining in flakes as it fell thin upon his temples, or waved slightly upwards from the side of his head, stepped forward to the front of the platform, and, raising his hands in prayer and blessing, pronounced the words—“The Lord bless and keep you; the Lord make his face to shine upon you and be gracious unto you; the Lord lift up his countenance upon you, and give you peace.” The beautiful and impressive way in which he uttered the last words of this prayer was said to have been inexpressibly affecting.

Mr. Montgomery, who was never married, died at his residence, The Mount, Sheffield, May 1st, 1854, and was buried at Sheffield. His portrait is subjoined:

His funeral was a public one, and a monument was afterwards erected to his memory in the town of Sheffield. ‘Memoirs of the Life and Writings of James Montgomery, including Selections from his Correspondence, remains in prose and verse, and Conversations on various subjects; by John Holland and James Everett; have been published in six volumes 8vo, London, 1854-56.

MONTROSE, Duke of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred by James III. on David, fifth earl of Crawford, by royal charter, dated 18th May, 1488, to himself and his heirs (see vol. i. p. 710). On the 19th September 1489, a new patent or charter, under the great seal, was granted to him by James IV., conferring the dukedom upon him for life only. He died at Finhaven at Christmas 1495, and the dukedom is said to have then become extinct. In 1848 a petition was presented to the queen by the earl of Crawford and Balcarres, claiming it on the ground of its being vested in the heir male. This petition was referred to the House of Lords, and the claim was opposed by the Crown and the duke of Montrose, on the ground that the charter of 18th May 1488, was annulled by the act of the first year of the reign of James IV., called the Act Rescissory, and that the grant of the dukedom, made in 1489, was never registered. After hearing parties, on Aug. 5, 1853, their lordships adopted a resolution to the effect that the claimant had not made out his right to the dignity. Soon after, Lord Lindsay, son of the earl of Crawford and Balcarres, addressed a letter to the Times newspaper, protesting against the resolution of the House of Lords, and stating that he had published a full "Report of the Montrose Claim," containing, among other documents, "an Address to her Majesty, in humble remonstrance against the opinion reported to her Majesty." Lord Lindsay submits that the principles on which the decision of the peers is founded are, one and all, wholly repugnant to the understanding and practice of past times, and to plain equity and justice. The opinion, he farther asserts, is entitled to less than usual weight in respect to the unwonted and strange departure from established forms of procedure—the decision having been given before the voluminous evidence was ordered to be printed, and the evidence thus "arbitrarily degraded to a mere cipher or phantom." He adds, in conclusion: "I therefore now, on these and various other grounds, formally protest, before her majesty and the country, against the opinion or report (which, be it observed, is certainly not in law a sentence or final judgment) delivered by the House of Lords on the 5th of August 1853 as unjust in itself, proceeding on error and misrepresentation throughout, and as having, in its principles, and in its application of those principles, a direct tendency to revolutionize the whole system of peerage law, and, indeed, to innovate on other departments of law, and certainly of justice, hitherto sacred from such encroachments."

MONTROSE, Earl, marquis and duke of, titles in the peerage of Scotland, possessed by the noble family of Graham, whose origin and descent have been already given (see vol. ii. pp. 341, 342). They were first ennobled in the person of Patrick Graham of Kincairdine, who in 1451 was created Lord Graham. His grandson, William, third Lord Graham, was on 3d March 1505, created earl of Montrose, the title being derived from his hereditary lands of "Auld Montrose" and not from the town of that name, (see vol. ii. pp. 342, 343). He fell at the battle of Flodden, 9th September 1513. He was thrice married. By his first wife, Annabella, daughter of John, Lord Drummond, he had, William, second earl. By his second wife, a daughter of Sir Archibald Edmonstone of Duntrath, he had three daughters; and by his third wife, Christian Wawane of Segy, relict of Patrick, sixth Lord Halyburton of Dirletoun, he had two sons: Patrick, ancestor of the Grahams of Inclibraco, Gorthy, Bucklivie, and other families of the name; and Andrew, consecrated bishop of Dunblane in 1575.

William, second earl of Montrose, was one of the peers to whom the regent duke of Albany committed the charge of the young king, James V., when he himself went to France in 1517. He was one of the commissioners of regency appointed by that monarch on 29th August 1536, during his majesty's absence in France, and in 1543, he was chosen by the Estates of the kingdom, along with Lord Erskine, to remain continually in the castle of Stirling with Queen Mary, for the sure keeping of her person. He died 24th May 1571. By his countess, Lady Janet Keith, eldest daughter of William, third earl Marischal, he had four sons and five daughters. Robert, Lord Graham, the eldest son, fell at the battle of Pinkie, 10th September 1547. His posthumous son, John, by his wife, Margaret, daughter of Malcolm, Lord Fleming, became third earl of Montrose. The Hon. Mungo Graham of Orchill, the third son, was great-grandfather of James Graham of Orchill, who, as nearest agnate above 25 years of age, was served tutor at law of James, fourth marquis of Montrose, 16th March 1688. The Hon. William Graham, the fourth son, was ancestor of the Grahams of Killearn.

John, third earl of Montrose, succeeded his grandfather in May 1571, and on 7th September the same year, he was appointed a privy councillor at the election of the regent Mar. He was one of the commissioners for the king, who concluded the Pacification of Perth, February 3d, 1572. On the king's assumption of authority in 1578, he was appointed a privy councillor. He joined the faction against the regent Morton, and was one of the principal among those who, in 1581, brought him to the block; with the court favourite, the earl of Arran, he guarded him from Dumbarton to Edinburgh, to stand his trial, and as chancellor of the jury returned the verdict of "guilty art and part" against him, circumstances which necessarily led to a feud between Montrose and the powerful family of Douglas. In 1583 the castle of Glasgow, then held for the duke of Lennox, surrendered to him. He was appointed an extraordinary lord of session, 12th May 1584, in the room of the earl of Gowrie, who was beheaded on the 4th of that month, and on the 13th he succeeded that nobleman as lord-treasurer. After the return of the earl of Angus and the banished lords in November 1585, he was deprived of both offices. On 6th November 1591, he was again admitted an extraordinary lord of session, the king's letter bearing that he had "been dispossessed of the place of befor without any guid caus or occasion." He was appointed high-treasurer of Scotland, 13th May 1584, and lord-chancellor, 15th January 1599, after the office had been vacant for more than three years.

After James' accession to the throne of England, the earl of Montrose was nominated lord-high-commissioner to the Estates which met at Edinburgh 10th April 1604. In a continuation of this parliament held at Perth 11th July, 1604, he was appointed one of the commissioners for the treaty of union then projected between the two kingdoms of Scotland and England. Having resigned the office of chancellor, it was conferred on Alexander Seton, Lord Fyvie, one of the lords of session, and in recompense, a patent was granted by the king to the earl, dated at Royston, in December 1604, creating him viceroy of Scotland for life, the highest dignity a subject can enjoy, and bestowing on him a pension of £2,000 Scots. In virtue of this commission he presided at the meeting of the Estates at Perth, 9th July 1606, wherein the episcopal government in the church was restored. His name appears as commissioner to the parliament which met at Edinburgh 18th March 1607. He died 9th November 1608, in his 61st year. Calderwood says: "Because he had been his majesty's grand commissioner in the parliaments preceding, and at conventions, his majesty thought meet that he should be buried in pomp, before any other were named. So he was buried with great solemnity. The king promised to bestow forty thousand merks upon the solemnity of the burial, but the promise was not performed, which drew on the greater burden upon his son." (Hist. of the Kirk of Scotland, vol. vii. p. 38.) By his countess, Jean, eldest daughter of David, Lord Drummond, he had three sons and a daughter. The sons were, 1. John, fourth earl; 2. Sir William Graham of Braeo; and 3. Sir Robert Graham of Scotistown.

John, fourth earl, was appointed president of the council in July 1626, and died 24th November same year. In Birrel's Diary (p. 34), under date 19th January 1595, it is mentioned that the young earl of Montrose fought a combat with Sir James Sandilands at the Salt Trone of Edinburgh, thinking to have avenged the slaughter of his cousin, Mr. John Graham, who was slain by a pistol-shot, and four of his men killed with swords. The fourth earl married Lady Margaret Ruthven, eldest daughter of the first earl of Gowrie, who was executed for treason in 1584. He had one son, James, fifth earl and first marquis of Montrose, and five daughters. A memoir of the first marquis of Montrose is given at page 345 of volume ii. (See JAMES GRAHAM.) By his countess, Lady Magdalen Carnegie, sixth daughter of the first earl of Southesk, the first marquis had two sons. The elder, Lord Graham, earl of Kincardine, a youth of great promise, accompanied his father in his campaign of 1645, and died at the Bog of Gight in Strathbogie, in March of that year, when only sixteen years of age, and was buried at Bellie church.

James, second marquis, called the good marquis, as his father is called the great marquis of Montrose, was born about 1631. He was restored to the family estates, sworn a privy councillor, and had a patent of the title of marquis of Montrose, 12th October 1660. On the trial of the marquis of Argyle, the great enemy of his father, in 1661, the marquis of Montrose refused to vote, as he felt too much resentment to judge in the matter, (Burnet's History, vol. i. p. 213). He was appointed one of the extraordinary lords of session, 25th June 1668, but died in February following. He married Lady Isabella Douglas, countess dowager of Roxburgh, fifth daughter of the second earl of Morton, and with one daughter had two sons, James, third marquis, and Lord Charles Graham, who died young.

James, third marquis, being a minor at his father's death, the king, Charles II., took him under his immediate protection, appointed him captain of the guards, and afterwards president of the council. At the trial of the earl of Argyle, 12th December 1681, the marquis of Montrose, his cousin-german, was chaneellor of the jury who found him guilty. He died 25th April 1684. By his wife, Lady Christian Leslie, second daughter of the duke of Rothes, chaneellor of Scotland, he had a son, James, fourth marquis and first duke of Montrose. As the latter was a mere child when he succeeded to the titles and estates of his family, his father had nominated as his tutors, his mother, the earls of Haddington and Perth, Hay of Drummelzier, and Sir William Bruce of Kinross. The marchioness, his mother, took for her second husband, Sir John Bruce, younger of Kinross, and on her marriage, the tutory was found null by decision of the court of session, 1st February 1688. This was thought to be a device of the king, James VII., to have the young marquis educated as a Roman Catholic. But if so, he had no opportunity of carrying his design into effect, as he was then fast verging to his fall. The case was rendered remarkable by two of the judges who had voted in favour of the tutors selected by his father, Lords Harearse and Edmonstone, being, in consequence, removed from their seats on the bench, by a letter from the king himself. His nearest agnate, Graham of Braeo, being under 25 years of age, could not be tutor at law, and James Graham of Orchill, the nearest agnate above 25, was accordingly served his tutor.

In 1702 the marquis made a great addition to his estates by purchasing the property of the duke of Lennox, as well as many of its jurisdictions; among these were the hereditary sheriffdom of Dumbarton, the custodiership of Dumbarton castle, and the jurisdiction of the regality of Lennox. He was appointed high-admiral of Scotland, 23d February 1705, and president of the council, 28th February 1706. He steadily supported the union and the protestant succession, and was advanced to the dignity of duke of Montrose by patent, dated 24th April 1707. He was one of the sixteen Scots representative peers chosen by the last parliament of Scotland, 13th February 1707, and reelected at the general election of 1708. He was subsequently three times re-elected. Appointed keeper of the privy seal of Scotland, 28th February 1709, he was removed in 1713, for not complying with the tory administration. At the death of Queen Anne the following year, the duke of Montrose was appointed by George I. one of the lords of the regency. He was one of the noblemen who attended the proclamation of his majesty at Edinburgh, 5th August 1714, and on 24th September, six days after the king had landed in England, his majesty appointed his grace one of the principal secretaries of state in the room of the earl of Mar, whose dismissal led to the rebellion of 1715. His grace was sworn a privy councillor at St. James', 4th October 1717. He had been constituted keeper of the great seal in Scotland in 1716, but was removed from that office in April 1733, in consequence of his opposition to Sir Robert Walpole.

At the meeting of parliament in 1735, a petition was presented, signed by six Scots noblemen, the duke of Montrose being one, complaining of the undue interference of government in the recent election of the sixteen Scots representative peers. It stated that the peers had been solicited to vote for a prepared list called the king's list, that sums of money, pensions, offices, and discharges of crown debts were actually granted to peers who voted for it, and to their relations, and that on the day of election a body of troops was drawn up in the Abbey court of Edinburgh, evidently with the view of overawing the peers at the election. So strong, however, was the ministry at the time that the petition was rejected.

In the celebrated Rob Roy Maegregor Campbell, the duke, when marquis of Montrose, found a persevering and irreconcilable enemy, who turned him into ridicule and set all his power and influence at defiance. Rob Roy had been so successful in his profession of a drover or cattle-dealer, that before the year 1707 he had purchased the lands of Craighrostane, on the banks of Lochlomon, from the family of Montrose, and relieved the estate of Glengyle, the property of his nephew, from considerable debts. Previous to the union of the two kingdoms no cattle were permitted to be imported into England, but free intercourse being allowed by the treaty of union, various speculators engaged in this traffic, and among others, the marquis of Montrose, afterwards created duke, and Rob Roy entered into a joint adventure. The capital to be advanced was fixed at 10,000 merks each, and Rob Roy was to purchase the cattle and drive them to England for sale. Macgregor made his purchases accordingly, but finding the market overstocked on his arrival in England, he was obliged to sell the cattle below prime cost. The duke refused to bear any share of the loss, and insisted on repayment of the whole money advanced by him with interest. Macgregor refused to pay either principal or interest, and having spent the duke's money in organizing a body of the Macgregors in 1715, under the nominal command of his nephew, his grace took legal means to recover it, and in security seized the lands of Craigrystone. This proceeding so exasperated Macgregor that he resolved in future to supply himself with cattle from his grace's estates, and for nearly thirty years, down to the day of his death, he carried off the duke's cattle with impunity, and disposed of them publicly in different parts of the country. Although these cattle generally belonged to the duke's tenants, his grace was the ultimate sufferer, as they were unable to pay their rents, to liquidate which their cattle mainly contributed. Macgregor also levied contributions in meal and money, but he never took it away till delivered to the duke's storekeeper in payment of rent, and he then gave the storekeeper a receipt for the quantity taken. At settling the money rents Macgregor often attended, and several instances are recorded of his having compelled the duke's factor to pay him a share of the rents, which he took good care to see were discharged to the tenants beforehand.

His grace, who was chancellor of the university of Glasgow, died at London, 7th January 1742. From a portrait of him by Sir John Medina, engraved by Cooper, the subjoined woodcut is taken:

By his duchess, Lady Christian Carnegie, second daughter of the third earl of Northesk, he had, with one daughter, four sons, namely, 1st, James, marquis of Graham, who died in infancy; 2d, David, marquis of Graham, created a peer of Great Britain, by the titles of Earl and Baron Graham of Belford in Northumberland, 23d May 1722, with remainder to his brothers. He took the oaths and his seat in the House of Lords, 19th January 1727, and died, unmarried, 2d October 1731, in his father's lifetime; 3d, William, second duke of Montrose; and 4th, Lord George Graham, a captain R.N., who in 1740 was appointed governor of Newfoundland. At the general election of 1741 he was chosen M.P. for Stirlingshire. He saw a good deal of active service afloat, and Aaron Hill wrote a poem to him on his action near Ostend, 24th June 1745. He died, unmarried, at Bath, 2d January 1747. In Buchanan House, Stirlingshire, the seat of the family, there is a painting, about quarter size, by Hogarth. It represents Lord George Graham at table in the cabin of his ship with attendants. Some parts of the group bear marks of the characteristic humour of the immortal artist.

William, second duke of Montrose, was in August 1723, on the recommendation of some of the professors of the university of Edinburgh, placed, with his brother, under the tuition of David Mallet, the poet, at that time a young man still bearing his father's name of Malloch. On his arrival, the same month, at Shawford near Winchester, where the family resided, Mallet wrote to a friend, "Both my lord and my lady received me kindly, and as for my Lord William and Lord George, I never saw more sprightly or more hopeful boys." With their tutor they made the tour of Europe, and Mallet translated Bossuet's 'Discours sur l'Histoire Universelle' for the use of his young charge.

In 1731, his grace, then Lord William Graham, succeeded his elder brother in the British peerage of Earl and Baron Graham of Belford. He also then became, by courtesy, marquis of Graham, as heir to the dukedom. On the 12th July 1739, the following adventure occurred to him. Riding at some distance before his servant near Farnham in Surrey, he was attacked in a by-lane by two highwaymen, one of whom, laying hold of the bridle of his horse, and bidding him deliver, his lordship drew a pistol, and shot him through the head. The other robber, snapping his pistol, made off, and was pursued by his lordship, till quitting his horse, he escaped into a wood.

On his father's death in 1742, he became second duke of Montrose. Under the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions act of 1747, his grace was allowed as compensation for his hereditary offices, in all £5,578 18s. 4d. in full of his claim of £15,000; being, for the sheriffship of Dumbarton £3,000, the regality of Montrose £1,000, of Menteith £200, of Lennox £578 18s. 4d., and of Darnley £800. He died 23d September 1790. By his duchess, Lady Lucy Manners, youngest daughter of John, second duke of Rutland, he had two sons, and a daughter, Lady Lucy Graham, married to the first Lord Douglas of Douglas. The elder son died the day he was born.

James, third duke of Montrose, the youngest of the family, born 8th September 1755, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of M.A. At the general election of 1780, he was chosen one of the members for Richmond in Yorkshire. He zealously opposed Mr. Fox's India bill, and on the formation of the Pitt administration, 27th December 1783, his lordship was appointed one of the lords of the treasury.

In 1784 he was chosen one of the representatives of Great Bedwin, in Wiltshire. On 10th June that year he became president of the Board of Trade, on 13th July joint postmaster-general, and on 6th August, jointly with Lord Mulgrave, paymaster of the forces. He procured the repeal of the prohibitory act of 1747, whereby the Highlanders obtained the restoration of their ancient dress, which had been proscribed after the last rebellion. In 1789, when, on the illness of George III., the project of a regency was supported with great zeal by the opposition, Burke was, on one occasion, so carried away by the violence of his feelings that, in reference to his majesty, he declared "the Almighty had hurled him from his throne." The marquis, who was seated beside Pitt on the treasury bench, instantly started to his feet, and with great warmth exclaimed, "No individual within these walls shall dare to assert that the king was hurled from his throne." A scene of great confusion ensued. On the recovery of his majesty, the marquis was the mover of the address to the queen.

On the death of his father in September 1790, he succeeded to the dukedom. In November of the same year he was appointed master of the horse, and on 12th May 1791, he was constituted one of the commissioners for the affairs of India, and sworn a privy councillor. He was made a knight of the Thistle, 14th June 1793, and in 1795 was appointed lord-justice-general of Scotland, when he resigned the mastership of the horse. On the change of administration in February 1806, his grace was removed from the presidency of the Board of Trade, and the joint postmaster-generalship, but on his friends coming into power, the office of master of the horse was again conferred upon him, 4th April 1807. He retained that office till 1821, when he succeeded the marquis of Hertford as lord-chamberlain. This last office he resigned in 1827. In 1812 he had been elected one of the knights of the Garter, under the regency of the prince of Wales. His grace, like his father, was chancellor of the university of Glasgow. He was also a general of the Royal Archers of Scotland, and lord-lieut. of the counties of Stirling and Dumbarton; D.C.L. He died Dec. 30, 1836.

In 'Wraxall's Memoirs of his own Times,' the following sketch of his grace is given: "Few individuals, however distinguished by birth, talents, parliamentary interest, or public services, have attained to more splendid employments, or have arrived at greater honours than Lord Graham, under the reign of George III. Besides enjoying the lucrative sinecure of justice general of Scotland for life, we have seen him occupy a place in the cabinet, while he was joint postmaster general, during Pitt's second ill-fated administration. In his person he was elegant and pleasing, as far as those qualities depend on symmetry of external figure: nor was he deficient in all the accomplishments befitting his illustrious descent. He possessed a ready elocution, sustained by all the confidence in himself necessary for addressing the house. Nor did he want ideas, while he confined himself to common sense, to argument, and to matters of fact. If, however, he possessed no distinguished talents, he displayed various qualities calculated to compensate for the want of great ability; particularly the prudence, sagacity, and attention to his own interests, so characteristic of the Caledonian people. His celebrated ancestor, the marquis of Montrose, scarcely exhibited more devotion to the cause of Charles I. in the field, than his descendant displayed for George III. in the house of commons. Nor did he want great energy, as well as activity of mind and body. During the progress of the French Revolution, when the fabric of our constitution was threatened by internal and external attacks, Lord Graham, then become duke of Montrose, enrolled himself as a private soldier in the city light horse. During several successive years, he did duty in that capacity, night and day, sacrificing to it his ease and his time; thus holding out an example worthy of imitation to the British nobility."

He was twice married, first, to the eldest daughter of the earl of Ashburnham, by whom he had one son, William, earl of Kinecardine, who died in his infancy; and, 2dly, to Lady Caroline Maria Montague, eldest daughter of George, 4th duke of Manchester; issue, 2 sons and 4 daughters.

James, 4th duke, the elder son, born in 1799, elected chancellor of the university of Glasgow in 1837, and in 1843 appointed lord-lieut. of Stirlingshire, married, in 1836, previous to succeeding to the dukedom, 3d daughter of Lord Decies; issue, 3 sons and 3 daughters. Sons: 1. James, born in 1845, died in 1846. 2. James, marquis of Graham, born June 22, 1847. 3. Douglas-Bresford-Malise-Ronald, born Nov. 7, 1852. Major-general of the Royal Archers, colonel of the Stirling, Dumbarton, Clackmannan, and Kinross militia; a knight of the Thistle 1845; sworn a privy councillor 1850.

CREATIONS.—Baron Graham, 1451, earl of Montrose, 1503, marquis of Montrose, earl of Kinecardine, Baron Graham and Mungdock, 1644, duke of Montrose, marquis of Graham and Buchanan, viscount of Dundaff, Lord Aberruthven and Fintry, 1707, to the heirs male of the body of the first duke, whom failing, to the heirs of the marquis of Montrose by former patents granted to his ancestors; and Earl and Baron Graham of Belford in the peerage of Great Britain, 1722, by which last creation the duke of Montrose holds his seat in the House of Lords. The estate of Buchanan in Stirlingshire was purchased by the third marquis, who is known to antiquarians as having presented to the university of Glasgow one of the most beautiful of its Roman remains. The family have long ceased to possess any connexion with either the town of Montrose, whence they derive their principal title, or its vicinity.

MONYPENNY, Lord, a title in the Scottish peerage, which became extinct about the beginning of the 16th century. The surname of Monypenny is one of great antiquity in Scotland. Ricardus Monypenny obtained from Thomas, prior of St. Andrews, in 1211, the lands of Pitmullen or Pitmilly in Fife. John Monypenny of Pitmilly was one of the Scottish barons whose name appears in the Ragman Roll as having sworn fealty to King Edward I. of England in 1296. Another, or probably the same John Monypenny, was one of the ambassadors from the pope and the French king to solicit Edward III., on behalf of the Scots, and he obtained a safe-conduct to pass into Scotland, 22d January 1336.

The Monypennys carry a dolphin in their arms, which has led some writers to conjecture that they are originally from the province of Dauphiny in France. That province, it is historically recorded, in the year 1343 was transferred by Humbert II., Dauphin de Viennois, its sovereign, having no issue, to Philip of Valois, on condition that the direct heir of the French crown should be called the Dauphin, and wear a dolphin in his arms.

Thomas Monypenny and Christian Keith, his wife, had a charter from Robert III. of the third part of the lordship of Leuchars in Fife, which third part was afterwards called Leuchars-Monypenny. Another third part, that to which the castle was attached, was conferred on Sir Alexander Ramsay, whose only daughter married Eustachius de Monypenny, and their successor leaving only a daughter, she married Ramsay of Collathie, and this portion of the lands, with the castle, passed to that family.

Thomas Monypenny is supposed to have been the father of John Monypenny of Pitmilly and Sir William Monypenny. The latter's son, William Monypenny, had a safe-conduct, dated December 5th, 1444, to go to England, to the coronation of Henry IV. He acquired the lands of Congressant in France, and appears to have resided, in the latter part of his life, in that country. He had another safe-conduct, 14th July 1447, in which he was styled Natif d'Escoffe, escuier d'escuieres of the king of France, to negotiate the marriage of the princess Eleanor of Scotland to the dauphin. Three commissions passed the great seal of Scotland, 8th November 1458, to the same William Monypenny, baron of Retre, lord of Conquersault in France, and John Kennedy, provost of St. Andrews, to proceed on an embassy to the French king, to demand the earldom of Xantoin, which had been granted to James I. They were also directed to form a treaty with the king of Castile, to settle the debt due by Scotland to the king of Denmark, and afterwards to pass to Rome, to testify the king's obedience to the new pontiff Pius II.

This William Monypenny was created a peer of Scotland, under the title of Lord Monypenny of Conquersall, a corruption of Congressault, by James II., before 1464. He was ambassador from France to England, 16th February 1471. His son, Alexander, second Lord Monypenny, having no male issue, exchanged, in 1495, his barony of Earlsball, in Fife, with Sir Alexander Bruce of the Airth family, for his lands of Escartot in France, and on his death the peerage became extinct.

David Monypenny of Pitmilly, an eminent lawyer, born in May 1769, (eldest son of Lieutenant-colonel Alexander Monypenny of Pitmilly of the 56th foot, who died in 1800,) passed advocate 2d July 1791, was appointed sheriff-depute of the county of Fife, 7th February 1807, solicitor-general, 22d February 1811, admitted a lord of session, 25th February 1813, when he took the title of Lord Pitmilly. He also became a lord of justiciary, and at the original constitution of the jury court in civil cases in Scotland, he was nominated one of the lords commissioners, 13th June, 1815. His lordship retired from the bench in October 1830. In 1831 he published a pamphlet on the Scottish poor laws. With one sister he had two brothers, Alexander Monypenny of Edinburgh, and William Monypenny, collector of customs, Kirkcaldy.

A branch of the Pitmilly family is settled at Hole House, Rolvenden, Kent, which property was acquired by the marriage, 31st May, 1714, of a Monypenny with Mary, daughter and heiress of Robert Gybbon, Esq. of Hole House.

MOOR, JAMES, LL.D., an eminent Greek scholar, the son of Mr. Robert Moor, teacher of mathematics in Glasgow, and his wife, Margaret Park, was born in that city, June 22, 1712. He entered the university of his native city in November 1725, and while at college acquired much distinction for his proficiency in the ancient languages, mathematics, and geometry. On completing his academical course, he kept a school for some time at Glasgow. He was afterwards tutor in the families successively of the earls of Selkirk and Kilmarnock, and travelled with his pupils on the continent. When Dean castle, the seat of the latter nobleman, was accidentally burnt, Mr. Moor lost his valuable collection of books, as well as his manuscript speculations on philological and mathematical subjects. In November 1742 he was appointed librarian to the university of Glasgow, and in July 1746, he became professor of Greek there, on which occasion the earl of Selkirk advanced him £600, to enable him to purchase the resignation of his predecessor.

In conjunction with professor Muirhead, he superintended, at the request of the university, a splendid edition of Homer, published by the Foulises of Glasgow. He also edited their Herodotus. In 1761 he was appointed vice-rector of the university, which, in April 1763, conferred on him the degree of LL.D. Besides other works, he was the author of various Essays which purported to have been "read to a literary Society in Glasgow, at their weekly meetings within the College." Several of these were never printed. He resigned his chair in May 1774, and died, unmarried, September 17, 1779. His library and cabinet of medals were purchased by the university, of which he was such a distinguished member.

Dr. Moor was possessed of considerable poetical powers, and among other pieces, is stated to have been the author of the popular Scots ballad of 'The Chelsea Pensioners,' which was published in the newspapers at the commencement of the French revolution, as the production of a young lady.—His works are:

Three Essays. Glasgow, 1759, 12mo.

On the End of Tragedy, according to Aristotle; an Essay in two parts, read to a Literary Society in Glasgow, at their weekly meetings within the College. Glasg. 1764, 8vo.

On the Præpositions of the Greek Language; an Introductory Essay, read to a Literary Society in Glasgow, at their weekly meetings within the College. Glasg. 1766, 12mo.

Vindication of Virgil from the charge of a Puerility which was imputed to him by Dr. Pearce, in his Notes on Longinus. 1766.

Elementa Lingua Græca. Glasg. 1783, 8vo. Edin. 1798, 1809, 8vo. Glasg. 1817, 8vo. This, his principal work, though incomplete in some respects, soon became a standard schoolbook.

He also contributed a few poems to 'The Edinburgh Magazine and Review.'

MOOR, JACOB, an eminent landscape painter, a native of Edinburgh, was the author of three Essays; on the Influence of Philosophy on the Fine Arts; on the Composition of the Picture described in the dialogue of Cebes, and on Historical Composition; which were read before a literary society held in the college of Glasgow in the years 1752, 1754, and 1755, and afterwards printed by Andrew and Robert Foulis, in 1759. He went to Rome about 1773, where he attained considerable reputation. He was employed by the Prince Borghese to conduct the alterations which were made in the gardens of his villa, near the Porta Pinciana, executed in imitation of the modern style of gardening now practised in England, for which he was liberally remunerated. He died of a fever at Rome in 1793, leaving a respectable property to his relations.

MOORE, JOHN, M.D., an eminent physician and miscellaneous writer, the son of the Rev. Charles Moore, an episcopalian clergyman at Stirling, and his wife, the daughter of John Anderson, Esq., of Dowhill near Glasgow, was born in Stirling in 1730. He was educated at the university of Glasgow, and began the study of medicine and surgery under the care of Dr. Gordon, an eminent practitioner in that city. At the same time, he attended the anatomical demonstrations of Professor Hamilton, and the medical lectures of the celebrated Dr. Cullen, then professor of medicine at Glasgow. In 1747 he went to the Netherlands, where the allied army was then serving, and attended the military hospitals at Maestricht. Soon after, he was recommended by Dr. Middleton, director-general of military hospitals, to the earl of Albemarle, colonel of the Coldstream Guards, then quartered at Flushing, and was appointed assistant-surgeon of that regiment, which he accompanied to Breda. On the conclusion of peace in the summer of 1748, he returned to England.

After remaining some time in London, during which he attended the anatomical lectures of Dr. William Hunter, Mr. Moore went over to Paris to prosecute his studies in the hospitals of that city. Soon after his arrival, the earl of Albemarle, then British ambassador at the court of France, appointed him surgeon to his household. Two years afterwards, he was induced to become the partner of his old master, Dr. Gordon, surgeon at Glasgow; and on the latter subsequently commencing practice as a physician, Mr. Moore went into partnership with Mr. Hamilton, professor of anatomy in Glasgow college.

In the spring of 1772, Mr. Moore obtained the diploma of M.D. from the university of Glasgow. He was soon after engaged by the duchess of Argyll as medical attendant to her son, the duke of Hamilton, who was in a delicate state of health; and whom he accompanied to the continent, where he spent five years in travelling with his grace. On their return in 1778, Dr. Moore removed his family from Glasgow to London, and in 1779 he published 'A View of Society and Manners in France, Switzerland, and Germany,' in 2 vols. 8vo. In 1781 appeared 'A View of Society and Manners in Italy,' 2 vols. 8vo. In 1786 he published his 'Medical Sketches;' and in 1789, a novel, entitled 'Zeluco.'

In the summer of 1792 he paid a short visit to Paris, as medical attendant of the earl of Lauderdale, and having witnessed some of the principal scenes of the French Revolution, on his return he published 'A Journal during a residence in France, 1792.' Dr. Moore edited a collected edition of Smollett's Works. He died at London, Feb. 20, 1802. His portrait is subjoined:

He had two sisters, one married to the Rev. Dr. Wm. Porteous, one of the ministers of Glasgow, and the other to George Macintosh, Esq. of Dunhatton. The eldest son of the latter, Charles Macintosh, F.R.S., celebrated for his chemical discoveries, was the inventor of the gentleman's covering called a mucintosh, and other gutta percha articles (see vol. ii. p. 752.) Dr. Moore's works are:

A View of Society and Manners in France, Switzerland, and Germany. Lond. 1779, 2 vols. 8vo. Several editions, and translated into the French, German, and Italian languages.

A View of Society and Manners in Italy. London, 1781, 2 vols. 8vo.

Medical Sketches, in two Parts. London, 1786, 8vo.

Zeluco, a Novel. London, 1789, 2 vols. 8vo.

A Journal during a Residence in France, from the beginning of August to the middle of December, 1792. London, 1792, 2 vols. 8vo.

A View of the Causes and Progress of the French Revolution. London, 1795, 2 vols. 8vo.

Edward: a Novel. London, 1796.

Mordant, a Novel. London, 1800, 3 vols. 8vo.

MOORE, SIR JOHN, a distinguished British commander, son of the subject of the preceding article, by his wife, a daughter of Professor Simson, of the university of Glasgow, was born in that city, Nov. 13, 1761. He received the rudiments of his education at the local High School, and at the age of eleven accompanied his father, then engaged as travelling physician to the duke of Hamilton, to the continent. In 1776 he obtained an ensign's commission in the 51st foot. He was next promoted to a lieutenancy in the 82d regiment, and served in America till the conclusion of the war in 1783, when his regiment being reduced, he was put upon half-pay. On his return to Britain, with the rank of captain, he resumed the studies of fortification and field tactics, and on the change of ministry, which soon followed the peace, he was, by the Hamilton influence, elected to represent the Lanark district of burghs in parliament. In 1787 he obtained the rank of major in the 4th battalion of the 60th regiment, and in 1788 he exchanged into his first regiment, the 51st. In 1790 he succeeded by purchase to the lieutenant-colonelcy, and in 1791 he went with his regiment to Gibraltar.

In 1794 Colonel Moore was ordered to accompany the expedition for the reduction of Corsica, and at the siege of Calvi he was appointed by General Charles Stuart to command the reserve, at the head of which he gallantly stormed the Mozzello fort, amidst a shower of bullets, hand grenades, and shells, that exploded among them at every step. Here he received his first wound, in spite of which he mounted the breach with his brave followers, who drove the enemy before them. Soon after the surrender of the garrison, he was nominated adjutant-general, as a step to farther promotion.

A disagreement having taken place between the British commander, General Stuart, and Sir Gilbert Elliot, the viceroy of the island, the former was recalled, and Colonel Moore was ordered by the latter to quit Corsica within 48 hours. He returned to England in November 1795, and was almost immediately promoted to the rank of brigadier-general in an expedition against the French West India islands. He sailed from Spithead February 28, 1796, to join the army under Sir Ralph Abercromby at Barbadoes, where he arrived April 13. His able services under this gallant veteran during the West India campaign, especially in the debarkation of the troops at St. Lucia, and the siege of Morne Fortune, were, as declared by the commander-in-chief in the public orders, "the admiration of the whole army."

On the capitulation of St. Lucia, Sir Ralph appointed General Moore commandant and governor of the island, a charge which he undertook with great reluctance, as he longed for more active service. But he performed his duty with his accustomed energy and success, notwithstanding the hostility of the natives, and the numerous bands of armed Negroes that remained in the woods. Two successive attacks of yellow fever compelled him to return to England in August 1797, when he obtained the rank of major-general. In the subsequent December, his health being completely re-established, he joined Sir Ralph Abercromby in Ireland as brigadier-general, and during the rebellion of 1798 was actively engaged. At Horetown, he defeated a large body of the rebels under Roche, and immediately encamped near Wexford, which he delivered from the insurgents.

In the disastrous expedition to Holland, in August 1799, he had the command of a brigade in the division of the army under Sir Ralph Abercromby; and in the engagement of the 2d October, he received two wounds, which compelled him to return to England. In 1800 he accompanied Abercromby in the expedition to Egypt; and, at the disembarkation of the troops, the battalion which he commanded carried by assault the batteries erected by the French on a neighbouring eminence of sand to oppose their landing. At the battle of Abonkir, March 21, where he was general officer of the day, his coolness, decision, and intrepidity, greatly contributed to the victory, which, however, was dearly purchased with the life of Sir Ralph Abercromby. In this battle General Moore received a dangerous wound in the leg by a musket-ball, which confined him first on board one of the transports, and afterwards in the neighbourhood of Rosetta, till the conclusion of the expedition. He returned home in 1801, in time to soothe the last moments of his venerable father; on whose death he generously conferred an annuity on his mother, the half of which only she would accept.

After this period, General Moore was encamped with an advanced corps at Sandgate, on the Kentish coast, opposite to Boulogne, preparing for the threatened invasion of the French. As he largely enjoyed the confidence of the duke of York, then commander-in-chief, he was engaged, at his own request, in a camp of instruction, in training several regiments as light infantry, and the high state of discipline to which he brought them was of essential service in the subsequent campaigns in the Peninsula. Towards the end of 1804, General Moore's merits induced the king to confer on him the order of the Bath. In 1806 he was sent to Sicily, where he served under General Fox, and in the following year he was appointed commander-in-chief of all the troops in the Mediterranean. In May 1808 he was despatched, at the head of 10,000 men, to Sweden, with the view of assisting the gallant but intractable sovereign of that country, Gustavus Adolphus IV., in the defence of his dominions, then threatened by France, Russia, and Denmark; but refusing to comply with the extravagant demands of that eccentric monarch, he was placed under arrest. He had the good fortune, however, to effect his escape, and immediately sailed with the troops for England. On his arrival off the coast, his landing was prevented by an order to proceed to Portugal, to take part in the expedition against the French in that country, under the command of Sir Harry Burrard.

After the liberation of Portugal, the troops were preparing to advance into Spain, when a letter from Lord Castlereagh, dated September 25, 1808, arrived at Lisbon, appointing Sir John Moore commander-in-chief of an army of 30,000 infantry and 5,000 cavalry, to be employed in the north of the Peninsula, in co-operating with the Spanish forces against the French invaders. He began his march on the 18th of October, and on the 13th of November he reached Salamanca, where he halted to concentrate his forces, and where, distracted by every species of disappointment and false information, and deluded by the representations of Mr. Frere, the British ambassador in Spain, he remained for some time uncertain whether to advance upon Madrid, or fall back upon Portugal. At length, learning that the whole of the disposable French armies in the Peninsula were gathering to surround him, he commenced, on the evening of December 24, a rapid march to the coast, through the mountainous region of Galicia, and after the most masterly retreat that has been recorded in the annals of modern warfare, conducted, as it was, in the depth of winter, and while pressed on all sides by the skilful and harassing manœuvres of the pursuing enemy, he arrived at Corunna, on January 11, 1809, with the army under his command almost entire and unbroken. In this memorable retreat 250 miles of country had been traversed, and mountains, defiles, and rivers had been crossed, amidst sufferings and disasters almost unparalleled, and yet not a single piece of artillery, a standard, or a military trophy of any kind, had fallen into the hands of the pursuing enemy.

Finding that the transports, which had been ordered round from Vigo, had not arrived, Sir John Moore quartered a portion of the troops in the town of Corunna, and the remainder in the neighbouring villages, and made the dispositions that appeared to him most advisable for defence against the enemy. The transports anchored at Corunna on the evening of the 14th, and the sick, the cavalry, and the artillery were embarked in them, except twelve six-pounders, which were retained for action. Several general officers, seeing the disadvantages under which either an embarkation or a battle must take place, advised Sir John Moore to send a flag of truce to Soult, and open a negotiation to permit the embarkation of the army on terms; but, with the high-souled courage of his country, Moore indignantly spurned the proposal as unworthy of a British army, which, amidst all its disasters, had never known defeat.

The French, assembled on the surrounding hills, amounted to 20,000 men, and their cannon, planted on commanding eminences, were larger and more numerous than the British guns. The British infantry, to the number of 14,500, occupied a range of heights, enclosed by three sides of the enemy's position, their several divisions, under the command of Generals Baird, Hope (afterwards fourth earl of Hopetoun), Paget (afterwards first marquis of Anglesey), and Frazer, being thrown up to confront every point of attack.

About two o'clock in the afternoon of the 16th, a general movement was observed along the French line; and on receiving intelligence that the enemy were getting under arms, Sir John Moore rode immediately to the scene of action. The advanced pickets were already beginning to fire at the enemy's light troops, who were pouring rapidly down the hill on the right wing of the British. Early in the battle Sir David Baird, while leading on his division, had his arm shattered with a grape-shot, and was obliged to leave the field. At this instant the French artillery plunged from the heights, and the two hostile lines of infantry mutually advanced beneath a shower of balls. They were still separated from each other by stone walls and hedges. A sudden and very able movement of the British gave the utmost satisfaction to Sir John Moore, who had been watching the manoeuvre, and he cried out, "That is exactly what I wished to be done." He then rode up to the 50th regiment, commanded by Majors Napier and Stanhope, who had got over an enclosure in their front, and were charging most valiantly. The general, delighted with their gallantry, exclaimed, "Well done, the 50th! Well done, my majors!" They drove the enemy out of the village of Elvina with great slaughter. In this conflict, Major Napier, advancing too far, was wounded and taken prisoner, and Major Stanhope received a ball through his heart, which killed him instantaneously.

Sir John Moore proceeded to the 42d, and addressed them in these words, "Highlanders, remember Egypt!" They rushed on, driving the French before them. In this charge they were accompanied by Sir John, who sent Captain (afterwards first Viscount) Hardinge, to order up a battalion of guards to the left flank of the Highlanders, upon which the officer commanding the light company, conceiving that as their ammunition was nearly expended, they were to be relieved by the guards, began to withdraw his men; but Sir John, perceiving the mistake, said, "My brave 42d, join your comrades; ammunition is coming, and you have your bayonets."

When the contest was at the fiercest, Sir John, who was anxiously watching the progress of the battle, was struck in the left breast by a cannonball, which carried away his left shoulder, and part of the collar-bone, leaving the arm hanging by the flesh. The violence of the stroke threw him from his horse. Captain Hardinge, who had returned from executing his commission, immediately dismounted, and took him by the hand. With an unaltered countenance he raised himself, and looked anxiously towards the Highlanders, who were hotly engaged. Captain Hardinge assured him that the 42d were advancing, on which his countenance brightened. Hardinge tried in vain to stop the effusion of blood with his sash, then, with the help of some Highlanders and Guardsmen, he placed the general upon a blanket. He was lifted from the ground by a Highland sergeant and six veteran soldiers of the 42d, and slowly conveyed towards Corunna. In raising him, his sword touched his wounded arm, and became entangled between his legs. Captain Hardinge was in the act of unbuckling it from his waist, when he said, in his usual tone, and with the true spirit of a soldier, "It is as well as it is; I had rather it should go out of the field with me." When the surgeons arrived, he said to them, "You can be of no service to me; go to the soldiers, to whom you may be useful." As he was borne slowly along, he repeatedly caused those who carried him to halt and turn round, to view the field of battle; and he was pleased when the firing grew faint in the distance, as it told of the retreat of the French.

On arriving at his lodgings he was placed on a mattress on the floor. He was in great agony, and could only speak at intervals. He said to Colonel Anderson, who had been his companion in arms for more than twenty years, and who had saved his life at St. Lucia, "Anderson, you know that I always wished to die in this way." He frequently asked, "Are the French beaten?" And when told that they were, he exclaimed, "I hope the people of England will be satisfied; I hope my country will do me justice." He spoke affectionately of his mother and his relatives, inquired after the safety of his aides-de-camp, and even at that solemn moment mentioned those officers whose merits had entitled them to promotion. He then asked Major Colborne if the French were beaten; and on being told that they were, on every point, he said, "It is a great satisfaction for me to know we have beaten the French." He thanked the surgeons for their trouble. Captains Percy and Stanhope, two of his aides-de-camp, came into the room. He spoke kindly to both, and asked if all his aides-de-camp were well. After an interval he said, "Stanhope, remember me to your sister." This was the celebrated Lady Hester Stanhope, the niece of Pitt. A few seconds after, he died without a struggle, January 16, 1809. The ramparts of the citadel of Corunna were selected as the fittest place for his grave, and there he was buried at the hour of midnight, "with his martial cloak around him." The chaplain-general read the funeral service of the Church of England by torch-light; and on the succeeding day, when the British were safely out at sea, the guns of the French paid the wonted military honours over the grave of the departed hero. Soult afterwards raised a monument to his memory on the spot. A marble monument has been erected to his memory in the Cathedral of Glasgow. There is also an open air statue of him in George Square of the same city. Another stands in St. Paul's Cathedral, by order of Parliament.

Sir John Moore had, with one sister, who died unmarried in December 1842, four brothers, viz., 1st, James Carrick Moore, Esq. of Cornwall, Wigtonshire, author of a 'Narrative of the Campaign of the British Army in Spain, commanded by Lieutenant-General Sir John Moore, authenticated by official papers and original letters.' London, 1809, 4to; also 'The Life of Lieutenant-General Sir John Moore, K.B.' London, 1834, 2 vols. 8vo. He assumed, in 1821, the additional surname of Carrick, in compliance with the testamentary injunction of his relative, Robert Carrick, a banker at Glasgow, who bequeathed to him estates in the counties of Wigton, Kirkcudbright, and Ayr. 2d, Admiral Sir Graham Moore, C.B., whose son, John Moore, held the rank of commander, R. N. 3d, Charles Moore, of Lincoln's Inn, barrister at law, auditor of public accounts, who died unmarried; and 4th, Francis Moore, at one time under secretary of war. The latter married Frances, daughter of Sir William Twysden, baronet, and relict of the eleventh earl of Eglington, and by her had two sons, William, a colonel in the army, and John, who died unmarried.

MOORE, DUGALD, a self-taught poet of considerable vigour of imagination and expression, was born in Stockwell-street, Glasgow, in August 1805. His father was a soldier in a Highland regiment, but died early in life, leaving his mother in almost destitute circumstances. While yet a mere child, Dugald was sent to serve as a tobacco-boy in a tobacco-spinning establishment in his native city; an occupation at which very young boys are often employed, at a paltry pittance, before they are big enough to be apprenticed to other trades. He was taught to read chiefly by his mother, and any education which he received at schools was of the most trifling description. As he grew up, he was sent to the establishment of Messrs. Lumsden and Son, booksellers, Queen Street, Glasgow, to learn the business of a copper-plate pressman. Here he was much employed in colouring maps. His poetical genius early developed itself, and long before it was suspected by those around him, he had blackened whole quires of paper with his effusions. Dugald found his first patron in his employer, Mr. James Lumsden, afterwards provost of Glasgow, who exerted himself successfully in securing for his first publication a long list of subscribers among the respectable classes of Glasgow. This work was entitled 'The African and other Poems,' and appeared in 1829. In the following year Dugald published another volume, entitled 'Scenes from the Flood, the Tenth Plague, and other Poems;' and in 1831 he produced a volume larger and more elegant than the previous ones, entitled 'The Bridal Night, the First Poet, and other Poems.' The success of these several publications enabled their author to set up as a bookseller and stationer in his native city, where he acquired a good business. Dugald, indeed, may be cited as one of the few poets whose love of the Muses, so far from injuring his business, absolutely established and promoted it. In 1833 he published 'The Bard of the North, a series of poetical Tales, illustrative of Highland Scenery and Character;' in 1835, 'The Hour of Retribution, and other Poems;' and in 1839, 'The Devoted One, and other Poems.' This completes the list of his publications; but when it is considered that each, six in number, was of considerable size, and contained a great number of pieces, it will be at once acknowledged that his muse was in no ordinary degree prolific. Most of his productions are marked by strength of conception, copiousness of imagery, and facility of versification. Dugald Moore died, after a short illness, of inflammation, January 2, 1841, while yet in the vigour of manhood. He was never married, but resided all his life with his mother, to whom he was much attached, and whom his exertions had secured in a respectable competency. He was buried in the Necropolis of Glasgow, where a monument was erected to his memory, from a subscription, raised among his personal friends only, to the amount of one hundred pounds.

MORAY, Earl of, a very ancient title, the native possessors of which, during the middle ages, originally called maormors, appear to have been the most powerful chiefs in Scotland. In the tenth and eleventh centuries their territories extended nearly from sea to sea, and until they sunk under the ascendancy of the kings of the line of Malcolm Canmore, they may be said to have been the real sovereigns of the north.

In the year 1120, during the reign of Alexander I., Angus, earl of Moray, the grandson of Lulach, stepson of Macbeth, laid claim to the crown, and excited an insurrection in his own territories, which was suppressed by the king in person. Ten years afterwards, in the reign of David I., Earl Angus again took the field, but that monarch having collected all his forces, and being aided by the martial barons of Northumberland, with Walter L'Espee at their head, Angus was defeated and slain at Strickathrow, one of the passes in Forfarshire, whither he had advanced with his army. In 1141, Wimond, called by historians Malcolm MacHeth, a monk of Furness Abbey, Lanarkshire, claimed the earldom of Moray, as the son of Earl Angus, and at various times previous to 1151, invaded the Scottish coasts, but at length had his eyes put out, and was imprisoned in Roxburgh castle as an impostor. (See vol. ii. p. 24.) He had married a daughter of Somerled, thane of Argyle, who, in 1153, on the accession of Malcolm IV., invaded Scotland, accompanied by his grandsons, the sons of Wimond, one of whom, Donald, being found skulking in Galloway, was imprisoned, like his father, in Roxburgh castle. (See page 94 of this volume.)

Under Gildominick, the Moraymen, about 1160, raised such a formidable rebellion that the king, Malcolm IV., marched north with a powerful army, and after compelling them to submit, caused all who had appeared in arms against him, to transplant themselves to the southern parts of the kingdom. The earldom of Moray was subsequently held by the family of Randolph, by that of Dunbar, by an illegitimate son of James IV., by the regent Moray, and by the descendants of his daughter, also Stuarts.

The first of the family of Randolph was Dunegal, a Celtic chief, proprietor of Strathnith or Stranith, the original name of Nithsdale, who lived in the reign of David I. On his death his extensive possessions appear to have been shared among them by his four sons, only two of whom, Ranulph or Randolph, the eldest, and Dovenald, the youngest, can now be traced.

Randolph, as superior of the whole of Nithsdale, transmitted the designation of lord of Stranith to his posterity. He married Bethoc, heiress of the lands of Bedrule, a contraction of Bethoc-rule, and Buecastle in Teviotdale, and from him his descendants assumed the surname of Randolph. Thomas, his son, was one of the anti-Anglican party removed from the administration of affairs during the minority of Alexander III., 21st September, 1255, and died in 1262. His son, Thomas Randolph, lord of Strathnith, was sheriff of Roxburghshire in 1266, and great-chamberlain of Scotland from 1267 to 1278. He sat in the parliament at Brigham in 1290, when the project of marriage between Queen Margaret and Prince Edward of England was agreed to, and in 1292 he was one of the nominees on the part of Robert de Brus in his competition for the crown of Scotland. He swore fealty to Edward I., 13th June of that year, and on the 26th of the following December, with his son, the celebrated Sir Thomas Randolph, afterwards earl of Moray, he was present when Baliol did homage to the English monarch. In 1294 he was summoned to attend King Edward into France. By his wife, Lady Isabel Bruce, eldest daughter of Robert, earl of Carrick, eldest son of the competitor, he had, with a daughter, (Isabel, the wife of Sir William Moray,) a son, Sir Thomas Randolph, already mentioned, one of the chief companions in arms of his uncle, Robert the Bruce, who, in guerdon of his services, conferred on him the earldom of Moray, with many goodly lands and baronies. (See RANDOLPH, THOMAS, earl of Moray.)

Dovenald, or Donald, the youngest son of Dunegal of Stranith, appears to have obtained the barony of Sanquhar, the lands of Morton, and some other possessions in Upper Nithsdale; and he is supposed to have been the Donald who, along with Ulric, led the men of Galloway at the battle of the Standard in 1138, and fell in the conflict. His descendants assumed, in the 13th century, the surname of Edgar, from the name of Donald's son; and they continued, in the 14th century, to hold various lands in Dumfries-shire. During the reign of Robert the Bruce, Richard Edgar possessed the castle and half the barony of Sanquhar, with some adjacent lands; and Donald Edgar obtained from David II. the captainship of the clan MacGowan in Nithsdale.

Sir Thomas Randolph, the first earl of Moray of the name, married Isabel, only daughter of Sir John Stewart of Bonkyl, and with two sons, Thomas, second earl, and John, third earl, had one daughter, Lady Agnes, married to Patrick, ninth earl of Dunbar and March.

Thomas, the eldest son, second earl of Moray of the Randolph family, succeeded his father, 20th July 1332. At that time Edward Baliol had invaded Scotland, and the earl of

ARMORIAL BEARINGS OF STUART, EARL OF MORAY.

Quarterings—1st and 4th, Arms of Regent Moray; 2. for Stewart of Doune; 3. for Randolph, Earl of Moray.

Moray had a chief command in the army under the earl of Mar, at Duplin, 12th August the same year, and was killed at the first alarm. Dying unmarried, twenty-three days after succeeding to the title, it devolved on his brother, John, third earl and last of the male line of his heroic family. Though quite a youth at the time, he at once took arms in behalf of his youthful sovereign and cousin, David Bruce, and surprised and defeated Baliol at Annan in December 1332. At the battle of Halidon Hill, 19th July 1333, he commanded the first division of the Scots army, supported by Lord Andrew Fraser and his two brothers, Simon and James. Escaping from the carnage of that dreadful day, he retired to France, where the young king, David II., and his queen, had been sent for security, but returned to Scotland the following year, when he and the high steward were chosen joint regents of the kingdom. He was successful in taking prisoner Comyn, earl of Athol, commander of the English forces in Scotland, but, on his swearing allegiance to David Bruce, he set him at liberty. Comyn, however, disregarding his oath, repaired to the English camp, and resumed his hostilities to his lawful sovereign. The earl of Moray next, in August 1335, with a chosen party, attacked, near Edinburgh, a body of foreign auxiliaries in the service of the English king, under Count Guy of Namur, and forced them to surrender, but escorting the count to the borders, he fell into an ambush and was made prisoner by William de Pressen, warden of Jedburgh. He was confined first at Nottingham, and afterwards in the Tower of London. On 25th July 1340, he was removed to Windsor castle. He was allowed to go to France, and even to visit Scotland, which he did in 1341. The same year he was exchanged for the earl of Salisbury, a prisoner with the French. In February 1342 he invaded England, his sovereign David II. serving as a volunteer under him. At the fatal battle of Durham, 17th October 1346, the earl of Moray, with Douglas, the knight of Liddesdale, commanded the right wing of the Scottish army, and was killed at the first attack of the English. He married his cousin, Isabel, only daughter of Sir Alexander Stewart of Bonkyl, widow of Donald, earl of Mar, slain at Duplin, but had no issue.

On his death, his sister, Lady Agnes, countess of Dunbar and March, commonly called, from her dark complexion, "Black Agnes," and celebrated in history as the successful defender of the castle of Dunbar in 1337-8, against the earls of Salisbury and Arundel, succeeded to the vast estates of the earldom, and her husband, in her right, assumed the additional title of earl of Moray. The countess died about 1369, leaving two sons, George, tenth earl of Dunbar and March, and John, who became earl of Moray in his mother's right.

John, second earl of Moray of the Dunbar family, was one of the commissioners sent to endeavour to get Scotland included in the treaty betwixt England and France in 1384, and had 1,000 francs for his share of the money brought by John de Vienne, admiral of France in 1385. He was engaged in the battle of Otterburn in 1388, and according to Bnehanan, was the leader of the Scots, after the death of Douglas, although Major says it was the earl of March. By the courtesy of the earl of Moray, Ralph Percy and many of the prisoners were set at liberty, on their word to return when called for. He was one of the guarantees of a treaty with the English, 16th July 1390, and was killed in a tourney with the earl marshal of England in 1394. By his countess, Marjory, eldest daughter of King Robert II., he had, with one daughter, Lady Mabella Dunbar, comtess of Sutherland, two sons, Thomas, third earl of Moray of his branch, and Alexander Dunbar of Frendraught, in Banffshire, whose son subsequently succeeded to the earldom.

Thomas, third earl of the Dunbar family, was one of the prisoners taken by the English at the battle of Homildon in Northumberland, 14th September 1402. He had a son, Thomas, fourth earl of Moray, one of the hostages for King James I. when he was permitted to visit Scotland, 31st May 1421, also, for his final liberation, nominated by treaty of 13th December 1423. On the latter occasion his annual revenue was estimated at 1,000 merks. His cousin, James Dunbar of Frendraught, succeeded him in the cauldron of Moray. The latter had two daughters. Lady Janet, the elder, became the wife of James, second Lord Crichton, eldest son of Lord-chancellor Crichton, and in 1493 the earl resigned the barony of Frendraught in favour of her grandson, Sir James Crichton, ancestor of Viscount Frendraught, (see FRENDRAGHT, viscount, vol. ii. p. 271). Lady Mary, the younger daughter, married Archibald, third son of James, seventh earl of Douglas, and her husband, through the influence of his brother with the young king, was created earl of Moray, to the prejudice of the husband of the elder daughter.

In revenge for the murder of the eighth earl of Douglas by King James II. in Stirling castle, on 13th February 1452, Archibald Douglas, earl of Moray, and others of his friends, burnt the town of Stirling. The earl of Moray had a safe-conduct to pass through England, on his way to Rome, with his brother, James, ninth earl of Douglas, 2d May 1453. The following year he endeavoured to excite a rebellion in the north, but was obliged to take shelter in the Hebrides. Thence he proceeded into Annandale, to join his brother, the earl of Douglas, who, after repeated rebellions, was defeated by his kinsman the earl of Angus, leader of the king's troops, at Arkinholme in Dumfries-shire, 1st May 1455. In this battle the earl of Moray and the earl of Ormond, brothers of the earl of Douglas, were slain. Six weeks after his decease, namely, on 12th June 1455, the earl of Moray was attainted for fortifying the castles of Lochindore and Tarnau against the king, and other acts of treason, by which attainder the earldom of Moray became vested in the crown.

The next possessor of the earldom of Moray was James Stewart, natural son of King James IV., by Janet, daughter of John Lord Kennedy. It was conferred upon him and the heirs male of his body, by the king his father, by charter, dated 20th June 1501. He was then but two years old. In 1517, when Lord Home was arrested by the regent duke of Albany, and put on his trial, James, earl of Moray, says Calderwood, "accused him chiefly of the slaughter of his father King James; for it was whispered among manie, that the king was not slaine at Flodden field, but one clothed with his apparell, like him in countenance and stature: that he was seen to return through Tweed, and that he was slaine beside Kelso by the Lord Hume's friends or dependers." (Hist. of Kirk of Scotland, vol. i. p. 59.) In 1529, the earl was one of the commissioners for treating of peace with the English. In March 1530, he was appointed lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and sent to the borders, to meet the earl of Northumberland at a day of truce; but nothing was done, because they could not agree whether they should meet on Scottish or English ground. The same year he was, with the earl of Argyle, employed against the Island chiefs, having been appointed lieutenant over the north isles, when he declared that he undertook the expedition upon his own expenses, from a desire to forward the king's service, and to pacify the country, and that he expected no remuneration unless his endeavours were successful. The principal chiefs having given in their submission, the insurrection in the isles was suppressed in the summer of 1531. Soon after, the earl of Argyle presented a complaint to the secret council, against Alexander of Isla, which he did not appear to sustain, but proceeded again to the Isles, in concert with the earl of Moray, for which he was summoned before the king, and imprisoned, while Moray's conduct on the occasion seems to have given the king great dissatisfaction, if we may judge from an original letter in the State Paper office, dated Newcastle, 27th December 1531, from the earl of Northumberland to Henry VIII., which alludes to "the sore imprisonment of the earl of Argyle, and the little estimation of the earl of Murray," by the king of Scots.

In 1534, the earl of Moray and Lord Erskine, with the bishop of Aberdeen and one Robert Reid, were sent on an embassy to France, to negotiate the marriage of James V. with a French princess. The earl married Lady Elizabeth Campbell, only daughter of Colin, third earl of Argyle, and had a daughter, Lady Mary Stewart, wife of John, master of Buchan. Dying, without issue male, 14th June 1544, the earldom reverted to the crown, and was conferred on George, fourth earl of Huntly, high-chancellor of Scotland, his heirs and assignees, by charter, dated 13th February 1549. The grant, however, was recalled in 1554. (See vol. ii. p. 519.)

The earldom of Moray was next bestowed, in 1562, by Queen Mary, on her half-brother, Lord James Stewart, natural son of James V., and afterwards regent of Scotland, assassinated by Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh at Linlithgow in 1570. For a memoir of the regent Moray, see STUART, JAMES, Earl of Moray. He held his titles by a variety of grants, which occasioned perplexity respecting their inheritance. In February 1562 he obtained the charter of the earldom. In January 1564 he had another charter, limiting the succession to heirs male; in June 1566 a third charter was granted to him, throwing open the succession to his heirs general, and in 1567 he obtained from parliament a ratification of the charter of 1563, again limiting the succession to his heirs male. He married Lady Ann Keith, daughter of William, fourth earl Marischal, afterwards countess of Argyle, and had by her two daughters, Lady Elizabeth, countess of Moray, and Lady Margaret, afterwards countess of Errol.

In 1580, James Stuart, eldest son of Lord Doune, and lineally descended from Robert Stuart, duke of Albany, governor of Scotland from 1389 to 1419, received from James VI. the ward and marriage of the two daughters of the regent Moray, and a few days thereafter he married the elder, Lady Elizabeth, and assumed the title of earl of Moray. Thus, on both sides, the first of each that branched from the royal family were regents of Scotland.

Sir James Stewart of Beith, father of Lord Doune, was the third son of Andrew, Lord Avandale, (see vol. i. p. 170). He was gentleman of the bedchamber to James V., and lieutenant of his guards. That sovereign also granted him the custody of Doune castle in Menteith, which afterwards came into the possession of his son. He was killed at Dunblane at Whitsunday 1547, by the Edmonstones of Duntreath, in resentment for the office of steward of Menteith, formerly in their family, having been conferred on him.

His son, Sir James Stewart, Lord Doune, obtained the abbey of St. Colme in commendam. He early joined the Reformation, and was one of the lords of the articles in the Estates of August 1560, when the popish religion was overturned. In 1561 he was sent to England to demand a safe-conduct from Elizabeth for Queen Mary, then about to return to Scotland, and, in the end of the same year, was despatched as ambassador to France. He was knighted when Lord Darnley was created earl of Ross, 15th May 1565, and appears to have been concerned in the murder of Rizzio, as, among others, he was, by act of privy council 19th March 1566, ordered to be summoned to compare and answer under pain of rebellion, &c. He joined the association against Mary and Bothwell in June 1567, and attended the coronation of James VI., but on the escape of Mary from Lochleven castle in the following year, he went over to her side, and was in the castle of Edinburgh with the queen's party in August 1570, when his castle of Doune, a place of prodigious size and strength, was rendered without slaughter to the regent Lennox. Of this celebrated stronghold, Grose has given a view. Several modern views of it have also been painted by Stevenson and others. Appointed a privy councillor by James VI., 11th November 1579, he was created Lord Doune, 24th November 1581. He was collector-general of his majesty's revenues, and on 23d January 1583, was admitted an extraordinary lord of session, an office which he held for three years. He died 20th January 1590. By his wife, Lady Elizabeth Campbell, eldest daughter of the fourth earl of Argyle, he had, with two daughters, two sons, James, called "the bonny earl of Moray," and Henry, Lord St. Colme, (see ST. COLME, Lord).

The elder son, James Stuart, as the royal surname was usually spelled after Queen Mary's return from France, was the husband of Lady Elizabeth, the elder daughter of the regent Moray. As his claim to the earldom was doubtful, a charter was given to him in 1592 by James VI. and the Scottish Estates, ratifying to his son all the charters granted to the regent and the Lady Elizabeth. This, as it confirmed both what declared the succession general, and what limited it to heirs male, rendered the entire principle of the family succession inexplicable. The earl, therefore, lost no time in obtaining an entirely new charter to himself and his heirs male. Deemed the handsomest man of his time in Scotland, he is known in history and in song as "the bonny earl of Moray." His personal attractions and accomplishments are said to have made a deep impression on the heart of the young queen, Anne of Denmark, soon after her coming to Scotland; according to the old ballad:

"He was a braw gallant,
And he played at the gluve;
And the bonny earl of Moray
Oh! he was the queen's luv."

Some commendations of his beauty, imprudently but no doubt innocently enough made by her majesty in the king's hearing, as to the earl's being "a proper and gallant man," excited his jealousy, and he granted a commission to the earl of Huntly, to bring Moray to his presence. Between these noblemen a deadly feud existed, the earl of Moray having in 1589 joined the combination against Huntly, (see vol. ii. p. 522). On the pretence that the earl of Moray had given harbour to the turbulent earl of Bothwell, Huntly, on 7th February 1592, beset his castle of Donibristle in Fife, and summoned him to surrender. A gun being fired from the castle, which mortally wounded one of the Gordons, Huntly's men set fire to the house. Dunbar, sheriff of Moray, who was with the earl at the time, anxious to save him, said to him, "Let us not stay to be burned in the flaming house. I will go out first, and the Gordons, taking me for your lordship, will kill me, while you escape in the confusion." He accordingly rushed out, and was at once slain. Moray followed, and fled towards the rocks on the sea-shore, but the silken tassels attached to his skullcap or helmet having caught fire, as he ran out through the flames, betrayed him to his enemies. He was pursued by Sir Thomas Gordon of Cluny, whose brother had been slain at Darnaway two years previously, and Gordon of Gight, and mortally wounded. Having been stabbed in the face, some say by Huntly himself, with his last breath he exclaimed, "You have spoiled a better face than your own."

"Oh! lang will his lady
Look ower the castle Doune,
Ere she see the earl of Murray
Come sounding through the town."

Huntly departed for the north, and took refuge in the castle of Ravensraig, belonging to Lord Sinclair, who told him, with a mixture of Scottish caution and hospitality, that he "was welcome to come in, but would have been twice as welcome to have passed by." The countess dowager of Moray brought the dead bodies of her son and the sheriff of Moray in litters to Leith, to be buried in the aisle of St. Giles' church at Edinburgh, in the Good Regent's tomb. She caused her son's picture to be drawn as he lay dead, and presented it to the king "in a fyne lane cloth," with lamentations, and earnest cries for justice; but as Huntly was a favourite at court and personally liked by the king, her cries were little regarded. Tumults took place among the people, not only in the capital but in other parts of the kingdom, on account of the murder, which obliged the king to cancel the commission he had given to Huntly. That nobleman was summoned, at the instance of Lord St. Colme, the brother of the murdered earl, to stand his trial. He accordingly surrendered at Edinburgh, and on the 12th March was committed a prisoner to the castle of Blackness. On the 18th a proclamation was issued by the king, prohibiting the young earl of Moray from pursuing him for his father's slaughter, in respect that he was warded in Blackness castle, and willing to abide a trial by his peers, saying that he did nothing but by his majesty's commission. On giving sufficient surety, however, that he would appear and stand trial, on receiving six days' notice, he was released by the king on the 20th of the same month.

The feud that subsisted between the families of Huntly and Moray originated in their rival claims to the earldom of Moray, which had been held by Huntly's grandfather, previously to being conferred on the regent Moray, and there can be no doubt that the chancellor Maitland, and even the king himself, were both concerned in the death of "the bonny earl." With three daughters, the latter had two sons, James, second earl of Moray, his father being reckoned the first in the present line of succession, and the Hon. Sir Francis Stuart, knight of the Bath, one of the members of the celebrated Mermaid club, founded by Sir Walter Raleigh, to which Shakspeare, Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, and other poets, also belonged.

James, second earl, was in 1601, by the special mediation and appointment of King James VI., reconciled to the murderer of his father, who, two years before, had been created marquis of Huntly, in testimony of which he married Lady Anne Gordon, the marquis' daughter. He was one of the train of nobles who accompanied the king to London, on his accession to the English throne in 1603, and on 17th April 1611, he obtained a new investiture of the earldom of Moray, to himself and the heirs male of his body, whom failing, to Sir Francis, his brother, with the same limitation.

In 1624 he was engaged in suppressing a formidable insurrection of the clan Chattan against him, an account of which has been given under the head of MACINTOSH (see vol. ii. p. 733). He was one of the chief mourners at the funeral of his father-in-law, the marquis of Huntly, 30th August, 1636. He himself died at his seat of Darnaway, or, more correctly, Tarnaway, in Elginshire, 6th August 1638.

His son, James, third earl, took no part in the civil wars, though a royalist, and died 4th March 1653. By his countess, Lady Margaret Home, elder daughter of the first earl of Home, he had, with four daughters, four sons, namely, 1. James, Lord Doune, who died before his father, unmarried; 2. Alexander, fourth earl; 3. The Hon. Francis Stuart of Culalay, who died unmarried; and 4. The Hon. Archibald Stuart of Duncarn, Fifeshire.

Alexander, fourth earl, was, by Cromwell's act of grace and indemnity 1654, fined £3,500, for his loyalty. He was admitted justice-general 1st June 1675; appointed a commissioner of the Treasury, 27th September 1678; nominated an extraordinary lord of session 17th July 1680, and on 2d November the same year, succeeded the duke of Lauderdale as secretary of state. Entering readily into the designs of James VII., he was constituted lord-high-commissioner to the Estates in 1686, when it was attempted to obtain toleration for the Roman Catholics, and in 1687 he was made a knight of the Thistle. At the Revolution the earl was deprived of all his offices, and retiring to his castle of Donibristle, on the northern shore of the Forth, he resided quietly there till his death, 1st November 1700. By his countess, Emilia, daughter of Sir William Balfour of Pitcullo, lieutenant of the Tower of London, he had four sons: 1st, James, Lord Doune, who predeceased his father; 2d, Charles, fifth earl, who was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 23d September 1681, and died, without issue, 7th October 1735, in his 76th year; 3d, Hon. John Scott, who died November 9th; and 4th, Francis, sixth earl. The latter was one of those who were summoned on suspicion of disaffection during the rebellion of 1715. He held the earldom only four years, dying 11th December 1739, in his 66th year.

His eldest son, James, seventh earl of Moray, born about 1708, was made a knight of the Thistle in 1741. The same year he was elected one of the sixteen Scots representative peers, and afterwards rechosen three times. He died 5th July 1767, in his 59th year. Under the act of 1747, abolishing the heritable jurisdictions in Scotland, he received in all £4,200, in full of his claim of £14,000, namely, for the sheriffship of Moray, £3,000, and for the stewardry of Menteith, £1,200.

His son, Francis, 8th earl, born Jan. 11, 1737, made extensive improvements on his estates. In 1767 and 1768 he planted at Darnaway, Doune, and Donibristle, upwards of 13 millions of trees, of which 1,449,660 were oaks. At the general election of 1784 and in 1790, he was chosen a Scots representative peer, and on May 28, 1796, was created a British peer by the title of Baron Stuart of Castle Stuart, in the county of Inverness, to himself and the heirs male of his body. He died Aug. 28, 1810, aged 74. With 4 daughters, he had 5 sons. The two eldest sons died young.

Francis, the 3d son, became 9th earl. Born at Edinburgh Feb. 2, 1771, he died Jan. 10, 1848. He raised an independent company of foot, which was disbanded in 1791. He was twice married, 1st, to Lucy, 2d daughter of Major-gen. John Scott of Balcomie, Fifeshire, M.P.; and, 2dly, to his cousin, Margaret Jane, daughter of Sir Philip Ainslie, knight of Pilton, Mid Lothian. By the former he had two sons, Francis, Lord Doune, born in 1795; and the Hon. John Stuart. By the latter he had 4 sons and 4 daughters.

Francis, 10th earl, born Nov. 7, 1795, died unmarried May 6, 1859, when his brother, the Hon. John Stuart of Borland, born January 25, 1797, a captain in the army, succeeded as 11th earl. His surviving brothers' names are Hon. Archibald George, born in 1816, and Hon. George, born in 1814.

MORAY, a surname, originally Murreff, now MURRAY, which see. The acknowledged chieftainship of the great family of this name is vested in Moray-Stirling of Abercairny, and Ardoch, both in Perthshire, descended from one Freskine, a Fleming, who settled in Scotland in the reign of David I. (1122—1153), and acquired from that monarch the lands of Strathbrock in Linlithgowshire, and of Duffus in Moray. In 1158 he was succeeded by his elder son, William. His younger son, Hugh, was the ancestor of the earls of Sutherland, (see SUTHERLAND, Earl of). William's elder son, also called William, succeeded his father in 1200. He assumed the name of William de Moravia, having extensive estates and great local influence in the province of Moray. He married the daughter and heiress of David de Olifard, son of Walter de Olifard, justiciary of Lothian, who died in 1242, and acquired with her the lands of Bothwell and Drumsargard, in Lanarkshire, and Smallholm in Berwickshire. Drumsargard, anciently Drumshargat, is now called Cambuslang, and forms a part of the entailed estate of the duke of Hamilton. Besides Sir Walter, his heir, he had several sons, who, says Chalmers, "propagated the name of Moray, by founding other houses, one of which was the Murrays of Tul-libardine, now represented by the duke of Athol." Sir Walter succeeded in 1226 to the family estates, and was the first of the name designated of Bothwell. He died in 1284. He had married a daughter of Malcolm, earl of Fife, a marriage which enabled his descendant in the fifth degree to plead the privileges of that family. His elder son, Sir William de Moravia, dominus de Bothwell, was, by Alexander III., appointed hereditarius panitarius Scotie, an office similar to that of the great master of the household in modern times. He was one of the magnates of Scotland who were summoned to Berwick as an auditor of the claims to the crown of Bruce and Baliol. He died without issue in 1293.

His brother, Sir Andrew Moray of Bothwell, the celebrated patriot, succeeded him. He was one of the first to join Wallace, when he reared the standard of national independence. Among the barons who swore fealty to Edward I. in 1292 and 1296, whose names appear in the Ragnan Roll, there are no less than 17 named Moray, Murreff, or Moravia. But Sir Andrew Moray of Bothwell is not found amongst them. Of all the barons of Scotland, he and Sir William Wallace form the exceptions. There is an Andrew Moray in the roll, but that name was a common one at that time, and the statement in Douglas' Peerage that it was the lord of Bothwell, is a mistake. In 1297, when Wallace was basely deserted by the leaders of the Scots at Irvine, Sir Andrew Moray alone remained faithful to him. He fell at the battle of Stirling, 13th September that year, being the only person of distinction slain on the Scottish side. This was the most complete victory which Wallace ever gained in a regularly fought field, yet, such was his modesty that he allowed the name of Sir Andrew Moray to stand before his own as the leader of the Scottish army. By his wife, a daughter of Sir John Cumyn, lord of Badenoch, the lord of Bothwell had two sons, Sir Andrew, his successor, and Sir William Moray of Drumsargard, from whom the Morays of Abercairny are lineally descended.

Sir Andrew Moray of Bothwell, the elder son, was, when very young, joined in command with Sir William Wallace, (Hailes' Annals, vol. ii. p. 212.) when he invaded England, soon after the battle of Stirling, and his name takes precedence of Wallace's in the protection granted to the canons of Hexham, in Northumberland, by which the priory and convent were admitted under the peace of the king of Scotland, and all persons prohibited, on pain of death, from doing them injury. Hemingford has inserted in his history a copy of this remarkable document, which is still extant, and is dated Hexham, 8th November 1297.

Sir Andrew Moray afterwards joined the standard of Bruce, and adhered to him under every change of fortune. His faithful services were rewarded by his receiving in marriage, in 1326, in the abbey of Cambuskenneth, the king's sister, the Lady Christian Bruce, widow of Gratney earl of Mar and of Sir Christopher Seton. The lordship of Bothwell had by Edward I. been given to Aymer de Valence, earl of Pembroke, whom he had appointed his governor of the south part of Scotland, but upon his forfeiture it was restored by Robert the Bruce to Sir Andrew Moray. After the fatal battle of Duplin, 12th August 1332, and the coronation of Edward Baliol as king at Scone, on the 24th September, Bruce's party chose Sir Andrew Moray regent of the kingdom. One of his first acts was to send the young king, David II., and his queen, for safety to France. Early in the following year he attempted to surprise Baliol in Roxburgh castle, but was unfortunately taken prisoner. One of his soldiers, named Ralph Golding, having advanced before his companions, was thrown to the ground. The regent generously attempted to rescue him, but not being promptly supported by his followers, he fell into the power of his enemies. Disdaining to surrender to Baliol, he cried out, "I yield to the king of England; conduct me to him." He was conveyed to Edward at Durham, and detained in close custody, but, the following year, he either escaped, or was set at liberty. His return to Scotland infused new spirit into the national party, and he was even joined by some of the English malcontents. Marching into Buchan, at the head of a considerable force, he laid siege to the castle of Dundarg, then held by Henry de Beaumont, one of Baliol's adherents, whom he compelled to capitulate.

In 1335, when Cumyn, earl of Athol, whom the English faction had made governor of Scotland under Baliol, was besieging the castle of Kildrummie, which was then under the charge of Lady Christian Bruce, the wife of Sir Andrew Moray, he was attacked by the latter and others of the loyal nobility, defeated and slain, 30th September that year. Sir Andrew Moray was, thereafter, at a meeting of the Estates held at Dunfermline, re-elected regent.

In the summer of 1336, Edward III. again invaded Scotland, and wasted the country wherever he went, when the Scots, remembering the lessons of the good king Robert, had recourse to a sort of guerilla warfare, taking refuge in forests and morasses, where the English could not follow them. On Edward's departure, Sir Andrew Moray issued from his fastnesses, and laid siege to the castle of Stirling. Edward hastened to its relief, when the regent retiring to the north, made himself master of the castle of Dunottar, in Kincardineshire, which Edward had re fortified in his progress through Scotland. He also took the castles of Laurieston, in the same county, and Kinclaven, in Perthshire, and during the following winter, he harassed the Mearns and Angus. The tower of Falkland he likewise wrested from the English, and in February 1337, assisted by the earls of Fife and March, he got possession, after a siege of three weeks, of both the town and castle of St. Andrews. In this siege he is said to have employed very powerful battering machines, from some of which stones weighing 200 pounds were thrown at the walls. Following the plan of the great Bruce, Moray entirely razed and destroyed these castles. At the same time he besieged the castle of Cupar, which was defended by William Bulloch, a warlike ecclesiastic, whom Balfour, the vassal king, had created chamberlain of Scotland and governor of the castles of St. Andrews and Cupar. Finding it impossible to make any impression on this strong fortress, the regent was obliged to raise the siege. In March he took his own castle of Bothwell, and attempted to reduce the castle of Edinburgh, but did not succeed. He subdued, however, the whole of Lothian, and invaded Cumberland. In 1338 Sir Andrew Moray, worn out with the fatigues of the constant warfare in which he had been engaged, died at his castle of Avoch in Ross, respected and lamented by all true Scotsmen, and was buried in the abbey of Dunfermline, where Bruce and Randolph had been already interred. He had two sons, John Moray, lord of Bothwell, and panetorium Scoticæ, who died in 1352, without issue, and Thomas, who succeeded his brother.

In 1351, Thomas Moray, who, the following year, became lord of Bothwell, was one of the seven hostages sent to England, when David II., then a prisoner, was permitted to visit his dominions. In 1357 he was one of the commissioners appointed to treat with the English for David's release. He was also one of the eight great lords of whom three were to place themselves in the hands of the English, in security of the conditions being fulfilled on which the Scots monarch was liberated. He accordingly went to England, and died of the plague in London about Michaelmas 1361. He left an only child, Jean, his sole heiress, who married Archibald the Grim, lord of Galloway and third earl of Douglas.

The Abercairny family are lineally descended from William, second son of the patriot, Sir Andrew Moray of Bothwell, and younger brother of the regent of the same name. From his uncle and godfather he got the lands and barony of Drumsargard, part of the barony of Bothwell. In a letter to King Edward I., dated in 1290, and signed by a great number of the Scots nobility, concerning a marriage between the 'Maiden of Norway,' the infant queen of Scotland, and Prince Edward of England, William de Moreff de Drumsargard is one, (Rymer's Fœdera, vol. ii. p. 471). His name appears in the Ragman Roll, as having sworn fealty to Edward I. in 1296. He died about 1300, and was succeeded by his son, Sir John Moray de Drumsargard, a personage of great power and authority in his time. He married in 1290, the Lady Mary, only daughter of Malise, earl of Strathern, and with her acquired the lands of Abercairny and Ogilvy in Perthshire. He had three sons: 1. Maurice, created earl of Strathern, 9th February 1333, and slain at the battle of Durham in 1346, without issue; 2. Sir Alexander Moray of Drumsargard, Ogilvy and Abercairny, who carried on the line of the family; and, 3. Walter, ancestor of the Murrays of Ogilfae, in Stirlingshire, a family now extinct.

Sir Alexander Moray, the second son, was returned heir to his paternal inheritance in 1349. On the death of Thomas, last lord of Bothwell, without male issue in 1366, he claimed the succession to his honours and estate, being his cousin and next heir male; but was unable to recover them from the earl of Douglas, the husband of Thomas' daughter. "The power of the Douglasses," says the Baronage (p. 100), "being then very great, he found it impossible for him to get justice in the ordinary courts of judicature; yea, their influence was then so universal that he could not get lawyers to plead his cause." He, therefore, resigned the lands and barony of Drumsargard to his brother, Walter, and removed to Perthshire, where he settled, and where his posterity have resided ever since. In 1397 he had the misfortune to be concerned in the slaughter of one Spalding, and was obliged to plead the privilege of the clan Macduff, as being within the ninth degree of consanguinity to the noble family of Fife, and the privilege was granted to him. He died, at an advanced age, in the beginning of the reign of James I. By his wife, Lady Janet, daughter of William, earl of Ross, and sister of Queen Euphemia, relict of the baron of Monynusk, he had a son, Sir Andrew Moray of Abercairny and Ogilvy. This gentleman was knighted by James II. He had a son, Sir Humphry Moray, who succeeded his father in the beginning of the reign of James III. His son, Andrew Moray of Bothwell, married a daughter of Robertson of Strowan, and was killed at Flodden, with his eldest son, George, in September 1513. This son had married Agnes, a daughter of the illustrious house of Lindsay, and had a son, John Moray, who succeeded his grandfather, and was slain at Pinkie in 1547. By his wife, who was his own cousin, Lady Nicholas Graham, daughter of William, earl of Montrose, he had, with six daughters, three sons.

His eldest son, William Moray of Abercairny, died in 1558, without issue, and was succeeded by his brother, Robert, who married, in 1560, Catherine, daughter of William Murray of Tullibardine, progenitor of the dukes of Athol, and, with two daughters, had six sons.

The second son was the celebrated poet and scholar, Sir David Moray of Gorthy, keeper of the privy purse to Prince Henry, eldest son of James VI., "thereunto appointed by his highness' speciall dyrreccion and commandement." He was the author of a very rare volume of poems, dedicated to Prince Henry, entitled 'The Tragical Death of Sophonisba, written by David Murray, Scots-Brittain, printed by John Smethwicke, in Saint Dunstan's Churchyard, in Fleet Street, 1611;' to which is added, 'Cœlia, containing certain Sonets and small Poems.' This volume, with a few other pieces by Sir David, was reprinted in 1823, for the Bannatyne Club, the editor of which reprint erroneously describes the author as having been tutor to Prince Henry, instead of keeper of his privy purse. The work itself is so very scarce that, at the sale of Mr. Fiulay's library, an original edition of Sophonisba sold for no less a sum than thirty-two guineas. Among the commendatory tributes prefixed, there is one from John Murray, a cousin of the author, and another by Drayton. Prince Henry died November 6, 1612, and Sir David attended his funeral, sitting in a chariot at the feet of the "lively effigy," or figure, which represented the dead prince lying in state. What became of him afterwards is not known. We learn from a rare tract of four pages, preserved in the university library at Edinburgh, among the books presented by Drummond of Hawthornden, that, in 1615, he published at Edinburgh, a paraphrase of the 104th Psalm, and that in 1616 he addressed an elegant sonnet to his friend Drummond. His poetry is praised for the easiness of the versification, and the more than customary purity of the language.

The third son, Sir Mungo Moray of Craigie, had, by his wife, a daughter of George Italket of Pitfirrane, two sons, namely, 1st, Sir Robert Moray, lord-justice-clerk and president of the Royal Society, of whom a memoir is given under the head of MURRAY, in larger type; and 2d, Sir William Moray of Dreghorn, master of the works to Charles II.

The fourth son was the Rev. John Murray, at first minister at Borthwick, where he was for seven years. Thence he was translated to Leith, at the earnest suit of the people thereof. He was a great opposer of the bishops, and on 25th February 1608, after being four years and a half in Leith, he was summoned to appear before the council, to answer for a sermon preached by him, on Galatians v. 1, at a synodal assembly at Edinburgh, as moderator of the preceding synod, wherein he inveighed against the avarice and ambition of some of the prelates. This sermon was printed at London without his knowledge, he having given a written copy of it to a friend who had requested it of him. He acknowledged it to be his, but gave in a general answer to the council, which in effect was a declination of their jurisdiction, in the form of a supplication that the matter might be remitted to his own ecclesiastical superiors. Although favourably dismissed from the council, he was, at the instigation of the bishops, apprehended on a warrant from the king, and put in ward in the castle of Edinburgh. After being detained there a year, he was removed to Newabbey near Dumfries, and ordered to confine himself within four miles of that place. His charge at Leith was declared vacant, and Mr. David Lindsay inducted there in his stead. He remained at Dumfries about a year and a half, preaching either there or at the kirk of Traquair, on the other side of the Nith, and then went with his wife and children to Dysart in Fife, where he remained privately half-a-year. Removing to Prestonpans, then called Saltpreston, he resumed his public preaching. In 1617, at the urgent request of the parishioners and the presbytery, he was placed at Dunfermline. On the 12th December 1621, he was summoned by the bishop of St. Andrews to appear before the high commission, and answer for not conforming to the five acts of Perth, and as he paid no attention to the summons, though twice cited, he was removed from Dunfermline, and ordered to confine himself within the parish of Foulis in Strathern.

The fifth son, Captain Andrew Murray, and the sixth, who was named James, both died without issue.

The eldest son, Sir William, succeeded his father in 1594. Being about the same age as James VI., he was brought up with him at Stirling, his majesty being then under the charge of the old countess of Mar, Abercairny's aunt on the mother's side. He was knighted by the king and appointed master of the horse to the queen. He lived mostly at court, both in Scotland and after James' accession to the crown of England, and died in 1640, leaving his estate greatly encumbered with debt. He had a son, Robert, who predeceased him in 1628, and left two sons, William and David.

William, Robert's elder son, succeeded his grandfather, and was a great loyalist, but died while still a young man, in 1642. His eldest son, Sir Robert Moray of Abercairny, born in 1636, was, immediately after the Restoration, knighted by Charles II. He died in April 1704, in his 68th year. With two daughters, he had five sons, namely, 1st, William, his heir; 2d, Robert, who was so strongly attached to the interests of the Stuart family that he waited upon James VII., after his expatriation, at St. Germain's, and was by him, it is said, intrusted with some commission of importance to his adherents in Scotland. 3d, Captain John Moray, who, after the Revolution, went into the French service, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. After the accession of Queen Anne, he and Captain James Murray, brother of Sir David Murray of Stanhope, were by the exiled family at St. Germain's, sent over to Scotland, under the protection of her majesty's indemnity, as a check upon Simon Fraser of Beaufort, afterwards the celebrated Lord Lovat, and to sound the dispositions of the people. He died, unmarried, in 1710. 4th, James, and 5th, Maurice, both died young and unmarried.

The eldest son, William Moray of Abercairny, greatly improved his paternal estate, and entirely relieved it from all the encumbrances upon it. He died in 1735. By his wife, a daughter of Graham of Balnagowan, he had a son and two daughters. His only son, James, had, with four daughters, two sons, Alexander and Charles, who both inherited the estate. The latter, Colonel Charles Moray of Abercairny, married the eldest daughter and heiress of Sir William Stirling, baronet of Ardoch, and died in 1810. With five daughters, he had three sons. James, the eldest son, succeeded him. He was a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant of Perthshire; captain, 15th hussars, and subsequently lieutenant-colonel of the Perthshire local militia. He died, without issue, in December 1840, and was succeeded by his brother, Major William Moray-Stirling of Abercairny and Ardoch. He married the Hon. Fanny Douglas, daughter of Archibald, Lord Douglas, and served for a long period in the army. He was ten years in India, and was severely wounded at Waterloo. He succeeded his mother in Ardoch, when he assumed the additional name of Stirling.

MORDINGTON, Lord, a (dormant) title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1641, on Sir James Douglas, second son of the tenth earl of Angus. He had married Anne, only child of Lawrence, fifth Lord Oliphant. This lady claimed the peerage of Oliphant, but in the court of session in 1633, it was determined, in presence of Charles I., in favour of the heir male. The king, however, was pleased to create her husband a peer by the title of Lord Mordington, 14th November 1641, with the precedence of Oliphant (1458). He obtained a grant from the crown of the lands and barony of Over Mordington in Berwickshire, on 24th August 1634. These lands at one period belonged to the celebrated Randolph, earl of Moray, by gift from his uncle, Robert the Bruce, and at the death of John, third earl, passed to his sister, Black Agnes, countess of Dunbar. They were given as a dowry with her daughter, Agnes, on her marriage to Sir James Douglas of Dalkeith, and continued in the possession of his successors, the earls of Morton, till the attainder of the regent Morton in June 1581, when they reverted to the crown. The first Lord Mordington died 11th February 1656.

His son, William, second Lord Mordington, married Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Hugh, fifth Lord Sempill, by whom he had two sons; James, third Lord Mordington, and the Hon. James Douglas. James, third lord, during the lifetime of his father, had a charter, "To James, master of Mordingtoun," of the lands of Nether Mordington, of date 2d August, 1662. His son, George, fourth Lord Mordington, has obtained a place in Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors, (Park's edition, vol. v. p. 147,) as the author of a work called 'The great blessing of a monarchical government, when fenced about with, and bounded by, the laws, and these laws secured, defended and observed by the monarch. Also, that as a Popish government is inconsistent with the true happiness of these kingdoms, so great also are the miseries and confusions of anarchy. Most humbly dedicated to his majesty by George Douglas, Lord Mordington.' London, 1724. Two pieces against a weekly paper, called the Independent Whig, are also mentioned there as written by his lordship. He died 10th June 1741. His only son, Charles, went to sea when young, and did not return till after his father's death. As he had no landed property, he did not assume the title. Engaging in the rebellion of 1745, he was taken prisoner, and tried 11th September 1746, under the designation of Charles Douglas, Esq. He then pleaded his peerage, which was objected to by the counsel for the crown; but on proving his descent, his trial was postponed, and himself remanded to the castle of Carlisle, from which he was soon after released. On the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions the following year, he claimed for the privilege of regality over the lands of Nether Mordington, £300, which was refused. He died without issue, and in him terminated the male line of the family. His sister, Mary, assumed the title of Baroness Mordington, and died 22d July 1791, without issue. Her husband, William Werner, Esq., an officer of the royal regiment of horse guards, fought at the battles of Dettingen and Fontenoy. The peerage of Mordington is represented, it is said, by the Baroness Sempill.

MORE, a surname signifying great, from the Gaelic Mòr, big or large. In Scotland it is variously spelled Mure, Muir, or Moir. Those of this name and that of Morison carry three Moors' heads in their armorial bearings, as having some allusion to their name. See MURE.

MOREHAM, a surname taken from lands in Haddingtonshire, now a parish. The de Morehams flourished under Alexander I. and II., and in the Ragman Roll appears the name of Thomas de Moreham puer, that is, the younger, as having sworn fealty to Edward I. Sir Reginald More, lord-great-chamberlain under David II., belonged to this family. He had sunk the last syllable of his name. Removing into Stirlingshire, he resided on the north bank of the Carron, at a place now called Seathmoor, where he built a fine house. He married one of the coheresses of the Grahams of Eskdale, with whom he acquired the lands of Abercorn in Linlithgowshire, once the possession of Sir John the Graham, the "fidus Achates" of Wallace. Here his family resided for some generations, and were known in writs as the Mores of Abercorn. The sole heiress married Sir William Lindsay of the Byres.

MORISON, THOMAS, a learned physician of the sixteenth century, was born at Aberdeen, and studied at the university of Montpellier, at which he is supposed to have taken a degree. In 1593 he published at Frankfort a treatise, 'De Metallorum Causis et Transubstantiatione,' and in 1594 he produced at Edinburgh a work on the Popedom, entitled 'Papatus; seu depravatæ Religionis Origo et Incrementum;' both dedicated to James VI. The latter volume, which is now exceedingly rare, is said to be highly prized by the learned for its singular erudition. He was the friend of Lord Bacon, with whom, as well as with his brother, Mr. Anthony Bacon, he maintained a correspondence. We are also informed that he was employed to furnish intelligence from Scotland to the earl of Essex. From a letter addressed to him by Bacon, dated "from his chambers in Gray's Inn," in 1603, soliciting his influence with the king in his favour, it appears that Dr. Morison's death must have taken place after that year, though Dempster places it in 1601.

MORISON, ROBERT, M.D., an eminent physician and botanist of the 17th century, was born at Aberdeen in 1620, and received his education at Marischal college in that city. In June 1639, on the breaking out of the civil wars in Scotland, he signaled his zeal in the cause of the king, by appearing in arms at the battle of the Bridge of Dee, where he was dangerously wounded in the head. Soon after his recovery his attachment to the royal cause obliged him to retire to France, when, fixing his residence at Paris, he applied assiduously to the study of botany and anatomy, and took the degree of M.D. at Angers in 1648.

His reputation as a botanist induced the duke of Orleans to appoint him, in 1650, to the charge of the royal gardens at Blois, of the plants in which he afterwards published an accurate catalogue, under the title of 'Hortus Regni Blesensis.' On the Restoration he removed to London, and was appointed by the king his physician and royal professor of botany, with a salary of £200. In 1669 he published his 'Preludium Botanicum,' and soon after he was elected professor of botany in the university of Oxford. In 1672 appeared his 'Plantarum Umbelliferarum Distributio Nova,' the substance of which is incorporated in the 'Plantarum Historia,' 2 volumes, 1678. A 3d was added after the author's death by Jacob Bobart. Dr. Morison died at London, Nov. 9, 1683, aged 63.

MORTIMER, the surname of an ancient potent family of Norman descent, who possessed the lands of Aberdour in Fife. At an early period these lands belonged to a family of the name of Vetere-Ponte or Vipont, a surname still known in Scotland, under the latter form, though now very rare. This family ended in an heir female, Auicea, only daughter and sole heiress of 'Johannes dominus de Vetere-ponte or Vy-pont, anno 2 regni Davidis I.' She married, in 1126, Alanus de Mortuo-Mari or Mortimer, who thereby acquired right to her lands. The name, though fancifully supposed to have been first borne by a crusader, and said to be derived from "De Mortuo Mari," "from the Dead Sea," was taken from a place in Normandy, the great ancestor of the family being a relative by blood of William the Conqueror. In the Register of the abbey of St. Colme there is the following entry in Latin: "Sir Alan Mortimer, lord of Aberdour, gave the half of the lands of his town of Aberdour to God and the monks of St. Colme's Isle for the benefit of a burial-place to himself and his posterity, in the church of their monastery." Sibbald (History of Fife, page 92, edition 1803) says, "It is reported that Alain the founder being dead, the monks carrying his corpse in a coffin of lead, by barge, in the night-time, to be interred within their church, some wicked monks did throw the samen in a great deep, betwixt the land and the monastery, which to this day by the neighbouring fishermen and salters is called Mortimer's Deep." With the Mortimer family the lands of Aberdour continued for more than a century, when they came to the ancestors of the earl of Morton, the present proprietor.

MORTON, earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred by James II. 14th March 1458, on James Douglas of Dalkeith, descended from Sir John Douglas, second son of Sir James de Douglas, of London, who was assassinated by order of Sir David Barclay of Brechin in 1350, and whose eldest son, Sir James Douglas, had, in 1351, a grant of the barony of Aberdour in Fife, from his uncle, William de Douglas, lord of Liddisdale, and some time earl of Athol, (see vol. i. p. 163). The remote ancestor of the noble family of Morton was Andrew, second son of Archibald de Douglas, the second of that illustrious race who bore the name of Douglas. The title is taken from the lands of Mortoune in the parish of East Calder, Mid Lothian, anciently called Calder-Clere; having been at one time the property of the family of de Clere.

James, first earl of Morton, had a safe-conduct into England, as one of the ambassadors from Scotland, 14th June 1491, and again, 28th July 1494. He married Johanna, the widowed countess of Angus, daughter of King James I., and, with two daughters, had a son, John, second earl.

The second earl of Morton was present in the estates of parliament when the settlements on the princess Margaret of England by James IV. were confirmed, 13th May 1504. He was succeeded by his son, James, third earl, who received a safe-conduct 6th February 1516, to go to England. The Douglases of London obtained, in early times, a baronial jurisdiction over many lands, in several shires, which was called the regality of Dalkeith. In 1541, James, third earl of Morton, obtained a charter from James V., confirming this regality. On the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions in Scotland in 1747, the duke of Buccleuch, to whom this regality then belonged, received £3,400 for it. The earl of Morton married Catherine, natural daughter of James IV., by Margaret Boyd, and had 3 daughters; Lady Margaret, married to the earl of Arran, duke of Chatelherault, regent of Scotland; Lady Beatrix, wife of Robert, fifth Lord Maxwell; and Lady Elizabeth, wife of James Douglas, second son of Sir George Douglas of Pittendreich, (see vol. ii. p. 47,) the brother of the sixth earl of Angus. Having no male issue, he made an entail of his estates and honours in favour of Sir Robert Douglas of Lochleven, who had a charter of the same, 17th October 1540. Afterwards, however, he altered the destination, and a charter of the lands and earldom was granted in favour of his son-in-law, James Douglas, and the Lady Elizabeth, his wife, and the longest liver, in conjunct fee, and the heirs male to be procreated between them, the remainder to others therein mentioned, and the heirs male of their bodies respectively, which was confirmed by royal charter, 22d April 1543. The third earl died in 1553.

His son-in-law, James Douglas, became fourth earl of Morton, in terms of the above-mentioned settlement, and was the famous regent Morton, of whom a memoir is given in vol. ii. p. 53, in larger type. He left no lawful issue, although he had several natural children. On his execution in 1581, his estates and titles became forfeited to the crown. John, 7th Lord Maxwell, grandson of the 3d earl, obtained, in right of his mother, a new charter of the earldom of Morton, June 5, 1581 (see p. 126 of this volume), and was 5th earl of Morton. The attainder being reversed in Jan. 1585, Lord Maxwell had to relinquish the title, which devolved on the next heir of entail, Archibald, 8th earl of Angus of the Douglas family, (see vol. ii. p. 47). The latter, 6th earl of Morton, died, without surviving issue, in 1588. In the superstition of the times he was suspected to have died by witchcraft. This earl, says Calderwood, (vol. iv. p. 680,) was "more nor anie of his predecessors, yea, nor anie of all the erles in the countrie, much beloved of the godlie. The king was wont commonly to call him 'the ministers' king.' He gave a proof of his religion and pietie at his last and greatest extremitie; for howbeit he was assured he was bewitched, yitt refused he all helpe by witches, but referred the event to God."

On the earl of Angus' death, Sir William Douglas of Lochleven became 7th earl of Morton. He was descended from Sir Henry Douglas of Lugton, who, in the reign of Robert II., obtained a grant of the castle of Lochleven, in the neighbourhood of Kinross, with lands on the shore of the lake. He was the third son of Sir John Douglas of Dalkeith, by Agnes Monfode. In 1566, Sir William Douglas of Lochleven, the near kinsman of the regent Morton, and half-brother to the regent Moray, was selected as the jailer of the unfortunate Queen Mary when she was imprisoned in Lochleven castle, 16th June 1567. She made her escape, it is well known, on the 2d May 1568, by means of George Douglas, youngest son of Sir Robert. The sixth earl died 24th September, 1606. His grandson, William, seventh earl, was a privy councillor, and one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber both to King James VI. and Charles I. On 12th April 1630, he was constituted high-treasurer of Scotland, and held that office till 1635, when he was appointed captain of the yeomen of the guard, and besides being made a knight of the Garter, was sworn a member of the English privy council. In 1641 he was nominated high-chancellor of Scotland, but the appointment being opposed in parliament by his own son-in-law, the famous marquis of Argyll, the husband of his second daughter, Lady Margaret Douglas, the king did not persist in it.

On the breaking out of the civil wars, the earl of Morton, who was then one of the richest noblemen in the kingdom, advanced large sums for the support of the royal cause. Among other estates disposed of for that purpose, the estate of Dalkeith was in 1642 sold to the Buccleuch family. On that account the islands of Orkney and Zetland were, 15th June 1643, with all the regalities belonging to them, granted by royal charter in mortgage to the earl, redeemable by the crown on the payment of £30,000 sterling. In 1646, when Charles I. took refuge with the Scots army at Newcastle, the earl of Morton went to that town to wait on his majesty. He afterwards retired to Orkney, where he died 7th August 1648, in his 66th year. With five daughters, he had four sons.

His eldest son, Robert, ninth earl, mortgaged the islands of Orkney and Zetland, to assist Charles, but died towards the end of the year 1649. His son, William, tenth earl, received in 1662 a new grant of Orkney and Zetland, which had been confiscated by Cromwell, not in his own name, however, but in that of the Viscount Grandison, the brother of his countess, in trust for the Morton family. Both this and the former grant were contested by the lord-advocate, and being reduced, these islands were, by act of parliament, 27th December 1669, annexed for ever to the crown. The earl died in 1681, without surviving issue, when the title devolved on his uncle, the Hon. Sir James Douglas of Smithfield, who was knighted by the earl of Lindsay under the royal standard at the Isle of Rhee for his gallant behaviour. He was a gentleman of the privy chamber to Charles I.

The 11th earl died in 1686. He had, with one daughter, five sons. The eldest, Charles, Lord Aberdour, was drowned at sea on his passage to Holland, unmarried.

The second son, James, twelfth earl, supported the Revolution, and was a privy councillor to Queen Ann. He was one of the commissioners for the Union, which he zealously supported in parliament. The same year (1707) Orkney and Zetland were placed under his jurisdiction as their admiral and hereditary steward and justiciary, having been restored by act of parliament, to himself and his heirs, in the old form of mortgage, redeemable by the crown on payment of £30,000, but subject to an annual feu duty of £500 to his lordship. He died unmarried in December 1715.

His brother Robert, thirteenth earl, described as a man of talent and honour, and well versed in the knowledge of the antiquities of his country, also died unmarried, in 1730, when his next brother, George, became the fourteenth earl of Morton. He was a colonel in the army and M.P. for Kirkwall in the last parliament of Scotland. He steadily supported the Union, and was named one of the members of the House of Commons in the first parliament of Great Britain, February 1707. At the general election of 1715, he was chosen M.P. for Peebles, &c., and in 1722 and 1727, for the county of Orkney. In May 1733, three years after succeeding to the earldom, he was appointed vice-admiral of Scotland, and died at Edinburgh, 4th January 1738, in his 77th year.

His son, James, 15th earl, born at Edinburgh about 1702, was a nobleman of abilities and learning. In 1738, after his accession to the earldom, he was invested with the order of the Thistle, and in 1739 appointed a lord of the bedchamber. On 12th May the same year he was elected one of the sixteen Scots representative peers, and afterwards four times re-chosen. He was a frequent speaker in the House of Lords, in which he sat for thirty years. On visiting Orkney in 1739, his lordship had severe contests with Sir James Stewart of Burray, baronet, which, in 1740, formed the subjects of judicial investigation. The earl was assolizied, and Sir James, being found guilty, was fined and imprisoned for assaulting his lordship.

In 1742, though his revenues from Orkney and Zetland were computed to amount to £3,000 sterling a-year, on the ground that they did not yield a rental equal to the interest of the mortgage, the earl contrived to obtain an act of parliament vesting them irredeemably in himself and his heirs. He also got a temporary lease of the rents of the bishopric of Orkney, and a donation of the rights of admiralty, which, in these islands, had always been considered as distinct from those of the admiralty of Scotland. Being at Paris in 1746, he was confined three months in the Bastille. His countess (Agatha, daughter and heiress of James Halyburton of Pitcur) and child, and a sister of the countess, were also imprisoned, but in separate apartments. The cause of this imprisonment was never known. He returned to England, 3d May 1747, and on the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions the same year, he was compensated for the office of steward and justiciary of Orkney and Zetland with the sum of £7,147.

In 1760 his lordship was appointed lord-clerk-register of Scotland. He established the Edinburgh Philosophical Society, and on 27th March 1764, was elected president of the Royal Society of London. In 1766, after being harassed with complaints, quarrels, and lawsuits, on account of the manner in which the rents, feu-duties, and services were exacted, he sold his estates in Orkney and Zetland, for £60,000, to Sir Lawrence Dundas, grandfather of the first earl of Zetland. His lordship died at Chiswick, October 12th, 1768, leaving a distinguished reputation for scientific attainments and philosophical knowledge. At the time of his death he was one of the trustees of the British Museum, and a commissioner of annexed estates. He was twice married. By his first countess, Agatha Halyburton, he had five sons and two daughters. By his second countess, Bridget, eldest daughter of Sir John Heathcote of Normanton, county of Rutland, baronet, he had a son, the Hon. John Douglas, an officer in the army, and a daughter, Lady Bridget Bouverie, she having married the second son of the first earl of Radnor.

Charles, Lord Aberdour, his eldest son, having died young, Sholto Charles, the second son, born in 1732, also in his father's lifetime styled Lord Aberdour, became 16th earl of Morton. In 1759 he raised a corps of light dragoons, of which he was made captain-commandant. He was one of the lords of police at the accession of George III., and held that office till his death, which took place in Sicily, 25th September 1774, aged 42. He had married at Edinburgh, 19th November 1758, Katherine, fourth daughter of the Hon. John Hamilton, second son of the sixth earl of Haddington, and had two sons, George, seventeenth earl, and the Hon. Hamilton Douglas, who, on the death of Colonel James Halyburton of Pitcur, at Dundee, 9th May 1765, acquired that estate, and thereafter assumed the additional name of Halyburton. He was a lieutenant in the royal navy, and on 30th December 1783, he was sent in command of the barge of the Assistance, 50 guns, then assisting at the evacuation of New York, in search of some deserters, when a dreadful storm arising, on new year's morning, 1784, the barge was discovered lying on her side on the Jersey shore, and the dead bodies of all her crew on their faces in the mud, whence they had struggled in vain to extricate themselves. The relations of Lieutenant Halyburton, who thus unfortunately died in his 21st year, erected a monument at Sandyhook to his memory and that of his fellow-sufferers. The estate of Pitcur, in virtue of the entail under which it was held, devolved on his aunt Mary, countess of Aboyne, (see vol. ii. p. 414).

George, the elder son, 17th earl of Morton, born April 3, 1761, was in 1784 chosen one of the 16 Scots representative peers. He was created a baron of Great Britain by the title of Lord Douglas of Lochleven, Jan. 10, 1791, and appointed chamberlain of the queen's household in 1792; knight of the Thistle, July 26, 1797. He was vice-president of the Royal Society; vice-president and manager of the Royal Institution; lord-lieutenant of the county of Fife, and colonel of the Fifeshire militia. He died July 17, 1827, without issue, when the British title of Lord Douglas of Lochleven, being to himself and the heirs male of his body, became extinct, and the Scottish honours devolved on his cousin, George Sholto Douglas, Esq., son of the Hon. John Douglas, 2d son of the 16th earl.

George Sholto, 18th earl, born in London in 1789, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he graduated M.A. in 1810. He was attached to the mission in Spain in 1811, made secretary of legation at Stockholm, in July 1812, and elected a representative peer of Scotland in 1830. In September 1841 he was appointed a lord in waiting to her majesty, an office which he held till June 1849. Reappointed in Feb. 1852, he held the same till Dec. of the same year. In 1843 he was appointed lieutenant-col. of the Mid Lothian yeomanry cavalry, but resigned in 1844. Deputy-lieut. of Mid Lothian in 1854. He died March 31, 1858. He had married in 1817, Frances Theodora, eldest daughter of Right Hon. Sir George Henry Rose, G.C.H.; issue, 5 sons and 5 daughters.

Sholto-John, the eldest son, succeeded as 19th earl. Born at Berlin, April 13, 1818, he became a lieutenant 11th hussars in 1843, but retired in 1844. He succeeded his father in that year as lieutenant-col. of the Mid Lothian yeomanry cavalry, and became lieutenant-col. commandant in 1852. Married, 1st, Jan. 24, 1844, Helen, daughter of James Watson of Saughton, Mid Lothian; issue, Sholto George Watson. Lord family the lands of Aberdour continued for more than a century, when they came to the ancestors of the earl of Morton, the present proprietor.

On the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions in Scotland in 1747, the duke of Buccleuch, to whom this regality then belonged, received £3,400 for it. The earl of Morton married Catherine, natural daughter of James IV., by Margaret Boyd, and had 3 daughters; Lady Margaret, married to the earl of Arran, duke of Chatelherault, regent of Scotland; Lady Beatrix, wife of Robert, fifth Lord Maxwell; and Lady Elizabeth, wife of James Douglas, second son of Sir George Douglas of Pittendreich, (see vol. ii. p. 47.), the brother of the sixth earl of Angus. Having no male issue, he made an entail of his estates and honours in favour of Sir Robert Douglas of Lochleven, who had a charter of the same, 17th October 1540. Afterwards, however, he altered the destination, and a charter of the lands and earldom was granted in favour of his son-in-law, James Douglas, and the Lady Elizabeth, his wife, and the longest liver, in conjunct fee, and the heirs male to be procreated between them, the remainder to others therein mentioned, and the heirs male of their bodies respectively, which was confirmed by royal charter, 22d April 1543. The third earl died in 1553.

His son-in-law, James Douglas, became fourth earl of Morton, in terms of the above-mentioned settlement, and was the famous regent Morton, of whom a memoir is given in vol. ii. p. 53, in larger type. He left no lawful issue, although he had several natural children. On his execution in 1581, his estates and titles became forfeited to the crown. John, 7th Lord Maxwell, grandson of the 3d earl, obtained, in right of his mother, a new charter of the earldom of Morton, June 5, 1581 (see p. 126 of this volume), and was 5th earl of Morton. The attainder being reversed in Jan. 1585, Lord Maxwell had to relinquish the title, which devolved on the next heir of entail, Archibald, 8th earl of Angus of the Douglas family, (see vol. ii. p. 47). The latter, 6th earl of Morton, died, without surviving issue, in 1588. In the superstition of

On the earl of Angus' death, Sir William Douglas of Lochleven became 7th earl of Morton. He was descended from Sir Henry Douglas of Lugton, who, in the reign of Robert II., obtained a grant of the castle of Lochleven, in the neighbourhood of Kinross, with lands on the shore of the lake. He was the third son of Sir John Douglas of Dalkeith, by Agnes Monfode. In 1566, Sir William Douglas of Lochleven, the near kinsman of the regent Morton, and half-brother to the regent Moray, was selected as the jailer of the unfortunate Queen Mary when she was imprisoned in Lochleven castle, 16th June 1567. She made her escape, it is well known, on the 2d May 1568, by means of George Douglas, youngest son of Sir Robert. The sixth earl died 24th September, 1606. His grandson, William, seventh earl, was a privy councillor, and one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber both to King James VI. and Charles I. On 12th April 1630, he was constituted high-treasurer of Scotland, and held that office till 1635, when he was appointed captain of the yeomen of the guard, and besides being made a knight of the Garter, was sworn a member of the English privy council. In 1641 he was nominated high-chancellor of Scotland, but the appointment being opposed in parliament by his own son-in-law, the famous marquis of Argyll, the husband of his second daughter, Lady Margaret Douglas, the king did not persist in it.

On the breaking out of the civil wars, the earl of Morton, who was then one of the richest noblemen in the kingdom, advanced large sums for the support of the royal cause. Among other estates disposed of for that purpose, the estate of Dalkeith was in 1642 sold to the Buccleuch family. On that account the islands of Orkney and Zetland were, 15th June 1643, with all the regalities belonging to them, granted by royal charter in mortgage to the earl, redeemable by the crown on the payment of £30,000 sterling. In 1646, when Charles I. took refuge with the Scots army at Neweastle, the earl of Morton went to that town to wait on his majesty. He afterwards retired to Orkney, where he died 7th August 1648, in his 66th year. With five daughters, he had four sons.

His eldest son, Robert, ninth earl, mortgaged the islands of Orkney and Zetland, to assist Charles, but died towards the end of the year 1649. His son, William, tenth earl, received in 1662 a new grant of Orkney and Zetland, which had been confiscated by Cromwell, not in his own name, however, but in that of the Viscount Grandison, the brother of his countess, in trust for the Morton family. Both this and the former grant were contested by the lord-advocate, and being reduced, these islands were, by act of parliament, 27th December 1669, annexed for ever to the crown. The earl died in 1681, without surviving issue, when the title devolved on his uncle, the Hon. Sir James Douglas of Smithfield, who was knighted by the earl of Lindsay under the royal standard at the Isle of Rhee for his gallant behaviour. He was a gentleman of the privy chamber to Charles I.

The 11th earl died in 1686. He had, with one daughter, five sons. The eldest, Charles, Lord Aberdour, was drowned at sea on his passage to Holland, unmarried.

The second son, James, twelfth earl, supported the Revolution, and was a privy councillor to Queen Anne. He was one of the commissioners for the Union, which he zealously supported in parliament. The same year (1707) Orkney and Zetland were placed under his jurisdiction as their admiral and hereditary steward and justiciary, having been restored by act of parliament, to himself and his heirs, in the old form of mortgage, redeemable by the crown on payment of £30,000, but subject to an annual feu duty of £500 to his lordship. He died unmarried in December 1715.

His brother Robert, thirteenth earl, described as a man of talent and honour, and well versed in the knowledge of the antiquities of his country, also died unmarried, in 1730, when his next brother, George, became the fourteenth earl of Morton. He was a colonel in the army and M.P. for Kirkwall in the last parliament of Scotland. He steadily supported the Union, and was named one of the members of the House of Commons in the first parliament of Great Britain, February 1707. At the general election of 1715, he was chosen M.P. for Peebles, &c., and in 1722 and 1727, for the county of Orkney. In May 1733, three years after succeeding to the earldom, he was appointed vice-admiral of Scotland, and died at Edinburgh, 4th January 1738, in his 77th year.

His son, James, 15th earl, born at Edinburgh about 1702, was a nobleman of abilities and learning. In 1738, after his accession to the earldom, he was invested with the order of the Thistle, and in 1739 appointed a lord of the bedchamber. On 12th May the same year he was elected one of the sixteen Scots representative peers, and afterwards four times re-chosen. He was a frequent speaker in the House of Lords, in which he sat for thirty years. On visiting Orkney in 1739, his lordship had severe contests with Sir James Stewart of Burray, baronet, which, in 1740, formed the subjects of judicial investigation. The earl was assoltized, and Sir James, being found guilty, was fined and imprisoned for assaulting his lordship.

In 1742, though his revenues from Orkney and Zetland were computed to amount to £3,000 sterling a-year, on the ground that they did not yield a rental equal to the interest of the mortgage, the earl contrived to obtain an act of parliament vesting them irredeemably in himself and his heirs. He also got a temporary lease of the rents of the bishopric of Orkney, and a donation of the rights of admiralty, which, in these islands, had always been considered as distinct from those of the admiralty of Scotland. Being at Paris in 1746, he was confined three months in the Bastille. His countess (Agatha, daughter and heiress of James Halyburton of Pitcur) and child, and a sister of the countess, were also imprisoned, but in separate apartments. The cause of this imprisonment was never known. He returned to England, 3d May 1747, and on the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions the same year, he was compensated for the office of steward and justiciary of Orkney and Zetland with the sum of £7,147.

In 1760 his lordship was appointed lord-clerk-register of Scotland. He established the Edinburgh Philosophical Society, and on 27th March 1764, was elected president of the Royal Society of London. In 1766, after being harassed with complaints, quarrels, and lawsuits, on account of the manner in which the rents, feu-duties, and services were exacted, he sold his estates in Orkney and Zetland, for £60,000, to Sir Lawrence Dundas, grandfather of the first earl of Zetland. His lordship died at Chiswick, October 12th, 1768, leaving a distinguished reputation for scientific attainments and philosophical knowledge. At the time of his death he was one of the trustees of the British Museum, and a commissioner of annexed estates. He was twice married. By his first countess, Agatha Halyburton, he had five sons and two daughters. By his second countess, Bridget, eldest daughter of Sir John Heathcote of Normanton, county of Rutland, baronet, he had a son, the Hon. John Douglas, an officer in the army, and a daughter, Lady Bridget Bouverie, she having married the second son of the first earl of Radnor.

Charles, Lord Aberdour, his eldest son, having died young, Sholto Charles, the second son, born in 1732, also in his father's lifetime styled Lord Aberdour, became 16th earl of Morton. In 1759 he raised a corps of light dragoons, of which he was made captain-commandant. He was one of the lords of police at the accession of George III., and held that office till his death, which took place in Sicily, 25th September 1774, aged 42. He had married at Edinburgh, 19th November 1758, Katherine, fourth daughter of the Hon. John Hamilton, second son of the sixth earl of Haddington, and had two sons, George, seventeenth earl, and the Hon. Hamilton Douglas, who, on the death of Colonel James Halyburton of Pitcur, at Dundee, 9th May 1765, acquired that estate, and thereafter assumed the additional name of Halyburton. He was a lieutenant in the royal navy, and on 30th December 1783, he was sent in command of the barge of the Assistance, 50 guns, then assisting at the evacuation of New York, in search of some deserters, when a dreadful storm arising, on new year's morning, 1784, the barge was discovered lying on her side on the Jersey shore, and the dead bodies of all her crew on their faces in the mud, whence they had struggled in vain to extricate themselves. The relations of Lieutenant Halyburton, who thus unfortunately died in his 21st year, erected a monument at Sandyhook to his memory and that of his fellow-sufferers. The estate of Pitcur, in virtue of the entail under which it was held, devolved on his aunt Mary, countess of Aboyne, (see vol. ii. p. 414).

George, the elder son, 17th earl of Morton, born April 3, 1761, was in 1784 chosen one of the 16 Scots representative peers. He was created a baron of Great Britain by the title of Lord Douglas of Lochleven, Jun. 10, 1791, and appointed chamberlain of the queen's household in 1792; knight of the Thistle, July 26, 1797. He was vice-president of the Royal Society; vice-president and manager of the Royal Institution; lord-lieutenant of the county of Fife, and colonel of the Fifeshire militia. He died July 17, 1827, without issue, when the British title of Lord Douglas of Lochleven, being to himself and the heirs male of his body, became extinct, and the Scottish honours devolved on his cousin, George Sholto Douglas, Esq., son of the Hon. John Douglas, 2d son of the 16th earl.

George Sholto, 18th earl, born in London in 1789, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he graduated M.A. in 1810. He was attached to the mission in Spain in 1811, made secretary of legation at Stockholm, in July 1812, and elected a representative peer of Scotland in 1830. In September 1841 he was appointed a lord in waiting to her majesty, an office which he held till June 1849. Reappointed in Feb. 1852, he held the same till Dec. of the same year. In 1843 he was appointed lieutenant-col. of the Mid Lothian yeomanry cavalry, but resigned in 1844. Deputy-lieut. of Mid Lothian in 1854. He died March 31, 1858. He had married in 1817, Frances Theodora, eldest daughter of Right Hon. Sir George Henry Rose, G.C.H.; issue, 5 sons and 5 daughters.

Sholto-John, the eldest son, succeeded as 19th earl. Born at Berlin, April 13, 1818, he became a lieutenant 11th hussars in 1843, but retired in 1844. He succeeded his father in that year as lieutenant-col. of the Mid Lothian yeomanry cavalry, and became lieutenant-col. commandant in 1852. Married, 1st, Jan. 24, 1844, Helen, daughter of James Watson of Saughton, Mid Lothian; issue, Sholto George Watson. Lord

O

Aberdour, b. Nov. 5, 1844; 2dly, in 1853, Lady Alice Lambton, 3d daughter of the 1st earl of Durham. Appointed deputy lieutenant of Mid Lothian in 1848, and of Argyleshire in 1859. In April of the latter year he was elected a representative peer of Scotland.

MORVILLE, surname of. See SUPPLEMENT.

MOTHERWELL, WILLIAM, a highly-gifted poet, was born in Glasgow, October 13, 1797. His family originally belonged to Stirlingshire, where for several generations they resided on a small property of their own, called Muirmill. At an early age he was placed under the care of an uncle in Paisley, and after receiving a good education, was apprenticed to the sheriff-clerk of the county, with the view of following the legal profession. On the termination of his apprenticeship he was employed for some time by Dr. Robert Watt, in assisting in the compilation of that valuable and useful work, the 'Bibliotheca Britannica,' in which occupation he displayed a passionate love of antiquarian lore, that characterized all his after years. Having early begun to "try his 'prentice hand" on poetry, he about the same time contributed some pieces to a small periodical published at Greenock, called 'The Visitor.' At the age of twenty-one he was appointed deputy to the sheriff-clerk at Paisley, which office he held for about ten years. In the year 1819 he contributed an Essay on the Poets of Renfrewshire, to a collection of Songs and other poetical pieces published at Paisley, entitled 'The Harp of Renfrewshire,' in which a few of his own productions also appeared. He subsequently became editor of a work of a somewhat similar nature, but of higher pretensions and greater merit, being a valuable collection of ballads, published in parts, and completed in 1827, under the title of 'Minstrelsy, Ancient and Modern,' illustrated by a most interesting historical introduction and notes, which exhibited his extensive acquaintance with the ballad and romantic literature of Scotland.

In 1828 Mr. Motherwell became editor of the 'Paisley Advertiser,' a paper of conservative politics, which he conducted with spirit and success for nearly two years. At the same time he edited the 'Paisley Magazine,' a monthly periodical, which, though it displayed much talent and liveliness, only existed for a year. In the beginning of 1830, on the retirement of Mr. MacQueen, the able and at that period well-known advocate of the West India interests, from the 'Glasgow Courier,' Mr. Motherwell was engaged as editor of that journal, and he continued to conduct it till his death. He entered upon the editorship at a period of great public excitement, when the principles he supported, those of conservatism, were, for the time, exceedingly unpopular, but he advocated the cause which he conscientiously believed to be the true one with signal intrepidity, unflinching zeal, and consummate ability, and for upwards of five years sustained with distinction the character of the newspaper under his charge. Of Motherwell it may be truly said that "he gave up to party what was meant for mankind," for politics, in a great measure, thus withdrew him from the more congenial pursuits of literature. He did not, however, wholly forsake poetry, for, in 1832, a volume of his 'Poems, Narrative and Lyrical,' was published at Glasgow, and was most favourably received. A few months previously he had furnished his friend, Mr. Andrew Henderson, with an able and interesting preface for his collection of Scottish Proverbs, in which he showed a thorough acquaintance with the "saws" and sayings of his countrymen.

The same year he contributed a number of pieces in prose and verse to 'The Day,' a periodical then published at Glasgow. His 'Memoirs of Peter Birnie,' a Paisley baillie, formed one of the most amusing papers in that publication. In 1834-5 he superintended with Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, an elegant edition of the works of Burns, in five volumes, published by Messrs. A. Fullarton & Co. A large amount of the notes, critical and illustrative, was supplied by him.

Mr. Motherwell was of short stature, but stout and muscular. The engrossing and exciting nature of his duties, combined with other causes, gradually undermined his health, and he was latterly subject to occasional attacks of illness. On the evening of 31st October 1835, he was seized with an apoplectic fit, and though medical aid was speedily procured, in less than three hours, during which he scarcely spoke, he died, November 1, in his 39th year. He was never married. A monument to his memory was erected in Glasgow Necropolis, where he was buried.

He was very fond of the poetry of Norway, and in his 'Poems, Narrative and Lyrical,' he has introduced three remarkable pieces, thoroughly imbued with the character of the Norse legends. With regard to these, he says, in his dedication to a brother poet, William Kennedy, author of a volume of 'Lyrics,' they "are intended to be a faint shadowing forth of something like the form and spirit of Norse poetry; but all that is historical about them is contained in the proper names. The first, 'Sigurd's Battle Flag,' does not follow the story as given in the Northern Sagas, but only adopts the incident of the Magic Standard, which carries victory to the party by whom it is displayed, but certain death to its bearer. 'Jarl Egill Skallagrím's Wooing Song' is entirely a creation, and nothing of it is purely historical, save the preserving of the name of that warrior and Skald. From the memorials, however, he has left us of himself, I think he could not well have wooed in a different fashion. As for 'Thorstein Raudi,' or the Red, that is a name which occurs in Northern history; but, as may well be supposed, he never said so much in all his life about his sword or himself, as I have taken the fancy of putting into his mouth."

As a poet, Mr. Motherwell possessed considerable genius and originality. His principal characteristics are purity of spirit and depth of feeling. His ballad compositions are simple, but full of truth and pathos. His most exquisite productions are 'Jeanie Morrison,' and 'My head is like to rend, Willie,' which, especially the former, no one possessing any sensibility can read without being deeply affected. There is a touching tenderness about them both which appeals at once to the best sympathies of our nature, and they approach nearer to the sweetness and simplicity of some of the songs of Burns than any poems of the kind in the language. His 'Sword Chant of Thorstein-Raudi,' and similar pieces, are distinguished by a spirit of warlike enthusiasm which stirs the heart like the blast of a trumpet. Personally he was endeared to his friends by many admirable qualities. Kindness of heart, generosity of disposition, and urbanity of manner, were not the least striking features of his character. He left various manuscripts, finished and unfinished, among which was a prose work, embodying the wild legends of the Norsemen, a department of literature to which he was much devoted. A new edition of his poems, containing a selection from these manuscripts, was published in one volume at Glasgow in 1846, with a memoir by Dr. McConechy, his successor in the Courier, and a personal friend of his own.

MOUBRAY, the surname of an ancient family, the first of whom in Scotland, Philip de Moubray, descended from one of the Norman adventurers who came over with William the Conqueror, was the second son of Nigel de Moubray, and brother of William de Moubray, ancestor of the duke of Norfolk of that name. He came to Scotland with William the Lion, and by his marriage with Galicna, daughter of Waldev, earl of Dunbar, he acquired the lands of Barnbogle and Dalmeny in Linlithgowshire, and Inverkeithing in Fifeshire. In 1215, and again in 1220, he was ambassador to England, to treat of the marriage of Alexander II. with the princess Joan. Galfride or Gotofride de Moubray, the next on record, was one of the Magnates Scotie from 1287 to 1294. He was among those who swore fealty to Edward I., and those of his name in Scotland, like many of the barons of that period, frequently changed sides in the great contest for the national independence at the end of the 13th and beginning of the 14th century. He married the second daughter of the Red Cumyn, slain by Bruce, and had five sons. The fourth son is supposed to have been the Sir Philip de Moubray, who was governor of Stirling castle in the English interest, previous to the battle of Bannockburn. On the day after that decisive victory he surrendered the castle to Robert the Bruce, and entering his service, ever after continued faithful to him. He accompanied Edward Bruce to Ireland, and fell with him at the battle of Dundalk in 1318.

He had a son and a daughter. The son, Sir John Moubray of Redcastle in Forfarshire, his mother's property, was slain at Annan in 1332, on Edward Balliol's side. The daughter, Philippa de Moubray, heiress of her father, married Sir Bartholomew de Loen, a foreign knight, probably of the house of Heynberg in Guelderland, related to the dukes of Gueldres. Their only child, David, assumed the name of Moubray, and was contracted in marriage to the Lady Janet Stewart, daughter of the duke of Albany, governor of Scotland. His son, Sir John de Moubray, was dead before 1st February 1426.

This line of the Moubrays subsisted till the reign of James the Fifth, when Sir John Moubray of Barnbogle left a daughter, his sole heiress, who married Robert Barton, son of Sir Robert Barton of Over Barton. In consequence he changed his name to Moubray, and in his line the family continued till 1675, when it failed. Barnbogle castle, the ancient seat of the family, on the shore of the Frith of Forth near Cramond, had passed by sale from them, in 1620, and is now the property of the earl of Rosebery.

William Moubray or Mowbray, as the name is usually spelled, the brother of the above-named Sir John Moubray of Barnbogle, was the founder of the branch of the Moubrays of Cockairney in the parish of Dalgetty, Fifeshire, the lands of that name having been bestowed upon him by the latter in 1511.

Roger de Moubray, the brother of Philip first above mentioned, held lands in Perthshire under William the Lion, and his brother, Alexander II., some of whose charters he witnessed. He granted in subinfeudation the lands of Mon-creif and Balmachin to Matthew, who from them assumed the name of Moncreif.

The family of Cockairny have continued in an uninterrupted male line. Sir Robert Moubray, who succeeded in 1794, was knighted in 1825, and died in 1848.

MOWAT, a surname originally Montealt. A family, deriving their name from the lands of Montealt in the county of Flint, North Wales, settled in Scotland in the reign of David I., and in course of time the name was softened into Mowat. In the Ragman Roll is the name of Willielmus de Monte Alto, miles. There is a charter of William, earl of Douglas and Mar, to James Mowat of the lands of Easter Fowlis, dated at the castle of Kildrumny, 26th July 1377. The principal family of the name was Mowat of Balquollie, Aberdeenshire. There were also Mowat of Stanehouse in Clydesdale, and Mowat of Busbie in Cunningham, but all these families have long been extinct.

MUDIE, ROBERT, a voluminous writer, author of 'The Feathered Tribes of the British Islands,' and numerous other popular and scientific works, was a native of Forfarshire, and was born in 1777. The son of a country weaver, he received the rudiments of his education at a humble rural school in his native place, about six or seven miles north-west from Dundee. For whatever learning he afterwards possessed, he was solely indebted to his own industry and native vigour of mind, and he furnishes another remarkable example of those individuals who, by the force of their genius, application, and steadiness, have raised themselves from a lowly rank in life, without the aid of either school or college, to a conspicuous position among the higher class of literary and scientific men of their day. In his early youth, he was put to the loom, and plied the shuttle for several years, until he was drawn for the militia. From his boyhood he had evinced an insatiable desire for knowledge of every description, and all the hours which he could spare from his employment as a weaver, or his militiaman's duties, were devoted to the reading of books. He used to mention that before he left home, he was much indebted to a gentleman who lent him some volumes of the 'Encyclopedia Britannica,' in which he indulged at large his taste for variety, and that in the towns where his regiment was stationed he always contrived to find a good supply of books. By the time that his militia service of four years expired, he had attained to so much knowledge that he was emboldened to undertake the duties of a village school in the south of Fife. Besides other accomplishments, we are told, he had acquired considerable skill in the art of drawing, a respectable acquaintance with arithmetic and mathematics, and great facility in English composition. He also wrote verses with ease.

He was soon appointed to the situation of drawing-master in the academy of Inverness, and afterwards in that of Dundee, where he was not long till he was transferred to the department of arithmetic, theoretical and practical, and English composition. At Dundee he remained for about twelve years, and besides contributing much to the local newspaper, and conducting for some time a mouthly periodical, he published a novel, called 'Glenfurgas,' in 3 volumes. Becoming a member of the Dundee town council, he engaged eagerly in the cause of burgh reform, in conjunction with R. S. Rintoul, afterwards the editor of the London Spectator.

About 1820, Mr. Mudie left Dundee for London, and at first obtained employment as a parliamentary reporter for the newspapers. He was for some time connected with the Morning Chronicle, and subsequently editor of the Sunday Times. He also contributed largely to several of the periodicals of the day. His life thenceforward was that of a laborious literary hack, and as he wrote with great facility, he produced altogether upwards of ninety volumes, on almost every subject. Many of his works were hastily produced, to provide for the passing wants of the day, and he has been known to throw off a volume of his 'Seasons' in eight days. He was an able writer, an expert compiler, an acute and philosophical observer of nature, and particularly happy in his geographical dissertations and works on natural history. With all his acquirements, however, and with all his industry and perseverance, his was but the fate of too many literary men, constant drudging and perpetual poverty, and at last complete bodily exhaustion. He died 29th April 1842, aged 64, leaving the widow of a second marriage in poor circumstances.

In the Appendix to Dr. Hanuah's Life of Dr. Chalmers, a brief account of Mr. Mudie is given by Professor Duncan, of the university of St. Andrews, who was rector of the academy of Dundee, when the subject of this notice was one of the teachers in it. Mr. Mudie was a visitor at the manse of Kilmany in Fife, at the time Dr. Chalmers was minister of that parish, and Dr. Hannah relates, (Life of Chalmers, vol. i. p. 22,) that in the autumn of 1811, when that eminent divine was alone at the manse, Mr. Mudie and Mr. Duncan came in upon him from Dundee. On consulting his servant privately, as to what there was for dinner, he found, to his dismay, that there was nothing whatever in the house but two separate parcels of salt fish. Having given particular directions that a portion of each should be boiled apart from the other, he joined his friends, and went out with them to enjoy a walk. On returning to the house, the dinner was served, two large and most promising covered dishes being placed at the head and foot of the table. "And now, gentlemen," said the host, as the covers were removed, "you have variety to choose among; that is hard fish from St. Andrews, and this is hard fish from Dundee."

He furnished the letterpress to Gilbert's Modern Atlas; and the greater part of the natural history department of the British Cyclopaedia. He was also the literary conductor of the scientific publications called The Surveyor, the Engineer, and the Architect.

Munro, frequently spelled Monro, and sometimes with a final e at both forms of the surname, the name of a clan (in Gaelic Clann Roich or Rothich) whose possessions, situated on the north side of the frith of Cromarty, were generally known in the Highlands by the name of Fearann Donull or Donald's country, being so called from the progenitor of the clan, Donald the son of O'Ceann, who lived in the time of Macbeth. The Monroes were vassals of the earls of Ross, and may be regarded as a portion of the native Scottish Gael. According to Sir George Mackenzie, they came originally from the north of Ireland with the Macdonalds, on which great clan "they had constantly a depending." Their name he states to have been derived from "a mount on the river Roe," county Derry. Clan tradition, however, holds that they formed a branch of the natives of Scotland who, about 357, being driven out by the Romans, and forced to take refuge in Ireland, were located for several centuries on the stream of the Roe, and among the adjacent mountains. In the time of Malcolm II., or beginning of the 11th century, the ancestors of the Munroes are said to have come over to Scotland to aid in expelling the Danes, under the above-named Donald son of O'Ceann, who, for his services, received the lands of East Dingwall in Ross-shire. These lands, erected into a barony, were denominated Foulis, from Loch Foyle in Ireland, and the chief of the clan was designated of Foulis, his residence in the parish of Kiltearn, near the mountain called Ben Uaish or Benwyvis.

Another conjecture as to the origin of the name of Munro is that from having acted as bailiffs or stewards to the lords of the Isles in the earldom of Ross, they were called "Munrosses." Skene ranks the clan as members of a great family called the Siol O'Cain, and makes them out to be a branch of the clan Chattan, by converting O'Cain into O'Catban, and thus forming Chattan. Sir George Mackenzie says the name originally was Bunroe.

Hugh Munro, the first of the family authentically designated of Foulis, died in 1126. He seems to have been the grandson of Donald, the son of O'Ceann above mentioned. Robert, reckoned the second baron of Foulis, was actively engaged in the wars of David I. and Malcolm IV. Donald, heir of Robert, built the old tower of Fowlis. His successor, Robert, married a daughter of the earl of Sutherland. George, fifth baron of Foulis, obtained charters from Alexander II. Soon after the accession of Alexander III., an insurrection broke out against the earl of Ross, the feudal superior of the Munroes, by the clans Ivor, Talvigh and Laiwe, and other people of the province. The earl having apprehended their leader, and imprisoned him at Dingwall, the insurgents seized upon his second son at Balnagowan, and detained him as an hostage till their leader should be released. The Munroes and the Dingwalls immediately took up arms, and setting off in pursuit, overtook the insurgents at Beallich-ne-Broig, between Ferrandonald and Loch-Broom, where a sanguinary conflict took place. "The clan Ivor, clan Talvigh, and clan Laiwe," says Sir Robert Gordon, "wer almost uterhe extinguished and slain." The Munroes and Dingwalls lost a great many men. Dingwall of Kildun, and seven score of the surname of Dingwall were killed. No less than eleven Munroes of the house of Foulis who were to succeed one after another, fell in this battle, so that the succession of Foulis opened to an infant "then lying in his cradel." The earl's son was rescued, and to requite the service performed he made various grants of land to the Munroes and Dingwalls.

The child lying in his cradle was afterwards Sir Robert Munro, the sixth of his house. He fought in the army of Bruce at the battle of Bannockburn. His only son, George, fell there, leaving an heir, who succeeded his grandfather. This George Munro of Foulis was slain at Halidonhill in 1333. The same year, according to Sir Robert Gordon, although Shaw makes the date 1454, the following remarkable event occurred in the clan history: John Munro, the tutor of Foulis, in travelling homeward from Edinburgh to Ross, stopped in a meadow in Strathardle that he and his servants might obtain some rest. While they were asleep, the owner of the meadow cut off the tails of their horses. To revenge this insult, on his return to Ross, he summoned his whole kinsmen and followers, and having selected 350 of the best men amongst them, he returned to Strathardle, which he wasted and spoiled; killing some of the inhabitants and carrying off their cattle. In passing by the castle of Moy, on his way home, the laird of Macintosh sent a message to him demanding a share of the spoil. This was customary among the Highlanders when a party drove cattle so taken through a gentleman's land, and the part so exacted was called a Staoig Rathaid, or Staoig Creich, that is, a road collop. Munro offered Macintosh a reasonable share of the booty, but the latter would not accept of less than the half. This Munro refused, and drove off the cattle. Collecting his clansmen, Macintosh went in pursuit of him, and came up with him at Clach-na-haire, near Inverness. On perceiving his approach, Munro sent home fifty of his men with the cattle, and in the contest that ensued, Macintosh and the greater part of his men were killed. Several of the Munroes were also slain, and John Munro himself was left for dead on the field of battle, when Lord Lovat had him carried to his house in the neighbourhood, where he was cured of his wounds. One of his hands was so mutilated, that he lost the use of it, on which account he was afterwards called John Bac-Laimh, or Ciotach. The Munroes had great advantage of the ground, by taking up a position among rocks, from which they annoyed the Macintoshes with their arrows.

Robert, the eighth baron of Foulis, married a niece of Euphame, daughter of the earl of Ross, and queen of Robert II. He was killed in an obscure skirmish in 1369, and was succeeded by his son, Hugh, ninth baron of Foulis, who joined Donald, second lord of the Isles, when he claimed the earldom of Ross in right of his wife. The decisive battle of Harlaw, in 1411, put an end to his pretensions.

The forfeiture of the earldom of Ross in 1476, made the Munroes and other vassal families independent of any superior but the crown. In the charters which the family of Foulis obtained from the Scottish kings, at various times, they were declared to hold their lands on the singular tenure of furnishing a ball of snow at Midsummer if required, which the hollows in their mountain property could at all times supply; and it is said that when the duke of Cumberland proceeded north against the Pretender in 1746, the Munroes actually sent him some snow to cool his wines. In one charter, the addendum was a pair of white gloves or three pennies.

In 1497, when Sir Alexander Macdonald of Lochalsh a second time invaded Ross, he was encountered by the Munroes and the Mackenzies, at a place called Drunchatt, where, after a sharp skirmish, he and his followers were again routed, and driven out of the country. In 1502, a commission was given to the earl of Huntly, the Lord Lovat, and William Munro, twelfth baron of Foulis, to proceed to Lochaber, and let the king's lands of Lochaber and Mamore, for the space of five years, to true men. Sir William Munro of Foulis was nominated justiciary of Inverness by James IV. He fell in battle in 1505. In 1514 Munro of Foulis and Mackenzie of Kintail were appointed lieutenants pro tempore of Wester Ross. Robert, the 14th baron, fell at the battle of Pinkie in 1547. Robert More Munro, the fifteenth chief, was a faithful friend of Mary, queen of Scots. Buchanan states that when that unfortunate princess went to Inverness in 1562, "as soon as they heard of their sovereign's danger, a great number of the most eminent Scots poured in around her, especially the Frasers and Munroes, who were esteemed the most valiant of the clans inhabiting those countries." These two clans took for the queen Inverness castle, which had refused her admission.

With the Mackenzies the Munroes were often at feud, and Andrew Munro of Milntown defended, for three years, the castle of the canony of Ross, which he had received from the regent Moray in 1569, against the clan Kenzie, at the expense of many lives on both sides. It was, however, afterwards delivered up to the Mackenzies under the act of pacification.

The chief, Robert More Munro, became a protestant at an early period of the Scottish Reformation. Of the family of Foulis, there is a sketch appended to Dr. Doddridge's well-known 'Life of Colonel Gardiner,' and Robert More Munro is there described as "a wise and good man, who left an opulent estate to the family." James VI. granted to him a lease of certain crown customs or dues in the shires of Inverness, Ross, Sutherland, and Caithness. He died in 1588. His son, Robert, sixteenth baron of Foulis, died, without issue, in July 1589, and was succeeded by his brother, Hector Munro, seventeenth baron of Foulis. The latter died 14th November 1603.

Hector's eldest son, Robert Munro, eighteenth chief of Foulis, styled "the Black Baron," was the first of his house who engaged in the religious wars of Gustavus Adolphus, in the seventeenth century. In 1626 he went over with the Scottish corps of Sir Donald Mackay, first Lord Reay, accompanied by six other officers of his name and near kindred. Doddridge says of him, that "the worthy Scottish gentleman was so struck with a regard to the common cause, in which he himself had no concern but what piety and virtue gave him, that he joined Gustavus with a great number of his friends who bore his own name. Many of them gained great reputation in this war, and that of Robert their leader was so eminent that he was made colonel of two regiments at the same time, the one of horse, the other of foot in that service." In 1629 the laird of Foulis raised a reinforcement of 700 men on his own lands, and at a later period joined Gustavus with them. The officers of Mackays and Munro's Highland regiments who served under Gustavus Adolphus, in addition to rich buttons, wore a gold chain round their necks, to secure the owner, in case of being wounded or taken prisoner, good treatment, or payment for future ransom.

The "Black Baron" died at Ulm, from a wound in his foot, in the year 1633, and leaving no male issue, he was succeeded by his brother, Hector Munro, nineteenth baron of Foulis, who had also distinguished himself in the German wars, and who, on his return to Britain, was created by Charles I., a baronet of Nova Scotia, 7th June 1634. He married Mary, daughter of Hugh Mackay of Farr, and dying in 1635, in Germany, was succeeded by his only son, Sir Hector, second baronet, who died, unmarried, in 1651, at the age of 17. The title and property devolved on his cousin, Robert Munro of Opisdale, grandson of George, third son of the fifteenth baron of Foulis. His uncle, Colonel Robert Munro, who also served with reputation in the German wars, was author of a work, entitled, 'Munro, his Expedition with the worthy Scots regiment called Mackay's, in the wars of Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden,' &c., published at London in 1657, folio; a work which Sir Walter Scott acknowledges having suggested to him the character of the renowned soldado, Dugald Dalgetty. In the service of Gustavus, there were at one time not less than "three generals, eight colonels, five lieutenant-colonels, eleven majors, and above thirty captains, all of the name of Munro, besides a great number of subalterns."

During the civil wars at home, when Charles I. called to his aid some of the veteran officers who had served in Germany, this Colonel Robert Munro was one of them. He was employed chiefly in Ireland from 1641 to 1645, when he was surprised and taken prisoner personally by General Monk. While in Ireland he published 'Relation of the proceedings of the Scottish army in Ireland, in Three Letters, sent to General Leslie,' London, 1642, 4to; and 'Letter of great consequence to the Committee for Irish affairs in England, concerning the state of the rebellion there,' London, 1643, 4to. His nephew, Colonel Sir George Munro, succeeded him in the Irish command. He was subsequently lieutenant-general of the royalist troops in Scotland, when he fought a duel with the earl of Glencairn. (See vol. ii. p. 312). Afterwards he joined Charles II. in Holland. At the Revolution he was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland.

Sir Robert Munro, third baronet of Foulis, died in 1688, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir John, fourth baronet, who, in the Scottish convention of estates, proved himself to be a firm supporter of the Revolution. He was such a strenuous advocate of Presbyterianism, that, being a man of large frame, he was usually called "the presbyterian mortar-piece." In the Stuart persecutions, previous to his succession to the title, he had, for his adherence to the covenant, been both fined and imprisoned by the tyrannical government that then ruled in Scotland. He died in 1696. His son, Sir Robert, fifth baronet, though blind, was appointed by George I. high sheriff of Ross, by commission, under the great seal, dated 9th June 1725. He married Jean, daughter of John Forbes of Culloeden, and died in 1729.

His eldest son, Sir Robert, twenty-seventh baron and sixth baronet of Foulis, a gallant military officer, was the companion in arms of Colonel Gardiner, and fell at the battle of Falkirk, 17th January 1746. "He went early," says Dr. Doddridge, "from the university to the camp, and served seven years in Flanders, being some time captain in the Royal Scots. It was here that he contracted that acquaintance and strict friendship with good Colonel Gardiner, which ran through the remainder of their lives." In the rebellion of 1715, when the majority of the Highlanders espoused the cause of the exiled family, the Munros, like the Mackays and Rosses, joined the government forces. On his return from Flanders, Sir Robert, with his clan, assisted the earl of Sutherland in retarding, for nearly two months, the march of the earl of Seaforth, with 3,000 men, to the rebel camp at Perth, and thereby prevented the earl of Mar from crossing the Forth, till the duke of Argyle had gathered sufficient strength to oppose him. In 1716, Sir Robert was made a commissioner of inquiry into the forfeited estates, and we are informed by Dr. Doddridge, that by his interest with the government, he did eminent service to the unfortunate widows and children of such as had, to the ruin of their families, been engaged in the rebellion. He was for 30 years a member of parliament. From the termination of his commission of inquiry in 1724 till 1740, he had no post under government.

In May 1740, when the Independent companies were formed into the 43d Highland regiment, Sir Robert Munro was appointed lieutenant-colonel, John earl of Crawford and Lindsay being its colonel. Among the captains were his next brother, George Munro of Culcairn, and John Munro, promoted to be lieutenant-colonel in 1745. The surgeon of the regiment was his youngest brother, Dr. James Munro. Embarking for Flanders, the 43d was engaged in the battle of Fontenoy in 1745. The Highlanders on this occasion were commanded by Sir Robert, in whom, besides great military experience, were united all the best qualities of the soldier. Aware of the importance of allowing his men to follow their accustomed tactics, he obtained leave of the duke of Cumberland to allow them to fight in their own way. He accordingly, says Dr. Doddridge, "ordered the whole regiment 'to clap to the ground' on receiving the French fire; and instantly after its discharge they sprang up, and coming close to the enemy, poured in their shot upon them to the certain destruction of multitudes, and drove them precipitately through their lines; then retreating, drew up again, and attacked them a second time after the same manner. These attacks they repeated several times the same day, to the surprise of the whole army. Sir Robert was everywhere with his regiment, notwithstanding his great corpulency, and when in the trenches he was hauled out by the legs and arms by his own men; and it is observed that when he commanded the whole regiment 'to clap to the ground,' he himself alone, with the colours behind him, stood upright, receiving the whole fire of the enemy; and this because, as he said, though he could easily lie down, his great bulk would not suffer him to rise so quickly. His preservation that day was the surprise and astonishment not only of the whole army, but of all that heard the particulars of the action." Sir Robert was subsequently appointed to the command of General Ponsonby's regiment, that general having been slain at Fontenoy. It was ordered to Scotland during the rebellion, and made part of the left wing of the royal army at the battle of Falkirk, 17th January, 1746. His regiment partook of the panic which had seized the other regiments on the left, and fled, leaving its colonel alone and unprotected. In this situation, Sir Robert was attacked by six men of Lochiel's regiment, and, for some time, gallantly defended himself with his halbspike. He killed two of his assailants, and would probably have despatched more, had not a seventh come up and shot him in the groin with a pistol. On falling, the Highlander struck him two blows across the face with his broadsword, which killed him on the spot. Dr. Munro of Opisdale, his brother, who had attended him to the field, was standing close beside him when he fell, and shared his fate, at the hands of the same Highlander, who, after firing another pistol into his breast, cut him down with his claymore. The bodies of the two brothers having been recognised the next day, were honourably interred in one grave in the churchyard of Falkirk in presence of all the chiefs.

The fate of Sir Robert's other brother, Captain George Munro of Culcairn, was peculiar. He was shot on the shores of Loch Arkaig, on the Lord's day, 31st Aug., 1746, amongst the wild rocks of Lochaber, by one of the rebels named Dugald Roy Cameron, or, as he is still styled in tradition, Du Rbu. After the rebellion, an order was issued to the Highlanders to deliver up their arms. Dugald, accordingly, sent his son to Fort-William with his arms to be delivered up. When proceeding down Loch Arkaig, the young man was met by an officer of the name of Grant, who was conducting a party of military into Knoydart, and being immediately seized, was ordered to be shot on the spot. His father swore to be revenged, and learning that the officer rode a white horse, he watched his return behind a rock, on a height above Loch Arkaig. Captain Munro had unfortunately borrowed the white horse on which Grant rode, and he met the fate which was intended for Grant. Dugald Roy escaped at the time, and afterwards became a soldier in the British service.

Sir Robert left a son, Sir Harry Munro, 7th baronet and 25th baron of Foulis, an eminent scholar and M.P. The friend of Riddiman, he is mentioned as having criticised Buchanan's Latin edition of the Psalms elaborately. He died in 1781.

His son, Sir Hugh, 8th baronet, had only a daughter, Mary Seymour Munro, who died January 12, 1849.

On his decease, May 2, 1848, his kinsman, Sir Charles, became 9th baronet and 27th baron of Foulis; eldest son of George Munro, Esq. of Culrain, Ross-shire, (who died in 1845.) and lineal male descendant of Lieut.-gen. Sir George Munro, next brother to the 3d baronet of this family. Born May 20, 1795, and educated at Edinburgh, he early entered the army, and served under Wellington in the Peninsula and in France, and received a medal and six clasps. In 1817 he commanded the 1st regiment of English lancers in the service of Venezuela, and in 1818 was made general in the Columbian army by Bolivar. He married 1st, in 1817, Amelia, daughter of Frederick Browne, Esq., 14th dragoons; issue, 5 sons and 2 daughters; 2dly, in 1853, Harriette, daughter of Robert Midgley, Esq. of Essington, Yorksire. Charles, the eldest son, born in 1824, married in 1847, with issue.

The military strength of the Muuroes in 1715 was 400, and in 1745, 500 men; badge, the common club moss. The clan slogan or battle cry was "Caisteal Foulis na theine"—Castle Foulis in flames.

The family of Munro of Lindertis, Forfarshire, possesses a baronetcy of the United Kingdom, conferred in 1825 on Major-general Sir Thomas Munro, who distinguished himself by his services in India, and of whom a memoir is given below in larger type. On his death, July 6, 1827, his eldest son, Sir Thomas, born in 1819, formerly captain 10th hussars, became the 2d baronet. His presumptive, his brother, Campbell, captain grenadier guards, born in 1823; married.

There are also the family of Munro of Teaninich, county Ross, a branch of the house of Foulis; Munro of Novar, county Ross, and Munro of Poyntsfeld, county Cromarty, besides other respectable families of the name.

Donald Munro, or Monro, dean of the Isles, was the author of a 'Description of the Hybrides, or Western Isles, in 1549, with Geneologies of the Chief Clans of the Isles; a little work which is mentioned with praise by Buchanan. It was published in 1774, and reprinted in 1805 and 1818.

MUNRO, SIR THOMAS, a distinguished civil and military officer in India, was born at Glasgow, May 27, 1761; being the second son of Alexander Munro, a once affluent merchant in that city, and his wife, Margaret, daughter of Thomas

Stark. He was educated for the mercantile profession, but his father having become involved in his circumstances, in consequence of the revolt of the North American colonies of Great Britain, with which he principally traded, young Munro, in the end of 1779, proceeded to Madras as an infantry cadet, in the service of the East India Company. His conduct, during Lord Cornwallis' Mysore war against Hyder Ali, attracted the notice of government, and after he had been promoted to the rank of lieutenant, his talents and discretion obtained for him, in August 1788, the appointment of assistant in the Intelligence Department. In this capacity he served under the orders of Captain Alexander Read, in the occupation of the ceded district of Guntoor, until the breaking out of the war with Tippoo Saib in 1790, when he again took the field with the army, and remained with it till the hollow peace of 1792.

On the cession by Tippoo of the Baramahl, he was again employed under Captain Read, in the civil administration of that district till 1799. In the ensuing campaign Captain Munro served in the army of Lord Harris, as secretary to his friend, now Colonel Read, who commanded a detached force; and, after the fall of Seringapatam, he was appointed, with Captain, afterwards Sir John Malcolm, joint secretary to the commissioners for the settlement of Mysore. Soon after he was nominated by Lord Mornington (afterwards the Marquis Wellesley), then governor-general of India, to the charge of the civil administration of Canara, a wild and rugged province on the western or Malabar coast of the peninsula.

In May 1800 Munro was promoted to the rank of major, and having established order and tranquillity in Canara, he applied for and obtained the superintendence of the extensive and valuable province ceded by the Nizam in commutation of his subsidy; and in this new field, where he continued for seven years, he not only achieved the complete organization of a disturbed and barbarous territory, but so far gained the confidence and good will of the inhabitants as to be styled by them "The Father of the People."

In 1804 he obtained the rank of lieutenant-colonel; and in 1808, after twenty-eight years' uninterrupted service in India, he revisited his native country. On the renewal of the Company's charter, he was, for many days consecutively, examined before a committee of the House of Commons. In 1813 he attained the full rank of colonel, and in 1814 he married Jane, daughter of Richard Campbell, Esq. of Craigie, Ayrshire, by whom he had two sons, Thomas and Campbell. In the latter year he returned to Madras, at the head of a commission of inquiry into the judicial administration of our Eastern dominions, for which his vigorous and comprehensive understanding, his long and extensive experience, and his habits of laborious research rendered him peculiarly qualified.

In the war with the Pindarries and Mahrattas in 1817 and the following year, he greatly distinguished himself. Being in the neighbourhood of Soondoor, where he had been sent as commissioner to take charge of the districts ceded to the Company by the Peishwa, he was appointed by Lieutenant-general Sir Thomas Hislop to undertake the reduction of the rebellious feudatory of Soondoor, and shortly after he was vested with a separate command of the reserve, with the rank of brigadier-general, under orders from the marquis of Hastings. With a very inadequate force he immediately entered upon active measures, and fortress after fortress was surrendered at his approach. Mr. Canning, in moving, March 4, 1819, the thanks of the House of Commons to the marquis of Hastings and the army in India for their splendid services in the war of 1817 and 1818, thus describes the conduct of Munro on the occasion:—"To give some notion of the extent of country over which these actions were distributed, the distance between the most northern and most southern of the captured fortresses is not less than 700 miles. At the southern extremity of this long line of operations, and in a part of the campaign carried on in a district far from public gaze, and without opportunities of early and special notice, was employed a man whose name I should have been sorry to have passed over in silence. I allude to Colonel Thomas Munro, a gentleman of whose rare qualifications the late House of Commons had opportunities of judging when he was examined at their bar, on the renewal of the East India Company's charter, and than whom England never produced a more accomplished statesman, nor India, fertile as it is in heroes, a more skilful soldier. This gentleman, whose occupations for some time past have been rather of a civil and administrative than of a military nature, was called, early in the war, to exercise abilities which, though dormant, had not rusted from disuse. He went into the field with not more than 500 or 600 men, of whom a very small proportion were Europeans, and marched into the Mahratta territories, to take possession of the country which had been ceded to us by the treaty of Poona. The population which he subdued by arms, he managed with such address, equity, and wisdom, that he established an empire over their hearts and feelings. Nine forts were surrendered to him, or taken by assault on his way; and at the end of a silent and scarcely observed progress, he emerged from a territory heretofore hostile to the British interest, with an accession instead of a diminution of force, leaving everything secure and tranquil behind him."

At the conclusion of the war, Colonel Munro resigned his military command, and, accompanied by his family, again visited England, where he arrived in 1819. In November of that year he was invested with the insignia of a knight companion of the Bath. In 1820, with the rank of major-general, he returned to Madras as governor of that presidency; and, as a farther reward of his distinguished services, he was created a baronet of the United Kingdom, June 30, 1825. The Burmese war prevented him from retiring from India so early as he wished; and, sacrificing his personal wishes and convenience to the public service, he retained his office till its conclusion. At length, in 1827, he made every arrangement for returning to enjoy his well-earned honours in his native land, and before his departure proceeded to pay a farewell visit to the people of the Ceded Districts, for whom he had continued to feel a strong interest, but was attacked on July 5 with cholera, then prevalent in the country, and expired on the 6th at Putteecondah, near Gooty, where he lies interred. "There was something exceedingly solemn and touching in the funeral," says a gentleman who was present on the occasion. "The situation of the churchyard; the melancholy sound of the minute guns reverberating among the hills; the grand and frowning appearance of the fortress towering above the Gour, all tended to make the awful ceremony more impressive." An equestrian statue, by Chantrey, has been erected to his memory at Madras. In 1830 was published 'The Life of Sir Thomas Munro, with Extracts from his Correspondence and Private Papers. By the Rev. G. R. Gleig,' 3 vols.

In the Extraordinary Gazette issued at Madras, after his death, the following tribute was paid to his merits. After stating that he had been more than 47 years in the service of the East India Company, it continues, "From the earliest period of his service, he was remarkable among other men. His sound and vigorous understanding, his transcendent talents, his indefatigable application, his varied stores of knowledge, his attainments as an Oriental scholar, his intimate acquaintance with the habits and feelings of the native soldiers, and inhabitants generally, his patience, temper, facility of access, and kindness of manner, would have insured him distinction in any line of employment. These qualities were admirably adapted to the duties which he had to perform in those provinces where he had long been known by the appellation of Father of the people."

MURE, a surname, the same as More, Muir, and Moore. The chief of the name in Scotland was Mure of Rowallan, in Ayrshire, whose family, terminating in an heiress, is now represented by the noble family of Loudoun, the head of which is marquis of Hastings in the peerage of Great Britain. In 1825 was published at Glasgow a work entitled 'The Historie and Descent of the House of Rowallane. By Sir William Mure, knight, of Rowallan, written in, or prior to 1657,' in which it is stated that it was a tradition of their house that they came originally from "the ancient tribe of O'More in Ireland." In a note, the editor, William Muir, says, "The surname 'More' certainly occurs very early in all the three British kingdoms, and is most probably of Celtic origin," and adds, "in most early writings in which the name is found, accordant with the idiomatic usage of Celtic patronymics, the preposition de is omitted, which so invariably accompanies all early Saxon designations." This, however, is a mistake, as David de More, of the house of Polkelly, Renfrewshire, appears as a witness to a charter of Alexander II. Willielmi de Mora and Laurentii de Mora also occur in two charters granted by Robert the Bruce.

The first on record of the family is stated to have been the above-named David de More. His successor is supposed to have been Sir Gilchrist More, the first of the name mentioned in the family 'Historie.' In the beginning of the reign of Alexander III., Sir Walter Cumyn took forcible possession of the house and living of Rowallan, "the owner thereof, Gilchrist More, being reducted for his safety to keep close in his castle of Polkellie." The latter distinguished himself at the battle of Largs in 1263, and for his bravery was knighted. "At which time," says the 'Historie,' "Sir Gilchrist was reponed to his whole inheritance, and gifted with the lands belonging to Sir Walter Cuming before mentioned, a man not of the meaneast of that powerful tribe, which for might and number have scarcele to this day been equalled in this land." He married Isobel, daughter and heiress of the said Sir Walter Cumyn, and on the death of his father-in-law he found himself secured not only in the title and full possession of his old inheritance, but also in the border lands wherein he succeeded to Sir Walter Cuming, within the sheriffdom of Roxburgh. Sir Gilchrist "disponed to his kinsman Ranald More, who had come purposlie from Ireland for his assistanee" in the time of his troubles, and also at the battle of Largs, the lands of Polkellie, which appear to have been the original inheritance of the family. He died "about the year 1280, near the 80 year of his age," and was buried "with his forfathers in his own buriell place in the Mures Isle at Kilmarnock." He had a son, Archibald, and two daughters, Elizabeth, the wife of Sir Godfrey Ross, and Anicia, married to Richard Boyle of Kelburne, ancestor of the earls of Glasgow.

Archibald was slain at Berwick when that town was taken by the English, and the army of John Baliol totally routed, in 1297. By his wife, a daughter of Sir John Montgomerie of Eastwood, he had, with two daughters, William, his successor. He is said to have had other sons, the supposed ancestors of the Mures of Caldwell and Auchindrane.

In the Ragman Roll, among those barons who swore fealty to Edward I. in 1296, we find the names of Gilchrist More of Craig and Reginald More de Craig, that is, the Craig of Rowallan. The former is stated to have been the ancestor of the Mures of Polkellie, who, Nisbet thinks, were "the stem of the Mures, and an ancient family than the Rowallan." The latter was in 1329 chamberlain of Scotland.

William More, the son and successor of Archibald, married a daughter of the house of Craigie, then Lindsay, and with two daughters, had a son, Adam, who succeeded him. Of William honourable mention is made in an indenture of truce with England in the nonage of King David, wherein he is designated Sir William. He died about the time when King David was taken prisoner at the battle of Durham, fought 17th October 1346. There is supposed to have been an older son than Adam, named Reynold. The editor of the 'Historie,' on the authority of Crawford's Officers of State, (vol. i. p. 290,) says in a note: Reynold, son and heir of Sir William More, was one of the hostages left in England at David's redemption. This is certainly the same Sir William mentioned above, but whether of Rowallan seems still doubtful; if so, he must have lived long after 1348. There is a William More, Miles, mentioned in M<sup>r</sup>Farlane's MS., as living in 1363. Supposing this Sir William More to have been of Rowallan, Reynold probably never returned from England, and thus the estate may have fallen to Sir Adam, a younger son. During the long protracted payment of the king's ransom, many of the hostages died in confinement.

Sir Adam More, who, "in his father's auld age," had the management of all his affairs, both private and public, considerably enlarged and improved the estate. He married, in his younger years, Janet Mure, heiress of Polkellie, granddaughter of Ranald More, and thus restored that estate to the family. By this marriage he had two sons, Sir Adam, his successor, and Andrew, and a daughter, Elizabeth, married in 1348, to Robert, the high steward, afterwards King Robert II. She was a lady of great beauty and rare virtues, and attracted the high steward's regard in his younger years when living in concealment about Dundonald castle during Edward Baliol's usurpation. There was long considerable doubt as to this marriage, and Buchanan and earlier historians were of opinion that none had ever taken place. The fact of her marriage, however, is now set beyond all question, and the author of the 'Historie' says, "Mr. John Learnonth, chaplain to Alexander, archbishop of St. Andrews, hath left upon record, in a deduction of the descent of the House of Rowallan, collected by him at command of the said archbishop, that Robert, great steward of Scotland, having taken away the said Elizabeth, drew to Sir Adam her father ane instrument that he should take her to his lawful wife, which myself have seen, saith the collector, as also ane testimonie, written in Latin by Roger M'Adam, priest of our Ladie Marie's chapel, ('Our Lady's kirk of Kyle,' in the parish of Monkton,) that the said Roger married Robert and Elizabeth foresaids." The editor of the 'Historie' remarks in a note: "Mr. Lewis Innes, principal of the Scots college at Paris, first completely proved the fallacy of Buchanan's account of King Robert's marriages, by publishing in 1694, a charter granted by him in 1364, which charter showed that Elizabeth More was the first wife of Robert, and made reference to a dispensation granted by the pope for the marriage. That dispensation was long sought for in vain, but was at length discovered in 1789, at which time a dispensation for the marriage with Euphemia Ross was also found. These discoveries have decided the question. The dispensation for the marriage with Elizabeth More is dated in December, in the sixth year of the pontificate of Clement VI. He was elected pope in 1342; this dispensation must therefore have been granted in December 1347. The dispensation for the marriage with Euphemia Ross is dated in the third year of the pontificate of Innocent VI. He was elected pope in 1352; this dispensation must therefore have been given in 1355."

Sir Adam, the eldest son, had on his own resignation, a new charter from Robert III., of the barony of Rowallan and whole lands holden of the crown, as also of the barony of Polkellie, &c., with very ample privileges, the designation given him by the king being 'consanguineus.' He married Joan, daughter of Danielston of that ilk, and by her had three sons. "Carried away," says the 'Historie,' "as appears with empty surmises and hopes founded on court favors, he made unawares a new rent in his estate and provided his second son, Alexander, to the baronnie of Pokellie, together with the lands of Linflure and Lowdonehill, wherein his lady was infeft in life-rent, and wer given out by him, now the second time, to the great damage and prejudice of his house and posteritie. However, at that time the court seemed to smile upon him, his proper estate considerable, his friendship strong, and of the greatest of these times. He gave a quartered coat of the arms of Mure and Cumyn. The hoarseness and asperitie of the Irish pronunciation of his title and lands is forgot, and Rigallane is now Rowallane, Pothkellath is now Pokellie, &c., and More is now Mure by the court dialect." (Page 59.) He died in 1399. His two younger sons, Alexander and Rankine, were steady adherents of the Douglasses. From the earl of Douglas, who married Margaret, daughter of Robert III., he had the lands of Hareschaw and Drumbowy, Lanarkshire, by a precept of infefment dated in 1417. The family of Polkellie, sprung from him, continued for nearly 150 years, when Margaret, daughter and heiress of William Mure, the last of that house, marrying Robert Cunningham of Cunninghamhead, her whole inheritance came into possession of that family. Rankine, the youngest son, was "commonlie called of Abercorn," says the 'Historie,' "not that he had these lands in heretage, for that doth never appear by historie nor evident that ever come to my hands, notwithstanding of the common tradition thairament, being established thair as bailiffe and a chief officer under his lord, the earle of Duglass, having charge of his men thair in all his noble atchievements." He "rose to no mean respect, place, and power, and is said to have attained to large possessions in Stirlingshire within Abercorn, the Curses Calder and other places adjacent where he also settled divers of his surname and friends." He was an active and stirring adversary of Sir Alexander Livingstone of Calender, guardian of the young king, James II., one of the principal enemies of the earl of Douglas. Rankine's grandson long held out the castle of Abercorn for the Douglasses, and was slain when it was stormed, and the power of that great family overthrown.

Archibald, eldest son of Sir Adam, succeeded. He married Euphame Kennedy, daughter of the knight of Dunure, ancestor of the marquis of Ailsa, and had a son, named Robert. He is said by the author of the 'Historie' to have "died in battell against England, 1426." The date is evidently wrong, for, as the editor remarks in a note, "Nothing in history of this nature corresponds to the date 1426. The action alluded to should possibly be referred to the battle of Sark, 1448; and if so, we must place Archibald, who fell, after a Robert, probably his brother, and both sons of an Archibald." In a charter of "George Fullertoun, lord of Corsbie," in 1430, Robert More of Rowallan is designated sheriff depute, it is understood of Ayrshire. He is supposed to have been succeeded by a son or brother named Archibald, father of another Robert "who frequented the court in the minority of King James the Third. He was ane man black hared and of ane hudge large stature, therefore, commonlie called 'the Rud of Rowallane.'" The epithet 'Rud' is explained in a note to mean of great stature and strength, "a man with 'a baek as braid as a barn door,' and who, in addition to his bodily ability, has also the inclination for a fray." The 'Historie' does not give a good account of this fierce personage, 'the Rud of Rowallan,' nor of his wife either. "The king, in his bearne head proponed to round with him, and as he offered swa to doe dang out his eye with the spang of ane cockle shell. He was a man regarded not the well of his house, but in following court, and being unfit for it, waisted, sold, and wadset all his proper lands of Rowallane, whilk may be ane example to all his posteritie. He married Margerie Newtoun, daughter to the laird of Michaelhill in the Merse; ane drunken woman, and ane waistor man, what made then this house to stand but the grace of God?" The 'Rud of Rowallan' died in 1504. He had four sons and a daughter.

John, his eldest son, married "Elizabeth Stewart, daughter to the first Lord Evandale," says the 'Historie,' "whose mother was daughter to the earle of Crawford, called Earle Beardie." The first Lord Evandale, who was the son of Lord James Stewart, son of Murdoch, duke of Albany, of the royal house of Stewart, died without issue in 1488. His nephew, Andrew Stewart, who afterwards succeeded to the estate of Evandale, was created a peer by the same title. He left several sons and daughters, and Elizabeth Stewart, who married John Mure of Rowallan, must have been one of the latter, although not mentioned so in the published histories. If, as is understood, she was the daughter of the second, not the first, Lord Evandale, she was the sister of Andrew Stewart, third Lord Evandale, and also of Henry Stewart, created Lord Methven, the third husband of Margaret, queen-mother of Scotland, daughter of Henry VII. of England, and grandmother of Mary, queen of Scots. He had four sons and three daughters. The sons were, John, his successor; Archibald, called 'Mickle Archibald'; Patrick Boyd, and James. From Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, we learn that "Nov. 3. 1508.—Patrick Boyde, brother to the laird of Rowallan," and 27 others, were "convicted of art and part of convocation of the lieges against the act of parliament, coming to the kirk of Stewarton, in company with John Mure of Rowallan, for the office of parish clerk of the same kirk, against Robert Cunynghame of Cunynghamehead and his servants, in the year 1508;" and that "James Muir, brother to the laird of Rowalloun was, in 1508, convicted of art and part of the forethought felony and oppression done to John Mowat, junior, laird of Busbie, and Andrew Stevinstone, in the town of Stewarton, in company with the laird of Rowalloun." John is said to have "deceast before Robert his fither in 1501;" if so, he must have possessed the estate on his father's resignation. The editor adds in a note, that he was dead in 1495. A long feud had existed betwixt the lairds of Crawfordland and Rowallan, the latter being superior of the lands of Ardoch as Crawfordland was first called, during which the evidents of both houses were destroyed. In a justice-eyre, held at Ayr about 1476 by John, Lord Carlyle, chief justice of Scotland on the south side of the Forth, Robert Muir of Rowallan and John Muir his son, and others their accomplices, were indicted for breaking the king's peace against Archibald Craufurd of Craufurdland.

John Mure of Rowallan, the eldest son, and grandson of Robert "the Rud," married Margaret, third daughter of Archibald Boyd of Bonshaw, brother of Thomas, master of Boyd, created earl of Arran about 1467. This lady was the means of putting an end to the feud of the Rowallan family with the Craufurds. In her youth she had been mistress to James IV., by whom, with a son, Alexander, bishop of St. Andrews, she had a daughter, Catherine Stewart, married to the third earl of Morton. She afterwards "procured to herself the ward of the laird of Rowallan, John Muir, and married him." They had sasine of the lands of Warnockland, the gift of James IV., in January 1498. This John Mure of Rowallan was slain at Flodden in September 1513. He had four sons and four daughters.

Mungo, his eldest son, succeeded him. His half-sister, Catherine, countess of Morton, had three daughters, the eldest of whom, Lady Margaret Douglas, married the regent earl of Arran, duke of Chatelherault, ancestor of the dukes of Hamilton; the second, Lady Beatrix, married Lord Maxwell; and the youngest, Lady Elizabeth, became the wife of the regent Morton. These noblemen, therefore, stood in near relationship to Mungo Mure of Rowallan, which they were all very ready, the regent Morton in particular, to acknowledge. Mungo Mure of Rowallan was with Robert Boyd of the Kilmarnock family when he arrived, with a party of horse, to the assistance of the regent Arran in the skirmish at Glasgow, in 1543, with the earl of Glencairn. In the Appendix to the 'Historie' there is an account of "the behaviour of the house of Kilmarnock towards the house of Rowallane, and of their house towards them," in which he is thus referred to: "It is understandit that Mungow Muir of Rowallane, quhois mother wes Boyd, jounit with Robert Boyd guidmane of Kilmarnock, in seeking revengement of the slaughter of James Boyd, the king's sisteris sone, quho sould have bene Lord Boyd, bot befor he was fullie restorit was slaine be the earl of Eglintounne. Nixt, my lord of Glencairne proponing ane richt to the barrourie of Kilmarnock proclamit ane court to be holdin at the Knockanlaw, quhair the said Robert Boyd guidmane of Kilmarnock and Mongow Muir of Rowallane, with the assistance of thair friends, keptit the said day and plaece of court, offritt battel to the said earl of Glencairn, and stayit him from his pretendit court holding. Thridlie, the foirsaid Robert Boyd guidmane of Kilmarnock, and the said Mungow Muir of Rowallane, entirit in the field of Glasgow, the said Mungow being lairglic better accompanied then the foirsaid Robert, they behavit themselfe so valiantlie in that fact that the Duik Hamiltone quho reckonit both his lyfe and honour to be preservit be thair handis, maid the said Robert Boyd, guidman of Kilmarnock, Lord Boyd, lyk also as he revardit the said Mungow Muir with dyvers fair giftis. The said Robert Boyd hiehlie esteemit of the said Mungow Muir of Rowallane and gave him the first place of honour al his dayis, acknowleging the alteration of his estait to the wortbines of the said Mungowis handis." This Mungo is particularly mentioned as having greatly improved the old castle of Rowallan. He was slain in battle at Pinkiefield "at the black Satterday, in the yeare of our lord 1547." He married Isabel, daughter of Sir Hugh Campbell of Loudoun, sheriff of Ayr, and had five sons and six daughters.

His eldest son, John Mure of Rowallan, took great delight in planting, and built a portion of Rowallan castle. He "lived gratuslie," says the 'Historie,' and "died in 1581, in the 66th year of his age." The year is supposed to be a mistake for 1591, as it is given in the family Genealogical tree, drawn up in 1597. A 'letter of Sleance,' subscribed at Irvine and Kilwinning, 16th and 17th March 1571, is inserted in the Appendix to the 'Historie' so often quoted, from Alexander Cowper, mason in Kilwinning, "wyth consent and assent" of certain persons named, his "elheife and capitall branchis, bayth on the father syde and mother syde," granting his remission, free forgiveness and pardon to John Mure of Rowallan, William Mure, his son and heir, John Mure and Mungo Mure, his sons, and two others, and "thair complices, kin, freindis, allys, assistaris and parttakeris, the crevall wounding, hurting and bluding of me, the said Alexander, to the great effusione of my blude, done and committit be the saidis persones thair seruandis and complices," in the month of February, 1570. In March 1571 Robert Lord Boyd and John Mure of Rowallan were charged by the regent Mar to appear before the secret council, with a view to adjust the feud which prevailed between the families of Kilmarnock and Rowallan. The account above quoted of the mutual friendly offices between these families appears to have been drawn up in reference to this charge. It recites many good deeds done by the Mures to the Beyds, in particular, amongst others, that after Robert, master of Boyd, had slain Sir Neil Montgomerie of Lainshaw, he was received and concealed by John Muir of Rowallan, who, with his friends and servants, was the means of saving his life, when pursued by the Montgomeries; and also that after the battle of Langside he kindly received the said Robert, being then Lord Boyd, although he had fallen into disfavour with the regent Moray, and much more to the same purport. John Muir of Rowallan subscribed the bond in support of the Reformation in 1562, and the same year he was a member of the Scottish estates. In 1568, when Queen Mary escaped from Lochleven castle, she wrote the laird of Rowallan a letter dated 6th May that year, requiring him to meet her at Hamilton, as soon as he could muster his retainers, all well armed for her service. It does not appear, however, that he complied with the summons. In 1584 John Mure of Rowallan, "and his spouse and six persons with them in company," received a license from James VI., to eat flesh in Lent, and upon Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays "for ane zeir next hereafter," and in February 1588 he had the present of a gray courser from his kinsman, the earl of Morton, on the latter going abroad. In the letter which accompanied the gift he says: "I think ze sall find him als meit an haikney for zour self or zour wife to ryd upoun as ony uthur, for I chosit him to have been presentit to the king quhen the Scots horse suld have been send to the duke of Gwies." He married a daughter of Cunninghame of Cunninghamehead, and had three sons and three daughters. His third son, Mungo Mure, received a remission, of date 1st March 1607, for being concerned in the slaughter of Hew, fourth earl of Eglington. He died in London in November 1632. Before his departure, we are told, he greatly lamented "the crying sinne of innocent blood."

William, the eldest son, succeeded his father. He was "of a meik and gentle spirit, and delyted much in the study of phisick, which he practised espeeciellie among the poore people with very good success. He was ane religious man, and died gratuitously in the year of his age 69, the year of our lorde 1616." With three daughters he had three sons, Sir William, who succeeded him; John Mure of Blacklaw, who was slain at a combat at Beith, and Hugh of Skirnalland.

Sir William, the eldest son, the next laird of Rowallan, is described as "ane strong man of bodie, and delyted much in hunting and halking." He died in 1639, aged 63. He was thrice married, and had issue by each of his wives.

His eldest son, by his first wife, Elizabeth Montgomery, daughter of the laird of Hazlehead, was William Mure of Rowallan, the eminent poet, a memoir of whom is given below, in larger type. He was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir William Mure of Rowallan, in the end of 1657. This Sir William Mure was firmly attached to the Reformed doctrines, and was the intimate friend of the celebrated Mr. Guthrie, first minister of Fenwick. It is said that conventicles were held in the house of Rowallan during his time. Whether on this account or not, it is certain that he suffered much during the troubles of the Church of Scotland. He was imprisoned in 1665, in the castle of Stirling, with the lairds of Cunninghamehead and Nether-Polloek. When other gentlemen were liberated upon the bond of peace in 1668, these three were retained in confinement, but in the year following, on the removal of Bishop Burnet from Glasgow, they presented a petition for release to the duke of Lauderdale, the commissioner, which was granted. In 1683 Sir William Mure again fell under the suspieion of the court, and was apprehended, with his eldest son, in London. They were sent to Edinburgh and committed prisoners to the Tolbooth. In the same year his second son, John, was taken prisoner, and carried to Edinburgh. In a short time the health of the young laird of Rowallan required indulgence, and he was allowed to be removed from the prison to a private house. In April 1684, they were both discharged, upon giving a bond of £2,000, to appear when called upon. Sir William died in or about 1686. He married about 1640, Elizabeth, daughter of James Hamilton of Aikenhead, provost of Glasgow, and had two sons and a daughter.

The elder son, William Mure of Rowallan, the last lineal representative of the family, was entered a student at the university of Glasgow in 1660. His share in the afflictions of his father has been already noticed. This did not shake his attachment to the church for which he suffered. His name frequently occurs in the records of the parish of Kilmarnock. He is mentioned there, for the last time, in 1695, in a commission to defend a process of translation before the synod. He was a member of the Scots parliament, and died in 1700. He married about 1670, Dame Mary Scott, apparently heiress of Collarny in Fife, by whom he had three daughters, Anna, Margaret, and Jean. The latter, his only surviving daughter and sole heiress, married, first, William Fairlie of Brunsfield, near Edinburgh, afterwards designed of Fairlie, to whom she had issue. Tradition still points out the spot where Fairlie was married to the heiress of Rowallan. The ceremony was performed by a eurate, in the fields, about a quarter of a mile from the house of Rowallan, at a tree, still called the marriage tree, which stands on the top of a steep bank, above that part of the stream called "Janet's kirk." The heiress of Rowallan married, secondly, David, first earl of Glasgow, and had to him three daughters, Lady Betty, who died in infancy; Lady Jean, who, by special destination, succeeded to Rowallan, and Lady Anne, who died unmarried. Jean Mure, countess of Glasgow, died September 3, 1724, and was succeeded by her elder surviving daughter of the second marriage, Lady Jean Boyle Mure of Rowallan, who married the Hon. Sir James Campbell of Lawers, K.B., third and youngest son of the second earl of Loudoun (see vol. ii. p. 695). Their son, James Mure Campbell, succeeded to the estate of Rowallan, and was the fifth earl of Loudoun (see LOUDOUN, fifth earl).

The Mures of Caldwell in Renfrewshire are directly descended from Sir Reginald Mure of Abercorn and Cowdams, who appears to have been chamberlain of Scotland as early as 1329, the first year of the reign of David II. He is supposed to have been the same Reginald whose name appears with that of Gilchrist More in the Ragnan Roll, as having sworn fealty to Edward I. in 1296. His paternal inheritance seems to have been Cowdams in Ayrshire, which belonged to him previously to 1326, as an agreement concerning these lands between him and the monks of Paisley is dated in that year. Mr. Mure of Caldwell is still their feudal superior. Gilchrist More, here mentioned, was Sir Reginald's son. He received the half of the estate of Caldwell on his marriage with the daughter of Caldwell of that ilk. Johannes Mure, jun. de Cowdams, appears in 1446, as one of the commissioners for fixing the boundaries of the burgh of Prestwick, near Ayr.

Sir Reginald, who was granduncle of the queen, Elizabeth Mure, first wife of Robert I., acquired his extensive estates of Abercorn, &c., in the Lothians and Stirlingshire, by marriage with one of the coheiresses of Sir John Graham of Eskdale and Abercorn. He adhered steadily to the cause of David II. in the Balliol wars with England, and was one of the commissioners appointed in 1340 to treat with the lords Percy, Moubray, and Neville of a truce between the two kingdoms. With one daughter, he had two sons, William, who succeeded to Abercorn, and died without male issue, and Gilchrist More, already mentioned, who carried on the line of the family.

Sir Adam Mure, the fourth in succession from Gilchrist, was knighted by James IV., and is supposed to have been slain at the battle of Flodden. His son, John Mure of Caldwell, on 20th February 1515, took by assault, at the head of his followers, "the castle and palace" of the archbishop of Glasgow, situated near the city, battering the walls in breach "with artillery," and carrying off a rich booty. He married Lady Janet Stewart, daughter of Matthew earl of Lennox, and grand-aunt of Lord Darnley, husband of Mary, queen of Scots, and died in 1539. His eldest son, John Mure of Caldwell, had, with other children, two sons, John, his heir, and William of Glanderstoun, ancestor of the Mures of Glanderstoun. The granddaughter of the latter was the mother of the Rev. William Carstairs, a divine of great political influence in the reign of William III. (See vol. i. p. 600.)

Sir John, the elder son, was knighted by James V. He was slain, 10th September 1570, by the Cunninghames of Cunninghamehead and Raeburne of that ilk, the same who were afterwards principals in the murder of his cousin, Hugh, earl of Eglintoun, in 1585.

His son, Sir Robert Mure of Caldwell, was one of the jury appointed in 1580 to try the Lord Ruthven, high-treasurer of Scotland, for the murder of David Rizzio. He was on terms of great intimacy and confidence with James VI., by whom he was knighted, and to whom he was related through the Lennoxes. Six letters addressed to him by that monarch, preserved at Caldwell, have been inserted in the 'Selections from the Caldwell Papers,' printed for the Maitland Club in 3 vols. 4to, in 1854. About 1610 the lands of Thornton near Kilmarnock, long in possession of the family, were alienated to a cadet, founder of the house of Mure of Thornton, the male line of which becoming extinct in 1701, in the person of Sir Archibald Mure, lord provost of Edinburgh, the estate passed by his heir female to John Cuninghame of Caddell, and is now held by his descendant, in feu of the Caldwell family.

William Mure of Caldwell, the fourth in succession to Sir Robert, was a staunch Covenanter. He and a few other west-country gentlemen of similar sentiments, met in arms at Chitterfleet, in the parish of Beith, on 28th November 1666, and having collected a body of horsemen, amounting to about fifty in all, and consisting chiefly of the tenantry of Caldwell and the neighbouring estates, they set out, under Caldwell's command, to join Colonel Wallace of Achans, who was marching from Galloway in the direction of the Pentlands, by Lesmahago and Lanark. On the way, finding themselves intercepted by the king's troops, under General Dalzell, they retraced their steps, and dispersed. Caldwell was attainted, fled to Holland, and died in exile. His estates were bestowed on General Dalzell; and Caldwell's lady, a daughter of Sir William Cunninghame of Cunninghamehead, was imprisoned, with two of his daughters, in Blackness castle, where she underwent much cruel persecution.

Barbara Mure, the second daughter, lived to obtain, by special act of parliament, 19th July 1690, a full restoration of the family estates. She married John Fairlie of that ilk, but dying without issue, was succeeded, in 1710, by her kinsman, William Mure, fourth laird of Glanderstoun, descended from William, second son of the John Mure who inherited Caldwell in 1539. This William Mure bore his share in the persecution of the times, having been imprisoned and fined, on a charge of nonconformity, in 1683. A Journal of a tour by him through England and the Netherlands in 1696, is printed among the 'Caldwell Papers.' Dying without issue, he was succeeded by his nephew, William Mure, eldest son of Mure of Rhoddens in Ireland. His son, William Mure of Caldwell, M.P. for Renfrewshire from 1742 to 1761, was appointed one of the barons of the exchequer in Scotland in the latter year. In 1753 he bought Wester or Little Caldwell from the duke of Hamilton. The portion of the estate the Mures had previously possessed was called Easter Caldwell. Baron Mure was an intimate associate of David Hume the historian, and the author of one or two tracts on speculative points of political economy, printed for private circulation. His correspondence and miscellaneous papers occupy the greater part of two of the three volumes of the 'Caldwell Papers.' He was rector of the university of Glasgow in 1764-5, and died in 1776.

His eldest son, Colonel William Mure of Caldwell, was the friend of Sir John Moore, but early left the army. He was rector of the university of Glasgow in 1793-4. He married Anne, eldest daughter of Sir J. Hunter Blair, bart. of Dunskeg, with issue, and died February 9, 1831.

Col. Mure's eldest son, William Mure of Caldwell, D.C.L., born July 9, 1799, was educated at Westminster, and studied at Edinburgh and in Germany, where he imbibed that taste for critical inquiry which made his name extensively known among the scholars of modern Europe. He married in 1825, Laura, 2d daughter of William Markham, Esq. of Becca Hall, Yorkshure with issue; vice-lieutenant of Renfrewshire and colonel of its militia; was M.P. for that county from 1846 to 1855; lord-rector of Glasgow university in 1847-48; author of 'Brief Remarks on the Chronology of the Egyptian Dynasties; snowing the Fallacy of the System laid down by Messrs. Champollion, in Two Letters on the Museum of Turin,' London, 1829, 8vo; 'A Dissertation on the Calendar of the Zodiac of Ancient Egypt, Edinburgh, 1832, 8vo; 'A Tour in Greece,' 1842; 'A Critical History of the Language and Literature of Ancient Greece,' 5 vols., 8vo, 1850-57; and the compiler of the 'Caldwell Papers.' He died at London, April 1, 1860, in his 61st year.

His eldest son, William Mure of Caldwell, lieutenant-colonel Scots fusilier guards, m. 3d daughter of 1st Lord Leconfield.

David Mure, born in 1810, 3d son of Col. William Mure, who died in 1831, passed advocate at the Scottish bar in the latter year. In 1853 he was appointed sheriff of Perthshire, and in 1858 solicitor-general for Scotland; lord-advocate in April 1859, and elected M.P. for Buteshire soon after.

The Mures of Auchindrane were long a flourishing family in the south of Ayrshire. In 1611, John Mure of Auchindrane was accused of the murder of a retainer of Kennedy of Colzean, committed where there were no witnesses, but which was discovered in a remarkable manner. The corpse of the murdered man had been buried in Girvan churchyard, but the laird of Colzean dreaming of him in his sleep, caused his body to be taken up, and insisted on all who lived near to come and touch the corpse. All did so but Auchindrane and his son, whom nobody suspected, till his young daughter, Mary Mure, seeing the crowd, went in among them, and when she came near the dead body, the blood sprang from it, on which Auchindrane was apprehended and put to the torture. 'The Auchindrane Tragedy,' founded on this murder, is one of the dramatic compositions of Sir Walter Scott.

MURE, SIR WILLIAM, of Rowallan, a poet of the 17th century, was born in 1594. He was the eldest son of Sir William Mure of Rowallan, by his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Montgomery of Hazlehead, and sister of Alexander Montgomery, author of 'The Cherrie and the Slae.' He obtained an excellent classical education, and in his early years began to cultivate a taste for poetry. The 'Historie' of his family above quoted says of him: "This Sir William was pious and learned, and had an excellent vein in poesie; he deltyed much in building and planting." Before his twentieth year he attempted a poetical version of the story of Dido and Eneas, from Virgil. In the 'Muse's Welcome,' a collection of poems and addresses made to King James on his visiting Scotland in 1617, there is an address by Mure of Rowallan. In 1628, he published a translation, in English supplies, of Boyd of Trochrig's beautiful Latin poem, 'Hecatombè Christiana,' together with a small original piece called 'Doomesday.' His principal work is his 'True Crucifixe for true Catholikes,' published at Edinburgh in 1629.

For some years afterwards he seems to have been employed on a version of the Psalms, which was much wanted in Scotland at that time. The old English version was not popular; and the one executed by King James and Sir William Alexander of Menstrie, subsequently earl of Stirling, was so disliked that the bishops would not press it upon the church. King James' version was not sanctioned by the Assembly, and some expressions in it gave offence to the people, such as the sun being called "The lord of light," and the moon, "The pale lady of the night." Though this version was rejected, still many wished that the old one should be improved, or a better one substituted in its place. Several gentlemen attempted particular psalms; but a version of the whole was undertaken by Sir W. Mure of Rowallan, which he seems to have finished in 1639. Principal Baillie, who attended the Westminster Assembly, as a commissioner from the Church of Scotland, in a letter, dated at London, January 1st, 1644, says, "I wish I had Rowallan's Psalter here, for I like it better than any I have yet seen." It does not, however, appear that Sir William's version was transmitted to the Assembly. That of Mr. Rous, which was recommended by the English parliament, was finally adopted, and has ever since been used in Scotland; but the committee appointed in 1650 to revise Mr. Rous's version, were instructed to avail themselves of the help of Sir William Mure's. (Historic and Descendent of the House of Rowallan, pp. 92—94.)

During the civil war, Sir William Mure took arms on the popular side. In the first army raised against the king, he commanded a company in the Ayrshire regiment, and was a member of the convention of 1643, by which the Solemn League and Covenant was ratified with England. He was a member of the 'Committee of warre' for the sheriffdom of Ayr in 1644, and in the beginning of that year he accompanied the Scots army which marched to the aid of the parliamentary cause, and was wounded at the battle of Longmarston

Moor, July 2. He was also present at the storming of Newcastle, in the following month. He died in the end of 1657. Specimens of his poems, many of which are still in manuscript, will be found in Lyle's 'Ancient Ballads and Songs,' published at London in 1827. Sir William Mure was twice married, first, in 1615, when only twenty-one, to Anna, daughter of Dundas of Newliston, by whom he had five sons and six daughters; and, secondly, to Dame Jane Hamilton, Lady Duntreath, by whom he had two sons and two daughters. His second son, Captain Alexander Mure, was slain in the war against the rebels in Ireland; another of them, Patrick, the youngest son of the first marriage, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1622. The title is now extinct.

MURRAY, a very common surname in Scotland, the origin of which has already been explained; see ATHOL, duke of, (vol. i. p. 164,) and MORAY, a surname, (page 204 of this volume). An account of the Murrays of Tullibardine, the ancestors of the Athol family, is given under the former head, and those of Bothwell and Abercainey under the latter.

The first baronet of the family of Murray of Blackbarony was Sir Archibald Murray, who was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, May 15, 1628. He was the son of Sir John Murray, eldest son of Andrew Murray of Blackbarony, whose ancestors had been seated at Blackbarony for five generations prior to 1552. Sir John was the brother of Sir Gideon Murray, lord-high-treasurer of Scotland and a lord of session, father of the first Lord Elibank, (see vol. ii. p. 128.) and of Sir William Murray, ancestor of the Clermont family. Lieutenant-colonel Sir Archibald John Murray, baronet of Blackbarony, formerly of the Scots fusilier guards, son of Sir John Murray, baronet of Blackbarony, by his wife, Anne Digby, of the noble family of Digby, died, without issue, May 22, 1860. He was succeeded by his brother, Sir John Digby Murray, baronet, born in 1798, married, 1st, in 1823, Miss Susannah Cuthbert, issue one son, John Cuthbert; 2dly, in 1827, Frances, daughter and coheirress of Peter Patten Bold, Esq., M.P., of Bold Hall, Lancashire; issue, 3 sons and 4 daughters.

The family of Murray of Clermont, Fifeshire, which possesses a baronetcy (date 1626), is a branch of the ancient house of Murray of Blackbarony, whose baronetcy is dated two years later. Sir William Murray, 4th and youngest son of Sir Andrew Murray of Blackbarony, who lived in the reign of Mary, queen of Scots, was knighted by James VI., and having acquired the estate of Clermont in Fifeshire, it became the designation of his family. His only son, William Murray of Clermont, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, July 1, 1626. Sir James Murray, 5th baronet, receiver-general of the customs in Scotland, died in February 1699, without issue, when the title devolved on his nephew, Sir Robert Murray, 6th baronet, who died in 1771. His eldest son, Sir James Murray, 7th baronet, a distinguished military officer during the first American war, was adjutant-general of the forces serving on the continent in 1793. He married in 1794 the countess of Bath in her own right, and in consequence assumed the surname and arms of Pulteney. He subsequently held the office of secretary at war; was colonel of the 18th foot, and a general in the army. He died April 26, 1811, leaving no issue, when his half-brother, Sir John Murray, became 8th baronet. Sir John was a lieutenant-general in the army, and colonel of the 56th foot. He died, without issue, in 1827, when the title and estates devolved upon his brother, the Rev. Sir William Murray, who died May 14, 1842. The eldest son of the latter, Sir James Pulteney Murray, 10th baronet, died unmarried, Feb. 2, 1843. His brother, Sir Robert Murray, born Feb. 1, 1815, became 11th baronet; married, in 1839, Susan-Catherine Sanders, widow of Adolphus Cottin Murray, Esq., and 2d daughter and co-heir of John Murray, Esq. of Ardeleybury, Herts, lineally descended from Sir William Murray, father of 1st earl of Tullibardine; with issue, a son, William Robert, 23d fusiliers, born in 1840, and a daughter.

The first baronet of the Stanhope family was Sir William Murray of Stanhope, an active supporter of the royal cause during the civil wars, who for his loyalty was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, after the Restoration, with remainder to his heirs male whatsoever, 13th February 1664. His ancestor, John Murray of Falahill, descended from Archibald de Moravia, mentioned in the chartulary of Newbottle in 1280, was known in history as the outlaw Murray. He died in the early part of the reign of James V. His exploits are commemorated in one of the ballads of the 'Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border.' He married Lady Margaret Hepburn, and had, with three daughters, two sons. His eldest son, John Murray of Falahill, was ancestor of the Murrays of Philiphaugh. His second son, William Murray, married Janet, daughter and heiress of William Romanno of that ilk, Peebles-shire, and had a son, William Murray of Romanno, living in December 1531. The great-grandson of the latter, Sir David Murray, who was knighted by Charles I., acquired the lands of Stanhope in the same county, and was the father of Sir William Murray, the first baronet of Stanhope. Sir David Murray, the fourth baronet, was implicated in the rebellion of 1745, and received sentence of death at York the following year, but was subsequently pardoned on condition of his leaving the country for life. The family estates were sold under the authority of the court of session. Sir David died in exile, without issue, when the representation of the family devolved on his uncle, Charles Murray, collector of the customs at Borrowstownness, who, had the title not been forfeited, would have been fifth baronet. His son, Sir David Murray, died without issue at Leghorn, 19th October 1770. The representation of the family then devolved on John Murray of Broughton, the well-known secretary to Prince Charles. This personage having assumed the title after the general act of revival, became Sir John Murray of Broughton, baronet. He married Margaret, daughter of Colonel Robert Ferguson, brother of William Ferguson of Carloch, Nithsdale, and had three sons, David, his heir, Robert, and Thomas, the last a lieutenant-general in the army. Sir John died 6th December 1777. His eldest son, Sir David, a naval officer, was succeeded, on his death in June 1791, by his brother, Sir Robert, ninth baronet. The son of the latter, Sir David, became the tenth baronet in 1794, and on his death, without issue, was succeeded by his brother, Sir John Murray, eleventh baronet; married, with issue.

The first baronet of the Ochtertyre family was William Moray of Ochtertyre, who was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, with remainder to his heirs male, 7th June 1673.

He was descended from Patrick Moray, the first styled of Ochtertyre, who died in 1476, a son of Sir David Moray of Tullibardine. The family continued to spell their name Moray till 1739, when the present orthography was adopted by Sir William, 3d baronet. Sir William Murray, 5th baronet, married Lady Augusta Mackenzie, youngest daughter of 3d earl of Cromartie; issue, 3 sons and 2 daughters. He died in 1800. Of General Sir George Murray, G.C.B., his second son, a memoir is given at page 232 in larger type.

The eldest son, Sir Patrick Murray, 6th baronet, born Feb. 3, 1771, passed advocate at the Scottish bar in 1793, and was appointed a baron of the court of exchequer in Scotland in 1820. He died June 1, 1837. By his wife, Lady Mary Hope, youngest daughter of the 2d earl of Hopetoun, he had 5 sons and 4 daughters. Capt. John Murray, the 2d son, assumed the name of Gartshore, on succeeding to the estate of that name in Dumbartonshire. (See vol. ii. page 284.)

Sir William Keith Murray, the eldest son, 7th baronet of Ochtertyre, born in 1801, married 1st, Helen Margaret Oliphant, only child and heiress of Sir Alexander Keith of Dunnottar, knight marischal of Scotland; issue, 10 sons and 3 daughters; 2dly, Lady Adelaide, youngest daughter of 1st marquis of Hastings. He assumed the name of Keith, on his marriage with his first wife, and on her death in Oct. 1852, his eldest son, Patrick, born Jan. 27, 1835, captain grenadier guards, (retired in June 1861.) succeeded to the estates of Dunnottar, Kincardineshire, and Ravelston, Mid Lothian. Sir William died Oct. 16, 1861, when his eldest son, Sir Patrick, became 8th baronet.

The Murrays of Touchadam are supposed to derive from the Morays, lords of Bothwell. Their progenitor, Sir William de Moravia, designed of Sanford, joined Robert the Bruce, but being taken prisoner by the English, was sent to London in 1306, and remained in captivity there until exchanged after the battle of Bannockburn. His son and successor, Sir Andrew de Moravia, called by David II. "our dear blood relation," obtained from that monarch a charter of the lands of Kepmad in Stirlingshire, dated 10th May 1365. This was his first acquisition in that county. On 28th July 1369 he received another royal charter of the lands of Touchadam, as Touchadam was then called, and Tulchmaler, in the same county. His great-grandson and representative, William Murray of Touchadam, was scutifer to James II., and was appointed constable of Stirling castle under James III. His eldest son, David Murray of Touchadam, having no issue, made a resignation of his whole estate to his nephew, John Murray of Gawamore, captain of the king's guards and lord provost of Edinburgh, who succeeded to the same on the death of his uncle, about 1474. He was a firm and devoted adherent of James III., and after the battle of Sauchieburn he was deprived of a considerable portion of his lands. A great number of the family writs were at the same time embezzled or lost. His son, William Murray, the seventh from the founder of the family, Sir Andrew de Moravia, about 1568, married Agnes, one of the daughters and coheirresses of James Cuninghame of Polmaise, Stirlingshire, whereby he acquired that estate. His son and successor, Sir John Murray, knight, got a charter under the great seal of the lands and barony of Polmaise, 8th April 1588. His grandson, Sir William Murray of Touchadam and Polmaise, obtained from Charles I. a charter of the lands of Cowie in 1636. During the civil wars, he supported the royal cause, and was at the battle of Preston in 1648, when the army of the royalists under the duke of Hamilton was defeated. In 1654 he was fined by Cromwell £1,500.

William Murray of Touchadam and Polmaise succeeded his father, William Murray of Touchadam, Polmaise, and Pitlochrie in Fife, in 1814. He died in 1847, when his cousin, John Murray, born in 1797, the 19th from Sir Andrew de Moravia, succeeded. He married in 1830, Elizabeth, daughter of James Bryce, Esq. Edinburgh, with issue. His eldest son, John, captain grenadier guards, was born in 1831.

The first on record of the family of Murray of Philiphaugh in Selkirkshire, Arehibold de Moravia, mentioned in the chartulary of Newbottle in 1280, was also descended, it is supposed, from the Morays, lords of Bothwell. In 1296 he swore fealty to Edward I. His son, Roger de Moravia, obtained in 1321, from James, Lord Douglas, the superior, a charter of the lands of Fala, subsequently designated Falahill, for many years the chief title of the family. The 5th in direct descent from Roger was John Murray of Falahill, the celebrated outlaw, who took possession of Ettrick Forest with 500 men,

“—————a’ in ae liverye clad,
O’ the Lincome grene sae gaye to see;
“He and his ladye in purple clad,
O! gin they lived not royallie!”

The king, James IV., sent James Boyd to him,

“The earle of Arran his brother was he,”

to ask him of whom he held his lands, and desiring him to come and be the king’s “man,”

“And hald of him yon foreste free.”

On Boyd delivering this message to him,

“Thir landis are mine! the outlaw said;
I ken nae king in Christentie;
Frae Soudron I this foreste wan,
When the king nor his knights were not to see.”

And he declared his intention to keep it

“Contrair all kingis in Christentie.”

The king, in consequence, set forth at the head of a large force, to punish the outlaw, and force him to submission. The outlaw summoned to his aid his kinsmen Murray of Cockpool and Murray of Traquair, who hastened to Ettrick with all their men. The barony of Traquair before it came into the possession of the Stuarts (earls of Traquair) was the property of the family of Murray, ancestors of the Murrays of Blackbarony. The lands of Traquair were forfeited by Wilhelmus de Moravia previous to 1464. They were afterwards, by a charter from the crown dated 3d February 1478, conveyed to James Stewart, earl of Buchan, son of the black knight of Lorne, from whom they descended to the earls of Traquair. On the approach of the royal force, the outlaw, “with four in his cumpanie,” came and knelt before the king and said, “I’ll give thee the keys of my castell,

Wi’ the blessing o’ my gay ladye,
Gin thou’lt make me sheriffe of this Foreste,
And a’ my offspring after me.”

To this the king consented, glad to receive his submission on any terms, and the usual ceremony of feudal investiture was gone through, by the outlaw resigning his possessions into the hands of the king, and receiving them back, to be held of him as superior.

“He was made sheriffe of Ettricke Foreste,
Surely while upward grows the tree;
And if he was na traitour to the king, Forfaulted he suld never be.”

It is certain that, by a charter from James IV., dated November 30, 1509, John Murray of Philiphaugh is vested with the dignity of heritable sheriff of Ettrick Forest, which included the greater part of what is now Selkirkshire, an office held by his descendants till the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions in 1747. “The tradition of Ettrick Forest,” says Sir Walter Scott, in his introduction to ‘The Sang of the Outlaw Murray,’ in the ‘Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border,’ “bears that the outlaw was a man of prodigious strength, possessing a baton or elub, with which he laid lee (i. e. waste) the country for many miles round, and that he was at length slain by Buccleuch, or some of his clan, at a little mount, covered with fir trees, adjoining to Newark eastle, and said to have been part of the garden. A varying tradition bears the place of his death to have been near to the house of the duke of Buccleuch’s gamekeeper, beneath the castle, and that the fatal arrow was shot by Scott of Haining from the ruins of a cottage on the opposite side of the Yarrow. There was extant, within these twenty years, some verses of a song on his death. The feud betwixt the outlaw and the Scotts may serve to explain the asperity with which the chieftain of that clan is handled in the ballad.” The laird of Buccleuch had counselled “fire and sword” against the outlaw; for, says he,

“He lives by reif and felonie!”

But the king gave him this rebuke:

“And round him east a willie ee,—
Now, haud thy tongue, Sir Walter Seott,
Nor speak of reif nor felonie:—
For, had every honest man his awin kye,
A right pair clan thy name wad be!”

The outlaw’s wife, Lady Margaret Hepburn, was the daughter of the first earl of Bothwell. He had two sons, James, his heir, and William, ancestor of the Murrays of Romanna, afterwards Stanhope, baronets, (see previous page).

James Murray of Falahill, the elder son, died about 1529, and his son, Patrick Murray of Falahill, obtained, under the great seal, a charter, dated 28th January 1528, of the lands of Philiphaugh, situated near the royal burgh of Selkirk, and celebrated as the scene of the signal defeat of the marquis of Montrose, 15th September 1645, by General Leslie. The hollow under the mount adjoining the ruins of Newark castle, mentioned above as the place where the outlaw Murray is said to have been slain, is called by the country people Slainman’s-lee, in which, according to tradition, the Covenanters, a day or two after the battle of Philiphaugh, put many of their prisoners to death. A number of human bones were, at one period, found there, in making a drain.

Patrik’s great-great-grandson, Sir John Murray of Philiphaugh, knight, was appointed by the Scottish Estates one of the judges for trying those of the counties of Roxburgh and Selkirk, who had joined the standard of Montrose in 1646. In 1649 he claimed £12,014, for the damages he had sustained from Montrose. He died in 1676.

His eldest son, Sir James Murray of Philiphaugh, born in 1655, was admitted a lord of session in 1689, and appointed lord-register in 1705. On his death in 1708, he was succeeded by his eldest son, John Murray of Philiphaugh, M.P. from 1725 till his decease in 1753. This gentleman's fourth son, Charles, married a sister of Robert Scott, Esq. of Danesfield, Bucks, and was grandfather of Charles Robert Scott Murray, Esq. of Danesfield, M.P. for that county.

The eldest son, John Murray of Philiphaugh, was several times M.P. for the county of Selkirk, and once for the Selkirk burghs, after a severe and expensive contest with Mr. Dundas. He died in 1800. His eldest son, John Murray of Philiphaugh, died, unmarried, in 1830, and was succeeded by his only surviving brother, James Murray of Philiphaugh, the 17th of the family, in a direct line; married, with issue.

The Murrays of Lintrose, Perthshire, are a junior branch of the Murrays of Ochertyre, being derived from Mungo Murray, born 15th July 1662, youngest son of Sir William Murray of Ochertyre, baronet, by Isabel, his wife, the daughter of John Oliphant, Esq. of Bachelton. Captain William Murray, a son of this family, served with the 42d Highlanders, under Wolfe, in America, and afterwards in the West Indies. Subsequently, with the rank of major in the same distinguished regiment, he served under General Howe against the American revolutionists. On the 15th September 1776, when the reserve of the British army were in possession of the heights above New York, Major Murray was nearly carried off by the enemy, but saved himself by his strength and presence of mind. Attacked by an American officer and two soldiers, he kept his assailants at bay for some time with his fusil; but closing upon him, his dirk slipped behind him, and being a corpulent man, he was unable to reach it. Snatching the sword of the American officer from him, he soon compelled the party to retreat. He wore the sword as a trophy during the campaign. He became lieutenant-colonel 27th regiment, and died the following year.

The Murrays of Cringletie, Peebles-shire, are descended from a junior branch of the family of Murray of Blackbarouy. James Wolfe Murray, Esq. of Cringletie, born in 1814, eldest son of James Wolfe Murray, Lord Cringletie, a senator of the College of Justice, by Isabella Katherine, daughter of James Charles Edward Stuart Strange, Esq. (godson of Prince Charles Edward,) succeeded his father in 1836; appointed to 42d Royal Highlanders in 1833; married in 1852, Elizabeth Charlotte, youngest daughter of John Whyte Melville, Esq., and grand-daughter of 5th duke of Leeds, with issue. His son, James Wolfe Murray, born in 1853.

Other old families of the name are the Murrays of Broughton, Wigtownshire; Murray of Murraythwaite, Dumfriesshire; and Murray of Murrayshall, Perthshire. The family of Murraythwaite have been settled there since about 1421.

The Murrays of Murrayshall derive in the male line from the ancient family of Graeme of Balgowan, and in the female, from that of Murray, Lord Balvaud, (see vol. i. p. 231,) whose eldest son succeeded as Viscount Stormont, (see STORMONT, Viscount of). John Murray, advocate, son of Andrew Murray of Murrayshall, at one period sheriff of Aberdeenshire; born in 1809, succeeded in 1847; m. in 1853, Robina, dr. of Thomas Hamilton, Esq.; educated at Edinburgh university, M.A. 1828. Passed advocate in 1831.

The Murrays of Henderland, Peebles-shire, have given two judges to the court of session, namely, Alexander Murray, Lord Henderland, who died in 1795, and his second son, Sir John Archibald Murray, appointed in 1839, when he assumed the judicial title of Lord Murray. He had previously been lord-advocate, and recorder of the great roll, or clerk of the pipe, in the court of exchequer, Scotland, a sinecure office which had also been held by his father, and was resigned by Lord Murray, some time before his first appointment as lord-advocate in 1834. He was M.P. for the Leith district of burghs from 1832 to 1838. He died in 1859.

MURRAY, SIR ROBERT, one of the founders and the first president of the Royal Society of London, was the son of Sir Robert Murray of Craigie, by a daughter of George Halket of Pitferrian. He is supposed to have been born about the beginning of the seventeenth century, and received his education partly at St. Andrews and partly in France. Early in life he entered the French army, and became so great a favourite with Cardinal Richelieu that he soon obtained the rank of colonel. He returned to Scotland about the time that Charles I. took refuge with the Scots army; and, while his majesty was with the latter at Newcastle in December 1646, he formed a plan for the king's escape, which was only frustrated by Charles' want of resolution. "The design," says Burnet, "proceeded so far that the king put himself in disguise, and went down the back stairs with Sir Robert Murray; but his majesty, apprehending it was scarce possible to pass through all the guards without being discovered, and judging it highly indecent to be caught in such a condition, changed his resolution, and returned back." In May 1651, being then in Scotland with Charles II., he was appointed justice-clerk, an office which appears to have remained vacant since the deprivation of Sir John Hamilton in 1649. A few days after he was sworn a privy councillor, and in the succeeding June was nominated a lord of session, but he never exercised the functions of a judge. At the Restoration he was reappointed a lord of session, and also justice-clerk, and made one of the lords auditors of the exchequer; but these appointments were merely nominal, to secure his support to the government; for, though he was properly the first who had the style of lord-justice-clerk, he was ignorant of the law, and it does not appear that he ever sat on the bench at all. He was high in favour with the king, Charles II., by whom he was employed in his chemical processes, and was, indeed, the conductor of his laboratory. He was succeeded in the office of justice-clerk in 1663 by Sir John Home of Renton; and in 1667 he had a considerable share in the direction of public affairs in Scotland, when, not being so obstinately bent on the establishment of Episcopacy as some of his colleagues, an unusual degree of moderation marked for a time the proceedings of the government. Sir Robert's principal claim to distinction, however, consists in his having been one of the founders of the Royal Society of London, and its first president. "While he lived," says Bishop Burnet, "he was the life and soul of that body." He was a member of almost all its committees and councils, and besides assisting in obtaining its charter, in July 1622, and in framing its statutes and regulations, was indefatigably zealous in promoting its interests in every respect. Several of his papers, chiefly on the phenomena of the tides, on the mineral of Liege, and on other scientific subjects, are inserted among the early contents of the Philosophical Transactions. Sir Robert Murray, who had married a sister of Lord Balaures, died suddenly, in his pavilion, in the Garden of Whitehall, July 4, 1673, and was interred at the king's expense in Westminster Abbey.

MURRAY, THOMAS, an eminent portrait painter, was born in Scotland in 1666; and at an early age went to London, where he became a pupil of Riley, state-painter to Charles II., and successor to Sir Peter Lely. He studied nature carefully, and in his colouring and style imitated his master, Riley. He painted portraits with great success and credit; and being employed by the royal family, as also by many of the nobility, he acquired, in the course of time, a considerable fortune. The portrait of Murray, by himself, is honoured with a place in the gallery of painters at Florence. He died in 1724.

MURRAY, PATRICK, fifth Lord Elibank, a learned and accomplished nobleman, see ELIBANK, Lord, vol. ii. p. 130.

MURRAY, WILLIAM, first earl of Mansfield, a celebrated lawyer and statesman, the fourth son of David, fifth Viscount Stormont, was born at Perth, March 2, 1705. He was removed to London in 1708, and in 1719 was admitted a king's scholar at Westminster school. In June 1723 he was entered at Christ church, Oxford, where he distinguished himself by his classical attainments. In 1730 he took the degree of M.A., and afterwards travelled for some time on the Continent. Having become a student at Lincoln's Inn, he was called to the bar at Michaelmas term 1731. His abilities were first displayed in appeal cases before the House of Lords, and he gradually rose to eminence in his profession. In 1736 he was employed as one of the counsel for the lord provost and town council of Edinburgh, to oppose in parliament the Bill of Pains and Penalties, which afterwards, in a modified form, passed into a law against them, on account of the Porteous riots. For his exertions on this occasion, he was presented with the freedom of the city of Edinburgh in a gold box. In November 1742 he was appointed solicitor-general in the room of Sir John Strange, who had resigned. About the same time he obtained a seat in the House of Commons, as member for Boroughbridge, in Yorkshire. His eloquence and legal knowledge soon rendered him very powerful in debate, and as he was a strenuous defender of the duke of Newcastle's ministry, he was frequently opposed to Pitt, afterwards earl of Chatham; these two being considered the best speakers of their respective parties. In March 1746 he was appointed one of the managers for the impeachment of Lord Lovat, and the candour and ability which he displayed on the occasion received the acknowledgments of the prisoner himself, as well as of the Lord-chancellor Talbot, who presided on the trial.

In 1754 Mr. Murray succeeded Sir Dudley Ryder as attorney-general, and on the death of that eminent lawyer, in November 1756, he became lord-chief-justice of the king's bench. Immediately after he was created a peer of the realm, by the title of Baron Mansfield, in the county of Nottingham. He was also, at the same time, sworn a member of the privy council, and, contrary to general custom, became a member of the cabinet. During the unsettled state of the ministry in 1757, his lordship held, for a few months, the office of chancellor of the exchequer, and during that period he effected a coalition of parties, which led to the formation of the administration of his rival Pitt. The same year, on the retirement of Lord Hardwicke, he declined the offer of the great seal.

which he did twice afterwards. During the Rockingham administration in 1765, Lord Mansfield acted for a short time with the opposition, especially as regards the bill for repealing the stamp act. As a judge his conduct was visited with the severe animadversions of Junius, and made the subject of much unmerited attack in both houses of parliament. He was uniformly a friend to religious toleration, and on various occasions set himself against vexatious prosecutions founded upon oppressive laws. On the other hand, he incurred much popular odium by maintaining that, in cases of libel, the jury were only judges of the fact of publication, and had nothing to do with the law, as to libel or not. This was particularly shown in the case of the trial of the publishers of Junius' letter to the king.

With regard to his thrice refusal of the great seal, Lord Campbell, in his Lives of the Chief Justices of the King's Bench, (vol. iii. p. 469.) says, "In 1770, the king and the duke of Grafton, repeatedly urged Lord Mansfield to become lord chancellor, but whatever his inclination may have been when Lord Bute was minister, in the present ricketty state of affairs he peremptorily refused the office, and suggested that the great seal should be given to Charles Yorke, who had been afraid that he would snatch it from him. By Lord Mansfield's advice it was that the king sent for Charles Yorke, and entered into that unfortunate negotiation with him which terminated so fatally—occasioning the comparison between this unhappy man, destroyed by gaining his wish, and Semele perishing by the lightning she had longed for. For some months the chief justice presided on the woolsack as Speaker of the House of Lords, and exercised almost all the functions belonging to the office of the Lord Chancellor."

In October 1776, having been previously created a knight of the Thistle, Lord Mansfield was advanced to the dignity of an earl of the United Kingdom by the title of earl of Mansfield, with remainder to the Stormont family, as he had no issue of his own. During the famous London riots of June 1780, his house in Bloomsbury Square was attacked and set fire to by the mob, in consequence of his having voted in favour of the bill for the relief of the Roman Catholics, and all his furniture, pictures, books, manuscripts, and other valuables, were entirely consumed. His lordship himself, it is said, made his escape in disguise, before the flames burst out. He declined the offer of compensation from government for the destruction of his property. The infirmities of age compelled him, June 3, 1788, to resign the office of chief-justice, which he had filled with distinguished reputation for thirty-two years. The latter part of his life was spent in retirement, principally at his seat at Caen Wood, near Hampstead. He died March 20, 1793, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. The earldom, which was granted again by a new patent in July 1792, descended to his nephew, Viscount Stormont. (See STORMONT, Viscount of.) A life of Lord Mansfield, by Holliday, was published in 1797, and another, by Thomas Roscoe, appeared in 'The Lives of British Lawyers,' in Lardner's Cyclopædia.

MURRAY, LORD GEORGE, lieutenant-general of the rebel Highland army in 1745-6, was the fourth son of the first duke of Athol, and brother of the second duke. Born in 1705, he took a share in the insurrection of 1715, though then but ten years old, and he was one of the few persons who joined the Spanish forces which were defeated at Glenshiel in 1719. He afterwards served several years as an officer in the king of Sardinia's army; but having obtained a pardon he returned from exile, and was presented to George I. by his brother the duke of Athol. He joined Prince Charles at Perth in September 1745, and was immediately appointed lieutenant-general of the insurgent forces. The battle of Preston, where he commanded the left wing of the prince's army, was, in a great measure, gained through his personal intrepidity. "Lord George," says the chevalier Johnstone, in his 'Memoirs of the Rebellion,' "at the head of the first line, did not give the enemy time to recover from their panic. He advanced with such rapidity that General Cope had hardly time to form his troops in order of battle when the Highlanders rushed upon them, sword in hand, and the English cavalry was instantly thrown into confusion."

On the advance of the rebel army into England, Lord George had the command of the blockade of Carlisle, which soon surrendered. Owing to the intrigues of Murray of Broughton, secretary to the prince, whose "unbounded ambition," we are told, "from the beginning aimed at nothing less than the whole direction and management of every thing," Lord George was induced, at this time, to resign his command as one of the lieutenant-generals of the army, acquainting the prince that thenceforward he would serve as a volunteer. At the siege of Carlisle, the duke of Perth had acted as principal commander, and Lord George, it was thought, was not willing to serve under him for the rest of the campaign. The duke, however, subsequently declined the principal command, when Lord George, who had resumed his place, became general of the army under the prince.

He was the first to recommend the retrograde movement from Derby, of which he offered to undertake the conduct. In that memorable retreat he commanded the rear-guard, and contrived to keep the English forces effectually in check. Being delayed by the breaking down of some baggage waggons, the enemy came upon him at Clifton in Cumberland. His force consisted of about a thousand men, and he applied to the prince, who was then at Penrith with the main body of the army, for a reinforcement. Instead of receiving it, however, orders were sent to him to pursue his retreat; but, after requesting the messenger to keep secret the orders he had brought, he determined to attack the enemy with what force he had. He, therefore, drew up his troops in order of battle, and the English, under the duke of Cumberland, came up just as the sun was setting. After making his hasty arrangements, which were not completed till it was quite dark, he made a powerful charge upon the English, lighted by the moon which broke at intervals through the dark clouds. The English cavalry were forced back with a severe loss, while the Highlanders lost but twelve men.

At the battle of Falkirk, Lord George had the command of the right wing, and took his place at the head of the Macdonalds of Keppoch, with his drawn sword in his hand, and his target on his arm. When the English dragoons came within ten or twelve paces of him, he gave orders to fire. "The cavalry closing their ranks, which were opened by this discharge," says Johnstone, "put spurs to their horses, and rushed upon the Highlanders at a hard trot, breaking their ranks, and throwing down everything before them. A most extraordinary combat followed. The Highlanders, stretched upon the ground, thrust their dirks into the bellies of the horses: some seized the riders by their clothes, dragged them down, and stabbed them with their dirks; several of them again used pistols, but few of them had sufficient space to handle their swords." This victory, like that at Preston, was, in a great measure, achieved by the personal bravery of Lord George Murray, though the prince himself commanded.

On arriving at Inverness, Lord George received information of various cruelties practised by the English troops on the people of Athol. He "set off instantly," says Johnstone, "with the clan of Athol, to take vengeance for these outrages, and he conducted his march so well, passing through byeways across the mountains, that the enemy had no information of his approach. Having planned his march so as to arrive at Athol in the beginning of the night, the detachment separated, dividing itself into small parties, every gentleman taking the shortest road to his own house," and in this way all the English were surprised at their posts. Many were put to the sword, and about 300 were made prisoners. Sir Andrew Agnew, who held the castle of Blair, marched out with a detachment to ascertain who they were that had attacked his posts, but owing to the precautions taken by Lord George, he returned to the castle, without venturing on an attack. Lord George then invested the castle, which he blockaded, and the garrison, reduced to great distress from want of provisions, were expected soon to surrender, when his lordship received an order from the prince to return to Inverness, in consequence of the advance of the duke of Cumberland.

It was Lord George Murray who proposed the night march to Nairn, the evening before the battle of Culloden, with the view of surprising the army of the duke of Cumberland. He led the van for that attack, but finding that the rear of the Highlanders did not come up in time, he at once advised a retreat. At the battle of Culloden Lord George commanded the right wing of the prince's army. The English artillery was rapidly thinning his ranks when he gave orders to charge. The first line of the English army reeled and gave way before them. But their opponents were so numerous that before the Highlanders could reach the second line of the English they were entirely destroyed. On this occasion Lord George displayed all his former heroism. While advancing towards the second line, in attempting to dismount from his horse, which had become unmanageable, he was thrown; but, recovering himself, he ran to the rear and brought up two or three regiments from the second line of the Highlanders, to support the first; but although they gave their fire, nothing could be done,—all was lost.

After their defeat, Lord George and the other chiefs who remained with the army retired to Ruthven, where they assembled a force of about 3,000 men, but two or three days after the battle they received orders from the prince to disperse. His lordship had written to Charles, pointing out the principal causes which had led to the loss of the battle, and requesting him to accept of the resignation of his commission, but when he found that it was the intention of the prince to depart for France, he sent a message to him earnestly dissuading him from such a course, and advising him to remain in Scotland and try another campaign. He maintained that the Highlanders "could have made a summer's campaign without the risk of any misfortune;" and "though they had neither money nor magazines, they would not have starved in that season of the year so long as there were sheep and cattle."

On the prince's escape, Lord George withdrew to the Continent, and having spent some years in France and Italy, died in Holland on the 8th July 1760. His character is thus sketched by Johnstone:—"Lord George Murray, who had the charge of all the details of our army, and who had the sole direction of it, possessed a natural genius for military operations; and was a man of surprising talents, which had they been cultivated by the study of military tactics, would unquestionably have rendered him one of the greatest generals of his age. He was tall and robust, and brave in the highest degree; conducting the Highlanders in the most heroic manner, and always the first to rush, sword in hand, into the midst of the enemy. He used to say, when we advanced to the charge, 'I do not ask you, my lads, to go before, but merely to follow me.' He slept little, was continually occupied with all manner of details; and was, altogether, most indefatigable, combining and directing alone all our operations:—in a word, he was the only person capable of conducting our army. He was vigilant, active, and diligent; his plans were always judiciously formed, and he carried them promptly and vigorously into execution. However, with an infinity of good qualities, he was not without his defects:—proud, haughty, blunt, and imperious, he wished to have the exclusive ordering of everything, and, feeling his superiority, he would listen to no advice. Still, it must be owned, that he had no coadjutor capable of advising him, and his having so completely the confidence of his soldiers enabled him to perform wonders."

MURRAY, ALEXANDER, D.D, a celebrated self-taught philologist, was born at Dunkitterick, in the parish of Minnigaff, stewartry of Kirkcubright, October 22, 1775. His father was a humble Galloway shepherd, an occupation followed by his ancestors for several generations, and for which he himself was originally designed. He was taught to read by his father, who was in his seventieth year at the time of his birth. The method which the old man adopted was to draw the figures of the letters on an old wool card with the ends of the burnt roots of the heather that grew on the hills. After thus learning the letters by means of the burnt sticks, he was advanced to the catechism, which was the child's primer in those days. Then he somehow obtained a New Testament, and afterwards a whole Bible, by going to a place where an old tattered copy of it lay, which he carried off bit by bit. In the wild solitary glen where his father lived, he made himself master of the whole contents of the sacred volume, and also devoured every printed scrap of paper on which he could lay his hands, and so strong was his memory that even when he was but a boy he could repeat the names of the patriarchs and scripture characters from Adam to our Saviour without omitting one. When about seven years old, he was employed on the hills in herding sheep. The poverty of the family, and the remote situation of their hut, prevented his being sent early to school, and in fact he would never have obtained any regular instruction at all, had not a brother of his mother, named William Cochran, offered, in May 1784, to be at the expense of sending him to school, and boarding him for a short time in New Galloway. Bad health, however, obliged him to return home before he had been six months at school, and for more than four years after this he had no opportunity of resuming his attendance. In the meantime he was employed as usual as a shepherd boy, and for about three years the Bible, and what "ballads and penny stories" he could pick up, formed his only reading.

In the end of 1787 he engaged to teach throughout the winter the children of two neighbouring farmers, and as a remuneration, he received sixteen shillings, part of which he immediately laid out in the purchase of books. Soon after he began to give irregular attendance for a short time at the school of Minnigaff, chiefly for the purpose of improving his arithmetic, with the view of becoming a merchant's clerk. In 1790, having obtained a cheap copy of Ainsworth's Dictionary, he began the study of Latin, and in May of that year commenced to learn French. In the summer of 1791 he again attended school for about three months, and read with avidity whatever books he could anywhere borrow, whether in English, French, Latin, Greek, or Hebrew, for so great was his application, that he had made himself master of all these languages within the space of only about eighteen months, and that chiefly by his own unaided exertions.

In the winter of 1792-3 he again engaged in teaching, when he received, as he informs us, for his labours, about thirty shillings. During the same winter he went in the evenings to a school at Bridgend of Cree, where he remained for about three months and a half. The whole period of his school attendance, scattered over a space of eight years, did not exceed thirteen months; but every spare hour was given to study, and as he himself tells us, French, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew occupied all his leisure time. In 1791 he had made himself acquainted with the Abyssinian alphabet, from an inaccurate copy which he transcribed from an odd volume of the Universal History. The Arabic letters he had learned previously from Robertson's Hebrew Grammar. He had purchased the same year, for a trifle, a manuscript volume of the Lectures of Arnold Drackenburgh, a German professor, on the lives and writings of the Roman authors, from Livius Andronicus to Quintilian, which he afterwards translated, and in 1794 offered his version to the booksellers at Dumfries, with a number of poems which he had composed, chiefly in the Scottish dialect, but neither of the two booksellers in that town would undertake the publication. During this visit to Dumfries he was introduced to Burns, the poet, who treated him with great kindness, and gave him some useful hints as to his poetry.

The fame of his extraordinary acquirements having extended to Edinburgh, in November 1794 he was invited to that city, when he underwent an examination before Principal Baird and two of the other city clergymen. The extent and accuracy of his classical attainments made such an impression on these gentlemen, that they exerted their influence to procure for him a free attendance at the classes in the university, and contributed to his means of subsistence during the first two years of his academic career. At the end of that period he obtained a bursary, or exhibition, from the city, and soon after was able to support himself by private teaching. He continued to devote himself with all his wonted enthusiasm to the study of languages, and after having attained to a knowledge of all those spoken in Europe, he commenced his investigations into the Oriental tongues, and of the six or seven dialects of the Abyssinian or Ethiopic language, in particular, he made himself completely master. The latter circumstance induced Mr. Constable, the publisher, to employ him in 1802 to superintend a new edition of 'Bruce's Travels to discover the Source of the Nile,' which appeared in seven volumes 8vo, in 1805, with a Life of the author prefixed, and a mass of illustrative notes. The Life of Bruce he afterwards enlarged and published separately. He had previously contributed several miscellaneous pieces to the Scots Magazine, of which he was at one time editor.

Having passed through the usual college course, to qualify him for the ministry in the Church of Scotland, he was appointed in 1806 assistant and successor to the Rev. Mr. Muirhead, minister of Urr, in the stewartry of Kirkeudbright, and on the death of the latter in 1808, he succeeded to the full incumbency of the parish. In 1812 he became a candidate for the vacant professorship of Oriental Languages in the university of Edinburgh, and among the numerous testimonials of his qualifications which were published on the occasion, was one from Mr. Salt, formerly envoy to Abyssinia, whose admiration of the deep erudition and extensive research displayed in his edition of Bruce's Travels, caused him, on his return to England in February 1811, to recommend him to the marquis of Wellesley, "as the only person in the British dominions" adequate to translate an Ethiopic letter which he had brought from the governor of Tigre to George III. In remembrance of Mr. Murray's services in translating this letter, a pension of £80 a-year was after his death granted by his majesty to his widow. He was elected professor of Oriental Languages on July 8, by a majority of two votes, and a few days thereafter the senatus of the university conferred on him the degree of D.D. He was not destined, however, to occupy long a chair which he was so admirably qualified to fill. On October 31 he entered upon the discharge of his professional duties in a weak state of health, and continued with the utmost ardour to teach his classes during the winter. At the commencement of the session he published his 'Outlines of Oriental Philology,' an elementary work, designed for the use of his students. In the beginning of February a new impression of his edition of Bruce's Travels also made its appearance. Soon after, his illness assumed such an alarming aspect as to prevent his lecturing, though he continued his literary labours to the last, having been the very day before his death engaged nearly twelve hours in arranging his papers, &c. He died on the morning of April 15, 1813, in the 37th year of his age. In his latter years he had written a work of great learning, entitled 'History of European languages,' which was published after his death in 2 vols. 8vo, under the auspices of Sir Henry Moncreiff and Dr. Scott of Corstorphine. By his wife, whom he married while residing at Urr, Dr. Murray had a son and daughter, the latter of whom died in 1821. Subjoined is his portrait, from a painting by Geddes, engraved by Burnet:

MURRAY, SIR GEORGE, an able military officer and diplomatist, the second son of Sir William Murray, the fifth baronet of Ochertyre, was born at the family seat in Perthshire, February 6, 1772. He was educated at the high school and university of Edinburgh, and on 12th March 1789, was gazetted an ensign in the 71st foot. Soon after, he removed to the 34th regiment, and in June 1790 to the 3d Guards. In 1793 he was in the army under the duke of York which was employed against the French in Flanders, and in January 1794 he was promoted to a lieutenancy, with the rank of captain. In April of that year he returned to England, but having rejoined the army in Flanders during the summer, he was present in the retreat through Holland and Germany. In 1795 he was appointed aide-de-camp to Major-general Sir Alexander Campbell, on the staff of Lord Moira's army in the expedition intended for Quiberon. In the autumn of the same year, he proceeded to the West Indies under Sir Ralph Abercromby, but in consequence of ill-health he soon returned, and he served on the staff in England and Ireland during the years 1797 and 1798. In August 1799 he was appointed a captain in the guards, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He participated in all the dangers and disasters of the expedition to Holland that year, and was wounded at the Helder. He was soon, however, able to proceed with his regiment to Cork, whence he embarked with it to Gibraltar, as part of the force under the orders of Sir Ralph Abercromby. Having been placed in the quarter-master-general's department, he went to Egypt for the purpose of making arrangements preparatory to the celebrated expedition against the French in that country, and while there he displayed so much gallantry and skill that the Turkish government conferred upon him the order of the crescent, second class.

He was present in every one of the engagements in Egypt, at Marmarice and Aboukir, at Rosetta and Rahmanieh, at Cairo and Alexandria, and had the good fortune to escape without a wound. In 1802 he went from Egypt to the West Indies, and remained there a year as adjutant-general to the British forces in those colonies. On his return to England, he filled a situation at the Horse Guards. In 1804 he was appointed deputy quarter-master-general in Ireland. In 1806 he was engaged in active service in the expedition to Stralsund, but that design was rendered abortive by the successes of the French in Poland. About two years thereafter, Colonel Murray was intrusted with a diplomatic mission to Sweden, and being there at the time that the expedition under Sir John Moore went to that country, he received from that distinguished commander the appointment of quarter-master-general. Very soon afterwards, the troops under Sir John Moore joined the army in Portugal, and Colonel Murray, who went along with them, served all through the peninsular war. On new year's day 1812, he became a major-general, and on 9th August 1813 he was appointed colonel of the 7th battalion of the 60th regiment. In 1817 he was removed to the 72d foot, and on September 11, 1813, was nominated a knight of the Bath, before the enlargement of that order.

After serving for a short time as adjutant-general in Ireland, Sir George was appointed governor of the Canadas. He had not been long there when the secretary of state announced to him that the Emperor Napoleon had landed at Cannes from Elba. He had the choice of either remaining in Canada, or returning to Europe, to engage in active service. He preferred the latter, but the delay occasioned by the embarkation of a large body of troops, and the slow progress made in sailing with a fleet of transports, prevented his arriving in time, and he did not join the duke of Wellington's army till it had nearly reached Paris, after the battle of Waterloo.

During the stay of our army of occupation in France, Sir George remained with them, with the local rank of a lieutenant-general. While in Paris he received seven orders of knighthood, besides those conferred by his own sovereign, so highly were his character and services held in estimation by continental monarchs. He became a knight Grand Cross of Hanover; knight Grand Cross of Leopold, St. Alexander Newski, and the Red Eagle; a commander of the Tower and Sword, Maximilian Joseph, and St. Henry.

On the return of the army of occupation to England in 1817, Sir George Murray was appointed governor of Edinburgh castle, but he held that office only for a year, as on 18th August 1819, he was nominated governor of the Royal Military College at Woolwich. On 14th June 1820, the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.C.L., and in January 1824 he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society. In September 1823 he had been appointed to the command of the 42d foot, and on 6th March following he became lieutenant-general of the ordnance. The same year (1824) he was chosen M.P. for the county of Perth. At this time he filled the office of commander of the forces in Ireland.

At the general election of 1826, he was again returned for Perthshire. In January 1828, when the duke of Wellington became prime minister, Sir George Murray was appointed secretary of state for the colonies; on which occasion he resigned the command of the army in Ireland, and was sworn a member of the privy council. From that period he distinguished himself as a ready and fluent speaker in the House of Commons. He supported the Roman Catholic emancipation bill of 1829, and after the whig government came into power in November 1830, he was one of the principal members of the opposition. In that year, and again in 1831, he was re-elected for Perthshire, but on the dissolution of parliament in 1832, after the passing of the Reform Bill, he was defeated by the earl of Ormelie, afterwards marquis of Breadalbane. In 1834 his lordship became a member of the House of Lords, and Sir George Murray was again elected M.P. for Perthshire.

In Sir Robert Peel's administration of 1834-5, Sir George held the office of master-general of the ordnance. At the general election which ensued he was opposed by Mr. Fox Maule, afterwards Lord Panmure, who defeated him by a majority of 82. At the general election of 1837, Sir George stood for Westminster, but was unsuccessful. Two years subsequently he became a candidate for Manchester, and was again defeated.

On the death of Lord Lynedoch in 1843, he succeeded him as colonel of the 1st or Royal regiment of foot. He attained the rank of lieutenant-general May 27, 1825, and that of general, November 23, 1841. He was editor of 'The Duke of Marlborough's Letters and Despatches,' from 1702 to 1712, which were published in 1845. He will be remembered as a successful soldier, an able minister, and a skilful and fluent debater. He died in London 26th July 1846, aged 74, and was buried at Kensal Green. At the time of his death he was governor of Fort George and president of the Royal Geographical Society. He had married in 1826, in the 54th year of his age, Lady Louisa Erskine, sister of the marquis of Anglesey and widow of Lieutenant-general Sir James Erskine, baronet. Lady Louisa was then 48. She died 23d January 1842. They had one daughter, who married H. G. Boyce, Esq., of the 2d life guards, and died in 1849.

MYLNE, ROBERT, an eminent architect, was born at Edinburgh, January 4, 1734. His father, Thomas Mylne, an architect and magistrate of that city, belonged to a family who held the hereditary office of master-mason to the kings of Scotland, conferred by King James III. Robert Mylne of Balfargie, who died 24th December 1667, built Mylne's Court, and Mylne's Square, Edinburgh, as well as the additions to Holyrood-house, in the reign of Charles II. Young Mylne received his education in his native city, and afterwards travelled to Rome, where he resided for five years. In September 1758 he gained the first prize in the academy of St. Luke, in the first class of architecture, and was unanimously elected a member of that body, the necessary dispensation having been obtained from the Pope, on account of his being a Protestant. He was also elected a member of the academies of Florence and Bologna. He subsequently visited Naples and Sicily, and his professional skill and classical knowledge enabled him to illustrate several obscure passages in Vitruvius. His account of this excursion, with his fine collection of drawings, intended for publication, was left in manuscript to his son, but never published.

After making the tour of Europe he repaired to London, where his plan for constructing a bridge at Blackfriars was preferred to those of twenty other candidates, and he was employed to superintend that vast public undertaking; which was commenced in 1760. It was the first structure of the kind erected in Great Britain, in which arches approaching to the form of an ellipsis were substituted for semicircles; and the great superiority of Mr. Mylne's mode of centring, though disputed at the time, is now universally allowed. Amongst others, Dr. Johnson came forward to condemn the form of the arch, but the short controversy that took place between Mr. Mylne and his illustrious opponent, on this occasion, did not prevent their afterwards becoming intimate friends. The bridge was completed in 1769, for the exact sum specified in Mr. Mylne's estimate, namely, £153,000; his own remuneration being an annual salary of £300, with five per cent. on the money actually laid out on the work.

On completing the bridge, Mr. Mylne was appointed surveyor of St. Paul's Cathedral, and he it was who suggested the felicitous inscription, placed over the entrance of the choir, to the memory of Sir Christopher Wren, ending, "Si monumentum requiras, circumspecte?" Among the buildings erected, altered, or repaired by him, may be enumerated Rochester Cathedral; Greenwich Hospital, of which he was clerk of the works for fifteen years; King's Weston, the seat of Lord de Clifford; Blaze Castle, near Bristol; the duke of Northumberland's house on the banks of the Thames at Sion; and other edifices in England; and Ardincaple House, and Inverary Castle, in Scotland. He died May 5, 1811, at the New River Head, London, where he had long resided as engineer to that company. In 1770 he married Mary, sister of Mr. Home, surgeon, by whom he had nine children, and of these one son and four daughters survived him. The burial-place, over which is a suitable monument, of the Myles, hereditary master-masons to the kings of Scotland, is in Greyfriars churchyard, Edinburgh, to the left of the eastern gate, as the churchyard is entered from the head of the Candlemaker Row.

NAIRNE, Baron, a title in the Scottish peerage, conferred in 1681, on Robert Nairne of Strathord, descended from Michael de Narn, witness to a charter of Robert, duke of Albany, to Andrew de Hamilton of the lands of Gallyston, 10th February 1406-7. One family of the name was the Nairnes of Sandford. Alexander Narn of Sandford, comptroller of the household to James II., and a commissioner to treat with the English, 17th April and 5th July 1547, witnessed three charters of that monarch, under the designation of "nostro-rum computorum refulator." Another branch was that of Mukkersy, to which the noble house of Nairne belonged. John Nairn and Margaret Oliphant his wife, had a charter from George, bishop of Dunkeld, of the lands of Mukkersy, 7th December 1511. He is supposed to have been the ancestor of Thomas Nairn of Mukkersy, who had a charter of the lands of Ochtergaven, now Auchtergaven, in Perthshire, in 1605. His son, Robert Nairn of Mukkersy, advocate, had a charter of the barony of Strathord, 19th July 1621, and died in February 1652. By his wife, Margaret, daughter of Sir John Preston of Pennycaik, lord president of the court of session from 1609 to 1616, he had, with two daughters, four sons, namely, 1st, Robert, first Lord Nairne; 2d, John Nairn of Mukkersy; 3d, Alexander Nairn of Greenyards; and 4th, William Nairn, a captain in the service of King Charles II., killed at the battle of Worcester in 1651.

Robert Nairne of Strathord, the eldest son, was a strenuous royalist during the civil wars. With the earls of Crawford, Marischal, Leven, and other principal royalists, he was taken prisoner, by a detachment sent by General Monk, at Alyth in Forfarshire, 28th August 1651. They were shipped at Broughty Ferry, and sent to the Tower of London, where he remained till the Restoration. He was knighted by Charles II., and appointed one of the lords of session 1st June 1661, also one of the judges of the court of justiciary, 11th January 1671. He was created a peer of Scotland, by the title of Lord Nairne, by patent, dated at Whitehall, 27th January 1681, to himself for life, and after his decease, having no sons, to his son-in-law, Lord William Murray, fourth son of the first marquis of Athol, who had married his only daughter, Margaret. He died in 1683.

Lord William Murray, second Lord Nairne, was a naval officer, and showed signal instances of valour. After the Revolution he did not take the oaths to government nor his seat in parliament. Engaging in the rebellion of 1715, he was taken at Preston, 14th November that year, and being sent prisoner to the Tower of London, was brought to trial, 19th January 1716, when, pleading guilty, he was sentenced to death on 9th February, but respited and afterwards pardoned. An act of parliament was passed in 1716, to enable the king to make provision for Margaret, Lady Nairne, and her children, out of her husband's forfeited estate. His lordship died in 1725, and she survived till 14th November 1747. They had four sons and eight daughters. The second son, the Hon. Robert Nairne, married Jean Mercer, heiress of the ancient family of Mercer of Aldie, Perthshire. He engaged in the rebellion of 1745, and was killed at the battle of Culloden, 16th April 1746, by which the estate of Aldie was saved from forfeiture. Their eldest son, Colonel William Mercer of Aldie and Meikleour, married Margaret Murray, heiress of Pitkeathly, and died 19th January 1790, leaving three daughters, the eldest of whom, Jane, married George Lord Keith, (see vol. i. p. 139,) and had an only child, Margaret Mercer Elphinstone, Baroness Keith of Banheath and Stonehaven-Marischal, and countess of Flahault in France, of whom afterwards.

The eldest son, John, third Lord Nairne, born about 1691, was with his father in the rebellion of 1715. He was lieutenant-colonel of Lord Charles Murray's regiment, and was taken, on the surrender of the insurgents at Preston, 13th November 1715. He was in consequence forfeited with his father, but in 1738 he obtained an act of parliament, to enable him to sue or maintain any action or suit, and to inherit any real or personal estate that might descend to him. In spite, however, of this partial reversal of the attainder, he took part in the rebellion of 1745, having, with several other Perthshire gentlemen, joined the prince at Blair Athol, on his march to Edinburgh. Previous to the arrival of Charles at the castle of Blair, the marquis of Tullibardine, who, in the absence of his father, the duke of Athol, to whom it belonged, acted as host while the prince remained there, had written to Mrs. Robertson of Lude, a daughter of Lord Nairne, desiring her to repair to the castle, to get it put in proper order, and to do the honours of the house.

From Blair, the prince sent forward Lord Nairne and Lochiel, with 400 men, to take possession of Dunkeld, in which town they proclaimed the Pretender. After remaining two days at the castle of Blair, Charles repaired to the house of Lude, where he spent the night, and next day went to Dunkeld, whence he proceeded to Lord Nairne's house, where he dined and slept. The following day he entered Perth.

Lord Nairne was at the battle of Preston; and, in command of the Nairn regiment, 200 strong, forming part of the Athol brigade, he marched with the prince into England. He shared in all the dangers of the rebellion, and after the battle of Culloden, escaped to the continent. He was included in the act of attainder, 1746, and died in France, 11th July 1770, aged 79. By his countess, Lady Catherine Murray, third daughter of the first earl of Dunmore, he had eight sons and three daughters. The eldest son, James, died unmarried. John, the second son, succeeded to the representation of the family. Charles, the third son, an officer in the service of the States-general, died in June 1795. Thomas, the fourth son, an officer in Lord John Drummond's regiment, was taken in October 1745, on board 'L'Esperance,' a French vessel, on his passage from France to Scotland, to join the prince. He died at Sancerre in France, 3d April 1777.

John Nairne, the eldest surviving son, entered the army, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. But for the attainder, he would have been fourth lord. He had two sons and a daughter. John, the elder son, an officer in the army, died unmarried. William Murray Nairne, the younger son, born in 1757, was assistant inspector-general of barracks in Scotland, and a major-general in the army. The title was restored to him by act of parliament 17th June 1824. He had married in June 1806, Carolina, third daughter of Laurence Oliphant of Gask, a lady whose fine lyrical genius and enthusiastic love of music have caused her name to be enrolled among the most gifted poetesses of Scotland.

Carolina, Lady Nairne, the authoress of the popular songs of 'The Laird o' Cockpen' and 'The Land o' the Leal,' was born in the old mansion of Gask, Perthshire, 16th July 1766. So beautiful was she in her youth that she was known in her native district by the poetical designation of 'The Flower of Strathearn.' In the 'Modern Scottish Minstrel,' by Charles Rogers, LL.D., vol. i., there is a well-written and comprehensive memoir of Lady Nairne, with a selection from her songs and other pieces, some of them published there for the first time. From this memoir we learn that her first composition in Scottish verse was a piece called 'The Pleuchman,' which she sent anonymously to the president of an agricultural dinner that took place in her youth in the neighbourhood of her father's house. The production, on being publicly read, was received with warm approbation, and speedily set to music. Her motive in first entering upon the composition of Scottish verse was a very laudable one, namely, the purification of the national minstrelsy from the loose ribaldry which tainted the songs and ballads that then were popular among the peasantry, and in this she was eminently successful. To this early period of her life, says Dr. Rogers, may be ascribed some of her best lyrics. 'The Laird o' Cockpen,' and 'The Land o' the Leal,' at the close of the last century, were sung in every district in the kingdom. Dr. Rogers attributes the restoration of her husband's title in 1824 to George the Fourth having learned during his visit to Scotland in 1822, that the song of 'The Attainted Scottish Nobles' was the composition of Lady, then Mrs. Major Nairn. At the request of several ladies, her acquaintances, she contributed various songs to 'The Scottish Minstrel,' begun in 1821, and completed in 1824, in six royal 8vo volumes, forming one of the best collections of our Scottish melodies yet published. It was brought out by Mr. Robert Purdie, music-seller, Edinburgh, and edited by R. A. Smith. Her pieces were contributed on the express condition that her name should be kept secret, and it does not appear that either Mr. Purdie or Mr. Smith ever knew it. The signature which she assumed was 'B. B.,' and these gentlemen believed that her real name was 'Mrs. Bogan of Bogan.' Dr. Rogers says in a note, that a daughter of Baron Hume was one of the ladies who induced Lady Nairne to become a contributor to 'The Scottish Minstrel.' Many of the songs were sent to the editor through the medium of Miss Hume, who thus expresses herself in a letter to a friend:—"My father's admiration of 'The Land o' the Leal' was such that he said no woman but Miss Ferrier was capable of writing it. And when I used to show him song after song in MS., when I was receiving the anonymous verses for the music, and ask his criticism, he said—"Your unknown poetess has only one, or rather, two, letters out of taste, viz. choosing 'B. B.' for her signature." Lady Nairne herself never divulged, beyond a small circle of confidential friends, the authorship of any of her verses, even when she saw them attributed to others. Her ladyship died at Gask 27th October 1845, aged 79. During the last years of her life, she devoted all her energies to the service of religion, and her benevolence, we are told, extended towards the support of every institution likely to promote the temporal comforts or advance the spiritual interests of her countrymen. Her contributions to the public charities were ample, and from the extreme modesty of her disposition, they were almost always anonymously given. To the Free church and school in the West Port, Edinburgh, she contributed £300, under the strictest injunctions of secrecy, and Dr. Chalmers, in an address delivered at Edinburgh on 29th December 1845, only revealed the fact when her death left him at liberty to do so. Some years after her death, appeared, in an elegant folio volume, 'Lays from Strathearn: by Carolina, Baroness Nairn. Arranged with Symphonies and Accompaniments for the Pianoforte by Finlay Dun.' It bears the imprint of London, and has no date.

Lord Nairne, her husband, had died July 9, 1830. Their only son, William, sixth Lord Nairne, born in 1808, was in his 22d year when he succeeded to the title. In the spring of 1837 he was seized with a severe attack of influenza, and for the recovery of his health he went with his mother to the Continent, and died at Brussels, 27th Dec. that year, without issue. The title is claimed by Margaret, Baroness Keith, mentioned on the previous page.

This lady, born in 1788, married in 1817, the count de Flahault de la Billarderie, in France, a general in the army of Napoleon I., and French ambassador at the British court, 1861; issue, 5 daughters. In her youth she was the bosom friend of the lamented Princess Charlotte. She succeeded her father (see vol. i. p. 139) in 1823, as Baroness Keith of Stonehaven-Marischal in the peerage of Ireland, and as Baroness Keith of Banheath in that of the United Kingdom.

A baronetcy was possessed by the family of Nairne of Dunsinnan, Perthshire, the supposed site of a stronghold of Macbeth, 15 miles from Birnam, celebrated by Shakspeare:

"Macbeth shall never vanquished be, until Great Birnam wood to high Dunsinane hill
Shall come against him."

It was conferred, 31st March 1704, on Sir William Nairne of Dunsinnan, descended from Michael de Nairn, who lived in the reign of Robert III. Sir William Nairne, the fifth baronet, a younger son of the second baronet, was a lord of session. Admitted advocate in 1755, he was, in 1758, appointed commissary clerk of Edinburgh, conjunctly with Alexander Nairne, a relative of his own. In 1786 he was promoted to the bench, and took his seat as Lord Dunsinnan. In 1790 he succeeded to the baronetcy, on the death of his nephew. At the same time he bought the estate of Dunsinnan from another nephew, for the sum of £16,000. It comprises almost the entire parish of Colliace, and as soon as it came into his hands, he spared no expense in putting it into a state of the highest improvement. He was appointed a lord of justiciary in 1792, and continued to attend the duties of the circuit until 1808, when he resigned, and in 1809 he retired from the bench altogether. He died, at an advanced age, at Dunsinnan house, 25th March 1811. The title became extinct at his death. His sister's son succeeded to the estate and assumed the name of Nairne.

Lord Dunsinnan was uncle to the famous Catherine Nairne or Ogilvie, whose trial in 1765, for the crimes of murder and incest, occupied public attention very much at the time. She had married, in that year, being then only nineteen, Thomas Ogilvie of Eastmill, Forfarshire,—a gentleman, as stated at the trial, forty years of age and of a sickly constitution. Three or four days before the marriage, his younger brother, Patrick Ogilvie, a lieutenant in the 89th foot, returned, on account of bad health, from India, and took up his residence at his house. In less than a week after the marriage an improper intimacy is stated to have commenced between the brother and Mrs. Ogilvie. Four months afterwards, at his instigation, she poisoned her husband with arsenic, and with her accomplice, was brought to trial, when they were both found guilty, and condemned to be hanged. Patrick Ogilvie was, in spite of every effort made to save him, executed in the Grassmarket of Edinburgh. The interval betwixt his condemnation and execution he almost exclusively devoted to playing on the violin, of which he was very fond. Catherine Nairne escaped from the Tolbooth. The execution of her sentence had been delayed on account of pregnancy, and, soon after her accouchement, she disguised herself in the clothes of the midwife, Mrs. Shiels, who, for several days, while in attendance on her, had had her head muffled up, under pretence of a violent attack of toothache, and so got out of prison. Her uncle, Mr. Nairne, then an advocate of ten years' standing, is supposed to have assisted in her escape. It was on Saturday, 15th March 1766, that she contrived to get away from the Tolbooth, and the same night she left the city, in a carriage, accompanied by Mr. Nairne's clerk, Mr. James Bremner, afterwards solicitor of stamps. This gentleman went with her as far as Dover, on her way to France. Her behaviour on the way was marked by great frivolity, as she was continually putting her head out of the window and laughing immoderately. In the proclamation issued for her apprehension by the magistrates of Edinburgh, she is described as attired in "an officer's habit, with a hat slouched in the cocks, and a cockade in it;" and "about twenty-two years of age, middle-sized, and strong made, has a high nose, black eyebrows, and a pale complexion." Government offered a reward of £100 for her apprehension, and the city of Edinburgh the same. It is said she afterwards married a Dutch gentleman, by whom she had a numerous family. It was also reported that she had retired to a convent and taken the veil, also that she died in England soon after the beginning of the nineteenth century.

NAPIER, a surname of considerable antiquity both in Scotland and England. It is principally, however, Scotch. There is a charter of the 44th of King Henry III. (1259), "Johes le Naper, venator regis Haveringe, Maner, 18 acres terre messuag. Essex." According to an old tradition, mentioned in a MS., temp. Charles I., written by Sir W. Segar, Garter king of arms, quoted in Burke's Commoners, the surname arose from the following event:—One of the ancient earls of Lennox had three sons; the eldest succeeded him in the earldom, the second was named Donald, and the third Gilchrist.

The then king of Scots being engaged in war, and having convoked his subjects to battle, the earl of Lennox was called on, amongst others, to send such force as he could collect to the king's assistance, which he accordingly did, keeping his eldest son at home with him, but putting his men under the command of his two younger sons. The battle went hard with the Scots, who were not only forced to lose ground, but were actually running away, when Donald snatched his father's standard from the bearer, charged the enemy with the Lennox-men, changed the fortune of the day, and obtained a victory. After the battle, as the custom was, every one reported his acts, when the king said, "You have all done valiantly; but there is one amongst you who had 'Nac Peer,'" (that is, no equal); and, calling Donald to him, commanded him to change his name from Lennox to Napier, and bestowed upon him the lands of Gosford, and lands in Fife, as a reward for his service. This is just a specimen of the old legends with which the early history of Scotland abounds, not one of which is worthy of the slightest credit. The name was originally Le Naper, and seems most likely to have been derived from an office attached to the court, such as Le Botiler, Le Gros Veneur, &c. In England, says Lower, (English Surnames, vol. ii. p. 206.) William de Hastings, temp. Hen. I., held the manor of Ashele, co. Norfolk, by the service of taking charge of the naperie (table-cloths and linen) at the coronation of the English kings.

NAPIER, Baron, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1627 on Sir Archibald Napier, eldest son of Sir John Napier of Merchiston, the celebrated inventor of the Logarithms, of whom a memoir is given at page 244 in larger type. Merchiston castle, within a mile and a half of Edinburgh, was, from a very early period, the patrimony of the family of Napier, descended from John de Napier, who had considerable estates in the county of Dumbarton, and is mentioned in a charter of Malcolm, earl of Lennox, as early as 1280. He is witness to another charter of the same earl in 1294. Johan le Naper, Johan le Naper del counte de Dunbretan, and Mathew le Naper de Agheleck, swore fealty to Edward I. in 1296.

In 1303, when Sir William Oliphant defended Stirling castle against all the power of Edward I., John de Napier was one of the Scots leaders assisting him. The garrison surrendered in 1304, and were sent prisoners to England. Although Edward heaped various indignities upon the governor and principal men with him, he yet excepted them from being chained. John de Napier was fined in three years' rent of his estate by the same monarch, for his patriotic adherence to his country's cause. William de Napier, the third in succession from him, was governor of the castle of Edinburgh in 1401.

William's son, Alexander Napier, the first mentioned as having acquired the lands of Merchiston, was provost of Edinburgh in 1437. Sir Alexander Napier of Merchiston, his son, held the office of comptroller to King James II., as appears from a charter of that monarch, 7th March 1449-50, of the lands of Philde, Perthshire, then in the gift of the crown by the forfeiture of the Livingstones. In this charter, as in other old documents, the name is spelled Napare. When the queen-mother was in 1439 imprisoned by Sir Alexander Livingstone of Callendar, guardian of James II., (see vol. ii. p. 677.) Alexander Napier was wounded in her defence. He was one of the ambassadors sent to England in 1451, when he took the opportunity of going on a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Thomas á Becket at Canterbury. In 1455 he was provost of Edinburgh. He was also vice-admiral of Scotland, being so designed in a safe-conduct to him as one of the ambassadors to the court of England, 24th September 1461. He had another safe-conduct to go to England in 1464. In 1468 he was sent to Denmark, with the lord-chancellor, to negotiate the marriage between King James III. and the Danish king's daughter, the princess Margaret. He was employed on several other public occasions, and held the office of master of the household to James III. He died about the end of 1473.

His son, John Napier of Merchiston, was in the household of Mary, dowager of James II., and having been employed in several negotiations with the court of England, had a pension for life of 50 marks sterling from King Henry VI., granted when that monarch came to Scotland, after the to him disastrous battle of Towton in 1461. He married Elizabeth, one of the two daughters of Murdoch Menteth of Rusky, whose mother was Lady Margaret, second daughter of Duncan earl of Lennox. Elizabeth Menteth was co-heiress with her sister Agnes, wife of John Haldane of Gleneagles, of her brother, Patrick Menteth of Rusky, and John Napier, after his marriage with her, used the designation of Merchiston and Rusky indiscriminately. The disputes (see vol. ii. p. 648) between Stewart of Dernely, Haldane of Gleneagles, and Elizabeth Menteth, about the earldom of Lennox, appear to have been finally adjusted, 19th June 1492, when Elizabeth Menteth was left peaceably in possession of the fourth part of the earldom. By this marriage his descendants were allied to the first families in Scotland, and even claimed a connection with the royal family of Great Britain, in consequence of the union of Lord Darnley with Mary, queen of Scots. The Lennox arms appear to have been previously those of the Napiers, as they were used by Alexander Napier the first of Merchiston, and were not first assumed by this John de Napier, on account of his marriage. (Douglas' Peerage, Wood's edition, vol. ii. p. 283.)

John's eldest son, Archibald Napier, the next laird of Merchiston, was dead before 8th May 1529. Among various charters which he obtained was one of the lands of Gartness, Rusky, Cailzenueh, &c., on his own resignation, the whole incorporated into the free barony of Edinbellie Napier, 21st May 1509. He was the father, with other children, of Sir Alexander Napier, who succeeded him, and, by a second marriage, of Alexander Napier of Inglishton, who is supposed to have been the ancestor of the Napiers of Linton-hoo in Bedfordshire, baronets, the direct male line of which terminated in 1747.

The eldest son, Sir Alexander Napier of Merchiston, fell at the battle of Flodden, 9th September 1513. His only son, Alexander Napier of Merchiston, was little more than four years old at his father's death, and after he came of age he spent several years in France. He was killed at the battle of Pinkie, in September 1547, being then about 38 years old.

His son, Sir Archibald Napier of Merchiston, born before 1535, was knighted in 1565, and appointed master of the mint in 1587. He died at Merchiston castle in May 1608, aged about 74. His eldest son was John Napier, the inventor of the Logarithms, of whom afterwards. Another son, by a second marriage, Sir Alexander Napier of Lauriston, was appointed a lord of session 14th February 1626, and died in 1629. His brother, Archibald Napier, was slain in November 1600, by five of the name of Scott and Thomas Crichton, riding home to his own house to the Wowmit, in revenge for the death of one of their relations, who was killed by him in self-defence.

John Napier of Merchiston, the inventor of the Logarithms, was twice married. His son, by his first wife, Sir Archibald, was the first Lord Napier. John Napier, the eldest by the second marriage, was designed of Easter Torrie. Robert, the second son by that marriage, designed of Drumhony, was editor of his father's posthumous works, and ancestor of the Napiers of Culcreuch, now of Milliken, baronets, of whom afterwards. Alexander, the third son, was designed of Torrie. William, the fourth son, styled of Ardmore, was ancestor of the Napiers of Craigmart; and Adam, the fifth son, of the Napiers of Blackstoun, Renfrewshire.

The eldest son, Sir Archibald Napier of Merchiston, was matriculated at Glasgow university in March 1593. His attention having been early directed to agricultural improvement, he received in June 1598, from James VI., with advice of the lords of the secret council, to him only and to such as he should depute, the royal license for 21 years, to use such manure over all the lands in the kingdom as he should publicly set forth and recommend in print. He accordingly published his plan, entitled 'The new order of gooding and manuring all sorts of field land with common salt, whereby the same may bring forth in more abundance, both of grass and corn of all sorts, and far cheaper than by the common way of dunging used heretofore in Scotland.'

He was appointed gentleman of the privy chamber to James VI., whom he accompanied to London, on his accession to the English throne in 1603. He was sworn a privy councillor, 20th July 1615, constituted treasurer-depute of Scotland for life, 21st October 1622, appointed lord-justice-clerk, 23d November 1623, and two days thereafter admitted one of the lords of session. He resigned the office of lord-justice-clerk, 9th August 1624. He had a license, 14th January 1625, allowing him to export 12,000 stone weight of tallow annually, for seven years, "in remembrance of the mory good serviceis fra tyme to tyme done to his majestie thir mory years bigane, be his right trustie and wel beloved Sir Archibald Naper." The officers of state having been, by a new regulation entered into after the accession of Charles I., incapacitated from sitting in the court of session as ordinary judges, his majesty appointed Sir Archibald Napier one of the extraordinary lords of session, 15th February 1626. He was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 2d March 1627, and by warrant of privy seal of 1st May, the same year, a pension of £2,400 Scots yearly was granted to him, for having, at the king's special desire, advanced to Walter Stewart, gentleman of the privy chamber, the sum of £6,000 Scots.

He was created a peer of Scotland by the title of Baron Napier of Merchiston, by patent dated at Whitehall, 4th May 1627, the honours being limited to the heirs male of his body. He was appointed one of the commissioners of tithes, and obtained a lease of the crown lands of Orkney for 45,000 marks annually, which he subleased to William Dick for 52,000 marks. In March 1631, he surrendered the lease of Orkney, his pension, and the office of treasurer-depute, and was allowed £4,000 sterling, as compensation.

On the breaking out of the civil war in Scotland, he took a decided part in favour of Charles I. When the marquis of Hamilton, with the king's fleet, arrived in Leith Roads in May 1639, Lord Napier was sent to him with a conciliatory proposal from the committee of Estates, and the marquis soon after retired from the Frith of Forth. Lord Napier was one of those who signed the association formed by Montrose at Cumbernauld in January 1641, for the support of the royal authority. On 11th June the same year, he was apprehended, with Montrose and Sir George Stirling of Keir, and committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh, but released 16th November following. In 1644 he was confined by the covenanting party to his apartments at Holyrood-house, with his son, the master of Napier, and his son-in-law, Sir George Stirling of Keir, and commanded not to stir thence under a heavy penalty. The master of Napier, disregarding the injunction, made his escape. The ruling party immediately imprisoned his father, with his brother-in-law, Sir George Stirling, Lady Elizabeth Napier, his wife, and Lillias Napier, his sister, in the castle of Edinburgh, and confined his other sister, Lady Stirling, to the house of Merchiston. In addition Lord Napier had to pay £10,000 Scots, as cautioner for his son, for breaking his confinement.

In consequence of the raging of the plague in the castle of Edinburgh, Lord Napier and his connexions were removed to the gaol at Linnlithgow, whence they were liberated by the master of Napier after the battle of Kilsyth. His lordship accompanied the marquis of Montrose to the south of Scotland, and after the defeat at Philiphaugh, escaped with him into Athol. He was left there on account of bad health, and died at Fincastle in November 1645, aged upwards of 70, and was buried in the church of Blair. In 1647, the ruling party threatened to take up his bones to pass a sentence of forfeiture on him, but this was prevented by his friends paying 5,000 marks. He was, says Bishop Wishart, a man "not less noble in his personal accomplishments than in his birth and descent; a man of the greatest uprightness and integrity, and of a most happy genius, being, as to his skill in the sciences, equal to his father and grandfather, who were famous all the world over for their knowledge in philosophy and mathematics, and in the doctrine of civil prudence far beyond them." Montrose had been accustomed from his earliest years to look up to this gifted nobleman with feelings of reverential and filial awe. He was the author of 'A True Relation of the Unjust Pursuit against the Lord Napier, written by himself, containing an account of some court intrigues, in which he was the sufferer.' This was published by Francis, seventh Lord Napier, under the title of 'Memoirs of Archibald, first Lord Napier, written by himself; published from the original MS.,' Edinburgh, 1793.

By his wife, Lady Mary Graham, second daughter of the fourth earl of Montrose, and sister of "the great marquis" of Montrose, the first Lord Napier had two sons, John, who died young, and Archibald, second Lord Napier, and two daughters, as above mentioned.

Archibald, second Lord Napier, was, like his father, a faithful adherent of the royal cause. After making his escape, when master of Napier, from his confinement at Holyrood-house, as above stated, he joined his uncle, the marquis of Montrose, at the ford of Cardross, 21st April 1645. At the battle of Auldearn, 4th May of that year, he displayed signal valour. He commanded the reserve at the battle of Alford, on 2d July following, and after the victory of Kilsyth, 15th August the same year, he was sent by Montrose, with a select body of horse, to Edinburgh, to summon that city to surrender, and to set the prisoners at liberty. On his way, he had the satisfaction of releasing his father and his wife, with Sir George Stirling of Keir, his brother-in-law, and his sister, from the prison of Linnlithgow.

In February 1646, after succeeding to the title of Lord Napier, he hastened to the relief of his tenants who were then oppressed by the marquis of Argyre, and subsequently was besieged by General Middleton at Kincardine, a seat of the marquis of Montrose. After holding out for fourteen days, he was at last obliged to capitulate. The evening previous, however, to the place being surrendered, his lordship made his escape through a postern gate, and joined the marquis of Montrose. When the latter disbanded his army, Lord Napier retired to the Continent. He attended the marquis of Montrose to Paris, where, as appears by a letter from himself to his lady, dated Bruxelles, 14th June 1648, "it was ever sayde yt Montrose and his nephew was like ye Pope and ye church, who wold be inseparable." When the marquis proceeded to Germany that year, Lord Napier went to Flanders. He was so strongly attached to his uncle that, for the purpose of being near him for facility of correspondence, he refused the command of a regiment in Spain, which was offered him. He was particularly excepted in Cromwell's act of grace and pardon, 12th April 1654, his lady being allowed £100 a-year out of his forfeited estates, with a farther sum of £50 in July, 1658. He died in Holland in the beginning of 1660. By his wife, Lady Elizabeth Erskine, eldest daughter of John, eighth earl of Mar, he had two sons and three daughters. The Hon. John Napier, the second son, was killed in a sea-fight against the Dutch in 1672, without issue. After the Restoration, Lady Napier obtained a pension of £500 per annum in consideration of her husband's loyalty and sufferings.

Archibald, third Lord Napier, obtained in 1662 from Charles II. a warrant, addressed to the earl of Middleton, then lord-high-commissioner to the Scots parliament, authorising him to pay his mother, Lady Napier, and himself £3,000 sterling, for the loyalty shown by them during the civil commotions; but as the warrant is preserved among the Napier papers, it is believed that the money was never paid. Being unmarried, Lord Napier resigned his peerage into the king's hands 20th November, 1676, and obtained a new patent of the same, with the former precedence, dated at Whitehall, 17th February 1677, granting the title to himself and the heirs of his body; failing them, to his three sisters, Jean, Margaret, and Mary, in succession, and the heirs male of their bodies, with remainder to the heirs of their bodies; and failing them, to his own heirs male whatever; failing all these, to his heirs and assigns whatsoever, the heir female being obliged, on succeeding to the title, and her heirs, to assume the name and arms of Napier. Lord Napier died a bachelor in August 1683.

The Hon. Jean Napier, his eldest sister, predeceased him. She married Sir Thomas Nicolson of Carnock, Stirlingshire, baronet, and had a son, Sir Thomas Nicolson of Carnock, who, on the death of his uncle, became fourth Lord Napier. (See Nicolson, baronet.) He died in France, 9th June, 1686, in his 18th year, unmarried. The title then devolved on his aunt, Margaret, baroness Napier, second daughter of the second Lord Napier, and widow of John Brisbane, Esq., secretary of the royal navy in England, who died in 1684, while preparing to set out for Portugal, to which country he had been appointed envoy extraordinary. She had a pension of £200 sterling from Charles II., 4th August 1683, on account of the public services of her husband. Lady Napier died in September 1706. She had two sons and a daughter, who all predeceased their mother.

The daughter, Margaret, who, as the last survivor of them, was styled mistress of Napier, married William Scott, Esq., eldest son of Sir Francis Scott of Thirlestane, Selkirkshire, and had, with two daughters, who died young, a son, Francis, fifth Lord Napier.

This nobleman, born 16th November 1703, succeeded to the title when only three years old. He inherited the estate of Thirlestane and the title of baronet, on the death of his father in 1725. He served as a volunteer in the allied army, under the earl of Stair, in the campaign of 1743, and was appointed one of the lords of police in Scotland, 2d October 1761, an office long since abolished. The same year, at his own expense, he procured a survey of a navigable canal to form a communication betwixt the Forth and Clyde. He died at Lewes, Sussex, 11th April 1773. He married, first, Lady Henrietta Hope, third daughter of the first earl of Hopetoun, and by her had, with one daughter, who died in infancy, five sons, namely, 1. William, sixth Lord Napier; 2. The Hon. Charles Napier of Merchistoun Hall, Stirlingshire, Captain R.N., who died, 19th December 1807, in his 77th year, leaving issue by his second wife, Christian, daughter of Gabriel Hamilton, Esq. of Westburn, Lanarkshire. His eldest son was the celebrated Admiral Sir Charles Napier, of whom afterwards. 3. The Hon. Francis Napier, lieutenant-colonel of marines, who died without issue at Dublin in 1779. 4. The Hon. John Napier, lieutenant 25th regiment, who died in Germany, 31st July 1759. 5. The Hon. Mark Napier, major-general in the army, who died 10th June 1809, aged 71, leaving issue. His lordship married, secondly, Henrietta-Maria, daughter of George Johnston, Esq., a cadet of the Hilton family, and had by her three daughters and five sons. The eldest, the Hon. George Napier, born at Edinburgh in 1751, died a colonel in the army and comptroller of army accounts in Ireland 13th October 1804. He had served in the American campaign in 1777, was on Lord Moira's staff in the duke of York's expedition in Holland, and was selected to take the command of the 102d or Londonderry regiment, on its being raised. He was one of the most powerful and active men in the British army, and at his death it was said of him that "a better or braver soldier never served his country, a more upright or more diligent servant of the public never filled an office of trust." In consideration of his services his majesty granted a yearly pension of £1,000 to his widow, Lady Sarah Lennox, seventh daughter of the second duke of Richmond. By this lady he had eight children. His eldest son, Lieutenant-general Sir Charles James Napier, G.C.B., the conqueror of Scinde, was born 10th August, 1782, of whom on page 242.

Vice-admiral Sir Charles Napier, K.C.B., one of the most distinguished of British naval commanders, and remarkable especially for his daring and intrepidity, the eldest son of Captain the Hon. Charles Napier of Merchistoun Hall, Stirlingshire, R.N., above mentioned, was born at Falkirk, 6th March 1786. In the male line, as has been seen, he was a Scott, one of the rough border clan of that name, to which the author of Waverley belonged. At the time of his birth, his father was regulating captain on the Leith station, where his duty was to superintend the entry of seamen for the navy, and to forward them to their destination at the Nore. He spent a great portion of his early years at Merchistoun Hall, with his younger brother, afterwards Major-general Thomas Erskine Napier, in 1854 commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland. He received his education principally at the high school of Edinburgh, and in 1799, at the age of thirteen, he joined the Martin sloop of war, as a first class volunteer, and went to the North Seas. Removed, in the following spring, to the Renown, 74, the flagship of Sir John Borlase Warren, he sailed to the coast of Spain, and was present in the attack on Ferrol. He afterwards went to the Mediterranean, and in November 1802 became a midshipman in the Greyhound, 32. On his return from a visit to St. Helena in the Egyptienne, he joined successively in 1804-5, the Mediator and Renommée frigates. In November 1805, he got his lieutenancy, as soon as he "passed," at 19 years of age. He was appointed to the Courageux, 74, which formed part of the squadron of Sir J. B. Warren; and assisted at the capture of the French 80 gun ship the Marengo, and the 44 gun frigate the Belle Poule. In March 1807, being then in the West Indies in the Prince George, 98, he was nominated acting commander of the Pultusk frigate, and the appointment was confirmed by the admiralty on 30th November following. He was present at the reduction of the Danish islands, St. Thomas and St. Croix, and on 17th July 1808, he assisted, with the boats of the Fawn sloop, in cutting out a Spanish merchantman from under two batteries on the coast of Porto Rico, the guns of one of which he spiked. In August of the same year he removed to the Recruit brig of 18 guns. A day or two after receiving the command he came in sight of the French corvette Diligente of 22 guns, making in the direction of the island of Martinique. He immediately gave chase, and the two vessels exchanged broadsides within pistol-shot of each other. Captain Napier was struck by a shot at the very commencement of the action, which broke his thigh-bone, but he refused to go below. The result he told the public, in his own characteristic way, in one of his election speeches at Portsmouth in 1833. "I had once the misfortune," he said, "of receiving a precious licking from a French corvette; the first shot she fired broke my thigh, and a plumper carried away my main-mast. The enemy escaped, but the British flag was not tarnished." In February 1809 he assisted at the reduction of Martinique. The Æolus, Cleopatra, and Recruit were ordered to beat up in the night between Pigeon island and the Main, and anchor close to Fort Edward. The enemy fearing an attack, burnt their shipping. With five men he landed in open day, scaled the walls of Fort Edward, and planted the Union Jack on the ramparts. A regiment being landed in the night, Fort Edward was taken possession of, and the mortars turned against the enemy. Sir Alexander Cochrane, his commander-in-chief, wrote him a letter saying, that his "conduct was the means of saving many lives, and of shortening the siege of Martinique."

In the ensuing April he assisted Sir Alexander Cochrane in a chase of three French ships of the line, which, after a running fight of nearly fifty-five hours, terminated in the capture of the Hautpout, 74. For his services in this affair, the commander-in-chief appointed him to the command of the captured vessel, and the post commission thus conferred upon him was confirmed by the admiralty 22d May 1809. At this time he was only 23. In the following summer he returned with convoy to England in the Jason frigate, and did not again go afloat till 1811. During this interval he served a campaign as a volunteer with the army in the Peninsula, and was present at the battle of Busaco, at which he carried off the field his cousin, Major Napier, afterwards Lieutenant-general Sir Charles James Napier, who was shot through the face. In the course of the campaign he himself was wounded.

In the early part of 1811 he was appointed to the Thames frigate of 34 guns, in which he served in the Mediterranean under Sir Edward Pellew, afterwards Lord Exmouth. On 26th July that year, in concert with the Cephalus under Captain Augustus Clifford, he silenced the fire of eleven gunboats and a felucca moored across the harbour of Porto del Infreschi, as well as that of a round tower, and captured 14 merchantmen, and a quantity of spars destined for a ship of the line and a frigate. On 1st November, in command of his own boats and those of the Imperieuse, he landed with 250 men of the 62d regiment, at the back of the harbour of Palinuro, and carried the neighbouring heights, under a heavy fire from the enemy, who were compelled to retire. Next day he succeeded in capturing 10 gunboats, 22 richly laden feluccas, and the battery of 24-pounders by which they had been protected. In the spring of 1812 he was employed as the senior officer on the coast of Calabria. On 14th May he attacked the port of Sapri, took 28 ships laden with oil, and, supported by the Pilot sloop, compelled a strong battery and tower to surrender at discretion. On 26th February 1813, in concert with the Furiuse, 36, and with the second battalion of the 10th regiment, he took possession of the island of Ponza, and that without loss, although exposed to the fire of four batteries and a tower. On his removal soon afterwards to the Euryalus, 36, with the aid of his boats he captured, 16th May, La Fortunc, xebecque, carrying ten long 9-pounders, four swivels, and 95 men, with upwards of 20 merchant vessels, lying in Cavalrie roads. In the following winter he drove on shore the Balleine French store-ship of 22 guns and 120 men, and compelled a gabarre of 30 guns and 150 men to seek refuge under the land batteries.

Shortly afterwards, on the breaking out of the American war, he sailed with a squadron under Captain King for North America. His services here were chiefly up the Potomac. He took part in the brilliant expedition under Captain, afterwards Vice-admiral Sir J. A. Gordon, against Alexandria, and assisted him in bombarding Fort Washington. After the American batteries were silenced, and their powder magazine blown up, the squadron, carrying with it 21 sail of prizes, safely reached the mouth of the river, on coming down which they found the brushwood swarming with the enemy, who fired a volley of musketry, a ball of which struck him in the neck.

In the subsequent operations against Baltimore, in September 1814, Captain Napier, having a division of boats under his orders, rendered good service in causing a diversion, which favoured an assault upon the enemy's entrenched camp on the opposite side of the city. In June 1815, his ship, the Euryalus, was paid off, and on the 4th of that month he was made a C.B. He remained unemployed till 1829, and during the interval he directed his attention to the numerous abuses in the management of the navy, and published a number of letters on the subject addressed to Lord Melville, then at the head of the admiralty, to the Lord-high-admiral (the duke of Clarence), and others in authority, under the signature of a post-captain. On 8th January 1829 he was appointed to the Galatea, of 42 guns, and from that period until the end of 1832 he was employed on particular service on the coast of Portugal. The object of his mission appears to have been to obtain restitution from Don Miguel, who had usurped the Portuguese throne, of certain British ships which had been seized, upon a pretext wholly unjustifiable, off the Western Islands. Of his services on the Portuguese coast, on the part of this country and on that of the constitutional government of Portugal, he has given a detailed account in his 'History of the War of Succession in Portugal.'

In 1833, Captain Napier succeeded Admiral Sartorius, in the command of Donna Maria's fleet, and on 4th July that year, he achieved a signal victory off Cape St. Vincent over the more numerous and powerful squadron of Don Miguel, by boarding. In this action, the following was the relative strength of the two fleets. Donna Maria's squadron, under Napier, three frigates, a corvette, and a brig, 176 guns in all. Don Miguel's squadron, two ships of the line, mounting 86 guns each, a frigate of 52 guns, a 50 gun ship, three corvettes and two brigs, in all 372 guns. The result of this brilliant achievement was the evacuation of Lisbon by the Miguelites, and the establishment of Donna Maria on the throne of Portugal. For this important service he was created by the Portuguese government Viscount Capo San Vicente, and appointed admiral-in-chief of the Portuguese fleet. He also obtained the Grand Cross of the Tower and Sword; but receiving nothing but incivility and ingratitude from the Portuguese officials, he returned to England in the following November. In January 1837 he was awarded the Captain's good service pension.

On 1st January 1839 he was appointed to the command of the Powerful, 84, fitting for the Mediterranean, with special instructions to take soundings of the Dardanelles, and drawings of the various ports along the coast, &c., all preparatory to the naval operations which were soon after carried into effect in that quarter. In 1840 he hoisted his broad pendant as commodore, and became second in command under Sir Robert Stopford, of the fleet employed on the coast of Syria. He was a principal actor in the brief but brilliant war that ensued for the settlement of what was called the Eastern question. From the landing of the British, Turkish, and Austrian forces in Djounie Bay, he was indefatigably employed in every operation of the war. He obtained a signal success over a force commanded by Ibrahim Pacha, which occupied a strong position among the mountains of Beyrout. The evacuation of that place immediately followed, and the submission of the army of Suliman Pacha, with its cannon and stores. On the 24th September he captured Saida, and within a month took about 10,000 prisoners, cleared all Lebanon of the Egyptians, forced Ibrahim Pacha to abandon the passes of the Taurus, and to concentrate the whole of his army at Zachle and Damaseus. At Sidon Commodore Napier particularly distinguished himself. On the 3d November Acre was bombarded by Sir Robert Stopford, Commodore Napier leading the division of the squadron which attacked the north side of the town. Immediately after the reduction of Acre, he was sent to Alexandria, in command of a division of the fleet, and there he acted on his own responsibility, and concluded a convention with Mehemet Ali, pasha of Egypt, who agreed to the immediate removal of the Egyptian troops from Syria and the delivery of the Ottoman fleet, on condition of a cessation of hostilities, and his reinstatement in the hereditary government of Egypt. This convention Sir Robert Stopford refused to ratify. The British ambassador at Constantinople and the Ottoman Porte also disclaimed it. It was, however, approved of by Lord Palmerston, then secretary of state for foreign affairs, and formed the basis of the agreement on which the Eastern question, after a protracted correspondence, was settled. For his services in this war, Commodore Napier was created a knight commander of the Bath, 4th December 1840. He was also presented by the monarchs of the different countries with the cross of Maria Theresa of Austria, the cross of St. George of Russia, and the insignia of the second class of the order of the Red Eagle of Prussia.

In the spring of 1841, he returned to England, and, not long after, was elected M.P. for Marylebone. On 30th November of the same year he was appointed one of the naval aides-de-camp to the queen. In 1846 he was made rear-admiral of the blue, and in 1847 appointed to the command of the Channel fleet, which he held for two years. In 1851 he published a volume, containing all the letters on naval reform which he had contributed to the London papers during the previous thirty years, with the title of 'The Navy, its Past and Present State;' the Introduction to which was written by his cousin, Major-general Sir William Napier, author of the 'History of the Peninsular War.'

In 1853 he was promoted to be vice-admiral of the blue. On the breaking out of the Russian war the following year, he was appointed to the command of the Baltic fleet; but with the exception of the taking of Bomarsund, he did nothing whatever in the Baltic sea. He, however, brought home his fleet in safety and good order. In June 1855 he became vice-admiral of the white, and in 1858 admiral of the blue. In November of the same year, on the death of Sir William Molesworth, he was elected M.P. for Southwark. He married the widow of Edward Eiers, Esq., R.N., and their son, Captain Charles Napier, was drowned in December 1847, whilst in command of the Avenger steam frigate, when she was wrecked on the Sorelle rocks in the Mediterranean. Sir Charles Napier died at his seat, Merehilton Hall, Hampshire, November 6, 1860. His portrait is subjoined.

His cousin, Lieutenant-general Sir Charles James Napier, G.C.B., son of Colonel George Napier, by Lady Sarah Lennox, was born at Whitehall, London, 10th August, 1782. When he was between two and three years old, his father removed to Ireland, and in January 1794, before he had completed his twelfth year, he obtained a commission in the 33d regiment. He first served in the Irish rebellion of 1798, and was aide-de-camp to Sir James Duff, commanding in Limerick, in 1800. In 1803 he again served in Emmet's rebellion.

In 1804 he received a captain's commission in the 50th, of which regiment he became major in 1806, and commanded it all through Sir John Moore's memorable retreat to Corunna. At that famous battle, he and Major Stanhope charged the French most gallantly, which caused Sir John to exclaim, shortly before receiving his death-wound, "Well done, the 50th! Well done, my majors!" In endeavouring to silence an advanced gun which was making great havoc in the British lines, Major Napier was severely wounded and taken prisoner. Besides a bayonet stab in his back from a French soldier who came behind him, he had received a musket-ball in his leg, and a sabre-cut on his head. The soldiers were about to despatch him, when he was saved by the intervention of a drummer, named Gibert, whom Soult afterwards rewarded for his conduct. Having been returned in the Gazette as among the slain, his friends went into mourning for him, and obtained from the Prerogative court administration of his personal estate. In the meantime, he was treated with the greatest kindness by Marshal Soult, who recommended him to the consideration of his successor, Ney. The latter permitted him to return on his parole to England, where he arrived 30th March 1809, and eventually procured his liberation by an exchange. For his gallant conduct in this battle he obtained a medal, then seldom given and much prized.

He subsequently joined Lord Wellington's army in Portugal as a volunteer. At the Coa two horses were shot under him, and at Busaco, 27th September 1810, he was shot through the face, the bullet lodging behind the ear. He was compelled to travel a hundred miles to Lisbon, for efficient surgical assistance, when the bullet was extracted. He was present at Fuentes, at the second siege of Badajoz, and in many skirmishes. In 1811 he attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the 102d regiment, and went out to Bermuda in command of it. In 1813 he served in the expedition to Chesapeake Bay, under Sir Sidney Beekwith. Afterwards he commanded at the affair of Little Hampton, which proved most successful.

Having made all haste to reach Waterloo as a volunteer, he arrived from Ghent on the field, on the evening of the 18th June, too late to take part in the battle, but he was present throughout the march upon Paris, and at the storming of Cambrai. On his homeward voyage to England, the ship he took passage in sunk off Flushing, and he saved himself by swimming.

In 1818 he was appointed inspecting field officer in the Ionian islands, where he executed many public works, designed by himself, and in 1824 was made lieutenant-governor or resident of Cephalonia, when he introduced most important improvements in the administration of justice and in the internal condition of the island. After his return to England, he published a work, entitled 'The Colonies and the Ionian Islands;' also, another on 'The Roads and Bridges of Cephalonia.'

In 1835, the commissioners for the colonization of South Australia obtained for him the offer of the governorship of that colony, but as the government would not allow him either men to defend it, or money to promote its improvement, he declined the appointment. At this time he published 'Colonization, with Remarks upon Small Farms and Over Population,' in which he eloquently advocates the rights of native tribes. Having fixed his residence for some time in Dublin, he published, in 1838, a pamphlet treating of the neglected waste lands and defective agriculture, at that period, of Ireland.

In 1837 he obtained the brevet rank of major-general, and soon afterwards he published his 'Remarks on Military Law, and the Punishment of Flogging,' which he disapproved of in time of peace. He also, about the same time, edited De Vigny's 'Lights and Shadows of French Military Life.' In March 1839 he was appointed to the command of the northern district of England, and is said to have prevented a Chartist outbreak at Nottingham, by bringing the leaders to witness a review of the troops under his command, when he pointed out to them the fearful inferiority of their half-armed, undisciplined masses to his soldiers. In 1841 he was appointed to the command of the troops in the Bombay presidency, and in 1842 he was sent to Seinde, to take the command of an army of reserve stationed there, to keep open the communications between Generals Nott, English, and Pollok, then advancing into Afghanistan. Here he had to fight at an immense disadvantage. At Meeanee, on 17th February, 1843, he defeated a strong Belooch force of 35,000 men, the force under his command being only 2,700. His own loss at this battle was 20 officers and 250 rank and file, while that of the enemy was 6,000. For this brilliant action he received the grand cross of the Bath. Hyderabad immediately surrendered, and six of the Ameers, on being taken prisoners, offered him their costly swords, which he returned. With 5,000 men against 26,000, he defeated Shere Mahomed, styled the Lion, the most warlike of the hostile Ameers, at the battle of Hyderabad or Dubba, on 24th March. At this battle a Belooch powder magazine exploded close beside him, killing or wounding all around him, singeing his clothes, and breaking his sword in his hand, though leaving him personally unhurt. One feature of his proceedings in Scinde is worthy of special mention. For the first time in the practice of the British army he inserted in his despatches the names of the private soldiers who had distinguished themselves in battle.

He was now appointed by Lord Ellenborough, then governor-general of India, governor of Scinde, when he abolished the suttee and slavery, and greatly checked the practice of infanticide. He opened canals, and organised a native police force. In a campaign of 54 days in 1845, he completely subdued the hill tribes or mountain robbers north of Scinde. The thanks of both houses of parliament for "the skill and gallantry with which the operations in Scinde were carried on, and for the decisive victories with which they were crowned," were awarded to him. Besides his other works, he was author of two smaller ones on 'The Greek Revolution.'

In the spring of 1849, after his return to England, when the disasters of the last Sikh campaign had excited the anxieties of the people of this country, by the advice of the duke of Wellington, Sir Charles James Napier was appointed to the command of the Indian army, and on 24th March of that year, he set out for India, but when he arrived there, he found that the object of the war had been attained. He, however, exerted himself in reforming the flagrant abuses which had grown up in the army, especially among the officers. Having remained in India about two years, he resigned his command and returned to England. He did more, perhaps, to reform the British army than any other general officer of his time. He was particularly opposed to debt and idleness among the officers, and was remarkable for the simplicity of his own style of living. He died Aug. 29, 1853, aged 71. His next brother, General Sir George Thomas Napier, K.C.B., born in 1784, for some years governor at the Cape of Good Hope, lost his right arm at Ciudad Rodrigo, where he led the storming party. He died Sept. 3, 1855, leaving 3 sons and 1 dr. Another brother, General Sir William Francis Patrick Napier, K.C.B., born in 1785, author of 'The History of the Peninsular War,' and of works on the 'Conquest of Scinde,' on the Poor Law, and on the Corn Laws, with some reviews and works of fiction, died Feb. 12, 1860. A younger brother, Captain Henry Napier, R.N., author of the Florentine History, born in 1789, died in 1853.

William, 6th Lord Napier, born May 1, 1730, became in 1747 a cornet in the Scots Greys, and major Nov. 14, 1770. He sold his commission in 1773, on account of bad health, and the same year he succeeded his father. He was deputy-adjutant-general to the forces in Scotland, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the army from 17th January 1763, till his death, 2d January 1775, in his 45th year. By his wife, Mainie, or Marion Anne, fourth daughter of Charles, eighth Lord Cathcart, he had one son, Francis, seventh Lord Napier, and four daughters. The Hon. Mainie or Marion Shaw Napier, the eldest daughter, married, in 1779, the Rev. Andrew Hunter of Barjarg, D.D., then one of the ministers of Dumfries, afterwards professor of divinity in the university of Edinburgh, and one of the ministers of the Tron church in that city. Dr. Hunter died 21st April 1809. His youngest son, the Rev. John Hunter, became one of the ministers of the Tron church, Edinburgh, in October 1832.

Francis, seventh Lord Napier, born at Ipswich, 23d February, 1758, entered the army as ensign in the 31st foot, 3d November 1774, and became lieutenant of the same regiment 21st March, 1776. He served in America under General Burgoyne, in the war of independence, and was one of those who surrendered with him to General Gates at Saratoga the following year. After being detained a prisoner for six months, he obtained permission to return to Europe on parole, not to serve in America until regularly exchanged, which took place in October 1780. On 17th November 1779, he had purchased a captain's commission in the 35th foot, and after being on half-pay for a short time, he exchanged to full pay as captain in the 4th foot, 31st May, 1784. On 29th December following, he purchased the majority of that corps, but sold out in 1789.

On the 16th September of that year, Lord Napier, as grand master mason of Scotland, laid the foundation of the new university buildings of Edinburgh, Dr. Robertson, the historian, being at that time principal. On the 11th November he had the degree of LL.D. conferred on him by the university.

In 1793, when the Hopetoun fencibles were embodied, his lordship was appointed lieutenant-colonel of that corps, and held the commission until it was disbanded in 1799. He was elected one of the sixteen Scots representative peers in 1796, and appointed lord-lieutenant of Selkirkshire, 17th November 1797. Nominated high-commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1802, he annually filled that office for nearly twenty years. On 10th November 1803, he was elected a member of the society in Scotland for propagating Christian Knowledge, and on 3d January 1805 he became president of that society. On 5th February 1806, he was constituted a member of the board of trustees for the encouragement of Scottish fisheries and manufactures. His lordship died 1st August 1823.

His eldest son, William-John, eighth Lord Napier, born at Kinsale 13th October 1786, entered the navy at the age of 16, and was a midshipman on board the Defiance at the battle of Trafalgar. In 1809 he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant, and five years afterwards to that of post-captain. In 1815, at the age of 29, owing to the peace, he retired from active service, and entered the university of Edinburgh. He afterwards turned his attention to agricultural pursuits, and was long distinguished in the south of Scotland as an improver in store-farming.

In 1824, the year after he had succeeded to the title, he was appointed to the command of the Diamond, bound for the South American station. In the course of three years he again retired from active service, and returned to Scotland. In 1833, he was appointed superintendent of the trade and interests of the British in China. Finding, on landing at Macao, in July 1834, that the governor of Canton was disposed to obstruct his farther progress until notice of his arrival should have been sent to the court at Peking, he determined to proceed in spite of every obstacle. On the 24th of that month, he sailed up the Canton river, and next morning arrived at the British factory. Commercial transactions between the British and Chinese merchants were immediately prohibited by the governor, in consequence of which his lordship sent the Imogene and Andromache frigates up the Bogue river. They were fired at by the forts, which in return they battered about the ears of the Chinese soldiers. This occurred on the 7th September, but, owing to calms, the ships were obliged to come to an anchor for several days. On the 14th, Lord Napier became seriously indisposed, and that the interests of the British merchants might not be injured by a farther suspension of their trade, the men of war were ordered "to move out of the river," and he returned to Macao, where he died 11th October 1834, of a lingering fever, brought on by anxiety. He was one of the 16 Scots representative peers. With four daughters, he had two sons; Francis, who succeeded him, and William, clerk of the works at Hong-Kong.

Francis, the elder son, 9th Lord Napier, born Sep. 15, 1819, married, in 1845, the only daughter of Robert Manners Lockwood, Esq., issue, 4 sons. In Aug. 1840, he was attached to the embassy at Vienna, and in Sep. 1842, appointed paid attaché at Teheran. In Jan. following he became paid attaché at Constantinople, in May 1846, secretary of legation at Naples, in April 1852 secretary of legation at St. Petersburg, and in April 1854, secretary of embassy at Constantinople. In 1857 he was appointed British minister at Washington, and in 1858 at the Hague. His eldest son, William John George, was born Sep. 22, 1846.

The head or chief of the ancient family of Napier, is Milliken Napier of Napier and Milliken, Renfrewshire, baronet, descended from Robert Napier of Culcreuch, Stirlingshire, the second son of the second marriage of John Napier of Merchiston, the inventor of the Logarithms. He is, therefore, his lineal representative and male heir. Robert Napier left one son, Alexander Napier of Culcreuch, born in 1621, who married Margaret, eldest daughter of John Lennox of Woodhead, or Lennox castle, Stirlingshire, and died in 1692. His eldest son, John Napier of Culcreuch, born in 1665, married his cousin, Jean Lennox of Woodhead, and died in 1734. The son of John, William Napier of Culcreuch, a general in the army, married Jane, daughter and heiress of James Milliken, Esq. of Milliken, Renfrewshire, and on his death in 1780, left a son, Robert John Milliken Napier, who took the name of Milliken, in compliance with the will of his maternal grandfather. He was senior colonel in the army, and commanded at the siege of Mangalore, in the East Indies. He died in 1808, from wounds received in action, at the age of 43.

His only son, Sir William Milliken Napier of Napier and Milliken, baronet, born in 1788, married in 1815, Elizabeth Christian, 5th daughter of John Stirling, Esq. of Kippenross, Perthshire, with issue, 2 sons and 1 daughter. He was served heir male general of Archibald, 3d Lord Napier, March 17, 1817, and succeeded to the baronetcy of Nova Scotia, which had been conferred on the first Lord Napier, March 2, 1627. Sir William died Feb. 4, 1852.

His eldest son, Sir Robert John Milliken Napier of Napier and Milliken, 10th baronet, born Nov. 7, 1818, married, April 4, 1850, issue, 3 sons and 3 daughters. Archibald Lennox, the eldest son, was born Nov. 2, 1855.

The Napiers of Ballikrain, Stirlingshire, were an ancient family. The last in the male line, John Napier, Esq. of Ballikrain, was the 16th of the name and family of Napier who, in succession, possessed the estate. His heiress married Robert Dunmore, Esq., whose second son, John Dunmore Napier, Esq., inherited his mother's lands.

NAPIER, JOHN, of Merchiston, the celebrated inventor of the Logarithms, was born at Merchiston castle, near Edinburgh, in 1550. Local tradition had pointed to Drumbeg, a common thatched farmhouse in the parish of Drymen, Stirlingshire, as his birthplace, when the earl of Buchan, who wrote a biography of him, showed, by an inscription on Napier's portrait, engraved by Cooper from an original painting, that he was born at Merchiston castle. Part, however, of his patrimonial inheritance lay in the parish of Drymen. He was the eldest son of Sir Alexander Napier of Edinbellie and Merchiston, master of the mint to James VI., by his first wife, Janet, only daughter of Sir Francis Bothwell, a lord of session, and sister of Adam, bishop of Orkney. At the time of his birth, his father was only sixteen years old. He was educated at St. Salvator's college, St. Andrews, which he entered, it is stated, in 1562-3. He afterwards, according to Mackenzie, spent several years in France, the Netherlands, and Italy; and on his return to his native country, about 1571, he applied himself closely to the study of mathematics. It is conjectured that he acquired a taste for this branch of learning during his residence abroad, especially in Italy, where at that period there were a considerable number of mathematicians of reputation.

While at college, during his "tender years and bairn age," he contracted an intimate friendship with a Roman Catholic gentleman, whom he styles his "familiar," and frequently defended the Reformers and their doctrines against his attacks. At the same time, he was also an attentive hearer of the sermons of that worthy Englishman, Mr. Christopher Goodman, on the Apocalypse; and his interpretation of its mysteries, as applied to the papists, determined him, to use his own words, "with the assistance of God's Spirit, to employ his study and diligence to search out the remanent mysteries of that holy booke." The fruits of this resolution appeared in his 'Plain Discovery of the whole Revelation of St. John,' published at Edinburgh in 1593; in the dedication of which to the king, he urged his majesty to attend to the enforcement of the laws and the protection of religion, beginning reformation "in his owu house, family, and court." From this work it appears that, amidst his various mathematical speculations, Napier paid some attention also to the cultivation of poetry, for prefixed is a metrical address to Antichrist, and certain versified prophecies out of the Orales of Sybilla are annexed. The same year (1593) he was chosen by the General Assembly one of the commissioners appointed to assemble at Edinburgh to counteract the designs of the Roman Catholics for the overthrow of the Reformed faith, then recently established. In 1596 he published a 'Letter to Anthony Bacon, (brother of Lord Bacon,) entitled Secret Inventions, profitable and necessary in these days for the Defence of this Island, and withstanding Strangers, Enemies to God's Truth and Religion.' His portrait is subjoined.

Napier had for several years directed his inquiries to the discovery of a short and expeditious method of calculation, to facilitate the solution of trigonometrical problems, and at length his efforts were crowned with the most complete success. In 1614 he produced his book of Logarithms, by which the science of astronomy and the arts of practical geometry and navigation have been wonderfully aided and advanced. The work, entitled 'Mirifici Logarithmorum Canonis Descriptio,' was dedicated to Prince Charles, afterwards Charles

I. This important discovery soon made his name known all over Europe, and Kepler dedicated his Ephemerides to the inventor of the Logarithms, considering him the greatest mathematician of his age. In his last work, styled 'Rabdologia, seu Numeratio per Virgulas,' in two books, published in 1617, Napier describes a method of performing the operations of multiplication and division by means of a number of small rods, which continue to be known and used by the name of Napier's Bones. This illustrious mathematician died at Merchiston castle, April 3 or 4, 1617, and was buried in the church of St. Giles at Edinburgh. He was twice married; first in 1571, to Elizabeth, daughter of Sir James Stirling of Keir, by whom he had a son and a daughter; secondly, to Agnes, daughter of James Chisholm of Cromlix, in Perthshire, by whom he had five sons and five daughters. His eldest son, Archibald, was the first Lord Napier of Merchiston.

During a considerable part of the period of his being employed in his calculations he resided at the house of Gartness on the Endrick, in the parish of Drymen, close to a romantic cascade, called the Pot of Gartness. The incessant sound of the cascade, it is said, never annoyed him, while the clattering noise of a mill in the immediate neighbourhood so shattered his thoughts that he was frequently obliged to request the miller to stop its movements. Accustomed frequently to walk out in the evening in his nightgown and cap, and wearing an aspect of deep abstraction, he obtained the reputation among the country people in his vicinity of being a warlock. Hume, in his History of England, says of him, that he was "the person to whom the title of 'Great Man' is more justly due than to any other whom his country ever produced." In his 'Provincial Antiquities,' Sir Walter Scott refers to a curious contract existing in the charter chest of Lord Napier, betwixt Logan of Restalrig, who is said afterwards to have leagued with the earl of Gowrie in his conspiracy against James VI., and the inventor of the Logarithms, dated in July 1594, by which Napier bound himself to go to Berwickshire, and "use all craft and ingine" (genius or ingenuity) to discover a treasure alleged to have been hidden within Logan's house of Fast castle. For his reward he was to have the third of what was found, and to be safely guarded by Logan back to Edinburgh. And in case he should find nothing, he refers the satisfaction of his labour and pains to the discretion of Logan. It has been suspected by Mr. Mark Napier, in his 'Memoirs' of his great namesake, that Logan had another object in view than that expressed in the contract. Napier seems to have sustained some serious injury from the unprincipled laird of Restalrig, as appears from the terms of a lease granted in 1596, by which his tenant is prohibited from subletting his land to any one who should bear the surname of Logan.

NASMYTH, a surname, formerly and properly Naesmyth. The family tradition accounts for the origin and spelling of the name by the following romantic incident. In the reign of Alexander III., the ancestor of the family, being in attendance on the king, was, on the eve of a battle, required by him to repair his armour. Although a man of great stature and power, he was unsuccessful. After the battle, having performed prodigies of valour, he was knighted by the king, with the remark that "although he was nae Smith, he was a brave gentleman." The armorial bearings of the family have reference to this origin of the name, viz., a drawn sword between two war hammers or "martels" broken, with the motto, "Non arte sed Marte," in old Scotch, "Not by knavery but by bravery," (arte and knavery meaning skill, not cunning). Naesmyth of Posso is the head of this ancient family, being descended from the stalwart knight of the legend.

The Naesmyths of Posso, created baronets of Nova Scotia, have held lands in Tweeddale since the 13th century. Their ancestor, Sir Michael Naesmyth, fought in the wars with Bruce. Another Sir Michael Naesmyth was chamberlain to the archbishop of St. Andrews, and obtained, in 1544, in marriage with Elizabeth, daughter of John Baird of Posso, the estate of that name in Peebles-shire. He was a staunch adherent of Queen Mary, and the tower of Posso was frequently inhabited by her on hawking excursions. It was fitted up for her reception by her royal mother, Mary of Guise, from the palace at Leith. The tower was burnt down in the reign of Charles I., and is now a ruin. Sir Michael Naesmyth fought on Queen Mary's side at Langside in the year 1568. He was subsequently banished, and his property confiscated by the regent Moray. He died at an advanced age in 1609. His second son, John, was chief surgeon to James VI., and to the king of France. "John Nesmyth, chirurgian," was by chance riding beside King James, as he was hunting at Falkland on 5th August 1600, the morning of the Gowrie conspiracy catastrophe, when Alexander Ruthven came to his majesty, and was the person sent by the king to bring Ruthven back, after he had spoken with him, to say that he had determined to proceed to the earl of Gowrie's house at Perth, in search of some imaginary treasure, as soon as the chase was ended. He died at London in 1613, and in his last will he bequeathed his "heart to his young maister the prince's grace," meaning Henry, prince of Wales. His son, James Naesmyth of Posso, was falconer to James VI. The royal erie of Posso Craig is on the family estate, and the lure worn by Queen Mary and James, presented to him by the latter, is preserved as an heirloom.

James Naesmyth, sheriff of Peebles-shire, son of the falconer, was a member of the Scottish parliament in 1627. Under his sheriffship the last "weaponshaw" was held for the county of Peebles on the Sheriff's muir. His eldest son, James Naesmyth, an eminent lawyer, was known as "the deil o' Dawick," that is, Dalwick, the family seat. He died in 1706. A younger son of James the Sheriff was a loyal gentleman; having raised a troop of horse, he served under Claverhouse in behalf of the royal cause. The deed signed by Charles II. at Windsor is in the family charter chest. Another Naesmyth (John) fought at the battle of Preston. His claymore, inlaid with gold, bearing on one side, "For God, my Country and King, James the Eighth," and on the other, "Prosperitie to Scotland and Nae Union," is retained in the family.

The lawyer's son, Sir James Naesmyth, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 31st July 1706, with limitation to his heirs male. On his death in 1720, his eldest son, Sir James Naesmyth, M.P., became the second baronet. He distinguished himself by his improvements and plantations on the estate of Dalwick, and is described by Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, as "a gentleman of much scientific acquirement. He was a pupil of Linnæus, and studied under him in Norway. In addition to his own ordinary gardens, he created others for extensive botanical collections, with greenhouses for rare plants; and on these he put the strikingly appropriate motto: 'Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these.'" In 1735 he planted an avenue of silver-firs at Dalwick, most of the trees of which are nearly of equal magnitude. He had travelled into Switzerland and Italy, and was the first who brought over and planted the larch in Scotland, which he did in 1725, some years before the Duke of Athole. He died 4th February 1779. He had two sons. The elder, Sir James Naesmyth, 3d baronet, married in 1785, Eleanor, 2d daughter of John Murray, Esq. of Philiphaugh. When a child, this lady was saved from the flames of Hangingshaw castle, on its accidentally catching fire, by being let down in a basket through a window. Sir James died Dec. 4, 1829.

His only son, Sir John Murray Naesmyth, 4th baronet, born at Dalwick, Dec. 30, 1803, was educated at Rugby, and greatly exceeded his grandfather's example, in improving the beauty of the family seat. He married, 1st, Mary, 4th daughter of Sir John Marjoribanks, 1st baronet of Lees, issue, 5 sons and 1 dr.; 2dly, Hon. Eleanor Powys, daughter of Thomas, 2d Lord Lilford, issue, a son and a dr. The eldest and only surviving son, James, of the Bengal civil service, born Feb. 9, 1827, married Eliza Gordon Brodie, eldest dr. of F. Whitworth Russell, Esq., Bengal civil service, 2d son of Sir Henry Russell, Bart. of Swallowfield, chief justice of India.

NASMYTH, ALEXANDER, a celebrated artist, the father of the Scottish school of landscape painting, was born at Edinburgh in 1757, and received his elementary education in that city. In his youth he went to London, and became the apprenticed pupil of Allan Ramsay, the son of the poet, at that period one of the most esteemed portrait painters of the metropolis. He afterwards repaired to Italy, where he pursued his studies for several years in the society of the best Roman artists of the time. On his return to his native city he commenced practising with great success as a portrait painter; and to his friendship with Burns, the world is indebted for the only authentic portrait which exists of our national bard. The natural bias of Mr. Nasmyth's mind, however, was towards landscape painting; and the pleasure he derived from the execution of some pieces in that branch of art, and the applause with which they were received, induced him almost entirely to abandon portraits, and to devote himself to the painting of landscapes. The distinctive characteristics of his chaste and elegant compositions are well known. His industry was so unceasing, and his name so popular, that his productions found their way into many of the mansion-houses in England and Scotland, besides gracing the walls of more humble domiciles innumerable.

Mr. Nasmyth numbered among his early employers many of the nobility and gentry of Scotland, and as he was frequently invited as a guest to their country seats, his sound judgment and great knowledge of scenic effect enabled him, in many instances, to suggest important improvements for the beautifying and adornment of their pleasure-grounds. His advice in this delightful department of art being eventually much sought after, he was induced to adopt it as a lucrative branch of his profession. And it is not too much to say that to his suggestions and plans, and to the principles he promulgated, much of the beauty of some of the finest park scenery of Scotland is to be attributed. In the improvement of his native city he was at all times of his life much interested; and not a few of the most ingenious and beneficial changes in the street architecture of Edinburgh are to be traced to his invention.

For many years he employed a considerable portion of his time in giving tuition in the principles and practice of his art; and from this source he derived a larger income than any contemporary teacher. He took an active interest in all the institutions established in Edinburgh for the promotion of art. He was one of the few distinguished members of the original Society of Scottish Artists; and one of the first elected associates of the Royal Institution, to whose exhibitions he became a principal contributor; and although his great age, at the period of the union of the artists of that body with the Royal Scottish Academy, prevented his joining their institution, he allowed himself to be named as an honorary member, and ever continued to feel deeply interested in its prosperity. The fineness of his intellect, and the freshness of his fancy, continued unimpaired to the end of his labours. His last work of all was a touching little picture, entitled 'Going Home.' He died at Edinburgh, April 10, 1840, aged 83. Soon after his return from Italy he married the sister of Sir James Foulis of Woodhall, Colinton, by whom he had a large family, who all inherited, in a greater or less degree, their father's skill and genius in the arts. Peter, the eldest son, is the subject of the succeeding notice. George and James, the two youngest of the family, became the leading partners in the firm of Nasmyths, Gaskell, and Company, engineers, Patricroft, near Manchester.

NASMYTH, PETER, a distinguished painter, eldest son of the preceding, was born at Edinburgh, in 1786. He early evinced an extraordinary capacity for art, and a no less ardent inclination to study it in the school of nature. Instead of attending to the lessons of his schoolmaster, the truant boy was frequently found with a pencil in his hand, drawing some old tree, or making out the anatomy of a hedge-flower. Finding it a vain effort to keep him to his books, his parents at last, after many attempts, allowed him to take his own course, and to follow out in his own way the dictates of his powerful genius. On one occasion, when going on a sketching excursion with his father, Peter had the misfortune to injure his right hand; but, nothing disheartened, with his left hand he made some admirable sketches, which are now eagerly sought after by collectors for their truth and fidelity. His ingenuity suggested many contrivances to facilitate the study of nature in the stormy atmosphere of his native mountains. One of these was a travelling tent, which is mentioned as having been more creditable to his enthusiasm than to his mechanical skill. At the age of twenty he proceeded to London, where his wonderful talents were soon appreciated. Possessing a character intensely English, many of his landscapes vie with the works of Ruysdael and Hobbema, who seem to have been his favourite masters. Without being a copyist of their manner, he may be said to have infused their spirit into his works, and he was honourably distinguished by the name of the English Hobbima. So high is the estimation in which his pictures are held, that many of them have sold for more than ten times the sum which the artist received for them.

In his habits he is described as having been peculiar. From the age of 17, in consequence of sleeping in a damp bed, he had been afflicted with total deafness. He died at South Lambeth, near London, August 17, 1831, aged 45.

NEWALL, derived from NEVILLE, or NOEL, the surname of a family of Norman extraction, which came to Scotland about the 16th century, and settled in Galloway.

William Newall of Barskeoch in Kells, and of Earlston in Dalry, in the stewartry of Kirkeudbright, married Jean Boyle Cunningham, eldest daughter of Sir Alexander Cunningham of Corshill, great-grandson of James, earl of Glencairn, and had 5 sons and 2 daughters. The sons were, 1. John. 2. Robert. 3. Charles. 4. William. 5. James.

John, the eldest son, married, 1st, Jean Blair, daughter of — Blair of Dunrod, issue, 5 sons; and 2dly, Agnes, daughter of W. Rorison of Ardoch, and had 2 sons and some daughters. The sons of both marriages all died without issue. The last of them was Colonel Newall Maxwell of Goldielea, he having taken the name of Maxwell from his wife.

James, the youngest son of William Newall of Barskeoch, married his 2d cousin, Agnes Montgomery M'Culloch, daughter of John M'Culloch, Esq., his mother being descended from the Eglinton family. They left one son, Thomas Cuthbert, and three daughters.

The son, Thomas Cuthbert Newall, married Janet Brackenridge, eldest daughter of William Brackenridge, Dowhill, Ayrshire, issue, 6 sons and 3 daughters.

James, the eldest son, succeeded Colonel Newall Maxwell as proprietor of Goldielea, and represents the male line of the Newalls of Barskeoch and Earlston.

NEWARK, Lord, a title in the peerage of Scotland (now extinct) conferred, 31st August, 1661, on the celebrated General David Leslie, a memoir of whom is given in a previous part of this work, (see vol. ii. p. 660,) with limitation to the heirs male of his body. His son, David, second Lord Newark, succeeded his father in 1682, and died 15th May 1694, without surviving male issue, when the title properly became extinct. His eldest daughter, Jean, on his death, assumed the title of Baroness Newark. She married Sir Alexander Anstruther, knight, and on her death, 21st February 1740, her eldest son, William, styled himself Lord Newark. He frequently voted at elections of representative peers in Scotland, without challenge, till 2d January 1771, when the duke of Buccleuch objected, on the ground that he was not the heir male of the body of the first Lord Newark. He was captain of marines, but the corps to which he belonged was reduced in 1749, and in 1755 he got a company of invalids. He died at Edinburgh 3d February 1773. His brother, Alexander, a merchant at Boulogne, also assumed the title of Lord Newark, and voted, as such, at the general election of Scots representative peers in 1774, without challenge; but at that of 1790 the duke of Buccleuch protested against his vote in the same terms as against his brother's. He died 10th March 1791, aged 80. His eldest son, the Hon. John Leslie, assumed the title, but the house of lords having in 1793 decided that the votes given by his father were not good, he was obliged to relinquish it. He was lieutenant-colonel of the 3d regiment of foot, and aide-de-camp to the king. The family is represented, it is said, by Leslie of Wardes and Findrassie, baronet.

NEWBURGH, Earl of, a title conferred in 1660, on Sir James Livingstone, of Kinnaird, baronet, (see vol. ii. p. 677). He had been one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber to King Charles I., who created him Viscount Newburgh, 13th September 1647, to him and the heirs male of his body. On Cromwell's discovering that he corresponded with Charles II. in his exile, his lordship in 1650 escaped into Holland, and repaired to the king at the Hague. He was excepted from pardon by Cromwell's act of grace in 1654. At the Restoration he was appointed captain of the guards, and by patent, dated 31st December 1660, created earl of Newburgh, viscount of Kinnaird, and Baron Livingstone of Flacraig, to him and his heirs whatsoever. He died 26th December 1670. His only son, Charles, second earl of Newburgh, died in 1694, leaving a daughter, Charlotte Maria, countess of Newburgh in her own right. This lady, who possessed the title 61 years, died 4th August 1755. She was twice married; first, to Thomas, eldest son of Hugh, Lord Clifford of Chudleigh, by whom she had two daughters; and, secondly, to the Hon. Charles Radcliffe, third son of Francis, Lord Radcliffe, by Mary Tudor, a daughter of King Charles II., by whom she had three sons and four daughters. Her second husband, Charles Radcliffe, was the brother of the unfortunate earl of Derwentwater, who was beheaded 24th February 1716, for engaging in the rebellion of the previous year. He himself, after being condemned to death for his share in that insurrection, escaped out of Newgate, and took refuge in France, where he married the countess of Newburgh. After the breaking out of the rebellion of 1745, he was taken on board a French privateer, when on her way to Scotland with supplies for Prince Charles, and beheaded on Towerhill, in terms of his former sentence, 8th December 1746. On the death of his nephew, Lord Radcliffe, in December 1731, he had assumed the title of earl of Derwentwater. The Chevalier de St. George wrote a letter of condolence to his widow, under the title of 'Lady Derwentwater,' on her husband's execution, and in her answer she informed "his majesty" that the king of France, on the recommendation of "the prince of Wales and the duke of York," had given her son, "that was Captain in Dillon's," the brevet of colonel, with appointments of 1,800 livres a-year, and to his sisters 150 livres a-year each, "with his royal promise of his protection of the family for ever." The son referred to, James Clement Radcliffe Livingstone, rose to be a general in the French service. By an act of parliament passed in 1749, the forfeited Derwentwater estates were invested for the benefit of Greenwich Hospital, after allotting £30,000 out of the sum derived from the sale of a portion of them for the relief of the children of the said Charles Radcliffe.

James Bartholomew, the eldest son, born at Vincennes in France, 23d April 1725, was the third earl of Newburgh. While Lord Kinnaird, he was captured, with his father, on board the French vessel in 1745. Ten years afterwards, he succeeded his mother, and died at Slindon in Sussex, the property of his wife, the only daughter and heiress of An thony Kemp of Slindon. His son, Anthony James Radcliffe Livingstone, fourth earl of Newburgh, was born in 1767. Having presented a petition to parliament, a bill was passed in 1788, for granting £2,500 yearly to his lordship and the heirs male of his body, payable from the Derwentwater estates, commencing from March 1787. He died Nov. 29, 1814, when the title was assumed by his cousin, Francis Eyre, Esq., son of Mary, wife of Francis Eyre, Esq. of Hassop, Derbyshire, and Walworth castle, Northamptonshire, and eldest daughter of Charlotte Maria, countess of Newburgh by her 2d husband, the Hon. Charles Radcliffe.

Besides the title, this gentleman assumed also the additional double name of Radcliffe-Livingstone. He died Oct. 23, 1827, in his 66th year. His elder son, Thomas, also assumed the title of earl of Newburgh. He married in 1817 Lady Margaret Kennedy, 3d daughter of the earl of Cassillis, created in 1831 marquis of Ailsa, but died, without issue, May 22, 1833. He was succeeded by his brother, Francis, called the 7th earl, who died, unmarried, in 1832. His sister, Mary Dorothea, then assumed the title of countess of Newburgh. She married, July 21, 1836, Colonel Charles Leslie of Balquhain, Aberdeenshire, at one time an officer of the grenadier guards, and knight of the Royal Hanoverian Guelphic order, and died Nov. 22, 1853, without issue.

Immediately after her death, the titles were claimed by Maria Cecilia, Princess Giustiniani, marchioness dowager Bandini, as descended from Lady Anne Clifford, daughter by her first husband, of Charlotte Maria, countess of Newburgh in her own right, daughter of the 2d earl. Lady Anne married at Naples in 1739, Sir James Joseph Mahony, Count Mahoni, a lieutenant-general in Naples. They had one daughter, Cecilia, who married Benedict, 5th Prince Giustiniani, and with 2 daughters had 3 sons; 1. Vincenzo Guiseppe, Prince Giustiniani. 2. The Chevalier Lorenzo Giustiniani. 3. Cardinal James Giustiniani. She married, 2dly, in 1773, Charles, Count Sanseverino, and died in 1793.

The eldest son, Vincenzo Guiseppe, 6th Prince Giustiniani, had one daughter, Maria Cecilia Giustiniani, already mentioned, born in 1796, married, in 1815, Charles, 4th Marquis Bandini of Lanciano and Rustano, in the Roman States, issue, a son, Sigismund Nicholas, and 4 daughters.

The Newburgh earldom in Scotland had by right descended, in 1814, to Vincenzo, 6th Prince Giustiniani, but from his residence in Italy, he did not take proceedings to establish his succession to the peerage of his ancestors, and the assumption of the titles by Francis Eyre Radcliffe-Livingstone, so called 5th earl, was therefore a usurpation. The House of Lords, on July 29, 1858, allowed the claim of Maria Cecilia, Princess Giustiniani, dowager marchioness of Bandini, as heir of the first marriage, and in consequence she became second countess of Newburgh in her own right. Her highness was naturalized by act of parliament in 1857, and resides in the Papal States.

Her son, Sigismund Nicholas, Viscount Kinnaird, born June 30, 1818, succeeded his father in 1850, as 5th marquis of Bandini, and assumed the name of Giustiniani, as the adopted heir of his uncle, the Cardinal Prince Giustiniani. With his mother, he was naturalized by act of parliament in 1857. He married, Sept. 14, 1848, Maria Sophia Angelica, dr. and coheir of Signor Guiseppe-Maria Massini of Rome, issue, 2 sons and 3 drs., all naturalized as British subjects.

NEWHAVEN, Viscount, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred, by patent, dated 17th May, 1681, on Charles Cheyne of Cogenho, descended from an old Northamptonshire family of the name. (For surname of Cheyne, see vol.

i. p. 638.) The principal title was taken from Newhaven, in the county of Edinburgh; the secondary title was Lord Cheyne. Previous to being created a viscount, he had been M.P. for Agmondisham, and as a Scottish peerage, previous to the Union, held by an English subject, stood on the same footing as an Irish one at present, he still possessed in England merely the rank of a commoner, and was eligible to being elected a member of parliament. In 1695, Viscount Newhaven was chosen M.P. for Newport in Cornwall, and died 13th July, 1698, in his 74th year. His only son, William, second Viscount Newhaven, was M.P. first for Buckinghamshire and afterwards for Agmondisham till the Union in 1707, when he became a peer of the realm. In 1712 he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Buckinghamshire, but removed from that office on the accession of George I. in 1714. He died 14th December 1738, in his 82d year, without issue, when the peerage, being to the heirs male of the body of the first viscount, became extinct.

NEWTON, a surname common to both Scotland and England. A family of this name possessed a baronetcy of Nova Scotia, conferred in 1625, among the first of the creation, on Adam Newton, dean of Durham, an accomplished scholar and courtier. Born in Scotland, he was educated in France, where he governed the first class of the college of Saint Maixant, in Poitou, in the reign of Henry III. While in that situation he appears to have conformed to the Popish religion, but on his return to Scotland he professed himself a zealous Protestant. About 1600 he was nominated tutor to Prince Henry, eldest son of James VI., whom he accompanied to England; and, although not in orders, was, by command of the king, installed dean of Durham, September 27, 1606. In 1610 he was appointed secretary to the prince, and after the death of his royal pupil, in 1612, was made treasurer to Prince Charles. In April 1625 he was created a baronet, as Sir Adam Newton of Charlton, in Kent, which manor was conferred on him by grant from the crown. By desire of his majesty, he translated into Latin the work which King James wrote against Conrade Vorstius, and also the first six books of 'Father Paul's History of the Council of Trent;' and he has been much praised for the neatness and perspicuity of his Latin style. In September 1628 he succeeded Fulk Greville, Lord Brooke, as secretary to the Marches of Wales, and died January 13, 1629. By his wife, Dorothy, daughter of Sir Thomas Puckering, lord keeper of the great seal in the time of Queen Elizabeth, he had five daughters and two sons, both of whom successively enjoyed the baronetcy, which became extinct, on the death of the younger, in 1700. They had assumed the name of Puckering.

NICHOL, JOHN PRINGLE, LL.D., an eminent astronomer, the eldest son of a merchant in Brechin, Forfarshire, was born in that town, January 13, 1804. He was educated at Brechin academy, and showed so much talent and energy that his friends were persuaded to send him to college to fit him for the church. He, accordingly studied at King's College, Old Aberdeen, where he gained the highest honours. He was scarcely seventeen years of age when he was appointed schoolmaster of the parish of Dnn, in the neighbourhood of his native town. He was afterwards parish schoolmaster at Hawick, and thereafter at Cupar-Fife. Subsequently he became rector of the academy at Montrose, in which capacity he frequently delivered lectures upon chemistry, geology, electricity, and astronomy, elucidated with such apt experiments and illustrations, as made them extremely popular.

Meanwhile, he had, at intervals, attended the divinity class at college, where he studied for the Established Church of Scotland, and in due time was licensed to preach the gospel. His tastes, however, led him to the pursuits of science, and having been in early life a keen mathematician, he soon abandoned the pulpit, and devoted himself to the more congenial study of astronomy. Without having, in his early years, special advantage or encouragement, he was indebted for the position which he attained in the world of science solely to his own merit and perseverance. While teaching others, he continued an ardent student himself. By his writings and by his lectures, which latter were, in a high degree, popular, fascinating, and instructive, he soon became generally known, and in 1836, when the professorship of practical astronomy in the university of Glasgow became vacant, Lord Melbourne, then prime minister, at once appointed Mr. Nichol to the chair.

From that period he resided in Glasgow, and it was owing mainly to his exertions that the magnificent Observatory in its immediate vicinity was erected. He expended upon it a large amount of his own private means, and there, by the aid of some of the finest instruments in Great Britain, he pursued his favourite studies, and, from time to time, gave to the world the results of his observations in solar regions. He was the first to make the public familiar with that which is called the "Nebular Hypothesis." He delivered frequent courses of lectures on his favourite science to crowded audiences in the City Hall of Glasgow, and also in many of the larger and smaller towns throughout the kingdom; and appeared to take as much delight in explaining the laws that regulate the heavenly bodies to the unpretending mechanic as to the carefully educated student. He died at Rothesay, September 19, 1859. He was twice married, and left a son and a daughter. His works are:

NICHOLSON, the name of a family which possesses a baronetcy of Nova Scotia, conferred, 2d July 1629, on John Nicholson of Nicholson and Lasswade, with remainder to his heirs male generally. Sir James Nicholson, the sixth baronet, dying without issue, Arthur Nicholson, Esq. of Lochend, was served heir-male to the family in 1826, and as such inherited the title as seventh baronet. Sir Arthur Nicholson married Miss Jack, daughter of the very Rev. William Jack, D.D., principal of King's college, Aberdeen. The family seats are Brough Lodge, Fetlar, and Gremista, near Lerwick, Shetland.

NICHOLSON, PETER, an eminent architect, the son of a stone-mason, was born in the parish of Prestonkirk, East Lothian, on 20th July 1765, and received the rudiments of his education at the parish school. When a boy, mathematics formed his principal study, in which he became remarkably proficient. At the age of twelve he was taken from school to assist his father. He had before this employed himself in making drawings and models of the numerous mills in the neighbourhood of his native place, and having expressed a wish to be a cabinetmaker, he served an apprenticeship to it of four years at Linton, the principal village in the parish, and afterwards worked as a journeyman first in Edinburgh and subsequently in London. Having commenced teaching at an evening school in Berwick Street, Soho, he was so successful that he soon abandoned his trade for authorship, and in 1792 published 'The Carpenter's New Guide,' the plates of which were engraved by his own hand. Among subsequent works of his, at this period, were 'The Student's Instructor to the Five Orders,' and 'The Principles of Architecture,' 3 vols. 8vo. The latter work, commenced in numbers in 1795, was not completed till 1799.

In 1800 Mr. Nicholson returned to Scotland, and went to reside in Glasgow. He built a wooden bridge across the Clyde, long since removed. He also designed Carlton Place, Laurieston, and the large and singularly out-of-place Grecian structure which terminates the second quadrangle of the university of that city. Eight years afterwards he removed to Carlisle, having, through the recommendation of his countryman, Thomas Telford, been appointed architect of the county of Cumberland. In this situation he superintended the building of the new court houses in the county town. While at Carlisle he obtained rewards from the Society of Arts for an improvement in handrailing, and for the invention of an instrument called the Centrolinear. In 1810 he returned to London, where he published several professional and other works, a list of which is subjoined to this memoir.

In 1827 he commenced the publication of a work entitled 'The School of Architecture and Engineering,' which he designed to complete in twelve numbers at 1s. 6d. each, but in consequence of the bankruptcy of the publishers, only five numbers appeared. In 1829 he removed to Morpeth, and in 1832 to Newcastle on Tyne, where he opened a school in the Arcade. Here he was elected president and honorary member of several societies connected with architecture, civil engineering, and the fine arts. Having, in his old age, fallen into pecuniary difficulties, a general subscription was, in 1835, set agoing by his friends in Newcastle to purchase an annuity for him, but as only £320 was subscribed, a petition was presented from the inhabitants of that town to his majesty, for a grant for a pension to him from the privy purse, in which his writings are thus referred to:—"The works of Peter Nicholson, while they have contributed to the advancement of knowledge, have tended to raise the English mechanic to that pre-eminence he has attained over the other artificers of Europe; and while they have been honoured with the proudest marks of distinction by the various learned societies of this kingdom, have yet failed to produce to their author those benefits which are necessary for his existence; and it must ever be a source of regret that an individual who, having devoted his best energies to the advancement of science, should be left at the close of a long and laborious life, and in his 73d year, to struggle in penny and want." Mr. Nicholson returned to Carlisle in October 1841, and died there June 18, 1844, in his 79th year. He was twice married, and had two sons and a daughter. His elder son, Michael Angelo Nicholson, author of 'The Carpenter and Joiner's Companion,' died in 1842.

NICOLL, ALEXANDER, D.C.L., an eminent oriental scholar, was the youngest son of John Nicoll, Monymusk, Aberdeenshire, where he was born, April 3, 1793. His parents belonged to the Scottish Episcopal communion, in the principles of which he was strictly educated. He received the first rudiments of learning at a private seminary; and, after being for some time at the parish school, he was sent in 1805 to the grammar school of Aberdeen. Having soon after obtained a small bursary, he attended the classes of Latin and Greek at the Marischal college of that city; and, at the close of his first session at college, he gained the prize of the silver pen, bestowed on the best Greek scholar in the first class. In 1806 he entered the class of mathematics, then taught by Dr. Hamilton, the celebrated writer on finance, and also attended the prelections of Professor Beattie in natural and civil history.

In 1807 he went to Oxford, having been informed that there was a vacancy at Baliol college, in one of the exhibitions on Snell's foundation. He carried with him a letter of recommendation from Bishop Skinner of Aberdeen to Dr. Parsons, the Master of the college, and was at once elected to the vacant exhibition. For the next four years he prosecuted his studies with great diligence and success, and in 1811 obtained the degree of B.A. In 1813 he turned his attention to the oriental languages, and of these soon acquired an extensive knowledge, on account of which he was appointed one of the sub-librarians of the Bodleian library, with the salary of about £200 a-year. In 1817 he received deacon's orders, and became curate of one of the churches in Oxford.

He now applied himself to cataloguing the oriental manuscripts in the Bodleian, a very arduous task, when it is considered that these amounted to about thirty thousand. After preparing and publishing a catalogue of the MSS. brought from the east by Dr. E. D. Clarke, he set himself to complete the unfinished general catalogue of the eastern MSS., which had been begun about a hundred years before by Uri, the celebrated Hungarian. His first fasciculus of this great work made his name known throughout Europe. He had made himself master of so many of the modern languages, that it was commonly said of him that he could walk to the great wall of China without requiring an interpreter.

In June 1822, on the promotion of Dr. Richard Lawrence to the archbishopric of Cashel, Nicoll was, without solicitation on his part, appointed regius professor of Hebrew in the university of Oxford, to which chair was attached the canonry of Christ church. In the letter in which the earl of Liverpool, then prime minister, announced the appointment, he said, that it had been conferred by his majesty on account of his high reputation as an oriental scholar and the value attached to his labours. His income was now about £2,000. He soon after took the degree of doctor of civil law. He died of bronchitis, September 24, 1828, in the 36th year of his age. He was twice married: first to a Danish lady, who died in 1825; secondly, to Sophia, daughter of the Rev. J. Parsons, editor of the Oxford Septuagint, who wrote a Memoir of Dr. Nicoll, prefixed to a posthumous volume of his Sermons. By his second wife he had three daughters, who survived him.

NICOLL, ROBERT, one of the most precocious poets that has appeared in Scotland, was born January 7, 1814, at a farm-house at Little Tullybeltane, in the parish of Auchtergaven, Perthshire. He was the second son in a family of nine children. His father, at the time of his birth, was tenant of a small farm in Auchtergaven, but having become security, to the amount of five or six hundred pounds, for a connexion by marriage, who failed and absconded, the utter ruin of his own family was the consequence; he gave up his whole property to his creditors, and engaged himself as a day-labourer on the fields he had formerly rented. Robert received the little education he ever got at the parish school, and at an early age he was sent to a neighbouring farmer, who employed him to tend cattle, or assist in rural operations, during the summer months, while he continued to attend the parish school in winter. His propensity for reading early showed itself. In going to, or returning from school, or when herding upon his own "Ordie braes," he was never without a book, and his friends bestowed upon him the familiar nickname of 'the minister.' When he was about thirteen he first began to write, and at the same time became a correspondent of one of the Perth papers.

When he was eighteen years of age he left his home, "by the bonnie Ordie's side," and became an apprentice to a grocer in the High Street of Perth. Being employed in the shop from seven in the morning until nine in the evening, it was chiefly during the night that he wrote and studied. During his stay in Perth, and when no more than nineteen years of age, he wrote his prose tale, entitled 'Il Zingaro,' his first production of any length, which was published in Johnstone's Edinburgh Magazine. It is the story of an ardent youth, who, smitten with love for a beautiful girl, became a water-carrier in an Italian city, and who, by enduring privations, and exerting wonderful energy, gets to be the pupil of an eminent painter, and in course of time, becomes himself eminent, and finally obtains the hand and affections of the object of his love.

On the expiry of his apprenticeship, Nicoll went to Dundee, and opened a small circulating library, with something less than £20, which he had borrowed for the purpose. In 1835, he published a thin volume, entitled 'Poems and Lyrics,' which was largely subscribed for by his friends in his own rank of life. It received from the periodicals of the day a degree of praise seldom bestowed upon the work of so young a man; for he was then only twenty-one years of age. The most elaborate notice of the volume appeared in Tait's Magazine, in which a high estimate is given of his poetical powers.

Having no capital to carry on his business, he received into partnership a young tradesman, possessed of some money, and also started a local periodical, which did not succeed. He soon after retired from the business, making it over entirely to his partner. On his leaving Dundee, Mr. William Tait, the then publisher and proprietor of Tait's Magazine, offered him temporary employment on that periodical, and through Mr. Tait's exertions, he was appointed, in the summer of 1836, editor of The Leeds Times. About the end of the same year he married Miss Alice Souter, of Dundee.

At the time of his entering on this journal, its circulation was only a thousand, but before he left the paper, it had increased to nearly four times that amount, a fact which shows the characteristic force and vigour of his mind, and the untiring perseverance with which he followed out every undertaking in which his heart was engaged. Besides the duties of his own paper, he also wrote leaders for a Sheffield print, but the exhausting nature of newspaper work soon began to tell fatally on his constitution. It was his close application to his duties which first undermined his health, and brought on rapid consumption. At the conclusion of a general election, when Leeds was contested by Sir William Molesworth and

Sir John Beckett, Nicoll, who had devoted his whole energies to the interest of the former, was seized with a severe illness, and at the urgent request of his friends in Edinburgh, he resigned his situation and returned to Scotland, in the hope that his native air would, in some measure, aid in restoring him. He was received into the house of Mr. and Mrs. Johnstone, at Laverock Bank, near Leith, and every means which the best medical skill could suggest was tried for his benefit, but in vain. His case having been represented to Sir William Molesworth, by a literary friend in Edinburgh, that gentleman immediately placed fifty pounds in his hands for the dying poet's service. He breathed his last, December 9, 1837, aged only 24, and his remains were interred in North Leith churchyard.

In private life, Mr. Nicoll was universally respected. His talents were of a very high order, and his writings are full of promise. As he said himself, he had "written his heart in his poems." Above the middle size, his figure was slender, his features pleasing, and he had a pair of large dark eyes which Mary Howitt declared to be the finest she had ever seen. He was styled by Ebenezer Elliot "Scotland's second Burns." His disposition was frank, social, and kindly; his feelings warm and generous, and his friendships lasting. A complete edition of his poems, which are mostly in the Scottish language, with a memoir of his life, by his steady and affectionate friend, Mrs. Johnstone, authoress of 'Clan Albyn,' 'Elizabeth de Bruce,' &c., was published by Mr. Tait in 1842. It contains upwards of 140 pieces, all of them of merit, and many of them showing undoubted proofs of genius, which was fast maturing when he was called away. His love songs are remarkable for purity, tenderness, and beauty, and his lighter pieces are marked by a spirit and humour entirely his own.

NICOLSON, a family of this name, styled of Carnock and Tillicoultry, possesses a baronetcy of Nova Scotia, conferred, 16th January 1637, on Thomas Nicolson of Carnock, Stirlingshire, with remainder to his heirs male generally. He died 8th January 1646. His great-grandson, Sir Thomas Nicolson, fourth baronet, inherited in 1683, the barony of Napier, and was fourth Lord Napier, (see p. 239 of this volume). Dying, unmarried, in 1686, in his 18th year, the barony of Napier reverted to his maternal aunt, the estate of Carnock vested in his sisters, and the baronetcy devolved on his cousin and heir male, Sir Thomas Nicolson of Tilliecultray, Clackmannanshire, who became 5th baronet. The latter sold that estate in 1693, and retired to Holland. On the death of his grandson, Sir David, 8th baronet, without issue, at Breda, Oct. 19, 1808, the baronetcy devolved on his kinsman, Major-general Sir William Nicolson, 9th baronet, born in Scotland in 1759. He died in 1820, and was succeeded by his son, Sir Frederick William Erskine Nicolson, captain R.N., born April 22, 1815. The latter married, 1st, only dr. of James Loch, Esq., M.P., issue, 2 sons and a dr.; and 2dly, only dr. of Robert Cullington, Esq., issue, a son and a dr.

NIDDRIE, a surname, meaning king's champion, derived from two Gaelic words, Niadh, champion, and Ri or Rioch, king, and denoting that it was once the place of his residence. Niddy-Marshall, in the parish of Liberton, Mid Lothian, was so called from the Wauchopes, who, in ancient times, were guardians of part of the south borders of Scotland, (see WAUCHOPE, surname of,) and to distinguish it from Longniddy in East Lothian, and Niddy Seton, Linlithgowshire.

NIMMO, ALEXANDER, F.R.S.E., M.R.I.A., an eminent civil engineer, was born at Kirkcaldy, in Fifeshire, in 1783. His father was originally a watchmaker, but latterly kept a hardware shop. From the Grammar school of his native town, Alexander was sent for two years to the college of St. Andrews, and finally completed his education at the university of Edinburgh. He was an excellent Greek and Latin scholar, and the bent of his mind was early directed towards the higher branches of mathematics and algebra. At the age of nineteen he was appointed rector of the Inverness academy by the unanimous vote of the proprietors, after a severe competition with other candidates, during an examination which lasted three days. Whilst in this situation he was, at the recommendation of Mr. Telford, first employed in a public capacity by the parliamentary commissioners for fixing and determining the boundaries of the Scottish counties; and his services in this undertaking, which were performed during the vacations, gave great satisfaction to his employers. His report on the occasion, which is of considerable length, is one of the most interesting documents of the kind ever published. Soon after he was again recommended by Mr. Telford to the commissioners for reclaiming the bogs of Ireland. In this situation he became well acquainted with the habits and wants of the Irish peasantry; and his reports and maps of the Irish bogs were in the highest degree creditable to him.

After completing the bog surveys, Mr. Nimmo visited France, Germany, and Holland, and personally inspected the great public works of those nations. On his return he was employed in the construction of Dunmore harbour—a work of immense magnitude and utility, on a shore much exposed to the roll of the Atlantic, and where the depth of water at the extremity of the pier exceeds that of the Plymouth breakwater. He was also engaged by the Fishery Board in making surveys of the harbours of Ireland, and constructing harbours and piers; and by the Ballast Board to make a chart of the whole coast, which was executed with great skill and accuracy. Besides these labours he compiled a book of sailing directions of St. George's Channel and the Irish coast.

During the great distress of 1822, he was appointed engineer to the western district of Ireland; and, between that year and 1830, he caused, by the improvement of land and the formation of what may be termed new settlements, an increase of revenue in that district to the amount of not less than £106,000 per annum. Mr. Nimmo's engagements, in extent and variety, were surprisingly great. Upwards of thirty piers or harbours on the Irish coast were built under his direction; also Perth Cawl in South Wales. He designed the Wellesley bridge and docks at Limerick; and in his latter years, was engaged in Lancashire, projecting a railway from Liverpool to Leeds, and also the Manchester, Bolton, and Bury railway. He was consulting engineer to the duchy of Lancaster, the Mersey and Irwell navigation, the St. Helen's and Runcorn Gap railway, the Preston and Wigan railway, and the Birkenhead and Chester railway. In addition to his classical and mathematical attainments, he was well versed in modern languages, particularly French, German, Dutch, and Italian. He was also thoroughly acquainted with practical astronomy, chemistry, and geology. To the latter science, in particular, he was much attached, and wrote an excellent paper, showing how it might become available in navigation, which was published in the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy, of which he was a member. He was likewise a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh. Mr. Nimmo was the author of the article on Inland Navigation in Dr. Brewster's Encyclopædia; also, in conjunction with Mr. Telford, of that on Bridges, and, with Mr. Peter Nicholson, of that on Carpentry. Besides these, he wrote several papers for various periodicals. His evidence on the trial between the Corporation of Liverpool and the Mersey Company is highly interesting to engineers and practical mathematicians. On this occasion he was cross-examined by Mr. afterwards Lord Brougham, and he was undoubtedly the only engineer of the age who could at all have competed with the learned counsel's knowledge of the higher mathematics and natural philosophy, on which the whole subject in dispute depended. Mr. Nimmo died at Dublin, January 20, 1832, aged 49.

NISBET, or NESBIT, a local surname derived from lands in the shire of Berwick. These lands, says Nisbet, (System of Heraldry, vol. i. p. 313,) "were of an ancient denomination, for, in the donation of King Edgar, the son of Malcolm Canmore, in whose reign surnames came first to be hereditary, to the monks of Dunfermling, to pray for the soul of his father and for the health of his own, amongst other lands he gives these of Nisbet, at least the patronage of the church called East Nisbet (of late Elmbank), and the teinds of Nisbet (afterwards called West Nisbet), where the castle of Nisbet stood, memorable in our histories for the fatal overthrow the English gave, by the assistance of the then rebel earl of March, to the flower of the youth of the Lothians." The lands of Nisbet are in the parish of Edrom. East Nisbet, at one time called Allaubank, is now known by the name of Bighouse.

Philip de Nesbyth is a witness to one of the charters of David I. to the monks of Coldingham. Willielmus de Nesbyth is a witness in a charter granted to the monks of Durham in the reign of Malcolm IV., David's successor, by Earl Patriek, one of the progenitors of the earls of March and Dunbar. Thomas Nisbet was prior of the monastery of Coldingham from 1219 to 1240. On 18th June 1221, he attested the dower-charter of Alexander II., at York, granting to his queen, Johanna, the baronies of Jedburgh and Lessudden (Rymer's Fadera, vol. i. p. 252). Philip de Nesbit is mentioned in the bond of submission given by the barons of Scotland to Edward I. of England, in 1296. James and John Nisbet also appear there, and in the Ragman Roll is the name of Adam Nisbet, supposed to be the ancestor of Nisbet of Nisbet. A charter was granted by Robert the Bruce to Adam Nisbet of that ilk of the lands of Knoeklies. In the reign of David II. this or another Adam Nisbet of Nisbet distinguished himself on the southern borders. He was succeeded by Philip Nisbet of that ilk.

The chief line continued to flourish until the civil wars in the reign of Charles I. Among those who were conspicuous for their loyalty to that unfortunate monarch was Sir Alexander Nisbet of Nisbet, who, during the peaceable part of his reign, was sheriff principal of Berwickshire. He strenuously opposed the Covenanters, but he and his five sons were at last forced to leave Scotland and join the king's army in England. The eldest son, Philip, was on his travels on the continent when the civil wars broke out. Hastening home, he offered his services to the king, who knighted him, and made him colonel of a regiment. He was lieutenant-governor of Newark-upon-Trent, when besieged by the Covenanters. Afterwards returning to Scotland, he became one of the officers of the marquis of Montrose, with whom he continued till the battle of Philiphaugh, where he was taken prisoner. He was beheaded at Glasgow, 28th October 1646, with Alexander Ogilvie, eldest son of Sir John Ogilvie of Innerquharity, a youth scarce twenty years of age. Two of Sir Philip's brothers, Alexander and Robert, both captains, were killed in the field, fighting under Montrose. Adam, his youngest brother, was the father of Alexander Nisbet, the celebrated antiquarian and heraldic writer, the last male representative in the direct line of Nisbet of Nisbet. His mother, Janet Aikenhead, was the granddaughter of David Aikenhead, lord provost of Edinburgh.

Alexander Nisbet, the heraldist, was born at Edinburgh in 1672. He was educated for the law, but devoted his time almost exclusively to the study of antiquities. His first work, published at Edinburgh in 1702, was entitled 'Heraldic Essay on Additional Figures and Marks of Cadency; shewing the Ancient and Modern Practice of differencing Descendants.' In 1718 he produced 'An Essay on the Ancient and Modern use of Armories;' and the same year appeared a work of a different description, being his collection of the 'Decisions of the Court of Session from 1655 to 1687; with his Law Doubts. His principal work, the 'System of Heraldry, Speculative and Practical, with the true Art of Blazon, with Cuts,' which is considered the best treatise on that subject in the English language, was published at Edinburgh, in two vols. folio, in 1722-42. A second edition appeared in 1804, price five guineas, and another in 1816. He also wrote a vindication of Scottish Antiquities, which remains in manuscript in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh. He died at Dirleton, in 1725, aged 56.

Several families, most of which are now extinct, branched off, at various periods, from the chief stock; such as, the Nisbets of Paxton; the Nisbets of Spittle; the Nisbets of Swinewood, Berwickshire; the Nisbets of Dalzell, Lanarkshire; the Nisbets of Carplin, in the same county; the Nisbets of Johnstone, Renfrewshire; the Nisbets of Dean, baronets; the Nisbets of Craigtannies, and the Nisbets of Dirleton, Haddingtonshire. The three last came of three sons of Henry Nisbet, merchant and lord provost of Edinburgh, in the reign of James VI., descended from Nisbet of that ilk. The Nisbets of Dalzell continued from the 14th century to the reign of Charles II. It came into the family by the marriage of a son of the laird of West Nisbet to the younger daughter and co-heiress of the laird of Dalzell, and he "and his successors, for distinguishing him from the laird, was commonly called the baron of Dalzell, and did possess the one half of the barony in right of that marriage," until the first earl of Carnwath, when Lord Dalzell (see vol. i. p. 593) purchased it from him. (Hamilton's Description of the Shires of Lanark and Renfrew, p. 45.) From them descended the Nisbets, eminent citizens of Glasgow.

The first of the Nisbets of Dirleton was the celebrated lawyer, Sir John Nisbet, Lord Dirleton. His father, Sir Patrick Nisbet of Eastbank, was the third son of James Nisbet, merchant in Edinburgh, a brother of the above-mentioned Henry Nisbet, by his wife, Margaret Craig, sister of Thomas Craig of Riccarton. He was admitted a lord of session, 1st November 1636, when he took the title of Lord Eastbank, and was knighted by the marquis of Hamilton as royal commissioner 14th November 1638. He was superseded in 1641.

Sir John Nisbet, his son, admitted advocate 20th November 1633, was in 1639 sheriff-depute of the county of Edinburgh. He was afterwards appointed one of the commissaries of Edinburgh. He purchased the lands of Dirleton in 1663, and was appointed lord-advocate and admitted a lord of session, 14th October, 1664. As lord-advocate he was very severe on the unfortunate Presbyterians, who were prosecuted at the instigation of the prelates, and as an instance of the zeal with which he persecuted them, Wodrow (vol. i. p. 293) relates that one Robert Gray having, when brought before the council, refused to tell the hiding-places of certain proscribed individuals of that party, Sir John Nisbet took a ring from the man's finger, and sent it with a messenger of his own to Mrs. Gray, with an intimation that her husband had told all he knew as to the whigs, and that the ring was sent to her as a token that she might do the same. The poor woman, in consequence, revealed the places of concealment, which so affected her husband that he died in a few days thereafter. Lord Dirleton resigned his offices in 1677, and was the last who held the office of lord-advocate with a seat on the bench. He was succeeded as lord-advocate by Sir George Mackenzie, a still more bitter persecutor, and died in April 1687, aged about 78. Bishop Burnet, (History, vol. i. p. 484), describes him as a man of great learning, chiefly in the Greek, and adds, "he was a person of great integrity, only he loved money too much." Forbes says that "at the burning of his house, Lord Dirleton lost a curious Greek manuscript, written with his own hand, for recovery whereof he offered £1,000 sterling."

Lord Dirleton's Law Doubts, methodized by Sir William Hamilton of Whitelaw, and his Decisions from 7th December 1665 to 26th June 1677, were published in 1698.

The Dirleton family ended in an heiress, Mrs. Hamilton Nisbet Ferguson of Raith, previously countess of Elgin, the daughter of William Hamilton Nisbet of Dirleton, the last proprietor in the male line. Mrs. Hamilton Nisbet Ferguson died in 1853, when R. A. Christopher, formerly Dundas, of Bloxholm Hall, Lincolnshire, became possessed of Dirleton, and for the second time changed his name to Hamilton Nisbet. (See vol. ii. pp. 95, 128, and 197.)

A branch of the Dirleton family, designated of Woodhill, settled in county Donegal, Ireland. Another Irish family of the name, the Nisbets of Derrycairne, county Leitrim, are descended from Captain James Nisbet, who went from Berwickshire to Ireland, about 1640, and engaged in the wars between King Charles I. and the Irish insurgents.

A family of the name of Nisbet, which settled in Ayrshire, was distinguished in the religious history of Scotland. One of the most eminent martyrs of the Covenant was John Nisbet of Hardhill, in the parish of Loudoun, in that county. Born about 1627, he was a lineal descendant of Murdoch Nisbet of Hardhill, one of those who, about 1500, were styled the Lollards of Kyle. He spent his youth in military service on the Continent, but returning to Scotland in 1650, he was present at the coronation of Charles II. at Scone, and swore the Covenants at the same time that that profligate monarch subscribed them. He soon after married, and went to reside at Hardhill. He was a man of a bold, decided, and straightforward character, and a fine specimen of the Covenanters of his class. In 1664 he incurred the displeasure of the Episcopalian incumbent of his parish, for having had a child baptized by one of the ejected ministers; and in consequence of his attachment to Presbyterianism, he was much exposed to the persecutions of those tyrannical times. In 1666 he joined in renewing the Covenant at Lanark, and in the engagement at Pentland Hills, November 28, he behaved with great courage and resolution, and was so severely wounded that he was left for dead among the slain. On his recovery he returned home, but was not allowed to remain long in peace, and again taking up arms, he distinguished himself at Drumclog and Bothwell Brig, where he had the rank of captain. After the defeat and dispersion of the Covenanters, he was denounced a rebel, and a reward of three hundred merks was offered for his apprehension. Lieutenant Nisbet, a cousin of his own, with a party of Colonel Buchan's dragoons, surprised him and three others in a house called Midland, in the parish of Fenwick, upon a Sabbath morning, in the month of November 1685. His companions were killed upon the spot, but Nisbet was preserved for the sake of the reward. He was carried first to Ayr, and then to Edinburgh, where he was examined before the privy council, and finally condemned to be hanged. He behaved with much consistent firmness both during his confinement and at his trial, and he met his death with the utmost fortitude. His execution took place at Edinburgh, December 4, 1685. By his wife, Margaret Law, he had several children, but only three sons survived him, namely, Hugh, James, and Alexander. The second of these was author of the 'Private Life of the Persecuted, or Memoirs of the first years of one of the Scottish Covenanters,' published from the original MS., at Edinburgh, in 1827.

The first president of Dickinson college, Pennsylvania, United States, was Charles Nisbet, D.D., born at Haddington in 1736, and educated at Edinburgh. After being for some years minister of Montrose, in 1783, when Dickinson college was instituted, he was invited to become its president, and in 1785 he went to America. He held the appointment till his death, January 17, 1804. He is described as having been an admirable classical scholar, and particularly conversant with Greek. His memory was so retentive that at one period of his life he could repeat the whole of the Æneid and also the whole of Young's Night Thoughts.

NITHSDALE, Earl of, a title (attainted) in the peerage of Scotland, conferred by patent dated at Farnham, Aug. 29, 1620, on Robert, ninth Lord Maxwell, (see page 128 of this volume,) with precedence from 29th October 1581, the date of his father's charter of the earldom of Morton; the title being changed from earl of Morton to earl of Nithsdale. At the meeting of the Estates at Edinburgh 25th July 1621, he was chosen one of the lords of the articles. It was in this parliament that the five articles of Perth were ratified, and Lord Nithsdale was one of the noblemen who voted for them. In May 1623, he was one of the members of the council appointed by the king to sit twice a-week to hear grievances, but this commission, says Calderwood, "took no effect." In 1625, he was named by King Charles I. commissioner for obtaining an unconditional surrender of the tithes, but was deterred by the violent opposition of the proprietors from carrying out his instructions. He joined the marquis of Montrose, with his son, Lord Maxwell, in support of the king, in 1644, for which they were excommunicated by the General Assembly. His lordship died at Edinburgh in May 1646. His only son, Robert, second earl, was taken prisoner at the capture of Newcastle by the Scots Covenanters, when he retired from the contest, and was restored by act of parliament, 3d February 1647, against his father's forfeiture. He died, unmarried, in October 1667. He was commonly styled the Philosopher. At his death his titles and estates devolved on John, 7th Lord Herries. (See vol. ii. p. 475.)

John, third earl of Nithsdale, had also, when Lord Herries, joined the marquis of Montrose, for which he was also excommunicated. His son, Robert, fourth earl of Nithsdale, died in March 1695. By his countess, Lady Lucy Douglas, he had a son, William, fifth earl, and a daughter, Lady Mary Maxwell, countess of Traquair.

William, fifth earl of Nithsdale, engaged in the rebellion of 1715, and was taken prisoner at Preston in Lancashire, 14th November of that year. Sent to the Tower of London, he was tried by his peers in January 1716, for high treason, and pleading guilty, was sentenced to be beheaded, with the earl of Derwentwater and Viscount Kenmore, 24th February 1716. The countess of Nithsdale and Lady Nairne, whose husband had also been condemned, surprised the king, as he was passing through his apartments at St. James', and throwing themselves at his feet, implored his mercy in behalf of their husbands, but he turned away from them with contemptuous indifference. The courage and resolution of his countess, Lady Winifred Herbert, daughter of William, marquis of Powys, effected what the king refused to bestow, his escape from an ignominious death. On the evening of the 23d, he succeeded in getting out of the Tower, dressed in female attire, provided by his countess and some other ladies who had paid him a farewell visit. When the king heard of his escape next morning, he observed that "it was the best thing a man in his condition could have done." A circumstantial narrative of his escape, written by the countess, and published in the Transactions of the Society of Antiquaries in Scotland, vol. i., has been often quoted. He had disposed of his estate to his son, Lord Maxwell, 28th November 1712, reserving his own liferent. It was finally determined by the house of lords, 21st January 1723, that only this liferent was forfeited. His honours were attained, and he died at Rome, 20th March 1744. He had a son and a daughter, Anne, the wife of Lord Bellew, an Irish nobleman.

The only son, John Lord Maxwell, on his father's death, came into possession of the family estates, and assumed the title of earl of Nithsdale. Under the act abolishing heritable jurisdictions in 1747 he got £523 4s. 1d. for the regality of Terregles and bailliary and regality of Lincluden. He died at London, Aug. 4, 1776. He had married his cousin, Lady Catherine Stewart, 4th daughter of Charles, 4th earl of Traquair; issue, 2 daughters, Mary, who died in her 15th year, and Winifred, styled Lady Winifred Maxwell, who died July 13, 1801, in her 66th year. She married William Haggerston Constable of Everingham, 2d son of Sir Caruaby Haggerston of Haggerston, bishopric of Durham, bart., and had 3 sons and a daughter. Her eldest son, Marmaduke William Constable Maxwell, succeeded to his mother's estates: and in 1858 the title of Lord Herries was restored, by act of parliament, to this gentleman, the direct descendant of the family on the mother's side. (see page 472 of this vol.)

The title of earl of Nithsdale, which was restricted to heirs male, is claimed by William Maxwell, Esq. of Caruehan, descended from James Maxwell of Brakenside, 2d son of John, 6th Lord Herries. He has been twice married, without issue.

NORTHESK, Earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1647 on Sir John Carnegie, (see vol. i. p. 593,) brother of David, first earl of Southesk, (see SOUTHESK, Earl of). Sir John Carnegie, second son of David Carnegie of Panbride, obtained from his father the lands of Aithie, Cuiekstoun, &c., Forfarshire, of which he had a charter 1st March 1596. He was first styled of Aithie, and was created a peer, by the title of Lord Lour, by patent, dated at York, 20th April 1639, to him and his heirs male, and advanced to the dignity of earl of Ethie, Lord Lour and Egglismadie, by patent, dated 1st November 1647, to him and his heirs male for ever. He was fined £6,000 sterling by Cromwell's act of grace and pardon in 1654. On 15th December 1658, he was served heir of conquest of Robert Carnegie of Dunnichen, his immediate younger brother, in Caraldstone and other lands in Forfarshire, with the office of dempster in parliaments, justice courts and circuit courts, of the sheriffdom of Forfar. In 1662 his lordship got his titles changed to earl of Northesk and Lord Rosehill. He died 18th January 1667, aged about 88. He was twice married, and by his first wife, Magdalen, daughter of Sir James Halyburton of Pitcur, he had two sons and four daughters. Lady Jean, the youngest daughter, married to William Graham of Claverhouse, was the mother of the celebrated Viscount Dundee.

David, the elder son, second earl of Northesk, died 12th December 1677. He had five sons and two daughters. David, the eldest son, third earl of Northesk, died in October 1688. His son, David, fourth earl, was by Queen Anne constituted high sheriff of Forfarshire, and sworn a privy councillor in 1702. He was also appointed one of the commissioners of the chamberlain's court and a lord of police. He supported the treaty of Union in parliament, and in 1708 he was chosen one of the sixteen Scots representative peers, and was twice afterwards reelected. He died in 1729.

His son, David, fifth earl, died unmarried at Ethie, 24th June 1741, and was succeeded by his brother George, sixth earl, an officer in the royal navy. He attained the rank of captain, 25th August 1741, and commanded the Preston of 50 guns in the fleet under Sir John Norris in January 1744. While on a voyage to the East Indies, with Commodore Burnet, they fell in with and captured in the straits of Banca, on 25th January 1745, three very valuable French East Indiamen from Canton to Europe. He commanded the Oxford of 66 guns in 1755, and the following year was promoted to a flag. He rose by seniority to the rank of admiral of the white, and died at Ethie, 22d January 1792, being then the third flag officer in the service. He married Lady Anne Leslie, eldest daughter of Alexander, earl of Leven and Melville, and had by her four sons and three daughters. David, Lord Rosehill, the eldest son, an ensign in the 25th foot, in 1767 quitted the army and went to America. He died at Rouen in Normandy, 19th February 1788, aged 39.

William, seventh earl of Northesk, a distinguished naval commander, the second son, was born in 1788. At the age of eleven he entered the navy, his first ship being the Albion. He afterwards served in the Southampton frigate with Captain Macbride, at the time he conveyed the queen of Denmark to Zell; and in the Squirrel, with Captain Stair Douglas. He then obtained an acting appointment as lieutenant of the Nonsuch, and, in 1777, was confirmed by Lord Howe in the Apollo. He afterwards served under Sir John Lockhart Ross, in the Royal George, at the capture of the Caracra fleet off Cape Finisterre, and of the Spanish squadron under Don Juan de Langara, and at the relief of Gibraltar; then in the West Indies with Lord Rodney, who promoted him from the flagship, after the celebrated action of April 17, 1780, to be commander of the Blast fireship. He was subsequently removed into the St. Eustatia, and was present with her at the reduction of the island of that name, February 3, 1781. He obtained post rank, April 7, 1782, and at the ensuing peace returned to England in the enterprise frigate. In 1788 his eldest brother died, when he succeeded to the title of Lord Rosehill. In 1790, on the equipment of the fleet in consequence of the dispute with Spain relative to Nootka Sound, he was appointed to command the Heroine frigate, but was soon after paid off.

On the death of his father, in January 1792, he became earl of Northesk, and in January 1793, proceeded to the West Indies in command of the Beaulieu frigate. He returned in the Andromeda in December, and was soon after placed on half-pay. In 1796 he was appointed to the Monmouth, 64, and joined the North Sea fleet under the command of Lord Duncan. In May 1797 the mutiny, which had commenced in the Channel fleet, extended to the ships employed in the North Sea, and the Monmouth was brought by her refractory crew to the Nore. On the first symptoms appearing of the men's return to duty, the mutineers on board the Sandwich sent for Lord Northesk, to endeavour to effect a reconciliation with the government. On reaching the Sandwich, his lordship was ushered into the cabin, where Richard Parker, as president, and about sixty seamen, acting as delegates from the several ships, were sitting in close deliberation. Parker requested him, as "the seamen's friend," to proceed to the king, with a declaration of the terms on which they were willing to give up the ships. His lordship consented, but told them he had no expectation of success. He immediately hastened to London, but, of course, the terms, from the unreasonableness of the demands, were at once rejected. Lord Northesk afterwards resigned the Monmouth, and remained unemployed till 1800, when he was appointed to the Prince, of 98 guns, in the Channel fleet, in which ship he continued till the peace in 1802. On the renewal of the war in 1803, he was appointed to the Britannia of 100 guns. In May 1804 he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral, and, in the following month, hoisted his flag in the Britannia, and served in the arduous blockade of Brest till August 1805, when he was detached with a squadron, under the orders of Sir Robert Calder, to reinforce Vice-admiral Collingwood off Cadiz. At the battle of Trafalgar, he was third in command, and maintained his well-earned reputation by a display of the most undaunted valour. In his ship the Britannia, he broke through the enemy's line astern of their fourteenth ship, and pouring in on each side a most tremendous and destructive fire, he continued engaging frequently on both sides, and with two or three at a time, with very little intermission for five hours, when all resistance ceased. For his eminent services, on this occasion, he was, on January 29, 1806, honoured with the insignia of the order of the Bath. He also received the thanks of both houses of parliament, the freedom of the city of London, and of the Goldsmiths' Company, with a sword of the value of one hundred guineas from the city of London, an admiral's medal from his majesty to be worn round the neck, and a vase of the value of £300, from the Patriotic Fund at Lloyd's. In April 1808 he became a vice-admiral, and, June 4, 1814, an admiral. In November 21, 1821, he was appointed rear-admiral of Great Britain, and on May 27, commander-in-chief at Plymouth, where he remained till 1830. He died May 28, 1831. His lordship married Mary, only daughter of William Ricketts of Longwood in Hampshire, by Mary Jervis, eldest sister of the first earl of St. Vincent, and had by her four sons and five daughters. George, Lord Rosehill, the eldest son, was lost in his 16th year, on board his majesty's ship, 'The Blenheim,' in which he was a midshipman, 2d February 1807, when that ship foundered in the East Indies.

The second son, William Hopctoun, eighth earl, born 16th October 1794, married 4th February 1843, Georgiana Maria, eldest daughter of Rear-admiral the Hon. George Elliot, with issue a son, George John, Lord Rosehill, born 1st December 1843, and a daughter, Lady Margaret Maria Adelia Carnegie.

In the early part of 1853, the countess of Northesk published a compilation, entitled 'The Sheltering Vine,' a selection of passages of holy writ, and of extracts from fathers of the English church, 'with a view to present comfort and consolation to persons laid low, either bodily or spiritually, by afflicting providences.'

The title of Viscount St. Vincent in the peerage of Great Britain is in remainder to the male issue of the seventh earl's countess, after her brothers and their heirs male.

O

OCHILTREE, Lord Stewart of, a title (dormant) in the peerage of Scotland, the first possessor of which was Andrew Stewart, third Lord Avandale, (see vol. i. p. 170,) who, having exchanged his lordship of Avandale, with Sir James Hamilton of Fyuart, for the barony of Ochiltree in Ayrshire, the regent Arran, with consent of the Estates, ordained him to be called Lord Stewart of Ochiltree, 15th March, 1543. He died in 1548. By his wife, Lady Margaret Hamilton, only child by his first wife, of James, first earl of Arran, he had a son, Andrew, second Lord Ochiltree, commonly called the good Lord Ochiltree, the father-in-law of John Knox. He was one of the lords of the congregation, and a principal actor in all the transactions and negotiations with the queen regent, Mary of Guise, in 1559-60, and afterwards in all the proceedings of the Reformers in the reign of Queen Mary. When Knox was called before the queen, Lord Ochiltree accompanied him to the palace of Holyrood. He opposed the queen's marriage with Lord Darnley, and declared openly that he would never consent that any of the popish faction should be king of Scotland. After "the Chase-about Raid," in which he was actively engaged, he took refuge in England, with the Lord James Stewart, afterwards the regent Moray, and the others. At the battle of Langside, where he fought against Queen Mary, he was wounded by the Lord Herries. He had five sons and two daughters.

His eldest son, Andrew, master of Ochiltree, died before 10th September 1578, leaving two sons and six daughters. His lordship's second son, Captain James Stewart of Bothwellmuir, was the unworthy favourite of James VI., the usurper of the titles and estates of the earl of Arran, and lord-high-chancellor of Scotland, (see vol. i. p. 160). The third son, Sir James Stewart of Monkton, was killed in Blackfriars-wynd, Edinburgh, 30th January 1588, by Francis, earl of Bothwell.

Andrew, the elder of the two sons of the master of Ochiltree, succeeded his grandfather as third Lord Ochiltree. He was a gentleman of the bedchamber to James VI., general of the ordnance, governor of Edinburgh castle, and a privy councillor. He sold the lordship of Ochiltree to his cousin, Sir James Stewart of Killeith, eldest son of the usurping earl of Arran, and resigned his title in his favour in 1615. Andrew Stewart, formerly Lord Ochiltree, was created Lord Castle Stuart, in the peerage of Ireland, by patent, dated 7th November 1619. He died in 1632, leaving three sons, the youngest of whom, the Hon. Colonel Robert Stewart, carried on the line of succession.

Sir James Stewart of Killeith, fourth Lord Ochiltree, having, in 1631, from the hereditary enmity which he bore to the house of Hamilton, brought a charge of treason against the marquis of Hamilton, alleging that with the troops raised by him for the service of Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, in aid of the elector-palatine, he intended to assert his right to the Scottish crown, was tried for leasing-making, found guilty, and sentenced to imprisonment for life in the castle of Blackness. He remained there for more than twenty years, and was released in 1652 by the English, after the battle of Worcester. He died in 1659. He was twice married. By his first wife, Margaret, daughter of Uchtrede Macdowall of Garthland, he had a son, who predeceased him, leaving a son, William, fifth Lord Ochiltree, a young nobleman of great promise, who died in his 16th year, while attending the university of Edinburgh, 12th February 1675. By his second wife, Mary Livingston, the fourth Lord Ochiltree had a son and three daughters. The title of Lord Ochiltree has been dormant since 1675.

Andrew Thomas Stewart of Stewart Hall, county Tyrone, the great-great-grandson of the Hon. Colonel Robert Stewart above mentioned, at the election of a Scots representative peer, 26th October 1768, appeared and answered to the title of Lord Ochiltree, but the clerks refusing to receive his vote, he took a protest against them. In 1774 he presented to the lord-lieutenant of Ireland a petition claiming the title of Lord Castle Stuart, which had been dormant since 1684. It was referred to the Irish house of peers, and their lordships, on 24th May 1774, declared that he had fully proved his right to the same. He voted as Lord Ochiltree at the election of Scots peers, 24th July 1790, but it was decided in a committee of privileges of the house of lords, 16th April 1793, that he had not made out his right. He was created Viscount Stuart in 1793, and earl of Castle Stuart, 29th December 1800, and died 20th August 1809, leaving issue. This family have adopted the spelling of Stuart, as being a branch of the royal house of that name, descended from the regent duke of Albany. The possessor of the title of earl of Castle Stuart is also a baronet of Nova Scotia, of date 1637.

OCHTERLONY, a Forfarshire surname. From the Ochterlonies of Kelly in that county, already mentioned, (see ARCHERLONY, vol. i. p. 169), sprung the Ochterlonies of Kintrockat, and the Ochterlonies of Pitforthly, in Ayrshire. To the Kintrockat branch belonged Major-general Ochterlony of the Russian service, who fell at the battle of Inkerman, 5th November 1854. He was lineally descended from Prince Rupert, and was a grandson of John Ochterlony of Montrose, whose son, the general's father, settled in Russia in 1794. General Ochterlony's great-grandfather, Robert Ochterlony, Esq. of Kintrockat, married Anna, daughter of Robert Young, Esq. of Anldbar, (see YOUNG, surname of).

Of the Pitforthly branch, was Major-general Sir David Ochterlony, G.C.B. of the East India Company's service, who greatly distinguished himself in the Nepaulese war, for which he received the thanks of both houses of parliament, and in 1816 was created a baronet of the United Kingdom. He was the grandson of Alexander Ochterlony, Esq. of Pitforthly, and was born at Boston, New England, Feb. 12, 1758. Being unmarried, he obtained a second patent of his baronetcy Dec. 8, 1823, with remainder to Charles Metcalfe Ochterlony, only son of Roderick Ochterlony, Esq. of Delhi. Sir David died July 15, 1825, when Sir Charles Metcalfe Ochterlony, born Dec. 21, 1817, became 2d bart.; married, in 1844, Miss Sarah Tribe of Liverpool; issue, 3 sons and 2 daughters.

OGILBY, JOHN, a miscellaneous writer, born at or near Edinburgh, in November 1600, removed in his youth with his parents to London. His father, a gentleman of a respectable family, having spent his patrimony, was thrown into the King's Bench prison for debt, and his son became apprentice to a dancing-master. In the saltatory art he showed so much proficiency that the pupils subscribed sufficient money for him to buy up his indentures, and begin business as a teacher of dancing on his own account. While officiating at a masque given by the duke of Buckingham, by a false step he unfortunately sprained his ankle, and was thereby rendered lame for life. In 1633, when the unfortunate earl of Strafford went to Ireland as lord deputy, Ogilby accompanied him as teacher of dancing to his children. He also acted occasionally as his lordship's amanuensis, and became one of the earl's troop of guards. Having composed poetical versions of some of Æsop's Fables, and a humorous piece, entitled 'The Character of a trooper,' the earl made him deputy-master of the revels. He now erected a little theatre in Dublin, where he exhibited dramatic entertainments, but in the rebellion of 1641 he lost all his property. He quitted that country about 1646, but was shipwrecked on his passage to England, and reached London in a most destitute condition.

Soon after he proceeded on foot to Cambridge, where he was patronised by many of the scholars, and having devoted his attention to classical studies, he became a complete master of the Latin language. In 1649 he published a translation of the works of Virgil, and in 1651 'The Fables of Æsop, paraphrased in verse.' At the age of 54 he learnt Greek, and removing to London, in 1660 he published a magnificent version of Homer's Iliad, dedicated to Charles II., with engravings by Hollar and other artists, and annotations by Shirley. The same year he published at Cambridge, with the assistance of Dr. John Wortlington, and other learned men, a superb edition of the 'English Bible,' embellished with illustrative maps and engravings. A copy of this work was presented to the king, and another to the house of commons, and from the latter he received a gratuity of £50.

On the coronation of Charles II. in 1661, Ogilby was employed to supply the poetical part of the pageantry, including the speeches, emblems, mottoes, and inscriptions. He accordingly wrote 'The Relation of his Majesty's Entertainment passing through the City of London to his Coronation,' &c., in ten sheets folio. This work, afterwards, by his majesty's command, published in a large folio volume on royal paper, with five engravings, is said to have been found useful in succeeding coronations.

In 1662 Ogilby obtained the patent of master of the revels in Ireland, when he again went to Dublin, and built a larger theatre than his former one. Soon after he returned to England, and in 1665 published a second volume of Translations from Æsop, with some fables of his own. The same year he produced a translation of the Odyssey, with notes and embellishments.

Though Ogilby's poetry was of inferior merit, he contrived to get rid of his different works as they were published, by means of a lottery, by which he acquired large sums of money. In the great fire of London, his house in Whitefriars, with all that it contained, was burnt to the ground. Besides his whole stock of published works, there perished in the flames three unpublished poems of his own, two of them heroic poems, entitled 'The Ephesian Matron' and 'The Roman Slave,' and the third an epic, in twelve books, styled 'The Carolics,' in honour of Charles I. He immediately set about reprinting all his former publications, and revived his lottery scheme, whereby he obtained money to the amount of £4,210, which enabled him to set up a printing office. By his interest at court he received the appointment of cosmographer and geographic printer to the king, and in this capacity he projected a General Atlas of the World, of which several parts were published. He also produced several minor works, illustrative of the topography of England, and issued several Maps of London. Ogilby died September 4, 1676.

Survey of the Roads of England. Lond. 1675, 1698, folio.
Explanation of the large Map of London, by T. Ogilby and
W. Morgan. 1677, 4to.

An Actual Survey of the principal Roads of England and Wales, improved by J. Senex. Lond. 1717, 8vo.

OGILVY, a surname derived from a barony in the parish of Glammis, Forfarshire, which, about 1163, was bestowed by William the Lion on Gilbert, ancestor of the noble family of Airlie, and, in consequence, he assumed the name of Ogilvy, (see vol. i. p. 31, article AIRLIE, earl of). He was the third son of Gillibred, maormor of Angus, or, as some say, of Gilchrist (Gille Chrìosda, the servant of Christ), maormor of Angus. In the charters of the second and third Alexanders there are witnesses of the name of Ogilvy. Sir Patrick de Ogilvy adhered steadily to Robert the Bruce, who bestowed upon him the lands of Kettins in Forfarshire. The barony of Cortachy was acquired by the family in 1369-70. For notices of this family see AIR-LIE, (vol. i. pp. 31, 32). The "gracious gude Lord Ogilvy," as he is styled in the old ballad of the Battle of Harlaw, in which battle the principal barons of Forfarshire fought on the side of the earl of Mar, who commanded the royal army, was the son of Sir Walter Ogilvy of Auchterhouse, slain in a clan battle with the Robertsons in 1394.

"Of the best among them was

The gracious gude Lord Ogilvy,
The sheriff-principal of Angus,
Renownit for truth and equity—
For faith and magnanimity
He had few fellows in the field,
Yet fell by fatal destiny,
For he nae ways wad grant to yield."

His eldest son, George Ogilvy, was also slain.

OGILVY, Lord, the first title of the Airlie family, conferred by James IV., in 1491, on Sir John Ogilvy of Lintrathen.
The sixth Lord Ogilvy of Airlie was dangerously wounded in an encounter on the High street of Edinburgh, with Sir John Gordon, third son of the earl of Huntly, on 27th June 1562, (see vol. ii. p. 520). For his faithful adherence to Queen Mary, Lord Ogilvy suffered a long imprisonment. In 1596 he was ambassador from King James VI. to the Danish King, Christian IV.

The title of Lord Ogilvy of Deskford was conferred, 4th October 1616, on Sir Walter Ogilvy of Deskford and Find-later, whose son, James, second Lord Deskford, was created earl of Findlater, 20th February 1638, (see vol. ii. p. 214).
He was descended from Sir Walter Ogilvy of Auchleven, second son of Sir Walter Ogilvy of Lintrathen, high treasurer of Scotland.

The Clan Ogilvy are called "the Siol Gilchrist," the race or posterity of Gilchrist. In 1526, the Macintoshes invaded the country of the Ogilvies, and massacred no fewer than 24 gentlemen of the name. A feud between the Campbells and the Ogilvies subsisted for several centuries.
In Pitcairn's Criminal Trials we find James Ogilvy complaining, on 21st October, 1591, that a body of Argyle's men had attacked him when residing peaceably in Glenisla, in Forfarshire, which anciently belonged to the Ogilvies, killed several of his people, ravaged the country, and compelled him and his lady to flee for their lives. When, in 1640, the marquis of Argyle, in the absence of the earl of Airlie, who had gone to England, to avoid subscribing the Covenants, destroyed the castles of Airlie and Forthour, (see vol. i. p. 32.) he is said to have treated the Lady Ogilvy, who then resided in the latter, with great cruelty, refusing to let her remain, to be confined, she being then in a state of pregnancy, or to permit her grandmother, his own kinswoman, Lady Drimmie, to admit her into her house of Kelly.

The house of Craig, in Glenisla, belonging to Sir John Ogilvy of Craig, cousin of the earl of Airlie, was also destroyed by his orders. He had sent Sergeant Campbell, one of his elan, to Craig, with directions to demolish it, but on his arrival there the sergeant found only a sick gentlewoman and some servants in the house, and having more humanity than his chief, he returned to the marquis and reported that it was a place of no strength, and not worth demolishing. Argyle, in a rage, told him it was his duty to obey the orders given to him, and commanded him to go back and deface and spoil the house, which he did. The Ogilvies had their revenge in 1645, for the burning of "the bonnie house of Airlie," and the other strongholds of the Ogilvies, when Castle Campbell, near Dollar, or the Castle of Gloom, its original name, was destroyed by them and the Macleans, and the territory of the marquis of Argyle was overrun by the fierce and ruthless clans that followed Montrose, and carried fire and sword throughout the whole estates of the clan Campbell.

The family of Inverquharity are descended from Sir John Ogilvy, third son of Walter Ogilvy of Auchterhouse, above mentioned. From his elder brother, Sir Walter Ogilvy, he obtained the lands of Inverquharity in Forfarshire, by charter dated 3d June 1420. Under Alexander Ogilvy of Inver-quharity, a sanguinary battle took place between the clan Ogilvy and the Lindsays, at Arbroath, on 13th January 1445-6, when 500 of the Ogilvies were slain. Alexander Ogilvy himself, severely wounded, was taken prisoner, and died, soon after, in the castle of Finhaven, to which he had been removed. For the details, and the cause of the feud between these powerful families, see vol. i. of this work, pp.
708 and 709.

Sir John Ogilvy of Inverquharity was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 26th September 1625, with remainder to his heirs male generally. The family, like the whole clan Ogilvy, were distinguished by their unflinching attachment to the cause of Charles I. and the house of Stuart, and Sir John's second son, Alexander, a youth of extraordinary promise, was taken prisoner at Philiphaugh, fighting under Montrose, and executed at Glasgow in 1646.

Sir John's eldest son, Sir David, second baronet, married in 1662, Margaret, daughter of Sir John Erskine of Dun, and had four sons and three daughters. Captain Ogilvy, a son of Sir David, was with King James at the battle of the Boyne, and is said to have been the author of the Jacobite song,

"It was a' for our rightful king
We left fair Scotland's strand."

He was one of the hundred gentlemen who volunteered to attend their royal master in exile, and fell in an engagement on the Rhine.

Sir David's eldest son, Sir John, third baronet, was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir John, fourth baronet, who was twice married: 1st, in 1720, to Helen, daughter of Sir Lawrence Mercer of Aldie; and, 2dly, to Anne, daughter of James Carnegie, Esq. of Finhaven, and had issue by both marriages. His eldest son, Sir John, fifth baronet, married in 1754, Charlotte, daughter of Dr. Walter Tulliedelph of Tulliedelph, Forfarshire, and died in 1802. Sir John's eldest son, Sir William, 6th baronet, and his 2d son, Sir John, 7th baronet, both died unmarried, when the 3d son, Sir William, became 8th baronet, an admiral in the royal navy, who died in 1823, leaving 8 sons and 1 daughter. Sir John, 9th baronet, the eldest son, born at Edinburgh, March 17, 1803, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford, was an officer in the guards; twice married, with issue, by the first marriage a son and daughter, and by the 2d, 2 sons and 4 daughters.

The family of Ogilvy of Carnousie, Banffshire, possess a baronetcy, conferred in 1626. Its representative, Sir William Ogilvie of Boyne, born in 1810, succeeded his father, Sir William Ogilvie of Carnousie, in 1824. He was educated at Westminster, and the Military college, Edinburgh, and was at one time in the army. He married in 1838, Augusta Porter, youngest daughter of James Grange, Esq., formerly of Her Majesty's Treasury. He claimed the dormant titles of Baron Bauff and Earl of Findlater, in the peerage of Scotland. He died at Christchurch, New Zealand, Feb. 20, 1861.

The family of Ogilvy of Barras, Kincardineshire, also possessed a baronetcy, conferred in 1661. The first baronet was Sir George Ogilvy, lieutenant-governor of the castle of Dunnottar, in Cromwell's time, he being so created for his exertions in the preservation of the regality of Scotland during the siege, in 1652, of that celebrated stronghold by the English parliamentary forces under General Lambert. Ogilvy did not surrender till the siege had been converted into a blockade, when he was reduced by famine and a consequent mutiny in the garrison. He had previously, however, removed the regalia, by a stratagem, on account of which he was long imprisoned in England, (see vol. ii. p. 611, article KINTONIE, earl of). In 1660 the regalia was by him presented to Charles II., and for this good service, with his long imprisonment and loss of property, he received no farther reward than the title of a baronet of Nova Scotia and a new coat of arms. The family of Barras had in their possession a receipt granted by the earl Marischal on the delivery of the regalia. Sir William Ogilvy of Barras, the 7th baronet, succeeded his father in 1837.

OGILVIE, JOHN, D.D., a poet of considerable genius, was the son of the Rev. Mr. Ogilvie, one of the ministers of Aberdeen, where he was born, about 1733. He was educated at the Marischal college, which afterwards honoured him with the degree of doctor in divinity. Having been duly licensed for the Church, he was appointed, in 1759, minister of Midmar, Aberdeenshire, where he continued till his death, in 1814. His life was devoted to literary pursuits, and the faithful discharge of his pastoral duties; and his personal history was only varied by the publication of his numerous works, and an occasional visit to London, where he became acquainted with Dr. Johnson, by whom he was much esteemed. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, Edinburgh. Scarcely one of Dr. Ogilvie's works is known to the general reader, even by name, at the present day. "The truth is," says the writer of his memoir, in the Lives of Eminent Scotsmen, "Ogilvie, with powers far above the common order, did not know how to use them with effect. He was an able man lost. His intellectual wealth and industry were wasted in huge and unhappy speculations. Of all his books, there is not one which, as a whole, can be expected to please the general reader. Noble sentiments, brilliant conceptions, and poetic graces, may be culled in profusion from the mass; but there is no one production in which they so predominate, if we except some of his minor pieces, as to induce it to be selected for a happier fate than the rest. Had the same talent which Ogilvie threw away on a number of objects been concentrated on one, and that one chosen with judgment and taste, he might have rivalled in popularity the most renowned of his contemporaries."

His works are :

OLIPHANT, a surname originally Olifard. The first in Scotland of this name was David de Olifard, who accompanied David I. from Winchester in 1141. A branch of the Olifards settled in Kincardineshire. Under Malcolm IV., Osbert Olifard was sheriff of Mearns, and his only daughter married Hugo de Aberbothenoth, ancestor of the viscounts Arbuthnott, (see vol. i. p. 143).

OLIPHANT, Lord, a title (dormant) in the Scottish peerage, conferred before 1458, on Sir Lawrence Oliphant, descended from the above-named David de Olifard, who, at the siege of Winchester castle in 1141, being then a soldier in the army of King Stephen, rescued his godfather, King David I. of Scotland, holding that stronghold for his niece, the empress Maud, and having concealed him from his pursuers, conveyed him in safety to his own dominions, (see vol. ii. p. 24). He was rewarded with grants of land in Roxburghshire, and with the office of justiciary of Lothian, being the first who held that office in Scotland of whom any account appears. His eldest son, David Olifard, was also justiciary of Lothian. He had four other sons. Walter, the second son, was one of the hostages for William the Lion, on his release in 1174. The second David Olifard witnessed a charter of that monarch respecting the woods and wastes belonging to the priory of Coldingham. His son, Sir Walter Olifard, was justiciary of Lothian for more than twenty years under Alexander II., and one of the most frequent witnesses of that king's charters. He was present at the marriage of Alexander with the princess Joan, sister of Henry III. of England, 18th June 1221. He gave to the monks of Coldingham the right of exacting yearly from the church of Smallholm two marks and a-half of silver. He died in 1242. His grandson, Sir William Oliphant, was one of the most distinguished actors in the struggle for Scottish independence in the days of Wallace and Bruce. Although, like many other patriotic barons, forced to submit to Edward I. in 1297, he took the earliest opportunity of throwing off his allegiance to that grasping monarch and of opposing his ambitious schemes against his native country. In 1300 he defended Stirling castle for three months, when Edward besieged it, but at length was obliged to capitulate. In 1303 the Scottish leaders compelled the English to surrender that important fortress, when Sir William Oliphant was again appointed its governor, and under him it was the only fortress in Scotland which defied King Edward's power. The castle was stormed by the English, and after an offer of capitulation had been refused, it surrendered at discretion, 20th July 1304. Edward sent the brave garrison to different prisons in England, and the governor, Sir William Oliphant, to the Tower of London. He was detained in captivity till the 24th May 1308, when he was set at liberty by Edward II. He was one of the subscribers of the famous letter to the Pope in 1320, asserting the independence of Scotland. He died 5th February 1329. His son, Sir Walter Oliphant of Aberdalgy, married the princess Elizabeth, youngest daughter of Robert the Bruce, as appears by a charter of David II., erecting the lands of Gask, in Perthshire, into a free barony, dated 11th January 1364. His grandson, Sir John Oliphant, was knighted by Robert II., and died about 1420. His son, Sir William, was one of the hostages for James I. Sir William's son, Sir John Oliphant of Aberdalgy, married Isabel, daughter of Walter Ogilvy of Auchterhouse, and was slain in the encounter between the Ogilvies and the Lindsay's at Arbroath in January 1446. (See vol. i. p. 709.)

The son of Sir John, Sir Laurence Oliphant of Aberdalgy, was the first Lord Oliphant. In his youth, he accompanied the earl of Douglas to France, and afterwards travelled into Italy. He was created a peer by James II., but the precise date is not known. It was, however, before October 1458. He was a noble of great influence and power, and on two or three occasions was sent as ambassador to treat of peace with England. In the first parliament of James IV., 6th October 1488, he was chosen one of the lords of the articles for the barons. He was also sworn a privy councillor, and constituted justiciary within his own bounds, and those of Strathbrand, in 1490. He obtained bonds of manrent from 13

gentlemen in his neighbourhood, a list of whom is given by Crawford (Peerage, p. 379). He died about 1500. He had three sons. 1. John, second Lord Oliphant. 2. William, who married Christian, only daughter and heiress of Alexander Sutherland of Duffins, in Moray, Strabroek in West Lothian, and Berriedale in Caithness, in consequence of which he took the designation of William Oliphant of Berriedale. His lady also inherited a fourth part of the earldom of Caithness, to which she was coheir. From them descended the Oliphants of Gask. Their son, Andrew Oliphant, having no male issue, in 1520 resigned his estates in Caithness to his kinsman and chief, Lord Oliphant, on condition that his lordship should provide suitable matches and tochers for his three daughters. Two of them were accordingly married to cousins of their own, namely, Margaret, to Walter Oliphant of Newton, and Catherine to Andrew Oliphant of Binzian. The third son of the first Lord Oliphant was George Oliphant of Bachelton.

John, second Lord Oliphant, the eldest son, was one of the peers who ratified in parliament the settlements on Margaret, queen of James IV., 13th May 1504. He had two sons, Colin, master of Oliphant, and Laurence, abbot of Inchaffray, both slain on the fatal field of Flodden. The master left a son, Laurence, third Lord Oliphant, who succeeded his grandfather in 1516. He was one of the noblemen taken prisoner at the rout of Solway in November 1542, when his annual revenue was estimated at 100 marks sterling. At first he was ordered to remain with Sir Thomas Lee, an English knight, but was allowed to be ransomed for 800 marks sterling, 1st July 1543. He died 26th March 1566. Besides four daughters, he had three sons. The latter were, 1. Laurence, fourth Lord Oliphant. 2. Peter, ancestor of the Oliphants of Langton. He got from his father the lands of Turing and Drimmie, part of the dowry lands given by King Robert I., with his daughter, Lady Elizabeth Bruce, to Walter Oliphant. 3. William, mentioned in a remission, dated 5th May 1576, to himself and two others of the name, for being art and part in the slaughter of one James Ross, committed in September 1571.

James, fourth Lord Oliphant, joined the association in behalf of Queen Mary at Hamilton, 8th May, 1568, and always continued true to her cause. He died in Caithness, 16th January 1593. With three daughters, he had two sons, Laurence, master of Oliphant, and John Oliphant of Newland. The former married Christian, second daughter of William Douglas of Locheleven, second earl of Morton. In a chance pursuit of Lord Ruthven, with whose family the Oliphants were at feud, Alexander Stuart, of the house of Traquair, a kinsman of Ruthven, was slain by a follower of the master of Oliphant. This happened in October 1580. Lord Ruthven prosecuted the master at law for the same, and in March 1582, the latter went to the lodgings at Edinburgh, of his lordship, who was then earl of Gowrie, at nine o'clock one night, without his sword or any other weapon, and offered himself in his will. In August of the same year, the master was one of the persons engaged in the Raid of Ruthven. In March 1584 he was charged with his brother-in-law, Mr. Robert Douglas, to quit the realm, and on their passage to the continent they were drowned. They "were never seen again," says Calderwood, "they, nor shippe, nor mie belonging therunto. The maner is uncerteine; but the most common report was that being invaded by Hollanders or Flusingers, and fighting valiantlie, sune one of the principall of their number, in revenge whereof they were all sunke; or, as others report, after they had rendered (surrendered) they were hanged upon the mast of the shippe. They were two youths of great expectation." (Hist. of Kirk of Scotland, vol. iv. p. 46.)

His son, Laurence, fifth Lord Oliphant, born 24th March, 1583, succeeded his grandfather ten years afterwards. He dissipated most of the extensive estates of the family. By his wife, Lillias Drummond, eldest daughter of James, fourth Lord Maderty, he had a daughter, Anne, married to Sir James Douglas of Mordington, brother of the marquis of Douglas. With the view of preserving the peerage in the male line, his lordship resigned his honours and estates in favour of Patrick Oliphant, his cousin-german and heir male; but this settlement not having been ratified by the crown, Anne Oliphant, his daughter, claimed both, by action before the court of session. The case was decided 11th July 1633, in presence of Charles I. It was found that the deed by which Lord Oliphant had disposed of his honours barred the succession of his daughter, while it did not vest the peerage in the heir male, and the dignity was declared to be at the disposal of the king. In consequence of this decision Charles created the heir male Lord Oliphant, with the former precedence, by a new patent, dated 17th July 1633, and at the same time raised Sir James Douglas, husband of Anne Oliphant, to the peerage, by the title of Lord Mordington, (see p. 206 of this volume.) with the precedence of Lord Oliphant.

Patrick, sixth Lord Oliphant, the heir male, on whom the king thus conferred the title, was the son of John Oliphant of Newland, second son of Laurence, fourth Lord Oliphant, and previously had the designation of master of Oliphant. He was twice married: first, to Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Patrick Cheyne of Esslemont, by whom he had a daughter, Lillias, wife of Sir Laurence Oliphant of Gask; and, secondly, to Mary, daughter of James Crichton of Frendraught, and had by her three sons, Charles, William, and Francis, who all succeeded to the title.

Charles, seventh Lord Oliphant, took the oaths and his seat in parliament, 12th October, 1706, and opposed the treaty of Union. His son, Patrick, eighth Lord Oliphant, died without issue, in 1721, when the title devolved on his uncle, William, ninth lord, a colonel in the army, who also died without issue. His brother, Francis, tenth lord, voted at the elections of Scots peers down to 1747. On his death, 19th April 1748, William, son of Charles Oliphant of Langton, one of the clerks of session, assumed the title, and voted at an election in 1750, since when no one has voted as Lord Oliphant at the elections of Scots peers. He died 3d June, 1751, acknowledging Laurence Oliphant of Gask to be heir to his peerage. That gentleman, however, having, with his eldest son, been attainted for engaging in the rebellion of 1745, did not assume the title. John Oliphant of Bachilton, who died in March 1781, was styled Lord Oliphant. His posthumous daughter, Janet Oliphant of Bachilton, was the wife of the eighth Lord Elibank, and their children, in consequence, adopted the name of Oliphant-Murray as their family name. (See vol. ii. p. 131.)

The Oliphants of Gask were descended from William Oliphant of Newton in Perthshire, 2d son of Colin, master of Oliphant, slain at Flodden. They were devoted Jacobites. The paternal grandfather of Carolina Oliphant, (Lady Nairne the poetess, see p. 236 of this volume,) had attended Prince Charles Edward as aide-de-camp during his disastrous campaign of 1745-6, and his wife had cut off a lock of his hair on the occasion of his accepting the hospitality of the family mansion. The portion of hair is preserved at Gask; and Lady Nairne has alluded to the circumstance in her song of 'The Auld House.' The estate of Gask escaped forfeiture, but the father of Lady Nairne, Laurence Oliphant of Gask, did not renounce his Jacobite sentiments. He named his daughter, Carolina, in honour of Prince Charles; and would not permit the names of the reigning monarch and his queen to be mentioned in his presence, nor allow them to be designated otherwise than by the initial letters, "K. and Q."

In 1755, Laurence Oliphant of Gask married his cousin, Margaret, daughter of Duncan Robertson of Strowan, by the daughter of Lord Nairne. On the death of her brother, the aged chief of Strowan, his grand-nephew of Gask became heir of line of the family. Mr. Oliphant died Jan. 1, 1792. His grandson, James Blair Oliphant of Gask, succeeded, on the death of his elder brother, unmarried, Dec. 31, 1824, and was the 13th in descent from the first lord, and 23d from David de Olifard, the first of the name in Scotland.

Mr. Oliphant of Gask was, Aug. 18, 1839, served heir male of Francis, 10th Lord Oliphant, also heir of the body of William Oliphant of Newton, brother of Laurence, 3d Lord Oliphant. He was also heir general to the last acknowledged Lord Oliphant, and to the principal branch of the family. He married in 1840, Henrietta Græme, only surviving daughter of Margaret Anne Græme, daughter of William Grahame of Orchill by James Gillespie-Grahame, Esq. Mr. Blair Oliphant died in 1847.

Laurence Oliphant of Condie and Newton, Perthshire, descended from Laurence Oliphant, first of Condie, grandson of William Oliphant of Newton, by his wife, the heiress of Berriedale, succeeded to the estate in 1806. The eldest son of Ebenezer Oliphant of Condie and Newton, by Mary, 3d daughter of Sir William Stirling, baronet, of Ardoch, he was born in 1791, and has been thrice married. His son and heir, by his 3d wife, Marianne, eldest daughter of Stuart Oliphant, Esq. of Rossie, named Laurence-James, was born in 1846. The estate of Condie was purchased by this family in 1601.

ORKNEY, IARL, or earl of, a very ancient title held under the Norse kings. When Harald Harfager, or the fair-haired, one of the chiefs of Norway, subdued the Orkney islands in 876, he conferred the government of them on Ronald or Rognovald, count of Merca, father of Rollo, the famous invader of Norway, and the great-great-grandfather of William the Conqueror. Ronald ceded the government of the Orkneys to his brother, Sigurd. A long line of Scandinavian iarls succeeded, who all affected the style of independent princes. About the year 1325, the male line of the ancient iarls failed in the person of Magnus V., who married the countess of Caithness, and his daughter, Isabella, having become the wife of Malise, earl of Strathern, her husband, in her right, possessed also the earldoms of Caithness and Orkney. One of their daughters, Isabella, married Sir William Sinclair of Roslin, and her son, Henry, obtained the earldom of Orkney, in 1379, from the Norse king, Haco IV.

His son, Henry, second earl, was admiral of Scotland, and chief attendant on Prince James, afterwards James I., when he was captured by the English at sea in 1405, on his voyage to France. The earl of Orkney was sent to the Tower of London, and his brothers were permitted to visit him in August of the same year. In the following month he was allowed to return to Scotland, his brothers apparently remaining as hostages for him. He died before 1418. Fordun erroneously states 1420.

His son, William, third earl of Orkney, was one of the hostages for James I., when allowed to visit Scotland, 31st May 1421, and he had a safe-conduct to meet him at Durham, 13th December 1423. As admiral of Scotland he conveyed the princess Margaret to France in 1436, on her marriage with the dauphin. In 1446 he founded Roslin Chapel, which, although called a chapel, was really, from the very outset, a collegiate church, and endowed it with various lands and revenues. He was high-chancellor of Scotland from 1451 to 1458. He had a grant of the earldom of Caithness, 28th Aug. 1455, in compensation, as the charter bears, of a claim of right which he had to the lordship of Nithsdale, through his mother, Egidia, daughter and heiress of William Douglas, lord of Nithsdale, by Egidia, daughter of Robert II. In his time, the young king, James III., married the princess Margaret of Denmark, and in 1468 obtained as her dowry, besides 2,000 florins in money, the Orkney islands, in pledge for 50,000 florins, and Shetland for 8,000 more. As the islands were never ransomed, they thenceforth became part of the dominions of Scotland. In 1470 the earldom of Orkney and lordship of Shetland were purchased by the king from the Sinclairs, and in 1471 they were annexed to the crown by act of parliament. As some compensation, the king granted to the earl the castle of Ravensraig, now in ruins, situated on a lofty rock, overhanging the seashore, at Dysart, in Fife, with several lands adjoining, by charter, dated 17th Sept. 1470. He was now styled earl of Caithness and Lord Sinclair. In 1471 and two following years, he was sent ambassador to England. He was twice married, and resigned the earldom of Caithness in favour of William Sinclair, his eldest son of the second marriage, who, in consequence, obtained a charter of that earldom, 7th December 1476. His first wife was Lady Margaret Douglas, eldest daughter of the fourth earl of Douglas, by whom he had one son, William Sinclair of Newburgh, ancestor of Lord Sinclair, and a daughter, Lady Catherine, married to Alexander, duke of Albany, second son of James II., but divorced on account of propinquity of blood. His second wife was the daughter of Alexander Sutherland of Dunbeath, and by her he had William, earl of Caithness, three other sons, and four daughters. (See CAITHNESS, earl of, vol. i. p. 521, and SINCLAIR.)

The title of duke of Orkney, with that of marquis of Fife, was bestowed on the fourth earl of Bothwell, 12th May 1567, three days before Queen Mary's ill-fated marriage with him, but he held it for little more than a month, and was forfeited 29th December of the same year, (see vol. i. p. 356).

The earldom of Orkney was, 28th October 1581, conferred by James VI. on Lord Robert Stewart, abbot of Holyrood-house, natural son of King James V. In 1569 he had exchanged the temporalities of the abbacy of Holyrood-house for the temporal estates of the see of Orkney, with Adam Bothwell, bishop thereof. He died in 1592, and was succeeded by his son, Patrick, who, in 1600, got charters of both the earldom and the bishopric. Like his father, he was proud, avaricious, cruel, and dissipated, and having, by his profuse style of living, involved himself deeply in debt, he endeavoured to extricate himself by the most illegal and oppressive acts on the people of Orkney, confiscating their property, and depriving them of their usual privileges. Numerous complaints against him reached the king, and he was, in consequence, committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh in 1611, accused of high treason. One of his savage orders was, that if any man endeavoured to give relief to vessels in distress, he should be fined and imprisoned, "at the earl's pleasure." Previous to his apprehension, he took refuge in the king's castle at Kirkwall, which he maintained with much desperate valour for some time against the king's troops, till it was at last taken and demolished. Having mortgaged his estates to Sir John Arnot, the king purchased his right, and took possession of his castles of Kirkwall and Birsay. To the latter the earl had made great additions, as well as his father, Earl Robert, and above the gate was the famous inscription, which, among other points of dittay, (crimes charged against him in the indictment,) cost him his head. It was as follows: "Dominus Robertus Stuartus, filius Jacobi Quinti Rex Scotorum, hoc opus instruxit." Above his coat of arms was the motto, "Sic fuit, est, et erit." The earl's natural son, Robert Stewart, at the head of 500 men, seized these castles in 1613, but by the king's orders, the earl of Caithness proceeded to Orkney, and succeeded in taking them from him. Being sent a prisoner to Edinburgh, Robert Stewart was condemned and executed. The earl was tried for high treason in October 1613, and beheaded at the market cross of Edinburgh, February 6, 1614. He left no issue.

The title of earl of Orkney was next bestowed, January 3, 1696, on Lord George Hamilton, fifth son of William and Anne, duke and duchess of Hamilton, his secondary titles being viscount of Kirkwall, and Baron Dechmont. He was an eminent military commander, and field-marshal of the forces. Born in 1666, he was bred to the profession of arms under his uncle, the earl of Dunbarton. He had the rank of colonel in the army in 1690; the command of the 7th regiment of foot in 1692, and was promoted to the colonelcy of the Royal Scots the same year. He distinguished himself at the battles of the Boyne, Aughrim, Steinkirk, and Landen, and at the sieges of Athlone, Limerick, and Namur. At the attack of the latter place, he was made a brigadier-general by King William, who commanded in person. As a reward for his eminent services in Ireland and Flanders, King William, in January 1696, advanced him to the dignity of a peer of Scotland by the title of earl of Orkney, viscount of Kirkwall, and Baron Dechmont; and his countess, the sister of Edward, first earl of Jersey, got a grant, under the great seal of Ireland, of almost all the private estates of King James in that country. His portrait is subjoined:

Upon the accession of Queen Anne, Lord Orkney was, in 1702, promoted to the rank of major-general, and in 1703 to that of lieutenant-general, and was likewise made a knight of the Thistle. He afterwards served under the duke of Marlborough, and by his gallantry contributed to the victories of Blenheim, Ramillies, Oudenard, and Malplaquet. In 1708 he was elected one of the sixteen peers of Scotland, and was re-chosen at every general election till 1734. In 1710, his lordship was sworn of the privy council, and made general of the foot in the Low Countries. In 1712 he received the colonelcy of the royal regiment of Fusileers, and again in Flanders under the duke of Ormond. In 1714 he was appointed gentleman extraordinary of the bedchamber to George the First, and soon after governor of Virginia. Subsequently he was constituted governor of Edinburgh castle, and lord-lieutenant of Lanarkshire, and promoted to the rank of field-marshal of the forces. He died at London in 1737, in his 71st year. He had 3 daughters; Lady Anne, who succeeded as countess of Orkney; Lady Frances, countess of Scarborough; and Lady Harriet, countess of Oreray, afterwards of Cork.

The eldest daughter, Lady Anne, countess in her own right, died in 1756. She married, in 1720, her cousin-german, the 4th earl of Inchiquin in Ireland, and had 4 sons and 4 daughters. Lady Mary O'Brien, the eldest daughter, succeeded her mother as countess of Orkney, and died March 10, 1791. She married in March 1753, her cousin-german, Murrough, 5th earl of Inchiquin, afterwards marquis of Thomond. This lady was deaf and dumb. Shortly after the birth of her first child, the nurse saw her cautiously approach the cradle in which the infant was asleep, and fling down a large stone with all her force upon the floor. The noise it made awoke the child, who cried. The countess fell on her knees in a transport of joy. She had discovered that her child possessed the sense which was wanting in herself. She had 4 sons, who all died young, and 4 daughters.

Her eldest daughter, Lady Mary O'Brien, born in 1755, became, on the death of her mother, countess of Orkney. She married, Dec. 21, 1777, the Hon. Thomas Fitzmaurice, M.P., brother of the 1st marquis of Lansdowne, and had one son, John, viscount of Kirkwall, born Oct. 9, 1778, elected M.P. for Heytesbury, Wiltshire, in 1802, and married, 11th August that year, the Hon. Anne Maria De Blacquiere, eldest daughter of the first Lord De Blacquiere. He died Nov. 23, 1820, leaving 2 sons. The countess died in 1831.

Her elder son, John, Viscount Kirkwall, having predeceased her, she was succeeded by her grandson, Thomas John Hamilton Fitzmaurice, born Aug. 8, 1803. In 1833 he was elected one of the 16 Scots representative peers. He married, in 1826, the second daughter of the 3d Lord Boston; issue, 5 sons and 3 daughters. His eldest son, George William Hamilton, Viscount Kirkwall, born in 1827, entered the army as an ensign in the 92d foot, in 1845, and in 1862 was a captain Scots Fusileer guards.

ORMISTON, a surname derived from lands of that name, now a parish, in East Lothian. They were so called from an Anglo-Saxon, named Orme, who possessed them in the reign of Malcolm the Maiden. Whether this was the same Orme, the son of Hugh, who was abbot of Abernethy, in Perthshire, in the reign of William the Lion, and whose descendants, from his possessing the lands of Abernethy, assumed that name, (see vol. i. p. 14,) is not known. There are various places in Scotland of the name of Ormiston.

ORMOND, earl of, a title conferred in 1445 on Hugh Douglas, fourth son of James, seventh earl of Douglas. He had a safe-conduct to pass through England with his brothers, the earls of Douglas and Moray, 12th May 1451, and again on 2d May 1453. For engaging in the rebellion of his brother, the eighth earl of Douglas, in the spring of 1455, he was executed for high treason in May of that year, and attainted. (See vol. ii. p. 44.) His son, Hugh, dean of Brechin, died without issue.

The title of marquis of Ormond was bestowed, at his baptism, on Prince James Stewart, second son of James III., "an empty title," says Douglas, (Peerage, vol. ii. p. 345.) "unusual in Scotland, without territory, and without jurisdiction." He was afterwards created duke of Ross.

ORR, a surname common in Renfrewshire, particularly in the parish of Lochwinnoch, where, at one period, there were some heritors of the name. Hewe de Orr appears in the Ragman Roll as having sworn fealty to Edward I. in 1296. The name occurs also in writs of the time of James IV. The family of Orr of Barrowfield came originally from the parish of Cambusnethan, in the upper ward of Lanarkshire.

Hugh Orr, born at Lochwinnoch, January 13, 1717, and bred a gunsmith and door-lock filer, went to America, at the age of twenty, and settled at Massachusetts. At Bridgewater, in that State, he set up the first tilt hammer in that part of the country, and for several years he was the only maker in that quarter of edgetools, the manufacture of which he was the means of spreading through various parts of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut. In 1748 he made 500 muskets for the province of Massachusetts Bay, and during the revolutionary war he engaged actively in the manufacture of arms. In conjunction with a French gentleman, he established a foundry for the casting of cannon and cannon-shot. He also originated the business of exporting flax-seed from the part of the country in which he resided. For several years he was elected a senator for the county of Plymouth. He died in December 1798, in his 82d year.

ORROK, a surname derived from lands in the parish of Burntisland, Fifeshire, long possessed by a family of that name, but subsequently the property of J. E. Drinkwater Bethune, Esq. of Balfour. Simon de Orrok is mentioned in the Ragman Roll. The name is supposed to have originated from the rocks on that part of the Fife coast, where the lands lie.

The Orroks of that ilk, says Nisbet, for armorial bearings had sable, on a chevron, betwixt 3 mullets argent, as many chess rocks of the first. Crest, a falcon perching proper. Motto, "Solus Christus mea Rupes."

OSWALD, an Anglo-Saxon name. The first syllable, like Ead or Ed, in Edward, Edmund, Edwin, Edgar, &c., was intended to show derivation and family relationship by the use of similar personal names, a practice which seems to have been common in Anglo-Saxon families, thus, Oswald, Oslaf, Oslac, Oswin, Osfrith, Osric, Osbald, &c. Mr. Kemble, in his ingenious and valuable work 'On the Names, Surnames, and Nicknames of the Anglo-Saxons,' gives several instances of this practice.

Since the end of the 17th century a family of the name of Oswald have possessed the estate of Dunnikier, in the parish of Dysart, Fifeshire, on part of which the village of Pathhead is built. This property anciently belonged to the family of Lundin of Balgonie, and afterwards, according to Sibbald, to a Mr. John Watson, who built the old house in Pathhead, and mortgaged several acres of land near Burntisland for maintaining poor widows.

Persons of the name of Oswald have for arms, Azure, a naked boy, pointing at a star, in the dexter chief point.

The family of Oswald of Fingalton had, Azure, a savage wreathed about the middle with bay leaves, having a sheaf of arrows hanging by his side, and bearing a bow in his left hand, all proper, and pointing with the other hand to a comet, placed in the dexter chief point, or. Crest, a dexter hand, issuing out of a cloud, and pointing to a star of eight rays, proper. Motto, "Forti favet Cœlum." (Nisbet's System of Heraldry, vol. i.)

One of the most eminent of the family of Oswald of Dunnikier was the Right Hon. James Oswald of Dunnikier, a statesman and patriot, who was long a member of parliament. Born in 1715 in the town of Kirkealdy, he was educated at the burgh school, where he had for associates Dr. Adam Smith and Dr. John Drysdale, with whom he continued his friendship during life. Through his influence the latter gentleman obtained a presentation to a city charge in Edinburgh. Mr. Oswald was the eldest of four sons. His next brother was promoted to the dignity of a bishop. His father died young. After having the advantage of foreign travel, he passed advocate in 1740, but it does not appear that he ever practised at the Scottish bar.

At an early period of his life Mr. Oswald had shown a decided taste for literature, and had prosecuted literary pursuits with great ardour. He had also made considerable proficiency in classical learning. Politics, however, and public business soon withdrew his attention from studies in which, had he continued to cultivate them, he bade fair to attain high distinction. One long an intimate in his family, and himself an elegant scholar, left this posthumous record respecting his literary attainments and connexions:—"That eminent person, Mr. Oswald, who joined the accomplishments of a scholar to the qualities of a statesman, willingly gave the leisure he could spare to the company of men of letters, whom he valued, and who held his great talents in high estimation. He was the first patron of Douglas; David Hume submitted to him his Essays on Political Economy, and the pages of his History, before they went to the press, drew from his deep insight into the political state of England, both in ancient and modern times, many valuable remarks. Lord Kames consulted him upon his literary labours, and Adam Smith was indebted to that large and comprehensive mind, for many of the views of Finance, that are found in the Wealth of Nations."

In 1751 Mr. Oswald was elected member of parliament for his native town and conjoined burghs, and in every succeeding parliament he was returned either for these burghs or for the county of Fife, until 1768, when ill health compelled him to vacate his seat in favour of his son, James Townsend Oswald. He filled successively the situations of commissioner of the navy, lord of trade and plantations, lord of the treasury, and treasurer of Ireland, and was also a member of the privy council. George II. and George III., sensible of his merits, conferred upon him valuable marks of their consideration, and each bestowed a reversionary grant on his son, of an honourable patent office which he held. The 'Memorials of the Public Life and Character of the Right Hon. James Oswald of Dunnikier,' consisting of his Correspondence, was published in 1825, with a portrait, in 1 vol. 8vo.

Of this family also was Sir John Oswald of Dunnikeir, a distinguished officer. He entered the army when very young, and was engaged in active service for nearly fifty-three years. In November 1793, when captain in the 3d foot, he joined the second battalion of grenadiers under Lieutenant-colonel Cra-dock, and, embarking for the West Indies, with his battalion, in the expedition under Sir Charles Grey, was present at the capture of the islands of Martinique, St. Lucia, and Guadeloupe. Thence he proceeded to St. Domingo, and in April 1797 was appointed lieutenant-colonel in the 35th foot. In 1799 he embarked in the expedition to Holland, and was wounded in the action of September 19. For his conduct on this occasion, he was particularly thanked by the duke of Gloucester, then Prince William, to whose brigade he belonged.

In February 1800, he sailed for the Mediterranean, with the corps under General Pigot. Landing in Minorca, he proceeded to the blockade of Malta, at the capture of which island he was present. He remained there till the peace of Amiens. On the recommencement of hostilities in 1804, he rejoined his regiment, but in May 1805 was compelled to return to England, on account of his private affairs. In October of the same year, he had the brevet of colonel; and, in February 1806, he joined the army under Sir James Craig. On the troops landing in Sicily, he was appointed commandant of Melazzo. In June the same year he commanded the advance destined to cover the disembarkation of the troops under Sir James Stuart in Eufemia Bay; on which occasion he defeated a considerable body of the enemy, who had attacked his force. He was next appointed to the third brigade of that army, and commanded the same at the battle of Maida. Two days after the action, he marched with the same brigade into Lower Calabria, captured about three hundred French prisoners at Monteleone, with all the enemy's depot, and pushed forward, by forced marches, to the investment of Scylla castle, the siege of which was confided to him. After a resistance of twenty days, he succeeded in subduing it. He then returned to Sicily with the army; and was appointed, in November, by General Fox, brigadier-general, but this nomination was cancelled by order of the commander-in-chief.

In February 1807 he accompanied the corps under Major-general Fraser to Egypt; and was intrusted with the command of the party selected for assaulting the forts in Alexandria, when he stormed and carried the western lines and forts, taking a considerable quantity of artillery, and driving the Turks, who defended them, within the walls. The place capitulated two days after, and Colonel Oswald proceeded as second in command in the second (unsuccessful) expedition against Rosetta. On the return of the troops he was appointed commandant of Alexandria. When the army withdrew to Sicily, he was made commandant of Augusta by Sir John Moore; and in June 1808 appointed brigadier-general on the Mediterranean. In October following he returned to Melazzo, where he was second in command of a large force, the charge of disciplining which in a great measure devolved upon him. In 1809 he had the command of the reserve of the army destined for Naples, and on the surrender of Proci-da, was appointed commandant of that place. In September the same year he commanded the force employed to expel the enemy from certain of the Ionian islands. Among these, Zante, Cephalonia, Ithæa, and Cerigo, surrendered to the troops under his orders. In March 1810 he proceeded against Santa Maura, with a force amounting to about 2,000 men, where he landed on the 23d, and drove the enemy from the town, and stormed the intrenchment. In addition to his military duties, he was charged with the whole civil administration of the different islands. He perfected the organization of the civil and military local government of each; established an advantageous intercourse with the neighbouring Turkish pachas, and by his firm and equitable sway confirmed the favourable prepossessions which the Greeks generally entertained towards the British name and control. In February 1811 General Oswald was appointed colonel of the Greek light infantry, a corps he had formed and disciplined chiefly from the prisoners of that nation. Upon quitting the Ionian isles, he received from their respective inhabitants addresses expressive of their sense of the benefits which they had derived from his administration, with an appropriate gift from each. In June 1811 he was promoted to the rank of major-general; and in November of the same year was placed on the staff of the Western district of England. During that command he succeeded in re-establishing the peace of Bristol, which had been endangered by the fury of a mob stimulated to mischief by seditious harangues.

In August following General Oswald was nominated to the Peninsular staff. He joined the army under the marquis of Wellington, October 22, and accompanied it during the severe cavalry affair of the 23d and 24th. He was placed in command of the fifth division of the army, vacant in consequence of General Leith being wounded, and took the direction of the left of the army, at the moment when warmly engaged, both at Villa Morilla and Palencia. He continued to conduct that division during the remainder of the arduous retreat; and after placing it, with little comparative loss, in cantonments on the Douro, he returned to Britain.

In May 1812 he rejoined the army on taking the field, when he resumed the command of the fifth division, forming a portion of the left column under the orders of General Sir Thomas Graham, afterwards Lord Lynedoch. He directed that division during the masterly march through the north of Portugal, and the Spanish provinces of Zamora, Leon, and Palencia, till it crossed the Ebro. At the battle of Vittoria he had the command of all the troops composing the advance of the left column, with which he attacked and drove the enemy from the heights. He held the same command during the blockade of St. Sebastian, until the return of Sir James Leith on the 30th August, when he continued his services as a volunteer, and accompanied the lieutenant-general to the trenches on the occasion of the assault. On General Leith being again wounded, the command of the fifth division once more devolved upon General Oswald; but family affairs soon after obliged him to return to Britain.

This distinguished officer was twice honoured with his sovereign's gracious acknowledgment of services, in which he held chief command; and three times for those in which he held a subordinate situation. Twice by name he obtained the thanks of parliament; and he bore three medals, one for Maida, one for Vittoria, and one for the siege of St. Sebastian. He was nominated a knight commander of the Bath at the enlargement of the order in 1815; was advanced to the grade of Grand Cross, February 25, 1824, and was invested at Carlton House 9th June following. In July 1818 he obtained the colonelcy of the rifle brigade. In August 1819 he received the brevet of lieutenant-general, and the 9th October following was removed from the rifle brigade to the colonelcy of the 35th foot. Sir John Oswald died at Dunnikeir, June 8, 1840. He was twice married; first, in January 1812, to Charlotte, eldest daughter of the Rev. Lord Charles Murray-Aynsley, uncle of the duke of Atholl, and that lady having died, February 22, 1827, he married, secondly, in October 1829, her cousin, Emily Jane, daughter of Lord Henry Murray, who survived him.

OSWALD, JOHN, a poet and political writer, who published under the assumed name of Syl- vester Otway, was a native of Edinburgh, where his mother is said to have kept John's Coffee-house. He served an apprenticeship to a jeweller, and followed that occupation till a relation of his died, and left him a considerable legacy. With this money he purchased a commission in the 42d Highlanders. Some accounts say that his father was a goldsmith, that he was brought up to the same business, that he enlisted in the 18th or Royal Irish regiment, and from his good education was soon made a sergeant, and that when quartered at Deal, he married a native of the place, with whom he got a sum of money sufficient to purchase his discharge, as well as to buy him a commission as an ensign in the 42d, then engaged in active service in America. In 1780, when the 2d battalion was raised, he went out as lieutenant with it to the East Indies. On the passage out, he fought a duel with the officer commanding the two companies, in the transport, in which he was not the aggressor. They fired two rounds at each other, luckily without bloodshed. His finances not permitting him to join the mess on board the transport, he lived upon the same rations that were served out to the soldiers. After being in India a short time, he sold his commission, and returned to England, overland, in 1783. On his outward voyage he had obtained a knowledge of Latin and Greek without the assistance of a master; and during his residence in India, he made himself acquainted with the Arabic. In politics he was a republican, and in religion somewhat of an infidel. In London, it is believed, he supported himself chiefly by his pen. He wrote both in prose and verse. His poetical effusions were mostly of an amatory cast, and some of them received the approbation of Burns. In his habits, Oswald was very singular, and, in imitation of the Brahmins, he rigidly abstained from animal food.

On the breaking out of the first French Revolution, Oswald went to Paris, where, in 1792, he published a new edition, translated into French, with considerable additions, of a pamphlet which he had brought out in London in 1784, entitled 'Review of the Constitution of Great Britain.' This pamphlet displayed some ability, and as, from its extreme views, it was quite in accordance with the spirit of the times in France, it at once gained him admission into the Jacobin club. With that ferocious body he soon acquired so much influence as to be acknowledged the first of Anglo-Jacobins. He took a leading part in all its transactions, and was nominated by the Revolutionary government to the command of a regiment of infantry, raised from the refuse of Paris and the departments. Being joined by his two sons, on the true principle of equality, he made them both drummers! His severe system of discipline made him very unpopular with his men; and having attempted to substitute for the musket in his regiment a pike of superior construction, to render them fit to make or withstand a charge, the soldiers mutinied, and flatly refused to be trained to its use. Colonel Oswald's corps was one of the first of those employed against the royalists in La Vendee, where he was killed in battle. It is said that his men took advantage of the occasion to rid themselves of their obnoxious commander, and to despatch also his two sons, and another English gentleman who was serving in his regiment.

Oswald's appearance in the French service excited some attention in this country at the time, and it is a remarkable fact that an attempt was made to prove his identity with Bonaparte. His countryman, Dr. William Thomson, then a well-known author in London, had prepared a work in which he seriously endeavoured to prove that the first consul's real name was John Oswald, the son of a goldsmith in Edinburgh. Oswald, he argued, was a man of enterprize and courage, and a great admirer of Ossian's poems, and so was Bonaparte. Having read his manuscript to a friend of his, that gentleman happened to dine that very day with the Corsican general Paoli, then an exile in London, to whom he related the circumstance, when the latter mentioned that he not only knew Bonaparte's early history, but had actually held him up at the baptismal font. This of course prevented the publication of Dr. Thomson's absurd speculation.

Oswald's works are :

OXFURD, Viscount of, a title (dormant) in the peerage of Scotland, conferred, in 1661, with the secondary title of Baron Makgill of Cousland, on Sir James Makgill of Cranston-Riddell, great-grandson of Sir James Makgill, who was provost of Edinburgh in the reign of James V., and was one of the first who embraced the Reformation in Scotland. He was descended from a family of the same name in Galloway, and had two sons. The elder, Sir James Makgill, purchased the estate of Nether Rankeillour, in the parish of Collessie, Fifeshire. He was educated at Edinburgh, for the law. In June 1554, he was appointed clerk-register, and on the 20th August following, an ordinary lord of session, when he took his seat on the bench as Lord Rankeillour. He was repeatedly employed in settling disputes on the borders, and in 1559 was one of the commissioners who concluded the treaty of Upsettlington. The same year he joined the Reformers, and was in familiar friendship with Knox. After the return of Queen Mary from France in 1561, he was sworn a member of her council, and was one of those to whom the modification of the stipends for the reformed clergy was intrusted. In 1563 he was one of a parliamentary commission appointed for visiting the universities. In 1566, for being implicated in the murder of Rizzio, he was deprived of the office of clerk-register, forced to fly from Edinburgh, and conceal himself in the Highlands. He was soon afterwards, however, pardoned, but ordered to remain north of the Tay. By the favour of the regent Moray, he was restored to the office of clerk-register in December 1567. The following year he was one of the commissioners chosen to attend the regent to York, to manage the accusation against Queen Mary, and was sent by him to London, with Maitland, younger of Lethington, not so much to assist the latter, as to watch his proceedings, as he was known to incline to the cause of Queen Mary. In 1571 and 1572, he was employed as ambassador to the court of Queen Elizabeth. He appears to have suffered considerably in the civil war which raged in Scotland at this time, as on the night of April 28th, 1571, a party of the queen's partisans entered his house in Edinburgh, and on his wife demanding what they wanted, she was killed by a stroke from one of them. (Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 70.) His house is said to have been pulled down by the same party, and sold for firewood. In the following month, "three coffers of Mr. James McGillis going out of Leyth to Pinkie, esteemed worth 1,000 lile," were taken by the queen's party. (Hist. of Senators of College of Justice, p. 90.) He had either acquired the barony of Pinkie near Musselburgh, or resided there for greater security. In 1578 he and George Buchanan were chosen extraordinary members of the king's council. He died in 1579. From him descended the Makgills of Rankeillour.

The viscounts of Oxfurd descended from David Makgill, the younger brother of Sir James Makgill of Nether Rankeillour. He was styled of Nisbet and Cranston-Riddell. Appointed a lord of session, 27th June 1582, he took the title of Lord Cranston-Riddell, and the same year he became lord advocate. This last office he held till 1589. He died before 12th March 1594. His son, David Makgill, was also a lord of session, appointed 25th May 1597, and died in 1607. This gentleman's eldest son, David Makgill of Cranston-Riddell, died without male issue, 15th May 1619.

His brother, Sir James Makgill, succeeded him in his estates, and was the first Viscount Oxfurd. He was created a baronet in 1627, appointed a lord of session, 3d November 1629, and constituted one of the commissioners of exchequer, 1st February 1645. He was elevated to the peerage, by the title of viscount of Oxfurd, and Lord Makgill of Cousland, by patent, dated 19th April 1651, to him and his heirs male of entail and provision whatsoever. He died 5th May 1663.

His son, Robert, second viscount, died 8th December 1706, aged about 58. He was twice married, but had issue only by his first wife, Lady Henriët Livingston, only daughter of the third earl of Linlithgow, namely, a son, the Hon. Colonel Thomas Makgill, who died without issue, in September 1701, and three daughters. The eldest daughter, the Hon. Christian Makgill, married the Hon. William Maitland, a younger son of the third earl of Lauderdale, and died in 1707, in her 30th year, leaving a son, Robert, who assuming the title of viscount of Oxfurd, voted as such at an election of a representative peer, 21st September 1733. In 1734, James Makgill of Nether Rankeillour, the sixth in descent from Sir James, Lord Rankeillour, claimed the title. His claim was referred to the lords' committee of privileges, but was by them refused, on the ground that although he had proved his being heir male whatsoever, he did not possess the other requisites in the patent, that of heir of entail and of provision. The title, therefore, has remained dormant since the death of the second viscount in 1706. On the death of her nephew, Robert Makgill, above mentioned, in 1755, the Hon. Henriët Makgill, youngest daughter of the second viscount and wife of James Hamilton, younger of Orbistoun, assumed the title of viscountess of Oxfurd. She died 11th October 1758, without issue.

James Makgill, the claimant, having died without issue, he was succeeded in Nether Rankeillour, and his other estates, by his sister, Isabella Makgill, who married the Rev. William Dick, one of the ministers of Cuppar. Their daughter, Margaret, heiress of Nether Rankeillour and Lindores, married the Hon. Frederiek Lewis Maitland, sixth son of the sixth earl of Lauderdale, a captain R.N. Their eldest son, Colonel Charles Maitland, when captain in the 17th light dragoons, was aide-de-camp to his cousin, Major-general Thomas Dundas, in the West Indies, in 1794. He was succeeded, in 1827, by his eldest surviving son, David Maitland Makgill, Esq. of Rankeillour, who, in June 1839, was served heir of line in general to the first viscount of Fren draught, (see vol. i. p. 727.) when he assumed the additional name of Crichton, his ancestor, Sir James Makgill of Rankeillour, having married in 1665, the Hon. Janet Crichton, only daughter of the first Viscount Fren draught. Mr. David Maitland Makgill Crichton of Rankeillour, who distinguished himself by his support of the Free church of Scotland, died 11th July 1851, leaving issue.

PANMURE, Earl of, a title (attainted) in the peerage of Scotland, conferred 3d August 1616, with the secondary title of Baron Maule of Brechin and Navar, on Patrick Maule of Panmure, (see p. 122 of this volume, article MAULE.) He was a faithful adherent of Charles I., and attended that unfortunate monarch in his imprisonment at Holdenby and Carisbrook, till compelled to leave him by the orders of parliament. By Cromwell he was, in 1654, fined in the exorbitant sum of £10,000 sterling, and £2,500 on account of his younger son, Henry, who had the command of a regiment in the duke of Hamilton's army, raised for the rescue of the king in 1648, and who, at the battle of Dunbar in 1650, also commanded a regiment. The earl's fine was mitigated to £4,000, and that for his son, Henry, to £1,000. His lordship died 22d December, 1661.

His elder son, George, second earl, when Lord Maule, fought at the head of the Forfarshire regiment of horse, of which he was colonel, at the battle of Dunbar, 3d September 1650, and also at an engagement with the English at Inverkeithing, 20th July following, when he was wounded. After the defeat of the royalists at Worcester, many of them repaired to Lord Maule, but, finding that he could be of no further service to the king's cause, he made his peace with General Monk in 1652. The second earl of Panmure died at Edinburgh 24th March 1671. By his countess, Lady Jean Campbell, eldest daughter of John, earl of Loudoun, high-chancellor of Scotland, he had nine children, of whom four sons and one daughter died young.

The eldest surviving son, George, third earl, was a privy councillor to Charles II. and James VII., and died 1st February 1686. He had a son, George, Lord Maule, who predeceased him. The third earl's brother, the Hon. James Maule of Ballumby, succeeded him as fourth earl. In his youth, he served as a volunteer at the siege of Luxembourg. He was a privy councillor to James VII., but was removed for opposing the abrogation of the penal laws against popery. At the convention of estates in March 1689, he vigorously supported the interest of the abdicated monarch. When the crown was settled on King William and Queen Mary, the earl of Panmure, with his brother, the Hon. Harry Maule of Kelly, who was also a member of the convention, left the meeting, and never appeared again in the parliament of Scotland. When the rebellion of 1715 broke out, the earl and his brother joined the standard of the Pretender, and the former proclaimed James VIII. at Brechin. At the battle of Sheriffmuir, his lordship commanded a battalion of foot, and was taken prisoner, but rescued by his brother. He afterwards took refuge in France, and was attainted by act of parliament. The yearly rental of his estates was £3,456 sterling, the largest of the confiscated properties, and though the government twice offered to restore them, if he would return and take the oath of allegiance to the house of Hanover, he remained firm in his attachment to the Stuart family. In 1717, an act of parliament was passed, to enable King George to make such a provision to his countess, Lady Mary Hamilton, third daughter of William and Anne, duke and duchess of Hamilton, as she would have been entitled to had her husband been dead. His lordship died at Paris, 11th April 1723, in his 64th year, without issue.

His brother, Mr. Maule of Kelly, after the Revolution lived in a retired manner till the rebellion of 1715, and spent much of his time in the study of the laws, history, and antiquities of his native country. He died at Edinburgh in 1734. He was twice married. By his first wife, Lady Mary Fleming, only daughter of the first earl of Wigton, he had, with other issue, a son, William, earl of Panmure in the Irish peerage, of whom afterwards; and a daughter, Jean, married, first, to George, Lord Ramsay, eldest son of the sixth earl of Dalhousie. By his second wife, Anne, daughter of the Hon. Patrick Lindsay Crawford of Kilmorie, he had, with other issue, John Maule of Inverkeillour, one of the barons of the court of exchequer in Scotland, who died, unmarried, in 1781.

William Maule, above mentioned, was, on 6th April 1743, created a peer of Ireland, by the titles of earl of Panmure of Forth, and Viscount Maule of Whitechurch. This nobleman purchased in 1764 the forfeited Panmure estates from the York Buildings Company, for £19,157 18s. 4d. He had early entered the army, and served several campaigns in Flanders. He was at the battles of Dettingen and Fontenoy, and in 1770 attained the rank of general. He died at Edinburgh 1st January 1782, aged 82. As his titles were limited to the heirs male of his body, and those of his brother of the half-blood, John Maule of Inverkeillour, who predeceased him, without issue, they became extinct at his death.

PANMURE, Baron, of Brechin and Navar, a title in the peerage of the United Kingdom, conferred, 9th September 1831, on the Hon. William Maule, formerly Ramsay, second son of the eighth earl of Dalhousie, (see DALHOUSIE, vol. ii. p. 3,) and grandson of George, Lord Ramsay and Jean Maule, daughter of the Hon. Harry Maule of Kelly. He was born 27th October 1771. His granduncle, William earl of Panmure, in the Irish peerage, had, in 1775, executed an entail of his estates, which form the largest landed property in Forfarshire, in favour of his nephew, George, earl of Dalhousie, in life, and his second and other sons in fee. This settlement was attempted to be set aside by Thomas Maule, lieutenant of invalids, heir male of the Panmure family, grandson of Henry Maule, bishop of Meath; but the court of session, on 1st March 1782, determined in favour of the earl of Dalhousie, except as to certain long leases of Panmure and Brechin Parks, which were found to belong to Lieutenant Maule. On the death of the earl of Dalhousie, 4th November 1787, the estates devolved on his second son, the Hon. William Ramsay, then 16 years of age, who thereupon assumed the name and arms of Maule. In 1789 he entered the army as a cornet in the 11th dragoons, and afterwards raised an independent company of foot, which was disbanded in 1791. At the general election in 1796, he was elected M.P. for Forfarshire. The politics of his family were tory, but he came forward on the whig interest, to which he firmly adhered during his long life. He was reelected at all the subsequent elections, till 9th September 1831, when he was raised to the peerage. His lordship died at Brechin castle, April 13, 1852. He was twice married: 1st, in 1794, to Patricia Heron, daughter of Gilbert Gordon, Esq. of Halleaths; and, 2dly, in 1822, (his first wife having died in 1821,) to Miss Elizabeth Barton. By the latter he had no issue, but by the former he had, with 5 daughters, 3 sons, viz. 1. Fox, 2d Baron Panmure, and 11th Earl of Dalhousie. 2. Hon. Lauderdale Maule, lieutenant-colonel 79th Highlanders, who died at Varna, Aug. 1, 1854; and 3. Hon. William Maule, born in 1809, died Feb. 17, 1859. He married in 1844, Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Binny, Esq. of Maulesden and Fearn; issue, 2 sons, who died in childhood, and 4 daughters.

In an obituary notice of the first Lord Panmure, it is stated that "he was emphatically a remarkable man. Endowed with much natural shrewdness, he neglected the cultivation of his talents; but of an energetic and fearless character, he drew attention to himself by his systematic defiance of conventional decorums. His public career was marked by consistent devotion to popular liberty, and mutual tolerance, and by benevolence rare both in its extent and its intensity. Alike unmeasured in his loves and hatreds, he was devotedly and tenderly attached to those who did not thwart him, implacable to those who did; liberal and humane to all who only came in contact with him in the abstractions of public life, he was a despot to those who stood in more intimate relations to him. Kind, liberal, tolerant, so long as nothing touched him personally, he was fierce and unrelenting as soon as his self-will was opposed." With his eldest son and some other members of his family he was long at variance. His munificence and liberality were shown in bestowing a pension on the widow of Fox, whose principles he had adopted and maintained steadfastly to the last, and after whom he named his eldest son, and also in conferring an annuity of £50 on the widow of Robert Burns, which was continued till the poet's family assured him that it was no longer needed. In 1838, he enlarged the building of the Public schools of Brechin, and erected a hall, with library, &c., for the Mechanics' Institution, at his own expense, and in 1841, he gifted the whole in perpetuity to the town council of that town. In 1839 his tenantry erected a handsome column, 105 feet high, in honour of his lordship, as a lasting memorial of their respect for him as their landlord. It is called the Panmure or 'Live and Let Live' testimonial, and stands on the highest part of the Downie hills, Forfarshire, commanding a view of large portions of seven counties.

The eldest son, long known as the Hon. Fox Maule, became second Lord Panmure. Born 22d April 1801, he was educated at the Charter-house, and when young entered the army as an ensign in the 79th Highlanders. He served for several years in Canada, on the staff of his uncle, the earl of Dalhousie, and retired from the army in 1831, with the rank of captain. He entered parliament in 1835 as member for Perthshire, and in April of that year was appointed under secretary of state for the home department, in Viscount Melbourne's administration. Rejected in 1837 for Perthshire, in the following year he was chosen for the Elgin district of burghs, and in 1841 was returned for Perth. In June of the latter year he was appointed vice-president of the board of trade, and sworn a privy councillor, but only held the former office till the following September. In November 1842 he was elected lord-rector of the university of Glasgow, and in July 1846, on the restoration of the whigs to power, he became a cabinet minister, and was constituted secretary at war. In 1849 he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Forfarshire. He continued secretary at war till 1852, when the expiration of the East India Company's charter rendering it necessary to have a minister of influence to direct the affairs of India, he was promoted to the presidency of the board of control. Soon afterwards he succeeded his father as Lord Panmure. In May 1853, the office of keeper of the privy seal of Scotland, to which no salary is attached, vacant by the death of Lord Melville, was conferred upon him. Under the Aberdeen coalition ministry he held no office, but when Lord Palmerston became prime minister in 1854, he accepted the office of minister of war. In 1853 he was created a knight of the Thistle, and in 1855 was decorated with the order of the Bath. On the death of his cousin, James Andrew Ramsay, 10th earl and 1st marquis of Dalhousie, without male issue, Dec. 19, 1860, he succeeded to the earldom of Dalhousie in the Scottish peerage; the marquissate, a creation of the United Kingdom, became extinct. In 1861 he resumed the family surname of Ramsay after that of Maule. He married in 1831, Montagu, eldest daughter of George, 2d Lord Abercromby. She died, without issue, Nov. 11, 1853.

PANTHER, or PANITER, DAVID, a statesman and prelate of the 16th century, belonged to an ancient family in Forfarshire. He was first prior of St. Mary's Isle, in Galloway, and afterwards vicar of the church of Carstairs, in the diocese of Glasgow, and commendator of the abbey of Cambuskenneth. For some time previous to 1545, he was principal secretary of state and a privy counsellor. In that year he was elected bishop of Ross, but not then consecrated, being at that time ambassador from Scotland at the court of France, where he resided for 7 years, and during all that period he regularly received the revenues of the see. On his return he was consecrated bishop at Jedburgh. At the request of the king of France he induced the earl of Arran to resign the regency into the hands of the queen dowager, and as a reward for this service, the French monarch conferred on him an abbey in Poitou. He was one of the commissioners sent from the Scottish parliament to England, in 1550, to conclude a peace with that country. When Queen Mary was married to the dauphin, Panther and several other eminent men went over to Paris to be witnesses of the royal nuptials. This prelate, who is represented as having been a man of the most immoral habits, died at Stirling, October 1, 1558. Calderwood (vol. i. p. 332) says that "he departed eating and drinking, which, together with the rest that thereupon depended, was the pastime of his life." Shortly before his death, he advised the popish clergy against entering into disputations with the reformed ministers. In Calderwood's 'Historic,' (vol. i. p. 414,) it is stated that "Mr. David Panther, then lying at Restalrig, dissuaded them, affirming that, if ever they disputed but where themselves were both judge and party, and where fire and sword should obey their decree, that then their cause was marred for ever: for their victory stood, neither in God nor his word; but in their own wills, and things concluded by their own counsels, 'whereto,' said he, 'these fellows will give no place, but will call you to your compt-booke, that is, to the Bible, and by it ye will not be found the men that ye are called. Therefore, if ye love yourselves, enter never in disputation with them, nor call the matter in question, but defend yourselves, or else all is lost.'"

Panther's official letters, written in elegant Latin, were published by Ruddiman, in two volumes, in 1722-24. The whole of the second volume was composed by him, the first being the production of his uncle, Patrick Panther, D.D., professor of divinity in the university of St. Andrews, and author of a Latin poem, entitled 'Vallidos,' in praise of the heroic exploits of Sir William Wallace.

PARK, MUNGO, an enterprising traveller, the third son and seventh child of a respectable farmer, was born at Fowlshiels, a farm on the estate of the duke of Buccleuch, near Selkirk, September 10, 1771. He received the rudiments of his education in his father's family, and was afterwards sent to the grammar school of Selkirk, where he distinguished himself by his application and proficiency. He was originally intended for the church, but, preferring the medical profession, he was, at the age of fifteen, apprenticed to Mr. Thomas Anderson, a respectable surgeon in Selkirk, with whom he resided three years. In 1789 he removed to the university of Edinburgh, where for three successive sessions he attended the customary medical classes. His favourite study at this time was the science of botany, to prosecute his researches in which he made a tour through the Highlands with his brother-in-law, Mr. James Dickson, who had settled in London as a nurseryman and seedsman. On leaving college, Park repaired to London, and was introduced by Mr. Dickson to Sir Joseph Banks, by whose recommendation he obtained the appointment of assistant-surgeon to the Worcester, East Indiaman. In February 1792 he sailed for Bencoolen, in the island of Sumatra, where he collected a variety of specimens in natural history. He returned the following year, and, November 4, 1794, he communicated to the Linnæan Society a paper containing a description of eight new species of fishes from the waters of Sumatra, which was printed in the third volume of their Transactions. Soon after, at the suggestion of Sir Joseph Banks, he offered his services to the African Association, and engaged to go out on an expedition to the interior of Africa, for the purpose of exploring the source of the Niger. He sailed from Portsmouth, May 22, 1795, on board the Endeavour, an African trader, and reached Pisania, a British factory, about 200 miles up the Gambia, July 5. Here he remained five months, learning the Mandingo language, and collecting information as to the habits and customs of the countries in his route. He left Pisania on the 2d of the ensuing December, and reached Yarra, a frontier town of Ludamar, then governed by the chief of a predatory horde of nomade Moors, February 18, 1796. Ali, the Moorish chief, detained him a captive till July 1, when he made his escape. At this time he had been deprived by the Moors of every thing but a horse, with its accoutrements, a few articles of clothing, and a pocket-compass, which he had saved by concealing it in the sand. Undismayed by the hardships and dangers which surrounded him, he travelled on to the Joliba, or Niger, which he reached at Sego, after a journey of fifteen days. He explored the stream downwards to Silla, and upwards to Bammakoe, then crossed a mountainous country to Kamalia, a Mandingo town, which he reached September 16. Here, five hundred miles from the nearest European settlement, his health at length gave way, and for upwards of a month his strength and energies were entirely prostrated by a fever. After his recovery he was detained in the same place five months more before he obtained the means of journeying to the coast. At last, on June 10, 1797, he returned to Pisania, and was received by the British residents there "as one restored from the dead."

After an absence from England of two years and seven months, Mr. Park arrived at Falmouth, December 22, 1797, and reached London on the morning of the 25th. An Abstract of his Expedition, drawn up by Mr. Bryan Edwards, secretary to the African Association, from materials furnished by Mr. Park, was immediately printed for the use of the members. In June 1798 Mr. Park went to reside at his mother's house at Fowlshields, where he spent the summer and autumn in preparing his volume of Travels. His simple but interesting narrative was published in 1799, with an Appendix, containing Geographical Illustrations of Africa, by Major Rennell; and, on its appearance, it was received with uncommon avidity, and has ever since continued a standard work.

Having resolved to settle in Scotland, Mr. Park married, August 2, 1799, a daughter of Mr. Anderson of Selkirk, with whom he had served his apprenticeship. In October 1801 he commenced practising at Peebles as a surgeon. In the autumn of 1803 a proposal was made to him by Government, to undertake a second expedition to Africa; and, in December of that year, he quitted Scotland for London. Owing to changes in the ministry, however, and other unavoidable causes, the expedition was delayed till January 30, 1805, when, every thing being arranged, he once more left the shores of England for the deadly and inhospitable regions of Central Africa. He was empowered to enlist at Goree any number of the garrison under forty-five, and to draw for any sum not exceeding £5,000. From Goree he was directed to proceed up the river Gambia, and thence, crossing over to the Senegal, to travel by such routes as he should find most eligible to the banks of the Niger. In his first journey he had traced its easterly course, but he had not been able to follow it down to its mouth. His object now was to cross the country from the western coast, enter Bambara, construct two boats, and, embarking on the river, endeavour to reach the ocean.

On March 28 Mr. Park arrived at Goree, from whence he proceeded to Kayee, a small town on the Gambia, a little below Pisania, where he engaged a Mandingo priest named Isaaeo, who was also a travelling merchant, to be his guide. Here he remained for some days arranging matters for the expedition, and here commences Mr. Park's interesting Journal of his last mission, which includes regular memoranda of his progress and adventures to November 16 of the same year. On the morning of April 27 the expedition set out from Kayee. It consisted of Mr. Park himself, with the brevet commission of a captain in Africa, his brother-in-law, Mr. Alexander Anderson, surgeon, with a similar commission of lieutenant, and Mr. George Scott, draughtsman, five artificers from the Royal dock-yards, Isaaco the guide, and Lieutenant Martyn and thirty-five men of the Royal African corps, as their military escort. In two days they arrived at Pisania, which they quitted on May 4, and on the 11th reached Medina, the capital of the kingdom of Woolli. On the 15th they arrived at Kussai, on the banks of the Gambia, and about this time one of the soldiers died of epilepsy.

Park's hopes of completing the objects of his mission in safety depended entirely on his reaching the Niger before the commencement of the rainy season, the effects of which are always fatal to Europeans. The half of his journey, however, had not been finished when the wet season set in, and, in a few days, twelve of the men were seriously ill, and others were soon affected in a greater or less degree by the climate. On the morning of June 13, when they departed from Dindikoo, the sick occupied all the horses and spare asses, and by the 15th some were delirious. On the 18th they arrived at Toniba, from whence they ascended the mountains south of that place; and, having attained the summit of the ridge which separates the Niger from the remote branches of the Senegal, Mr. Park had the satisfaction of once more seeing the Niger rolling its immense stream along the plains. But this pleasure was attended with the mortifying reflection, that, of the party that had set out with him from the coast, there survived only six soldiers and one carpenter, with Lieutenant Martyn, Mr. Anderson and the guide. Mr. Scott, the draughtsman, who had been left behind at Koomikoomi, on account of sickness, died without reaching the Niger. On August 21 Mr. Park and the few survivors embarked in a canoe, and on the 23d they arrived at Maraboo. Isaaco was immediately despatched to Segoo, the capital of Bambarra, to negotiate with Mansong, the sovereign, for permission and materials to build a boat for the purpose of proceeding down the Niger. Whilst waiting for his return Mr. Park was seized with a severe attack of dysentery, but, by the aid of medicine and a good constitution, he soon recovered. After many delays, Mansong sent a messenger to conduct the traveller towards Segoo. The king and his chiefs were much gratified by the presents which they received from Mr. Park, who, on September 26, proceeded to Sansanding. It was with difficulty, however, that he procured from Mansong, in return for his presents, two old canoes, wherewith he constructed, with his own hands, and some assistance from one of the surviving soldiers, a flat-bottomed boat, to which he gave the title of his majesty's schooner, the Joliba. In the meantime he was informed of the death of Mr. Scott, and he now had to lament the loss of his friend Mr. Anderson, who died, after a lingering illness, October 26. On November 16 every thing was ready for the voyage, and, during the succeeding days, previous to his embarkation, which was on the 19th, Mr. Park wrote several letters to his friends in Great Britain, with which Isaaco the guide was sent back to the British settlements on the Gambia.

Some time elapsed without any farther intelligence being received of Mr. Park and his companions; but in the course of 1806 various unfavourable reports became current regarding their fate. Information was brought down to the coast by the native traders from the interior of Africa, to the effect that Mr. Park and those with him had been killed during their progress down the river. Lieutenant-general Maxwell, the governor of Senegal, in consequence, engaged Isaaco, Mr. Park's former guide, to proceed to the Niger, to ascertain the truth of these rumours, and in January 1810 he left Senegal on this mission. He returned on September 1, 1811, bringing a full confirmation of the reports of Mr. Park's death; and delivered to the governor a Journal from Amadi Fatouma, the guide who had accompanied Park from Sansanding down the Niger, which, after being translated from Arabic into English, was transmitted by him to the secretary of state for the colonial department. From the information procured by Isaaco, it appeared that the expedition proceeded from Sansanding to Silla, whence Mr. Park, Lieut. Martyn, three other white men, three slaves, and Amadi, as guide and interpreter, nine in number, sailed down the Niger; and in the course of their voyage were repeatedly attacked by the natives, whom they as often repulsed with much slaughter. At length having passed Kaffo and Gourmon, and supplied themselves with provisions, they entered the country of Haonssa. Park had delivered some presents to the chief of Yaouri, a village in this district, to be transmitted to the king, who lived at a little distance. The chief, having learned that Park was not to return, treacherously appropriated them to himself, and sent a message to the king that the white man had departed without giving them any presents. At Yaouri, Amadi's engagement with Park terminated, and on going to pay his respects to the king he was put in prison, and an armed force was sent to a village called Bousa, near the river side, to intercept Park's progress. This force was posted on the top of a rock, which stretches across the whole breadth of the river, and in which there is a large cleft or opening through which the water flowed in a strong current. When Mr. Park arrived at this opening, and attempted to pass, he was attacked by the natives with lances, pikes, arrows, and stones. For some time he resolutely defended himself; but at length, overpowered by numbers and fatigue, and unable to keep the canoe against the current, he laid hold of one of the white men and jumped into the water. Lieutenant Martyu did the same, and they were drowned in the stream in attempting to escape. One slave was left, and they took him and the canoe, and carried them to the king. After having been kept in prison for three months, Amadi was released; and obtained information from the surviving slave, concerning the manner in which Mr. Park and his companions had died. Nothing was left in the canoe but a sword belt, of which the king had made a girth for his horse, and this belt Isaaco afterwards recovered. Captain Clapperton in his second Expedition received accounts confirming this statement, and visited the spot where the travellers perished. He was likewise told that the chief of Yaouri had some of Park's papers, which he was willing to give up to him, if he would go to see him. The Landers also visited the place, and were shown by the chief one of Park's books, which had fallen into his hands.

The portrait of Mungo Park is subjoined:

Mr. Park's death is supposed to have taken place about four months after his departure from Sansanding. Of his enterprising spirit, indefatigable vigilance, calm fortitude, and unshaken perseverance, he has left permanent memorials in the Narrative of his Travels, and in his Journal and Correspondence, published in 1815, with his Life prefixed by Mr. Wishaw. His widow, who was left with three children, died in February 1840.

PARK, PATRIC, a sculptor of considerable genius, the son of Matthew Park, an eminent builder in Glasgow, who erected the new part of Hamilton palace, was born in Glasgow in 1808. He early evinced a decided taste for art, and studied at Rome for some years, as a pupil of Thorwaldsen. In 1834 he settled in London, and was much engaged in bust sculpture. At different periods he had a studio in Glasgow and Edinburgh, and latterly at Manchester. In 1851 he was elected an associate of the Royal Scottish Academy of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture, and was afterwards chosen an academician. He excelled principally in busts, and those of many eminent personages of his time were executed by him, among whom may be mentioned

Thomas Campbell the poet, and General Sir Charles Napier. His fine bust of Napoleon III. was remarkable for its faithful likeness and beauty as a work of art. So also are his busts of the Duke of Cambridge and Mr. Layard, M.P. Another of his master-pieces is the "Scottish Lassie," a beautiful head of a female in marble, an idealized likeness of his wife, belonging to the Royal Scottish Academy, which is placed in the National Gallery of Scotland at Edinburgh. His genius was peculiarly fitted for large open-air statues, but he was never employed in this the highest branch of the art. Perhaps his eccentric character and independent disposition interfered to prevent his being engaged in what was all his life the object of his great desire. He wrote well on Sculptural subjects, and in 1846, printed at Glasgow, for private circulation, A Letter to Archibald Alison, Esq., LL.D., sheriff of Lanarkshire, 'On the Use of Drapery in Portrait Sculpture.' He died at Warrington, Aug. 16, 1855. He had gone from Manchester to give a gentleman whose bust he was taking a sitting, and on his return to the station at Warrington, he perceived a porter endeavouring to carry a heavy trunk. Rushing forward to his assistance, in the attempt to lift it, the weight of the box caused him to burst a blood vessel. In the 28th Annual Report of the Royal Scottish Academy, dated Nov. 14 of that year, the Council thus alludes to his merits and decease:

"A vacancy has occurred in the list of academicians, by the premature and lamented death of their highly talented brother academician, Patric Park, Esq., sculptor, an event which occurred suddenly at Warrington, on the 16th August last. Mr. Park had, at the time of his decease, only attained the age of forty-four years, and being an enthusiastic student and lover of his profession, his works, especially his portrait busts—long distinguished by some of the highest qualities of his noble art, seemed every succeeding year to gain in strength and refinement, so that, had life been spared, many works of still higher excellence might have been looked for from his prolific studio. The Academy exhibitions, for a long series of years past, and none of them more strikingly than that of 1855, when his fine bust of the Emperor of the French occupied a place of honour, sufficiently attest the justice of this brief eulogium of the council, and justify their sorrow that, in the death of Patric Park, the Academy has lost one of its most talented members, and the department of sculpture, in which he more peculiarly excelled, one of its most eminent professors."

He married a daughter of Robert Carruthers, Esq., Inverness, and had 4 sons and a daughter.

PASLEY, the surname of a Dumfries-shire family, several members of which have distinguished themselves in the service of their country. James Pasley, Esq. of Craig and Burn, near Langholm, who died April 13, 1773, at the age of 78, left six sons and four daughters. His wife was Magdalene, daughter of Robert Elliot, Esq. of Middlemiln, Roxburghshire, and grand-daughter of Sir Gilbert Elliot of Stobs, baronet.

The fifth son, Admiral Sir Thomas Pasley, born March 2, 1734, commanded a division of the fleet under Earl Howe, in the memorable defeat of the French fleet, June 1, 1794, and greatly distinguished himself. For his gallant conduct on the occasion, he was created a baronet of the United Kingdom, Sept. 1, of that year, with remainder, having no sons, to the heirs male of his daughters successively. He married Mary, daughter of Thomas Heywood, Esq., of the Nunnery, Isle of Man, one of His Majesty's deemsters for that island, and had two daughters, the elder of whom, Maria, married, in 1800, John Sabine, Esq., of the grenadier guards, and had an only son, who succeeded his grandfather. Sir Thomas died Nov. 29, 1808.

His grandson, Sir Thomas Sabine, born Dec. 26, 1804, became 2d baronet, and by royal permission, assumed, in 1809, the surname and arms of Pasley; married, with issue, 7 sons and 4 daughters. In 1857 Sir Thomas was raised to the rank of Rear-admiral of the White.

The first Sir Thomas' sister, Margaret, 3d daughter of James Pasley, Esq. of Craig and Burn, above mentioned, married, in 1761, George Malcolm, Esq. of Burnfoot, Dumfries-shire, and was the mother of a large family. Three of her sons were Col. Sir James Malcolm, died in 1829, Admiral Sir Pulteney Malcolm, and General Sir John Malcolm (See pp. 95 and 97 of this vol.)

General Sir Charles William Pasley, K.C.B. (1845) was, in his time, well known for his attainments in literature and science. He entered the army as 2d lieutenant in the artillery in 1797, and removed to the Royal engineers in 1798. He served at the defence of Gaeta in 1806, at the battle of Maida, at the siege of Copenhagen, and at Corunna in 1809, and was twice wounded. He was chief engineer of the Marquis of Huntly's division at Walcheren. In 1841 he became a major-general, and in 1851 a lieutenant-general. He was also a colonel commanding a corps of engineers. In 1844 he was created D.C.L. at Oxford. He was the inventor of some improvements in pontoon bridges, and author of a treatise on 'Military Instruction,' and 'An Essay on the Military Policy and Institutions of the British Empire.' For some years he was inspector-general of railways. He died in April 1861.

PATERSON. A family of this name at one period possessed the estate of Bannockburn, Stirlingshire, and also a baronetcy of Nova Scotia, conferred in 1686, but which has been long extinct. In 1745, Sir Hugh Paterson of Bannockburn, baronet, joined the rebellion. His mother, Lady Jean Erskine, was sister of the Earl of Mar, a strong Jacobite connection, and Prince Charles Edward slept at Bannockburn house on the 14th September of that year. Bannockburn house was also the prince's head-quarters during January 1746. Sir Hugh's grand-daughter is said to have been privately married to the prince, but she released him to promote the Stuart cause. Another Miss Paterson, belonging to a respectable family at Ballimore, made, in the present century, an equally romantic match, having married Prince Jerome, brother of Napoleon I.; but was obliged to separate from her husband by a dynastic divorce.

John Paterson, one of the ministers of Aberdeen, was consecrated bishop of Ross in 1662, by James Sharp, archbishop of St. Andrews. He had at one time signed the Covenant. His son, John Paterson, incumbent of the Tron Church, Edinburgh, was in 1674 consecrated bishop of Galloway, in his father's lifetime. He was bitterly opposed to the Presbyterians. In 1679 he was transferred to the see of Edinburgh. In 1687 he was appointed archbishop of Glasgow. At the Revolution he was deprived of his see. In 1692 he was arrested and committed to the castle of Edinburgh for plotting against the Revolution settlement, being at the time under sentence of banishment. In 1701 he was still in confinement. He died Dec. 9, 1703, in his own house at Edinburgh, in his 76th year. He was the last archbishop of Glasgow, and his violent counsels seem to have contributed to the overthrow of the Stuart government. His family went to England, and his grandson, an eminent solicitor in London, took an active part in the architectural improvement of the metropolis, as was recognised by the votes of the corporation, and borne witness to in his portrait by Sir Joshua Reynolds. He was a member of parliament, and chairman of Ways and Means. With the Lord-chancellor Camden, he was one of the executors of the will of his friend, David Garrick.

In the United States, as throughout the colonies, as well as on both sides of the Tweed, persons of this name are numerous. The progenitors of most of the families which bear it, are supposed to have been of Scandinavian origin.

PATERSON, WILLIAM, the founder of the bank of England, and projector of the Darien Expedition, was born at the farm of Skipmyre, Dumfries-shire, in March or April 1655. His father was a farmer, who appears to have possessed lands of his own, at some distance from the farm he held on lease. He seems to have received the education common to boys of his condition at the period, viz., grammar, writing, arithmetic, and some Latin, and, according to tradition, was destined for the Presbyterian church, but in 1672, in his 17th year, he was obliged to leave Scotland, council warrants having been issued for his seizure, on a charge of having had communication with the persecuted ministers and others then in hiding in the wilds of Dumfries-shire. He went to Bristol, to a relative of his mother's, a widow, who, on her death soon after, left him some small amount of property. He was afterwards received into the counting-house of a relative, a merchant in London. Subsequently, he was engaged in trade in the West Indies. There is no authority whatever for the loose statements that have been made that he was at one time a missionary, and, at another, engaged with the buccaneers. It seems certain, however, that he had acquired much information respecting Spanish America, which could only be furnished by the latter, as he had not been there himself.

On his return from the West Indies, he became eminent as a merchant in London. In 1690 he founded the Hampstead Water Company, and he was treasurer of a similar Company in Southwark. In 1691 he projected the Bank of England, taking, it is said, the bank of St. George, in Genoa, as a model. The scheme met, at first, with great opposition, one of the most influential and most persevering antagonists of his financial views being Mr. Lowndes, the secretary of the treasury, but, being supported by the principal London merchants, the bank was established in 1694. Its shares, to the amount of £1,200,000, were taken with great rapidity. Its first body of proprietors numbered 1,300, among whom was the celebrated John Locke. Paterson himself subscribed for £2,000 stock, and was one of the first directors of this great national establishment. He next proposed to found the Orphan Fund bank, to relieve the Corporation of London, on account of money due to the city orphans, a project which led to his withdrawal from the bank of England. The directors conceived that he was not entitled to do any other banking business than theirs, and, not to be restricted in his operations, he sold the stock he held as a qualification for a seat at the board, and voluntarily retired. With the bank of Scotland, founded in 1695, he had no participation whatever, although this has been frequently erroneously stated.

His great plan for the formation of a Company of trade and colonization in Africa and the Indies, afterwards called the Darien Company, was not at first a Scottish affair. For ten years he had offered it to the English minister, to the merchants of Hamburg, to the Dutch, and to the elector of Brandenburg, who all declined to entertain it. On the invitation of some of his countrymen he next propounded his scheme in Scotland. It is stated by Sir John Dalrymple, that that ardent patriot, Mr. Fletcher of Salton, brought Paterson to Edinburgh, to submit his plan of trade to the Scottish parliament and people, and that Fletcher introduced him to the marquis of Tweeddale, then Scots minister, and persuaded him to adopt the project. Lord Stair and Mr. Johnston, the two secretaries of state, with Sir James Stuart, the lord advocate, also gave their sanction to the scheme; and, in June 1695, a statute was passed in the Scots parliament, followed by a charter from the crown, for creating a trading Company to Africa and the Indies, with power to plant colonies in places not possessed by other Europeans.

Paterson's plan was to form an emporium on each side of the isthmus of Darien, for the trade of the opposite continents. The manufactures of Europe were to be sent to the Gulf of Darien, and thence conveyed by land across the ridge of mountains that intersects the Isthmus, there to be exchanged for the produce of South America and of Asia; and thus, to use his own emphatic language, he would wrest the keys of the world from Spain, then in possession of South America. English as well as foreigners were admitted into the Company. The original leaders in the scheme, whose names are inserted in the Act 1695, were nine residents in Scotland, with Lord Belhaven, and Sir Robert Chiesley, lord provost of Edinburgh, at their head, and eleven merchants of London, headed by William Paterson and Thomas Coutts. The sum of £300,000 was, in a few days, subscribed in London, and there the first meetings, for the constitution of the Company, were held.

This magnificent project was ruined through the infamous partiality of William III., who was mainly indebted for his crown to the Presbyterians of Scotland, and the mean jealousy of the English nation. The alarm was first excited by the East India Company, and the West India merchants. In Holland and Hamburg the sum of £200,000 had been subscribed. In the latter city the English consul presented a memorial to the senate, disowning the Company, and warning them against all connection with it. But though the assembly of merchants returned a spirited reply, they soon withdrew their subscriptions, and the Dutch followed their example. Both houses of parliament, on December 13, 1695, concurred in a joint address to the king, remarkable for its absurd, narrow, and illiberal views, against the establishment of the Company. The House of Commons instituted an inquiry into the case, and after examining Paterson, his Scottish colleagues in London, and their English partners, issued an impeachment against them for raising money in England by shares in their Company, under an act of the Scottish parliament. Although the impeachment was soon abandoned, the English subscriptions were withdrawn, and the prospects of the Company in London were nipped in the bud.

Paterson, however, was not easily intimidated, and the Scots people, indignant at the opposition which the scheme had met with in England, avowedly because it would be beneficial to Scotland, immediately subscribed £400,000, although at that time there was not above £800,000 of cash in the kingdom. So great was the national enthusiasm, that young women threw their little fortunes into the stock, and widows sold their jointures to get the command of money for the same purpose. Paterson himself subscribed £3,000 to the stock of the company. At the very outset a mishap befell the Scottish company and its projector which had an adverse influence on the fortunes of both. This was the loss of a large portion of the Company's capital, amounting to £25,000, which had been entrusted by Paterson to an agent in Holland, for the purchase of stores for the Company's projected expedition of five ships to America, but misappropriated by the latter. A board of inquiry was appointed to investigate the circumstances, and their report fully acquitted Paterson of all blame, and recommended that his services should be continued by the Company. The directors approved of the report, except as to that part relative to the acceptance of his services, and to the great detriment of the interests and prospects of the Company, the very man who had called it into being, was not employed officially in its first expedition, and had no part in its guidance. He sailed simply as a private adventurer, with his wife, and one servant. The name of the latter stands in the Company's books for a subscription for £100.

On the 26th of July 1698, five large vessels, laden with merchandise, military stores, and provisions, with 1,200 persons on board, sailed from Leith to form the projected colony. On the arrival of the colonists at the isthmus of Darien, they purchased lands from the natives, and established their settlement at Acta, a place midway between Porto Bello and Carthagena, having a secure and spacious harbour, formed by a peninsula, which they fortified, and named Fort Saint Andrew. The settlement itself they called New Caledonia; and, on the suggestion of Paterson, their first public act was to publish a declaration of freedom of trade and religion to all nations.

The infant colony was soon exposed to internal dissensions, from want of a proper head; and the native Indians continued to alarm them with preparations of the Spaniards for their expulsion. It was much harassed by the latter, and, in consequence of orders sent from England, the governors of the colonies in the West Indies and America issued proclamations, prohibiting any succour being given to the Scots at Darien, on the weak pretext that their settlement there was an infringement of the alliance between England and Spain. But in the papers of the Darien council, preserved in the Advocates' Library, it is averred that previous to the colony leaving Scotland, the right of the Company was debated before King William, in presence of the Spanish ambassador; and that, during the time the subscriptions were in course of being collected, Spain had made no complaints against the formation of the Company. Besides this, that part of the country where the colony settled was a territory never possessed by the Spaniards at all, and was inhabited by a people continually at war with them. To add to the misfortunes of the settlers, their provisions were soon exhausted, and they were indebted to the hunting and fishing of the natives for the scanty supplies they received. At the end of eight months those who survived were compelled, by disease and famine, to abandon the settlement, and return to Europe. Paterson himself was seized with fever, and his wife dying was buried in the colony. In his illness he was carried on board the 'Unicorn,' one of the Company's ships, and conveyed to New York, where his life was for some time despaired of. On his recovery, he sailed for Scotland, and arrived at Edinburgh on the 5th December, 1698. He soon regained the confidence of the Company, was admitted among the directors, and his name appears to their subsequent acts.

In the meantime, two other expeditions had sailed from Scotland. When the second arrived, they found the huts burned, and the forts demolished. After being joined by the third party that went out, they were attacked by the Spaniards from Panama, but having stormed the enemy's camp, they repulsed the Spanish force with great slaughter. At last a larger force arrived from Carthagena, and, after a siege of nearly six weeks, they were obliged to capitulate, on condition that they should be allowed to embark with their effects for Europe. Of the three expeditions, not more than thirty persons survived, to carry to their native country the disastrous intelligence of the utter ruin of the colony. An interesting description of the rise, progress, and failure of this well-conceived, but ill-fated, undertaking will be found in Sir John Dalrymple's Memoirs of Great Britain and Ireland.

Paterson's spirit was still ardent and unbroken, and while he was among the foremost to calm the public irritation at the treatment received from the English government, to avoid a war between the two countries, which appeared imminent, he set himself to devise suitable means for recovering the Company's losses. He projected a new plan, admitting England to a large share in the advantages of the settlement, which he presented to the Darien Company. In 1700 he is said to have published, anonymously, 'Proposals and Reasons for Constituting a Council of Trade,' a work which has been erroneously attributed to the pen of John Law of Lauriston. Although the latter was a relative of his own, he invariably opposed his schemes as unsound and pernicious. The provisions contained in this pamphlet were, in 1705, embodied, to a limited extent and in a modified form, in the 'Act for appointing a Council of Trade,' one of the last efforts at independent action of the Scots parliament and nation. To Paterson's enterprising spirit the trade and prosperity of his country were much indebted. He was an ardent advocate of free trade, and his principles were those which now govern the mercantile policy of this country.

In 1701, he submitted to King William his new plan of commerce and colonization in Spanish America, in order to counteract the ambitious designs in Europe of Louis XIV. It was adopted by the king, with whom he had several personal interviews on the subject. The decided character of the Revolution in the politics of Europe and the acknowledgment of King James' son by the French king, had led his majesty at last to turn a favourable ear to the project of the Darien Company. Unfortunately, his death, soon after, put an end to the scheme altogether.

Paterson was a warm advocate of the union with England, and he was employed, both in London and Edinburgh, to settle one of the most difficult branches of the treaty, namely, the arrangement of the public accounts between the two kingdoms. In this office two other gentlemen were associated with him, Dr. Gregory and Mr. Bower, and they had £200 sterling each for the work. He was elected a member of the first Imperial parliament for the Dumfries burghs, but there being a double return, a Mr. Johnstone having been also chosen, he was unseated on petition.

In the last Scots parliament, resolutions had been passed recommending Paterson to her Majesty for his good services, but the recommendation, like many others, was disregarded. By the treaty of union, a sum amounting to nearly £400,000 was agreed to be paid by the united kingdom, as an indemnity to Scotland, for the losses sustained by the Darien Company, and this was secured by an act of the Imperial parliament. Of this money Paterson claimed about £30,000, chiefly founded on his contract when forming the Company, and a special act of parliament passed in his favour in 1708. The Court of Exchequer decided that he had "a just right to be paid out of the equivalent money," and "in regard that he had been very instrumental in carrying on other matters of a public nature, much to his country's service, the judges thought it just that some way should be found to give him the recompense for his services he merited, and of which he had been disappointed." Pursuant thereto, the House of Commons, March 18, 1708, passed a resolution in Paterson's favour, in regard to his Darien claims, "and likewise that such a recompense be given to him as might be suitable to his services, expenses, losses, and public cares." The ministers of Queen Anne, however, were not to be moved into doing him justice, and it was not till after the accession of George I., and he had been reduced to great poverty, that he obtained the sum due to him.

Meantime he continued to urge financial reform on the attention of ministers. A representation which he made to Lord-treasurer Godolphin, in December 1709, on the disorders of the finances, was disregarded. Lord-treasurer Harley, Godolphin's successor, adopted some of his views, but did not employ him. He had presented a memorial to ministers on his claims, and stating his distress, but all the relief he seems to have got were two or three sums of £100 and £50, which stand opposite to his name in Queen Anne's bounty list in 1712 and 1713.

His latter years were spent in London, and it is believed that, in the period of his extreme distress, he taught mathematics in Westminster. In 1703 he proposed that a public library of agriculture, trade, and finance, should be formed, and gave his own books towards founding such an institution in London. It is thought that he was the original of Addison's Sir Andrew Freeport in the 'Spectator.' Having, on the accession of George I. to the throne in 1714, presented a memorial to his Majesty, the latter referred it to his Treasury, and an act of parliament was passed, whereby Paterson obtained the sum of £18,241 10s. 10<sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub>d., charged on the Scottish equivalent. His last successful effort in finance was the construction of the Sinking Fund in 1717, for the redemption of the national debt, which is still an essential element in our financial system. He died, January 22, 1719. In the obituary of the 'Register' of 1718-19, he is styled "the great calculator."

He was a voluminous writer on mercantile and financial subjects, but all his works were published anonymously. A volume entitled 'William Paterson, the Merchant Statesman, and Founder of the Bank of England: his Life and Trials. By S. Bannister, M.A., formerly Attorney-general of New South Wales,' was published at Edinburgh in 1857. The author mentions the following as among his principal publications:

A Brief account of the Intended Bank of England. London, 1694, 4to.

The Occasion of Scotland's Decay in Trade; with a proper Expedient for Recovery thereof, and the Increasing our Wealth. 1705, 4to.

Proposals and Reasons for Constituting a Council of Trade. 1700. This work was reprinted in 1751, by Robert and Andrew Foulis, Glasgow, and by them erroneously attributed to John Law of Lauriston. This mistake led Professor Dugald Stewart in 1761, to mention Law as its author, but there can be no doubt it was written by Paterson.

An Inquiry into the Reasonableness and Consequences of an Union with Scotland. With Observations thereupon, as communicated to Lawrence Phillips, Esq., New York. London, 1706, 8vo, p. 160.

Essay Concerning Inland and Foreign, Public and Private Trade. 1705.

Fair Payment is no Sponge. 1717. A tract written in reply to a pamphlet by one Broom, against the proposal of a Sinking Fund, entitled 'No Club Law,' declaring that it would apply a sponge to the public debt.

Wednesday Club Conferences. London, 1717.

Several of Paterson's Letters are contained in a volume entitled 'The Darien Papers, being a selection of Original Letters and Official Documents,' relating to the Company, printed by the Bannatyne Club in 1819, from the manuscripts preserved in the Advocates' Library.

Of his other numerous writings it is impossible now to give even the titles.

An Historical Romance, entitled 'Darien; or the Merchant Prince,' by Eliot Warburton, published in 1852, in 3 vols., is founded on the Darien expedition, and has William Paterson for its hero. So imbued with admiration of Paterson's character and genius was the author, that he was proceeding to the very scene of his enterprize, with the view of promoting its revival, when, with all on board, the ship went down, and was lost at sea. Paterson's family are said to have been related to that of Paterson, archbishop of Glasgow.

PATON, GEORGE, an eminent antiquary. See SUPPLEMENT.

PATRICK, ST., the patron saint of Ireland, was born in 373 at a village called Bonaven Taberniæ, supposed to be the town of Kilpatrick, on the Clyde, between Dumbarton and Glasgow. Jones, in his 'Historical Account of the Welsh Bards,' states his birth-place to have been the Vale of Rhos, Pembrokeshire. He is also said by some to have been a native of Cornwall, and by others of Brittany. All the information recorded of him is founded on conjecture, except what may be traced in his own writings, his 'Confessions,' and a letter which he addressed to Corotic, a Welsh prince. He styles himself both a Briton and a Roman, and says his father was of a good family, named Calphurnius, who appears to have come to Scotland in a civil capacity with the Roman troops. His mother's name was Concha, or Conchessa, the niece of St. Martin, bishop of Tours.

In his sixteenth year he was carried captive to Ireland by a band of the wild Irish, who had made an excursion into Scotland. After passing six years in keeping sheep, he made his escape to France, and by his mother's uncle at Tours was ordained a canon regular of his church. At the age of sixty, being moved by visions, and other signs, to undertake the conversion of the pagan Irish, he repaired to Rome, to receive the Pope's sanction and authority for this holy purpose. His original name is stated to have been Saccuthus, or, (according to Nennius, abbot of Bangor) Maur; that of Patricius being given to him by Pope Celestine, when he consecrated him a bishop, and sent him into Ireland in 433. The greatest success is said to have attended his missionary efforts. He converted and baptized the kings of Ulster and Munster, and the seven sons of the king of Connaught. He fixed his metropolitan see at Armagh, and founded monasteries, established schools, planted churches, and ordained priests in various parts of the country. Several miracles are attributed to him. He died at Down in Ulster, according to Usher, in 493, to Tillemont, about 455, and to Nennius, in 464. His works, or at least those attributed to him, were published, with remarks, by Sir James Ware, in 1658.

PEDEN, ALEXANDER, famed for his piety and zeal, and supposed powers of prophecy, was born in the parish of Sorn, Ayrshire, in 1626. After having obtained a regular university education, he was for some time employed as schoolmaster, precentor, and session-clerk, in the parish of Tarbolton. According to Wodrow, he was also at one period precentor at Fenwick. Shortly before the Restoration, he was settled minister of New-Luce, in Galloway, where, however, he only continued three years, having been, in 1662, ejected from his charge, with the majority of the Scots Presbyterian clergy. On quitting his parish, he preached a farewell sermon to his people, who, during its delivery, were deeply affected, especially when he told them that they should never see his face again in that pulpit. On the conclusion of the service, which lasted till night, he closed the pulpit door, and knocked three times on it with his Bible, saying as often, "I arrest thee in my Master's name, that none ever enter thee but such as come in by the door as I have done." It so happened, that none of the Indulged or Episcopal ministers ever officiated in the pulpit of New-Luce church, which was not again opened till the Revolution restored it to the Presbyterians. This remarkable circumstance, with several striking coincidences of a similar kind, procured for Peden the credit of possessing, in a high degree, the gift of foreseeing and foretelling future events, relating to himself and the oppressed Church of Scotland.

After his ejection he lurked in various retired parts of the country, and had frequent narrow escapes from his persecutors. In 1666 a proclamation was issued against him and several of the ejected ministers, for having, contrary to law, continued to exercise their ministerial functions; and as Peden disregarded a summons to appear before the privy council, he was declared a rebel, and forfeited in both life and fortune. For greater safety, he occasionally passed some time in Ireland. At length, in 1673, he was apprehended by Major Cockburn, in the house of Hugh Ferguson of Knockdow, in Carrick, who was fined 1,000 merks for harbouring him. Being carried prisoner to Edinburgh, Peden was, after examination, sent to the Bass, where he was kept in close confinement till 1678. In December of that year he was, with sixty others, removed to Edinburgh, and condemned to be transported to Virginia, not to return to Scotland under pain of death. After this sentence was passed, Peden frequently exclaimed, "That the ship was not yet built which should take him and his fellow-prisoners to America!" They were sent by sea to London, and on their arrival there, the captain of the vessel that was engaged to convey them to Virginia, finding that they were pious Christians, who were banished for their Presbyterian principles, and not thieves and robbers, as he had been given to understand, indignantly refused to be the instrument of carrying their iniquitous sentence into execution, and they were in consequence soon set at liberty. Peden spent some time in London and other places in England, and ventured to return to Scotland in 1679, but during the remainder of his life was forced to lurk, as before, in different places of concealment. He sometimes found a retreat in Ireland, sometimes in Scotland, till, at length, worn out with his prolonged toils and sufferings, he returned to Sorn, and lived chiefly in an artificial cave in the immediate vicinity of the garrison posted in Sorn castle, uniformly protected, as he had been in a hundred places before, from the peering searches of the bloodthirsty soldiery. He was visited on his deathbed by the celebrated James Renwick, and after he had been vainly searched for in his brother's house, he died there January 1686, in his sixtieth year. He was interred in the churchyard of Auchinleck; but forty days afterwards his body was lifted by a troop of dragoons, who carried it two miles to the village of Old Cumnock, with the view of hanging it, as a mark of ignominy, on a gallows there, but they eventually buried it at the gallows foot. "The place," says Mr. McGavin, "is now the common burying-ground for Cumnock parish." What are styled 'The Prophecies of Alexander Peden,' fathered upon him after his death, were collected into a small tract, which long formed one of the publications most highly prized by the peasantry of Scotland.

PENNECUIK, a surname derived from the parish of Penicuik, in Mid Lothian, belonging to Sir George Clerk, baronet. The name was in early times spelled Penicok, and is believed to have been derived from the Gaelic Bein-na-cuack, or the British Pen-y-coe, both of which mean the Cuckoo's hill.

PENNECUIK, ALEXANDER, M.D., an eminent physician and poet, was born at Newhall, near Edinburgh, in 1652. His father, of the same name, served as a surgeon in the Swedish army, during the Thirty Years' War, and was afterwards surgeon-general to the Auxiliary Scots army sent into England in 1644. He was proprietor of the estates of Newhall in the county of Edinburgh, and Romanno in Peebles-shire, and is said by his son to have lived to be "the oldest Æsculapins of the age." After receiving his education, which he completed on the Continent, Alexander went to reside with his father on the family property, which he inherited at the old gentleman's death. There he continued to practise as a physician, and to cultivate poetry and science. He wrote a 'Description of Tweeddale,' esteemed for the antiquarian and botanical information it contains, which, with his miscellaneous poems, was published in 1715. His poetical pieces are chiefly descriptive of rural manners. He died in 1722, leaving two married daughters, to the elder of whom he gave, as a dower, the estate of Newhall, and to the younger he left, at his death, the lands of Romanno. A new edition of his works, with a life of the author, appeared at Leith in 1815, exactly a century after their first publication. Dr. Penneuk is traditionally said to have furnished Allan Ramsay with the plot of 'The Gentle Shepherd;' but like many other tales handed down by tradition, there seems no foundation for the statement.

There was another Alexander Penneuk, a poet, and burgher of Edinburgh, the author of 'Streams from Helicon,' published in 1720; and 'Flowers from Parnassus,' in 1726. He wrote also an account of 'The Blue Blanket, or Craftsman's Banner;' and shortly before his death commenced a periodical, entitled 'Entertainment for the curious.' In his poetry he imitated Allan Ramsay. His life was dissipated, and he is said to have died of starvation in the streets.

PENNEY, a surname not very common in Scotland, but apparently derived from the coin of that name. An eminent lawyer of this surname, William Penney, was in May 1858 appointed a judge of the court of session, when he assumed the judicial title of Lord Kinloch. He was born in Glasgow, 8th August, 1801, being the eldest son of William Penney, merchant in that city, by the daughter of the Rev. David Johnston, D.D., minister of North Leith (see vol. ii. p. 579). He was educated at the university of Glasgow, and for a short time assisted his father in his counting-house. The bent of his mind leading him to the study of the law, in 1824 he passed advocate, and long had a considerable practice at the bar. He is the author of a work called 'The Circle of Christian Doctrine, A Handbook of Faith, framed out of a Layman's Experience,' Edin. 1861. Lord Kinloch married, 1st, in 1828, the daughter of Charles Campbell, Esq. of Leekuary, Argyleshire. She died in 1839, and in 1842 he married, 2dly, the daughter of John Campbell, Esq. of Kinloch, Perthshire, from which estate his judicial title has been assumed. Issue of both marriages, 13 sons and drs. His two elder sons went to Bombay. His eldest daughter married Colonel Frazer, commandant of Agra during the Indian mutiny, and was left a widow.

PERRY, JAMES, an able political writer and journalist, the son of an eminent builder, was born at Aberdeen, October 30, 1756. He was at first destined for the profession of the law, but his father having become unsuccessful in business, he left Aberdeen in 1774, and proceeded to Edinburgh. Disappointed in procuring employment there, he went to Manchester, where he was for two years engaged as clerk to Mr. Dinwiddie, a respectable manufacturer. In the beginning of 1777 he quitted Manchester for London, but did not at first succeed in obtaining employment. To amuse his leisure hours, he occasionally occupied himself in writing essays and fugitive verses for an opposition paper called the 'General Advertiser,' which he dropped into the editor's box, and they were always inserted. Calling one day at the shop of Messrs. Richardson and Urquhart, booksellers, to inquire, as was his custom, whether they knew of any situation that would suit him, the latter, laying down the Advertiser, which he had been reading, replied in the negative, but pointing to a particular article in the paper, said, "If you could write such articles as this, you might obtain immediate employment." It happened to be a humorous essay written by Mr. Perry himself. On intimating this fact to Mr. Urquhart, he expressed great satisfaction at the discovery, and, as he was one of the principal proprietors, he got him next day engaged on the paper at a salary of a guinea a-week, with an additional half guinea for contributing to the London Evening Post, belonging to the same parties. On the memorable trials of Admirals Keppel and Palliser, he, for six successive weeks, by his individual efforts, managed to transmit daily, from Portsmouth, eight columns of a report of the proceedings, taken by him in court, a circumstance which raised the sale of the Advertiser several thousands a-day. Besides his contributions to the two papers on which he was engaged, he found time to publish, anonymously, several occasional political pamphlets and poems on subjects of temporary interest. In 1782 he projected and was the first editor of the 'European Magazine;' but after conducting it for about a year, he was appointed editor of the 'Gazetteer,' at a salary of four guineas a-week, and accepted the situation on the express condition that he should be left to the free exercise of his own political opinions, which were those of the whig party.

In the latter journal he had the merit of introducing an important improvement in the manner of giving the parliamentary debates, namely, full reports by a succession of shorthand writers, instead of mere hasty abstracts by one man's unassisted efforts, in each house of parliament, as had been till then the practice. For several years he acted as editor of Debrett's Parliamentary Debates. He afterwards purchased the 'Morning Chronicle,' and for a few months carried it on in conjunction with his friend Mr. Gray, after whose death he conducted it himself as sole editor and proprietor. Under his management that paper became the organ of the whig opposition; and it is mentioned, as a proof of the ability and judicious care with which he conducted it, that in the course of forty years he was only twice prosecuted under ex officio informations. The first time was for printing in it the 'Resolutions of the Derby Meeting,' and the second for inserting a paragraph, copied from the Examiner, regarding the prospective popularity of the prince of Wales, if he adopted a liberal policy on succeeding to the throne. On the former occasion he was defended by Lord Erskine; on the latter he pleaded his own cause in person with great tact and ability, and in both cases he was honourably acquitted. He had twice an opportunity of entering the house of commons, having been solicited by Mr. Pitt, and afterwards by Lord Shelburne, to accept of a seat in parliament; but firm to the cause he had espoused, he declined both offers.

In 1798 he married Miss Anne Hull, by whom he had eight children, one of whom died young. For a considerable time previous to his decease, his declining health compelled him to relinquish the management of the Chronicle; and during the four last months of his life he resided at Brighton, where he died, December 4, 1821, in his 65th year. Having, by a long course of useful industry and active exertion, amassed a considerable fortune, he had the happiness to maintain his aged parents in comfort, and bring up the orphan family of his sister by her first marriage. She was afterwards married, for the second time, to the celebrated Professor Porson, and died in 1796. His second son, Sir Thomas Erskine Perry, born in 1807, was called to the bar at the Inner Temple, in 1834, and in 1841 was appointed a judge of the supreme court at Bombay, when he was knighted. In September 1847 he was promoted to be chief justice of Bombay, but resigned his seat on the bench in 1852, and in May 1854 was electd M.P. for Devonport. He married in 1833, the only child of James M'Elkiney of Brighton, and niece maternally of Madame Jerome Bonaparte. She died in 1841.

PERTH, Earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred 4th March 1605, on James, fourth Lord Drummond, (see vol. ii. p. 63,) to him and his heirs male whatsoever. Dying without issue male, his brother, John, became second earl, 18th December 1611. This nobleman was one of those who voted for the five articles of Perth in 1621. With his son, James, Lord Drummond, he joined the association formed by the marquis of Montrose at Cumbernauld in 1641, for the support of the royal authority, and in 1654 he was, with his son, fined by Cromwell £5,000. He died 11th June 1662. With two daughters, he had five sons: 1. Henry, Lord Drummond, who died in infancy. 2. James, third earl of Perth. 3. The Hon. Robert Drummond of Auchinloch, who died young. 4. The Hon. Sir John Drummond of Logie-Almond, who also joined Montrose. Drummond of Logie-Almond was one of the partisans of the Pretender in 1715, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Sheriffmuir. To this family belonged the distinguished scholar and antiquary, The Right Hon. Sir William Drummond of Logie-Almond, a memoir of whom is given at vol. ii. p. 67; and 5. William, second earl of Roxburgh, (see ROXBURGH, earl of).

James, third earl, joined the marquis of Montrose in August 1645, and on the 13th of the following month was taken prisoner at the battle of Philiphaugh. He died 2d June 1675. By his countess, Lady Anne Gordon, eldest daughter of the second marquis of Huntly, with whom he was a tocher of £30,000 Scots, he had a daughter, Anne, countess of Errol, and two sons, James, fourth earl of Perth, and John, first earl of Melfort, (see p. 136 of this volume).

James, fourth earl of Perth, born in 1648, studied at the university of St. Andrews, and afterwards visited the continent. In 1678 he was sworn a privy councillor. He joined the opposition to the duke of Lauderdale, after whose fall he was, in May 1682, appointed lord-justice-general. On 16th November following, he became one of the extraordinary lords of session, and on 23d June 1684, lord-chancellor of Scotland, and sheriff-principal of the county of Edinburgh. On the accession of James VII., he was continued in all his offices, and had the management of affairs in Scotland. He declared himself a Roman Catholic, and was invested with the order of the Thistle, on its revival in 1687. Having rendered himself obnoxious, by the cruel proceedings of the government against the persecuted Presbyterians, on James' abdication, the mob plundered his house in Edinburgh, and in attempting to make his escape to the continent, in a vessel from Burntisland, he was pursued by some seamen from Kirkcaldy, and taken near the Bass, at the mouth of the Forth. After being detained for five days in the common prison of Kirkcaldy, he was sent to Alloa, where he was delivered into the custody of the earl of Mar, and he remained for nearly four years a close prisoner in Stirling castle. A guard of 300 was kept up at Kirkcaldy for four months, as information was received that a body of his clansmen were coming from the Highlands, to burn the town, in revenge for the earl's apprehension. On his liberation in August 1693, his lordship went to Rome, where he resided for two years. King James sent for him to St. Germain, and created him duke of Perth, first lord of his bedchamber, and knight of the Garter. He was also made chamberlain to the exiled queen, and governor of the young prince of Wales, afterwards the Chevalier de St. George. He died at St. Germain, in France, 11th March, 1716, and was interred in the chapel of the Scottish college at Paris.

James, Lord Drummond, his eldest son, by his countess, Lady Jane Douglas, was a firm adherent of the house of Stuart. He attended James VII. in his expedition to Ireland in 1690, after which he returned to Scotland. He opposed the Union, and was one of the first to join in the rebellion of 1715. He formed the daring project of seizing the castle of Edinburgh, of which he was to have been made governor had it succeeded, but the attempt was frustrated in time. He escaped to France in the same vessel with the Chevalier de St. George, and was attainted for his share in the insurrection. He had executed a disposition of his estates 28th August 1713, in favour of his son, which was sustained by the court of session in 1719, and affirmed by the house of lords in 1720. On his father's death in 1716, he assumed the title of duke of Perth. He died at Paris in 1730. He married Lady Jean Gordon, only daughter of George, first duke of Gordon, and by her he had two sons, who adhered faithfully to the exiled family. When the duke of Cumberland arrived at Perth, on his way to the north, he caused the duchess of Perth and the countess of Strathallan, 11th February 1746, to be apprehended, conveyed to Edinburgh and imprisoned in the castle, and they were not liberated till the 17th of the following November. The duchess died in 1773, aged about 90.

The elder son, James, styled duke of Perth, joined Prince Charles Edward, on his arrival at Perth, in September 1745. He is said to have shot one or two of his vassals who refused to take up arms for the prince, but the charge is very likely to have been a fabrication. At the battle of Preston or Gladsnuir, he commanded the right wing, as lieutenant-general, "and," says Douglas, "in spite of a very delicate constitution, he underwent the greatest fatigues, and was the first on every occasion of duty, where his head or his hands could be of use; bold as a lion in the field, but ever merciful in the hour of victory." He accompanied the Highland army into England, and at the siege of Carlisle had the principal command. He directed the attack, signed the capitulation, and gave orders in the town till the prince's arrival. On the retreat from Derby, the duke was despatched from Preston, with 100 horse, to bring up from Scotland some reinforcements which had arrived from France under his brother, John, styled Lord John Drummond. The latter, who, with the duke, was educated at the Scots college of Douay, and afterwards at Paris, had entered the service of the king of France, for whom he raised a regiment called the Royal Scots, of which he was appointed colonel. In November 1745, he arrived at Montrose, in command of the troops sent to Charles' assistance by the French king. He also brought with him a train of artillery, and a considerable quantity of arms and ammunition. He joined the prince at Stirling, on his return from England, and commanded the left wing at the battle of Falkirk. After the action he was slightly wounded in the arm by a straggling shot, on entering the town. The duke of Perth had been left at Stirling with several battalions, to prosecute the siege of the castle. At the battle of Culloden, the duke commanded on the left of the first line. After that disastrous battle he escaped to the coast of Moydart, where he embarked for France, but his constitution being quite exhausted with the fatigues he had undergone, he died on the passage, 11th May 1746, having just completed his 33d year. His brother and heir, Lord John Drummond, succeeded in making his escape to France, and afterwards served with distinction under Marshal Saxe in Flanders. After the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom in 1747, he had the rank of major-general. At the time he received this promotion he was lying ill of a fever, of which he died the same year, without issue. Before this he had been attainted by the British parliament, and his estates and titles forfeited to the crown. On his death, his uncle, the Hon. John Drummond, also styled Lord John Drummond, assumed the title of duke of Perth. He died at Edinburgh, 27th October 1757, and was buried in the Abbey church of Holyrood.

On his death, his brother, the Hon. Edward Drummond, till then styled Lord Edward Drummond, assumed the title of duke of Perth. He died at Paris, 7th February 1760, when this line of the family became extinct.

On June 28, 1853, George Drummond, Duke de Melfort, Comte de Lussan, and Baron de Valrose, in France, descended from John, earl of Melfort, in the Scottish peerage, attainted in 1695, was restored by act of parliament to the titles of earl of Perth and Lord Drummond of Stobhall and Montifex, Viscount Melfort and Forth, and Lord Drummond of Riebertoun, and Castlemaine and Galstoun, in the peerage of Scotland; the said earl of Melfort being the Hon. John Drummond, second son of the third earl of Perth, (see p. 137 of this volume). Born in London May 6, 1807, he was at one time a captain 93d Highlanders. He m. 1st in 1831, the Baroness Albertine de Rothery, widow of General Comte Rapp, issue, with a daughter, who died in infancy, 2 sons, Willoughby, born in 1832, died in Feb. 1833. 2. Malcolm, Viscount Forth, born at Naples, May 13, 1834, m. in 1855 Mary, eldest daughter of Hon. Adolphus Capel, and niece of the earl of Essex, and died in 1861, leaving a son, George Essex Montifex, Lord Drummond, born in 1856. The earl m. 2dly in 1847, Susan, widow of Col. Burrows, and dr. of Thomas Bermingham Sewell, Esq. of Athenry, issue 2 drs.

PERTH, BARON, a title in the peerage of the United Kingdom, conferred, in 1797, on James Drummond, the lineal descendant of John, earl of Melfort, who, in 1785, had obtained possession of the Perth estates. He was also, at the same time, created Baron Drummond of Stobhall. He died in 1800, without surviving male issue, when his titles became extinct; but the estates devolved upon the Hon. Clementina Sarah Drummond, his daughter and sole heiress. In April 1807 she married the Hon. Peter Robert Burrel, eldest son of the first Lord Gwydyr, who, on 5th Nov. following, assumed, by sign manual, the additional surname and arms of Drummond. In June 1820, he succeeded his father as 2d Lord Gwydyr, and in December 1828, his mother as 19th Baron Willoughby de Eresby, as well as joint hereditary great chamberlain of England.

PICKEN, ANDREW, a talented miscellaneous writer, was born in Paisley in 1788. His father, an eminent manufacturer in that town, educated him for the mercantile profession. At an early age he went to the West Indies, but, being disappointed in his prospects there, he returned to Europe, and obtained a confidential situation in the Bank of Ireland. He subsequently removed to Glasgow, and entered into business in that city. He first came before the world as an author in 1824, by publishing 'Tales and Sketches of the West of Scotland,' a work which had great local success. In this volume appeared his popular and pathetic story of 'Mary Ogilvie;' and among the Sketches was one 'On the Changes in the West of Scotland during the last Half Century,' which contained much playful satire, but some of the remarks unfortunately gave offence to the citizens of Glasgow; and this, with other circumstances, induced Mr. Picken to quit that place. He removed to Liverpool, where he established himself as a bookseller.

In 1826, when the mania for speculation raged like an epidemic in the world of business, Picken joined in some of the hazardous projects of the time, and lost his all. His creditors would readily have assisted him to commence business anew, but he preferred following the precarious profession of an author; he repaired to London with the manuscript of a novel, called 'The Sectarian,' which was published in 1828, and excited considerable interest on its first appearance. It showed great skill in what may be termed the morbid anatomy of the mind; but, owing in a great degree to the nature of the subject, it did not meet with the success which its merits deserved. It had the effect, however, of making the author known to the editors of the principal periodicals; and, from this time, Mr. Picken became a regular contributor to the leading Magazines and Reviews. The publication of 'The Dominic's Legacy' in 1830 finally established his fame as the delineator of Scottish humble life. When Colburn's 'Juvenile Library' was projected, Mr. Picken undertook to supply 'The Lives of Eminent Missionaries;' but before he had finished his part of the contents, the work was discontinued. The 'Lives' were, however, published in 1830 by Kidd, under the title of 'Travels and Researches of Eminent English Missionaries,' and two large impressions were sold.

His next publication was 'The Club Book, to which several of the most popular living writers contributed. The tales written by the editor were in his happiest style. The story entitled 'The Three Kearneys,' founded on circumstances which he had witnessed during his residence in Ireland, showed that the author had thoroughly investigated the mixed character of the Irish peasantry. The 'Deer-Stalkers,' also a tale of great interest, was dramatized, and acted at the Queen's Theatre with much success. Soon after, in the summer of 1832, he produced a work on the Canadas, professedly a compilation, the information it contained being condensed from original documents furnished by his friend Mr. Galt, to whom the volume is dedicated. To Leitch Ritchie's 'Library of Romance' he contributed 'Waltham, a Tale,' which, though not very favourably received, displayed high powers of thought and sentiment.

In the course of 1833 he published 'Traditional Stories of Old Families,' in two vols., intended as the first part of a series, which would embrace the legendary history of Scotland, England, and Ireland. The project excited considerable interest, and many members of the aristocracy offered to aid the author by giving him access to their family papers. But he was not destined to finish the work, or avail himself of the ample stores thus opened to him. On November 10, 1833, while conversing with his son, he was suddenly struck down with apoplexy. He was conveyed home insensible, but in the course of a few days seemed to be recovering, when a second stroke caused his death on the 23d of the same month. He left a widow and six children. A novel, which he had completed shortly before his last illness, and which he himself regarded as the best of his productions, was published after his death under the title of 'The Black Watch;' the original name of the gallant 42d regiment.

PINKERTON, a local surname, derived from lands in the parish of Craik, Fifeshire. There is also a village of the name in the neighbourhood of Dunbar.

PINKERTON JOHN, F.S.A., an eminent antiquary and industrious miscellaneous writer, was born at Edinburgh, February 13, 1758, and claimed to be descended from an ancient family, originally seated at Pinkerton, near Dunbar. His grandfather, a yeoman at Dalserf, Lanarkshire, had a numerous family. His father, James Pinkerton, settled in Somersetshire, where having acquired a moderate property as a dealer in hair, an article, as wigs were generally worn, then greatly in request, he returned to Scotland about 1755, and married a Mrs. Bowie, whose maiden name was Heron, the widow of a respectable merchant in Edinburgh, who brought him an increase of fortune and three sons. James, the eldest, joined the army as a volunteer, and was slain at the battle of Minden; while Robert, the second son, succeeded to an estate in Lanarkshire left by the father. The subject of this notice acquired the rudiments of his education at a small school in the suburbs of his native city, and was in 1764 removed to the grammar school of Lanark, kept by Mr. Thomson, the brother-in-law of the poet of the Seasons, where he remained for six years. He was afterwards apprenticed to Mr. William Aytom, an eminent writer to the signet at Edinburgh, in whose office he served five years. In 1776 he published an Elegy, called 'Craigmillar Castle,' which he dedicated to Dr. Beattie. He also wrote one or two Tragedies, but these were never printed. On the death of his father in 1780 he visited London, principally with the view of procuring copies of rare books, which he could not obtain in Edinburgh, and in the end of the following year was induced to settle there altogether. In 1781 he published an 8vo volume of miscellaneous poetry, under the affected title of 'Rimes,' with dissertations prefixed 'On the Oral Tradition of Poetry,' and 'On the Tragic Ballad,' which reached a second edition. In 1782 he produced 'Two Dithyrambic Odes on Enthusiasm, and to Laughter,' in a sixpenny quarto pamphlet, and soon after 'Tales in Verse.' In 1783 appeared his 'Select Scottish Ballads,' in 2 volumes; most of the pretended ancient pieces in which were fabrications of his own. The forgery being detected by a gentleman, who directly accused him of the same, by a letter in the Gentleman's Magazine for November 1784, he confessed himself guilty, but, in palliation of his conduct, pleaded his youth and purity of intention; professing that the imposition was only intended to give pleasure to the world. "All which," says the satirical Ritson, (in his Essay on Scottish Song, p. 77.) "it is to be hoped he has found some charitable person to believe."

A fondness for collecting medals, and other curiosities, first caused by his having, while a boy, received from a lady a rare coin of the Emperor Constantine, on his Sarmatian victory, which she had taken as a farthing, drew his attention to the defective state of all the books published on the subject, and led him to prepare a manual and tables for his own use, which he eventually enlarged, and, in 1784, published under the name of an 'Essay on Medals,' in 2 vols. In compiling this excellent work he was materially assisted by the late Mr. Southgate of the British Museum, and Mr. Douce. In 1785, under the assumed name of Robert Heron, the surname of his mother, he published a singular work, entitled 'Letters of Literature,' which was unfortunately ascribed to the ill-fated author of that name, then rising into notice. This work is remarkable for his dogmatical depreciation of the Greek and Roman authors, and his recommendation of a new system of orthography much more outré than that proposed by Elphinstone. The book, however, obtained for him an introduction to Horace Walpole, through whom he became acquainted with Gibbon the historian, and by the latter he was recommended to the booksellers as a fit person to translate a projected work called 'The English Monkish Historians,' which, however, was dropped from want of encouragement. After the death of the earl of Orford, a collection of his remarks, witticisms, and letters, sold by Pinkerton to the proprietors of the Monthly Magazine, was published in two small volumes, with a portrait, under the title of 'Walpoliana.'

In 1786 Mr. Pinkerton published a selection of 'Ancient Scottish Poems, never before in print,' with notes and a glossary, being chiefly taken from the manuscript of Sir Richard Maitland of Lethington, in the Pepysian Library at Cambridge, in which work, in a 'List of all the Scottish Poets, with brief remarks,' he coolly confesses the forgery of several pieces in the previous collection. In 1787 he brought out, under the feigned name of H. Bennet, M.A., 'The Treasury of Wit,' being a selection of apophthegms and jests, from books in several languages, accompanied by a discourse on wit and humour, considered under four different heads. The same year he produced, in one volume, his celebrated 'Dissertation on the Origin and Progress of the Scythians or Goths, being an Introduction to the Ancient and Modern History of Europe,' in which those singular prejudices against everything relating to the Celtic name or nations, which pervade all his historical and antiquarian disquisitions, were first fully displayed. In 1789 he edited a collection of 'Ancient Latin Lives of the Scottish Saints,' only one hundred copies of which were printed, a work which tended to illustrate the early history of his native country. This was soon after followed by a new and greatly enlarged edition of his 'Essay on Medals,' which has become a standard work for information in numismatics. In the same year he published an edition of Barbour's old Scots poem of 'The Bruce, or the History of Robert, King of Scotland.' In 1790 appeared another numismatic work, entitled 'The Medallie History of England, to the Revolution.' Shortly after he brought out 'An Inquiry into the History of Scotland preceding the Reign of Malcolm III., including the authentic History of that period,' which, from the many rare and curious documents it contains, is of great value to the student of Scottish antiquities. In 1792 he edited three octavo volumes of 'Scottish Poems, reprinted from scarce editions.

In 1793 Mr. Pinkerton married Miss Burgess of Odiham, Hants, sister of the bishop of Salisbury; but the union was not a happy one, and a separation soon took place. In 1797 he issued another work of laborious research and great importance, in spite of the distorted style in which it is written, entitled 'The History of Scotland, from the Accession of the House of Stuart to that of Mary,' 2 vols. 4to, embellished with a portrait of the author, with "spectacles on's nose." Soon after he published 'Iconographia Scotica, or Portraits of Illustrious Persons of Scotland, with Biographical Notes;' and in 1799 another similar work, entitled 'The Scottish Gallery, or Portraits of Eminent Persons of Scotland, with their Characters.' He next turned his attention to geography, and in 1802 issued a standard work in two vols. 4to, entitled 'The Modern Geography, Digested on a New Plan;' a second edition of which, in three vols., was published in 1807. An abridgment of which also appeared in one volume 8vo.

In 1806 he visited the French capital, and on his return published his observations, under the title of 'Recollections of Paris,' in two volumes 8vo. Subsequently he was employed in superintending 'A General Collection of Voyages and Travels,' extending to seventeen volumes 4to;

and a 'New Modern Atlas,' in parts, the former of which was commenced in 1808, and the latter in 1809. He also edited for a short time 'The Critical Review,' with but indifferent success. His last original work was 'Petrology, or a Treatise on Rocks,' which appeared in 1811. In 1814 he republished in two volumes 8vo, his 'Inquiry into the History of Scotland,' along with his 'Dissertation on the Scythians or Goths.' In his latter years he resided almost entirely at Paris, where he died, March 10, 1826. His appearance was that of a very little and very thin old man, with a small, sharp, yellow face, thickly pitted by the smallpox, and wearing a pair of green spectacles. He was an eccentric but highly industrious literary workman; and his talents, though in some instances ill directed, were commensurate with undertakings of no ordinary rank in literature. His portrait is subjoined:

PITCAIRN, a local surname, derived from lands of that name in the parish of Leslie, Fifeshire. The family of Pitcairn of Pitcairn was one of the oldest in that county. Piers de Pitcairn, their ancestor, swore fealty to Edward I. in 1296. Nisbet (Historical and Critical Remarks on Ragman Roll, appended to System of Heraldry, vol. ii. p. 38) states that he had seen charters of this family as far back as 1417, and adds: "Of them was Robert Pitcairn, commendator of Dunfermline, secretary during the regency of Moray, Lennox, Mar, and Morton; a great complier with everything uppermost, a great timeserver, a great enemy to Queen Mary, and a very humble servant of the regents. There is no memory of him remaining." He was one of the nine persons chosen by the regent Moray to accompany him to England in 1568, when he went to justify his proceedings against Queen Mary, and one of the commissioners for him during all the conferences at York. Calderwood (Historie, vol. ii. p. 504) calls him "a wise and trustie man." He was appointed a lord of session in 1568, was often chosen a lord of the articles, and in 1570 was secretary of state, which office he held during the three succeeding regencies, and afterwards under James VI. After the assassination of the regent Moray and the retirement of the lords of the queen's party to Linlithgow, the commendator of Dunfermline was sent ambassador to Queen Elizabeth to solicit her aid against them, and to signify to her that a regent would not be chosen without her appointment or consent. In 1572 he was one of the commissioners appointed to meet, "and conclude with the superintendents and ministers in the kirk, or commissioners authorised by them, on all matters" relating to the church. The following year he was one of the commissioners who signed the articles of pacification concluded at Perth. In 1578 he was sworn a member of the king's council. On 28th January 1581, with the rest of the king's household, he subscribed the second Confession of Faith, commonly called the king's confession. He was one of the parties engaged in the Raid of Ruthven in 1582, and in August of the following year, when Colonel William Stewart, (see PITTSWEEM, baron, post), had regained all his favour with the king, the commendator of Dunfermline sent him a velvet purse, containing 30 four-pound pieces of gold, and desired friendship with him. The colonel straightway informed the king, insinuating that it was a bribe that he might betray his majesty, and divided the pieces among thirty of the guard. Every man bent his piece and carried it hanging at his knapsack or hat, all the way from Perth to Falkland, while the purse was carried on a spear point, (Calderwood, vol. iii. p. 721). A few days thereafter, the commendator of Dunfermline was apprehended at Falkland, where the king then was, and confined in Lochleven castle, where he remained about a month. He was set at liberty on 23d September, on finding caution to remain in Dunfermline, and about six miles round about, under a penalty of £10,000. On his death in 1584, he was succeeded as commendator of Dunfermline by the master of Gray, on whose extrusion in 1587, Henry Pitcairn became commendator.

One of the family of Pitcairn of Pitcairn acquired by marriage the estate of Forthar, also in Fifeshire, after which the lands of Pitcairn went to a younger son, from whom was descended Archibald Pitcairne of Pitcairn, the celebrated physician, poet, and wit, a memoir of whom is given below, in larger type. Of the elder branch, David Pitcairn, M.D., became the representative, on the death of his uncle, Dr. William Pitcairn, who practised as a physician in London for nearly half a century, and was many years president of the college of physicians there. Of Dr. David Pitcairn a notice is also given below, in larger type.

Mr. Robert Pitcairn, writer to the signet, the editor of the valuable and extensive collection of 'Ancient Criminal Trials of Scotland,' 3 vols. 4to, which bears his name, was a native of Perth. For a long time he was the head of the Edinburgh Printing and Publishing Company, and secretary of the Calvin Translations Society, instituted in May 1843, for the publication of new and original translations of the writings of John Calvin. For the last two years of his life he held a situation in the General Register House, Edinburgh. He died suddenly, on the street, in July 1855.

PITCAIRNE, ARCHIBALD, an eminent physician and poet, was born at Edinburgh, December 25, 1652. His father, Alexander Pitcairne, who was engaged in trade, and became one of the magistrates of that city, was a descendant, as above indicated, of the ancient family of Pitcairn of Pitcairn, in Fifeshire, and his mother, whose name was Sydsersf, belonged to a good family in the county of Haddington, descended from Sydsersf of Ruthlaw. He commenced his classical education at the school of Dalkeith, and from thence removed in 1668 to the university of Edinburgh, where he obtained in 1671 his degree of M.A. He studied first divinity, and then the civil law, the latter of which he pursued with so much ardour as to injure his health. He was, in consequence, advised by his physicians to proceed to the south of France; but by the time he reached Paris he found himself much recovered, and resolved to attend the law classes at the university there. Meeting, however, with some of his countrymen, who were medical students, he was induced to abandon the study of the law, and for several months attended the hospitals with them. On his return to Edinburgh he became acquainted with Dr. David Gregory, the celebrated professor of mathematics, and directing his attention to the exact sciences, he soon attained to such proficiency as to make some improvements in the method of infinite series, then lately invented.

Believing, with many learned men of his time, that there was some necessary connection between mathematics and medicine, and hoping to reduce the healing art to geometrical precision, he finally fixed on physic as a profession. There being, however, in Edinburgh at this period, no other medical school than the sick-chamber and the drug-shop, he returned to Paris about 1675, where he prosecuted his medical studies with diligence and enthusiasm. In August 1680 he received from the faculty of Rheims the degree of M.D., which in August 1699 was likewise conferred on him by the university of Aberdeen. After making himself master of the science of medicine from the earliest periods, he returned to Edinburgh, with the firm resolution to reform and improve it in practice. In November 1681 the royal college of physicians of Edinburgh was incorporated, and his name, as one of the first members, graced the original patent from the crown. He settled as a physician in his native city, and ere long rose to the highest eminence in his profession.

Soon after establishing himself in Edinburgh, he married Margaret, daughter of Colonel James Hay of Pitfour, who died, after bearing him a son and a daughter, when he wrote an elegiac poem to her memory. The children, also, were soon removed by death. In 1688 he published his 'Solutio Problematis de Historicis,' in vindication of Harvey's claim to the discovery of the circulation of the blood. In consequence of his high reputation, he was invited, in 1692, by the curators of the university of Leyden, to fill the chair of physic there, at that time vacant. His well-known Jacobite principles excluding him from all public employments at home, he accepted the invitation, and delivered his inaugural oration the 26th April of that year. During his residence at Leyden, where among his pupils was the celebrated Boerhaave, he published several dissertations, chiefly with the view of showing the utility of mathematics in the study of medicine. In little more than a year after, he returned to Scotland to fulfil a matrimonial engagement with Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Archibald Stevenson, one of the king's physicians at Edinburgh. This lady he married in 1693, and as her friends were unwilling that she should leave her native place, he resigned his chair at Leyden, and once more settled in practice in Edinburgh. His great success, however, as well as his powers of satire, soon raised around him a host of enemies, and he was attacked in various publications of the period, particularly in a sarcastic little volume, entitled 'Apollo Mathematicus,' the production of Dr., afterwards Sir Edward, Eyzat. Sir Robert Sibbald having published a treatise in ridicule of the new method of applying geometry to physic, Dr. Pitcairne published an answer in 1696, under the title of 'Dissertatio de Legibus Historiæ Naturalis.' The opposition to him was shown even within the college of physicians itself. Having, on November 18, 1695, tendered a protest against the admission of certain Fellows, one of whom was Dr.

Eyzat, on account of its having been conducted in an irregular manner, the matter was referred to a committee, who, on the 22d, delivered in a report that Dr. Pitcairne's protestation was "a calumnious, scandalous, false, and arrogant paper." The meeting approving of this report, did thereupon suspend him "from voting in the college, or sitting in any meeting thereof;" nay, it was even proposed to prohibit him from the practice of physic. After a violent and protracted contention, during which various attempts at reconciliation were made, the president, Dr. Dundas, on January 4, 1704, proposed an act of oblivion, which was unanimously agreed to, and Dr. Pitcairne resumed his seat in the college.

In October 1701 the college of surgeons admitted him a Fellow, an honour which had never been bestowed upon any other physician. He appears to have held, also, the nominal appointment of medical professor in the university of Edinburgh. During the year last mentioned he republished his Medical Treatises, with some new ones, at Rotterdam, in one volume 4to, under the title of 'Dissertationes Medicæ,' dedicating the work to Lorenzo Bellini, professor at Piza, who had inscribed his 'Opuscula' to him. A more correct edition of the same appeared a few months before his death.

Dr. Pitcairne died at Edinburgh, October 20, 1713, and was interred in the Greyfriars' churchyard. By his second wife he had a son and four daughters, one of whom, Janet, was, in October 1731, married to the earl of Kelly. He was universally considered the first physician of his time. He is said to have had one of the best private libraries of that day, which, after his decease, was purchased by the czar of Russia. His Latin poems, collected after his death, were, with others, published by Ruddiman, in 1727, in a small volume, entitled 'Selecta Poemata Archibaldi Pitcairni et aliorum;' and, according to Lord Woodhouselee, they comprise almost all that are of any value in that publication. He was also the author of a comedy called 'The Assembly,' printed at London in 1722, which Mr. George Chalmers says is "personal and political, sarcastic and profane, and never could have been acted on any stage."

At the solicitation of his literary and political friends Dr. Pitcairne was in the habit of printing, for private circulation, the numerous jeux d'esprit which he composed from time to time with extraordinary facility. These were generally on single leaves or sheets of writing paper, and many of them were distinguished for their brilliancy and elegant Latinity; but, from this ephemeral way of distributing them, few of them, it is supposed, have been preserved. Of these pieces, Archibald Constable, Esq., the well-known publisher of Edinburgh, who died in 1827, and who was named after Dr. Pitcairne, had formed a very large and valuable collection, with numerous manuscript effusions in prose and verse. These Mr. Constable had intended to publish, with the rest of his miscellaneous poetry, accompanied by a Life of Pitcairne, for which he had amassed extensive materials. A large folio volume of printed and MS. pieces, being part of these collections, appeared in a London bookseller's catalogue, priced at £10 10s.; but it is not known into whose possession the volume was transferred.

A small atheistical pamphlet, attributed to Dr. Pitcairne, entitled 'Epistola Archimedis ad regem Gelonem Albæ Græcæ, reperta anno aëræ Christianæ,' 1688, was made the subject of the inaugural oration of the Rev. Thomas Halyburton, professor of divinity in the university of St. Andrews, in 1710, which was published at Edinburgh in 1714, under the title of 'Natural Religion Insufficient, and Revealed Necessary to Man's Happiness.' Dr. Pitcairne has been generally represented as a professed unbeliever, and it must be admitted that his profane jests but too much exposed him to the character of a scoffer at religion. But, as remarked by the writer of his life in the Encyclopædia Britannica, whatever doubts might be entertained as to the soundness of his creed, they are completely removed by his verses written on Christmas Day; and Dr. Drummond has stated, that, during his last illness, he continued in the greatest tranquillity of mind, and evinced just apprehensions of God and religion.

A pleasing specimen of this eminent physician's poetical powers, being a poem 'On the King and Queen of Fairy,' in two versions, Latin and English, will be found in Donaldson's Collection, under the assumed name of Walter Denestone. An account of the Life and Writings of Dr. Pitcairne, by Charles Webster, M.D., was published at Edinburgh in 1781.

Dr. Pitcairne was likewise author of 'Babell, or the Assembly, a Poem, M.D.C.XCII.' Like the comedy of 'The Assembly,' this satirical poem was written in ridicule of the proceedings of the General Assembly, in the year 1692; but until 1830 it remained in MS., when it was printed for the members of the Maitland Club, under the editorial care of George R. Kinloch, Esq. That gentleman made use of two MSS., one in the possession of Dr. Keith of Edinburgh, the other in the library of Mr. Dundas of Arniston, which had formerly belonged to the well-known Scottish collector, Robert Milne of Edinburgh.

Dr. Pitcairne's published works are:

PITCAIRN, DAVID, M.D., an eminent physician, the eldest son of Major John Pitcairn of the marines, killed in the attack upon Bunker's Hill, in 1775, and Elizabeth, daughter of Robert Dalrymple, Esq. of Annfield, Dumfries-shire, was born May 1, 1749, in the house of his grandfather, the Rev. David Pitcairn, minister of Dysart, Fifeshire. After being at the High school of Edinburgh for four years, he attended the classes at the university of Glasgow till he was twenty; spending much of his leisure time with the family of the Rev. James Baillie, minister of Bothwell, Lanarkshire, father of Dr. Matthew Baillie and Joanna Baillie. In 1769 Mr. Piteairn entered at the university of Edinburgh, and studied medicine there for three years. In 1772 he went to London, and attended the lectures of Dr. William Hunter and Dr. George Fordyce. About the same time, that he might obtain an English degree in phisic, he entered at Bennet college, Cambridge, where he graduated. In 1780 he was elected physician to St. Bartholomew's hospital, London, and in 1792 physician to Christ's hospital. The former office, on account of the great increase of his private practice, he resigned in 1793. By the death of Dr. Warren in June 1797, Dr. Piteairn was placed at the head of his profession in London. It was his friendship for Dr. Matthew Baillie which first brought that eminent physician into notice. Although there was a great disparity of years, there existed betwixt them a long and uninterrupted friendship, and the confidence reposed by Dr. Piteairn in the professional abilities of his friend was sincere, Dr. Baillie being his only medical adviser to the last moment of his existenece.

Dr. Piteairn died in April 1809. He was a man of elegant literary accomplishments, joined to much professional knowledge. In person he was tall and erect. He was fond of country sports and athletic games, particularly of golf. It was a saying of his that "the last thing a physician learns in the course of his experience is to know when to do nothing." A flattering tribute to his memory, written by Dr. Wells, was inserted in the Gentleman's Magazine soon after his decease. It thus concludes: "Although of great practical knowledge, and having made many original observations on disease, he never published anything, but he fell a victim to a disease which had before escaped the observation of medical men, inflammation of the larynx, and so had the peculiar and melancholy privilege of enlightening his profession in the very act of dying."

PITSLIGO, Baron Forbes of, a title (attainted in 1746) in the peerage of Scotland, conferred by patent, dated at Holyrood, 24th March, 1633, to him and his heirs male whatsoever, on Alexander Forbes of Pitsligo, Aberdeenshire, descended from Sir William Forbes, second son of Alexander de Forbes, justiciary of Aberdeen, who died in 1405, (see vol. ii. p. 227). On the death of the first Lord Pitsligo, 25th October, 1635, his son, Alexander, became second lord, and was succeeded by his only son, Alexander, third lord, who died in 1691. Of his son, Alexander, fourth and last Lord Pitsligo, celebrated for his share in the rebellion of 1745, and for his various adventures and escapes subsequent to it, a memoir is given at page 238 of volume 2d. After Culloden, with Lord Ogilvy and Hunter of Burnside, he got safe to Bergen in Norway, whence the party proceeded to Sweden. Lord Pitsligo afterwards returned to Scotland, and lurked amongst his tenantry in Aberdeenshire, till his death in 1762, at the advanced age of 85. His sister, the Hon. Mary Forbes, by her first husband, John Forbes, younger of Monymusk, was the mother of Sir William Forbes, baronet, father of the eminent banker of that name, a memoir of whom is given at page 242 of volume 2d. Lord Pitsligo's only son, John, master of Pitsligo, died in 1781, without issue.

The title is claimed by Sir John Forbes of Pitsligo and Fetterairn, baronet; by Sir Charles Forbes of Newe and Edinglassie, baronet; and by John Alexander Forbes, Esq., formerly lieutenant-colonel of the 92d Highlanders.

PITTENWEEM, Baron, a title (extinct) in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1606, on Frederick Stewart, son of Colonel William Stewart, captain of the king's guard, who, on 31st July 1583, obtained a charter of the priory and lands of Pittenweem, and was thenceforth styled commendator thereof. This Colonel William Stewart, one of the unworthy favourites of James VI., was the second son of Thomas Stewart of Galston, in Ayrshire, third in descent from Alexander Stewart of Dreghorn, second son of Alan Stewart of Darnley. On obtaining favour at court he seems to have changed the spelling of his name to Stuart, as being of kin to his majesty. Calderwood (vol. iv. p. 448) says of him: "Colonell Stuart was (as is constantly reported) first a cloutter of old shoes. He went to the Low Countries, where he served in the warres, first as a souldiour, then as a captane, at last as a colonell. He returneth home, and was employed by the king to apprehend anie subject, in anie corner of the kingdom, that the court had anie querrell at. He wanted not likewise his reward, for he was gifted with the pryoric of Pittinweme, and married the Ladie Pitfirrane, not without suspicioun of the murder of her former husband." In October 1582 he and Mr. James Halyburton, provost of Dundee, were the king's commissioners to the General Assembly. In January 1583, after the Raid of Ruthven, by Colonel Stuart's interest, the king obtained permission from the confederated lords to visit the earl of March at St. Andrews, and on his entrance into the castle there, the colonel ordered the gates to be shut, and his followers excluded. The profligate earl of Arran soon regained his former place in the royal favour. In April, Colonel Stuart was sent ambassador to England. At a parliament held at Edinburgh, 4th December of the same year (1583), those who had been concerned in the Raid of Ruthven were declared guilty of high treason. At this parliament it was also, says Calderwood, (vol. iii. p. 761.) "statuted that the old plaeks, baches, three pennie peeces, and twelve pennie peeces, should be brought in betwixt and Julie next, to be brokin; and that a new coine be strickin, foure pennie groats, eight pennie groats, sixteen pennie groats, and that they be three pennie fyne. Yitt were they not so fyne. This was done to gett silver to Colonell Stewart to pay the waiged men of warre. The burrowes disassented from breaking of the old coin." In Anderson's Diplomata et Numismata Scotie are engravings of 13 gold and 23 silver coins of James VI., some of which are here given :

It was Col. Stewart, or Stuart, as he called himself, who apprehended the earl of Gowrie at Dundee, April 13, 1854. (see vol. ii. p. 340). The earl was beheaded at Stirling on the 4th of the following month, and on the earls of Mar and Angus and the master of Glamis seizing the castle of that town, Colonel Stuart hastened thither with 500 men. Hearing of the approach of James with 20,000 men, they fled to England, whence they returned in October 1585, with a large force, and having laid siege to Stirling castle, succeeded in obtaining possession of it and of the king's person. On this occasion, Colonel Stuart, who had been directed to defend the street at the west port of the town, had a narrow escape. Being fiercely assaulted he fled to the castle, but was followed, and overtaken by James Haldane, brother of the laird of Gleneagles, who, as he was laying hands upon him, was shot by the colonel's servant, Joshua Henderson. This led to the downfall and removal of the king's favourites, and Colonel Stuart was deprived of the command of the king's guard. In June 1589 he was sent to Denmark, with a full commission, to be present with the earl Marischal, James' ambassador, at the ratification of the king's marriage with the princess Anne, the youngest daughter of the Danish king, and having soon after returned to Scotland, he was again despatched, on 28th March 1590, by the nobility with five ships, to bring home the king and queen. On 20th January 1592 he was warded in the castle of Edinburgh for taking part with the queen in her intrigues against the chancellor, but was soon released. On the 15th August following, having accused Lord Spynie of secret conference with the turbulent earl of Bothwell, who at this time was the torment of James' life, Spynie challenged him to single combat, on which he was again imprisoned for a short time in the castle of Edinburgh, Spynie being warded in that of Stirling.

In 1606, the lands and baronies belonging to the priory of Pittenweem were by act of parliament erected into a temporal lordship, in favour of Colonel Stuart's son, Frederick, to him and his heirs and assigns, and he had further charters of the same in 1609 and 1618. Lord Pittenweem died without issue, and the title has never been claimed by any heir general or assignee. Previous to his death, he disposed the lordship to Thomas, earl of Kellie, who, with consent of his son, Alexander, Lord Fenton, surrendered the superiority of the same into the hands of the king.

PLAYFAIR, JONAS, an eminent mathematician and natural philosopher, born March 10, 1748, at Benvie in Forfarshire, was the eldest son of the Rev. James Playfair, minister of the united parishes of Liff and Benvie. He received the rudimentary part of his education at home; and, at the age of fourteen, was sent to the university of St. Andrews, where he soon became distinguished for his love of study, and especially for the rapid progress which he made in mathematical learning. While yet a mere student, he was usually selected by Dr. Wilkie, author of 'The Epigoniad,' then professor of natural philosophy, to deliver the lectures to his class during his own absence from indisposition. In 1766, when only eighteen years old, he became a candidate for the professorship of mathematics in Marischal college, Aberdeen. After a lengthened and very strict examination, only two out of six rival competitors were judged to have excelled him, namely, Dr. Trail, who was appointed to the chair, and Dr. Hamilton, who subsequently succeeded to it. In 1769 he went to reside at Edinburgh; and on the death of Dr. Wilkie, in 1772, he offered himself as his successor, but was again unsuccessful. The same year his father died; and the care of providing for the support of his mother and her young family having in consequence devolved upon him, he considered it his duty to enter upon the ministry, for which he had been educated, notwithstanding his strong predilection for scientific pursuits. He accordingly applied to Lord Gray, the joint patron with the Crown, for the vacant living of Liff and Benvie, and his request was at once complied with; but his lordship's right of presentation being disputed, he did not obtain induction till August 1773.

During the nine following years his time was chiefly occupied with his pastoral duties, and the superintendence of the education of his brothers. He did not neglect, however, the prosecution of his own philosophical researches. In 1774 he visited Schichallion, in Perthshire, to witness the experiments of Dr. Maskelyne, the astronomer royal, on the attraction of the mountains in that district, on which occasion he formed a permanent friendship with that celebrated philosopher. His earliest contribution to science was a paper communicated to the Royal Society of London, and inserted in their Transactions for 1779, 'On the Arithmetical of Impossible Quantities,' which is said to exhibit a greater taste for purely analytical investigation than had been shown by any of the British mathematicians of that age.

In 1782 he was induced, by an advantageous offer made to him by Mr. Ferguson of Raith, to resign his charge, and to become the tutor of his two sons, Mr. Robert Ferguson, subsequently a member of parliament, and his brother, afterwards Sir Ronald. In consequence of this arrangement, he removed to Edinburgh with his pupils.

In 1785, when Dr. Adam Ferguson exchanged his chair of moral philosophy for that of mathematics, taught by Mr. Dugald Stewart, and, in consequence of declining health, retired from the duties of the professorship, Mr. Playfair was admitted into the university of Edinburgh as his assistant, being appointed joint professor of mathematics. On the institution of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, in 1783, he became one of its original Fellows, and in subsequent years he contributed many valuable papers to its Transactions. In 1789 he communicated his 'Remarks on the Astronomy of the Brahmins,' which excited considerable attention both in Europe and India, and gave rise to much speculation and controversial discussion. The same year he succeeded Dr. Gregory as secretary to the physical class of the society; and, owing to the illness of Dr. Robison, the duties of general secretary, with the arrangement of the Society's Memoirs for publication, were for many years chiefly performed by him. In 1792 he communicated to the Society's Transactions a learned treatise 'On the Origin and Investigation of Porisms,' in which he gives a clear and beautiful philosophical analysis of this class of geometrical propositions.

In 1795 he published his 'Elements of Geometry,' for the use of the pupils attending his class, a work which has gone through numerous editions. In 1802 he published his 'Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory of the Earth,' in one vol. 8vo, a work on which he had been engaged for five years, and in which he powerfully, and with all the arguments he could derive from reason, science, and philosophy, effectively supports the geological system of his friend Dr. James Hutton, an admirable biographical account of whom he communicated in 1803 to the Transactions of the Royal Society.

On the death of Dr. Robison in 1805, Mr. Playfair succeeded him as general secretary to the Royal Society, and also as professor of natural philosophy in the university of Edinburgh. He resigned, in consequence, his former chair of mathematics, on which occasion his class presented him with a valuable astronomical circle, now in the Observatory of the Astronomical Institution at Edinburgh. The opposition of the clergy to the appointment of Mr. Leslie as his successor in the vacant chair, induced Mr. Playfair to come forward in his vindication, which he did, first, in a Letter to the lord provost, and afterwards in a strongly-written pamphlet, published in 1806, neither of which have been reprinted in the collection of his works.

In 1807 he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of London, and soon afterwards communicated to that learned body his 'Lithological Survey of Schichallion,' which appeared in the Philosophical Transactions for 1811.

In 1814 appeared, in two vols. 8vo, his 'Outlines of Natural Philosophy,' being the heads of lectures delivered to his class, an elementary work of great value. In 1815 he drew up for the Royal Society of Edinburgh a very interesting memoir of his distinguished predecessor, Dr. John Robison, which was published in their Transactions. To the Supplement of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' he contributed an Introductory Dissertation on 'The Progress of Mathematical and Physical Science since the Revival of Letters in Europe;' which masterly production comprises not only a succinct history of the sciences, but also gives comprehensive biographical sketches of those persons by whom they have been principally cultivated in this and other countries. For the same work he also wrote the valuable biographical account of Æpinus, and the learned article on 'Physical Astronomy.'

Having planned a greatly enlarged edition of his 'Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory,' he had at different times made excursions to various parts of Scotland and England, for the purpose of extending his geological inquiries, besides deriving materials for his intended republication, from the most approved works on geology; but he had no opportunity of visiting the Continent till the general peace of 1815 threw it open to travellers from Britain. At the age of sixty-eight he undertook a long journey through France and Switzerland into Italy, and spent a considerable time in exploring the mineralogical and geological phenomena of the Alps. On his return, after eighteen months' absence, other occupations unfortunately prevented him from maturing for publication the vast body of valuable materials he had collected for the proposed second edition of his Illustrations. For some time before his death he suffered much from a severe attack of disease in the bladder, which occasionally interrupted his literary labours, and of which at last he died on the morning of July 19, 1819, in the 72d year of his age. A monument has been erected to his memory on the Calton Hill, Edinburgh. His portrait is subjoined:

From 1804 Professor Playfair was a frequent contributor to the Edinburgh Review, the majority of his articles being of a scientific nature. The most celebrated of these is his admirable analysis of the 'Mecanique Celeste' of Laplace, and his masterly review of 'Leslie's Geometry.' In general literature he wrote for the same periodical an able and interesting paper on Madame de Stael's 'Corinne.' The whole of his articles are reprinted in the fourth volume of the collected edition of his works published at Edinburgh in 1822, in four vols. 8vo, with a Life prefixed by his nephew, Dr. James G. Playfair. An unfinished Memoir of John Clerk of Eldin, the inventor of the Naval Tactics, left by him in manuscript, was published, after his death, in the 9th volume of the Edinburgh Transactions. An interesting account of the character and merits of this illustrious mathematician, from the pen of Lord Jeffrey, has been inserted in the Encyclopædia Britannica, and in the Memoir prefixed to his works by his nephew.

PLAYFAIR, WILLIAM, an ingenious mechanic and miscellaneous writer, brother of the preceding, was born in 1759. His father dying when he was very young, his education and support devolved on his brother. He early discovered a strong predilection for mechanical science, and when of sufficient age was apprenticed for a short period to a millwright of the name of Meikle, in Dundee, where he had for his fellow-apprentice John Rennie, the celebrated engineer. He subsequently went to Birmingham, and was engaged, in 1780, as a draughtsman, at the Soho Works, in the employment of Mr. James Watt. Being ambitious to be known as an author, he turned his attention to politics and political economy, and published a great variety of pamphlets connected therewith. During the early period of his literary career, however, he did not altogether neglect his mechanical pursuits, having successively obtained five patents for various inventions. He also invented a machine to complete the ornamental part or fretwork of silver tea-boards and sugar-tongs, which had hitherto been executed by the hand only. The same machine was applicable to the manufacture of coach ornaments, buckles and even horse shoes.

After residing some time at Birmingham he went to London, where he opened a silversmith's shop for the sale of plate of his own manufacture; but this he soon relinquished, and proceeded to Paris, where he entered on some mechanical speculations, particularly a rolling-mill on a new plan, for the manufacture of which he obtained an exclusive privilege. One of the most important of his discoveries was that of the plan of the telegraph, then in constant use in France, which, with an alphabet invented by himself, he communicated to the British government; though the great service he thus rendered to his country was not only totally unrewarded, but was even very tardily acknowledged. He happened to be at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, when a member of the parliament of Bordeaux arrived at the same inn, and described to him a telegraph which had been erected on the mountain of Belville. Having at once comprehended the plan, in the course of the next day he executed two working models of the instrument, which he sent to the duke of York; "and hence," says the Encyclopædia Britannica, "the plan and alphabet of the machine came to England."

While residing in Paris, Mr. Playfair became acquainted with Mr. Joel Barlow, who had been sent to France as agent for the sale of about three million of acres of land, on the banks of the Scioto, a river falling into the Ohio, which had been purchased by a company at New York, to be disposed of in lots to intending emigrants. As Mr. Barlow was without connections in Paris, and unacquainted with the French language, Playfair undertook the management of the business. The lands were to be sold at five shillings per acre, one-half to be paid on signing the act of sale, and the other half to remain on mortgage to the United States, to be paid within two years after taking possession. In November 1789 he opened an office in a street contiguous to the Palais Royal, and in less than two months fifty thousand acres of land were disposed of. Two vessels sailed from Havre laden with the first settlers in the colony of Scioto, which was thus formed by Mr. Playfair. Having soon after unfortunately expressed himself in an unguarded manner concerning the French Revolution, he incurred the hostility of Barrere, the president of the National Convention, who obtained an order for his arrest. Being, however, seasonably apprized of his danger, he succeeded in escaping into Holland, and thence returned to England. On his arrival in London, he projected a Bank, under the name of the Security Bank, which was opened in Cornhill. Its object was to divide large securities, so as to facilitate the negotiation of small loans; but sufficient attention not being paid to the nature of the securities, bankruptcy ensued. He now devoted himself more closely than ever to literary pursuits, and his life, like that of most authors, was henceforth much chequered. His pamphlets and other publications, which are chiefly on subjects of temporary interest, amount to nearly a hundred distinct works. In politics he was a firm supporter of Government, and able vindicator of its measures towards France.

On the restoration of the Bourbons, he went again to Paris, and was for some time editor of Galignani's Messenger, until obliged to quit France by a prosecution for libel. From that period he picked up a precarious living in London by essay-writing and translating. He died February 11, 1823, in the 64th year of his age; leaving a widow, two sons, and two daughters, one of the latter being unfortunately blind.

POLLOCK, a surname derived from lands in Renfrewshire, called, since the 14th century, the parish of Eastwood, from an extensive forest which was formerly there. The name is supposed to be from the Gaelic pollag, 'a little pool.' In old writings the name is spelled Polloc and Pollok, the latter being the form generally adopted. The greater part of the parish belongs to Sir John Maxwell of Nether Pollok, baronet.

POLLOCK, the name of an ancient family of Renfrewshire, descended from Robert, youngest brother of "Petrus son of Fulbert," who was the first to assume this surname from his hereditary lands of Pollok in that county. About 1163, the church of Pollok, with its pertinents, was granted by Peter de Pollok to the then recently founded monastery of Paisley. His next brother, Helias, gave to the same monastery the church of Mearns, the next parish to Eastwood. Peter de Pollok was also possessor of the barony of Rothes, Aberdeenshire, which he gave to his daughter, Maurice de Pollok, or, as some say, his grand-daughter, Eva de Mortach, who married Sir Norman Leslie, and was the ancestress of the earls of Rothes, (see ROTHES, earl of). Peter de Pollok was succeeded by his brother Robert, who is witness in the donation of the kirks of Strathgryfe and Innerwick by Walter, dapifer, founder of the monastery of Paisley in the beginning of the reign of William the Lion. He is also a witness in several of the charters of Allan the son of Walter. Robert, son of Robert de Pollok, mortified a yearly rent to the same monastery, for the soul of Peter de Pollok, and Robert, son of Fulbert, his father. In the reigns of Alexander II., and Alexander III., Thomas de Pollok is witness in many charters.

John Pollok of Pollok, the twelfth in descent from the first Robert, fought on Queen Mary's side, at the battle of Langside, for which he was forfeited. His son, John Pollok of Pollok, was killed at the faction fight of Lockerbie in 1593, when assisting his kinsman, Lord Maxwell, against the laird of Johnstone.

His descendant, Sir Robert Pollok of Pollok, for his distinguished services in the reigns of William III. and Queen Anne, was, by the latter, created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 13th November 1703. He was a commissioner for the shire of Edinburgh to the Scottish Estates, and after the Union he represented that county in the Imperial parliament. On his death in 1736, his grandson, Sir Robert, became the second baronet. He married Ann, daughter of the Rev. Cornelius Crawford, of the family of Jordanhill, and had an only daughter, Cornelia, who succeeded to the estate, on her father's death in 1783. Dying in infancy two years afterwards, the estate was next inherited by her aunt, Jean Pollok, daughter of Walter Pollok, 2d son of the 1st baronet, and sister of the 2d baronet. She was succeeded by her cousin, Robina, only child of Captain John Pollok of Balgray, 3d son of the 1st bart. This Captain John Pollok was killed at the battle of Fontenoy in 1745. She married Sir Hew Crawford of Jordanhill, bart., (see vol. i. p. 706.) and had 2 sons and 3 daughters. On the death of Sir Hew, July 1, 1794, he was succeeded in the baronetcy of Kilbirnie, by his eldest son, Sir Robert, in whose person the families of Pollok of Pollok and Crawford of Kilbirnie and Jordanhill were united. On the death of his mother in 1820, he became possessed of her estate, when he assumed the additional name of Pollok, in terms of the settlement of the Renfrewshire property. He died, without issue, Aug. 7, 1845, when his nephew, Sir Hew Crawford Pollok of Pollok and Kilbirnie, born in 1794, eldest son of Captain Hew Crawford, deceased, succeeded to the estates and the baronetcy of Kilbirnie, which last dates from 1638. He married Elizabeth Oswald, daughter of Matthew Dunlop, Esq., issue, a son, Hew, born in 1843, and a daughter, Jane.

POLLOK, ROBERT, M. A., author of 'The Course of Time,' was born in 1799, in the parish of Eaglesham, Renfrewshire, at the farm of North Muirhouse, of which his father, John Pollok, was tenant. The farmhouse was overshadowed by some trees, to which he thus alludes in his poem :

"Much of my native scenery appears,
And presses forward to be in my song;
But must not now; for much behind awaits
Of higher note. Four trees I pass not by,

Which o'er our house their evening shadow threw :—
Three ash, and one of elm. Tall trees they were,
And old; and had been old a century
Before my day. None living could say aught
About their youth; but they were goodly trees :
And oft I wondered, as I sat and thought
Beneath their summer shade, or in the night
Of winter heard the spirits of the wind
Growing among their boughs—how they had grown
So high in such a rough tempestuous place :
And when a hapless branch, torn by the blast, Fell down, I mourned as if a friend had fallen."

His mother, Margaret Dickie, was from the parish of Fenwick. Her ancestors, of the name of Gemmel, were for many generations possessors of a property in that parish called Horsehill. He acquired the rudiments of his education at Langlee, and at a school at Newton-Mearns. For some time he assisted his father on the farm, but finding the laborious duties of an "upland farmer" too arduous for his constitution, he abandoned the plough, and went to reside at Barrhead with David Young, a brother-in-law, for the purpose of learning the carpenter trade. After making a few chairs and some other trifling articles, he became dissatisfied with a mere mechanical employment, and took up his abode with an uncle, Mr. David Dickie, at Fenwick, where, with a view to the ministry of the United Associate church, he applied himself to study. He learned Latin and Greek under Mr. Fairlie, the parish teacher, and subsequently went to the university of Glasgow, where, after the usual curriculum, he took his degree of master of arts. He next attended the divinity hall of the United Secession church, at Glasgow, under the Rev. Dr. Dick of that city, at that time sole professor of theology in that communion. He seems also to have attended the theological lectures of Professor MacGill in Glasgow university.

In the spring of 1827, he was, by the United Associate presbytery of Edinburgh, with his brother, licensed to preach the gospel. In the beginning of the same year, his celebrated poem, 'The Course of Time,' was published by the Messrs. Blackwood of Edinburgh, and at once took a foremost place in his country's literature. It is in blank verse, extending to ten books, and throughout displays a strong original genius, with frequently a power and enthusiasm most extraordinary in so young a man. The style, always expressive and fervid, is often scriptural and intensely poetical. It speedily passed through numerous editions. A beautifully illustrated edition was issued by the same publishers in 1856.

Soon after receiving his license, he was attacked with pulmonary disease, and went to reside, for a short time, at Aberdeen, without any visible improvement of his health. He preached once for Dr. John Brown, in the United Presbyterian church, East Rose Street, Edinburgh, and once or twice for Dr. Belfrage, Slateford. These were his only pulpit appearances. He spent the greater part of the summer of 1827 under the hospitable roof of Dr. Belfrage, and received every advantage which the best medical skill and the anxious attentions of affectionate friends could bestow.

As the malady under which he suffered seemed to gain ground, he was advised by Dr. Abercrombie of Edinburgh, and other eminent physicians, to remove to a more genial climate during the approaching winter. It was, therefore, determined that he should set out for Pisa, in the grand-duchy of Tuscany, and the means for prosecuting such a journey were readily supplied by the admirers of his genius. In the commencement of autumn he left Edinburgh, accompanied by his sister, afterwards Mrs. Gilmour, Eaglesham, and travelled by a steam-vessel to London. During the short time he remained in that city he resided at Camberwell with his kind and hospitable countryman, John Pirie, Esq., subsequently Sir John Pirie, an eminent shipowner and alderman, who, in 1842, was lord mayor of London, to whom he had been introduced by a mutual friend, and who made every exertion to contribute to his comfort.

After arrangements had been entered into for his voyage to Italy, his medical advisers in London, fearing that he would never reach that country, recommended his immediate removal to the south-west of England, and the neighbourhood of Southampton was selected as a suitable situation. On his arrival there, he took up his residence on Shirly Common. His disease, however, had made too much progress to be arrested, and in the course of a few weeks he died of consumption, September 18, 1827. He lies buried in the churchyard of Millbrook, the parish in which Shirly Common is situated. An obelisk of Peterhead granite has been erected over his grave, bearing, with the dates of his birth and death, the following simple inscription:—"The Grave of Robert Pollok, A.M., Author of 'The Course of Time.' His immortal Poem is his Monument."

Pollok was also the author of three small juvenile tales, at first published anonymously, under the title of 'Tales of the Covenanters.' After his death they were reprinted with his name. It was chiefly from the details of the sufferings of her own family in the time of the persecution in Scotland in the seventeenth century, as related to him by his mother, that the poet was led to their composition. An edition of these tales was published by W. Oliphant of Edinburgh in 1833, with a portrait and a Life of the author. His portrait is subjoined:

One of his early tales was named 'Ralph Gemmel, a Tale for Youth.' The Bible he had studied intensely, and hence acquired that scriptural style which often glows in long passages in 'The Course of Time.' Milton, Young, and Byron, were the only poets he read. The spirit of poetry and inspiration was formed, and "became a living soul" within him, in the green moorland solitudes round about his father's house, in the wild and beautiful parishes of Eaglesham and Mearns. His short compositions, written in early youth, gave little promise of power, and most of them were destroyed about the time of the publication of 'The Course of Time.' He was only 27 when he died. He may be described in his own words:

"A youth of great religious soul, who sat
Retired in voluntary loneliness,
In reverie extravagant now wrapped,
Or poring now on book of ancient date,
With filial awe, and dipping oft his pen
To write immortal things."

His father died in 1841. His mother's death took place in 1825. Besides his brother, his cousin, the Rev. Robert Pollok, was a minister of the United Associate Synod, the latter at Buckhaven in Fife.

POLWARTH, Baron, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred 26th December, 1690, on the distinguished statesman and patriot, Sir Patriek Hume, who, on 23d April 1697, was raised to the higher dignity of earl of Marelmont, (see page 103 of this vol., and page 502 of vol. ii.). The Polwarth peerage was in remainder to the heirs male of his body, and failing these to the heirs general of such heirs male. The title, with that of earl of Marelmont, became dormant on the death of the third earl, 10th January 1794. His youngest daughter, Lady Diana Hume, married Walter Scott of Harden, Berwickshire, M.P., who died 25th January 1793. She was the only one of the earl's three daughters who left surviving issue. Their only son, Hugh Scott of Harden, succeeded, in 1835, in establishing his claim to the title of Lord Polwarth, before the House of Lords, and thus became fourth Lord Polwarth. He married the daughter of Hans Moritz, Count von Bruhl, Saxon minister in England, and died Dec. 28, 1841, aged 83. His son, Henry Francis Hepburne-Scott, born Jan. 1, 1800, succeeded as 5th Baron Polwarth. In 1843 he was elected one of the 16 representative Scots peers, and in 1845 was appointed lord-lieutenant and sheriff-principal of Selkirkshire. In 1835 he married Georgina, 3d daughter of George Baillie of Jerviswoode and Mellerstain, with issue, 2 sons and 3 daughters. His elder son, Walter Hugh, master of Polwarth, was born Nov. 30, 1838.

His lordship assumed the additional surname of Hepburne, in consequence of the estates of the Hepburnes of Humbie (see vol. ii. p. 468) having descended to him through Helen Hepburne, countess of Farras, his great-great-grandmother. Lord Polwarth is twelfth baron of Harden, representative of the Scotts of Synton, and twenty-second in lineal male descent from Uchtred Fitz-Scott, who flourished in the reign of David I. By the failure of the male heirs of Sir Robert Scott of Murdochstone, from whom derives the ducal house of Bueeleuch, the chieftainship of all the Scotts in Scotland, devolves on Lord Polwarth, both families being descended from sons of Sir Michael Scott, who was killed in 1346.

PONT, a surname rare in Scotland, and in the case of the subjects of the two following memoirs, a contraction of Kilpont. Lord Kilpont was the secondary title of the earl of Airth, a peerage dormant since 1694. "The kindred names," says Lower, (English Surnames, vol. i. p. 81.) "Pontius, Ponto, Dupont, Da Ponte, &c., occur in most of the ancient and modern languages of Europe," and are derived from Pons, a bridge.

PONT, ROBERT, an eminent churchman, judge, and miscellaneous writer, generally called, in his younger years, Kynpont or Kypont, was born at Culross about 1524. Dr. Andrew Crichton, in a note to his Life of the Rev. John Blackadder, says that he was the son of John du Pont, an illustrious Venetian, who, being banished his country for professing the Reformed religion, came to Scotland in the train of Mary of Guise, queen of James V.; and that Nicholas du Pont, or da Ponte, father of the said John du Pont, was elected doge of Venice in 1578. Queen Mary of Guise, however, did not arrive in Scotland till 1538, which is inconsistent with the date of Robert Pont's birth, and the probability is that his parents, like himself, were natives of Scotland; where the surname of Pont is stated to have been known long before the Reformation. He received the rudiments of his education at Culross school, and in 1543 went to the university of St. Andrews, where, after finishing the philosophical curriculum, he entered on the study of theology. It is conjectured that he afterwards studied law at one of the continental universities. In 1559 his name appears as an elder in the kirk-session record of St. Andrews, and he was sent as one of the commissioners from that place to the first General Assembly, by which he was, with twenty others, declared fully qualified for the ministry.

In 1562 Pont was appointed to preach till the next Assembly at Dunblane, and in the following December he was named minister of Dunkeld. In 1563 he was put upon the leet with Bishop Alexander Gordon for the office of superintendent of Galloway, but was not elected, and by the Assembly of the same year he was appointed commissioner to visit the diocese of Moray. Being deeply skilled in the canon and civil laws, and highly esteemed for his prudence, zeal, and learning, he took an active and influential part in all the ecclesiastical transactions of that period. In 1566 the Assembly approved of his 'Translation and Interpretation of the (latter) Helvetic Confession,' and ordered it to be printed. In 1570 he was chosen moderator of the Assembly, an office to which he was four times elected afterwards. In January 1571 he was appointed provost of Trinity college, Edinburgh; and in the same year he was proposed by the regent as a senator of the college of justice. This dignity he did not deem himself at liberty to accept until he had obtained the sanction of the General Assembly, which he accordingly received on January 12, 1572. The following year he was charged with neglect of duty in non-residence and not visiting the churches in Moray; and for his excuse alleged want of leisure in consequence of his judicial duties. In November of the same year (1573) he received a pension from the king of 300 merks, on account of having no ecclesiastical living "quhairupon he may commodiously leif." In the Assembly of February 1574 he resigned his office of commissioner of Moray; and in that year was appointed colleague to William Harlaw, minister of St. Cuthbert's church, Edinburgh; and, December 29, 1584, was presented to the vicarage of St. Cuthbert's, vacant by Harlaw's decease.

In July 1574 he was, with others, appointed by the Assembly to revise all books that were printed and published. About the same period he drew up the Calendar, and framed the rules for understanding it, for Arbutnot and Bassandyne's edition of the Bible. He had also a considerable share in the preparation of the Second Book of Discipline. In 1582 he became, on invitation, minister of St. Andrews, but did not remain there above a year. In 1584 he publicly protested, with Mr. Walter Balcanqual and Mr. James Lawson, ministers, in name of the clergy and people of Scotland, against the acts of parliament concerning the church, commonly called "The Black Acts," on their proclamation at the market-cross of Edinburgh; and, having been deprived of his seat as a lord of session, he fled to England with many of his brethren: but in a few months he returned to Scotland with the earl of Angus, and the other Protestant lords. He now resumed his ministerial duties at St. Cuthbert's, and in 1587 was nominated by the king to the temporality of the bishopric of Caithness, but the Assembly refused to ratify the appointment. In 1591 he was directed by the Assembly to write against sacrilege, and his three sermons on that subject, after being approved of by the presbytery of Edinburgh, were printed in 1599. In 1594 he published 'A New Treatise of the Right Reckoning of Yeares and Ages of the World,' with the view of showing that the year 1600 was erroneously supposed to be the year of Jubilee. In 1600 he and two others were chosen commissioners to visit Orkney and Caithness; and in 1601 the Assembly appointed him to revise the Psalms. In 1604 he published a Latin treatise on the Union of the Two Kingdoms. He died May 8, 1606.

A second edition of his work on the Jubilee Year was published in quarto in 1619, in which year appeared also his 'De Sabbaticorum annorum periodis.' His 'Chronologia de Sabbatis' was published at London in 1626. He left several works in manuscript, which, however, have not been preserved.

He was twice married: first, to Catherine, daughter of Masterton of Grauge; and, secondly, to Margaret Smith, who survived him. One of his daughters by the first marriage, Helen Pont, married Adam Blackadder of Blairhall, the grandfather of the Rev. John Blackadder. Of his eldest son, Timothy, a brief notice follows. His second son, Zachary, obtained in October 1590, a full license, under the privy seal, as chief printer within the realm. He married Margaret, a daughter of John Knox by his second wife, and is mentioned as minister of Boar, in Caithness, in 1605. Dr. McCrie, in his Life of Knox, however, states that it was Robert Pont, the father, who married Knox's daughter. His works are:

Three Sermons against Sacrilege. Edin. 1599, 8vo.

A newe Treatise of the right reckoning of Yeares and Ages of the World, and men's lives, and of the estate of the last decaying age thereof, this 1600 yeare of Christ, (erroneously called a yeare of jubilee,) which is from the Creation the 5548 yeare. Containing sundrie singularities, worthie of observation, concerning courses of times, and revolutions of the Heaven, and reformations of Kalendars, and prognostications, &c. &c. Edin. 1599, 4to. Latine. 1619, 4to.

De Unione Britannicæ, seu de Regnorum Angliæ et Scotiæ omniumque adjacentium insularum in unam monarchiam consolidatione, deque multiplici ejus unionis utilitate, dialogus. Edin. 1604, 8vo.

PONT, TIMOTHY, a celebrated topographer, eldest son of the preceding, is styled, in the Books of Assiguation 1601-8, "Minister of Dwnet." Very little is known of his personal history, and the precise date of his death has not been recorded. According to Sibbald, he undertook, in 1608, a pedestrian expedition to explore the more remote parts of Scotland. Bishop Nicholson describes him as "a complete mathematician, and the first projector of a Scotch Atlas, for which great purpose he personally surveyed all the several counties and isles of the kingdom." The originals of his maps are preserved in the Advocates' Library. They were ordered by King James to be purchased from his heirs; and Sir John Scott of Scotstarvet afterwards prevailed upon Sir Robert Gordon of Straloch to prepare them for publication. Their revision was continued by his son, Mr. James Gordon, parson of Rothiemay, with whose corrections and amendments they were published in Beau's Atlas, under the title of 'Theatrum Scotiae.'

POPE, a surname common to both England and Scotland, though somewhat rare in the latter. In the list of those present at the meeting of the General Assembly at Glasgow, in June 1610, we find the names of Mr. William Pope and Mr. Thomas Paibe, both ministers. The Rev. Alexander Pope, minister of Reay, Caithness-shire, who died in 1776, was the author of a Description of the Shires of Caithness, Strathnaver, and Sutherland, in Pennant's Tour. He also wrote a Description of the Dune of Dornedilla, for the Archaeology, 1779, vol. v. p. 216. In the summer of 1732 he rode on his pony all the way from Caithness to Twickenham, in order to visit his namesake, the poet, when the latter presented him with a copy of the subscription edition of the Odyssey, in five volumes quarto, and a handsome snuff-box. They subsequently corresponded with each other, and from this and other circumstances it is thought probable that a relationship existed between them.

PORTMORE, Earl of, a title (now extinct) in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1703 on Sir David Colyear, elder son of Sir Alexander Robertson, of the family of Strowan, Perthshire, who was created a baronet of England 20th February 1677, and settled in Holland, where he acquired a considerable property, and assumed the name of Colyear. Besides Sir David, he had another son, Walter Philip Colyear, who had the command of a regiment in the Dutch service in 1695, and was appointed governor of Namur in 1718. He attained the rank of field-marshal, and died at Maestricht in November 1747, aged 90. His daughter Elizabeth, maid of honour to Queen Anne, and lady of the bedchamber to Queen Caroline, consort of George I., married in January 1709, Lionel, duke of Dorset, and died 12th June 1768.

Sir David Colyear, first earl of Portmore, went as a volunteer into the army of William prince of Orange, in 1674. He had the command of a Scottish regiment in the Dutch service, and came to England, with King William, at the Revolution. He served with great reputation in Ireland in 1689 and 1690, and afterwards in Flanders. He was created a peer of Scotland, by the title of Lord Portmore and Blackness, to him and the heirs male of his body, June 1699, and took the oath and his seat in parliament, 31st October 1700. We learn from a contemporary writer that his lordship had but one eye. In 1702 he became major-general, and on 27th February 1703, had the command of the 2d regiment of foot. He was raised to the dignities of earl of Portmore, viscount of Milsington, and Lord Colyear, by patent, dated at St. James' 13th April 1703, to him and the heirs male of his body. He was sent with the duke of Orleans to Cadiz, and served in the war of succession in Spain as lieutenant-general. In 1710 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland, and in January 1711, was promoted to the rank of general. In 1712 he commanded in Flanders, under the duke of Ormond. The same year he was sworn a privy councillor, and made a knight of the Thistle. In August 1713, he was created governor of Gibraltar, and in October following was chosen one of the sixteen representative peers of Scotland. When the Spaniards in March 1727 laid siege to Gibraltar, the earl of Portmore embarked for that place, to assume the command as governor. The siege was raised upon the approach of Admiral Wager, with eleven ships of the line. Spain then offered two millions sterling for possession of Gibraltar, but in vain, and by a compact at Seville in 1729, the Spanish government agreed to renounce all its claims upon it. Lord Portmore died 2d January 1730. He had married Catherine, countess of Dorchester, the mistress of James VII., and the only child of the witty and accomplished Sir Charles Sedley, of Southfleet in Kent, baronet. Her father took an active part in bringing about the Revolution, and it is related of him, that on being reproached by James for doing so, he sarcastically replied, that his majesty having made his daughter a countess, in gratitude he could not do less than aid in making his daughter a queen! The countess had a pension of £5,000 per annum on the Irish establishment, and died at Bath, 26th December 1717, having had, by Lord Portmore, two sons, David, viscount of Milsington, who predeceased his father, and Charles, second earl of Portmore.

The second earl, born 27th August 1700, was in 1732 appointed ambassador to compliment Don Carlos, afterwards king of the Two Sicilies, son of Philip V. of Spain, on his obtaining possession of the duchies of Parma and Piacentia. The same year he was invested with the order of the Thistle. At the general election of 1734, he was chosen one of the sixteen Scots representative peers, and in 1741 was rechosen. He was remarkable in his day for the splendour of his equipages and the magnificence of his dress. He was also a conspicuous member of the turf. He died in London, 5th July 1755. By his countess, Juliana, duchess dowager of Leeds, he had two sons and two daughters. The elder son, David, viscount of Milsington, an ensign in the Coldstream guards, died, unmarried, 16th January 1736, aged 18.

The younger son, William Charles, third earl of Portmore, married 5th November 1770, Lady Mary Leslie, second daughter of the ninth earl of Rothes, and had four sons and three daughters. His two eldest daughters died at Bath, the same day, 11th August, 1800.

The eldest son, Thomas Charles, fourth earl, was an officer in the army. He married Lady Mary Elizabeth Bertie, only child of the fifth duke of Aneaster, and had one son, Brownlow Charles Colyear, viscount of Milsington, who, on the death of his grandfather Brownlow, duke of Aneaster, 8th February 1809, succeeded to his large personal property. He died at Rome, in 1819, of wounds received from banditti. The earl married a second time, but died, without surviving issue, 18th January 1835, when the titles of earl Portmore, &c., became extinct.

PRESTON, Viscount of, a title (extinct) conferred in 1681, on Richard Graham, one of the principal secretaries of state under James VII., descended from Sir John Graham of Kilbride, called Sir John of the bright sword, second son of Malise, earl of Menteith, (see p. 149 of this volume). His grandfather, Sir Richard Graham of Esk and Netherby, was master of the horse to the duke of Buckingham, the unworthy favourite of James VI. and Charles I., and was one of the party who attended the latter when prince of Wales, on his secret and romantic expedition to Spain in 1623. He was created a Baronet of England 29th March 1629. In 1641 Sir Richard joined the royal army, and at the battle of Edgehill, October 23, 1642, was so severely wounded that he lay all night on the field among the dead. In 1648, when Charles was a prisoner in Carisbrook castle, in the Isle of Wight, he repaired thither, to take a last adieu of his unfortunate sovereign. He died in 1653. With four daughters, he had two sons. The younger of these, Sir Richard Graham of Norton Conyers, Yorkshire, was created a baronet of England, 17th November 1662.

The elder son, Sir George Graham of Netherby, county of Cumberland, died in 1657, aged 33. He had five sons and one daughter.

Sir Richard Graham of Netherby, the eldest son, was created a peer of Scotland, by the title of viscount of Preston, in the county of Haddington, and Lord Graham of Esk, to him and the heirs male of his body for ever, by patent, dated at Windsor Castle, 12th May 1681. In 1685 he was elected M.P. for Cumberland in the English parliament, and the same year was sent ambassador to the court of France. On his return to England in 1688, he was appointed one of the principal secretaries of state. By James VII., at the period of his abdication, he was created a peer of England, by the title of Baron Esk, but on claiming his seat in the House of Lords, 11th November 1689, he was ordered into custody, and directed to be prosecuted for a misdemeanor. On making his submission, however, this last order was discharged, and he was released. On the 30th of the following month his lordship and a Mr. John Ashton were apprehended on board a vessel in the Thames, with several treasonable papers in their possession, among which was an invitation to the French king to invade England, (Douglas' Peerage, vol. ii. p. 375). Lord Preston was arraigned for high treason at the Old Bailey, under the designation of Sir Richard Graham, baronet, viscount of Preston, in the kingdom of Scotland. His plea, that he was a peer of England, was overruled, and, 17th January 1690, he was found guilty and sentenced to death, his estates and title of baronet of England being forfeited to the crown. Through the intercession of his friends he obtained a pardon in June 1691, and retired to Nunnington, Yorkshire, where he died Dec. 22, 1695. The attainder did not affect his Scottish peerage, and his only son, Edward, succeeded as 2d viscount of Preston. The latter died in 1709, aged 31. His son, Charles, 3d viscount, died, without issue, at Bath, Feb. 22, 1739, when his titles became extinct. His extensive estates (see vol. ii. p. 343) came into possession of the Rev. Dr. Robert Graham, grandson of Sir George Graham, 2d bart. of Esk, and grandfather of the Right Hon. Sir James Robert George Graham, M.P., 2d baronet of Netherby, who died Oct. 25, 1861. Sir James' son, Sir Frederick Ulrie Graham of Netherby, bart., born April 2, 1820, is heir male of the viscounts of Preston. The original baronetcy of Esk reverted to the last viscount's cousin, the Rev. William Graham.

PRESTON, a surname derived from priest's town, the name of various places both in Scotland and England, and assumed in North Briton by the ancestor of the family of Preston of Valleyfield, Perthshire, from his territorial possessions in Mid Lothian, in the time of Malcolm Canmore.

The first of this family on record was Leolphus de Preston, in the reign of William the Lion. His grandson, Sir William de Preston, knight, was one of the Scottish nobles summoned to Berwick by Edward I., in the competition for the Scottish crown between Bruce and Baliol, in 1291. Sir William's son, Nichol de Preston, was one of the Scots barons who swore fealty to the English king in 1296. Nichol's grandson, Sir John de Preston, accompanied King David Bruce in his unfortunate expedition into England in 1346, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Durham. After several years' confinement in the Tower of London, he was released by ransom.

Sir John's son, Sir Simon de Preston, witnessed a charter of donation to the monastery of Newbattle in 1360. His son, also named Sir Simon de Preston, purchased in 1374, from John de Capella, the castle of Craigmillar, in the parish of Liberton, about three miles from Edinburgh. He had three sons, Sir George, Sir Henry, and Andrew. George Preston of Whitehill, the son of Andrew, was great-grandfather of Sir Richard Preston, created a peer of Scotland by the title of Lord Dingwall in 1607, to himself and his heirs whatsoever, (see vol. i. p. 38). This title fell, through marriage, to the last duke of Ormond in the peerage of Ireland, who was attainted in 1716, but it is doubtful if his attainder could affect the Scottish peerage, to which the Preston family have a claim.

William Preston of Craigmillar, great-grandson of Sir George, Sir Simon's eldest son, was a member of the parliament which met at Edinburgh June 1, 1478. He had the title of Domine de Craigmillar. This castle continued in the possession of the Prestons for nearly 300 years, and is often mentioned in the history of the period. On her return from France, it became the residence of the ill-fated Queen Mary. During the time the Prestons possessed it, that family held the highest offices in the magistracy of Edinburgh. In 1567, Sir Simon Preston of Craigmillar and "of that ilk," knight, was lord provost of Edinburgh, and, in that capacity, on his application, a charter was obtained from James VI., conveying to the city, Trinity Hospital, church, and property, for the behoof of the poor of Edinburgh. The copy of a bond betwixt Kirkaldy of Grange, governor of the castle, and Sir Simon Preston, on the part of the town of Edinburgh, for mutual defence and support, is given in Calderwood, (vol. ii. p. 412). Under 1591, we find the following entry in Calderwood, (vol. v. p. 117.) "Upon the 13th of Januar, the laird of Crigmillar intended divoreement before the commissars of Edinburgh against his wife, for adulterie committed with the laird of Nidrie. The witnesses being sworne, and to be examined, one of them, who could depone most in that matter, was talkin by force out of the Tolbuith by the Lord Bothwell, the king sitting in the meantime with the lords of the session in the Tolbuith, and was talkin captive to Crichton, where Bothwell threatened him with the gallows. Manie enormities were committed, as if there had been no king in Israel; so contemptible was the king's authority, and that through his own default, wanting due care and courage to minister justice."

The magnificent ruins of Craigmillar castle, the ancient seat of the family, stand about two miles and a half south of Edinburgh, on a rocky eminence commanding a fine view of the city and surrounding country. The outer wall displays the armorial bearings of the Prestons. About the time of the Restoration, it was acquired by Sir John Gilmour, lord president of the court of session, who, in 1661, built some additions to it. It now belongs to his descendant, Walter Little Gilmour, Esq.

William Preston of Craigmillar had two sons, Sir Simon, whose line failed with Robert Preston of Craigmillar in 1639, and Henry, father of James Preston, who, in 1544, acquired, by charter, from William, commendator of Culross, the lands and barony of Valleyfield, Perthshire, which ever after became the designation of the family. James Preston's great-grandson, Sir John Preston, succeeded his father, Sir James, as fourth baron of Valleyfield, and obtained a crown charter, Feb. 4, 1594. He married Grizell, daughter of Alexander Colville, commendator of Culross (whose son succeeded as third baron Colville of Culross), and with three daughters, the eldest of whom, Mary, married to Sir George Bruce of Carnock, he had three sons, James, who died without issue, George, his successor, and Robert, whose descendants carried on the line of the family.

George Preston, the sixth of Valleyfield, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, March 31, 1637. He married in 1634 Marion, only child of Hugh, 5th Lord Sempill, by his first wife, Lady Anna Hamilton, daughter of James, 1st earl of Abercorn, and died Nov. 26, 1679. He had, with two daughters, two sons, Sir William, 2d baronet, and George, a general in the army, who, on the arrival of Prince Charles Edward at Edinburgh in 1745, was superseded in the command of the garrison in the castle by General Guest, but afterwards resumed the command of the fortress. It is said that he was instrumental in preventing General Guest from capitulating, which was at one time his intention. General Preston was subsequently commander-in-chief in Scotland, when 80 years of age. He died, July 7, 1748. He paid off incumbrances on the estate of Valleyfield, and thus acquired the right to entail the property on the heirs, male and female, of his brother, Sir William, and his nephew, Sir George. The latter, son of Sir William, and third baronet, on his death in 1741, was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir George, fourth baronet, who died in 1779, having had five sons and a daughter. The daughter, Mary, married, in 1744, Robert Welwood, Esq. of Garvoek, advocate, and had, with other issue, a daughter, Elizabeth, who married Allan Maconochie of Meadowbank, a lord of session. (See MACONOCHIE, p. 60 of this vol., and WELWOOD, post.) Patrick, the eldest son, and Alexander, the next, predeceased their father. The former had two daughters, the elder of whom, Ann, Lady Baird Preston of Valleyfield and Ferntower, widow of General Sir David Baird, died without issue in 1847.

Sir Charles, the 3d son, was the 5th baronet. An officer in the army, he distinguished himself by his gallant defence of Fort John against the American general, Montgomery, having only surrendered at the last extremity. Subsequently a commissioner of the customs, and M.P. for the Kirkealdy burghs, he died, without issue, March 23, 1800.

His brother, Sir Robert, born in 1740, succeeded him as sixth baronet. He was commander of the East India Company's ship Asia. He is said to have been the originator of the Ministerial White Bait dinners, which take place at Greenwich towards the close of each session of parliament.

He was for some time M.P. for Dover, and had a cottage at Dagenham Reach in Essex, on the bank of a lake formed by the sudden eruption of the waters of the Thames over the adjacent country, about the middle of the last century. He called it his "fishing cottage," and often in Spring he went thither with a friend or two for a few weeks' relaxation in the country. His most frequent guest was Sir George Rose, secretary of the Treasury, and an elder brother of the Trinity House, of which Sir Robert also was an active member. On the suggestion of Sir George, Mr. Pitt, then prime minister, was invited, and for a few years he was an annual visitor at Dagenham Reach, always accompanied by Rose. Finding the distance from town inconvenient for the premier, Sir Robert proposed that they should in future dine nearer London. Greenwich was named, and Mr. Pitt requested to be permitted to bring Lord Camden, thus making the party four. Soon after, a fifth guest was added, Mr. Long, afterwards Lord Farnborough. In course of time others were invited, all belonging to the tory party. Ultimately Lord Camden considerably remarked that, as they were all dining at a tavern, it was only fair that Sir Robert Preston should not bear all the expense. It was then arranged that the invitations should be issued as usual by Sir Robert, and he insisted on still contributing a buck and champagne, but the rest of the charges were thenceforward defrayed by the several guests, and on this plan the meeting continued to take place annually till the death of Mr. Pitt. The list of guests, by this time, included most of the cabinet ministers. The time for meeting was usually after Trinity Monday, a short period before the end of the session. By degrees the meeting appears to have assumed a semi-political character, and is now one of the established customs of the party in power. Sir Robert died, without issue, May 7, 1834, at the advanced age of 95. He bought Culross abbey from the earl of Dundonald, who died in Paris in 1831, and who ruined himself by his coal-tar and other scientific speculations. In Sir Walter Scott's diary, under date June 19, 1830, there is the following entry: "After breakfast to Culross, (from Blair-Adam, being then on a visit there,) where the veteran, Sir Robert Preston, showed us his curiosities. Life has done as much for him as most people. In his 92d year, he has an ample fortune, a sound understanding, not the least decay of eyes, ears, or taste, is as big as two men, and eats like three. Sir Robert amuses himself with repairing the old House of Culross, built by the Lord Bruce. What it is destined for is not very evident. It is too near his own mansion of Valleyfield to be useful as a residence."

The whole male descendants of Sir George Preston, the first baronet, having become extinct, the baronetcy, in terms of the patent of creation, devolved on Sir Robert Preston, son of General George Preston, after mentioned, as nearest collateral heir male general, descended from Robert, third son of Sir John Preston of Valleyfield, knight. This Robert obtained a charter of the lands of Preston, Mid Lothian, 20th August, 1633, was knighted, and admitted a lord of session, 4th March, 1672, when he took the title of Lord Preston, and died in October 1674. His son, William Preston of Gorton, an estate acquired by Sir John Preston in 1342, was a major in the army, and died in 1733. He had two sons and a daughter. John, the elder son, succeeded to the estate of Gorton, which he left to his son, John, who died unmarried. The major's younger son, George, entered the army, and greatly distinguished himself by his courage and skill in the wars of Germany. He rose to the rank of general, and was colonel of the Scots Greys.

His only child, Sir Robert Preston, 7th baronet of Valley-

field, was born Jan. 3, 1757, and established his title to the succession by service before the sheriff of Edinburgh, Nov. 9, 1835. He married his cousin, Euphemia, daughter of John Preston, Esq. of Gorton, issue, 2 sons and 1 daughter, Mrs. Boswell of Blackadder, Berwickshire. On his death in 1846, his elder son, Sir Robert, at one period a major in the army, became 8th baronet; married, without issue. Sir Robert died Oct. 23, 1858, when his brother, Sir Henry-Lindsay, succeeded as 9th baronet. He entered the royal navy in 1801, and became a commander in 1830.

A baronetcy of Nova Scotia was conferred in 1628, on Sir John Preston of Airdrie, Fifeshire, the son of John Preston of Fentonbarns, lord president of the court of session from 1609 to 1616, by his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of William Turnbull of Airdrie. The president died 14th June of the latter year, and on 29th April 1652, Sir John, his son, married Lady Marjory Scot, relict of Sir James Scot, younger of Scotstarvet, director of the Chancery, and daughter of the first earl of Northesk. In 1663, Sir John Preston was served heir to his father and mother in the lands of Airdrie. One of the family erected a mansion-house on these lands, to which was given the name of Prestonhall. The baronetcy has long been extinct.

PRIMROSE, Viscount of, a title in the Scottish peerage, conferred 30th November 1703, on Sir James Primrose, baronet, of the Rosebery family. (See ROSEBERY, Earl of.)

PRINGLE, a surname prevalent in the south of Scotland, a corruption, as Sir George Mackenzie conjectures, of the word Pelerin or pilgrim. The account of the Pringles states that one Pelerin, who had gone on pilgrimage to the Holy Land, having settled in Teviotdale, his descendants were called from him Hop Pringle. The prefix Hop being synonymous with the British Ap or Irish O, signifying a son or descendant, Hop Pringle is, therefore, supposed to have meant the son of the pilgrim. The pilgrim's badge of a scallop shell forms a part of the armorial bearings of all the families of the name.

The Hop Pringles of that ilk, afterwards the Pringles of Torsonce, on Gala Water, were the head of one branch of the name settled in Mid Lothian, and the adjoining portions of East Lothian and Berwickshire. The principal families of this branch were the Pringles of Burnhouse, Hawtree, and Glengelt, and those of Rowcheester and Lees in the Merse. Their male line failed on the death of John Pringle of Torsonce in 1738. His only daughter, Margaret, having married Gilbert Pringle, one of the Pringles of Stitchell, carried the estates into that family. She had no children. John Pringle of Lees then became heir male, but his family also is extinct. (Burke's Landed Gentry, Supp. p. 262)

Another branch of the Pringles were the descendants of the family of Whitsome, Berwickshire, afterwards designed of Smalholm and Galashiels. Robert Hop Pringle of Whitsome is mentioned in a donation to the monastery of Soltray, confirmed by King Alexander III. For their support of the Bruce family, in their competition for the crown, the Pringles of Whitsome were deprived of their lands by King John Balliol, who conferred them upon John de Lyle, confirmed by a charter from King Edward I. of England, 13th October 1295. After the battle of Bannockburn, the lands were restored to Reginald Hop Pringle of Whitsome, by charter from Robert Bruce in 1315. During the brief and shadowy sovereignty of Edward Balliol, after that monarch's death, by a mandate from King Edward III. of England, they were ordered to be delivered up to "Walter de Insula," son of John de Lyle. They were restored, in 1336, to Thomas Hop Pringle of Whitsome, who, in 1363, had a safeguard to go into England, with his son and twelve persons in their retinue.

The Pringles of Whitsome were adherents of the house of Douglas, and held the office of scutifer, or squire, to the earls of that name. Robert Hop Pringle of Whitsome was present, in that capacity, with James, second earl of Douglas, at the battle of Otterbourne in 1388, where the earl was slain. From Archibald, third earl of Douglas, lord of Galloway, styled the Grim, he got a charter of the lands of Smalholm, Roxburghshire, in 1408, as well as a grant of the lands of Pilnair and Blackehester in Lauderdale, which remained for nearly three centuries in possession of the family. From the Douglasses also, who were then lords of Ettrick forest, he got the forest steadings of Galashiels and Mosalee, which were held by the Pringles as kindly tenants till the forfeiture of the Douglasses in 1455. They were subsequently held by them as kindly tenants of the crown till 1587, when they were feudalized by charter and sasine. It was this Robert Pringle who built the tower of Smalholm, a large square building, now entirely ruinous, and originally a border keep, situated among a cluster of rocks on an eminence in the farm of Sandy-knowe. The apartments rise above one another in separate floors or stories, and mutually communicate by a narrow stair. A wall surrounds the building, enclosing an outer court, and being defended on three sides by precipice and morass, the tower is accessible only by a steep and rocky path on the west. At the farm of Sandy-knowe, which was leased by his paternal grandfather, Sir Walter Scott spent some years of his boyhood. In a note prefixed to the ballad of 'The Eve of St. John,' he says that he wrote that ballad in celebration of Smalholm tower and its vicinity; and in the epistle preliminary to the third canto of Marmion, he notices the influence which the place had exerted on his tastes. In 1406, Robert Pringle of Smalholm, which became his designation after the erection of the tower, had a safe-conduct from Henry IV., to go to England, and in 1419 he had another, from Henry V., with John Wallace, to pay the ransom of James de Douglas, who succeeded his grand-nephew as seventh earl of Douglas, November 24, 1440, and was called James the Gross. The laird of Smalholm accompanied Archibald, fourth earl of Douglas, duke of Touraine, (the Douglas of Shakspeare,) on his famous expedition to France, in 1423, and was slain, with him, at the battle of Verneuil, the following year. (See vol. ii. p. 43.)

His son and successor, Robert Pringle of Smalholm, is said to have been the person who erected a drawbridge of a very peculiar construction over the Tweed, a river long remarkable for the very few bridges it possessed, at a small hamlet about a mile and a half above Melrose, called from the circumstance, Bridge-end. It is thus described by Sir Walter Scott, in 'The Monastery,' from the account of it in Gordon's Itinerarium Septentrionale: "Two strong abutments were built on either side of the river, at a part where the stream was peculiarly contracted. Upon a rock in the centre of the current was built a solid piece of masonry, constructed like the pier of a bridge, and presenting, like a pier, an angle to the current of the stream. The masonry continued solid until the pier rose to a level with the two abutments upon either side, and from thence the building rose in the form of a tower. The lower story of this tower consisted only of an archway or passage through the building, over either entrance to which hung a drawbridge with counterpoises, either of which, when dropped, connected the archway with the opposite abutment, where the farther end of the drawbridge rested. When both bridges were thus lowered, the passage over the river was complete." Sir Walter Scott says in a note that the vestiges of this uncommon species of bridge still exist, and that he often saw the foundations of the columns when drifting down the Tweed at night, for the purpose of killing salmon by torchlight. A stone, taken from the river, bore this inscription :

"I, Robert Pringle of Pilmore stede,
Give an hundred nobles of gowd sae reid,
To help to bigg my brigg over Tweed."

Sir Walter Scott quotes the first line as

"I, Sir John Pringle of Palmer stede."

It is certain that the bridge belonged to this family of the Pringles, and the money here mentioned may have been spent in repairing it, but the original builder of it, according to accounts likely to be more correct, was that "sore saint to the crown," David I., to afford a passage to his abbey of Melrose, and to facilitate the journeys of the devout to the four great pilgrimages of Scotland, namely, Scone, Dundee, Paisley, and Melrose. By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir James Dishington of Ardross, Fifeshire, Robert Pringle of Smailholm had four sons and three daughters. Over the doorway of the old house of Galashiels belonging to the family, the following inscription, under the date 1457, was cut, which is supposed to have referenee to this lady :

"Elspeth Dishington builit me,
In syne lye not;
The thyng thou canst not gette Desyre not."

The eldest son, David Pringle of Smailholm, was, after the forfeiture of the Douglasses, as we learn from the Exchequer Rolls of 1456, appointed cursor or ranger of the ward of Tweed, an office, held also by his son and grandson. In 1467 he was succeeded by his son, James, who appears to have been ranger from 1457 to 1495. Besides David his heir, he had a son, William, progenitor of the Pringles of Torwoodlee, and another, John, ancestor of the Pringles of Blyndlee.

David Pringle of Smailholm and Galashiels was ranger of the ward of Tweed for ten years. In 1505, Alexander, Lord Home, great-chamberlain of Scotland, became ranger or chamberlain of the whole of Ettrick Forest. In 1510 David Pringle obtained a charter of the lands of Redhead and Whytbank, which had been occupied by the ranger of the ward of Tweed pro officio cursoris, and these lands are still in possession of the family. He and his brother, William, are subscribing witnesses in the sasine of Margaret, queen of James IV., in her jointure lands of Ettrick Forest, 1st June 1505. He was twice married. By his first wife he had a son, David, younger of Galashiels and Smailholm, who, with four of his sons, was slain at Flodden, and a daughter, Isabella, wife of Sir David Home of Wedderburn, and mother of the seven spears of Wedderburn. By his second wife, Margaret, daughter of Thomas Lundie of Lundie, Fifeshire, he had, with two daughters, a son, James of Woodhouse and Whytbank, from whom the Whytbank family are descended, of whom afterwards.

John Pringle, youngest son of David, slain at Flodden, succeeded his grandfather on his death in 1535. This John Pringle of Smailholm and Galashiels fought at Pinkie in 1547, and afterwards, with George Pringle of Torwoodlee and William Pringle of Wolfhousebyre, was surety to the English for 100 gold nobles, the ransom of Hugh Rose of Kilravock, taken in that battle. He died about 1566. By his wife, Margaret, daughter of Sir James Gordon of Stitchell and Lochinvar, he had three sons and one daughter.

His eldest son, Andrew Pringle of Galashiels and Smailholm, made an entail of his estates in 1585, the year of his death. He had two sons, James his heir, and Robert of Howlatstown, on Gala Water, and a daughter, Isabella, married to George Pringle of Blyndlee.

The elder son, Sir James Pringle of Smailholm and Galashiels, was, in 1610, bailie of the regality of Stow, and, in 1622, he had a commission under the great seal as sheriff principal of Ettrick Forest. He was knighted by James VI., and being much about court, and living extravagantly, he was compelled to alienate a considerable portion of his estates. In 1623, he and George Pringle of Torwoodlee were commissioners to the Estates for the county of Selkirk. He died in 1635. He had four sons and as many daughters. Jean, his eldest daughter, married Hugh Scott of Deuchar, who got possession of the estate of Galashiels, having claims upon it. From him are descended the Scotts of Gala.

The two eldest sons having predeceased him, Sir James was succeeded by his third son, John, designed of Smailholm, but his inheritance was small, and even of that portion of the property which came to him, being encumbered with debt, he was ultimately deprived through legal diligence, by Sir Hugh Scott of Harden. John Pringle died in 1650, and his youngest brother, George, having predeceased him, Robert Pringle of Howlatstown, youngest son of Andrew Pringle of Smailholm and Galashiels, and brother of Sir James, became the male representative of the family. He died, without issue, in 1653, when the male representation devolved upon James Pringle of Whytbank, great-grandson of James Pringle of Woodhouse and Whytbank above mentioned.

In early life, James Pringle of Whytbank served for some years in France as an officer in the Scottish guards. He and James Murray of Philiphaugh represented the county of Selkirk in the Estates in 1633. For his adherence to the cause of King Charles I., he was heavily fined by the committee of Estates in 1646. He greatly improved his estate, and added several lands to it, both in Selkirkshire and Mid Lothian. He married in 1622, Sophia Schöner, a Danish lady, maid of honour to Anne of Denmark, queen of James VI., on which occasion, we are told, "her majesty presented her with her portrait, enamelled on mother of pearl, and set with small rubies and emeralds, suspended by a massy gold chain, a relic still preserved by the family." On his death in 1667, he was succeeded by his only son, Alexander Pringle of Whytbank, who, in 1652, was sheriff principal of Selkirkshire. Warmly attached to the Presbyterian form of church government, he was a frequent member of the ecclesiastical courts. He died in 1695, without issue, and was succeeded by John Pringle, grandson of his father's next brother, George Pringle of Balmungo, Fifeshire, a major in the army of Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, who, after serving, with considerable reputation, during the Thirty years' war, returned home, having married one of the daughters of Sir Patriek Ruthven, a general in the same service, created by Charles I., earl of Forth in Scotland, and Brentford in England, (see vol. ii. p. 254). His only son, the Rev. John Pringle, minister of Fogo, described as an elegant scholar, was father of John Pringle of Whytbank, who succeeded his father's cousin in 1695, and died of a fever in 1703, at the age of 25. He had a son, Alexander Pringle of Whytbank, who died in 1772, and was succeeded in his lands of Whytbank by his eldest son, Lieutenant John Pringle. The latter served on the staff of his relative, the Hon. General James Murray, commander of the British forces in Canada, after the death of General Wolfe. Lieutenant Pringle died in Canada in 1774, when his next brother, Alexander Pringle, then in the civil service of the East India Company on the Madras establishment, became proprietor of Whytbank. He returned to Scotland in 1783, and some years afterwards repurchased from the duke of Buccleuch the family estate and residence of Yair in Selkirkshire, which had been sold, with some other portions of his lands, by his father. At Yair he built a new mansion-house, and devoted a considerable part of his attention to the improvement of his estates. He commanded the Selkirkshire volunteers, until that corps was disbanded at the peace of Amiens, March 27, 1802. The same year he was appointed vice-lieutenant of Selkirkshire, on the establishment of that office by act of parliament. He was Sir Walter Scott's neighbour at Ashestiel, when he went there to reside in 1804, and in the second Epistle of Marmion he is mentioned as

An extract of a letter from him to the author of Marmion, on the publication of that poem in 1807, is given in Lockhart's Life of Scott, (page 184, 8vo edition). In 1812, Mr. Pringle obtained the patent office of chamberlain of Ettrick Forest. He died in 1827. By his wife, Mary, daughter of Sir Alexander Dick of Prestonfield, he had, with six daughters, five sons, three of whom, namely, John Alexander Pringle of Castledykes, the second son; William Alexander Pringle, the third; and David Pringle, the youngest, were in the Bengal civil service, and Robert Keith Pringle, the fourth son, was in the Bombay civil service, and afterwards became chief secretary to the government at that presidency.

The eldest son, Alexander Pringle of Whytbank, studied at Cambridge, and was admitted an advocate at the Scottish bar in 1814. In July of the following year, with Scott of Gala, he accompanied Sir Walter Scott to the field of Waterloo, and leaving him in Paris, he made a tour in Switzerland. He continued to practise as an advocate till 1830, when, at the general election which followed the death of George IV., he was elected M.P. for Selkirkshire. After the dissolution in 1831, he was re-elected. At the general election, after the passing of the Reform Act in 1833, he was defeated by Pringle of Clifton, by a majority of nine. Re-elected in 1835, by a large majority, he again sat for the county in 1837 and 1841. In the latter year he was appointed one of the lords of the Treasury, in the ministry of Sir Robert Peel, and also a commissioner of Revenue Inquiry. In July 1845 he resigned office, as he could not give his support to the ministerial measure for increasing the endowment of the Roman Catholic college of Maynooth. In January 1846, he was appointed principal keeper of the General Register of Sasines in Scotland, when he retired from parliament. In 1830 he had been appointed vice-lieutenant of the county of Selkirk. He died 2d September 1857. He married his cousin, Agnes Joanna, daughter of Sir William Dick of Prestonfield. His only son, Alexander Pringle, succeeded to Whytbank.

The Pringles of Torwoodlee, Selkirkshire, are descended from William Pringle of Smailholm, (see previous page,) who had a tack of the forest steid of Caddonlee in 1488, and one of Torwoodlee in 1509, to him and his son George. The same year he had a charter of one-fourth part of the barony of Cliftoun, Roxburghshire, which afterwards was sold to another branch of the Pringles. He was slain at the battle of Flodden in September 1513.

His son, George Pringle of Torwoodlee, was at the battle of Pinkie in 1547. In 1568 he was murdered in his own house by a party of Liddesdale rieurs, to the number of 300, consisting of Elliots, Armstrongs, and other lawless clans from the west border, under John Elliot of Copshaw, who had attacked, plundered, and burnt the house of Torwoodlee. George's son, William Pringle of Torwoodlee, was father of another George Pringle, who, in 1587, had a charter and sashine of Torwoodlee and others of his lands, previously held by him and his forefathers as kindly tenants and rentallers. From Piteaim's 'Criminal Trials' we learn that in 1607 he and his brothers, James and David, cited the surviving murderers of their grandfather to take their trial for the crime, when, not appearing, they were outlawed. In 1617 and 1621, George Pringle of Torwoodlee was one of the representatives in the Estates for the county of Selkirk. His grandson, also named George Pringle, an eminent patriot, and remarkable for his integrity and strength of character, succeeded to Torwoodlee, on the death of his father, James Pringle, about 1657. During the civil wars he took arms for the king, and was in most of the engagements in Scotland fought on his account, but after the Restoration, his attachment to the Presbyterian discipline and form of worship exposed him to much suffering, both in person and property, his house of Torwoodlee having frequently afforded an asylum to the persecuted Covenanters. When the earl of Argyle, after being sentenced to death, made his escape, on the night of the 20th December 1681, from Edinburgh castle, by the direction of Mr. John Scott, minister of Hawick, he rode straight to the house of Torwoodlee. Mr. Pringle gave him refuge, and sent his servant with him to the house of Mr. William Veitch, who conducted him in safety to England. On this becoming known to the government, Mr. Pringle was obliged to quit his own house, and for nearly two years to lurk in concealment. At length, in 1683, on a charge of being concerned in the Ryehouse plot, warrants were issued against him and others, and with much difficulty he and Sir Patrick Hume of Polwarth made their escape to Holland. In the first parliament of King James VII., his estates were confiscated, and bestowed on General Drummond of Cromlix. At the Revolution he hastened back to Scotland, and was a member of the convention of Estates which conferred the crown on William and Mary. His attainder was removed and his estates restored by a special act of parliament. He died in 1689.

His only son, James Pringle of Torwoodlee, who succeeded him, was but sixteen years of age when his father escaped to Holland, and although he was from home, and had no part in any of the circumstances which led to his exile, he was apprehended and imprisoned in Edinburgh castle, and only released at the end of three months by finding bail to the amount of £5,000 sterling. In 1685, on the failure of the earl of Argyle's expedition, he was again seized, and imprisoned in Blackness castle, where he suffered great hardship. After succeeding to the estate, he took an active part in public affairs, and held various offices of authority in his own district. His eldest son, George Pringle of Torwoodlee, advocate, died, unmarried, in 1780, and was succeeded by his nephew, James, son of his younger brother, James Pringle of Bowland, writer to the signet, and latterly one of the principal clerks of session. This gentleman purchased the lands of Bowland and Windydoors in 1722, and afterwards those of Catha. He died in 1778. His only son, James Pringle, sold Bowland, and acquired the lands of Buckholm and Wiliamlaw, Roxburghshire. He studied at Cambridge and Leyden, for the law, but on succeeding his uncle in Torwoodlee, he devoted himself entirely to the improvement of his property. He was a friend and neighbour of Sir Walter Scott, and Lockhart, in his Life of Scott, (p. 383, folio edition,) records a joyous evening spent in November 1818, at his beautiful seat, which, though mentioned in Scott's poetry as "distant Torwoodlee," is only about five miles from Abbotsford. Mr. Pringle was convener of the county of Selkirk, and commandant of the Selkirkshire troop of yeomanry cavalry from 1797, when it was raised, for about twelve years. From 1827 to 1830 he was vice-lieutenant of that county. He died in 1840, when his eldest son, Rear-admiral James Pringle, became tenth laird of Torwoodlee; married, with issue. The Admiral's eldest son, James Thomas, Lieutenant, R.N., was born in 1832.

The Pringles of Clifton were also an old family. In 1760, Robert Pringle of Clifton made an entail of his estates, and died, unmarried, in 1780. He was succeeded by his cousin, John Pringle of Haining, second son of his uncle, John Pringle, who was the second son of Andrew Pringle of Clifton (deceased in 1702) and his wife, Violet Rutherford, daughter of John Rutherford of Edgerstone. This John Pringle passed advocate 18th June 1698, and in 1702 purchased the estate of Haining, parish of Selkirk. On 1st July 1729, he was admitted a lord of session, when he took the title of Lord Haining. His lordship died 19th August 1754. With three daughters he had three sons, namely, 1. Andrew, also a lord of session, under the title of Lord Alenoor; 2. John Pringle of Haining; and 3. Robert, a doctor of medicine.

The eldest son, Andrew, did not take up his father's succession to Haining, as his affairs were embarrassed, and his next brother, John, who had made a handsome fortune as a merchant in Madeira, purchased it on his father's death, and cleared off all the incumbrances upon it. Admitted an advocate in 1740, Andrew Pringle was very eminent at the bar, being greatly distinguished for his scholarship and eloquence. In 1750 he was appointed sheriff of Wigtonshire, and in the following year sheriff of Selkirkshire. In 1755 he was appointed solicitor-general for Scotland, and 14th June 1759 he was raised to the bench, as Lord Alenoor, from a property which he had acquired in Selkirkshire. At the same time he was appointed a lord of justiciary. He died at his villa of Hawkhill, near Edinburgh, 14th January 1776, unmarried, and was succeeded in all his property by his next brother, John Pringle of Haining. The latter for a long time represented Selkirkshire in parliament. On the death of his cousin, Robert Pringle of Clifton, in 1780, he was served heir of provision to him under his entail, and thereafter assumed the designation of Pringle of Clifton, with the arms of the elder branch, undifferenced. He died in 1792, unmarried, and was succeeded by his cousin and grandnephew, Mark Pringle of Fairmalie, grandson of Mark Pringle of Crichton, third and youngest son of Andrew Pringle of Clifton, by Violet Rutherford of Edgerstone, above mentioned. On 2d October 1707, the day of the head court at Selkirk, Mark Pringle had an after-dinner quarrel with William Scott of Raeburn, then only about twenty-one years of age, the great-granduncle of Sir Walter Scott, and next morning they fought with swords, as was the fashion of the time, says the latter, in a field near Selkirk, when Raeburn was killed. The field "was called, from the catastrophe, the Raeburn Meadow Spot. Pringle fled from Scotland to Spain, and was long a captive and slave in Barbary." Having at length made a considerable fortune as a merchant, he returned to Scotland in 1738, and purchased the estate of Crichton in Mid Lothian. He died in 1751. His eldest son, John Pringle of Crichton, who had married Ann, eldest daughter of Robert Rutherford of Fairmalie, sister of Mrs. Coekburn, authoress of 'The Flowers of the Forest,' (see vol. i. p. 660 of this work,) continued to be engaged extensively in commercial pursuits, till the house with which he was connected became bankrupt. He was then forced to part with his lands, and his father-in-law, Mr. Rutherford, being involved along with him, had to sell some of his estates. His son, Mark Pringle, advocate, first designed of Fairmalie, on the death of his granduncle, John Pringle, became possessed of the estates of Haining and Clifton, the former as heir of line, through his grandmother, Ann Pringle, the wife of Robert Rutherford of Fairmalie, and the latter as heir male, through the entail executed by Robert Pringle of Clifton. At the general election of 1790, Mr. Pringle of Clifton was elected M.P. for Selkirkshire, and he sat for that county till the dissolution in 1802. He died in 1812. He had, with one daughter, two sons, John, and Robert, of Fairmalie.

The elder son, John Pringle of Clifton, was a minor on succeeding to the estates. He studied at Christchurch college, Oxford, and at the peace of 1815, entered the army as a cornet in the 7th hussars, and served in the army of occupation in France. In 1819, when the general reduction took place, he was obliged to go on half-pay. In 1820, he was elected M.P. for the Selkirk burghs, on the Whig interest. In 1831 he was killed by being thrown out of his open carriage near his own house of Haining. Dying unmarried, he was succeeded by his brother, Robert Pringle of Fairmalie, afterwards of Clifton, also an officer in the 7th hussars. In the first parliament after the passing of the Reform Bill he sat as member for Selkirkshire. He died at Haining in 1841, when the estate of Clifton passed, under the powers of the entail, to Robert Elliot of Harwood, whose father was the eldest son of the eldest sister of the entailer, Robert Pringle of Clifton, which made him heir of line of that family. Haining and the other estates of Robert Pringle descended to his only sister, Margaret Violet Pringle. This lady married Archibald Douglas, Esq. of Adderston, whose family are cadets of the house of Cavers: issue, one daughter. In compliance with her brother's settlement, she and her husband assumed the name and designation of Pringle of Haining in addition to that of Douglas.

The Pringles of Stitchell are sprung from the Hop Pringles of Craiglatch and Newhall, Selkirkshire, believed to have been very old cadets of the house of Smalholm. In the crown rentals of Ettrick Forest for 1485 and 1490, the lands of Craiglatch are mentioned as having been in the possession of William Hop Pringle and Alexander, his son. William Pringle of Craiglatch, also designed of Whittoun, Roxburghshire, had a charter of the lands of Hut, on the river Kale, in that county, in 1492, and crown tacks of Craiglatch in 1485 and 1490. His great-grandson, Alexander, was returned in 1539. In 1587, Alexander's son, George Pringle of Craiglatch, obtained a charter of his Ettrick Forest lands. For the crime of march-treason he and his eldest son, George, incurred the forfeiture of the lands of Craiglatch. March-treason included several species of offences peculiar to the border, such as holding communication with the English, and aiding them in their depredations on the Scottish side, as well as breaking border truce. The penalties for this crime were very severe. In 'The Lay of the Last Minstrel,' the herald of the English warden lords thus begins his address to the widowed lady of Buecleueh, on their appearance before the walls of Branksome Tower:

“It irks, high dame, my noble lords,
 'Gainst ladye fair to draw their swords:
 But yet they may not tamely see,
 All through the western wardenry,
 Your law-contenning kinsmen ride,
 And burn and spoil the Border side,
 We claim from thee William of Deloraine
 That he may suffer march-treason pain.”

Of the forfeited lands of Craighatch, Sir James Pringle of Smallholm obtained a gift, and he restored them to the family in 1601, in the person of George Pringle of Newhall, elder son of George Pringle, the son, above mentioned. In consequence, however, of the burdens incurred in their misfortunes, one-half, called the Knows, was alienated in 1617 to James Pringle of Whytbank, and the other half, called Newhall, became, from that time, the family designation. The first George Pringle had, besides George, his heir, another son, Robert, ancestor of the Sticheh family.

This Robert Pringle, first designed of Bartingbush, writer to the signet, realized a large fortune in his profession, and, besides acquiring the lauds of Templehall, Berwickshire, and various other properties, he purchased, in 1628, from Sir John Gordon of Lochinvar, (first viscount of Kenmure,) the estate of Sticheh, Roxburghshire, and was subsequently designated of Sticheh. He died in 1649. His eldest son, John, predeceased him, leaving two sons, Robert, the first baronet of Sticheh, and Walter, of Grayerook, advocate, who is mentioned in Wodrow's History as having ably pleaded for the Covenanters taken at Bothwell Bridge, when put upon their trial in 1679. His uncle, Walter Pringle of Greenknowe, a zealous Covenanter, suffered many hardships and persecutions. His Memoirs were published at Edinburgh in 1723, 8vo. He married Janet, second daughter of James Pringle of Torwoodlee. The ruins of Greenknowe tower, Berwickshire, his residence, are still remaining.

Sir Robert Pringle of Sticheh succeeded his grandfather in 1649, and in 1667, on the death of Robert Pringle of Newhall, he inherited the possessions of the elder branch of the family. He was created a baronet in 1683. By his wife, Margaret, daughter of Sir John Hope, a lord of session, with the title of Lord Craighall, he had, with other children, (19 in all.) 1. John, second baronet; 2. Sir Walter Pringle of Loehnton, admitted advocate, 10th December 1687, constituted a lord of session, as Lord Newhall, 6th June, 1718, at the same time appointed a lord of justiciary, and knighted. He died 14th December 1736, when his funeral was attended, as a mark of great respect, by the other judges, in their robes of office. The faculty of advocates also met on the occasion, when an elegant eulogium on his lordship's character, written by Sir Robert Dundas of Arniston, then dean of faculty, was ordered to be engrossed in their minutes, expressive of the high esteem in which he had been held by that learned body. An epitaph on Lord Newhall by Hamilton of Bangour is printed in the works of that poet. 3. The Right Hon. Robert Pringle, a distinguished statesman, who, May 18, 1718, was appointed secretary at war, an office which he held till 24th December following. 4. Thomas Pringle, writer to the signet, from whom descended the Pringles of Edgefield and the Pringles of Weens. His son, Robert Pringle of Edgefield, passed advocate 4th July 1724, and in 1748 was appointed sheriff-depute of Banffshire. Admitted a lord of session, 20th November 1754, he took the title of Lord Edgefield; and died 8th April 1784.

Sir John Pringle of Sticheh, second baronet, married Magdaleu, daughter of Sir William Gilbert Elliot of Stobbs, baronet, and had four sons and two daughters. The sons were, 1. Sir Robert, third baronet. 2. Gilbert, an officer of dragoons, who married Margaret, only daughter and heiress of John Pringle of Torsonee. 3. Walter, advocate and sheriff of Roxburghshire, who succeeded to Torsonee on his brother's death, and died unmarried; and 4. Sir John Pringle, the celebrated physician, of whom a memoir follows, in larger type.

The eldest son, Sir Robert Pringle, third baronet of Sticheh, married Katherine, eldest daughter of James Pringle of Torwoodlee, and died at the age of 88. His son, Sir James, fourth baronet, served many years as an officer in the army, first in the fusileers, and afterwards in the 59th regiment, which he commanded. Subsequently he was colonel of the Southern fencibles, and for a short time commanded the Roxburghshire yeomanry cavalry, after that corps was raised in 1797. He was master of works for Scotland, and represented Berwickshire in four parliaments. He died in 1809. By his wife, Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Norman Macleod of Macleod, he had, with three daughters, three sons, namely, 1. Robert, younger of Sticheh, who predeceased his father. 2. John, fifth baronet. 3. Norman, major of the 21st North British fusileers, and afterwards British consul at Stockholm. He had purchased Torsonee from his father, which he afterwards sold.

Sir John Pringle, fifth baronet of Sticheh and Newhall, born in 1784, served for ten years in the 12th light dragoons. He married, first, his cousin, Emilia Anne, 2d daughter of General Norman Macleod of Macleod, and had 3 sons and 5 daughters; and, 2dly, Lady Elizabeth Maitland Campbell, daughter of the 1st marquis of Breadalbane, issue, 2 daughters, the elder of whom, Mary Gavin, married in 1861, Robert, 2d son of George, 10th earl of Haddington. Heir, James, his eldest son by the first marriage. His 2d son, Norman, a cadet in the royal engineers at Woolwich, was accidentally drowned in the Thames. Sir John is vice-lieutenant of Roxburghshire, and a deputy-lieutenant of Berwickshire.

PRINGLE, SIR JOHN, baronet, an eminent physician and natural philosopher, was the youngest son of Sir John Pringle, second baronet of Sticheh, and Magdalen, daughter of Sir William Gilbert Elliot of Stobbs, and was born at Sticheh House, Roxburghshire, April 10, 1707. He received his grammatical education at home under a private tutor, and afterwards entered the university of St. Andrews, where a relative of his father, Mr. Francis Pringle, was at that time professor of Greek. In October 1727 he removed to Edinburgh to study medicine, with the view of following the profession of a physician. In the following year he proceeded to Leyden, at that period the most celebrated medical school in Europe; and, July 20, 1730, took the degree of M.D. in the university there, where he was the pupil of the illustrious Boerhaave. He completed his medical studies at Paris, after which he settled as a physician at Edinburgh. In March 1734 he was appointed by the magistrates and town council assistant and successor to Mr. Scott, in the chair of moral philosophy in that university. In 1742 he was nominated physician to the earl of Stair, then commander-in-chief of the British army; and, through the interest of this nobleman, he was constituted, in August of the same year, physician to the military hospital in Flanders. During his absence from the university, Messrs. Muirhead and Cleghorn were appointed to teach the moral philosophy class in his stead. At the battle of Dettingen, fought June 26, 1743, Dr. Pringle was present in a coach with Lord Carteret, and at one period of the engagement was exposed to great danger. Through his exertions a convention was entered into, in the early part of the campaign of that year, between Lord Stair and Marshal Noailles, for the mutual protection of the hospitals of the contending armies, which was faithfully adhered to by both generals.

After the retirement of Lord Stair, Dr. Pringle attended the army in Flanders throughout the campaign of 1744. Having by his diligence and ability recommended himself to the duke of Cumberland, he was in the following spring appointed physician-general to his majesty's forces in the Netherlands, and also physician to the royal hospitals there. He now resigned his professorship in the university of Edinburgh. In the end of 1745 he was recalled from Flanders to attend the forces under the duke of Cumberland, ordered against the rebels in Scotland. At this time he was chosen a member of the Royal Society of London. He remained with the royal troops till after the battle of Culloden, April 16, 1746, and in the two succeeding years he again served with the army on the Continent. On peace being concluded by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748, he embarked with the forces on his return to England. From this time he principally resided in London, and in 1749 was appointed physician in ordinary to the duke of Cumberland. In 1750 he published 'Observations on the Jail or Hospital Fever.' The same year he communicated to the Royal Society his famous 'Experiments upon Septic and Antiseptic Substances, with Remarks relating to their Use in the Theory of Medicine,' which were comprehended in several papers, for which he received the Copley medal. Many of his papers after this period appear in the Philosophical Transactions; and, besides these communications, he wrote in the Edinburgh Medical Essays, volume fifth, 'An Account of the Success of the Vitrum Ceratum Antimonii.' In 1752 he published his celebrated work 'On the Diseases of the Army,' which passed through numerous editions, and was translated into the French, German, Italian, and other languages. In 1753 he was elected one of the council of the Royal Society. In 1758, on relinquishing his appointment in the army, he was admitted a licentiate of the London college of physicians.

Soon after the accession of George III. he was, in 1761, appointed physician to the queen's household, and in 1763 physician extraordinary to her majesty. The same year he was chosen a member of the academy of sciences at Haarlem, and fellow of the college of physicians, London; and in 1764 he succeeded Dr. Wollaston as physician in ordinary to the queen. In 1766 the king was pleased to testify his sense of his long services, as well as of his abilities and merit, by raising him to the dignity of a baronet of Great Britain. In 1772 he was elected president of the Royal Society, and in 1774 was appointed physician extraordinary to his majesty. In 1776 he became a member of the academy of sciences at Madrid, and most of the other learned bodies of Europe at different periods enrolled his name in the list of their members. In 1778 he succeeded Linnæus as one of the eight foreign members of the academy of Sciences at Paris; and in 1781 he became a fellow of the then recently instituted society of antiquaries at Edinburgh.

His declining health induced him, at the close of 1778, to resign the presidency of the Royal Society. The discourses which he delivered as president, six in number, were published the year after his death, by his friend Dr. Kippis, in one volume 8vo. Hoping to derive benefit from the air of his native country, he spent the summer of 1780 in Scotland, residing chiefly in Edinburgh, and formed the design of fixing his residence altogether in that city. With this view, in 1781, he disposed of his house in Pall Mall, with the greater part of his library, and removed to Edinburgh;

but the keenness of the climate induced him to return to London in the beginning of the following September. On quitting the capital of the north, he presented the Edinburgh college with ten manuscript folio volumes of medical and physical observations, on the singular condition that they should never be printed, nor lent out of the library of the college. He died January 18, 1782, in the 75th year of his age, and, on February 7, his body was deposited in a vault in St. James' church. His portrait is subjoined:

A monument to his memory, by Nollekins, was afterwards erected in Westminster Abbey, at the expense of his nephew. He had married in 1752 the second daughter of Dr. Oliver of Bath, but his wife died, without children, in less than three years; and the baronetcy conferred on him became extinct at his death.—His works are:

PRINGLE, THOMAS, a highly esteemed poet and miscellaneous writer, the son of a farmer, was born on the farm of Blaiklaw, in Teviotdale, January 5, 1789. Owing to an accident which he met with in the nurse's arms, when only a few months old, by which his right limb was dislocated at the hip-joint, he was unfortunately rendered lame for life. He learnt the rudiments of Latin at the grammar school of Kelso, and completed his studies at the university of Edinburgh. He afterwards became a clerk in the Register Office, Edinburgh, in the service of his majesty's commissioners on the public records of Scotland. In 1811, in conjunction with a friend, he published a satirical poem, called the 'Institute,' which did not sell, and is now forgotten. In 1816 he contributed a descriptive poem to the 'Poetic Mirror,' which was the means of introducing him to Sir Walter Scott. Soon after he projected the 'Edinburgh Monthly Magazine,' the first number of which appeared in April 1817. It contained an article by Pringle on Scottish Gipsies, the materials for which were dictated to him by Scott, and have been inserted in the Introduction to Guy Rammerring. To enable him to devote his undivided attention to this periodical, which, soon falling into the hands of new proprietors, became 'Blackwood's Magazine,' he had relinquished his situation in the Register Office; and about the same time he undertook the editorship of the 'Edinburgh Star' newspaper. He also became joint-editor of Constable's 'Scots Magazine.'

Owing to some dispute with Mr. Blackwood, he soon retired from all connection with his Magazine, a circumstance which drew down upon him the abuse of some of his former coadjutors. Previous to this separation he had married Margaret, daughter of Mr. William Brown, an East Lothian farmer of great respectability. In January 1819, having relinquished the editorship of the 'Star,' he resumed his former occupation of copying old records in the Register Office; and in the same year he published the 'Autumnal Excursion, or Sketches in Teviotdale, with other Poems.' His earnings being totally inadequate to the support of his family, and circumstances compelling the other members of his father's house to have recourse to emigration, he applied, through his friend Scott, to Lord Melville, for an allotment of land in Southern Africa for his father and brother, and readily obtained a grant of eleven hundred acres of the unoccupied territory at the Cape. The little band of emigrants, consisting of twelve men, including three farm servants, six women, and six children, his wife, her sister, and himself, being of the number, sailed from London in February 1820, and arrived at Algoa Bay on the 15th May, where they disembarked. On reaching their place of settlement, they called it Glen-Lynden, which is now the official name of the river, and the whole of the valley, conferred in compliment to Pringle by General Bourke, when lieutenant-governor. In this remote location Pringle acted as the physician and surgeon of the party, there being no other within a hundred miles; and was at the same time the civil and military chief of the settlement, and the religious instructor and officiating minister. In June 1821 he obtained from Sir Rufane Donkin, the acting governor, an extension of the location, which put his party in possession of twenty thousand acres of land.

Through the interest of Sir Walter Scott, and others of his friends at the colonial department, he was appointed librarian of the government library at Cape Town; and in September 1822, with his wife and her sister, he commenced a residence there of nearly three years. His salary being only £75 a-year, he at first received pupils for private instruction, and then, in conjunction with a Dutch clergyman of the town, made arrangements for publishing a periodical in both the English and Dutch languages. The governor, however, Lord Charles Somerset, withheld his sanction from the latter project, and it did not make its appearance till some time afterwards, when, having obtained the approval of the government at home, it was at last published, under the name of the 'South African Journal.' Previous to this he had been joined by Mr. John Fairbairn from Edinburgh, with whom he organized a private academy on an extensive scale, which succeeded to his utmost wishes; and soon after the appearance of his 'Journal,' he was appointed joint-editor of the 'South African Commercial Advertiser,' a paper recently started by Mr. Greig, a printer. A dispute with the governor, however, arising from an attempted censorship of the press, to which Pringle would not submit, soon led to the discontinuance of both publications, the ruin of his academy, and the resignation of his office of government librarian. From October 1824 to April 1826 he was diligently employed in making himself acquainted with the true condition of the colony, and more especially of the frontier where his own relatives were located. During the greater part of 1825 he was in correspondence with the commissioners of inquiry, not only respecting his own case, but on the subject of various abuses in the local administration, the treatment of the coloured race, and the defence of the frontier. He was one of the originators of the second great measure next to the political emancipation of the Hottentots, namely, their establishment as independent occupiers of land. A paper, given in by him to the commissioners in 1823, was entitled 'Hints of a Plan for defending the Eastern Frontier of the Colony by a Settlement of Hottentots.' He also acted as secretary to the Society for the relief of the distressed Settlers in Albany, in which capacity he sent a pamphlet for publication to London, entitled 'Some Account of the Present

State of the English Settlers in Albany, South Africa,' which had the effect of procuring contributions to the relief fund, of £7,000 from England and India, besides £3,000 raised in the colony.

After visiting his relatives at Glen-Lynden, he returned to London in July 1826, and immediately applied to the Colonial Government for compensation for his losses at the Cape, but his claims were disallowed. An article, however, in the New Monthly Magazine, on the State of Slavery in the Colony, which he had transmitted to England previous to his departure from Cape Town, led to his acquaintance with Mr., afterwards Sir Powell Buxton and Mr. Zachary Macaulay, and eventually to his being engaged, in 1827, as secretary to the Anti-Slavery Society, a situation which he held until the object of that body was accomplished. To the cause of abolition he devoted the energies of his body and mind, discharging the duties of his office in a way that showed his whole heart to be in the cause of justice and humanity. He soon after became editor of 'Friendship's Offering,' a well-known annual in its day, which he conducted for seven or eight years with sound judgment and correct taste. In 1828 he published his 'Ephemerides,' being a collection of his juvenile poems, songs, and sonnets, and miscellaneous pieces, most of which are distinguished by their elegance and beauty, and all being rich in evidences of the truly benevolent and Christian spirit that actuated the author throughout his life. In 1834 those of his poems which relate to South Africa were reprinted in a volume, entitled 'African Sketches,' in which his interesting prose 'Narrative of a Residence in South Africa' appeared for the first time. After the author's death, it was republished in a separate form, with a Memoir prefixed, from the pen of Mr. Josiah Conder.

On the 28th June 1834, the day after his official announcement to the public of the abolition of slavery, he was seized with his last illness. Symptoms of consumption having soon become distinctly apparent, he was advised by his physician to remove to a warmer climate before the approach of winter. He, therefore, turned his thoughts towards Southern Africa; and after a fruitless application to Government for an appointment at the Cape, or for an advance of money to assist him on his return, the necessary preparations were hastily completed, and the passage for himself, his wife, and her sister, actually engaged. Three days, however, before the time appointed for sailing, he was attacked with a diarrhœa, which his already enfeebled constitution could not resist, and he died December 5, 1834. His remains were interred in Bannhill Fields burying-ground, where a simple stone bears an elegant tribute to his memory, composed by William Kennedy. In 1839 a collection of his poetical works, with a sketch of his life by Leitch Ritchie, which has furnished the materials of this notice, was published by Moxon of London, for the benefit of his widow.

Q

QUEENSBERRY, earl, marquis, and duke of, titles in the peerage of Scotland, possessed by a branch of the ancient and once dominant family of Douglas, and the latter held, since 1810, by the duke of Buccleuch. The title of earl of Queensberry was conferred in 1633, by Charles I., on Sir William Douglas of Drumlanrig, descended from Sir William Douglas, the elder of the two natural sons of James, second earl of Douglas, who was killed at the battle of Otterburn in 1388, (see vol. ii. of this work, p. 43). The barony of Drumlanrig, in the parish of Durrisdier, Dumfries-shire, was bestowed upon him by his father by charter, and he was subsequently designated dominus de Drumlanrig. In 1411, Sir William Douglas of Drumlanrig and Sir Gavin de Dunbar attacked Roxburgh, then in possession of the English, broke down the bridge, and burnt the town. On 24th September that year, with the earls of Douglas and March, he was a commissioner to treat for a peace with the English. He obtained from King James I. a letter, dated at Croydon, 30th November 1412, confirming to him the lands of Drumlanrig, "Hawkyke," and Selkirk, which is still extant. He had a safe-conduct to come and go to England, to negotiate the release of that monarch, then a captive there, 16th April 1413.

Upon various other occasions he had also a safe-conduct to go to England, particularly one on 16th December 1414, to him and six persons chosen by him, attended by eighty horsemen, to go to Carlisle, to perform certain feats of arms before judges, against Sir John de Clifford and six persons of his nomination. In 1420 he accompanied the Scottish auxiliaries to France under the earl of Buchan. He was knighted at the coronation of James I., 21st May 1424, and is said to have been killed in battle against the English in France in 1427. By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Robert Stewart of Durrisddeer and Rosyth, he had a son, William Douglas of Drumlanrig, who was one of the hostages for King James I., 9th November 1427, in the room of Sir Adam de Hebburn. In 1448 he was in the army commanded by the earls of Douglas and Ormond, when a sanguinary battle was fought with the English on the banks of the river Sark in Annandale, and the latter were defeated with great slaughter. He died in 1458.

His son, William Douglas of Drumlanrig, distinguished himself at the siege of Roxburgh, where James II. was killed in 1460, and also in December 1462 in the expedition of the earl of Angus to the relief of Alnwick, then held by a French garrison, under Breze, high-steward of Normandy, (see vol. ii. p. 45.) when he succeeded in bringing them off, in sight of a superior English force, commanded by King Edward IV. in person. He died in 1464. His son, Sir William Douglas of Drumlanrig, was killed while fighting on the king's side against the duke of Albany and the ninth and last earl of Douglas, in the engagement near Lochmaben, when they invaded Scotland 22d July 1484. With three daughters, he had four sons, namely, 1. James, his successor. 2. Areli-bald, ancestor of the Douglasses of Cashogle. 3. George, ancestor of the Douglasses of Penziers; and 4. John, vicar of Kirkconnell.

The eldest son, James Douglas of Drumlanrig, married, in 1470, Janet, eldest daughter of Sir David Scott of Branxholm, ancestor of the duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry, and died in 1498. He had, with one daughter, a son, Sir William Douglas of Drumlanrig, who fell at the battle of Flodden, 9th September 1513. With two daughters the latter had two sons, Sir James, and Robert, appointed provost of Lincluden in 1517. He was the last provost of that ancient religious house, and was allowed to enjoy the benefice for about forty years after the Reformation. He was one of the persons who accompanied King James VI., when he embarked for Norway, 22d October 1589, and appears to have been collector of the revenue, as on the appointment of the Octavians in 1596, he demitted that office, on being required to do so. The Douglasses of Burford were descended from him. He is said to have been a natural son, but legitimated in 1559.

The elder son, Sir James Douglas of Drumlanrig, was one of the barons who, with Sir Walter Scott of Buccleuch, attempted to rescue King James V. from the hands of the earl of Angus, near Melrose, in June 1526, for which he obtained a remission. The oldest extant charter of the town of Hawick is one of confirmation granted by this James Douglas of Drumlanrig, baron of Hawick, dated 11th October 1537. He was knighted by the regent Arran, duke of Chatelherault, and in 1553 appointed guardian of the west marches, with full powers of judiciary. He subscribed the Book of Discipline 27th January 1561, and was one of the confederated barons who marched against Queen Mary, in 1567, when she surrendered at Carberry hill. On this occasion, his son, Sir William Douglas of Hawick, with Hume of Manderston and Hume of Huttonhall, was sent forward to break the array of the queen's gunners, when she stood with her army on the hill. When the queen escaped from Lochleven, the son, Sir William Douglas, joined the regent Moray at Glasgow, and on the latter being advised to retire to Stirling, he declared, "If ye depart, I will go to the queen, as my Lord Boyd hath done." At the battle of Langside, he had the command of a party of horse on the regent's side. Old Drumlanrig, as his father was called, was with the forces under the earl of Morton at Leith, in 1571, and engaged in some of the skirmishes with the castle of Edinburgh, then held by the queen's party. On the 23d of June the same year, he was taken prisoner as he was riding home, on some business betwixt him and Lord Herries, and others who were at variance. Lord Herries treacherously appointed to meet him where the laird of Wormeston lay in wait for him, and he was conveyed to the castle of Edinburgh. On this occasion his son, Sir William, narrowly escaped. Not being certain whether his son had been killed or not, he sent him the following curious epistle: "Willie, Thon sall wit that I am haill and feare. Send me word thairfoir how thow art, whether deid or livand? Gif thow be deid, I doubt not but freindis will let me know the treuth; and gif thow be weil, I desyre na mair," &c. He showed this letter to his captors, that they might be sure it contained no treason; and to save his purse, he sent it with the letter, desiring the messenger to deliver it to his son. (Calderswood, vol. iii. p. 105, note.) He was one of those who visited Knox on his deathbed, and died in 1578. His son, Sir William Douglas, having predeceased him in 1572, he was succeeded by his grandson, Sir James Douglas of Drumlanrig, who distinguished himself in suppressing disturbances on the borders, and died 16th October 1615. With two daughters, Sir James had four sons. 1. Sir William. 2. Sir James Douglas of Mouswald, Dumfries-shire, derived from Moswold, "the wood near the moss." 3. David Douglas of Airdoch; and 4. George Douglas of Penziers.

The eldest son, Sir William Douglas of Drumlanrig, was the first earl of Queensberry. He had obtained a reversion of the provosty of Lincluden, and after the death of his granduncle, Robert Douglas, above mentioned, he enjoyed its revenues during his own life. He was a member of the General Assembly which met at Glasgow 8th June 1610, and entertained King James VI., at his house of Drumlanrig, when his majesty visited Scotland in 1617. By patent, dated at Whitehall, 1st April 1628, he was created a peer, by the titles of viscount of Drumlanrig, and Lord Douglas of Hawick and Tibberis, to him and his heirs male, bearing the name and arms of Douglas. He got vested in himself and his heirs the patronage and titles of the churches of Terregles, Lochrutton, Colvend, Kirkbean, and Caerlaverock, belonging to the provosty of Lincluden, and also a small part of its lands. When Charles I. visited Scotland in 1633, he advanced the viscount of Drumlanrig to the title of earl of Queensberry, to him and his heirs male bearing the name and arms of Douglas, by patent, dated at Seton, 13th June of that year. The title was taken from a mountain called Queensberry, in the parish of Closeburn, Dumfries-shire, having its name from the Anglo-Saxon berg, a hill, softened into berry. Situated amid a collection of heights, it is literally the "queen hill" of the district. He died 8th March 1640. He had, with two daughters, four sons: 1. James, second earl of Queensberry. 2. Hon. Sir William Douglas of Kelhead. 3. Hon. Archibald Douglas of Dornock, ancestor of the Douglasses of Dornock; and 4. Hon. George Douglas, who died unmarried.

James, second earl of Queensberry, the eldest son, adhered to the cause of Charles I. in the civil wars, and was on his way to join the marquis of Montrose after the battle of Kilsyth in August 1645, when the leading men of the district of Glencairn intercepted and took him prisoner. A fine of 120,000 marks Scots was imposed on him by the Estates, which he paid, and by Cromwell's act of grace and pardon in 1654, another fine of £1,000 sterling was exacted from him. He died in 1671. He was twice married; first, to Lady Mary Hamilton, third daughter of the second marquis of Hamilton, without issue; and, secondly, to Lady Margaret Stewart, eldest daughter of John, first earl of Traquair, high-treasurer of Scotland, by whom he had, with five daughters, four sons, namely, 1. William, third earl. 2. Hon. James Douglas, who, after passing advocate, entered the army, and was made colonel of the guards in Scotland in July 1684. He rose to be lieutenant-general, and died at Namur, in 1691. 3. Hon. John Douglas, killed at the siege of Treves in 1673; and 4. Hon. Robert Douglas, killed at the siege of Maestricht in 1676.

William, third earl and first duke of Queensberry, the eldest son, celebrated as a statesman, was born in 1637, and had charters of the office of sheriff and coroner of the county of Dumfries in 1664 and 1667. In the latter year he was sworn a privy councillor, and succeeded his father in 1671. In June 1680, he was appointed justice-general of Scotland, and was admitted an extraordinary lord of session, 1st November 1681. He was created marquis of Queensberry, earl of Drumlanrig and Sanquhar, viscount of Nith, Torthorwald, and Ross, and Lord Douglas of Kinmonth, Middlebie, and Dornock, to him and his heirs male whatsoever in all future time, by patent, dated at Whitehall, 11th February 1682; and in April following he obtained a warrant authorizing the lion king at arms to give to him and his heirs for ever the double tressure, as it is carried in the royal achievement. On being constituted high-treasurer of Scotland by commission, dated 12th May 1682, he resigned the place of justice-general, and on 21st September following was appointed constable and governor of Edinburgh castle. By Charles II. he was created duke of Queensberry, marquis of Dumfries-shire, earl of Drumlanrig and Sanquhar, viscount of Nith, Torthorwald, and Ross, Lord Douglas of Kinmonth, Middlebie and Dornock, to him and the heirs male of his body, by patent, dated at Whitehall, 3d November 1684.

On the accession of James VII. in 1685, his grace was continued in all his offices, and appointed high-commissioner to represent his majesty in the first session of his only Scots parliament, which met at Edinburgh 23d April of that year. After the king's letter had been read, his grace, referring to the Covenanters, said, among other things: "My lords, his majesty certainly expects from the prudence and loyalty of this parliament that effectual ways will be fallen upon for destroying that desperate, fanatical, and irreclaimable party, who have brought us to the brink of ruin and disgrace, and are no more rebels against the king than enemies of mankind, wretches of such monstrous principles and practices as past ages never heard nor those to come will hardly believe;" concluding with, "how inconsiderable soever they appear, assure yourselves they ought not absolutely to be contemned, for if they had not support and correspondence not yet discovered, it is not to be supposed they could have so long escaped the care and vigilance of the government." The following year the treasury being put in commission, his grace was appointed president of the council, but disapproving of the king's measures for repealing the penal laws against popery, he was, the same year, deprived of all his offices. He retired to his estates in Dumfries-shire, and occupied himself in superintending the building of Drumlanrig castle, which he had begun some years before. This magnificent edifice took ten years in building, and was not finished till 1689, the year after the Revolution. He expended upon it such enormous sums of money, and during the only night that he ever passed within its walls was so annoyed at not being able to obtain medical advice, to relieve him from a temporary fit of illness, that he abandoned it in disgust, and afterwards folding up the artificers' bills for erecting it in a sealed parcel, wrote upon the latter, "The devil pike out his een that looks herein." He concurred in the Revolution, and with others of the Scottish nobility waited on the prince of Orange at London, to request that he would take the administration of affairs into his hands, and call a convention. His grace was a second time appointed an extraordinary lord of session, 23d November 1693, and died at Edinburgh, 28th March 1695, aged 58. He was buried at Durrisdair, where a magnificent monument was erected to his memory. By his duchess, Lady Isabel Douglas, sixth daughter of William, first marquis of Douglas, he had, with one daughter, three sons, viz. 1. James, second duke. 2. William, created earl of March, 20th April 1697; and 3. Lord George Douglas, who died, unmarried, at Sanquhar in July 1693. His father presented the books belonging to this young nobleman to the library of the faculty of advocates at Edinburgh. The daughter, Lady Anne Douglas, married in 1697, David Lord Elcho, afterwards third earl of Wemyss. Her clothes catching fire whilst at prayers, 13th February 1700, she was so severely scorched that she died on the 21st. Her great-grandson, Francis, earl of Wemyss, succeeded in December 1810, to the title of earl of March and the great estates of the Queensberry family in the county of Peebles, (see page 103 of this volume, and WEMYSS, earl of).

James, second duke of Queensberry, the eldest son, was the eminent statesman who succeeded in effecting the treaty of union with England. Born at Sanquhar castle, 18th December 1662, he was educated at the university of Glasgow, after leaving which he proceeded to travel on the Continent. On his return in 1684, he was sworn a privy councillor, and made lieutenant-colonel of Lord Dundee's regiment of horse, from which he was removed in 1688. He entered heartily into the revolution, and joined the prince of Orange at Sherbourne 30th November that year. By King William he was appointed colonel of the sixth or Scottish troop of horse guards, a privy councillor, and one of the gentlemen of his bedchamber. In 1692 he was made a commissioner of the treasury, and in 1693 was authorized to sit and vote in parliament as lord-high-treasurer. On the death of his father in 1695 he quitted the army, and was appointed an extraordinary lord of session in his room, also keeper of the privy seal. In 1700 he represented the king as high commissioner to the parliament of Scotland, and 18th June 1701 was nominated a knight of the Garter, and installed at Windsor 10th July following. In 1702 and 1703 Queen Anne appointed his grace secretary of state, and her commissioner to the parliament of Scotland; but his administration creating great dissatisfaction, he was shortly afterwards deprived of all his offices, except that of lord of session. In 1705 he was restored to office, and appointed keeper of the privy seal and a lord of the treasury, and in the following year was constituted high-commissioner on the part of Scotland to carry through the treaty of Union between the two kingdoms. That important national measure was concluded, in 1707, chiefly by his address, skill, and ability, in spite of the most powerful opposition. In Scotland, where the Union was peculiarly obnoxious, the duke was very unpopular, but in England he was received with great distinction, and, as a reward of his services, a pension of £3,000 per annum was conferred on him, the whole patronage of Scotland was vested in his hands, and he was created a British peer, 26th May 1708, by the title of duke of Dover, marquis of Beverley, and earl of Ripon, with remainder to his third son, Charles, earl of Solway, third duke of Queensberry, of whom afterwards. On 12th June 1706, his grace surrendered to the crown the title of duke of Queensberry and other dignities conferred upon his father, and obtained a new patent of these honours, dated at Windsor castle, the 17th of the same month, granting them to him and his heirs of entail, male or female, succeeding to the estate of Queensberry, such heirs of entail being descended from the first earl of Queensberry. In this resignation the titles of marquis and earl of Queensberry, viscount of Drumlanrig, Lord Douglas of Hawick and Tibberis, were not included. On 9th February 1709, his grace was appointed third secretary of state. He died, after a short illness, 6th July 1711, in his 49th year. His portrait is subjoined :

By his duchess, Mary, fourth daughter of Charles Boyle, Lord Clifford, he had four sons and three daughters. The two elder sons died young, and the third, Charles, succeeded him. His second daughter, Lady Jean Douglas, married 5th April 1720, Francis, earl of Dalkeith, afterwards duke of Buccleuch, with issue.

Charles, third duke of Queensberry and second duke of Dover, the third but eldest surviving son, born at Edinburgh, 24th November 1698, was created earl of Solway, viscount of Tibberis, and Lord Douglas of Lockerbie, Dalveen, and Thornhill, by patent, dated at Windsor castle 17th June 1706 (the same date as that of the new patent of the dukedom of Queensberry granted to his father), to him and the heirs male of his body. He became duke of Queensberry, on his father's death, in 1711. He was a privy councillor and lord of the bedchamber to George I., and by George II. was appointed vice-admiral of Scotland.

His grace married, 10th March 1720, Lady Catherine Hyde, second daughter of Henry, earl of Clarendon and Rochester, celebrated for her beauty, her wit, and her sprightliness; by Pope, Swift, Prior, and other poets of her time. Both the duke and duchess had a sincere regard for Gay the poet, who said of her,

For friendship, zeal, and blithesome humours known.”

They received him into their house, treated him with all respect and attention, and undertook the regulation of his money matters, a task which he had ever proved himself inadequate. He accompanied them to Scotland, and spent some time with them at Queensberry house, Edinburgh. In consequence of their patronage of Gay, they were forbid the court, the ‘Beggars’ Opera,’ written by him, having, on its production in 1727, greatly offended those in power. His grace, in consequence, attached himself to Frederick, prince of Wales, then in opposition to his father, George II., and was appointed by him one of the lords of his bedchamber. On the death of Gay, in December 1732, the duchess erected a monument to his memory at Westminster Abbey, with an inscription by Pope.

Under the heritable jurisdiction abolition act of 1747, his grace was allowed £6,621 8s. 5d. in all, for his regalities, in full of his claim of £14,500. On the accession of George III. in 1760, the duke of Queensberry was sworn a privy councillor. In the following year, he was appointed keeper of the great seal of Scotland, and, on 16th April 1763, lord-justice-general. In 1778 he was honoured by a visit from the king and queen, at his seat of Amesbury, Wiltshire. Soon after he proceeded to London, to return thanks for this mark of distinction, but on the way, while stepping out of his carriage, he hurt his leg, and a mortification ensuing, he died at London 22d August of that year, at the age of 80. By his duchess he had two sons.

The elder son, Henry, earl of Drumlanrig, born 30th October 1722, was educated at the college of Winchester, and the university of Oxford. Afterwards, entering the army, he served two campaigns under the earl of Stair, and one under Charles Emanuel, king of Sardinia. For his signally gallant conduct, particularly at the siege of Coni, the latter ordered his ambassador in London to wait on his father, to thank him for the services performed by him. In May 1747, his lordship got a commission to raise a regiment of two battalions and twenty companies in the Highlands, for the service of the States of Holland. On the second battalion being disbanded in 1749, his lordship brought them back to Scotland at his own expense. On 10th July 1754, he married Lady Elizabeth Hope, eldest daughter of the second earl of Hoptoun. On their way to London a few weeks thereafter, with his father, mother, and brother, Lord Drumlanrig was killed, by the accidental discharge of his pistol, while riding in front of the carriages. (Douglas’ Peerage, Wood’s edition, vol. ii. p. 383.) This is said to have happened near Bawtry in Yorkshire, 19th October of the same year, his lordship being then 32. There is another account of his death, which has in it something of a romantic character. It is stated that he had become enamoured of a Miss Mackay, and was desirous of marrying her, but the duchess, his mother, opposed the match, and, by intercepting their letters, caused an estrangement to take place between them. Being at length assured that Miss Mackay was married, his lordship espoused Lady Betty Hope, the lady whom her grace had fixed upon for his wife. While proceeding to London with his lady, he met Miss Mackay on the road, at a town where they temporarily stopped, and learning from her that she was not married, as he had been led to believe, he, the following day, shot himself in his carriage, by the side of his wife. (See Chambers' Journal, vol. x. p. 18.) His countess never recovered the shock. She survived him only about a year and a half, and died, childless, 7th April 1756, in her 21st year.

Charles, the younger son, became earl of Drumlanrig on his brother's death. Born 17th July 1726, he was also educated at Winchester and Oxford. He was chosen M.P. for the county of Dumfries, at the general election of 1747, and re-elected in 1751. Having gone to Lisbon on account of his health, he was in that city when the celebrated earthquake took place, 1st November 1755. He returned home the following year, and died, 24th October 1756, unmarried.

On the death of the duke, their father, his grace's British titles of duke of Dover, &c., as well as the Scottish earldom of Solway, became extinct. The dukedom of Queensberry, with extensive estates, both in England and Scotland, devolved on his cousin William, earl of March and Ruglen, descended from Lord William Douglas, first earl of March, second son of the first duke of Queensberry.

From his father, Lord William Douglas received the castle of Neidpath, with a considerable estate in the county of Peebles, purchased in 1686 from the Tweeddale family. In his description of Tweeddale, Dr. Pennecuik thus celebrates Neidpath castle :

"The noble Nid Path Peebles overlooks,
With its fair bridge, and Tweed's meandering brooks,
Upon a rock it proud and stately stands,
And to the fields about gives forth commands."

In the reign of James VII., Lord William Douglas was lieutenant-colonel of a regiment of horse. After the Revolution he abstained for some years from taking the oaths to the new government; and when he did so, he was created a peer of Scotland, 20th April 1697, by the titles of earl of March, viscount of Peebles, and baron Douglas of Neidpath, Lyne, and Munard, by patent, to the heirs male of his body, which failing, to the heirs male of entail. He was by Queen Anne appointed governor of the castle of Edinburgh, by commission, dated 31st December 1702; but recalled in 1704. He died at Edinburgh, 2d September 1705. By his countess, Lady Jean Hay, second daughter of the first marquis of Tweeddale, high-chancellor of Scotland, he had, with three daughters, three sons: 1. William, second earl of March. 2. Hon. John Douglas of Broughton, M.P. for Peebles; and 3. Hon. James Douglas of Stow. The two younger sons died unmarried.

William, second earl of March, married Lady Anne Hamilton, the elder daughter of John, earl of Selkirk and Ruglen, and his countess, Lady Anne Kennedy, only daughter of the seventh earl of Cassillis, and had one son, William, third earl of March and fourth duke of Queensberry. His lordship died at Barnton, near Edinburgh, 7th March, 1731, in his 35th year. On the death of her father, 3d December 1744, the countess of March, (who subsequently married Anthony Sawyer, Esq., paymaster of the forces in Scotland, without issue,) became also countess of Ruglen, in her own right.

William, third earl of March, succeeded his mother as earl of Ruglen, on her death in April 1748, and in 1759, on the death of the eighth earl of Cassillis, he claimed that title as heir general, but his claim was disallowed by the House of Lords, and the titles of earl of Cassillis and Lord Kennedy adjudged to Sir Thomas Kennedy of Culzean, baronet, 27th January 1762, (see vol. i. page 608). He was also unsuccessful in a litigation for the estates of the Cassillis family. On the accession of George III. in 1760, the earl of March was nominated one of the additional lords of the bedchamber, and in 1761 he was made a knight of the Thistle. Chosen one of the sixteen representative Scots peers at the general election that year, he was subsequently rechosen four different times. He was vice-admiral of Scotland from 1767 till 26th October 1776, when he was nominated first lord of police, the board of which was abolished in 1782. He succeeded his cousin in 1778, as fourth duke of Queensberry, thus uniting in his person three different peerages, and in addition he was created a British peer, by the title of Baron Douglas of Amesbury, Wiltshire, 8th August, 1786, with limitation to the heirs male of his body. On the king's recovery, he was, early in 1789, dismissed from the office of lord of the bedchamber, on account of his supporting the right of the prince of Wales to the regency independent of the consent of parliament, and uniformly voting against ministers on that question.

His grace, when earl of March, had, in early life, made Neidpath castle, near Peebles, his residence. The wood which surrounded the castle he, in later years, caused to be cut down and sold, either for the purpose of impoverishing the estate before it should fall to the heir of entail, or to give the proceeds to his natural daughter. His conduct with regard to it called forth the following indignant sonnet from Wordsworth:

"Degenerate Douglas! Oh! the unworthy Lord, Whom mere despite of heart could so far please,
And love of havoc, (for with such disease Fame taxes him,) that he could send forth word
To level with the dust a noble horde,
A brotherhood, of venerable trees,
Leaving an ancient dome and towers like these,
Beggared and outraged! Many hearts deplored
The fate of those old trees; and oft with pain
The traveller, at this day, will stop and gaze
On wrongs which nature scarcely seems to heed:
For sheltered places, bosoms, nooks and bays,
And the pure mountains and the gentle Tweed,
And the green silent pastures yet remain."

When his grace first went to London, in his youth, being then earl of March, he became one of the principal patrons of horseracing of that day. At the outset of his career on the turf he distinguished himself by a wager with the celebrated Count Taaffe, an Irishman who had spent some time in the Austrian service, that he would travel in a four-wheeled machine the space of 19 miles in sixty minutes, and having got one made for the purpose, he gained it, this match against time having come off on the course at Newmarket, 29th August, 1750. He took a house at Newmarket, overlooking the course, and was very successful in his betting speculations. He had a choice stud of racehorses, with trainers and groomboys, the latter dressed in scarlet. From the duke of Cumberland, the victor at Culloden, Mr. Jennings the antiquary, and various others, he gained large sums. In 1756 he rode a match in person, dressed in his own running stable livery, consisting of a red silk jacket, a velvet cap, and buckskin breeches, when he was successful. After he had left the turf, he sold his house at Newmarket, and betook himself to the study of books and coins, the enjoyment of pictures and statues, and the acquisition of one of the noblest and most expensive collections of shells in the kingdom.

His later years were spent in retirement at his house in Piccadilly, London. He had an ear for music, and is said to have displayed great taste in a song. A munificent patron of musicians, especially foreign ones, in his house were to be seen all the great singers who were attracted to England in his time. "In point of person," says a writer in the Scots Magazine for February 1811, "his grace was of the middle size, neat, slim, and at an early period of life, graceful and elegant. In consequence of a speck in one of his eyes, a ridiculous story prevailed that he wore a glass one. He spent the greater part of his later years at the south-east extremity of his parlour bow window, where he sat eight or ten hours daily. Behind him stood a servant out of livery who acted the part of a nomenclator, and pronounced the names of such of the passengers as were of any distinction. So uniform was his grace in attendance during certain fixed hours, and of such long continuance of practice, that a gentleman who set out for India in quest of a fortune, on his return after ten years' absence, actually found him fixed in the same spot. His favourite pony was saddled every forenoon, and, until the day of his death, stationed nearly opposite the door, in constant readiness, precisely at the same moment as formerly."

His grace died at London, 23d December 1810, in his 86th year, unmarried. The titles of duke of Queensberry, marquis of Dumfries-shire, earl of Drumlanrig and Sanquhar, viscount of Nith, Torthorwald and Ross, with Drumlanrig castle, passed, by special limitation, to the duke of Buccleuch, the grandson of Lady Jean Douglas, duchess of Buccleuch. Those of marquis and earl of Queensberry, viscount of Drumlanrig and baron Douglas, devolved upon Sir Charles Douglas, sixth baronet of Kelhead, heir male of the family, of whom below. With these titles he got the baronies of Tintwald and Torthorwald, and other estates in Dumfries-shire. The titles of earl of March, viscount of Peebles, and Lord Neidpath, Lyne, and Munard, with Neidpath castle, and the estate attached to it in Peebles-shire, passed to the earl of Wemyss; while those of earl of Ruglen and Lord Douglas of Amesbury became extinct. The Wiltshire property of Amesbury went, in accordance with a settlement executed by the third duke of Queensberry, to Archibald, Lord Douglas of Douglas. His grace's personal fortune, amounting to about a million sterling, was devised in legacies to various persons, the earl of Yarmouth being the residuary legatee. A list of these is given in the number of the Scots Magazine above quoted.

Sir Charles Douglas of Kelhead, baronet, who succeeded as fifth marquis of Queensberry, derived his descent from the Hon. Sir William Douglas of Kelhead, second son of the first earl of Queensberry. He was an officer in the army, and governor of Carlisle in 1647. He was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, by patent dated 20th February 1668, and died before 1673. He was twice married; first, to Agnes, daughter of Fawsyde of Fawsyde, parish of Tranent, Haddingtonshire; and, secondly, to Jean Stewart, of the Traquair family, relict of Andrew Riddell of Haining, and by the former had five sons and several daughters.

His 3d eldest surviving son, Sir James Douglas, 2d bart. of Kelhead, born Sept. 19, 1639, succeeded him, and died before April 1708. By his wife, Lady Catherine Douglas, 2d daughter of the 2d earl of Queensberry, Sir James had one son, Sir William Douglas, 3d baronet, who died in 1733. The latter had 10 sons and 4 daughters. The eldest son, Sir John Douglas, 4th baronet, was chosen M.P. for Dumfries county at the general election of 1741. Apprehended in July 1746, on suspicion of having favoured the cause of the Pretender, he was, on Aug. 14th, committed to the Tower of London, and not liberated till March 1748, when he got out on bail. He died at Drumlanrig, Nov. 13, 1778. His eldest son, Sir William Douglas, 5th baronet, M.P. for the Dumfries burghs, died May 16, 1783. He married the eldest daughter and coheir of William Johnston, Esq. of Lockerby, Dumfries-shire, and, with 3 daughters, had 5 sons.

Sir Charles, the eldest son, 6th baronet of Kelhead, born in 1777, became in Dec. 1810, as already shown, 5th marquis of Queensberry. He was a knight of the Thistle, a lord of the bedchamber, lord-lieutenant of Dumfries-shire, and colonel in its militia. In 1833 he was created Baron Solway of Kinnmount, in the peerage of the United Kingdom, a title which became extinct at his death in 1837. By his marchioness, Lady Caroline Montague, 3d daughter of Henry, duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry, he had 5 daughters.

He was succeeded by his next brother, John, 6th marquis of Queensberry, born in 1779; appointed a lord of the bedchamber in April 1835. He died Dec. 19, 1856. He had married, in 1817, Sarah, daughter of James Sholto Douglas, Esq., with issue. His son, Archibald William, 7th marquis, born in 1818, was educated at Eton, and became a cornet in the 2d Life Guards, but retired in 1844. As Viscount Drumlanrig, he was elected M.P. for Dumfries-shire in 1847; married the daughter of Major-general Sir William Robert Clayton, baronet; issue, 4 sons and 2 daughters. He was killed at Kinnmount, Dumfries-shire, by the accidental discharge of his gun, while shooting rabbits, Aug. 6, 1858.

His eldest son, John Sholto Douglas, Viscount Drumlanrig, born July 20, 1844, succeeded as 8th marquis.

RAE, surname of, see SUPPLEMENT.

RAEBURN, SIR HENRY, a distinguished portrait painter, the younger son of Mr. William Raeburn, manufacturer at Stockbridge, a suburb of Edinburgh, was born there, March 4, 1756. His ancestors lived on the border, and his father, on his removal to Stockbridge, married Ann Elder, and commencing manufacturer, became the proprietor of mills. He had two sons, William, who succeeded him in his business, and Henry, the subject of this notice.

He lost both his parents while yet young, and received his education in Heriot's Hospital, Edinburgh, called by those who have been brought up in it, 'Heriot's Wark.' At the age of fifteen, he was apprenticed to a goldsmith in Edinburgh. Soon after he began to amuse himself by drawing miniatures, which, although he had never received any lessons, were finished in such a superior manner as to excite attention. His master, astonished at his performances, took him, about the year 1772, to see the paintings of David Martin, then the principal portrait painter in the Scottish metropolis. Martin, who painted many portraits in what Allan Cunningham calls "the first starched Hudson style of Sir Joshua Reynolds," at that time resided in St. James' Square. He received the young aspirant courteously, and lent him several pictures, with permission to copy them. He refused, however, to teach him how to prepare his colours, leaving him to find that out for himself. In thus maintaining the mystery of his profession, Martin acted properly enough. He had given him all the assistance which a younger artist, not a pupil, is entitled to expect from an elder, in the way of advice and encouragement, and so far was entitled to praise rather than censure. But when his jealousy of the rising talents of the youth, or his own capricious temper, led him somewhat hastily to accuse him of selling one of the copies which he had permitted him to make, the case was different. Raeburn indignantly established his innocence, and refused all further assistance from him.

He continued to paint miniatures, for which there was soon a general demand, and he usually finished two in a week. As this employment necessarily withdrew his time from trade, an arrangement was entered into with his master, whereby the latter, on receiving part of his earnings, dispensed with the young painter's attendance. In the course of his apprenticeship he began to paint in oil, and on a large scale, a style which he soon adopted in preference to miniature painting.

When the expiration of his apprenticeship rendered him free, he became professionally a portrait painter. At the age of twenty-two, he married Ann, daughter of Peter Edgar, Esq. of Bridglands, with whom he received a handsome fortune. He had fallen in love with this young lady while she sat to him for her portrait. With the view of improving himself in his art, he repaired to London, where he was introduced to Sir Joshua Reynolds. That artist, struck with the genius displayed in his works, advised him to enlarge his ideas by a visit to Italy, and even offered to supply him with money for the purpose, which, however, Raeburn did not need. He accordingly set out for Rome, accompanied by his wife, and well furnished with letters of introduction from Sir Joshua to the most eminent artists and men of science in that capital. He spent two years in Italy, diligently engaged in studying the most celebrated works of art. Returning to Edinburgh in 1787, he established himself in George Street of that city, where he soon rose to the head of his profession in Scotland, an eminence which he maintained to the end of his life.

In 1795 he built a large house in York Place, the upper part of which was lighted from the roof, and fitted up as a gallery for exhibition, while the lower was divided into convenient painting rooms. His dwelling-house was at St. Bernard's, near Stockbridge, on the banks of the Water of Leith. The history of his life is limited to his professional pursuits. He painted the portraits of many of the most eminent of his contemporaries in Scotland, and his likenesses are universally regarded as most striking and exact, while they are executed with a freedom, vigour, and dignity, in which he was excelled by none. His style was free and bold; his drawing critically correct; his colouring rich, deep, and harmonious; the accessories, whether drapery, furniture, or landscape, were always appropriate; and he had the peculiar power of rendering the head of his figure bold, prominent, and imposing. His equestrian pieces, in particular, are universally admired. The most interesting of his later works are a series of half-length portraits of his literary and scientific friends, which he painted solely for his own private gratification. A great number of his portraits have been engraved. Constantly employed as a portrait painter, he devoted no part of his attention either to historical or landscape painting. He was elected a member of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, of the Imperial Academy of Florence, and of the New York and South Carolina Academies. On November 2, 1812, or, as stated by some, in 1814, the Royal Academy of London elected him an associate, and, on February 10, 1815, he was chosen an academician.

In 1822, when George IV. visited Edinburgh, his majesty, as a compliment to the fine arts in Scotland, conferred the honour of knighthood on Mr. Raeburn, a dignity which was wholly unexpected on his part. A few weeks thereafter his brother artists, as a mark of their respect, invited him to a public dinner. Soon after, he was nominated portrait painter to his majesty for Scotland, an appointment which, however, was not announced to him till the very day when he was seized with the illness which terminated in his death. His portrait is subjoined :

The last pictures on which he was engaged were two portraits of Sir Walter Scott, one for himself, and the other for Lord Montague. He died, after a short illness, arising from general decay, July 8, 1823. His widow survived him ten years. He had two sons, Peter, who died at nineteen, and Henry, who with his wife and family, lived under the same roof with his father, and to whose children he left the bulk of his fortune, consisting of houses and ground-rents on his property at St. Bernard's, Stockbridge, which, in his latter years, he had occupied his leisure in planning out into elegant villas and streets, and now forms part of one of the suburbs of Edinburgh.

RAIT, or RAYE, a surname, originally Rhet, supposed to have been derived from a German, who came to Scotland in the reign of Malcolm the Maiden, from the country of Rhetia, whence the name. He is said to have got from that monarch some lands in Perthshire, which he called after his own name. In the reign of John Baliol mention is made of Sir Gervase Rait of that ilk. The name appears in the Ragman Roll as that of one of the Scots barons who swore fealty to Edward I. of England in 1296. In the reign of Robert III., Sir Alexander Rait of that ilk having killed the thane of Calder, fled to the Mearns, and obtained the protection of the earl Marischal. His son, Mark Rait, married the heiress of Hallgreen, named Dunnet or Durand, and got with her that estate, which became the designation of the family. David Rait of Hallgreen and Drumnagar had a charter from King James III. of these lands. A second son of this family was ancestor of the Raits of Pitforthie.

The Raits of Anniston House, Forfarshire, are also a branch of the Hallgreen family.

John Rait, D.D., bishop of Aberdeen in 1351, is witness to a charter the last day of February in the 23d year of David II. He died in the 26th year of the same king, viz., 1355. Another of the family was minister of Inverkeillour, Forfarshire, and died about 1688.

There was likewise a Capt. Rait, R.N., of whom honourable mention is made in the Life of William IV., as "the gallant Rait."

Dr. George Rait, brother of Rait of Hallgreen, married Catherine, daughter of Bishop Douglas of Dunblane, and had, with a daughter, Lady Ramsay of Banff, a son, William Rait, Esq., whose son, John Rait of Anniston House, married in 1799 Elizabeth, daughter of James Guthrie, Esq. of Craigie, Forfarshire, with issue.

His son, James Rait of Anniston House, born Nov. 20, 1805, educated at Eton, Edinburgh, and the University of St. Andrews; major of the Forfarshire militia, and a magistrate and deputy lieutenant of the county; was formerly Captain 15th Hussars. He commanded a regiment of lancers in the British legion in Spain in 1835-7, and gained the 1st class medal of St. Ferdinand. He was also decorated by General Cordova in the field with the 2d class medal of the same. He married July 17, 1838, Lady Clementina Drummond Ogilvy, 2d daughter of the earl of Airlie, with issue.

RALSTON, a surname derived from lands originally called Ralphston, in Renfrewshire. The ancient family of Ralston of that ilk descended from one Ralph, a contraction of Randolph, who obtained some lands from the high steward of Scotland, which he called after his own name, Ralphston. In course of time softened into Ralston, it became the surname of the family. Nicolaus de Ralston is witness to a donation to the monks of Paisley in 1272. In the Ragman Roll is the name of Hew de Ralstoun of this family. Jacobus Ralston of Ralston is witness in an instrument upon electing an abbot of the monastery of Paisley, whose surname was John Ralston of that ilk. Crawford, in his 'History of Renfrewshire,' says that the family were descended from the Macduffs, thanes or earls of Fife. But, as Nisbet remarks, this is not favoured by their arms, for they do not carry the lion rampant, the arms of the old earls of Fife, but three acorns on a bend, intimating that they are of the same race and stock with those of the surname of Muirhead.

In the reign of James II. lived John de Ralstone, who, in 1444, was made lord keeper of the privy seal, in 1448 bishop of Dunkeld, and in 1449 lord-high-treasurer. The same year he was sent ambassador to England, and again in 1452. (Keith's Catalogue of Scottish Bishops.) He was succeeded in the estate of Ralston by his nephew. In 1505 Thomas Ralston of Ralston obtained a charter of his lands from John Lord Ross. Hugh de Ralston of Ralston fell at the battle of Pinkie 10th September 1547. The son of the latter, also named Hugh, acquired in 1551, from Gavin, commendator of Kilwinning, the lands of Woodside and Turnerland, parish of Beith, Ayrshire. He was the sixth laird of Ralston.

The Ralstons of Warwickhill are descended from his youngest son, William Ralston, grandfather of Gavin Ralston, the first of Auchintorlie near Paisley, a man of such singular opinions with regard to religion that he acquired the name of the Pagan. William Henry Ralston, the third in descent from him, a captain in the army, purchased the lands of Warwickhill, and was succeeded by his nephew, Alexander Macdougall Ralston; married, with issue.

RAMSAY, a surname derived from Ramsay or Ramsea, the island of rams. Lower, in his 'Essays on English Surnames,' (vol. ii. p. 103.) says that the abbot of Ramsay bore on his seal a ram in the sea. Simundus de Ramsay, the ancestor of the Dalhousie family, the first of the name in Scotland, came from the county of Huntingdon, in England, where the name of Ramsay is a local appellation, and received a grant of lands in Mid Lothian from David I. (see vol. ii. p. 2. article DALHOUSIE). We learn from Douglas, (Peerage, Wood's edit. vol. i. p. 401.) that he was a witness in a charter of Archbishop Thurston to the monks of Holyrood in 1140, and also in one, in the reign of Malcolm IV., wherein William de Morville, constable of Scotland, granted the lands of Gilmerston, near Edinburgh, to Eudulph, the son of Uchtred. William de Ramsay is witness to a charter to the church of Coltingham, in the reign of King William the Lion, before 1198. Patriek de Ramsay is witness to a charter of King Alexander II., to the abbacy of Dunfermline in 1227. Another William de Ramsay was of the council of King Alexander III. in 1255, in the minority of that monarch. He witnessed a charter of Duncan de Lascels in 1260, also, a donation of Synon de Kyner or Kinneir, to the monks of Balmerno, in Fife, 1st September 1261, and another, signed in presence of King Alexander III., in the castle of Edinburgh, in May 1278. He is said to have had three sons: William, his successor; Malcolm, witness to a charter of William de Vallonis in 1284; and John, witness to the same and to another charter in 1278.

William de Ramsay, the eldest son, swore fealty to Edward I. of England, for his lands of Dalwolsie or Dalhousie, in the county of Edinburgh, and of Foulden, Berwickshire, in 1296, and again in 1304. He joined King Robert the Brus, and was one of the patriot barons who signed the letter to the pope, asserting the independence of Scotland, 6th April 1320.

Sir Alexander de Ramsay of Dalhousie, supposed to be his son, (referred to in the article DALHOUSIE, earl and marquis of,) distinguished himself by his valour and daring in the reign of David II., and was one of the most conspicuous of the Scottish leaders against the English at that period. In August 1335, when Edward III. invaded Scotland, and a considerable body of foreign troops, under the command of Guy count of Namur, had landed to his assistance, the latter were encountered and defeated on the Boroughmuir of Edinburgh by the regent Randolph, earl of Moray, the earl of March, and Sir Alexander Ramsay. Collecting together a band of adventurous young men, the latter took shelter in the caves of Hawthornden near Roslin, and in the adjacent caves of Gorton, and continually harassed the English by his sallies against them. He relieved the castle of Dunbar, when besieged by the earl of Salisbury in 1338, (see vol. ii. of this work, p. 78). He even extended his inroads across the border, and, on one occasion, returning from Northumberland with much booty, he was encountered by Robert Manners near Wark castle. Pretending to fly, he led the party into an ambuscade, when he attacked and totally defeated them, making their leader prisoner. He took the strong fortress of Roxburgh by storm from the English, 20th March 1342. As William Douglas, the knight of Liddesdale, (see vol. ii. p. 42.) had previously failed in an attempt on the same fortress, David II. conferred his office of sheriff of Teviotdale on Ramsay. This roused the resentment of Douglas, formerly his friend and companion in arms, and while Ramsay was holding a court in the church of Hawick, 20th June 1342, he came with an armed retinue, and dragging him from the judgment-seat, conveyed him to his castle of Hermitage, where he shut him up in a dungeon, and left him to perish of hunger. It is related that above the place of his confinement there was a granary, and that with some grains of corn which dropped down through the crevices of the roof, Ramsay protracted a miserable existence for seventeen days.

Sir William Ramsay of Dalhousie, said to be his son, conducted a body of men across the border, in August 1355, and pillaged the country about Norham, six miles above Berwick. Sir Thomas Grey of Chillingham, the governor of Norham castle, attacked him on his return, but was drawn into an ambush and taken prisoner. Sir William's elder son, Sir Patriek Ramsay of Dalhousie, had a charter from David II. of the lands of Kerrington, in Mid Lothian, and died in 1377. His son, Alexander, designed of Carnock, having predeceased him, he was succeeded by his grandson, Sir Alexander Ramsay, the son of the latter. This baron defended Dalhousie castle, when attacked by the English under Henry IV., so stoutly that the king was compelled to retreat from before it. Sir Alexander was slain at the battle of Homildon, 14th September 1402.

Sir Alexander Ramsay, the next feudal baron of Dalhousie, obtained a letter of safe-conduct to go to England in 1423, to accompany James I. to Scotland, on his return from his long captivity, and was knighted at his coronation the following year. At the conflict at Pipeden, 30th September 1435, when the English were defeated, he was one of the principal commanders. He died before 19th March 1465. He had four sons. Alexander, the eldest, predeceased his father, leaving a son of the same name. Robert, the second son, is supposed to have been the ancestor of the Ramsays of Cockpen. The Ramsays of Whitehill, in the county of Edinburgh, descended from a second son of Cockpen, had the title of baronet. The family terminated in an heiress, who married Balfour of Balbirnie. The two younger sons were George Ramsay of Hallhouse and Lekbernard, Mid Lothian, and William Ramsay. Sir Alexander made an entail of his estate, by charter, dated 3d April 1456, in favour of his grandson, Alexander, and the heirs male of his body, which failing, to his remaining sons in their order, and the heirs male of their bodies respectively.

The grandson, Sir Alexander Ramsay of Dalhousie, was a minor at the death of his grandfather. The baronies of Foulden and Dalhousie were confirmed to him by James III., 22d March, 1473. He was slain at Flodden in September 1513. His son, Nicol, who succeeded him, had a commission of justiciary on Dalhousie, Kerington, and Foulden, 2d May 1542, and died in 1554.

Nicol's son, George Ramsay of Dalhousie, signed the bond of association in 1567 for the defence of James VI., but on the escape of Queen Mary from Locheven castle, he joined her party, and entered into the band at Hamilton to support her cause, 8th May 1568. He died in December 1579. In Carr's History of Coldingham Priory, under the head of Foulden (page 158), it is stated that he was the last of the family, probably meaning that possessed Foulden, and that he died 4th January 1592, aged 74. He was buried in the churchyard of Foulden, where a tombstone bearing the latter date, with a quaint inscription, marks his dust. His eldest son, John Ramsay of Dalhousie, who succeeded him, died in 1592, without issue. His next brother, James, predeceased him, but left two sons, George, first Lord Ramsay, and John, viscount of Haddington and earl of Holderness. The latter, when Sir John Ramsay, was the chief instrument in saving the life of James VI., when attacked in Gowrie house in 1600, (see HADDINGTON, viscount of, vol. ii. p. 394).

George Ramsay of Dalhousie, the elder son, had the barony of Dalhousie, on his own resignation, and the lordship of Melrose on the resignation of his brother John, viscount of Haddington, erected into the free barony of Melrose, to himself and his heirs male of entail, with the title of Lord Ramsay of Melrose, by charter, dated 25th August 1618. He afterwards obtained a letter from King James VI., dated at Whitehall 5th January 1619, changing the title to Lord Ramsay of Dalhousie. He died in 1629. He married, first, Margaret, daughter and heiress of Sir George Douglas of Helenhill, brother of William, earl of Morton, and had, with two daughters, a son, William, second Lord Ramsay of Dalhousie, and first earl of Dalhousie, (see vol. ii. p. 2). By a second marriage he had two sons, the Hon. John Ramsay and the Hon. James Ramsay.

A baronetcy of Nova Scotia was conferred, 3d September 1625, on Gilbert Ramsay of Balmain and Fasque in Kincardineshire, grandson of Sir John Ramsay, knight, the page of James II., and the only one of his favourites not put to death at Lauder Bridge, who was created by that monarch Lord Bothwell (see BOTHWELL, Lord, vol. i. p. 353). Sir Alexander, the sixth baronet of this family, died 11th February 1806, without issue, when his kinsman and heir-at-law, Sir Thomas Ramsay, colonel East India Company's service, became seventh baronet. Sir Thomas died in 1830, without issue, when the title became extinct.

Sir Alexander, the sixth baronet, had bequeathed the estates to his nephew, Alexander Burnet, Esq., second son of Sir Thomas Burnet of Leys, baronet, by Catherine Ramsay, his sister. Mr. Burnet, in consequence, assumed by sign manual the surname and arms of Ramsay, and was created a baronet in May 1806, by the designation of Sir Alexander Ramsay of Balmain. He died 17th May 1810. By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter and coheir of Sir Alexander Bannerman of Elsick, baronet, he had eight sons and three daughters. The four eldest sons were, Sir Alexander, second baronet; Thomas, a captain in the 47th regiment, who was twice married, with issue; Robert, a captain in the 14th regiment, married, with issue; and the Very Rev. Edward Ramsay, dean of Edinburgh, in the Scots Episcopal church, married. The eldest son, Sir Alexander, third baronet, born 14th February 1785, was twice married, and had issue by both marriages. His 2d wife was Elizabeth, 2d daughter of the 1st Lord Panmure. Sir Alexander died April 26, 1852.

Sir Alexander, the eldest son, 3d baronet, born May 26, 1813, married Dec. 29, 1835, Ellen Matilda, eldest daughter of John Entwisle, Esq. of Foxholes, county of Lancaster, issue, 4 sons and a daughter. The eldest son, Alexander Entwisle, was born January 14, 1837.

A baronetcy of Nova Scotia is also possessed by the family of Ramsay of Bamff, Perthshire, conferred in 1666, on Sir Gilbert Ramsay, knight, grandson of George Ramsay of Bamff, descended from Adam de Ramsay of Bamff, one of the Scottish barons who swore fealty to Edward I. of England in 1296, and the father of Alexander Ramsay, physician to King James and Charles I.

Sir Gilbert's son, Sir James, second baronet, died in 1730, when his eldest son, Sir John, became third baronet. He was succeeded in 1738 by his eldest son, Sir James, whose eldest son, Sir John, fifth baronet, advocate and sheriff of Kincardineshire, died without issue. The title then devolved upon his brother, Sir George, the sixth baronet, who fell in a duel with Captain James Macrae of Holmains in April 1790, (see pp. 69, 70 of this volume). The dispute between them arose out of some insolent behaviour which one of Lady Ramsay's footmen had offered to Captain Macrae at the Edinburgh theatre, for which that gentleman beat him severely on the spot. This was on the evening of the 7th April. The footman, James Merry, having on the 12th raised an action against him, the captain wrote to Sir George, insisting on the prosecution being stopped or that the footman should be instantly dismissed. Sir George declined to interfere, and a duel was the consequence. On the 14th the parties met at Musselburgh, when Sir George received a wound of which he died on the 16th. Captain Macrae took refuge in France.

Leaving no issue, Sir George was succeeded by his brother, Sir William, 7th baronet, who died in 1807. The latter had 3 sons: James; George; and William, professor of humanity in the university of Glasgow, appointed in 1831, who married Catherine, daughter of Professor Davidson, of the same university, issue, one daughter.

Sir James, M.A., baronet, born Sep. 26, 1797, married in 1828, Jane, only child and heiress of John Hope Oliphant, Esq., first in council of Prince of Wales Island. He died without issue, Jan. 1, 1859.

His brother, Sir George, born March 19, 1800, succeeded as 9th baronet. He married in 1830 Emily-Eugenie, daughter of Henry Lennox, Esq., county Westmeath, issue, 3 sons.

In the reign of David II., families of the name of Ramsay acquired lands in various parts of the kingdom. In Fife there were the Ramsays of Northbarnes, the Ramsays of Lumquhat, and the Ramsays of Balbartan; in Forfarshire, the Ramsays of Mains; and in Kincardineshire the Ramsays of Cracknestown.

One-third of the lordship of Leuchars, in Fife, that to which the castle was attached, was conferred by Robert II. on Sir Alexander Ramsay, and to distinguish it from the other two-thirds it was subsequently designated Leuchars-Ramsay. Sir Alexander Ramsay dying without male issue, his only daughter married Eustacius de Monypenny, who thus acquired the lands of Leuchars-Ramsay, and their successor leaving only a daughter, who married Ramsay of Colluthie, this portion of the lands came to that family.

About 1356 Sir William Ramsay of Colluthie married Isabel, countess of Fife, daughter of Duncan, the last earl of Fife of the ancient race of Macduff, (see vol. ii. p. 211,) in consequence of which he was invested with the earldom, says Sir James Balfour, by David II., by the cincture of the belt and sword, as the custom then was, (Nisbet's Heraldry, vol. i. p. 34). Sibbald says that in a charter to the Scrimgeours, he is placed before the earl of March, from which he concludes that he had probably some right to the title by blood. There is no reason to believe, however, that he had any other right than was derived from the investiture of the crown, in consequence of his marriage with the heiress. He accompanied the earl of Douglas to France in 1356, probably previous to his marriage with the countess of Fife, and was present at the battle of Poitiers, 19th September of that year, when Archibald de Douglas, brother of the knight of Liddesdale, was made prisoner by the English, but effected his escape through the presence of mind of Sir William Ramsay. The circumstances are related at vol. ii. p. 43. Sir William Ramsay, earl of Fife, died without issue, when the investiture reverted to the crown; and his own estate to his heirs, whose successors long possessed Colluthie.

Elizabeth Ramsay, the daughter and heiress of the last male heir of the family, William Ramsay of Colluthie, married David Carnegie of Panbride, who received with her the lands of Leuchars-Ramsay and Colluthie. Two of the sons of this David Carnegie, by a second wife, were, after his death, raised to the peerage, his eldest son being created earl of Southesk, and his second son, earl of Northesk. See those titles.

A baronetcy was possessed by a family of the name of Ramsay, proprietors for a time of the lands of Abbotshall, in Fife. They were purchased from the Scotts of Balwearie by Sir Andrew Ramsay, styled of Waughton, who was created a baronet in 1669, and was son of Andrew Ramsay, a rector of the college of Edinburgh, and minister of the Greyfriars church there. He obtained the latter estate by his marriage with the heiress of Hieburn of Waughton, Haddingtonshire. Sir Andrew Ramsay was bred a merchant, and elected lord provost of Edinburgh in 1654, and for the three succeeding years. He gained the favour of the duke of Lauderdale by prevailing on the town council to give that unprincipled statesman £5,000 sterling for the superiority of Leith, and under his auspices he was re-elected lord provost of Edinburgh in 1662, and kept that office for twelve successive years, in spite of all the attempts of the council to remove him. In 1671 he was nominated a privy councillor and admitted an ordinary lord of session. He was also commissioner to parliament for Edinburgh. From the various offices which he held he was extremely useful to Lauderdale, and necessarily obnoxious to his opponents. It was, therefore, resolved to get quit of him by impeachment, and accordingly articles were given in by the earl of Eglington bearing that, "albeit by the act against billeting it was declared a crime in any man to endeavour to thrust any of his majesty's subjects out of their employment without a formal and legal sentence, yet he, the said Sir Andrew, had procured a letter from his majesty to thrust Mr. Rothead out of his employment as town clerk of Edinburgh, and albeit the making lies betwixt the king and his people was punishable by death, he had represented to his majesty that the town had risen in a tumult against the king, and had thereupon procured another letter commanding the privy council to proceed against the chief citizens as malefactors." This struck at Lauderdale himself as the procurer of these letters, and he therefore prevailed on Sir Andrew to escape from the impeachment by resigning his situation both as a magistrate and as a lord of session in 1673. Sir Andrew died in 1680, and was succeeded by his son, Sir Andrew Ramsay of Abbotshall and Waughton. He was named a commissioner of trade in 1685, and died in 1709, without issue, when he was succeeded by his nephew, Mr. Andrew Ramsay, a grandson of the laird of Whitston in the Mearns. The baronetcy has long been extinct.

RAMSAY, ANDREW MICHAEL, better known as the Chevalier de Ramsay, was born at Ayr, June 9, 1686. He was the son of a baker, in good circumstances, and received a liberal education, first at the school of his native place, and afterwards at the university of Edinburgh. He was subsequently appointed tutor to the two sons of the earl of Wemyss. Becoming unsettled in his religious principles, he repaired to the Continent, and at the university of Leyden he made the acquaintance of M. Poiret, a mystic divine, who induced him to adopt the doctrines of that system of theology. In 1710 he visited the celebrated Fenelon, archbishop of Cambrai, who had imbibed the fundamental principles of mysticism; and by that amiable prelate he was persuaded to become a Roman Catholic. Fenelon's influence procured him the appointment of preceptor to the duke de Chateau-Thierry and the prince de Turenne, when he was made a knight of the order of St. Lazarus. He was subsequently engaged by the Pretender to superintend the education of his two sons, Prince Charles Edward and Henry, afterwards cardinal de York; and for this purpose he removed to Rome in 1724; but on his arrival there, he found so many intrigues and dissensions that he soon requested leave to return to Paris. Some time after he visited Scotland, and was kindly received by the duke of Argyll and Greenwich, in whose family he resided some years, and employed his leisure in writing several of his works. In 1730 the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of LL.D., having been admitted for this purpose of St. Mary's Hall in April of that year. While in his native country he offered to settle an annuity on his relations, but they indignantly refused to accept it, on the ground of his having renounced the Protestant religion. After his return to France he resided some time at Pontoise, a seat of the prince de Turenne, duke de Bouillon, in whose family he continued in the capacity of intendant till his death, which happened at St. Germain-en-Laye, May 6, 1743. He was the author of the following works :

RAMSAY, ALLAN, next to Burns the most distinguished of the national poets of Scotland, was born October 15, 1686, at Leadhills, in the parish of Crawfordmuir, in Lanarkshire. He was great-grandson of Captain John Ramsay, a son of Ramsay of Cockpen, a branch of the family of Ramsay of Dalhousie. His grandfather, Robert Ramsay, a writer in Edinburgh, and after him, his father, also named Robert Ramsay, was superintendent of Lord Hopetoun's lead mines at Lead-hills, and his mother, Alice Bower, was the daughter of a gentleman of Derbyshire. His grandmother, Janet Douglas, was a daughter of Douglas of Muthil. All the education which he ever received was obtained at the parish school. He lost his father at the early age of twenty-five, and his mother soon after married Mr. Crichton, a small landholder of Lanarkshire, by whom she had several children. In 1700 his mother died, and in the following year his stepfather took him into Edinburgh, and bound him apprentice to a periwigmaker, an occupation which most of his biographers are very anxious to distinguish from that of a barber. In those days, however, from the prevalent fashion of wearing periwigs, wig-making was a very lucrative and highly respectable profession. Allan himself, it would seem, was not ashamed of his trade, but continued at it long after his apprenticeship had terminated. The earliest of his poems which can now be traced is an epistle addressed, in 1712, 'To the most happy members of the Easy club,' a convivial society which, in 1715, appointed him their poet laureate; but it was soon after broken up by the Rebellion. In 1716, while still a wig-maker, Ramsay published an edition of James the First's poem of 'Christ's Kirk on the Green,' with a second canto by himself, to which, two years after, he added a third. From the imprint of this latter edition, it appears that he had shortly before abandoned his original occupation, and commenced the more congenial business of a bookseller. His first shop was "at the sign of the Mercury, opposite to Niddry's Wynd." In 1721 he published a collection of his poems, in one volume 4to, which was so liberally subscribed for, that he is said to have cleared four hundred guineas by it. The greater part of the pieces in this volume had previously appeared at different times in the detached form of sheets or half-sheets, at one penny each, and so popular had his name become, that it was quite customary for the citizens of Edinburgh to send their children, with a penny, for "Allan Ramsay's last piece." In 1724 he published the first volume of 'The Tea-Table Miscellany,' a collection of songs, Scottish and English, which was speedily followed by a second; a third volume appeared in 1727, and a fourth after another interval. This publication went through no less than twelve editions in a few years. The rapid sale of the first volume induced him in the same year (1724) to bring out 'The Evergreen, being a Collection of Scots Poems, wrote by the Ingenious before 1600.' It professed to be chiefly selected from the Bannatyne MS., and was equally successful. Ramsay, who was a Jacobite in principle, inserted in this publication a poem of affected antiquity, under an assumed name, entitled 'The Vision,' having reference to the Pretender.

His next publication at once established his fame upon a permanent foundation. In 1725 appeared 'The Gentle Shepherd,' a pastoral comedy, in five acts—the best poem of its kind, perhaps, in any language. In 1721 he had published an eclogue, under the title of 'Patie and Roger,' and in 1723 a sequel under that of 'Jenny and Maggie.' The public approbation of these detached scenes encouraged him to make them the groundwork of the complete drama called 'The Gentle Shepherd,' the success of which was instantaneous and unprecedented. Edition rapidly followed edition, and in a few years it was known to every admirer of poetry in the three kingdoms, and had secured a welcome place in almost every cottage in Scotland. The great popularity of Gay's 'Beggars' Opera,' not long after, induced Ramsay to print a new edition of 'The Gentle Shepherd,' with songs abundantly interspersed, adapted to popular Scottish airs, and these it has ever since retained.

In 1726 he removed to a house at the east end of the Luckenbooths, afterwards occupied by Creech the bookseller, and instead of Mercury, adopted for his sign the heads of Ben Jonson and Drummond of Hawthornden. Ramsay is said to have been the first who established a circulating library in Scotland. After his death, it passed into the hands of Mr. Sibbald, and subsequently into those of Mr. Mackay, by whose respective additions it was rendered the most extensive establishment of the kind, perhaps, in Britain.

In 1728 a second quarto volume of his poems appeared, and was reprinted in 8vo during the same year. In 1730 he published his 'Thirty Fables,' undoubtedly the best of his minor productions. Among them is 'The Monk and the Miller's Wife,' a story which, though previously told by Dunbar, "woud of itself," as a competent critic has remarked, "be Ramsay's passport to immortality as a poet." With these he seems to have concluded his poetic labours. "I e'en gave over in good time," he says in a letter to Smibert, the painter, "before the coolness of fancy that attends advanced years should make me risk the reputation I have acquired." His fame had now extended beyond the limits of his native country. An edition of his poems was published by the London booksellers in 1731, and another appeared at Dublin in 1733. His acquaintance was courted by the rich and the noble, and his shop was the usual resort of the literary characters and wits of Edinburgh. His intercourse with contemporary poets was pretty extensive. Hamilton of Bangour, Hamilton of Gilbertfield, Gay, and others, were among the number of his friends, and he addressed verses to Pope and Somerville, author of 'The Chase,' the latter of whom returned his poetical greetings in two epistles.

In 1736 his passion for the drama and enterprising spirit prompted him to erect a new theatre in Carrubber's Close; but in the ensuing year the act for licensing the stage was passed, and the magistrates ordered the house to be shut up. By this speculation he lost a good deal of money; and it is remarked by his biographers, that this was, perhaps, the only unfortunate project in which he ever engaged. In 1743 he lost his wife, Christian Ross, daughter of a writer in Edinburgh, whom he had married in 1712, and who left him a son and three grown-up daughters, out of seven children she had borne to him. Soon after her death, with the view of spending his days in dignified retirement, he erected a house on the north side of the Castlehill, commanding a magnificent view, though now intercepted by the houses of the New Town of Edinburgh. The mansion itself, however, is built in rather a whimsical style of architecture. Here he spent the last twelve years of his life, although he did not give up his shop until 1755, three years before his decease. He died January 7, 1758, aged 72, and was buried in the Greyfriars' churchyard, where a monument was, after the lapse of more than half a century, erected to his memory. Allan Ramsay's works are:

Christ's Kirk on the Green. With a second Canto by Ramsay. Edin. 1716, 8vo. In 3 Cantos, the third also by Ramsay. Edin. 1718. Fifth edition, 1722

A pirated edition of the three volumes then ready was published at Dublin in 1729, 3 vols. in one, 12mo, pp. 334, printed for E. Smith. On the publication of the 9th edition in 1732, Ramsay, as we learn from a contribution of Mr. Peter Cunningham to the Gentleman's Magazine for April 1833, addressed a letter, dated 13th July of that year, to Mr. Andrew Millar, the London publisher, in which he granted him permission to print the three volumes of the Tea Table Miscellany then published, in what form he pleased, on payment to him of five pounds sterling at Martinmas following. He also empowered Mr. Millar to take up for him five guineas from the printers of his poems, the unpaid moiety as agreed on between them and Mr. M'Ewen, who had instructions from him to transact with them, and to whom they paid the first moiety. The letter was taken by his son, Mr. Allan Ramsay, the celebrated painter, and he added in a postscript: "My son brings you this, if he approves of it. If we agree, I desire that you send none to this country—it is scarce worth your while." This, says Mr. Cunningham, relates to the ninth edition of the first collected edition of the Tea Table Miscellany, that in three thin duodecimo volumes, printed for Andrew Millar in 1733, and called "the ninth edition, being the completest and most correct of any yet published by Allan Ramsay." The tenth edition appeared in 1740, with the addition of 150 songs. The eleventh edition was published at London, four volumes in one, 12mo, 1750. The 18th at Edinburgh in 1792.

RAMSAY, ALLAN, an eminent portrait painter, eldest son of the preceding, was born at Edinburgh in 1713. Having shown an early attachment to art, after receiving some instructions in London, he went to Italy, where he studied under artists of great celebrity. On his return he practised for some time in Edinburgh, but afterwards resided chiefly in London, where he acquired considerable reputation as a portrait painter. By the interest of Lord Bute he was introduced to George III., when prince of Wales, whose portrait he painted both in whole length and in profile, the former being engraved by Ryland and the latter by Woollett. Several mezzotinto prints were also published after portraits by him, of several of the most distinguished of his own countrymen. In March 1767 he was appointed principal painter to the king; a situation which he retained till his death, though he retired from practice about 1775, in consequence of having injured his arm by an accident. He visited Rome at four different times, and on the last occasion he spent several years in Italy. Finding his health decline he returned to England, but died, a few days after landing, at Dover, August 10, 1784. His portraits are celebrated for their resemblance to nature, and their unstudied simplicity; and he himself is described as having contributed to improve the style of portrait painting in Great Britain.

Ramsay possessed considerable literary taste, and was the founder of the "Select Society" of Edinburgh in 1754, of which all the eminently learned men of that capital were members. He was the author of some able pamphlets on history, politics, and criticism, published at different times, but afterwards collected into a volume, entitled 'The Investigator.' He also wrote a pamphlet on the subject of Elizabeth Canning. He was an excellent classical scholar; spoke the Italian and German languages fluently, and, like Cato, learned Greek in his old age. He is frequently mentioned by Boswell as being of Dr. Johnson's parties. He married Margaret, eldest daughter of Sir Alexander Lindsay of Evelick, baronet, a niece of Lord Mansfield, by whom he had a son, John, who attained the rank of major-general in the army, and two daughters, Amelia, married to Sir Archibald Campbell of Inverness, and Charlotte, who became the wife of Colonel Malcolm of Ford Farm, Surrey.

RAMSAY, JAMES, an eminent philanthropist, and one of the first who wrote against the slave trade, was born at Fraserburgh, Aberdeenshire, July 25, 1733. After receiving his grammatical education, he was apprenticed to Dr. Findlay, a medical practitioner in his native town, and in 1750 entered as a student of King's college, Aberdeen, where he obtained one of the principal bur-saries. In 1755 he repaired to London, and studied surgery and pharmacy under Dr. Macaulay, in whose family he lived for two years. He afterwards obtained an appointment as surgeon in the royal navy, in which he served for several years. While on board the Arundel he unfortunately fell on the deck and broke his thigh-bone, by which he was confined for ten months, and rendered lame for life. This accident determined him to quit the navy, and turn his thoughts towards becoming a minister of the church of England. Accordingly, while the Arundel lay at St. Christopher's, he obtained, from some of the principal inhabitants, strong recommendations to the bishop of London, by whom, on his coming to England, he was admitted into holy orders. Returning to St. Christopher's, he was presented by the governor to two rectories, valued at £700 a-year. In 1763 he married Rebecca Akers, the daughter of a planter of high respectability.

On his first settlement in the West Indies he made some public attempts to instruct the slaves; which, however, were misunderstood and misrepresented; and, in addition to his clerical duties, he took the charge of several plantations in the capacity of medical adviser. In 1777 he returned to Britain, and visited his native place. In the following year he was appointed chaplain to Admiral Barrington, then about to proceed to the West Indies. He resigned his pastoral charge in the island of St. Christopher's, and returned to England with his wife and family in the end of 1781. On his arrival he was, through the interest of his friend Admiral Sir Charles Middleton, presented to the livings of Teston and Nettlestead in Kent. In 1785 he published an 'Essay on the Treatment and Conversion of African Slaves in the British Sugar Colonies,' which involved him in a controversy on the slave trade that embittered his latter years. He died at London, July 20, 1789. His works are:

- Sermon on Deut. xxxii. 29, 30. 1778, 4to.
- Twelve Sermons for the use of the Royal Navy. 1782, 8vo.
- An Essay on the Treatment and Conversion of African Slaves in the British Sugar Colonies. London, 1785, 8vo.
- A Manual for African Slaves. Lond. 1787, 12mo.
- Essay on the Duty and Qualifications of a Sea-officer.
- A Treatise on Signals.

RANDOLPH, earl of Moray, one of the chief companions in arms of Robert the Bruce, and afterwards regent of Scotland, was the son of Thomas Randolph, lord of Strathnith, and lord-high-chamberlain of Scotland, (see p. 200 of this volume). Tytler, apparently not aware that Strathnith or Stranith was the original name of Nithsdale, erroneously styles him lord of Strathdon, a district in Aberdeenshire, with which he had no connection whatever. Randolph's mother was the Lady Isabella Bruce, eldest daughter of Robert earl of Carrick, and sister of the conqueror at Bannockburn. We first find him in public life present with his father on the 26th December 1292, when Baliol did homage to King Edward I. of England. After the murder of the Red Comyn, in February 1305, Randolph was among the small band of patriotic barons who hastened to join his uncle, Robert the Bruce, in his attempt to obtain the crown. In the defeat at Methven, in June 1306, Sir Thomas Randolph, then, says Barbour, "a young bachelor," was among the prisoners taken by the English. Through the intercession of Adam de Gordon he obtained a pardon from King Edward, to whom he swore fealty, and at once joined his forces against his uncle. "What was the private history of this alienation," says Tytler, "it is now impossible to ascertain, but it is evident that he was animated by a very determined spirit of hostility to the royal cause." He was in the army of the earl of Pembroke when, with John of Lorn, that nobleman attacked the small force of Bruce in his retreat in Carrick, and forced it to disperse and seek safety in flight. The following year he was taken prisoner by the good Sir James Douglas in Tweeddale, and conducted, with Stewart of Bonkyl, also a prisoner, to the king. With Adam de Gordon, and two other barons in the English interest, they had led a strong force into Scotland, and occupied a fortalice situated on the water of Line, which joins the Tweed a little above the town of Peebles, but the place was attacked by Douglas during night, and after a bloody struggle, Randolph and Stewart were made prisoners, while Gordon and the others escaped. When Randolph was brought into the presence of his royal uncle, the following conversation, as we learn from Barbour (pp. 188, 189), took place between them. "Nephew," said the king, "thou hast for a while forsworn thine allegiance, but we must now be reconciled." "Thou meanest to rebuke me," replied Randolph, haughtily, "but the rebuke applies with more force to thyself. Since thou hast chosen to make war upon the king of England, it became thee to support thy title on a plain field, and after the fashion of a brave monarch, instead of having recourse to subtle and cowardly ambushes." "Such a contest," Bruce calmly replied, "must yet arrive, and perchance it is not far distant. In the meantime it is fitting that thy proud words and rude demeanour should be punished as they deserve, till thou hast been taught to bow to my right, and to understand thine own duty." He then ordered him into close confinement. On due submission, he was soon, however, pardoned, and restored to his uncle's favour, and ever after continued steady in his attachment to the national cause. By his faithful services and the high capacity for command which he displayed, it was not long before he acquired the complete confidence of the king, who bestowed on him the district of Annandale, with the Isle of Man, and various baronies in different parts of the kingdom. Bruce also conferred upon him the earldom of Moray, and the charter conveying it to him forms the basis of the Essay on Honour and Dignity by Lord Kames. It has no date, as was usual with charters in those days, but is supposed to have been granted in 1312. In failure of heirs male, the earldom was to return to the king and his heirs.

On the 14th March 1313, the earl of Moray took by assault the castle of Edinburgh, which had been in possession of the English since 1296.

This celebrated fortress, which before the invention of artillery was deemed impregnable, was then commanded by Sir Piers Leland, a knight of Gascony, in the service of the king of England. The garrison was strong, well disciplined, and resolute, and Randolph endeavoured at first to reduce the place by famine. But, finding it well provisioned, he opened a communication with the governor, and the garrison, suspecting the fidelity of the latter, deposed and imprisoned him, and chose another commander in his place. Randolph then resolved upon attempting to take the castle by surprise. Among his followers was a soldier named William Frank or Francis, who appears to have been at a former period in the English service. This man, whom Barbour designates "wicht and apert, wyss, and curyuss," that is, strong, active, prudent, and skilful, was well acquainted with the castle rock, which he had often scaled in his youth, while engaged in a love-affair in the city. One day, when Randolph was surveying the castle from below, he came to him, and thus addressed him: "Methinks, my lord, you would rejoice if some one were to devise some means of putting this fortress into your possession, or show you how the walls could be scaled." "Thou sayest truly," replied the earl, "and could such a man be found, I pledge myself that his services shall be amply rewarded, not only by me, but by my royal uncle." "The generosity of the king and of thyself, noble Randolph," said the soldier, "is well known, but the love of country should be above such a consideration. Know that I can enable you to enter the castle with no greater aid than what a twelve feet ladder affords. If you wish to know how this can be done, I shall explain it in a few words. Know, then, that my father in my youth was keeper of yonder fortress, and that I, then a wild gallant, loved a certain maid in the town beneath. That I might repair to her when I pleased, I was wont to lower myself from yonder wall by night with the help of a ladder of ropes which I procured for the purpose, and by a secret path which I discovered, descended, returning by the same way unperceived by the garrison. I did this so often that I could find my way in the darkest night. If, therefore, you should think of trying to obtain access to the castle in this manner, I will be your guide." The earl, resolved to hazard the attempt, and associating Sir Andrew Gray (see vol. ii. p. 371) with himself in the enterprise, he selected thirty men, and during a very dark night they proceeded to scale the rocks. The place chosen for this perilous exploit is supposed to have been somewhere about the north-east side, facing what is now Prince's-street, and overhanging the ruins of the Wellhouse Tower, above which there is a part of the rock of extremely difficult access, popularly called Wallace's Cradle.

When the little party were about half-way up the crags, they came to a flat spot covered by a projecting rock, where they stopped to recover their breath, and prepare for the more dangerous part of the adventure. While arranging their scaling ladder, they distinctly heard the rounds, or check-watches, as Barbour calls them, passing along the walls above them. It chanced that one of the English soldiers, in mere wantonness and levity, and without any suspicion that there was any one beneath, took up a stone, and threw it from the battlements down on the cliffs, exclaiming at the same time, "Away! I see you well!" Randolph and his companions had presence of mind to remain where they were, and the sentinels passed on in their usual rounds. The adventurers resumed the ascent, and arrived in safety at the foot of the wall. They fixed their ladder, and Francis their guide ascended first, after him came Sir Andrew Gray, and Randolph himself was the third. They were speedily followed by the rest of the party. The sentinels, hearing the ringing of armour, took the alarm, and raised the cry of "Treason!" The garrison ran to arms, and the new governor of the castle, whose name has not been transmitted, and others, rushed to the spot. A desperate combat ensued, and Earl Randolph was for a time in great personal danger. Barbour tells us that "The constable and his company Met him and his right hardily."

Taken by surprise, and not knowing, in the darkness, the number of their opponents, many of the garrison fled over the walls, while others, with the governor himself, were slain. Not one of Randolph's party appears to have been killed. On obtaining possession of the castle, Sir Piers Leland was released from his dungeon, and entered into the service of the Scots. His namesake, Leland the antiquarian, styles him Petrus Lelandius, viscount of Edinburgh, but this appellation of viscount must refer to his former office of governor of the castle for Edward II. He adds that "Bruce after surmised treason upon him, because he thought that he had an English heart, and made him to be hanged and drawn."

At the decisive battle of Bannockburn, 24th June, 1314, the command of the vaward was given to Randolph. Previous to the battle, with his division, he was removed from the centre, and posted on the elevated ground above St. Ninians, with strict orders to guard the passage to Stirling castle. A select body of horse, mustering 800 strong, under the command of Sir Robert Clifford and three other leaders, having eluded his observation, were rapidly approaching the castle, when the quick eye of Bruce detected them. Riding up to his nephew, he exclaimed, "Ah! Randolph, little did I dream you would have suffered these men to pass! A rose has fallen from your chaplet." Randolph, with five hundred spearmen, hastened to retrieve his error by endeavouring to intercept the farther progress of Clifford and his party. In the encounter, he was exposed to great peril, and Douglas, having received the reluctant permission of the king to go to his assistance, was hastening to his aid, when he perceived that Randolph, with his spearmen formed in a compact square, had sustained Clifford's attack, and after a desperate contest, in which the assailants suffered severely, had dispersed and defeated them. He then commanded his men to halt, lest they should deprive Randolph of the honour so nobly won by him, (see vol. ii. p. 51). In the battle of the next day, Randolph, as second in command, led the centre of the Scots army against the vast English host opposed to them. In the act of the settlement of the crown of Scotland in the parliament held by Bruce at Ayr for the purpose, 26th April 1315, it was provided that in the event of the heir being a minor, "Thomas Ranulfi, comes Moraviæ," should be guardian of the sovereign and the kingdom.

When the Irish of Ulster the same year offered Edward Bruce the crown of Ireland, Randolph accompanied him to that country, as principal leader of the 6,000 Scots troops which his brother, King Robert, sent along with him. Embarking at Ayr, they landed at Carrickfergus on the 25th of May, and when attacked soon after by a body of English and Irish, Randolph, who commanded the advance, charged them with such impetuosity that they were speedily put to flight. He continued with Edward Bruce in all the remarkable successes which attended him in the first part of the campaign in Ireland. On the 29th June Dundalk was stormed and burnt. Athedee and other places of less note experienced a similar fate. After the battle of Coleraine, in which the English were defeated, Randolph on the 15th September passed over to Scotland for the purpose of obtaining a reinforcement, and in three months he returned with a select body of 500 men at arms. He found Edward Bruce engaged in pressing the siege of Carrickfergus, but on being rejoined by Randolph he abandoned it, and marching southward by Dundalk, they penetrated through Meath into Kildare. At Arscoll, in the province of Leinster, they encountered Butler, the lord justiciary, whose army, although superior in numbers, was enfeebled by discord, and was broken and defeated at the first onset.

The Scots now became a prey to famine, and dreading its effects amongst their followers, Randolph and Edward Bruce broke up their encampment, and retreated through Meath into Ulster. On arriving near Kenlis, they were met by a large and tumultuary force of English and Irish, which attempted to intercept their progress. At the first attack, however, they were put to flight. In April 1316, Randolph again proceeded to Scotland for reinforcements, and in the spring of the following year, King Robert the Bruce, at his solicitation, accompanied him in person to Ireland, to the assistance of his brother. Soon after his arrival, an Anglo-Irish army, 40,000 strong, under the command of Sir Richard Clare and other barons, was defeated by him, while passing through a wood near Carrickfergus, Randolph with himself leading the Scots rearward. King Robert, the same year returned to Scotland, taking Randolph with him. The death of Edward Bruce in the disastrous battle of Dundalk, October 5, 1317, rendered a new settlement of the succession to the crown of Scotland necessary, and at a parliament held at Scone in December 1318, the offices of tutor and curator of the heir, if under age, and guardian of the kingdom, were granted to Sir Thomas Randolph, earl of Moray and lord of Man, and failing him to Lord James of Douglas.

A short time previous to this, the town of Berwick had been taken by the Scots. Barbour gives this account of its capture. A citizen of the town named Spalding, having been harshly treated by the governor, wrote to a nobleman in Bruce's camp, supposed to have been Patrick earl of March, offering to betray at night the post where he kept guard. The earl communicated Spalding's offer to King Robert, and was commended by the king for having come direct to himself, instead of going to Randolph or Douglas, as these two chiefs were emulous of each other's glory. "You did well," said Bruce, "to make me your confident, for if you had told this either to Randolph or to Douglas, you would have offended the one to whom you did not at first tell it. Both of them, however, shall assist you in executing the enterprise." Bruce then commanded him to assemble a body of troops at a place called Dunse Park, and gave separate orders to Randolph and Douglas to meet the earl at the same place. At a part of the wall left unguarded, a portion of the Scots entered the town, and concealed themselves till daydawn, when, aided by their comrades without the walls, they were masters of the town before the hour of noon. The castle soon after capitulated.

On the investment of Berwick in September of the following year by Edward II., at the head of the whole English force, Bruce sent Randolph and Douglas, at the head of an army of 15,000 men, across the borders, with the object of compelling Edward to raise the siege. They entered England by the west marches, and penetrating into Yorkshire, ravaged all the districts through which they passed. The whole of the military strength of England was at this time with Edward before Berwick, but the archbishop of York, at the head of an undisciplined force of about 20,000 men, consisting chiefly of church vassals and priests, ventured to oppose them at Mitton, near Boroughbridge, 20th September 1319, and was defeated with great slaughter. From the great number of ecclesiastics slain in this battle, it was derisively termed by the Scots the "Chapter of Mitton." This success caused Edward to abandon the siege of Berwick, and the Scots, eluding an attempt of his to intercept them on their homeward march, returned to Scotland with great spoil.

Earl Randolph was one of the eight earls who signed the famous letter or memorial, asserting the independence of Scotland, addressed to the pope in 1320 by the barons, freeholders, and whole community of Scotland. He had in many a hard-fought field evinced his skill and prowess as a military commander. He was now to show that his talents as a statesman were equally great. In 1321, he entered into a correspondence with the earl of Lancaster, who had risen in rebellion against his cousin, the king of England, but was defeated and executed before he could receive any assistance from the Scots. Edward now collected his whole force for a new invasion of Scotland, and, in the meantime, the Scots broke across the border, and laid waste Lancashire, returning with much cattle and long trains of waggons laden with booty.

After the signal defeat of Edward at Biland Abbey in Yorkshire, by the Scots army, under Bruce, in 1322,—where Randolph, in the true spirit of chivalry, fought under Douglas in endeavouring to force a narrow pass, which led to the English camp,—negotiations for a truce were entered into, and Randolph, with Lamberton, bishop of St. Andrews, and Sir John Monteith, were nominated on the part of the Scots to meet with commissioners from England, when a fifteen years' truce was concluded. A still more important mission was now intrusted to him. To prepare the way for a reconciliation with the pope, and to counteract the misrepresentations of the English envoys at the papal court, Randolph was despatched to Avignon, where the pope then resided, and with consummate political skill obtained from the pontiff the recognition of the title of king to Bruce. With this concession, he also prevailed upon his holiness to refuse the request of Edward to publish anew the sentence of excommunication against Bruce, and to sanction the election of Scotsmen to the office of bishop, in spite of the charges of the English that they held the censures of the church in contempt, that they were barbarous heretics who put priests to the torture, and that they encouraged the nobility and people in their rebellion. Subsequently, with the bishop of St. Andrews, he was empowered by Bruce to meet the Despencers on the part of King Edward, to negotiate a lasting peace, but the conferences between them led to no result. In 1326, Randolph was sent ambassador to France, and in April that year concluded an alliance, offensive and defensive, with Charles le Bel, the brother of the English queen.

He and Douglas had the command of the Scots army, amounting to nearly 20,000 men, principally mounted troopers, which invaded England by the western marches, on the 15th June 1327. By the deposition of Edward II., in the preceding January, his son, Edward III., then in his fourteenth year, had succeeded to the English throne. He very early displayed his martial character, and anxious to repel the invaders, he led an army of 50,000 men against them. But though seldom out of view of the smoke which marked their desolating march, he never could overtake them, and he was driven to proclaim a reward of lands to the value of £100 sterling annually for life, with knighthood to any person who should conduct him in sight of the Scots. A Yorkshire esquire, named Thomas Rokeby, was the first to bring him certain information as to their whereabouts. Edward was then, with his army, at the Cistercian abbey of Blanch, on the river Derwent, still called Blanchland, and Rokeby reported that the Scots were encamped on the side of a hill about nine miles distant washed by the river Wear. He stated also, that having ventured too near to reconnoitre, he was made "prisoner, and taken before Randolph and Douglas, who, when informed of the nature of his errand, dismissed him without ransom, requesting him to tell King Edward that he could not be more desirous of meeting them than they were of fighting him." On the 1st of August, the English army, under Rokeby's guidance, advanced towards the Scots, and Douglas having watched their approach, returned and informed Randolph of the great strength of the vast array coming against them. On this occasion the two rival Scots commanders seem to have changed characters. "It matters not," said Randolph, who was usually cool and cautious, "we shall fight them, were they still more numerous than you report them." "Praise be to God," said Douglas, curbing his natural impetuosity, "that we have a leader who would not scruple to fight with twenty against sixty thousand, but by St. Bride, it would be folly to fight at present, when we may, in a little while, engage them with far more advantage." Edward found that the Scots occupied a position, with the river Wear in front, which was impregnable, and he sent a herald to the Scottish leaders, offering to leave sufficient space for them to draw up their army, if they would descend from the heights and cross the river, or allow him to pass the river, and leave him room to arrange his forces, so that they might fight on equal terms, but Randolph and Douglas were not to be moved by this bravado. "Go back," they said to the herald, "and tell your master that it is not our custom to follow the counsel of our enemy. The king of England and his barons are not ignorant of the injuries which have been inflicted by us on their kingdom. On our road hither, we have burnt and despoiled the country, and if they are displeased, let them now chastise us as they best can, for here we mean to remain as long as it suits our convenience."

On the fourth morning after, to the surprise of Edward, the Scots were not to be seen, and it was discovered that they had removed some miles farther up the river Wear, where they occupied a position, at a place called Stanhope Park, with a wood in their rear, which was still stronger than the one they had held before. The next night, while the English camp was buried in sleep, Douglas broke through their lines, penetrated to the royal pavilion, and, but for the spirited defence of the chaplain and domestics, would have carried off the young king. On regaining his own camp, he was asked by Randolph what success he had had. "We have drawn blood," he replied, "but little more." At this stage, Randolph again ear-nedly proposed to risk a battle. Douglas, however, recommended a retreat, which was immediately resolved upon. On the succeeding night, the Scots army silently left their camp, and crossing a morass which lay in their rear, were far on their homeward way before day broke, and disclosed to Edward the mortifying fact that they had escaped out of his hands. The result was a treaty of peace, in which England at last acknowledged the independence of Scotland, and recognised Bruce as its lawful king. This treaty was ratified in a parliament held at Northampton in April 1328.

During the last years of the heroic Bruce, Randolph was frequently his companion in his retirement at Cardross on the Clyde. On the death of his royal uncle, in accordance with the act of settlement, he became regent, and guardian of the young king, David II., during his minority. His first act was to ratify the peace with England, and he next applied himself with great vigour and success to the restoration of the internal tranquillity of the kingdom. He was strict in the dispensation of justice and severe and summary in his sentences on criminals. Of this two instances are recorded. While holding a justice-aire at Wigton, his protection was claimed for a man who had escaped from an ambuscade placed for his assassination in a neighbouring wood. The men in ambush being arrested were, by the regent's orders, executed, their purpose, though not carried into effect, having been murder. In the other case, while sitting in justiciary at Inverness, he noticed a man who, some time before, had murdered a priest, and then hastening to Rome had received absolution from the pope for the crime. Deeming himself safe, he returned to Scotland, but Randolph had very different notions of the claims of justice, and regardless of pope or pardon, as well as the plea of the murderer that the person slain, as a priest, was the subject of Rome, he put him on his trial, and being found guilty his execution followed.

In 1332, the English prepared to invade Scotland, when Randolph, though then suffering severely from the stone, assembled an army, and advanced into Berwickshire to oppose them. Finding, however, that they were coming by sea, he proceeded towards the Forth, but died at Musselburgh, on the 20th July of that year. The story that the English king had employed a vagrant monk to poison him, has been shown by Lord Hailes to be a pure invention.

RATTRAY, a surname, see SUPPLEMENT.

REAY, Lord, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1628, on Sir Donald Mackay of Far, baronet, the elder son of Hueheon or Hugh Mackay, by his second wife, Lady Jean Gordon, eldest daughter of the eleventh earl of Sutherland, (see p. 7 of this volume). He was born in February 1591, and in 1612, in his father's lifetime, was engaged, under a commission from the king to him and John Gordon, younger of Embo, in arresting at Thurso a notorious coiner named Arthur Smith, a servant of the wicked earl of Caithness, when a tumult ensued in which John Sinclair of Strickage, a nephew of the latter, was killed. The matter was brought before the privy council, on the complaint of both parties, and the proceedings that took place thereupon are related at page 523 of vol. i. In December 1613 Donald Mackay, with others concerned, obtained a remission and pardon for their share in the transaction. He succeeded his father in 1614, and in 1616 was knighted at Theobald's by King James VI. Believing himself to have been ill used by his uncles Sir Robert and Sir Alexander Gordon, in 1618 he abandoned the house of Sutherland with which he was connected, and formed an alliance with the rival family, that of the earl of Caithness, who had long been their mortal enemy, the principal object of this alliance being the destruction of the clan Gun. Through the interference, however, of his uncle, Sir Robert Gordon, he was soon after reconciled to the Sutherland family, and in 1622, when Caithness was denounced a rebel, his name was included, with those of his uncles and James Sinclair of Murkle, in the new commission of fire and sword issued against him. In 1626 Sir Donald obtained the king's license to raise a regiment in the north to assist Count Mansfeldt in his campaign in Germany, and collected about 3,000 men, the greater part of whom embarked at Cromarty in October of that year. On account of bad health he was obliged to delay his own departure, and on 18th March 1627 he was created a baronet. Soon after he proceeded to Germany, and distinguished himself in the service of the king of Denmark. In 1628 he was again in Britain, when he was raised to the peerage by the title of Lord Reay, by patent dated 20th June of that year, to him and his heirs male for ever. Returning to Germany, he served two campaigns against the imperialists, and in 1630 he joined the king of Sweden with his regiment, in consequence of a peace having been concluded between the king of Denmark and the emperor of Germany. A considerable number of gentlemen, chiefly from Ross, Sutherland, and Caithness, joined him on this occasion, some of whom rose to high rank in the army of Gustavus Adolphus. In 1631, he returned to England, and was accused by one David Ramsay of having said that the troops raised by the marquis of Hamilton for the Swedish service were intended to assist him in asserting his right to the Scottish crown. Lord Reay denied the charge, but Ramsay persisting in his story, his lordship challenged him to combat. As the case involved a matter of treason, it was considered so important that a high court of chivalry was, by commission under the great seal, constituted, to superintend the combat, which was appointed to be fought in Tothill Fields, Westminster, 12th April 1631, the English earl of Lindsey being nominated for the occasion high constable of England, and the earl of Arundel, earl Marischal. The parties were ordained to be armed each with a long sword, a short sword, a pike and dagger. The meeting was adjourned to 17th May, and on the 12th the court assembled, when both Lord Reay and Ramsay were committed to the Tower of London till they found security to keep the peace.

On the breaking out of the civil wars, his lordship, with the earl of Sutherland and others, joined the Covenanters on the north of the river Spey. He afterwards took arms in defence of Charles I., and in 1643 arrived from Denmark, with ships and arms, and a large sum of money, for the service of the king. He was in Newcastle in 1644, when that town was stormed by the Scots, and being made prisoner, was conveyed to Edinburgh tolbooth. He obtained his release after the battle of Kilsyth in August 1645, and embarked at Thurso in July 1648 for Denmark, where he died in February 1649. He married, first, in 1610, Barbara, eldest daughter of Kenneth, Lord Kintail, and had by her Y Mackay, who died in 1617; John, second Lord Reay, two other sons and two daughters. By a second wife, Rachel Winterfield or Harrison, he had two sons, the Hon. Robert Mackay Forbes and the Hon. Hugh Forbes. Of this marriage he procured a sentence of nullity, and then took to wife Elizabeth, daughter of Robert Thomson of Greenwich, but in 1637 was ordained to pay his second wife £2,000 sterling for part maintenance, and £3,000 sterling yearly during his non-adherence. By Elizabeth Thomson he had one daughter.

John, second Lord Reay, joined the royalists under the earl of Glencairn in 1654, and was taken at Balveny and imprisoned. By his wife, a daughter of Donald Mackay of Scourie, he had three sons: 1. Donald, master of Reay, who predeceased his father, leaving by his wife Ann, daughter of Sir George Munro of Culecain, a son, George, third Lord Reay. 2. The Hon. Brigadier-general Æneas Mackay, who married Margaretta, countess of Puchlor; and 3. The Hon. Colin Mackay. Æneas, the second son, was colonel of the Mackay Dutch regiment. His family settled at the Hague, where they obtained considerable possessions, and formed alliances with several noble families. Their representative, Berthold Baron Mackay, died 26th December 1854, at his chateau of Ophemert, in Guelderland, aged eighty-one. He married the Baroness Van Renasse Van Wilp, and his eldest son, the Baron Æneas Mackay, at one time chamberlain to the king of Holland, became next heir to the peerage of Reay, after the present family.

George, third Lord Reay, F.R.S., took the oaths and his seat in parliament, 29th October 1700. In the rebellion of 1715, he raised his clan in support of the government. In 1719, when the earls Marischal and Seaforth, and the marquis of Tullibardine, with 300 Spaniards, landed in the Western Highlands, he did the same, and also in 1745. He died at Tongue, 21st March 1748. He was thrice married; first, to Margaret, daughter of Lieutenant-general Robert Mackay of Scourie, colonel of the 21st regiment of foot, killed at Steinkirk in 1692, and had by her one son, Donald, fourth Lord Reay; secondly, to Janet, daughter of John Sinclair of Ulbster, by whom he had a son, the Hon. Colonel Hugh Mackay of Bighouse, and a daughter, Anne, wife of John Watson of Muirhouse, Mid Lothian; and, thirdly, to Mary, daughter of John Dowel, Esq., writer in Edinburgh, and had by her four daughters and two sons, the Hon. George Mackay of Skibo, and the Hon. Alexander Mackay, captain in the earl of Loudoun's Highlanders, on that regiment being raised, 8th June 1745. At the battle of Preston or Gladsmair that year, he commanded one of the three companies of his regiment engaged in it, and was taken prisoner by the rebels. He attained the rank of lieutenant-general in the army, and was commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland, colonel of the 21st foot, and governor of Stirling castle. He died 31st May 1789. Christian, the third daughter, was the wife of the Rev. John Erskine, D.D., of Carnock, minister of the old Greyfriars church, Edinburgh.

Donald, fourth Lord Reay, succeeded his father in 1748, and died at Durness, 18th August, 1761. He was twice married, and, with one daughter, the Hon. Mrs. Edgar, had two sons, George, fifth Lord Reay, who died at Rosebank, near Edinburgh, 27th February 1768, and Hugh, sixth lord. The fifth Lord Reay was also twice married, but had issue only by his second wife, a son, who died young, and three daughters. Hugh, his half-brother, who succeeded him, was for some years in a state of mental imbecility. He died at Skerry, 26th January 1797, unmarried, when the title devolved on Eric Mackay, son of the Hon. George Mackay of Skibo, third son of the third Lord Reay. Admitted advocate in 1737, Mr. Mackay of Skibo was, in 1757, elected M.P. for the county of Sutherland, and two years afterwards was appointed master of the mint of Scotland. He died at Tongue, June 25, 1782. By his wife, Anne, third daughter of Hon. Eric Sutherland, only son of the attainted Lord Duffus, he had 5 sons and 4 daughters. His eldest son, George, died in 1790. Eric, the 2d son, became 7th Lord Reay. Alexander, the next, an officer in the army, succeeded as 8th Lord Reay. Donald Hugh, the 4th son, a vice-admiral, died March 26, 1850. Patrick, the youngest, died an infant.

Eric, 7th Lord Reay, was, in 1806, elected one of the representative Scots peers. He died, unmarried, July 8, 1847, and was succeeded, as 8th Lord Reay, by his brother Alexander, barrack-master at Malta, born in 1775. He married in 1809, Marian, daughter of Col. Goll, military secretary to Warren Hastings, and relict of David Ross, Esq. of Calcutta, eldest son of the Scottish judge, Lord Ankerville, issue, 2 sons and 6 daughters. George, the eldest son, died in 1811. The 2d son, Eric, master of Reay, was born in 1813.

REID, a surname, being the old spelling of Red. The family of Reid of Barra, Aberdeenshire, possesses a baronetcy of Nova Scotia, conferred in 1706 on Alexander Reid of Barra. The fifth baronet, Sir Alexander Reid, succeeded his brother, Sir John, Capt. R.N., in 1845; married, with issue.

General John Reid of Strathloch, the founder of the professorship of music in the university of Edinburgh, adopted that surname in preference to his patronymic, Robertson. He was the son of Alexander Robertson of Strathloch, a property near Stratbardle in Perthshire, whose forefathers for more than three centuries were always called Barons Rua, Roy, or Red, from the first of the family having red hair. They were descended from the youngest son of Patrick Robertson, the first of Lude. All the younger children bore the name of Robertson. The general, however, though the heir, chose the name of Reid. He was born Feb. 13, 1721, and educated at the university of Edinburgh. He became a lieutenant in the earl of Loudoun's Highlanders, raised in 1745, and rose to the rank of general. He had a fine taste for music, and was one of the best flute-players of the age. In 1770 he published a set of Minuets and Marches, styled General Reid's Minuets, inscribed to the Right Hon. Lady Catherine Murray. In this collection appeared the celebrated and well known air, composed by him when major of the 42d regiment, to the words of "The Garb of Old Gaul" written by Captain afterwards Sir Harry Erskine of Alva, baronet. It is there entitled "The Highland, or 42d Regiment's March," which it has ever since continued to be. He likewise published Six Solos for a German Flute or Violin, with a thorough bass for the harpsichord, in which he styles himself "a member of the Temple of Apollo." These are usually called Captain Reid's Solos, he having been only a captain when he composed them. He died at London, February 6, 1807, aged 85. In his will, dated at London, 19th April 1803, he describes himself as "John Reid, Esq. General in his Majesty's army and Colonel of the 88th regiment of foot," and states that he was "the last representative of an old family in Perthshire, which on my death will be extinct in the male line." He left £52,000 in the 3 per cents, subject to the liferent of his daughter, for the purpose of establishing a professorship of music in the university of Edinburgh, where he was educated, the salary not to be less than £300 per annum. He directs in his will that annually on his birthday, the 13th of February, there shall be a concert of music held, including a full military band, to commence with some pieces of his own composition, to show the style of music that prevailed about the middle of the 18th century, among the first of which is that of 'The Garb of Old Gaul.' The chair of music was founded in 1839, when nearly £80,000 became available for its endowment.

REID, THOMAS, a philosopher and Latin poet of considerable reputation in his time, the son of James Reid, the first minister, after the Reformation, of Banchory-Ternan, in Kincardineshire, flourished in the seventeenth century. He studied at Marischal college, Aberdeen, and afterwards travelled through the greater part of Europe. Having maintained public disputations in several of the foreign universities, he collected into a volume the theses he defended. His Latin poems are preserved in the 'Delitiæ Poetarum Scotorum.' On his return to Britain, he was appointed Latin secretary to James I. of England. While on the Continent he had purchased the best editions of all the classics which were printed from the time of Aldus Manutius until 1615, also several curious manuscripts, particularly a Hebrew Bible, of most beautiful writing, supposed to have been the work of the twelfth century, all of which he bequeathed to the Marischal college, Aberdeen, with a considerable sum of money as a fund for a yearly salary to a librarian. He belonged to the family from which the celebrated philosopher, Dr. Thomas Reid, was descended.

His brother, Alexander Reid, an eminent physician, was the first, it is said, who read physical lectures to the Company of barber-chirurgeons at London. In 1620 he was created doctor of physic at Oxford by royal mandate. He was afterwards physician to Charles I., and died about 1680. He published a 'Manual of Anatomy,' and other medical works.

REID, THOMAS, a distinguished moral philosopher, was born, April 26, 1710, at the manse of Strachan, Kincardineshire, a parish situated about twenty-three miles from Aberdeen, on the north side of the Grampian mountains. His father, the Rev. Lewis Reid, was minister of that parish for fifty years, and his mother, the daughter of Mr. Gregory of Kinnairdie, was sister to David, James, and Charles Gregory, the celebrated professors. After two years spent at the parish school of Kincardine-O'Neil, young Reid was sent to Aberdeen for his classical education. About the age of twelve or thirteen, being intended for the church, he was entered as a student in Marischal college, where his instructor in philosophy, for three years, was Dr. George Turnbull, who afterwards attracted some notice as an author, particularly by a book, entitled 'Principles of Moral Philosophy,' and by a voluminous 'Treatise on Ancient Painting,' published in 1741, but long ago forgotten. It does not appear that Reid gave any early indications of future eminence, although his industry and modesty were conspicuous from his childhood. At college, however, he excelled the other students in mathematics, for which he soon showed a decided predilection. He continued longer than usual at the university, in consequence of having been appointed to the office of librarian, which had been endowed by his ancestor, the subject of the previous notice. During this period he formed an intimacy with John Stewart, afterwards professor of mathematics in Marischal college, and author of a Commentary on Newton's Quadrature of Curves. In 1736 he resigned the librarianship, and accompanied Mr. Stewart on an excursion to England, when they visited London, Oxford, and Cambridge. His uncle, Dr. David Gregory, procured him a ready access to Martin Folkes, the philosopher and antiquary, at whose house he met many eminent men in literature and science. At Cambridge he saw the vain and erudite Dr. Bentley, and enjoyed repeated conversations with Sanderson, the blind mathematician, who presented a phenomenon in the history of the human mind, to which Dr. Reid has more than once referred in his philosophical speculations.

In 1737 he was preferred, by the King's college, Aberdeen, to the living of New Machar, in the same county; but so great was the aversion of the people to the law of patronage, that his settlement not only met with most violent opposition, but he himself was exposed to personal danger. His unwearied attention, however, to the duties of his office, with the mildness and forbearance of his temper, soon overcame all prejudices, and in a few years afterwards, when called to a different situation, he was followed by the tears and benedictions of the very same people who would formerly have rejected him.

During his residence at New Machar, the greater part of his time was spent in intense study, more particularly in a careful examination of the laws of external perception, and of the other principles which form the groundwork of human knowledge. His chief relaxations were gardening and botany, to both of which pursuits he retained his attachment in old age. In 1740 he married his cousin, Elizabeth, daughter of Dr. George Reid, physician in London.

In 1748 he communicated to the Transactions of the Royal Society 'An Essay on Quantity, occasioned by reading a Treatise, in which Simple and Compound Ratios are applied to Virtue and Merit.' In 1752 he was elected professor of moral philosophy in King's college, Old Aberdeen. Soon after his removal there, in conjunction with his friend, Dr. John Gregory, he projected a literary Society, which subsisted for many years, meeting once a-week for the discussion of philosophical subjects, and it numbered among its members the illustrious names of Reid, Gregory, Campbell, Beattie, and Gerard. In 1764 he published his celebrated 'Inquiry into the Human Mind, on the Principles of Common Sense,' one of the most original and profound works which appeared about that period. As its professed object was the refutation of Mr. Hume's sceptical theory, with the view of avoiding any misconstruction of the historian's meaning, he submitted, through Dr. Blair, some detached parts of the work to Mr. Hume for his perusal. With these the latter was so much pleased, that he at once addressed a letter to the author, expressing his satisfaction at the perspicuous and philosophical manner in which he had replied to his reasonings. Soon after the publication of the 'Inquiry,' he received the degree of D.D. from the university of Aberdeen. A short time previous, the university of Glasgow had invited him to the chair of moral philosophy, then vacant by the resignation of Dr. Adam Smith, the superior advantages of which professorship induced him to accept of it, and, accordingly, he entered upon its duties in 1764. In the class-room, Dr. Reid was careful to divest his lectures of all metaphysical and merely scholastic terms and theories, teaching moral science on the sound principles of inductive philosophy, as inculcated by Bacon. Although there was nothing attractive in his elocution or mode of instruction, his style was so simple and perspicuous, his character so full of gravity and authority, and his students felt such an interest in the doctrines which he taught, that he was uniformly heard with the most respectful attention.

In 1781, while his health and faculties were yet entire, though he was at this period upwards of seventy years of age, he withdrew from his public labours, in order to devote himself wholly to philosophical investigation. In 1785 he published his 'Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man;' and in 1788, those on 'The Active Powers,' which are generally published together, under the title of 'Essays on the Powers of the Human Mind.' These works, with his 'Inquiry,' the 'Essay on Quantity,' already mentioned, and a short but masterly analysis of Aristotle's Logic, which forms an Appendix to the third volume of Lord Kames' 'Sketches,' published in 1773, comprehend the whole of Dr. Reid's published writings. At different times he read some essays before a Philosophical Society, of which he was a member, among which were 'An Examination of Dr. Priestley's Opinions concerning Matter and Mind,' 'Observations on the Utopia of Sir Thomas More,' and 'Physiological Reflections on Muscular Motion.' He outlived his wife and a numerous family of children, save one daughter, married to Patrick Carmichael, M.D. During the summer of 1796 he was prevailed upon by Dr. Gregory to pass a few weeks at Edinburgh.

He returned to Glasgow in his usual health and spirits; but about the end of September of that year he was seized with his last illness. After a severe struggle, attended with repeated attacks of palsy, he died on the 7th of October following, at the advanced age of eighty-six. His portrait is subjoined:

His works were collected by Mr. Dugald Stewart, and published in four volumes in 1803, with his Life prefixed, on which all the biographical accounts of Dr. Reid are founded. A French translation of this great philosopher's writings, by Jouffroy, with an Introductory Essay and Notes by Royard-Collard, appeared at Paris in 1828.

REID, JOHN, M.D., an eminent anatomist and physiologist, the sixth child of Henry Reid, a farmer and cattle-dealer, was born at Bathgate, Linlithgowshire, April 9th, 1809. He received his rudimentary education at the village school, and at the age of fourteen entered the university of Edinburgh, where for the first two or three years he chiefly studied Latin, Greek, and mathematics. He was originally intended for the church, but, preferring the medical profession, he devoted himself, for five years, with ardour to the requisite studies, and in 1830 took his degree of M.D. For a year he acted as clerk or assistant physician in the clinical department of the Edinburgh Infirmary, and in the autumn of 1831 he proceeded to Paris, for the purpose of improving himself in its medical schools. While in the French capital, as he himself tells us, his habit was to go to one of the hospitals for three hours in the morning before breakfast; after breakfast to the dissecting rooms for three or four hours more, and then he attended a lecture or two. The following year he returned to Edinburgh, and with three other medical men was sent to Dumfries, where the cholera was then raging, to assist the physicians of the district during the prevalence there of that fearful scourge. He subsequently became a partner in the school of anatomy in Old Surgeon's Hall, Edinburgh, and for three years discharged the duties of demonstrator, with high reputation to himself and to the great advantage of the numerous students who attended there. In 1836 he was appointed lecturer on physiology in the Edinburgh Extra-Academical Medical School, and, two years after, practical pathologist to the Royal Infirmary of that city, of which institution in the ensuing year he became the superintendent.

At this time he was engaged in some of those interesting physiological researches which caused his name to be held in high estimation by his professional brethren. An abridgment or abstract of his great 'Experimental Investigations into the Functions of the Eight pair of Nerves, or the Glossopharyngeal, Pneumogastric, and Spinal Accessory,' made at this period, was intimated to the British Scientific Association at the meetings of 1847 and 1848, and published in detail in the 'Edinburgh Medical and Surgical Journal' for January 1848, and April 1849. In March 1841 he was appointed Chandos professor of anatomy and medicine in the university of St. Andrews, and besides the regular lectures which belonged to the chair, he delivered also a course on comparative anatomy and general physiology. Having directed his inquiries to the natural history of the marine animals on the coast of Fife, he communicated the results in several papers to the 'Annals and Magazine of Natural History.' In 1848 he published in one volume his 'Physiological, Anatomical, and Pathological Researches,' being the papers and essays, twenty-eight in all, which he had for thirteen years contributed to various scientific journals.

Dr. Reid had long been afflicted with cancer in the tongue. In the year mentioned an operation was performed, and in consequence his health rallied so greatly that hopes were entertained of his ultimate recovery; but the insidious disease had made progress in his neck and throat, which caused his death, on 30th July 1849, at the early age of 41. In his latter years he gave evidence of having come under the power and influence of religion, and died a true Christian. By his wife, a lady of the name of Ann Blyth, he had two daughters, one of them a posthumous child. His Life, by George Wilson, M.D., was published in 1851.

RENNIE, GEORGE, an eminent agriculturist, was born on the farm of Phantassie, in the county of Haddington, in 1749. His father, James Rennie, a respectable farmer, was one of the most active promoters of agricultural improvements in his day, and his brother, John Rennie, was the celebrated civil engineer, of whom a short notice follows. He early exhibited indications of that activity, penetration, and intelligence, for which he was remarkable in after years. When scarcely sixteen, his father sent him to Tweedside to make a survey of the state of agriculture in that part of the country, where several gentlemen, among whom were Lord Kames, Hume of Ninewells, Renton of Lammerton, Fordyce of Ayton, and others, had commenced a system of extensive improvement of their own estates; and here his powers of observation enabled him to obtain much of that practical knowledge which afterwards rendered him so distinguished. In 1765 he was intrusted with the superintendence of a brewery, erected by his father on the ground afterwards occupied by the Linton distillery; but Mr. Rennie, senior, dying the following year, the establishment was relinquished, and in 1770 was let to a tenant. In 1783 he again undertook the management of the works, and commenced the business of distilling on a large scale. The distillery remained in his hands until 1797, when the whole work was let on lease. His reputation as a successful agriculturist had, in the meantime, become known over Scotland, and in 1787 he caused Mr. Meikle, the inventor of the drum thrashing machine, one of the most important discoveries which the agricultural art owes to mechanical genius, to erect on the Phantassie property, the first machine in the county worked with horses, the only previous one being that of Mr. Meikle himself, at Knowsmill, near Tyningham, which was impelled by water. The merit of this useful discovery being disputed by several persons, Mr. Rennie came forward in vindication of his friend Meikle, who was then between eighty and ninety years of age, and completely established his claim to the invention, in a letter originally inserted in a pamphlet by Mr. Sheriff, entitled 'A Reply to an Address to the Public, but more particularly to the Landed Interest of Great Britain and Ireland, on the subject of the Thrashing Machine. Mr. Rennie died October 6, 1828. His son, George Rennie, at one period governor of the Falkland Islands, and in 1841 elected M.P. for Ipswich, died March 22, 1860. In early life he devoted himself to sculpture, and produced at Rome some remarkable works, one of which, the 'Grecian Archer,' he presented to the Athenæum Club.

RENNIE, JOHN, a celebrated engineer, brother of the preceding, and uncle of governor Rennie, was born on the farm of Phantassie, East Lothian, June 7, 1761. He acquired the rudiments of his education at the parish school, and after being for two years with Mr. Andrew Meikle, an eminent millwright, he was sent to the school of Dunbar. On the promotion of the master to Perth Academy, the latter recommended him as his successor; but preferring mechanical employment, he soon resumed his labours with Mr. Meikle. After acting for a short time on his own account, in 1783, he was induced to remove to London, and soon after was employed by Messrs. Boulton and Watt in the construction of two steam engines, and the machinery connected therewith, at the Albion flour mills, near Blackfriars Bridge; which in 1791 were unfortunately destroyed by wilful fire. He was next engaged in superintending the construction of the new machinery of Whitbread's brewery, the execution of which increased his reputation. Having commenced business for himself as a civil engineer, from 1794 he was regarded as standing at the head of the profession in Great Britain, and was connected with every public work of magnitude in the kingdom. Canals, bridges, harbours, wet docks, and machines of every description, were extensively executed from his designs, and under his direction. Among his principal works may be mentioned Ramsgate harbour; Waterloo and Southwark bridges, London; the London docks, and the East and West India docks, at Blackwall; the Prince's dock at Liverpool; the docks at Hull, Dublin, Greenock, and Leith, and the breakwater at Plymouth, with several similar structures, where submarine masonry was carried to the utmost perfection. The greatest effort of his genius is generally considered to be the Bell Rock lighthouse, constructed on the same principle as that on the Eddystone rocks, erected by Smeaton. He built the stone bridges at Kelso, Musselburgh, and other places in Scotland, and the iron bridge over the Witham in Lincolnshire, and superintended the formation of the Grand Western canal, and the execution of the Aberdeen canal which unites the Dee and the Don, as well as other canals in different parts of the country. Before his death he had given plans for improving the docks at Sheerness, which were executed by his sons, George and John, afterwards Sir John Rennie, architect, who was knighted in 1831. He also furnished the designs for the new London bridge, the charge of the construction of which was intrusted to Sir John Rennie, who, in 1831, finished that magnificent structure.

Mr. Rennie was remarkable for his steady resolution and perseverance, and for his indefatigable industry. On going to France for a short time in 1816, he declared it to be the first relaxation he had taken for nearly thirty years. He married in 1789, and had four sons and two daughters. He died of inflammation of the liver, October 16, 1821, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral, London.

RENTON, a surname derived from lands in Berwickshire of that name, forming part of the barony of Coldingham. In old charters it is spelled Regnintun, Reignintun, Raynton, &c. The ancient family of Renton held the office of forester over the woods of the priory of Coldingham from the days of William the Lion, and this being hereditary, led them to assume the name of Forester in preference to that of Renton. In the 15th century the family ended in a female.

David Renton of Billy in the Merse, a descendant of the ancient foresters of Coldingham, became, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, proprietor of the estate of Lamberton, in the same county. Agnes, daughter of Renton of Billy, was the first wife of Alexander Lesly, first earl of Leven, the commander of the covenanting army at Duns Law in May 1639. The family sold the estate of Billy about the beginning of the 18th century.

Sir Thomas Renton, M.D., second son of William Renton of Moscastle, of the house of Billy, became so eminent in his day, by his skill in the cure of ruptures, that he was called to London in 1719, and appointed physician to Chelsea Hospital. He was knighted by George I., who made him his own physician extraordinary, and conferred on him a present of £5,000 in money, with a yearly pension of £500. His majesty also gave orders to Lord Carteret, then secretary of state, to cause a patent to be drawn out creating Sir Thomas a baron of Great Britain, under the title of Lord Renton, but he declined the peerage. He often attended the king in his journeys to Hanover.

The Rentons of Lamberton were in 1836 (Hist. of Coldingham Priory, p. 147) represented by Alexander Campbell Renton, Esq., grandson of the last lineal descendant, Lieutenant-colonel Alexander Renton.

RENWICK, JAMES, a celebrated field-preacher, and the last martyr for the covenanted work of Reformation in Scotland, was born in the parish of Glencairn, in Nithsdale, February 15, 1662. He was the son of Andrew Renwick, a weaver, by his wife, Elizabeth Corsan. From his childhood he evinced a pious disposition, and even at two years of age was observed to be aiming at prayer. His parents, being in very poor circumstances, with difficulty kept him at school, and during the time he attended the university of Edinburgh, he supported himself chiefly by assisting some gentlemen's sons in their education. On the conclusion of his academical course, having refused to take the oath of allegiance, he was denied laureation, but, with two others, afterwards received it privately at Edinburgh, where, for some time, he remained prosecuting his studies. He subsequently attached himself to the persecuted Presbyterians, and attended their secret meetings, taking an active part in all their proceedings. Having been present at the martyrdom of Mr. Donald Cargill, July 27, 1681, he determined to unite with the small remnant that adhered to his principles; and when the more zealous of the Covenanters agreed to publish the Lanark Declaration, Renwick was employed to proclaim it, which he did January 12, 1682, although he had no hand in its composition, and disapproved of some of its expressions.

Finding it impossible, in the then circumstances of the times, to obtain license in his own country, he was, by his party, sent over to Holland, in December 1682, when he entered a student at the university of Groningen. In six months he was found qualified for the ministry, and accordingly received ordination there. He commenced his ministerial labours in his native land, his first public sermon being preached November 23, 1683, in a moss at Darnead, in the parish of Cambusnethan; when, in vindication of himself, and for the information of his hearers, he gave an account of his call to the ministry, and declared his firm adherence to the persecuted Church of Scotland. At the same time he fully explained his mind as to the various religious questions then in agitation, and described particularly the class of preachers and professors he was resolved to hold no communion with. This gave great offence to some of the indulged ministers and false brethren, who had been led away by the defections of the times, and exposed him to much calumnious misrepresentation.

His fame and success as a field-preacher attracted the notice of the council, by whom he was publicly proclaimed a traitor, and all his adherents were treated as abettors of rebellion. In 1684 his troubles and discouragements began still more to thicken around him; nevertheless, he continued to preach wherever and whenever he could find opportunity. During that year his enemies became more vigilant in their search after him, and letters of intercommuning were issued against him and his followers, which led to the latter publishing, at the market-cross and church doors of several towns, their famous Apologetical Declaration, November 8, 1684. After this, the unhappy fugitives were hunted, like beasts of prey, through the mosses, muirs, and mountains of their native land, having often no place of refuge or retirement but a desert glen, or wild cavern of the earth. Renwick himself was often hotly pursued by the sanguinary soldiers, and had many signal escapes and remarkable deliverances.

On the accession of James VII. to the throne, Renwick, and about two hundred men, went to Sanquhar, May 28, 1685, and published a protest against his snecession, at the same time renouncing their allegiance to him, which was afterwards called the Sanquhar Declaration. In October 1687 a reward of one hundred pounds sterling was offered for his apprehension. Having gone to Edinburgh in January 1688, to deliver to the Synod of indulged ministers a protestation against the toleration they had accepted, which he lodged in the hands of Mr. Hugh Kennedy, their moderator, he was discovered, and after a short resistance, seized, on February 1. and committed close prisoner to the Tolbooth. On the 8th he was tried before the high court of justiciary, on an indictment which charged him with disowning the king's authority, refusing to pay the cess, and maintaining the lawfulness of defensive arms. He was found guilty, on his own confession, and executed in the Grassmarket of Edinburgh, on the 17th, being then only twenty-six years and two days old. His life was written by a contemporary field-preacher, Mr. Alexander Shields; and in 1777 appeared at Glasgow, 'A Choice Collection of very valuable Prefaces, Lectures, and Sermons, preached upon the Mountains and Muirs of Scotland, in the hottest time of the Persecution,' by Mr. James Renwick; to which are added, by the same author, the Form and Order of Ruling Elders, a Reply to Mr. Langlan's Letter to Gavin Wotherspoon, &c., which work has been several times reprinted.

RICHARDSON, the name of a family which possesses a baronetcy of Nova Scotia, conferred, 13th November 1630, on Sir Robert Richardson of Pencaitland, Haddingtonshire, whose son, Sir Robert, second baronet, sold that estate, and died without issue in 1640. The baronetcy devolved on his cousin, Sir James Richardson of Smeaton, third baronet, who died in 1680. His son, Sir James Richardson, fourth baronet, sold the Smeaton estate in 1708, and died in 1717. On the death of Sir John Richardson, the twelfth baronet, 12th April, 1821, the baronetcy became dormant. In 1837, Sir John Stewart Richardson, son of James Richardson, Esq. of Pitfour, Perthshire, was served heir male general to this baronetcy as heir of the first baronet's elder brother, and accordingly became 13th baronet. Born Sep. 1, 1797, in Aug. 1843 he was appointed secretary to the order of the Thistle. In 1826 he married Mary, daughter of James Hay, Esq. of Collepriest, Devonshire, issue 4 sons and 3 drs. James Thomas, the eldest son, 78th Highlanders, was born Dec. 24, 1840.

RICHARDSON, WILLIAM, a miscellaneous writer, son of Rev. James Richardson, minister of Aberfoyle, was born there Oct. 1, 1743, and educated at the parish school. In his 14th year he was sent to the university of Glasgow, and after finishing the usual curriculum, entered on the study of divinity; but, before he had completed his theological course, he was appointed tutor to the two sons of Lord Cathcart, whom he accompanied to Eton, where he remained for two years. In 1768 he went with his pupils to St. Petersburg, their father having been nominated ambassador-extraordinary to the empress of Russia; and, during his residence there, he acted as secretary to Lord Cathcart. In 1772 he returned with his only surviving pupil to Glasgow, and soon after, through the interest of Lord Cathcart, then lord rector of the university there, he was chosen professor of humanity, having succeeded Professor Muirhead in that chair. He died November 3, 1814. His works are:

He was also a contributor to Gilbert Stewart's Edinburgh Magazine and Review, and to the Mirror and Lounger; and wrote the Life of Professor Arthur prefixed to his works, and an Essay on Celtic Superstitions, appended to Dr. Graham's Inquiry into the Authenticity of the Poems of Ossian. He left in manuscript an Essay on Figurative Language, and some other papers.

RIDDELL, the surname of an ancient Roxburghshire family. The first in Scotland of the name was Gervase de Riddel, who accompanied from England David, prince of Cumberland, afterwards David I., and received from him considerable lands in that county. He was of Norman extraction, his grandfather, the Sieur de Riddell, having come over with William the Conqueror. The latter is particularly named in the roll of Battle Abbey, with "Avenell and Ros," and lands in various parts of England were bestowed on him by the Conqueror. From Dugdale's Baronage, (vol. i. p. 555,) we learn that his son Geoffrey, Lord Riddell, father of Gervase, was lord-chief-justice of England in 1107, and that he married Geva, daughter of Hugh de Abrincas, earl of Chester, of whom descended Matilda or Mand, wife of David, earl of Huntingdon, and grandmother of Robert Bruce the competitor, grandfather of King Robert the Bruce. He perished at sea in the same ship with Prince William, son of Henry I., on their return from France in 1120. His son, Gervase or Geoffrey, was progenitor of the Scottish family of Riddell of Riddell.

This Gervase or Geoffrey Riddell was the earliest sheriff of Roxburghshire. He was witness to most of the charters and donations of King David I., and also to the well-known Inquisition made by that monarch when prince of Cumberland, for the old possessions belonging to the church of Glasgow. He died about 1140, leaving two sons, Walter, his heir, and Sir Anketil, who succeeded his brother.

The elder son, Walter de Riddell, had a charter from David I., of the lands of Lilliesleaf, Whittunes, &c., in the county of Roxburgh, to be held of the king per servitium unius militis, sicut unus baronum nostrorum, &c. This is admitted to be the oldest charter extant by a Scottish king to a laic. It is without a date, as was usual in those days, but must have been granted sometime between 1140 and 1153. Nisbet, (vol. i. p. 374) says that he had seen a transcript of it, made by order of Lord Gray, justice-general of Scotland, in a justiciary court held at Jedburgh in 1506. The lands named were afterwards called the barony of Riddell. In the 'Lay of the Last Minstrel,' Sir Walter Scott mentions "Ancient Riddell's fair domain."

And in a note he says, "The family of Riddell have been very long in possession of the barony called Riddell or Reydale, part of which still bears the latter name. Tradition carries their antiquity to a point extremely remote; and is in some degree sanctioned by the discovery of two stone coffins, one containing an earthen pot filled with ashes and arms, bearing a legible date, A. D. 727, the other dated 936, and filled with the bones of a man of gigantic size. These coffins were discovered in the foundations of what was, but has long since ceased to be, the chapel of Riddell, and, as it was argued with plausibility that they contained the remains of some ancestors of the family, they were deposited in the modern place of sepulture, comparatively so termed, though built in 1110." There is nothing in the discovery of two stone coffins with the respective dates mentioned, to support the supposition that the family of Riddell was settled at that place in the seventh or eighth century, as has been rather hastily assumed. The first grant of land they had in Scotland was in the reign of David I., as above shown, when the first of the name came from England and obtained possessions in Roxburghshire.

Of Sir Anketil de Riddell, Walter's brother and successor, we find in Dalrymple's Collections many remarkable documents, particularly two bulls in confirmation from Popes Adrian IV. and Alexander III., of the lands of Lilliesleaf, Whittunes, &c., subsequently called Riddell, which have remained in the family through a long train of unbroken lineal succession. Sir Anketil had three sons: 1. Walter, his heir; 2. Hugo or Hugh, who was one of the hostages for King William the Lion, when taken prisoner at the battle of Alnwick in 1174; and 3. Jordanus de Riddell, who is witness to a charter of King William to the abbey of Dunfermline. Hugh, the second son, was progenitor of the Riddells of Cranstonriddell, having received a grant of the manor of Cranston in Mid Lothian from Earl Henry. The family terminated in an heiress, who, about 1478, married a son of the house of Crichton.

The eldest son, Walter de Riddell, had two sons: Sir Patrick, who, after succeeding to the estate, made donations of portions of his lands of Whittunes to the church at Melrose, in the reigns of William the Lion and Alexander II.; and Radulphus or Ralph, who is mentioned in several charters, and is supposed to have been progenitor of the Riddells of Swinburn castle in Northumberland. Sir Patrick's son, Walter de Riddell, got all his lands erected into the free barony of Riddell, and was the first of the family designated of that ilk. He confirmed his father's donations to Melrose, and himself made many donations to the monks of that place and Kelso. He had two sons, Sir William, and Patrick, who is mentioned in several writs.

Sir William, the elder son, was knighted, when a young man, by King Alexander II. He left two sons, Sir William, who, with his kinsman, Sir Hugh Riddell de Cranston, swore a forced fealty to Edward I. of England in 1296, and Galfrid or Geoffrey, who succeeded his brother. Galfrid's son, Sir William de Riddell, succeeded about 1325, and died in the reign of Robert II. His son, Quintin de Riddell, was the next proprietor, and the fifth in regular descent from him, but the fourth who possessed the lands, was Walter de Riddell of that ilk, who married Mariota, daughter of Sir James Pringle of Galashiels, and died in the beginning of the reign of James VI. He had three sons: Walter, Robert, progenitor of the Riddells of Kinglass, and William.

The eldest son, Walter, was served heir to his father in 1588. His son, Andrew Riddell of Riddell and Haining in Selkirkshire, succeeded in 1595. The latter was twice married, his second wife being Violet, daughter of William Douglas of Pompherston, Esq. He died in the beginning of the reign of Charles I. With four daughters, he had four sons: 1. Sir John, the first baronet of the family. 2. William, ancestor of the Riddells of Newhouse. 3. James, progenitor of the Riddells of Maybole; and 4. Walter, upon whom he bestowed the lands of Haining. This gentleman's last heir female, Magdalene Riddell, married David Erskine of Dun, a lord of session, and the family is now represented by the marquis of Ailsa, through the Erskines of Dun.

The eldest son, John, was by Charles I. created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 14th May 1628. With two daughters, he had four sons, namely, Sir Walter, second baronet; Sir William Riddell, governor of Desburgh in Holland; and John and Thomas, both captains in the Dutch service.

The eldest son, Sir Walter, was knighted in his father's lifetime, and succeeded him as second baronet. He had three sons: Sir John, third baronet; William, progenitor of the Riddells of Glenriddell in Dumfriesshire, of whom afterwards; and Archibald, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, commemorated by Wodrow. He took part with the celebrated Blackadder in conducting field-preachings in the south, and about the year 1679, suffered imprisonment for his adherence to the covenant. He had two sons: Captain Walter Riddell of Granton, who died without issue, and Dr. John Riddell, physician in Edinburgh.

Sir John Riddell, third baronet, got a remission from James VII. in 1687, for having been engaged in some treasonable practices against the government. His son, Sir Walter, died in 1747. The fifth baronet, his son, also named Sir Walter, was succeeded in 1765, by his son, Sir John, sixth baronet, who died at Hampstead, near London, 16th April 1768. By his wife, Jane, eldest daughter and eventually heiress of James Buchanan, Esq. of Sunden, Bedfordshire, he had three sons, who all succeeded to the baronetcy, namely, Sir Walter, Sir James Buchanan Riddell, an officer 1st foot-guards, who died at Brunswick a few months after inheriting the title; and Sir John Buchanan Riddell, M.P. for Selkirkshire. The latter died in April 1819, leaving 4 sons and 5 daughters. The eldest son, Sir Walter Buchanan Riddell, barrister-at-law, 10th baronet, born Aug. 8, 1810, has since February 1842 steward of the manorial courts of the duke of Northumberland. Recorder of Maidstone. He married in 1859 Alicia, youngest daughter of William Ripley, Esq., 52d foot.

The Riddells of Ardnamurchan, in Argyleshire, are said to be descended from Galfridus Riddell, baron of Blaye in Guienne, who aided the Normans in the conquest of Apulia, and accompanied William the Conqueror to England. From that monarch he obtained considerable grants of land. John Riddell, the sixteenth in descent from Galfridus, was the first of the family in Scotland. He married a daughter of Thomas Urquhart of Cromarty, and was succeeded in 1584 by his son James Riddell, who, engaging in commercial pursuits, was for some time a merchant at Kasimier in Cracovia, Poland. In Douglas' Baronage, (page 201,) his father's name is said to have been Robert, the second son of William Riddell of that ilk. The armorial bearings of the two families are different, and as it does not appear that the stock from which they both were derived was the same, it is probable that there is some mistake in this statement. About 1595 James Riddell was made a free denizen of the royal city of Kasimier, and in 1602 he had, from Alexander, then king of Poland, all the privileges of a free citizen confirmed to him. On his return to Scotland, he became a burgess and guild-brother of Edinburgh, and died in 1620. By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Adam Allan, merchant in Edinburgh, he had a son, James, who acquired the lands of Kinglass, in Linlithgowshire, and was the first designated by that title. During the civil wars in the time of Charles I., he was much in the confidence of Oliver Cromwell and General Monk. The former lodged with him in his house at Leith, and he afterwards carried on a correspondence with him. He was appointed by the Scots Estates commissary general to their forces in their expedition to the north, and is so designated in his burgess ticket from the town of Brechin in 1645. This gentleman was among the first who established the woollen manufactures in Scotland. Mr. Hogg, the minister of South Leith, having remembered the king in his prayers, the church was, by General Monk's order, turned into a stable, and the parishioners prevented from worshipping there. Previous to Monk's return to England, he asked Mr. Riddell if there was anything wherein he could be serviceable to him or his family. He replied that the only favour he could show him was that he would restore their church to the parishioners of South Leith, and allow them their former liberty of meeting in it for divine service. Monk not only granted the request, but ordered a new roof to be put upon the church at his own expense. In return the inhabitants conferred on Mr. Riddell a large space in the body of the church for a seat for his family. He afterwards got a pass from General Monk, dated 25th November 1659, allowing him to pass and repass, free from molestation, with his servants, horses, arms, &c., about his private affairs. After the Restoration, he obtained from Charles II. an order to himself and some others, for erecting a new manufactory of woollen and tow cards, the first of the kind in Scotland, for which he obtained an act of the Scots parliament held at Edinburgh, 23d September 1663, and John, earl of Crawford and Lindsay, joined in partnership with him, their indenture of copartnership being dated 6th December 1663. He died in 1674. By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of George Foulis of Ravelston, master of the king's mint, he had four sons and two daughters.

The eldest son, James Riddell of Kinglass, was a captain in the Dutch service. He greatly encumbered his paternal estate, and dying unmarried, in 1688, was succeeded by his brother, George, a wine merchant at Leith. This gentleman married Jane, eldest daughter of Captain John Taylor, and dying in 1706, was succeeded by his son, Captain George Riddell, who married Christian, daughter of Andrew Paterson of Kirktown, and had 5 sons and 2 daughters. The sons were, 1. George, who became an eminent physician in Yorkshire, Virginia. 2. Andrew Riddell of Enfield, an officer in the army. 3. James Riddell of Belton, the first of Ardnamurchan, of whom afterwards. 4. John, who acquired a considerable estate by commerce in Virginia; and 5. Robert Riddell of Carzield, Dumfries-shire, an officer in the royal regiment of horseguards blue.
